AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL STANDARDS AND REGULATE TRADE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish national standards for agricultural products and to regulate international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products and to provide that the governor in council may make regulations for the licensing of dealers to deal in any agricultural products shipped from or to a place outside the province in which such dealer carries on business, and for the issue, cancellation and suspension of such licences, including the prescribing of fees for the issue thereof.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NATO MEETING AND INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In welcoming the Secretary of State for External Affairs back to the house, I should like to ask him whether he is prepared to give a general outline of his visit to NATO and also whether in his opinion events of recent days in the U.S.S.R. are indicative of a more hopeful international attitude?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there may be a suitable opportunity in the near future to report on the NATO council meeting and other developments of recent weeks, and I would be glad to take advantage of the opportunity if it should arise.

As to the second part of the question, all I would say is that we have ground, as the result of recent developments, for some satisfaction and, indeed, some optimism, but no ground for exultation or no ground for believing that we have yet reached the end of the period of the cold war. My own view is well described by the phrase that has been used by the President and the Secretary of State of the United States, namely that we can be cautiously optimistic as a result of recent developments.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Could the defence estimates be expedited so the minister might make a statement on the NATO meeting in connection with those estimates? I notice he said he would do so at an early opportunity if that opportunity should arise.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING RELEASE OF 16 POLISH WAR VETERANS

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has just returned I shall not ask him for an answer today, but I wonder whether he would be prepared to make a statement tomorrow with regard to representations to the government of the U.S.S.R. respecting the release of the 16 heroes of the Polish underground movement who were arrested, spirited away to Russia and detained there from 1945 on, and whose terms of imprisonment appear to have expired now.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs in my absence, has been looking into this matter. I believe he can make at least an interim report on it now, if that is agreeable.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend will recall that when he asked this question the other day, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the petition to which he directed attention had not been received. On Tuesday last the petition was received. A delegation presented the petition, and included in that delegation was the daughter of one of the soldiers whose whereabouts concerns us all.

I assured the delegation, on behalf of the government and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the government of Canada would give the matter its sympathetic interest and follow through with the closest attention.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if, having regard to the fact the government of the United States appears to have made representations or presented a note on this subject already to the governments of the U.S.S.R. and Poland, the Canadian government will consider parallel action?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Martin: I may say that consideration is being given to all aspects of the problem. We want to act in a way that will be the most effective.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR MEETING OF UNITED STATES-CANADIAN CABINET COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the concern in this country that United States trade policies may endanger Canadian markets, will there be another meeting at an early date of the United States-Canada committee of cabinet ministers in order to discuss trade problems?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This session of the parliament of Canada is drawing to a close and the session of the congress of the United States is drawing to a close, so I believe it would be difficult to arrange a meeting at this time. As soon as both legislative bodies complete their work I hope we can arrange a meeting.

Mr. Drew: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is announcing the prospect of early dissolution of this parliament?

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FEDERAL AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Can the Prime Minister state whether or not the government has decided to consider the recent storm and flood damage in Saskatchewan a national emergency, and if so what assistance is it prepared to give?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): On Monday three members of the Saskatchewan government were here and met three of my colleagues and myself. We had a conference that lasted something over an hour and a half, during which they left with us some briefs and surveys that are being analysed now by our officials in the light of what was done in cases where the federal government did make contributions toward reparation of damages that had been caused by like occurrences.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question? Are the P.F.R.A. officials engaged in making a survey of the situation so as to place the government in full possession of the facts?

Mr. St. Laurent: Officials of the P.F.R.A. have been submitting, I will not say daily but quite frequently, reports on the examinations they have been making ever since this unusual storm took place there, and they are continuing to do that.

CIVIL DEFENCE

ALLEGED LACK OF CO-OPERATION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a question I intended to ask a bit earlier, but I did not do so. Has the minister investigated why, on the occasion of the sighting of unidentified aircraft recently on the west coast, it is alleged that Canadian civil defence authorities received no word of it although warnings were flashed widely throughout the western United States as far south as California? Does this failure to notify Canadian authorities signify a lack of co-operation between United States and Canada in civil defence?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend was kind enough to give notice of his intention to ask this question. I might say that the matter has been investigated, and in no circumstances could it be concluded that there is not the fullest collaboration between the civil defence authorities of both countries.

The situation to which my hon. friend directs attention arose out of an error in judgment on the part of a civil defence official in California. There was in fact no justification for the action he took, and his government has said so.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FIRMS PAID TO ACT AS DISTRIBUTORS—ALLEGED INADEQUATE ANSWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the fact that in answering a question in my name, in which I asked for the names of the firms paid to act as distributors for the national film board during 1954, he has given a page and a half by way of explanation as to why certain things could not be told—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): My question is that when I asked what these firms paid for the privilege of distributing these films, the answer the minister gave was that it cannot be stated what firms were paid. These firms are all paid to act, and I want an answer to my question. I might say this information was given to me a year or so ago, and the year before that, and I think I should have it for this year.

Mr. Speaker: The usual procedure when one has a complaint to make about an answer received is to deal further with it when the estimates are under consideration. The hon. member is entitled to ask a question at this stage. However, he is now reading part of the answer he has received which is not to his liking. At this stage I suggest to him that he is not allowed to present any argument, any more than is necessary to get his information from the government. He has asked one question and he should await the answer, and not recite the answer he has already received and comment upon it at this time.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The answer I have here is the second answer I have received. I put the question on the order paper in one form and then, in order to try to get the answer, I put it in another form; and now I get an evasive answer. I do not think I should wait until the estimates are before the house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must not forget that at this stage of the proceedings he must be satisfied with whatever answers he receives.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Even if he complains about the answer he receives, unless as a result of his comments he obtains a more satisfactory answer, there is certainly nothing the house can do about forcing a cabinet minister to give an answer different from that which, upon his responsibility as a minister, he has decided to give. If the hon. member wishes to debate the point, however, he may do so when the estimates of the minister's department are before the committee. That is the point at issue between the hon. member and myself. He has of course the right to discuss this answer which, in his view, is not satisfactory, but he is discussing it at the wrong time. That is the only point.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with deference may I point out that Your Honour has raised a point that is in fact distinct from that which arose out of the form of the question itself. Your Honour has placed before us the fact that we must accept answers that are given. I would point out to Your Honour that the hon. member stated that on earlier occasions in successive years he has received answers to questions in the same form, but that now he is denied similar information.

Since it appears that we are becoming increasingly bound by precedent, I do not think a precedent of this nature should be established by simply ignoring what would occur if this were allowed to pass. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if a form of question that has been customarily answered is not answered now on the ground that this information should not be given, it is appropriate that the point be raised, because otherwise we simply close off sources of information. Since we do not know when estimates are likely to come up it might deny to the whole house, the government side as well as this side, information we should have for further debate.

I would ask Your Honour to reconsider the point you have just made, having regard to the fact that this in itself can become something in the nature of a precedent.

Mr. Speaker: The only precedent I could find was a ruling by Mr. Speaker Lemieux, in which he had asked an answer to be given because the one that had been produced had no relation at all to the question that was asked. In this instance the hon. member says the answer he has received is evasive. See Debates, volume II, 1925, April 6, 1925, ruling by Mr. Speaker Lemieux, pages 1916-7.

An hon. Member: It may be.

Mr. Speaker: It may be. That is a matter of opinion and of debate. At this moment there is nothing one can do, at this stage of our proceedings, by way of complaining about it.

Mr. Drew: Since the point has been raised, might I point out that what I was directing my remarks to was not the question of whether it was evasive. I immediately concede that that is debatable. What I am pointing out is that the hon. member has said that the question sought information which had been given in reply to similar questions in earlier years. Now he is confronted with the answer that this information will not be given. That, Mr. Speaker, suddenly changes the procedure which has been accepted and followed. To let that pass without challenge in some way would be closing another door to the type of information I believe hon. members are entitled to receive.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member feels that his rights have been encroached upon, then he must deal with the matter on a question of privilege. On the other hand, if at this stage of the proceedings he merely wishes to ask questions to further elucidate the answer he has received, he is entitled to do so. Beyond that, as far as I am personally concerned at this moment, there is not much else I can do.

The point may be more complicated than I can perceive at the moment. I shall look into the remarks of the hon. member and also the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition, and if need be I shall clarify or modify the remarks I have made. Generally speaking, questions asked on the orders of the day are to be brief and of an urgent and national character. Whatever answers ministers feel free to give must be accepted as the answers. Even on questions on the order paper, if the minister says "No, I cannot answer this question", the question is answered.

On earlier occasions I have given the precedents with respect to that, and if necessary I shall give them again. But the particular point that has been raised by the hon. member, by way of complaining about the return received, which he feels is not complete—well, that is a different matter. I shall go into it further, and if necessary I shall give a ruling on it.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: With respect to the point raised earlier by the hon. member for Peterborough and pursued by the Leader of the Opposition, I should like to refer them to citation 137 of Beauchesne's third edition, which appears at page 67 and reads as follows:

> When the orders of the day are called by the Speaker and before they are read by the Clerk Assistant, it is the practice sanctioned by usage but not by any positive rule for members to make personal explanations or ask questions of the government in reference to . . .

Then down approximately at the middle of that citation I read the appropriate section:

> . . . or in respect to delay in obtaining returns or to the incompleteness of certain returns brought down under the order of the house; . . .

And so on. I think that is part of the case with which we were faced today. If hon. members look further in the same edition at citation 307, they will see the following:

> A minister may decline to answer a question without stating the reason for his refusal, and insistence on an answer is out of order, no debate being allowed. A refusal to answer cannot be raised as a question of privilege, nor is it regular to comment upon such refusal. A member can put a question, but has no right to insist upon an answer.

MONTREAL NEUROLOGICAL INSTITUTE

REQUEST THAT GRANTS BE PUT ON ENDOWMENT BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the tremendous contribution made by the Montreal Neurological Institute to human well-being, will the government consider the plea made by Dr. Wilder Penfield at the recent annual meeting of the institute for the government's contribution to be put on an endowment basis to assist this institution in its great work?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend did not give me notice of his intention to ask this question. I am not complaining on this score, except that I shall say to him what I have said before about the question of notice. It would give me an opportunity sometimes to give I will not say a more detailed but a more effective reply.

Mr. Knowles: Take your time.

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend knows, the government does give the neurological institute of Montreal an annual grant for operational purposes. In addition, under the national health program we have provided—I am speaking now from memory—well over half a million dollars worth of equipment. Then in addition there was slightly under one million dollars for construction of additional hospital beds. So I think the government, representing the people of Canada in this house, has evidenced its great interest in the very important institute which Dr. Wilder Penfield directs.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister take a look at the statement made by Dr. Penfield at the annual meeting of the institute last week and perhaps report further on the matter when we reach his estimates?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he will table the white paper on defence as soon as possible so all members may have it for study well in advance of consideration of the defence estimates, and if he can say when he might be able to do this?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The preparation of the white paper on defence is now complete and it is in the hands of the queen's printer. I am unable at the moment to indicate when it will be available for tabling. However, I expect to table it in time to give hon. members sufficient opportunity to study its contents before consideration of the defence estimates by the house.

TAXATION

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF REPRESENTATIONS OF DEALERS FOR REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he has received a brief from the motor car dealers' association of British Columbia asking for his consideration of their request for a refund of the excise taxes paid on cars in stock on April 5? Would the minister say whether he will be able to give further and favourable consideration to this admittedly difficult problem, and whether he is able to hold out any encouragement to that association?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I received briefs not only from the British Columbia motor car dealers' association but from the national body, I think from all the provincial bodies, and from quite a number of individual dealers. Of course we accept these representations along with all others and give them our best consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Consideration is always welcome, but how about encouragement?

Mr. Harris: Encouragement is a word which I think is used on every occasion by this government as to its intentions with respect to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Fulton: Encouragement is also—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a supplementary comment.

Mr. Fulton: No, it is a question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What comment does the minister care to make on the report in today's Toronto Telegram that he is resigning from the cabinet on October 23?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if there is a report that I am resigning from the cabinet, I suggest that any such report should come from myself. I am not aware of any report of that kind.

(Translation):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FEAST OF THE ASCENSION—SUGGESTED ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Does the Prime Minister propose to recommend the adjournment of the house at six o'clock this evening until Friday on the occasion of the feast of the Ascension tomorrow, a religious feast of obligation observed by at least 45 per cent of the people of Canada who are Catholics?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister intends to let the house proceed as it has done in past years with regard to religious feasts which are not observed by all the members of this house and which, according to the traditions of the house, have not required adjournment.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I just directed a question which I think of great importance to the Prime Minister and to which he was kind enough to reply. However, while that reply was given, the member for Russell (Mr. Gour) twice uttered the word "hypocrite", which I request him to withdraw.

Mr. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I did not say he was a hypocrite.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member thought he heard an expression the hon. member for Russell has just said he did not use.

Mr. Gour (Russell): Not at all.

Mr. Speaker: I believe then that that statement should simply end the matter which the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Gour (Russell): I never used that word.

[Mr. Knowles.]

ATOMIC ENERGY

NUCLEAR EXPLOSION OFF WEST COAST—CONSULTATION WITH CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with the explosion of the nuclear device off the west coast of North America. Was Canada consulted in that regard, in connection with the location or any other feature of the explosion?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand we were informed of that matter. I think that my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare may be able to give more information.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian government was informed and representations were made by the Canadian government in connection therewith.

RAILWAY ACT

INCREASE IN ANNUAL APPROPRIATION TO GRADE CROSSING FUND

The house in committee on Bill No. 259, to amend the Railway Act—Mr. Marler—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Apportionment of cost of protection, etc.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, when the bill was before the house for first reading and subsequently for second reading, some question was raised with regard to the limitation that was submitted as one of the recommendations; I refer to the limitation of $7 million. Reference was also made to the recommendation as to maintenance, where they recommended that $200 be allowed for maintenance for each protection, and also to the matter of rules and regulations with regard to the enforcement of warnings and signals.

While these matters were touched upon, they were not sufficiently emphasized. When the bill was before the committee these matters were brought to its attention, but likewise it did not see fit to implement the recommendations particularly those regarded as restrictions on the amount that was to be given each year, namely $5 million. At page 91 of the report we find this:

> It would seem desirable at the same time to prevent money accumulating in the fund if for any reason the normal rate of activity in grade crossing projects remained below the available resources in the fund.

This was implemented in the report. On page 116 the recommendation is brought forward for adoption:

> Until parliament enacts otherwise there should be an appropriation of $5 million instead of the present $1 million, to the fund each year from April 1, 1954, with a proviso that where on April 1st in any such year there is an uncommitted balance of more than $2 million in the fund the appropriation for that year should be such sum as with the uncommitted balance will amount to $7 million.

When this matter was before the committee the minister gave the reasons for it and while—

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the remarks the hon. member is making apply to clause 3 of the bill, not to clause 1. In fact the section he has just read is subparagraph 5 of clause 3.

Mr. Green: With regard to the point of order which has just been raised by the minister, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that on the first clause of the bill, by the practice of this house, general discussion is allowed. The hon. member for Danforth is merely carrying out what is the custom.

The Chairman: Order. It is true that we allow a general discussion on the first clause of a bill, and if that is what the hon. member is doing of course I will not interfere. On the other hand, I invite the co-operation of hon. members in conducting a discussion at the most appropriate places, and if this can be discussed more appropriately under clause 3 perhaps that might be done.

Mr. Small: I was trying to make a general statement. I had three points to raise, and I thought it would be permissible. My comments will not take very long anyway.

Mr. Marler: I shall not raise any further objection.

Mr. Small: I was talking about a limitation of $7 million being placed on the fund. The minister thought it was not advisable to adopt that recommendation. The engineers were present at the committee and outlined the grade separation program. There were 65 on the list at that time, 11 of which were urban and were considered of major importance, the remainder being rural. With such a program in front of them it would not seem that the limitation would have any effect for probably four, five or six years, and therefore there would not seem to be any particular reason for pressing the point. On that ground we do not think it is necessary. I think the operations under the fund will use up the $5 million every year, and it will not be necessary to put the $7 million restriction into effect.

Then there is the question of maintenance. The board recommended that a $200 limit be established on contributions from the fund for the maintenance of any particular protected crossing. Recommendation No. 4 on page 116 of the report is as follows:

> Contributions should be permitted towards the annual cost of maintenance and operation of automatic signals installed at crossings after the amendment comes into force, the contribution in respect of any one crossing not to exceed for any year the actual cost for that year nor exceed $200.

As a result of its investigations the board was of the opinion that some consideration should be given to the maintenance of grade level crossings where protective devices had been installed. But for some reason or other, possibly because it was too expensive, the government decided that such maintenance was not necessary. To give the committee some idea of what the board thought about the matter I should like to read the following from page 72 of their report:

> At the same time the maintenance of roads and streets under municipal control has been growing more onerous. Without revenues derived from the automobile industry or highway traffic, the municipalities have acquired heavy new responsibilities which, unless outside assistance is obtained, must be met from their general tax rates . . . Such costs of construction and maintenance of municipal roads and streets are a substantial burden on the municipalities.

They go on further to point out, as was mentioned in the debate, that the average maintenance cost per year for rural crossings was $560 and for urban crossings $865. Therefore an amount of $200 for each protected crossing would not seem to be out of place. However, as the years go by the amount will pile up, and I suppose the government in its wisdom thought it would be a good thing not to act upon this recommendation at the present time. But the municipalities are the ones who are going to have to bear the burden, and they are not going to be helped to any extent. Their situation is set out quite effectively in the last paragraph I read from the report. At page 100 of the report the board went on to say:

> Because of the fact that the assumption of a share of the annual maintenance costs by the fund would create a continuing liability, we believe that any steps in this direction should be most carefully considered.

I presume that is the reason for the government's action. The report goes on to say:

> Nevertheless we feel that the cost of maintenance has been and will undoubtedly be increasingly a deterrent to grade crossing protection projects, particularly where small or financially weak municipalities are concerned. An expenditure for a capital improvement requires to be voted but once, and can be undertaken when the means are seen to be available. Maintenance expenditure, however, is in the nature of an overhead or fixed cost which may increase as general costs increase and cannot be amortized. For some municipalities it may be entirely out of the question to pledge future tax revenues in this way. The railways' position is similar.

I believe the government should give consideration to this charge upon the municipalities because, as has been pointed out all through the board's report, the burden of meeting the cost is quite heavy and that is the reason the municipalities want assistance. We went along with the increase in the fund from $1 million to $5 million, though we thought it should have been considerably extended so as to cover the maintenance of protected crossings. I believe the government should make a concession there and allow something to help relieve the burden imposed upon municipalities. At page 101 of the report the board goes on to say:

> For these reasons, it would seem in order that the fund assume some share of the maintenance costs, since a good proportion of these will be incurred as a result of the proposed extended aid to new projects in the coming years. We would recommend that a fixed amount of $200 be the contribution from the fund toward annual maintenance and operation charges only on automatic signals installed at crossings after the date this provision takes effect.

From the language used by the board it is apparent they were quite confident the government would adopt their recommendation. I continue:

> Where maintenance of such installations was less the amount contributed would be only the total amount actually spent on maintenance. The remaining maintenance costs would be apportioned according to principles already laid down or previous practices of the board.

Notwithstanding that the committee has not seen fit to implement that recommendation, I think it would be wise for the government to at least take another look at the matter and reconsider its attitude, because on its own admission it is going to be a burden upon the municipalities. I do not think it would put too great a strain on the fund if a contribution of $200 for maintenance were granted. On principle the municipalities are entitled to some consideration.

I come now to the point which I consider the most important. It has to do with the rules and regulations for the protection of the public at level crossings. This subject covers a very wide field, including not only transportation but also industry. There are accident prevention associations to protect workers, notwithstanding that the workers may be indifferent and do not feel that the rules are necessary. Nevertheless the mounting accident toll in industry is such that precautions have to be taken to do something even for people who do not want anything done for them. In other words, after a fatality has occurred in an industry, on the highway or at a grade level crossing, the burden falls upon the taxpayers. It is not only the persons killed or injured who suffer; their families suffer also. Therefore all regulations that are laid down for the prevention of accidents have more in mind the protection of the families and the resulting drain upon some treasury or other.

When the question was before the committee even the railways recognized its importance, and the fact that something should be done to see that the regulations were enforced. They asked that some penalty be imposed upon those who disregard signals at grade level crossings. Devices are installed at crossings for the protection of the public and a lot of money is spent for that purpose, but then we do not take any measures to see that the signals are observed. In fact there is no penalty to make people observe them. It would be helpful, even if the penalty were only small.

The railways also emphasized the effect on the morale of their engineers and firemen who are involved in accidents. They can see the accident is going to happen, and they cannot do anything to stop it. The railways claim it has a devastating effect on their operators, and therefore the people using the highways and level crossings should be made to realize they must observe the warning signs. A request was made that teeth be put into the regulation by the imposition of a $25 fine, and I feel that is a good suggestion. I believe the government should give some consideration to implementing that recommendation made by the Canadian National.

I could go further and emphasize the portions of the report dealing with observance of the regulations. Mention is made on page 45 of the advance warning signs which are a matter of provincial and municipal responsibility. The report reads:

> As to the advance warning signs to be used, this is a matter for which the provinces and municipalities are primarily responsible. Under today's traffic conditions they are almost indispensable but the board has no authority to require the erection of such signs by the provinces or municipalities and the applicability of the fund has been limited to improvements at crossings.

This is a matter that concerns the railways, and I feel that we should be sufficiently interested to see that some form of assistance is given or some means found to enforce upon the people using the highways the observance of these signs. An accident is not always the railway's fault. Then on page 107 of the report we find this:

> Nevertheless the widespread concern with the problem of reducing or preventing grade crossing accidents is ample justification for the establishment of informal advisory committees. For the time being, these should be on a provincial basis. Apart from the difficulties of working through a large national body, provincially organized committees would permit a great deal of the necessary preliminary work to be done more expeditiously. By this means, municipal and other representatives would become more quickly conversant with the general aspect of the problem and the particular needs within their own province and what actions could be undertaken to meet these needs.

I believe that part of the report is particularly applicable at the present time. In the future there will be dominion-provincial conferences at which this matter can be considered. It is a matter of public relations and the education of the public. The thing that brought this to my attention was the receipt in the mail the other day of the program for a national highway safety conference to be held in Ottawa from May 24 to May 26. Would it not be a fine move on the part of this government if such legislation were enacted, or some tacit understanding given that this legislation would contain a clause providing a penalty for disregarding railway signs. The good roads association is sponsoring this safety conference, and many other organizations are greatly interested in it. The fact that a conference is being called is, I believe, a good sign.

The program for the fourth plenary session of this conference mentions reports of delegate divisions on proposals for implementing a Canadian highway safety program and recommendations for continuation of the national highway safety conference. These organizations are greatly concerned, because highway safety vitally affects them. I believe the fact that there are public bodies so much concerned about this that they would like to have something done about it is a good start.

I am not criticizing the minister because nothing has been done. Everyone seems to have the same attitude toward the prevention of accidents. It is all right as long as it does not cost any money or cause any trouble. As soon as you enter the realm of a financial undertaking, then they more or less try to evade any responsibility. This program for the national highway safety conference is a good start. Probably the minister would be in accord with the aims of that conference. If the sponsors of the conference were smart they would have the minister there to address them.

In view of the fact that a start has been made on the establishment of a committee on a national basis I believe the government would be well advised, through the transport commission, to enter into some kind of arrangement with them as to the best means of implementing legislation that would give effect to these regulations concerning level crossings.

Those are my general comments on the deficiencies of this bill as it has been presented to the house. We are not critical of the government's proposition, but we feel a vast improvement could be made if some consideration were given to the three points I have mentioned.

Mr. Ellis: On several occasions, Mr. Chairman, I have made comments on this bill. I do not wish to go over any of the material that was discussed earlier, but I do feel that the evidence given before the committee indicates the need for further action toward the elimination of level crossings in Canada. I do feel that the evidence submitted by both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National indicates the need for greater emphasis on grade separation projects.

In the committee the Canadian Pacific representative gave us a table showing maintenance and operation costs of railway crossing protection devices during the year 1954. When one considers the relatively high expenditure each year on the maintenance and operation of these protective devices, one must consider just what we get for the dollar that is invested in those types of safety devices.

The report of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada has given us information concerning the number of accidents at crossings protected by automatic signal devices. We do know that in a seven-year period the accident frequency at crossings protected by automatic devices was 4·9 per year per hundred crossings. There was an accident frequency of 1·2 accidents per year per hundred unprotected crossings. It would seem that even though we spent money and the railway companies spent money on the construction and maintenance of automatic signal devices, they have not been altogether effective in reducing the accidents. We know there is a heavier flow of traffic across these protected crossings, but we have to consider the amount of money we are spending to protect these crossings. When we consider that in the light of the number of accidents I think it is quite obvious that we might be further ahead, from the economic standpoint, if we laid greater stress on grade separation projects.

In the committee I asked the Canadian National engineering expert about the life span of a subway, and he replied that it was something in the neighbourhood of 75 years. The maintenance cost of subways is relatively low, particularly in the earlier years. I hope the government does not feel that this problem is solved with the passage of this bill or that it has discharged its obligations in connection with level crossing protection in Canada. I feel that the type of information we received in committee points to the fact that this is merely a start, and hope the government will pursue this matter and next session will go further toward the elimination of level crossings, particularly through grade separation projects. The hon. member for Danforth mentioned one matter that was discussed at some length in committee, having to do with safety devices at level crossings. It is one thing to build a protective device of some kind but it is quite another thing, of course, to have people pay attention to it. The representative of the Canadian National Railways was quite concerned about the fact that even if the railway company did erect protective devices, many of the travelling public would ignore them; and perhaps to some extent that is why we have a relatively high accident rate at protected level crossings.

The Canadian National Railways were most anxious that parliament should amend the Railway Act to make it a criminal offence for the driver of a motor vehicle to cross at a protected crossing when a signal is in operation. Since the subject has been raised by the hon. member for Danforth, while there might be some question from a constitutional standpoint as to the competence of parliament to amend the Railway Act to cover the matter in question, I would point out that in my own province of Saskatchewan we have in our vehicles act the very provision which I believe the railways are anxious to have placed in the federal legislation.

Section 134 of our vehicles act in the province states, in part, as follows:

> (2) The driver of a vehicle approaching a level railway crossing shall, when any signalman, any automatic signal or other safety device indicates the approach of a train, bring the vehicle to a dead stop, and shall not proceed until the signalman, automatic signal or device indicates that it is safe to do so.
> (3) The driver of a vehicle shall, before proceeding over a level railway crossing on the approach to which a sign indicating danger, or stop sign, is erected, whether or not a train can be seen or heard approaching the crossing, bring his vehicle to a dead stop at the danger or stop sign and shall not proceed until it is safe to do so.

As was pointed out by the representative of the Canadian National Railways, and from what I have learned in conversation with friends of mine who are railway engineers, perhaps the toughest part of an engineer's job, when approaching a level crossing, is when he sees a car approaching and does not know until the very last second whether the car is going to stop, or whether the driver will be so rash as to try to cross the tracks before the train reaches the crossing. Not only would we be doing something to eliminate accidents, we would be making railway engineers much happier if we were to have a uniform provision of the kind I have indicated.

Since in committee we did not decide whether the provincial or the federal government was competent to deal with the matter, I would ask the minister to make an investigation to learn whether it is possible to make such amendment to the Railway Act, perhaps following in form the act we have in Saskatchewan.

I believe this bill is good, as far as it goes. There can be no doubt that the increase to $5 million meets with the approval of all hon. members. However, I do not want the minister or the government to feel that the acceptance of this measure deals with the problem completely. In my view this measure only scratches the surface. While we support the bill wholeheartedly, I am hoping that at some future time the minister will find it possible to bring forward legislation to extend this principle.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to thank the hon. member for New Westminster for allowing me to speak in his place at this time. This afternoon I shall place before the committee an example of a grade crossing which, right today, illustrates in a practical fashion the weaknesses in both principle and detail to be found in Bill 259, now before us. While my observation will be directed to the first clause in the bill, I shall have some comment to make concerning other clauses.

In advance of making any comment, I think it might be well to place before the committee certain facts to show the relationship between the measure before us and the circumstances I shall set out. Apparently after consultation between the board of transport commissioners and the Canadian National Railways a decision was reached to make certain changes at a grade crossing in the town of Ingersoll, Ontario. The crossing in question is where the Canadian National Railways main line intersects provincial highway No. 2. Hon. members are no doubt aware of the fact that provincial highway No. 2 in Ontario is perhaps one of the busiest, if not the busiest, in the province, serving as the main link between Windsor and Montreal.

There is of course a great deal of traffic over this highway. Much of this is in the form of transport and truck vehicles, but there is also a large amount of tourist traffic in the summer months. In the past this crossing in Ingersoll has presented a great traffic hazard and has been the cause of many traffic jams. Some days it takes more than half an hour to make the crossing at this point.

I appreciate that in the past there has been some considerable difficulty. However, at the present time the highways program in Ontario is making headway, with the result that a new highway known as No. 401 is under construction, running parallel to highway No. 2 which, it is expected, eventually will take the place of that highway. I believe a portion of the new construction will be open for use this fall, by-passing the cities of London and Woodstock and the town of Ingersoll. I have taken some time to state the background, because it has a bearing on what I shall say later.

It appears that in the past this level crossing has been altered several times, and contributions to that end have been made from the fund. I shall not waste the time of the committee by stating details in this connection. However, I should like to read some paragraphs from correspondence which has taken place concerning this crossing, and which I believe tell the story very well. I would refer first to a portion of a letter dated May 2, 1955, from what appears to be the legal department of the Canadian National Railways. There is some uncertainty in my mind concerning the signature on the letter, and it occurs to me that the person here named may also be legal counsel for the board of transport commissioners. Perhaps the minister will enlighten us on this point.

This letter is addressed to E. R. Hopkins, secretary of the board of transport commissioners. It bears the file number 5087 and refers to "Protection at Thames street, Ingersoll, Ontario". The letter says, in part:

> With reference to your letter of February 17 last concerning protection at the above crossing, wherein, after an inspection by the board's engineer it was recommended that electric lights be installed on each of the present gate arms with a stand-by battery—

Then it proceeds to refer to previous improvements made at the crossing. At a later point the letter states:

> Conditions at this crossing are much more favourable and it is recommended that automatically controlled short arm gates with flashing light signals and bell be installed in lieu of the present mechanical gate as shown on drawing—

Then follow certain letters and figures identifying the drawings to which reference is made. It continues:

> Also enclosed herewith is detailed estimate showing the cost to be approximately $17,350 with an estimated annual maintenance cost of $825.
> It is considered that this type of protection constitutes an improvement made desirable by increased highway traffic, and it is therefore submitted that a contribution of 40 per cent of the cost be made from the railway grade crossing fund and the balance of the installation costs be assessed equally between the town and the railway company. It is further submitted that the cost of maintenance be shared equally by the municipality and the railway company.

I should now like to refer to a letter which was sent to the secretary of the board of transport commissioners by the solicitors for the town of Ingersoll, dated May 12, 1955. The pertinent part of the letter reads as follows:

> The municipal council of the corporation of the town of Ingersoll have carefully perused the proposed undertaking and they wish to object to such undertaking on the grounds that the share of the expenses allotted to the corporation of the town of Ingersoll on its 30 per cent basis would appear to be $5,205 and it would also appear that the annual maintenance cost of same to the town of Ingersoll would be $412.50 according to the proposal submitted to the board of transport commissioners.
> The town of Ingersoll is of the opinion that the protection given this crossing in the past by way of gates has been satisfactory; also the new super highway No. 401 which will pass within one mile south of Ingersoll when it is opened in about a year's time will considerably diminish the traffic which now passes through our town on Queens highway No. 2.
> May this letter be deemed a formal protest on behalf of the corporation of the town of Ingersoll to such an undertaking.

I wish to refer to a third letter. It is addressed to myself by the solicitors, Messrs. Start and Marshall, of the town of Ingersoll. The pertinent part reads:

> Dear Mr. Nesbitt:
> We are enclosing herewith a copy of the letter received by the town as an enclosure from the Canadian National Railways to the board of transport commissioners. We are also enclosing herewith a copy of our letter to the board objecting to this undertaking by the town in view of the cost of same to the town. The total estimated cost of installation is $17,350 and it is proposed that this be paid for as follows:
> Share from grade crossing fund—40 per cent, $6,940.
> Canadian National Railways share—30 per cent, $5,205.
> Town's share—30 per cent, $5,205.
> It is estimated also that the annual maintenance cost will be $825, and this will be assumed equally by the railroad and the town approximating $412.50 each annually.

Here is the situation, Mr. Chairman. I imagine the minister has never heard of a situation like this before. The municipality is objecting to the improvement in protection of the grade crossing. This must be the one case in a thousand, but it exists nevertheless. This town does not want it for three reasons. The first is because of the cost allocation; second, the maintenance allocation; and third, it is entirely unnecessary because when the new highway is opened in the fall there will not be any traffic problem on this railway crossing since the traffic, which is the main objection and the main cause of trouble at the crossing now, will be very largely eliminated by the opening of a new highway.

The comments I should like to make are as follows. First of all there is the apportionment of costs. When Bill No. 259 is passed the apportionment will be 60 per cent to the grade crossing fund, 25 per cent to the railway, and 15 per cent to the municipality. Yet this letter indicates that the cost will be on the old basis of 40 per cent, 30 per cent and 30 per cent. This will make a very considerable difference. If this crossing protection is proceeded with against the wishes of the town of Ingersoll, at least it should be made very clear to the town that the apportionment will be on the new basis and not on the old. I do not believe any orders have yet been given.

This is a situation that will come up in a number of cases where it had been decided to build these crossings before the passage of the present bill. The minister might give us some assurance that any of these grade crossings that are contemplated and have been authorized at the present time will have their costs apportioned on the basis of the amendments to the act before us at the present time. I say that because it would make the following difference in this case.

If the apportionment as suggested in the present amendments were used, the grade crossing fund would have to pay $10,410 instead of $6,940. The railway's share would be $4,337.50 instead of $5,205, and the town of Ingersoll's share would be $2,602.50 instead of $5,205. I hope when the minister makes his remarks later on he will be able to give us some assurance on this point.

There is one other matter in connection with the apportionment that I am a little curious about. It has to do with clause 265 (2) (b), which reads as follows:

> In the case of reconstruction and improvement of a grade separation at a crossing, 30 per cent of such cost or $150,000, whichever is the lesser.

In the particular instance to which I am referring no grade separation is contemplated. It is merely a change in protective devices. It is not a grade separation. However, it is not quite clear to me why in the case of reconstruction and improvement of a grade separation the fund can provide only 30 per cent instead of 60 per cent, as is proposed in this bill, or 40 per cent, as was done before. I do not quite understand the principle behind that. I hope we may receive some enlightenment later on.

The question of provision for maintenance has been mentioned by the hon. member for Danforth. Bill No. 259 does not contain any provision for maintenance of those grade crossings out of the fund. As has already been mentioned, apparently this has been recommended to the government by the board of transport commissioners. It can be said that this provision for maintenance was not put in the bill, but it is hoped that the bill may be amended so the board can make certain allowances in some instances, because a great many of these municipalities, particularly the small ones, are heavily overburdened with taxes. Every hon. member knows that, and there is no need for me to go into the matter any farther. As I look at this bill I still think the government might improve it a little and provide for the maintenance of the grade crossings out of the fund.

The last thing I should like to mention has puzzled me a little in the past few days, and also other hon. members. I am wondering how the federal parliament by an act, namely the Railway Act, can force municipalities to pay for the construction and maintenance of grade crossings against their will. Such legislation, on the face of it at least, seems to be ultra vires, since it is an invasion of property and civil rights, specifically reserved to the provinces.

However, I believe two similar cases have gone to the privy council, which have decided the matter. The first case was that of Toronto v. the Canadian Pacific Railway, reported in 1908 Appeal Cases, page 54. The other case was that of Toronto Railway v. City of Toronto, 1920 Appeal Cases, page 426. I might say a summary of the judgments in these cases was that legislation by parliament imposing, in effect, charges upon persons benefiting from railway improvements to provide for the expenses of such improvements was upheld. The provisions, challenged because they imposed burdens on persons peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the province, were held, nevertheless, to be intra vires as being ancillary to the main purpose.

I do not think the question arises in this case of whether or not municipalities are emanations of the crown in the right of the province because I think that is clearly not the situation. Municipalities are clearly persons created by the provinces. Perhaps the minister might agree with the point that if the provincial governments, who are in control of provincial highways, were ordered by the board to contribute to the cost of construction of grade crossings, the provincial governments would be perfectly within their rights to refuse to do so. However, I would be interested to hear any comments the minister would care to make in that regard.

The two cases I refer to were not exactly in point with respect to grade crossings. Even on general principles the privy council and other courts in Canada have frequently distinguished on the facts. I am not entirely satisfied yet that this legislation is not ultra vires.

I should like to suggest one or two thoughts to the minister and I would be interested, as I said before, to hear his comments. The questions that arise in my mind are, first, are grade crossings for the sole benefit of the municipality in which they are constructed? In many cases are not adjacent municipalities benefited, and should they not be assessed? How about provincial highways? The particular situation at Ingersoll to which I have just referred is not a matter of local traffic at all. The traffic here is mainly through provincial traffic from centres such as Toronto to London and Windsor. Those centres are benefited far more than the town of Ingersoll, which is being assessed. I think allowance should be made for this, if not at this time then in future legislation. In any event it seems to me unfair.

I know the principle has been recognized that the municipality should pay a certain portion of the cost of these grade crossings. It seems to me unfair that the municipality should be asked to pay anything. I know it will be said that the municipality benefits from the grade crossing. This is quite true, but I submit that the railroad and the grade crossing fund should bear the whole cost.

First of all there is a practical reason for this. The federal government provides funds for the railways, at least for the Canadian National Railways, and for the grade crossing fund. The federal government has greater means of raising revenue. As everyone knows, the municipalities have only limited means of raising taxation, and they are already overburdened with education and local road costs. It does not seem exactly logical or reasonable that the municipalities should be forced to help pay for the construction of grade crossings.

It is true that there is benefit to the municipality, but we must remember that the problem is created by the fact that the railroad is there. If there were no railroad there would be no need for a grade crossing and there would be no traffic problem at that particular point. I know it is certainly said that the municipalities benefit from the railways, which is quite true, but that should be considered more on a national basis. I believe consideration should be given, if not at this time then in the future, to further reduce if not extinguish completely the amount the municipalities have to pay.

I recognize that the government has considered the matter, and also that under the new apportionment of costs the municipality will pay must less than it had to pay before. We all appreciate this, but I think it should be carried a little further. After all, it is the position of the railroad tracks which creates the traffic problem.

I think I have said all I wish to say on this matter, but I shall conclude with one observation. The town of Ingersoll in the county of Oxford does not want this improved grade crossing protection, but I can assure the minister that the citizens of that county would be most grateful if the board of transport commissioners would divert their attention from Ingersoll to the Creditville crossing, seven miles east of Woodstock, where a grade crossing is badly needed.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, this bill was considered at length in committee, and it is unfortunate that the report of the committee is not available so hon. members could be thoroughly acquainted with what was said during the discussion of the bill and its various aspects. It may be necessary to repeat what took place at that time, and thus some of the work already done will be lost.

We in this group support the main spirit of the bill, that is that additional funds be made available for the elimination of grade crossings. I think that is the general spirit in which everyone accepts the tenor of the bill. However, as I pointed out in the committee, this bill is not a complete answer to railway crossing deaths. It will help materially to cut down the number of accidents, but we are going to have accidents at railway crossings whether we have overpasses or underpasses and spend millions of dollars in erecting various types of signals.

There are other factors to be taken into consideration, more particularly the lack of caution on the part of many motorists. The automatic signals we have today definitely are not the answer, nor is the overpass or the underpass. People deliberately commit suicide by means of excessive speed, because they freeze at the wheels of their cars, and because of other human factors. Then there are the mechanical factors to be considered, as well as weather and other conditions. While this

$5 million we are setting aside for the grade crossing fund will be of material benefit, we cannot look forward to it cutting out all accidents.

The hon. member for Oxford during his remarks indicated that he felt there was a constitutional question involved in this first clause, under which the board is to fix the share of the cost to be paid by the municipal district. I agree with him in that respect. The hon. member cited two cases in which there was some question of illegality, but it is not established in my mind that this bill authorizing the board to apportion a share of the cost to the municipal district is completely intra vires.

The municipality is a creature of the provincial government and has authority vested in it as such. We are dealing here with a board which receives its authority by federal right. I question very much the right of any board constituted under federal authority to exercise this power on a municipal district which receives its power by act of a provincial authority.

We should examine this very closely. As is indicated, the town of Ingersoll, which the hon. member mentioned, seems to feel the same way about it. It does not want this particular overpass or underpass, which would indicate that it should not be forced upon the town unless it agrees to it.

On examining the bill further I notice that no provision is made for the construction of overpasses or underpasses in connection with new roads. I cannot understand the reason for this, because in the building of new highways, such as the provincial governments are building today, at times it would be better to spend a few thousand dollars extra in order to build a road along a route where it might be possible to use a natural underpass or overpass, as the case might be, whereas at the present time under the present system whereby no money is set aside to assist in the building of such a crossing, the provincial authority would take the easier route for the road and say, "Well, it is simpler; we will save a couple of hundred thousand dollars or a few thousand dollars". But that saving in itself would not be sufficient to build the overhead pass or the underpass.

I think something should have been set aside in the bill that made it possible to contribute something to it, and that is not included. We feel that the provincial government possibly, the federal authorities, the municipal governments and the railways should bear the cost of these crossings to a lesser or greater degree, depending upon the location and other factors and that a fixed sum should not be set aside for municipal participation.

There are certain factors that we require educating in. For instance, we need uniform road signs leading to railway crossings. There is no such thing in the dominion. I would suggest that possibly a certain part of this sum should be set aside for that purpose, in order to discuss and to discover the feasibility and the possibility of having a national system of road signs wherever there are crossings.

Then we should have a uniform law that might be passed in respect to approaches to railway crossings. I think the hon. member for Regina City mentioned this too. The province of Saskatchewan has some enabling legislation, I believe, and the province of British Columbia has legislation governing this matter. But there are in Canada provinces which do not have any such regulations. I would say that we would be well advised to see if it would not be possible to incorporate within our act, through agreements with the provincial governments, provision that there should be uniformity of regulation pertaining to speed and other factors, road signals and on roads leading to crossings.

As to motor vehicles approaching railway crossings, in the table that was given us in committee by the Canadian Pacific Railway I find they have, for instance, eight different types of protective signals.

People who come from other parts of Canada are not too familiar with all of these types. I can well remember in the early thirties when, in making a trip through the southern part of the United States, I came to the city of Reno. It is true that I happened to note this wigwag affair but I had never seen one before. I did not know what it was there for.

I had seen no railway sign such as we have here in Canada at this place. You can imagine my amazement when a train sped before the car at that moment.

That is an indication of the type of thing with respect to which I feel we should try to gain uniformity in this country.

Among the various types of protection that have been set aside by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and apparently approved by the board are automatic bells, automatic danger signals, automatic wigwags, automatic flashing lights, automatic gates, manual mechanical gates, manual electric gates, and manual flashing lights. The numbers of them range from four in the case of the automatic bell to 270 in the case of the automatic flashing light. I know that we have uniform railway crossing signs at or before we reach each of the crossings, possibly. But this white and black sign may not be efficient. It certainly does not appear to be sufficient or we would not have as many accidents at railway crossings as we have at the present time. For that reason I think it would be important that we should set aside part of this fund to make it necessary to have one uniform type of indicator to let the people know when they are approaching an automatic signal at a railway crossing or one that might be even manually operated. Certainly we should not have as many as eight different kinds.

In order to assist further in this matter I would also propose that we should set aside possibly a sum equal to what we have here for this railway crossing fund in this bill for the purpose of educating our high school students in the proper way of driving, the recognition of signals, and the traffic laws as they exist in the country.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my support for the bill and for the remarks that have been made by the various members of this group on the resolution and on the second reading. There is no doubt about it that the passage of this legislation will assist in the improvement of a number of dangerous railroad crossings in Canada. However, even when this legislation is in effect the great majority of railway crossings will be unaffected and there will be a great number of danger spots left as they are at the present time.

The present railroad crossings are, generally speaking, marked with the usual signs, namely the white cross with the black lettering "Railroad Crossing". From my experience—and I am speaking from experience in the interior of British Columbia where you often have a motor road coming onto a track on a sharp curve and things of that sort—this type of marking is totally insufficient.

Mr. Marler: Does not the hon. member think that the type of marking is something that pertains to provincial responsibility?

Mr. Herridge: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman. I was just going to deal with that matter.

Mr. Marler: I am sorry for interrupting.

Mr. Herridge: I recognize that that matter is, to some extent, a responsibility of the provincial or other authorities. But with very little expense, by the use of road reflectors and the use of larger signs—signs well back from the crossings with reflectors on them—I think a great deal of the present hazard could be removed. I recognize the fact that in order to do this, co-operation would be required between the several authorities, federal, provincial and municipal.

I am rising, Mr. Chairman, because I am particularly concerned with this aspect of the question, namely the multitude of unprotected crossings which will not be affected by this bill. At very little cost I think that we can improve the situation as the result of co-operation between the federal, provincial and municipal governments and the railways concerned. I think that co-operation could be stimulated to quite an extent if the board of transport commissioners would insist on an improved standard of signs and markings at these crossings in general. If they improved their regulations, I think there would spring up from that action the co-operation between the various authorities which is necessary to give effect to their wishes.

I want to support what was said by the hon. member for New Westminster. I think we need uniformity in railroad signs across Canada. I think that is where there is a necessity for co-operation between the various authorities involved, including the companies.

Before sitting down I want to say also that I believe a great deal can be done to prevent the number of accidents we have by an educational campaign particularly in the high schools of this country. I think that is an aspect of the situation that has been overlooked. If we are able to make our people conscious of the dangers that exist through fast driving at these crossings and can make them conscious of the signs that are erected and of the care that must be taken to recognize them, I think something can be done in that respect. I think that we are not doing sufficient, as the result of co-operation between all the parties concerned with regulations from the board of transport commissioners, to do what can be done so easily at little cost in order to reduce greatly the hazards at many crossings that will not be affected by the terms of this legislation possibly for years to come.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, it is with a feeling of genuine satisfaction that I rise at this moment to take part in the discussion of this bill whereby it is sought to increase from $1 to $5 million the amount allocated each year for the protection of grade crossings.

It means, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and the government have at last realized that the human resources of this country are the ones that need the greatest measure of protection, because in safeguarding our human resources we are safeguarding at the same time the future of our whole country.

However, I am a little puzzled when I consider the percentages that will be contributed by the three public bodies concerned, namely the federal government, the municipalities and the railway companies.

If I correctly understand the terms of the bill, 60 per cent, provided that amount does not exceed $300,000, will be contributed by the Canadian government, whereas a contribution of 25 per cent is asked of the municipalities and an amount of 15 per cent of the railways.

I want to point out right away that the railway contribution seems to me inadequate and unreasonable, considering the fact that the Canadian Pacific, for instance, operates right across Canada, or just about, except in the maritime provinces, and is reaping colossal profits. As far as the Canadian National is concerned, it is difficult to say as much, as every year it has to face a very considerable deficit, which is met by the taxpayer. This means that Canada's contribution will exceed 60 per cent, as the percentages allocated to the national railways would obviously have to be paid, and would certainly not be met, because, for a number of years, the national railways have operated in the red.

Mr. Marler: It is not so.

Mr. Dufresne: The minister can surely not state that, last year and the years before, the Canadian National Railways did not operate at a loss.

Mr. Marler: Does not the hon. member remember that the Canadian National had a surplus in 1953?

Mr. Dufresne: Yes, but, Mr. Chairman, as the saying goes, one swallow does not make a summer.

Mr. Marler: Do not go beyond the truth.

Mr. Dufresne: I am not at all going beyond the truth when I state that every year, or nearly so, the Canadian parliament is usually requested to make good the deficits of the Canadian National Railways. That is why I come to the conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that the greater part of the contribution that should actually be made by the Canadian National Railways will once again be paid by the government and, therefore, by the Canadian taxpayers.

In support of my argument, may I be permitted to draw attention to the condition prevailing more particularly in the city of Quebec. The municipality of Quebec is being asked to contribute 25 per cent of the cost of those improvements. No account is taken of the fact that Quebec city, like all other Canadian municipalities, gets only approximately 10 per cent of the total taxes collected, because the federal government gets the major part of the taxes paid throughout the country; yet, this city is being asked to pay 25 per cent of the cost of doing away with grade crossings, which are quite numerous, as you will find out, Mr. Chairman, when I give a list of them.

I believe that the municipality of Quebec is unable to pay such an amount, because the situation in Quebec city is undoubtedly one of the worst as far as the railway right of way is concerned.

One must not forget also that the city of Quebec has already made its contribution. Some will say it was a long time ago! However, Quebec city did give a million dollars in 1870 toward the construction of the Canadian Pacific line linking Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa. Later, it gave $400,000 toward the construction of the Lake St. John line of the Canadian National Railway system—

(Text):

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a point of order. The hon. member is telling us now about the connection of the city of Quebec with the early railroad history of Canada. I think it is a most interesting subject but I do not think it has anything to do with the bill we are now discussing. I would suggest he talk about the subject matter of the bill and not the financial condition of the city of Quebec.

Mr. Dufresne: On a point of order, I am not speaking about the financial situation of the city of Quebec. In this bill we are asking the municipalities to pay at least 25 per cent of the cost for the elimination of railway crossings in Canada. I do wish to say, as I said in French a few minutes ago, that the city of Quebec has in the past already contributed its share toward the construction of certain railways, and as far as I know the city of Quebec is not in any position today to participate to the extent of 25 per cent of the cost in the elimination of railway crossings. That is the only thing I was saying, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think there is any point of order in that.

(Translation):

As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the city of Quebec has done its full share and is not in a position, as far as I can see, to do more. I wonder why there should not be an increase of barely 15 per cent in the percentage which the railways are called upon to contribute in order to allow the municipalities to benefit from the elimination of grade crossings which, particularly in Quebec city, constitute a constant menace to public safety and a general traffic nuisance. It must be said, too, that they hamper the city's development since they literally plug up a number of its streets.

Which part will be reserved to Quebec city out of this total amount of five million dollars? This question makes me wonder a little. I wonder, as a matter of fact, if Quebec city would not simply be forgotten should it be unable to put up the percentage required of it?

I might recall here something that was said once by a representative of the railways. I will read this sentence which may be found in the brief presented jointly by the Quebec chamber of commerce and the city of Quebec to the board of transport commissioners, on February 3, 1954. This official representing the railway companies said, on May 13, 1953, at a general meeting of the study group on elimination of grade crossings in Quebec city:

(Text):

Our company is absolutely satisfied with the present general layout of its railway facilities in the city of Quebec and I believe, not a single dollar will ever be made available for their relocation or even for making any study or plan to that effect.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that grade crossings in the city of Quebec, as I said a moment ago, are a constant menace to public safety as well as a traffic nuisance, besides being prejudicial to the development of the city. They spread out from one end of the city to the other, starting in the county I have the honour to represent in this house and ending in the next county, that of Quebec East.

I see in this brief for example—I was already aware of that situation of course, for I believe I am familiar with my county—that every day a great many Canadian Pacific trains, passenger trains, freight trains or shunting engines, run on those tracks which cross the city from one end to the other. As I said a moment ago, they are a menace to public safety, a traffic nuisance and an impediment to the development of Quebec on account of the noise and the smoke they make. That is why, too, certain wards such as St. Sauveur, St. Malo and St. Roch, are dirty and blighted with falling real estate values.

The presence of this trackage prevents the opening of a great many thoroughfares which would be required for the development of the city of Quebec. Among these thoroughfares, are the following streets: St. Roch, St. Dominique, Mgr. Gauvreau, Sagard, Laberge, Chapel, Letellier, Baulac, Church, Caron, St. Anselme, Langelier Blvd., Chevrier, Rigaudville, Recollets, St. Ambroise, Carillon, Renaud, Bigaouette, St. Luc, Courcelette, Garagonthier, that is 22 traffic arteries in all. It also prevents the building of a large boulevard at the end of these thoroughfares, which would ease the east-west traffic, according to a general town planning program for the city of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, would the minister be in a position to tell us in a few moments if this amount of five million dollars will be largely spent in areas most affected or whether it will merely be used to eliminate a few grade crossings here and there throughout the country? Representing as I do one of the Quebec city constituencies, may I be allowed to ask the minister to use his influence in order that a fairly considerable amount be voted soon, so as to demonstrate to the people of Quebec city that the government really intend doing something, first of all, for public safety, and then to prevent a large number of our people from falling into desperate circumstances because of unemployment. This woud be a profitable source of jobs and I would certainly not be slow in thanking the government should they decide to do something along this line. Before bringing these few remarks to a close, Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to ask once more what it was my privilege to ask for here last year, namely that in the event of a start in the elimination of grade crossings in Quebec city, the construction of a new station just outside the city, at St. Sacrament boulevard, be undertaken concurrently in order to relieve traffic congestion.

Mr. Chairman, those are the few remarks I wished to make. I made them I think in an objective spirit and once more I urge the minister to take into consideration the plight of one of the cities where the problem is the most acute in the country. Quebec city has too many level crossings, a danger to public safety. Only last year, at the Marie de l'Incarnation street crossing, a terrible accident took place. Let us make sure that such large amounts which we vote be used above all for the safeguarding of our most precious asset, human life.

(Text):

Mr. Jones: I am not going to speak at length, Mr. Chairman, but there are one or two points I should like the minister to clear up. Doubt has been cast by both the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for New Westminster on the legality of the enforcement clause in section 262. After a number of years of experience in municipal life, I am afraid that I must agree with them. I, too, doubt the enforceability of the clause if the municipality cared to fight it. I should like the minister to clear that up.

In the first place, I should like to know if municipalities are consulted officially before any steps are taken to authorize the disposal of the level crossing. Is an agreement reached between the municipality and the board of transport commissioners and the railway company or are the words in this clause to be taken literally that the order of the board is binding and enforceable against the municipality. If that is the case I should like to ask the minister if the municipality has a right of appeal to any court of law or merely to the board of transport commissioners. Perhaps the consent of the municipality would make legal enforcement a possibility. Frankly, I question the wording of the clause as it is. There should be some words there to correct the wrong impression that it gives as it now reads.

There are thousands of unprotected level crossings in British Columbia, and owing to the nature of the program that is being advanced it is obviously going to take many years to eliminate the bulk of them. I know of several dangerous crossings in British Columbia at which accidents causing death have taken place, but so far nothing has been done about them. What I should like to know is, has the transport board a system of arranging priorities for the removal of these dangerous crossings? If they have a system, how do they arrive at the priority of a given crossing? In arriving at priority, do they wait until some accident occurs or they are informed by some municipality; or have they their own system of checking annually all level crossings in Canada? I know that an annual check would be necessary in British Columbia, because some of the crossings are in locations where the moisture is excessive and the growth is wild. What may be clear one year may be hidden by the growth of young trees in the following year. Is there a system of making checks to follow the growth of trees, or is it just a haphazard, hit-or-miss system, under which when they have the money they do something to satisfy the one who is kicking loudest?

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I had the pleasure of serving on this committee. Witnesses were called and examined thoroughly. Simple lines of questioning were followed by lay members on the committee, but the legal minds examined thoroughly.

I do not forget the thoughts I had in mind when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra questioned the witnesses. I said to the person sitting next to me that if this bill could stand up under that kind of questioning—and it did—it could stand anything. I always like to hear the hon. member question witnesses because, while he is a Conservative, he is honest and sincere in his questioning, and what he does is appreciated. Anyone who reads the report will surely agree with me that the bill should be passed.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, after all this flattery from my friend from Fort William, I scarcely know what to say. However, I do agree that the bill was discussed thoroughly in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I believe we always try to carry on our discussions thoroughly in that committee.

For many years the question of grade crossings has aroused keen interest in the House of Commons, and it was as a result of that interest that the board of transport commissioners was requested to investigate the whole problem of railway grade crossings and to bring in a report. Hon. members know that the report was brought in about a year ago; in fact, to be specific, it is dated May 10, 1954. The legislation we are now considering follows that report.

I suggest we should bear that in mind, because the result is that the measure now before us is unlikely to be amended in the near future. It is presented as a result of the report, and in another year, or perhaps two or three years, there will not be the authority of a report behind any amendments which may be introduced by the government. For that reason I think we should be careful to see that the bill we are now passing is complete.

It is a matter of regret that there are two points with which the bill does not deal. I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. member for Fort William when he suggests that all the defects were remedied in committee.

The first point which in my view should be covered has to do with the grade crossing fund being made available to assist in the cost of maintaining and operating safety devices to be installed from now on. There was a clear recommendation from the board of transport commissioners on that point. I refer of course to paragraph 4 of the recommendations which is in these words:

> Contributions should be permitted towards the annual cost of maintenance and operation of automatic signals installed at crossings after the amendment comes into force—

That applies to installations made from now on. It continues:

> —the contribution in respect of any one crossing not to exceed for any year the actual cost for that year nor exceed $200.

The minister dealt with this subject when he spoke on March 17. He pointed out that all the money should be used for new grade separations, or for improvements to old ones, and that no moneys should be set aside for costs of maintenance and operation. Then he added this, as it appears at page 2135 of Hansard:

> Perhaps I should add that if we become convinced at some future date that this would be a useful addition to the powers of the board in respect to the fund we would be quite prepared to consider it.

The evidence we got in committee from the railways on this point was very clear. The Canadian Pacific Railway filed a table showing that in 1954 the cost to them of maintaining and operating highway crossing protection devices was $452,033.

Mr. Marler: That was not for maintenance alone, was it?

Mr. Green: The amount for maintenance was $179,227 and that for operation was $272,805, making the total of $452,033 I have mentioned.

Mr. Marler: I think that amount included sums paid to operators of manual protection devices, did it not?

Mr. Green: My understanding is that this was the total cost to them of maintaining and operating these highway crossing protection devices. And, mind you, they were not paying the total cost, because a proportion of that cost was paid by the municipalities, except in the case of automatic danger signs where the railways paid 100 per cent. In connection with automatic bells they paid 80 per cent; for automatic wigwags, 62·5 per cent; for automatic flashing lights, 52·8 per cent; for automatic gates, 66·2 per cent; for manual mechanical gates, 64·7 per cent; for manual electric gates 65·0 per cent and for manual flashing lights, 61·1 per cent. The difference was paid by one municipality or another or, in certain cases, possibly by a province.

These costs represent the costs of protecting level crossings, and are costs just in the same way as the amounts paid for grade separation projects. I cannot see why some assistance should not be made available from the grade crossing fund.

One result of the failure to give help in maintaining and operating these devices is that the municipalities will hesitate to make application for warning devices. The hon. member for Oxford has given a very good example today, when he tells us that the town of Ingersoll does not believe it should have to pay half the cost of maintaining and operating certain safety devices. I cannot understand why the minister and his department failed to implement that particular recommendation in the legislation that we are considering this afternoon.

The other point which I believe should have been included in the bill was based on a request made by the Canadian National Railways. Mind you, the Canadian National Railways have never been very forward in making suggestions about legislation to the committee. In most cases the Canadian Pacific Railway has to do the leading in requesting changes and, of course, the Canadian National Railways benefit by whatever changes the Canadian Pacific Railway can bring about as a result of the representations. But in this particular instance, the representative of the Canadian National Railways made a very clear-cut recommendation to the standing committee. He pointed out that there is no penalty clause in the railway act under which a person who has failed to pay attention to a safety device installed on the order of the board can be prosecuted. In other words, he was not referring to devices which have just been installed by the railway without an order, but to devices that the board of transport commissioners have ordered installed. He said that attempts had been made to prosecute people under the reckless driving provision of the code, but without success. The Canadian National Railways found itself unable to take adequate proceedings against a person who failed to heed those safety devices. He recommended that there should be a subsection written into the Railway Act. It would be subsection 2 of section 416, and would read as follows:

Any person who, in using any highway crossing at rail level for the purpose of passing on foot—

It has wider application than over a motor vehicle; it applies also to foot traffic. I continue with the proposed subsection:

—or in any vehicle along such highway across the railway, disregards signs, signals, or other protective devices erected or otherwise provided by the company pursuant to order of the board, is liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding $25.

The first clause of section 416 provides a penalty for a person who walks across a railway instead of going over a foot bridge, where there is a foot bridge in existence. I do not think there can be any doubt that if clause 1 is within the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament, the proposed clause 2 would also be intra vires.

The representative of the railway said that if this provision were written into the law he believed it would help to cut down the number of accidents. I believe there was considerable support in the committee for this submission but the minister declined to accept such an amendment and of course it was not written into the act.

The final disposition of the proposal was that the minister would write to the different provincial governments asking them if they had any objection to there being a provision of the kind suggested written into the Railway Act. I do not intend to go any farther with this matter today, but I urge upon the minister once more that he accept this recommendation which was made by the Canadian National Railways and was supported by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

None of us likes to see more penalty clauses written into legislation. There are, of course, many, many penalty clauses of all kinds facing every Canadian every minute of the day that he or she is awake; but here is a suggestion which fits in with the purposes of the grade crossing fund, namely, to cut down accidents at level crossings. I do submit that the suggestion could very well be accepted by the minister and the government.

(Translation):

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to answer the suggestions of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne). He spoke at some length about the situation in Quebec city, which is known to me, as I have often travelled by rail to Quebec. But I must say that in order to improve the existing situation in his city, it would be best to vote in favour of the measure which is now under consideration.

This legislation will put at the disposal of the municipalities willing to undertake projects of this kind—which are needed in the city of Quebec—much more considerable amounts than the latter was able to get under the act now being amended.

(Text):

I should like to try to deal summarily with the principal matters which have been raised during the discussions this afternoon. I think the first and perhaps the most important point mentioned is the increasing of the annual contribution from $1 million to $5 million. I think there has been in the minds of several members of the committee the thought that it would have been desirable to have provided a larger sum than $5 million. In that connection I should like to quote a paragraph from the report of the board of transport commissioners, which will be found on page 59 of the printed report, in which they say:

It is our considered opinion that a program of these proportions would represent the maximum amount of use of the fund grants at this time, and that any attempt initially to carry out a larger annual program would be subject to several objections: (1) the additional financial aid from the federal government would necessarily be applied to less urgent projects, and the value of the projects relative to other types of expenditure would be less; (2) as long as the grade crossing program remains a co-operative one—and we are strongly of the view that it should so remain—an expansion of federal grants without regard to the ability of other parties to finance their share would either cause an unwarranted strain on railway or municipal finances or leave a certain portion of the available grants unused; (3) apart from financial and economic limitations, there are also limitations of skilled labour, engineering personnel, equipment and similar items to be considered. Even on the program which we have suggested, we are not assuming an adequate supply of these factors will always be on hand.

I think that paragraph gives a very convincing reason why a larger sum than $5 million was not recommended by the board. As hon. members know, the bill, in that respect at least, embodies the recommendations of the board itself.

Another point on which I should like to touch, Mr. Chairman, is the concern expressed by the hon. member for Danforth with regard to the provision that if the uncommitted balance in the fund at the end of any year exceeds $2 million, then the appropriation for the ensuing year is to be reduced accordingly. I think if hon. members will examine the report of the board they will find that that provision was suggested by the board so that there would not be an accumulation of uncommitted funds in the grade crossing fund. I think it will be perfectly obvious to all who think about it for a moment that if there are uncommitted funds in the grade crossing fund it will be because there are no projects before the board which it is willing to approve.

The hon. member for Regina quoted some figures with regard to the number of accidents at protected crossings and contrasted them with the number of accidents at unprotected crossings. From those figures he drew what seemed to be an unwarranted assumption that because the accident rate at protected crossings was greater than at unprotected crossings we should re-examine the whole question and lay greater emphasis on grade separations.

I think the hon. member has failed to realize that one reason why the ratio of accidents at protected crossings is higher than at unprotected crossings is that the volume of traffic is substantially higher and therefore the possibility of accident much greater.

Mr. Ellis: May I point out to the minister that I mentioned specifically the fact that the accident rate was due to the greater volume of traffic.

Mr. Marler: Then probably we are in agreement as to the cause, although perhaps not as to the assumption or inference that ought to be drawn from these statistics. At all events I do not think there is any real difference of opinion between the hon. member and me. I think we are probably agreed that at the heavily travelled crossings it is desirable, where possible and where finances permit, to have grade separations rather than automatic or mechanical protection.

At the same time I do not think that we should overlook the fact that protection is highly important. I think the board believes that it is just as important to provide protection at level crossings, particularly where the volume of traffic is not of heavy density, as it is in the case of urban municipality crossings. I suppose that inevitably the provision of flashing lights, bells and short-arm gates will continue to be the basis of any protection program carried out by the board.

I should like to reassure hon. members, particularly those representing rural constituencies, that it is certainly not the intention of the board, if one may judge from what is said in their report, to concentrate their expenditures strictly in the urban areas and overlook the important advantages that would accrue from establishing protective devices at what I might refer to as grade crossings in rural areas.

A good deal of stress has been laid by hon. members on the desirability of embodying in this bill a provision for a penalty for those who disregard signs which are placed by order of the board of transport commissioners. I should like to repeat what was said by the board because similar representations were made to it during the course of the inquiry. I should like to quote from page 69 of the report as follows:

> Other suggestions, more closely allied to motor vehicle operation, including those of an educational nature respecting public observance of grade crossing signs and protective devices, compulsory speed reduction and compulsory stopping of vehicles under certain conditions, and the strict enforcement of prescribed highway safety regulations were placed before us.
> These are matters not within the jurisdiction of the board but, nevertheless, they are of interest to the board and might usefully meet with the attention of the provincial committees herein elsewhere suggested, as they constitute a part of the overall problem of highway accidents concerning which there is a rapidly amounting national awareness.

As some hon. members have pointed out, when this bill was before the standing committee, counsel for Canadian National Railways suggested that an amendment be made—I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra gave the substance a few moments ago, if not the text, of the proposed amendment—and then suggested to the committee that if there was legislation of this nature it would be possible for the railways to prosecute persons who disregarded protective signs.

I must say that I have not been wholly convinced as to the sincerity of those statements because if there had been a desire on the part of the railways to prosecute offenders there were already several statutes on the books of several of the provinces of Canada under which prosecutions might have been laid. It was not necessary that they should prosecute solely for reckless driving. This afternoon one hon. member referred to the legislation in Saskatchewan and I had occasion the other day to refer to the legislation in Nova Scotia. Section 117 of the motor vehicle act of Nova Scotia reads:

> Whenever a person driving a vehicle approaches a highway and railway grade crossing and a clearly visible or positive signal gives warning of the immediate approach of a railway engine, train or car, it shall be an offence for the driver of the vehicle to fail to stop the vehicle before traversing such grade crossing.

There is similar legislation in British Columbia. I think the fact that there is this legislation demonstrates two things. First, that if the railways desire to prosecute there is legislation available in many of the provinces under which action can be taken and, secondly, the fact that this legislation has been adopted by the provincial legislatures shows that this is a subject which comes properly within the purview of provincial legislation dealing with highways. For these reasons I think the board was quite right in indicating in its report that this was a matter to be dealt with by provincial legislation and not by an amendment to the Railway Act.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to a section of the Railway Act, I think it was section 416. I do not believe that the principle embodied in section 416 is comparable to what we are talking about. The existing provision relates to persons passing on foot across the right of way and I do not think that this is a matter of dealing with the right of way part of the highway. Clearly this is legislation which refers to the movement of vehicles on highways and it should be dealt with by the provinces.

The hon. member for Oxford spoke about a crossing in the town of Ingersoll. Perhaps that case will give me an opportunity to answer another question at the same time. I think the situation is simply that the correspondence which the hon. member read emanated, as I understood it, from the Canadian National Railways and representatives of the town of Ingersoll. I would think that the proper course for the town of Ingersoll to follow would be to take up the matter with the board of transport commissioners. I have made inquiry and am informed that it is not the practice of the board to make a mandatory order to force a municipality to carry out works of protection which they are unwilling or unable to do. So that, Mr. Chairman, in the case of Ingersoll, if the town authorities will communicate with the board of transport commissioners, I am sure that any representations they may make will be considered sympathetically by the board.

At the same time I should like to say just this further word. The question has been raised with regard to the constitutionality of the provision under which the board of transport commissioners may assess a portion of the cost of a grade crossing protection or a grade separation project upon a municipal corporation. It seems to me that it should not be overlooked that this is a provision that has long been in the Railway Act and I thought, if I understood the hon. member for Oxford correctly, that it had actually been the subject of a decision by the privy council which settled the question quite positively in affirming that this was legislation competent to the federal parliament. Consequently I do not think we should attach too much importance to the views of those who now seem to have some doubts on the constitutional aspects, inasmuch as the privy council has already rendered its judgment.

I think there is perhaps one other important subject upon which I should touch, namely the question of the costs of maintenance. I should merely like to remind the committee that the recommendation of the board was that, as to future projects, a contribution towards maintenance costs up to $200 in any one case might be made. As I said earlier, during the discussion of the resolution or on the second reading of this bill, this was the only recommendation of the board which we did not feel we should accept. But as I indicated at the time, and as I think I repeated before the standing committee, if experience shows that we should reconsider this aspect of the question, we shall be glad to do it in the light of the new provisions concerning the grade crossing fund.

I should like to emphasize the fact that it is only a matter of $200. I doubt very much, particularly in the examples which have been cited today, if a contribution of $200, of which the municipal share would probably be proportionately one-half, would determine whether a municipality would or would not accept responsibility to participate in providing protection or grade separation. At all events, Mr. Chairman, I will repeat what I said before. If experience shows that this provision would fill an urgent need, we shall be glad to reconsider our decision not to recommend it to parliament at the present time.

I should also like to emphasize the fact that the principal beneficiaries from this proposal would be the railways. The individual municipality itself would not benefit by any substantial amount. The benefit would accrue principally to the railways. I think hon. members will appreciate that the other provisions of the bill afford much more substantial relief to the railways. I do not think they should complain too strongly that with respect to future projects the costs of maintenance are not going to be absorbed by the grade crossing fund, even with the limitation of $200.

I think the only other point that I should deal with is the question of priorities which was raised by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. As I understand it, there is no system of priorities. Each of the projects that are submitted to the board is examined on its own merits. Each is approved. There is not a long waiting list which has to be reviewed at the end of the year. The board realizes that the only way in which we can make genuine progress towards the solution of the problem is to deal with meritorious projects as they come before the board and not to wait in order to establish a long list of priorities either as between one province and another or as between one project and another.

Mr. Chairman, there is only one final word I should like to say and it is this. I do not think anybody believes that, by voting $5 million to the grade crossing fund, we are thereby going to solve the problem of accidents at grade crossings. I think that the trouble can be ended only when the education of the public is complete and when people—drivers in particular—realize the dangers of crossing a railway without taking adequate precautions. The fact that so many accidents take place at protected crossings certainly shows that there is a need for much more care on the part of the drivers than is exercised at the present time. I suppose we shall only solve the problem ultimately when drivers generally have assumed a greater degree of care in driving their cars and when, at the busiest crossings, we are able to construct grade separations instead of protective devices.

After the full discussion we have had on this bill I hope it will now be possible to adopt it so as to enable the board of transport commissioners to make grants from the fund and to start with this larger sum of money towards making greater progress in solving the grade crossing problem.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question. Would the minister care to comment on whether or not it might be recommended to the board of transport commissioners that, where you have one of these grade crossings benefiting more than one municipality directly, or as in the case of the example I cited this afternoon—I refer to the town of Ingersoll—where the provincial highways are benefited more than the municipality, it might be possible that the expenses the municipality must pay could be allocated among more than one municipality or, in some cases, between a municipality and the provincial government.

Mr. Marler: I think the answer to that question will be found in the very first clause of the bill which clearly gives the board the power to order what portion of the cost is to be borne respectively by the company, any municipal or other corporation or person in respect of any order made by the board, and so on. I cannot see anything which precludes the board from ordering that the costs of a given project should be borne by one or more municipal corporations. When the benefit is going beyond the confines of a single municipality, I understand that it is their practice to discuss with the province concerned the possibility of provincial contribution. I think the hon. member will agree that each case must rest on its own merits and that, as I think I said in the standing committee, the wider the discretion which the board has in determining the apportionment of the cost, the more likely it is that they will be able to render substantial justice to all concerned.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER, ETC.

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Elections Act including provision for an increase in the salary of the chief electoral officer.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the resolution, which is very simple, is twofold. In the first place the resolution calls for the putting into effect of the recommendations made by the standing committee on privileges and elections which, through its chairman, tabled a report on the 29th of April. The draft bill attached to the report contains the changes in the act. I might say that none of these changes is of a very serious nature. The committee held quite a number of sittings. Recommendations were made to the committee by different departments of the government, by members of the house and by other organizations.

The second part of the resolution concerns the increase in the salary of the chief electoral officer. The bill to follow the resolution will contain provision for such increase so as to enable the chief electoral officer to receive remuneration comparable to the status of a deputy minister which he holds under the statute.

Mr. Pallett: In rising to speak on the resolution I do so with very limited experience of the elections act. However, I had a very enjoyable experience as a member of the standing committee on privileges and elections. I was very much impressed with the conduct and actions of the chief electoral officer. I felt the answers he gave to the questions asked and the presentation he made before the committee certainly indicated that he was non-partisan in his conduct so far as any matters relating to elections are concerned. With reference to the proposed increase in pay, if the man is worthy of his hire, and I certainly think he is, he is entitled to the increase suggested by the Secretary of State.

I believe the committee might have gone a little further in making recommendations, particularly so since certain sections of our country are becoming more built up and are faced with the problems of increasing population. I have some specific suggestions. The first one is that the hour of closing of the polls might be advanced to seven o'clock instead of six o'clock. I make this suggestion because in the more built-up areas where people live in one area and work in another some miles away they leave before the polls open in the morning and return after they close at night. I fully recognize the act provides that every employee must be given time off to vote by his employer, but I suggest the fact of the matter is that most employees do not take the time. Perhaps they are not aware of the provision in the act. The extension of the voting period by one hour would overcome the difficulty. The problem has already been dealt with by the province of Ontario where the hour of closing of the polls has been extended to seven o'clock to accommodate people in the suburban ridings. One might say that it is a problem of suburbia.

My second suggestion is that the advance poll might embrace a wider group of citizens, and again the province from which I come has already taken action in this regard. Contrary to the suggestions put forward by one of the government members on the committee, I suggest that voting is primarily a right and not a privilege. It may also be a privilege to vote but it goes further than that and is a right. I think the right should be extended to all persons, and if it is necessary for a person to be away from their own district on voting day for some reason I think they should have the right to vote at an advance poll. People could take advantage of the opportunity to vote. There would be no great rush of persons wanting to vote ahead of time but people who are conscientious about their duties as citizens could exercise their franchise. I make this suggestion to the Secretary of State so that an amendment may be incorporated in the act before the next election.

The act provides that there shall be a statutory day of voting, Monday. I think this matter can bear investigation. We wish everyone to have the opportunity to vote. We want them to be able to consider carefully the candidates for whom they are voting, and we must also recognize that women are taking a more important place in the affairs and life of the country. All of us no doubt have worked on election days and we know what happens when you call for a person to take them to vote and they are in the middle of doing a washing. They rush out, perhaps vote rather hurriedly, and rush back again. By fixing a statutory day we are perhaps losing the vote of some women who are busily occupied on Monday which, after all, is washday. I suggest that the removal of the provision fixing Monday as election day might be considered in order that the act might be more flexible.

Again, the custom is developing throughout the country of people taking long week ends. Maybe they return on Monday morning and they want to go to work immediately. They do not have the opportunity to properly assess the situation on a Monday. If elections were held on some other day than Monday I suggest to the Secretary of State that probably a greater percentage of voters would go to the polls.

I also suggest there should be some provision in the act to prohibit the holding of elections in the months of July and August. Many people are not at home at election time in the holiday months, and it is too much to ask people who work hard 50 weeks of the year to deny themselves the right to their holidays. While the franchise is dear to us, nevertheless it is asking a little too much of people to expect them to return from their holidays to vote. I suggest the Secretary of State might consider that matter with a view to changing the legislation.

I do not know how my next suggestion could be incorporated in our present voting system. The matter would perhaps require considerable study. At the present time representation in the house is not in any way in accordance with the popular vote. In the 1953 election the government members received 2,819,813 votes out of a total of 5,701,963, or less than half the popular vote. The fact that they received less than half the popular vote is not represented in any way by the number of seats they hold in the house. They have a quite extraordinary majority of seats which they won with less than half the popular vote. I am not suggesting the answer. I merely point out the situation to the house and the country as a whole. The fact is that the people who are governing the country and who have such a vast majority of seats actually received less than half of the votes cast by the people who voted at the last election. I would suggest that to the minister for any consideration he wishes to give it. With these remarks, and with the added support and commendation of the electoral officer I mentioned at the outset, I conclude.

Mr. Knowles: I should like first of all, Mr. Chairman, to join with the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Peel in the tribute all of us are happy to pay to the fairness and efficiency with which the chief electoral officer, Mr. Nelson Castonguay, carries out his duties. I am sure we all agree with the Secretary of State that, having voiced these tributes so often, it is good to have the opportunity to express these tributes in the more concrete form which has been suggested by the Secretary of State.

As had been pointed out the purpose of this resolution is to forecast the introduction of a bill, which I take it will be substantially along the lines of the draft bill recommended by the committee on privileges and elections. That draft bill can be found in Votes and Proceedings for Friday, April 29, 1955. Although the draft bill is rather voluminous, containing some 90 pages or more, we all recognize that for the most part it involves technical changes. Indeed, to a large extent they are changes that have been suggested by the chief electoral officer as a result of his experience with the general election of 1953. In so far as there are any changes of substance involved in this proposed legislation, we have the knowledge that they were worked out and agreed to by the members of the standing committee on privileges and elections.

Other members have made or no doubt will make suggestions as to additional improvements which should be made in the Canada Elections Act at this time. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come when our federal law respecting elections, the Canada Elections Act, should be tightened up with regard to election expenses and particularly with regard to the reporting of election expenses. I am aware of the fact that this subject is touched upon slightly in the draft bill, but only slightly. There is a suggestion in the draft bill that the amount of money a candidate himself may expend in the course of an election, which at the moment is fixed at $1,000, be fixed at a limit of $2,000. This change is to be made in section 62 of the Canada Elections Act.

I regret that, as yet, we have not heard that there is to be any change in section 63 or any of the other sections relating to election expenses and the reporting of those expenses after the election is over. As hon. members are aware, in 1949 there was before this house a bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Quebec South. This bill dealt with the whole question and suggested, in concrete and specific form, changes that would tighten up the election act with regard to election expenses. As most members are aware, I made a suggestion to him the other day that he might consider reintroducing that bill at this session. I hope he will give serious consideration to that suggestion. The bill was based on the lengthy experience he has had, and it arose out of legislation that was considered at a time when he was a member of the cabinet. It seemed to me that the hon. member for Quebec South had some very useful suggestions in that bill introduced in the first session of 1949.

I would remind the Secretary of State and the members of the house generally, that that bill seemed to meet with general approval in 1949. In fact, it not only passed first reading in the usual perfunctory manner but it passed second reading with just as much speed. There was no discussion at all. After that, it went through the committee of the whole in about a minute or two if one can judge from looking at Hansard. However, for reasons that were not given, it was not proceeded with any further at the 1949 session.

What is the situation at the moment with respect to the reporting of election expenses? The Canada Elections Act says that all candidates in a federal election must, on their own behalf and through their official agents, report their election expenses. There are forms on which this is to be done, and it is supposed to be done within two months after the candidate in each constituency has been declared elected. Despite that fact I have in my hand sessional paper No. 3-C, which was tabled on Wednesday, January 13, 1954, in reply to certain questions which I placed on the order paper. It indicates that at that date there were 133 candidates in the general election of August 10, 1953, who had not yet filed their election returns as at January 13, 1954.

May I make it clear that these 133 did not include any elected members. It appears that all the members who were elected on August 10, 1953, took the precaution to obey the law and see to it that their election expenses were reported within the proper time. But there were 133 defeated candidates who did not bother to meet that provision; at least they had not done so by January 13, 1954. I find that nothing was done about this illegal practice. I use that word advisedly because, according to one of the sections in the act, section 63, subsection 8, it is an illegal practice to fail to carry out the requirement that election expense returns be filed.

I notice also that according to a certain subsection of section 81, which can be found on pages 229 and 230 of the green book entitled "General Election Instructions for Returning Officers", there are certain penalties to be applied to those who commit corrupt practices or illegal practices. Let me make it clear that the failure to turn in one's election expense return is not listed as a corrupt practice but rather as an illegal practice. The maximum penalty for an illegal practice, as set out in section 81 is that such person, during the five years next after the date of his being so reported, convicted, ordered or found guilty, shall be incapable of being elected to or of sitting in the House of Commons or of voting at any election of a member of that house or of holding any office in the nomination of the crown or of the governor in council.

Now, it is one of my complaints that although there are these 133 persons who committed an illegal act in that they did not file their expense returns nothing has been done about it. Apparently it is difficult to impose this penalty on them, to deny them the right to run again within five years, or to vote at any election within five years, because certain technicalities have not been carried out. They would have to be reported in a document to Mr. Speaker, and it would have to be indicated that they had been heard on their own behalf; and it would have to be declared that they were persons who should be expressly disqualified, as therein provided.

But it just so happens that, although these 133 persons were not reported directly to Mr. Speaker, in the terms set out in the act, they were reported to the House of Commons in sessional paper 3-C which was tabled on Wednesday, January 13, 1954. And I find that among these 133 persons there are some whose names are known to certain people. For instance, there is a gentleman named Mr. O'Reilly who was the Liberal candidate in Hamilton West. There is Mr. Montgomery who was the Liberal candidate in Lanark. There is the name of Mr. Roland Angers who was the Liberal candidate in Chicoutimi, and that of Mr. Henri Courtemanche who was the Progressive Conservative candidate in Labelle. There is the name of Mr. Eric Wilfred Balcom, not the hon. member for Halifax who sits in this House of Commons, but who, I understand, is a relative of that hon. member, and who was the Liberal candidate in the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

There is the name of Mr. Leonard Francis Hodgson—just to pick a name at random—who was the Social Credit candidate in the constituency of Nanaimo; and there is Mr. Patrick Sheehan O'Dwyer who was the Liberal candidate in Yorkton. There is the name of Mr. George Black, the Progressive candidate in the constituency of Yukon. And there are other names to a total of 133 persons reported to the House of Commons, but not technically reported to Mr. Speaker.

May I say another word about this information that was reported to the house.

The Chairman: I wonder if the hon. member would assist me. The resolution is in very general terms, but I understand the changes have been considered in the committee. I have been leafing through the bill and have not yet found any reference to the matter the hon. member is discussing. I wonder if he would help me in that respect.

Mr. Knowles: I would be glad to help you, Mr. Chairman, in two ways. First of all I would point out that the hon. member who preceded me was permitted to make suggestions as to changes which should be made at this time in the Canada Elections Act, when it is being amended. Like him, I am making suggestions as to changes which should be made. I think as a matter of fact I am a little closer to the proposed legislation than was the hon. member who preceded me, because there is in the draft bill—which I admit is not before us, but to which reference has been made—at least one change in the matter of election expenses.

I am suggesting that we should act further at this time in the matter of election expenses, and with respect to the reporting of such expenses, so far as our federal legislation is concerned. And if Your Honour is looking for the reference, I suggest that it occurs in the draft bill where reference is made to section 62 of the act.

The Chairman: I have noted the clause in the bill, but I find that it deals with the subject of personal expenses of a candidate. It does not deal with the matter of reporting those expenses at some later time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I suggest the expenses of the candidate is one of the items required to be reported. But even if it were not there at all, I suggest that what I am doing is on all fours with what was done by the hon. member who preceded me, and what was done by hon. members who spoke on the last item of legislation before us, when suggestions were made as to other matters that should be dealt with when legislation is before us.

I am urging that at this time the whole matter of the way in which the act spells out how election expenses should be reported should be tightened up. As all members are aware, at the present time even the document to which I have been referring would not come normally to the table of the House of Commons. Under the Canada Elections Act as it now stands we are required merely to report our election expenses to the returning officer in the local constituency. He is required to retain that document in his possession for a period of six months. During that period of six months anyone can go and look at the document simply by paying to the returning officer a fee of 20 cents. At the end of six months he either destroys the document or returns it to the candidate or the official agent.

So far as the law is concerned, election expense returns are never sent to any central place. They are never scrutinized by the chief electoral officer or by any other officer or authority of any kind to determine whether or not the law has been complied with by those filing the returns. I remember one occasion some years ago when I was a defeated candidate going to the returning officer in the constituency and asking to see the return of the hon. gentleman who had defeated me. This was at a time when it cost 10 cents, not 20. I put down the 10 cents and the returning officer got out his receipt book, preparing to make out a receipt. But then he said, "Oh, I am not going to take 10 cents from you. I have been a returning officer for 20 years, and this is the first time anyone has ever asked to see one of these returns".

I recite that incident only to point out how little attention is paid to these election expenses returns, because they simply stay with the local returning officer for a period of six months, at the end of which time they are either returned to the candidate or they are destroyed.

The hon. member for Quebec South made a suggestion in his bill, which came before us in 1949, which was to the effect that these returns should be sent to the chief electoral officer, and that he should have certain authority to check through them and to report to the Speaker of the House of Commons in those instances where anything was irregular or where returns have not been made according to law.

The only reason we have had after the last two elections documents of the kind to which I have been referring is because I happened to put questions on the order paper. As a result of that the chief electoral officer sent out a letter to all the returning officers asking them to send in such information as they had, so that he could compile this return for the House of Commons.

It is my view that there ought to be some more adequate machinery for checking these returns, to make absolutely sure that the law is complied with right down the line. In recent weeks, and particularly in recent days, there have been many stories and comments in the press about election expenses. Some of these have been on the beam, some have been cynical and some, I think, have been quite unfair, particularly to those who try to obey the law. However, not only do we as members of parliament, and those who ran against us but who were not elected, have a stake in this, but I think the whole country, with its interest in democracy, has a stake in this whole question of election expenses being put on a much more satisfactory basis than they are at the present time.

As Your Honour pointed out a moment ago, a slight change is being made by the bill which it is expected will be founded upon this resolution. But I do not believe that change helps the situation at all. As I understand it at the present time there is no limit on the amount of money that can be spent in an election campaign. The only place where a limit is imposed is that the candidate himself must not, personally, spend directly more than $1,000. But if he wants to contribute $2,000 or $100,000 to the campaign, he can do so. But at the present time any amount that he wants to contribute in excess of $1,000 must be turned over to his official agent, and the official agent must pay the bills. The only change being made is that the amount that the candidate can spend personally is being raised from $1,000 to $2,000. I doubt if many members in this house are interested in that change; we do not spend that kind of money personally. But it raises the whole question, Mr. Chairman, as to whether there should not be some limit on the total amount that can be expended in an election campaign and indeed whether there should not be some restriction on the sources from which contributions could be received.

This latter question has been dealt with in legislation in years gone by, which was abolished. The former question, namely, placing a limit as to the amount that can be expended in any campaign, was the subject matter of Bill No. 7 introduced by the hon. member for Quebec South in 1949.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, all of us have a stake in this question. All candidates at election time, whether they are elected or defeated, have a stake in it. The country as a whole, with its concern for democracy, has a stake in this matter being made more satisfactory than it is at the present time. I urge very strongly that consideration be given to this matter and I would like to see the government introduce legislation along these lines.

Even if the matter was not discussed at the meetings of the committee on privileges and elections, and even if this bill goes through, the government could have that committee meet again at this session or next session to see if something could not be done about this matter, or possibly the hon. member for Quebec South might reintroduce his bill, to give the house a chance to show its support for it, as we did in 1949. In any case, all members will recognize that the time is ripe —indeed I urge that the time has come—for action on this important question of election expenses.

Mr. Pouliot: Before the resolution is carried I have a few remarks to make. The first remark I intend to make is that this bill has been studied by a parliamentary committee of this house, and the members of the committee took care to scrutinize all the proposed amendments contained in the report which was published on April 29 in the Votes and Proceedings.

I was very pleased to listen to the hon. member for Peel. I am sure that he will follow the traditions of his predecessor who who was an excellent member and very popular with his colleagues.

With regard to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I always listen to him with the deepest interest. He made some interesting suggestions today, but as one who has taken part in more elections than he has, and is perhaps not so insistent on the formalities, I shall tell him what is my experience with regard to reports of election expenses. In the first place, he suggested that the amount to be spent in an election should be curtailed or limited. It cannot be done because sometimes election expenses run pretty high, and there is nothing to hide. At the present time the system which has been in force for a long time is excellent. What is being done? There is an election agent who makes his report. There is the member who makes a report of his expenses, and the whole thing is left with the returning officer for six months. Anyone has the opportunity to go to the returning officer, who is well-known in the community, and examine the reports. If they do not, it is because they are satisfied with the way in which the election has been carried on. It is obvious. I will tell that to my hon. friend. Instead of blaming the constituents when nobody goes to the returning officer to check the report, he should realize that it is because everybody in the constituency is satisfied with the way in which the election has been carried on by the candidate. This is my experience; not only my experience but also that of my opponents. I do not know where they got their funds. One made a report, the other one did not. Where did he get his funds? I do not know. I won the election. I did not bother about the poor fellow; I left him to cry about his defeat.

We must be generous in such circumstances. I made my report. The report was published in the press, according to law, and it was left with the returning officer for six months. One of my opponents made a report which I looked at, but which I did not check. The other one did not make a report. If I had complained about it to the returning officer everybody would have thought me mean. They would have said, he has won his election and he is making a martyr of the poor fellow who was defeated. I submit these considerations to my hon. friend. He will understand them very well.

I tell him that even if quite a lot of money was spent on an election the election may have been conducted honestly. For instance, take loud speakers. How much do they cost? They cost on an average $750 for an election. It is an honest expenditure, but it runs pretty high. The cost of radio is pretty high. It is $15 for 15 minutes at the smallest stations. In larger stations it may run up to $60 for a quarter of an hour. It is a lot of money. Then there is the literature. There is no frank during an election. You have to pay for the stamps; you have to pay for the errands; you have to pay for all of that. It is all legitimate expenditures.

I am greatly surprised that the committee has not authorized the candidates to rent cars on election day. There would be nothing immoral or unethical in sending a car for somebody or paying for it. At the present time we have to beg our friends for cars or ask them to pay for a taxi driver. It makes no sense. If the friends of a candidate contribute toward his election there is no reason why he should not hire cars on election day to make it easier for the electors. There is nothing wrong in it. In my experience it is just to be nice, because very often when a taxi is sent to bring someone to vote and the elector asks who is sending the taxi and you say "so and so", sometimes he laughs and votes for the other side. Who can control the vote of one who goes to the polling booth in a limousine or in a Ford car? Sometimes electors want to ride in a nice car. I think that is only proper because that is the day when they are masters of the situation. It is only natural that they should want to be well taken care of. Why should we be hypocrites and say that no member pays anything to provide driving accommodation so that the electors may vote? There is nothing wrong in that. It is not purchasing votes; it is not infringing upon their liberties; it is simply giving them a chance to observe the law with the least effort. I do not see anything wrong about it and I am sorry the law does not take this into consideration. There is something much more serious than what the hon. gentleman has said, and I say that in the friendliest way.

As a rule elections are carried on honestly. I believe that all members of parliament representing all groups have been elected honestly according to the constitution and the practices of the country which have existed for so long. I say that, not only about hon. members on this side of the house but about all my colleagues.

What I think is more important is the way in which the right to vote is granted and to whom. The committee did an excellent job when it refused to accept the proposal by an employee of the Department of External Affairs that all the employees of that department located outside of Canada should have the right to vote. The right to vote is important and in this I am in accord with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it should be given only to those who will use that right within the boundaries of the country.

I stated before the committee that the right to vote which was given to our soldiers was a privilege. That right which was given to members of the forces stationed outside of Canada was something out of the ordinary, it was a tremendous privilege. Why should we grant it to civil servants or to the wives of soldiers stationed outside of Canada? It is enough to give it to the soldiers without giving it to their wives, who most of the time know nothing about the business of the country.

They could be asked, who is the Prime Minister of Canada, who is the Leader of the Opposition, who is the Minister of National Defence and they would be unable to answer. Yet they are to be qualified to vote. Many of them have never been in Canada and yet they would be qualified to express their opinions about Tom who is a Liberal candidate, Jim who is a Conservative candidate, Paul who is a C.C.F. candidate, and another gentleman who is a Social Crediter.

What do they know about it? Simply because this tremendous privilege is given to members of our armed forces does not mean that the same privilege should be given to their wives who are not familiar with Canadian politics. There should be an end to that. The committee did a splendid thing when it refused the suggestion of the representative of the Department of External Affairs to grant the same right to members of that department who were stationed outside of Canada.

When I saw the judge advocate general and this gentleman from the Department of External Affairs appear before the committee I felt that what they wanted was a Cook's tour around the world to visit all places where soldiers were stationed or where members of that department were to be found. I was surprised to hear from the chief electoral officer that only one-third of the soldiers actually vote. Why give the vote to their wives? The committee said "no" when the gentleman from the Department of External Affairs made his fine suggestion.

What scandalized me was that when I told him he was not well enough prepared to appear before the committee one of the members of the committee was shocked. He could not understand that I should say that a civil servant was not well enough prepared to appear before the committee and give the information asked for. He had worked on this proposal for two years but he was unsuccessful and he will not have his Cook's tour. But the judge advocate general will have his Cook's tour as the opportunity to vote is to be given to the wives of soldiers. In the one case it was refused, in the other case it was granted. I do not see why the judge advocate general should be granted this Cook's tour.

The best way to have an honest election is to teach people how to vote. The proportion of those who vote will then be much larger. There are some reasons why people do not vote. They may be sick, they may have to be away. It is better to have a smaller number of voters who vote right in Canada than to have a larger number who vote by power of attorney or by correspondence. How can it be checked?

These are considerations that I leave with the committee of the whole. I congratulate the minister upon the way he left the committee free to decide by itself what it thought was the best thing to do. I join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in what he said about Mr. Castonguay. He was most informative when before the committee and was always ready to answer. He deserves this increase in salary which is being provided.

I can remember when his father received only $4,000 for doing all this work at a time when a son of a former prime minister received $10,000 for doing nothing. I was the one who protested and I succeeded in having the salary of the father increased. I am glad that the son is following in the traditions of his father.

I can tell my hon. friend that from my long experience I can say that I have not seen anything wrong in the way elections have been carried out, and hon. members who sit here as well as those who sat in the ten previous parliaments have nothing to be ashamed of for having been elected to the parliament of Canada.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the estimates of the Department of Labour, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Agriculture. That will be the order of business for Friday should they not be disposed of tomorrow.

It being two minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 19, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake) moved that the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Tuesday, May 17, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

ARMED FORCES—DESERTERS, KOREAN WAR

Mr. Harkness:

1. From the start of the Korean war to March 31, 1955, what has been the total number of releases on account of desertion, or absence without leave: (a) from the navy; (b) from the army; (c) from the air force?
2. What was the largest number of men posted as deserters or A.W.L. at any one time and what was the date?

Mr. Campney: Stand.

Mr. Harkness: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this question. I wonder if I might ask that this question be answered in the immediate future? It is a question which I am quite sure the Department of National Defence could answer within three days, but it has been standing on the order paper since April 5.

Mr. Campney: The answer is being prepared. I can assure the hon. member that it was not possible to compile the answer to this question within anything like three days. I hope, however, to have the answer shortly.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

PER CAPITA DEBT

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What is the per capita debt in Canada for the latest date available?
2. To whom is this debt owed and under what terms?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. The white paper tabled in the House of Commons on April 4, 1955, showed that the liabilities of Canada at March 31, 1955, were estimated to total $17,944,100,000; the net debt (total liabilities less active assets) was estimated at $11,264,200,000 and the unmatured funded debt was estimated at $14,487,800,000. On the basis of an estimated population of 15,482,000 the per capita figures are $1,159.02, $727.57 and $935.78 respectively.

2. As a large proportion of the funded debt is in bearer form it is not possible to state to whom the debt is owed. The monthly return of assets and liabilities of the chartered banks of Canada shows that on March 31, 1955, the chartered banks of Canada held government of Canada treasury bills in the amount of $434,980,000. The Bank of Canada held government of Canada securities in the amount of $2,139,000,000 on the same date.

The maturity dates and interest rates on the funded debt of Canada are listed in the white paper.

FOREIGN LOANS AND MUTUAL AID

Mr. Nicholson:

1. To what countries did Canada grant financial assistance during world war I as (a) outright gifts; (b) credits and loans?
2. To what countries did Canada grant financial assistance during world war II as (a) outright gifts; (b) credits and loans?
3. What was the amount advanced to each country under the above-mentioned classifications?

CIVIL DEFENCE, ONTARIO—HOSE COUPLINGS

Mr. Brown (Brantford):

What progress has been made under the civil defence agreement between the federal government and the province of Ontario to standardize hose couplings in that province?

Mr. Robertson: The federal government agreed to pay one-third of the cost of the hose coupling standardization program in Ontario up to a maximum of $367,000, and has recently completed payment of this amount to the province.

The program in Ontario is approximately 90 per cent complete and the balance—in sparsely populated sections of northern Ontario—will be completed this year.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING GRANTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What are the total amounts granted to each of the provinces by the federal government for vocational training?
2. When did the program commence?
3. Is it now in effect, and if not, why was it discontinued?

Mr. Gregg:

1. The vocational schools assistance agreements entered into by the government of Canada with the provinces under the authority of the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act provided federal government financial assistance to the provinces for the development and carrying on of vocational training at a secondary school level. These agreements, which were entered into in 1945, ran for a ten-year period to March 31, 1955, and provided federal financial assistance to the provinces of approximately $30,700,000 over the ten-year period. Of this amount, $10,304,950 was allotted specifically for building and equipment projects for the extension of training facilities, and the balance by way of annual grants of $2,070,000 was provided to assist the provinces in meeting operational costs of vocational schools, as well as for buildings and equipment.

The amount allotted over this period to each province pursuant to these agreements and payments made to the close of the fiscal year 1954-55 thereunder are as follows:

Province	Allotment	Payments to March 31/55
Newfoundland	$ 689,450	$ 594,020
Prince Edward Island	338,400	329,092
Nova Scotia	1,567,100	1,208,738
New Brunswick	1,351,300	1,340,200
Quebec	9,319,500	9,319,500
Ontario	8,947,000	8,723,185
Manitoba	1,952,600	1,169,911
Saskatchewan	2,488,000	2,176,669
Alberta	2,149,600	2,094,669
British Columbia	1,884,100	1,847,329
Northwest Territories	21,100	4,866
Total	$30,708,150	$28,808,179

The federal commitments to the provinces with respect to the amount of $10,304,950 specifically allotted for building and equipment projects has been met and provision was made by the governor in council under date of March 12, 1955, for the extension of the term of each of the aforesaid agreements to March 31, 1956. Provision has been made in the estimates of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year 1955-56 for payments to the provinces pursuant to the provisions of these agreements to the amount of $2,070,000 in the fiscal year.

NATIONAL PARKS—SUPERINTENDENTS TRANSFERRED

Mr. Bell:

1. Have any park superintendents been transferred in the national parks branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources since January, 1953?

2. If so, who, where, and for what reasons?

Mr. Lesage:

1. Yes.

2. (i) Mr. B. I. M. Strong was transferred from the position of superintendent, Prince Albert national park, to the position of superintendent, Banff national park, effective May 10, 1953. Mr. Strong succeeded Mr. J. A. Hutchison who was promoted to the position of director, national parks branch.

(ii) Mr. J. D. B. MacFarlane was transferred from the position of acting superintendent of Cape Breton Highlands national park, to Ottawa in September 1953, and then to the position of superintendent, Prince Albert national park, effective December 1, 1953. This move followed Mr. Strong's transfer to Banff national park.

(iii) Mr. C. E. Doak was transferred from the position of officer in charge, Point Pelee national park, to the position of superintendent, Cape Breton Highlands national park, effective September 15, 1953. This transfer followed the move of Mr. MacFarlane.

(iv) Mr. K. B. Mitchell was transferred from the position of assistant superintendent, Banff national park, to the position of superintendent, Riding Mountain national park, effective March 6, 1955. Mr. Mitchell's transfer was a result of Mr. O. E. Heaslip's retirement.

(v) Mr. J. A. Pettis is to be transferred from the position of park engineer, Yoho national park, to position of superintendent, Kootenay national park, on the retirement of Mr. F. A. Bryant, superintendent, Kootenay national park. Mr. Bryant's retirement is to be effective July 7, 1955.

It is the department's established policy to move park superintendents from one park to another at intervals of approximately five years. This ensures that the superintendents will gain wide experience and will have the opportunity to develop their abilities to the fullest extent. It also ensures that a new viewpoint will be brought to the problems of administering each park at reasonable intervals, and at the same time helps to achieve uniformity in the handling of administrative details which are common to all parks.

BROADCASTING

RADIO—POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION TO REVIEW REGULATION AND CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government is contemplating the appointment of a royal commission to review the basis of regulation and control of radio broadcasting in Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I can say to the hon. gentleman that the government is contemplating the appointment of a commission, but that does not mean that any decision about an immediate appointment has been reached.

TELEVISION—MODIFICATION OF POLICY OF SINGLE STATION COVERAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister a second question? Is the government contemplating either the abandonment or modification of the so-called policy of single station coverage with respect to television, that is to say the policy of local monopoly of television in Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The question is not one to which a categorical yes or no can be given. The policy has never been that there would be, for all time, only one station in each locality. The whole matter is under constant consideration, and the question as to when it will be deemed proper to declare that applications for duplication of service will be entertained is part of that consideration. It may very well be that no decision would be arrived at before the appointment of the commission to which the hon. member referred in his previous question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CUSTOMS TARIFF

CLASSIFICATION OF CANNED MIXED FRUIT AS PEACHES—REFERENCE TO GATT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the government not prepared to let the court decision stand that mixed fruit is not peaches; or are press reports correct that the government's representative at Geneva has been asked to sound out other GATT countries as to whether the tariff on mixed fruit might be raised? How does that square with the government's low tariff policy?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): One of the rules of GATT is that tariff negotiations are conducted in strict secrecy. It would be impossible for me to say whether tariff discussions included mixed fruit, if I knew the answer, which I do not. If the matter of mixed fruit was referred to GATT it was referred by the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for tariff matters.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Minister of Finance comment on the press report that the government's representative at Geneva has begun sounding out other GATT countries on this issue?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): No, I was not aware of the press report; and I agree with my colleague, who says that these matters are conducted in secrecy.

REMISSION OF HIGHER DUTIES COLLECTED ON MIXED FRUIT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Has anything been done by his department to pay back the higher duties collected on mixed fruit during the period of time between the date when the government classified mixed fruit as peaches and the date when the court made its final decision that mixed fruit is not peaches?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Yes; the matter is being processed right along and, to date, we have paid back more than half a million dollars.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INCREASED DOCTORS' FEES IN ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the announced boost of 50 per cent in doctors' fees in Ontario, will the minister boost by 100 per cent his efforts to persuade the cabinet that the time has come to bring in nation-wide health insurance?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not give me notice of his intention to ask his question. However he knows perfectly well that not only the minister but the government as a whole always boost good causes.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

173. Departmental administration, $685,605.

The Chairman: I would point out to the committee that the item is found at page 31 of the main estimates, and the details appear at page 246. Shall the resolution carry?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, I am never quite sure whether hon. members would prefer to have me make way at once for members to discuss my estimates, on the one hand, or whether they would like a short statement concerning special items of interest, on the other. I am prepared today to follow either course. It is only in the hope that it might expedite the passing of my estimates that, unless someone objects, I shall choose the latter.

The main estimates of the department and the unemployment insurance commission for 1955-56 total $69,542,295, as compared with $72,874,271, including supplementaries, for 1954-55, or a reduction of $3,331,976. This is accounted for partly by a reduction in the estimate of the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, and partly by the fact that the Department of Public Works has been given the responsibility for building, maintenance and rental of premises for the unemployment insurance commission, costs which before were largely borne by the commission.

There is also a reduction in the item for vocational training capital expenditures, because our commitment under the agreement with the provinces has been fulfilled. There is a reduction in the services covering the movement of immigrants for work on farms and to fill other unsatisfied labour demands. These are the main items that cause the reduction in the vote; there are, of course, others. There are some slight increases in certain items which I shall refer to when I come to them.

On the question of staff, there is a slight change from last year; a reduction of 12 positions in the Department of Labour, partly owing to curtailment in certain fields of operation. But it will be noted from page 262 of the blue book on estimates that there is an increase of 304 in the establishment for the unemployment insurance commission. The increase is caused by the fixing of larger continuing establishments for many offices, owing to the increase in work load resulting from an increase in benefit claims.

At this point I should like to express my recognition and appreciation of the excellent work which the staff of both the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission have continued to render. I think they are deserving of high praise, and are a credit to our public service.

Now, to comment briefly on some of the activities for which these estimates provide, let me deal first with the annuities branch, item 175. There are at present 350,000 persons covered by Canadian government annuities. Approximately 68,000 of these people are actually in receipt of their annuities, to a total of $32 million a year. Annual premium income for the year ended March 31, 1955, was about $66 million, which is an increase of around $2 million over the previous year. The annuities fund, as at March 31, 1955, amounted to $864,543,038. During the past year there has been an increase in sales, particularly of individual contracts, which show an increase of 18 per cent over the previous year.

I need not emphasize the national importance of the work performed by the industrial relations branch, which covers conciliation services, administration of legislation governing wages and working conditions on government contracts, the development of labour-management co-operation, and many other lesser activities. These are in vote 176.

The moneys voted last year for these purposes were well spent. There were 80 industrial disputes dealt with during the past fiscal year. In 48 of these 80 cases, settlements of the disputes were secured by conciliation officers. In 25 cases conciliation boards were established during the year, and reports were also received from five conciliation boards established during the previous fiscal year. Settlements were made on the basis of the boards' recommendations in nine of these disputes. There were six disputes in the hands of conciliation officers, and 18 disputes referred to conciliation boards which were still being dealt with at the end of the fiscal year.

Aside from the cases I have mentioned as still pending, out of 80 industrial disputes all except three were settled during the year. In two of the three legal strikes occurred, and the third was settled by arbitration.

This industrial relations branch is also responsible for the administration of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. This involves the functions of the Canada labour relations board and the administration of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. These services are covered in the estimates under items 177 and 178.

The Canada labour relations board dealt with 65 applications for the certification of bargaining agents during the fiscal year, of which 53 applications originated during that period. Of the 65 applications mentioned, 34 were granted, 5 were rejected, 12 were withdrawn, and 14 were still being investigated on March 31. In disposing of these cases the board ordered 14 representation votes, which were conducted by officers of the department.

Last year I mentioned particularly the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, which was then a new piece of legislation, and stated that a broader program of educational activity was planned. As part of this program two series of radio talks, one in English and one in French, were arranged during the fiscal year just ended. Other publicity measures included a distribution of pamphlets and posters describing the provisions of the act. Between July 1, 1953, when the act came into effect, and March 31, 1955, a total of 11 complaints were made under the act. Of the 8 made during the past fiscal year, 6 were settled either by direct investigation and conciliation or by correspondence, and 2 were under investigation as of March 31, 1955.

It is proposed to continue the farm labour program which has been continuously in operation since world war II, and the funds required are shown in vote 181. Under this program agreements are entered into with the provinces to provide for the sharing of the costs of organized movements of farm workers to meet seasonal demands in different areas. The provinces have asked that the program be continued, and after consultation with them it has been decided that a program sufficient to take care of this year's needs can be carried on with a reduction of $75,000 from the amount provided last year.

In addition to the farm labour program, which is designed to make the most effective use of the farm labour force within Canada, it has been necessary from time to time to bring immigrant farm workers to Canada in organized groups. Similar organized group movements have been necessary to meet labour demands in several other basic industries. Funds for services connected therewith are provided under item 190. Last year an amount of $325,000 was included for transportation costs. This year any transportation required for these movements will be provided from funds voted to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. For this reason, and because the movements this year are expected to be somewhat smaller, the amount provided in vote 190 represents a reduction of $411,385 from the amount provided in 1954-55.

Last year when the estimates were before the committee the director of the new women's bureau had just been appointed. I am now happy to say that the new branch has now been staffed and in operation for the past nine months. The director is Miss Marion V. Royce, a lady who is proving very well qualified by training and experience to give proper attention to the problems of women in employment. Ground work has already been laid for a survey to be undertaken of married women in employment. In view of the economic and social implications of the growing participation of married women in the labour force, the bureau regards this as an important area of investigation. It is also planned to undertake two additional projects of research during the coming year; a study of the occupational distribution of women in Canada, and in the field of women's earnings. The administrative costs of the branch are provided for under item 182.

I mentioned last year the initial steps that had been taken to establish a comprehensive plan for the rehabilitation of Canada's disabled. In co-operation with the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Veterans Affairs, and in close consultation with the national advisory committee on rehabilitation, the provinces and voluntary agencies, these plans are going forward.

Eight of the provinces are now making use of the agreement whereby a maximum contribution of $15,000 a year is made through my department, on a matching basis, toward the salaries and expenses of a provincial co-ordinator and his staff, and toward the cost of supplying certain rehabilitation services not otherwise provided for. This is shown under item 183. The province of Ontario, in addition, has appointed a director of rehabilitation services, and discussions are going forward with that province regarding the possible signing of this agreement.

During the past year eight provinces have appointed provincial co-ordinators of rehabilitation. In these provinces improved facilities for rehabilitating the disabled through the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act are now being utilized, and my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be reporting to you that in nine of the provinces the new medical rehabilitation grant is being used to expand facilities and train the staff necessary for the medical side of the program.

While the program is new and much has yet to be done, a good start has been made. I am impressed by the calibre of the men selected by the provinces to head up this program, and you will be glad, as I am, to know that as experience is gained, more and more of our disabled will be equipped to live more useful and satisfying lives.

The vocational training program under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which is provided for under items 184, 185 and 186, accounts for approximately $4,500,000 of our total estimates for the year, so I think it is deserving of special mention although there is little change in the program from last year. Hon. members are aware that this program is a joint undertaking with the provinces, and with few exceptions the projects are based on a dollar for dollar contribution.

I mentioned earlier in my remarks that our commitments under agreement with the provinces for capital expenditures on vocational schools had been fulfilled. I referred to the $10,300,000 federal allotment which had been made since 1945 to be spent over a period of years on buildings and equipment to assist the provinces to enlarge and improve their vocational school facilities. At the close of the fiscal year 1954-55 federal payments under this program amounted to $9,722,374. The small amount which is requested under vote 186 is intended to provide for a few delayed claims from the provinces, and is in fact a revote.

Other vocational training programs which have been in effect for some years and which will be continued in 1955-56 include the training of apprentices, for which there is an annual expenditure of approximately $1 million; youth training, training of unemployed workers, foremanship and supervisory training, training of workers for defence industries, training of disabled persons, training of persons for the armed forces, etc. The detailed money provision for these various projects appears on page 255 of the blue book.

Mr. Chairman, I am not attempting here to report on all the services which come under the Department of Labour. If I were doing so, of course, I would make special mention of the work of our economics and research branch, government employees compensation branch—on which there is legislation before the house—and also the publication of the Labour Gazette, which attempts to present factual information on labour matters of special interest from month to month.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister goes on, I do not want to break into his argument but he gave a reply today to a question I asked regarding vocational training. He stated in that reply:

> The vocational schools assistance agreements entered into by the government of Canada with the provinces under the authority of the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act provided federal government financial assistance to the provinces for the development and carrying on of vocational training at a secondary school level.

Have all the provinces entered into agreements for the next year, so the same provision will be made as has been made in the past 10 years?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I shall be prepared to discuss this item in more detail when we come to it; but to answer my hon. friend's question, as he knows the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act has a large number of schedules. There is "M" for unemployed persons, there is "R" for disabled persons, and so on. All the provinces have now either entered into an agreement for this year on the same basis as last year or are in process of doing so.

I turn now, Mr. Chairman, to the estimates of the unemployment insurance commission. Since there is legislation concerning the act before the house I am not going into it as fully as I did with regard to the department. There are three votes, one for the administration of the act, one for the contribution of the government to the fund, and one for the transfer of unemployed workers to areas where jobs are available.

The vote for administration shows a decrease over last year of $1,014,342. During the fiscal year 1954-55 an agreement was reached with the Department of Public Works by which in their estimates they would provide the necessary funds for looking after the rental of office accommodation, necessary alterations in offices and the providing of office furniture for the unemployment insurance commission.

During the years the commission has been in existence the services of the trained employees of the Department of Public Works were largely utilized for these purposes, but the funds were always voted by the unemployment insurance commission. The decrease accomplished in this manner is offset to some extent by a careful review that was made during the year of the work load in all the offices, which resulted in a small increase in the basic fixed establishment for regular positions. As you will observe, they were increased from 7,406 to 7,710. With the increase in the basic fixed establishments for the various offices it has been determined that the need for casual help during periods of seasonal unemployment, such as the winter months, will not be as great and a lesser amount has been provided for this purpose for the fiscal year 1955-56.

During the 12-month period from April 1, 1954 to March 31, 1955, a total of $257,628,602 was paid out in benefits, and the number of beneficiaries was approximately 1,001,000. Total contributions were $190,632,050, with the government contributing $31,771,740 of this amount. On March 31, 1955, the balance in the unemployment insurance fund was $840,692,317, a decrease of $40,581,817 over the balance on March 31, 1954. This decrease in the fund was due to the increased claim load during the period.

The most important function of the commission, of course, is the operation of the employment service. The value of this work cannot be overemphasized. During the last fiscal year 842,993 placements were made by our national employment service through its various offices across Canada.

The item for the transfer of labour also shows a decrease of $100,000. This item is designed to assist in the transfer of unemployed Canadian workers to places where employment is available. Expenditures made are recovered where possible from employers who are willing to pay the transportation cost of these transfers, and to that extent provide a revolving fund of working capital to aid in the movement of workers to jobs. Where such refunds cannot be assured, and where the minister finds that conditions in an area are such as to warrant such action, he may use this vote to assist unemployed workers in meeting the cost of moving to jobs elsewhere. The amount provided for the fiscal year 1954-55 was not required to the extent at first anticipated, owing to arrangements made with employers to refund the cost of transporting employees who were available for work in new localities.

That, Mr. Chairman, concludes my introductory remarks.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the remarks the minister has made will probably help clear up some of the points on which we would undoubtedly have asked questions. However, there are still some things that are not particularly clear. I refer particularly to the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. I think we shall want more explicit information on that matter.

The reason I had not intended to go into the matter of unemployment insurance at this time is that, as the committee knows, the standing committee on industrial relations is even now sitting and considering amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. There will therefore be plenty of opportunity, I take it, for the committee to consider the various clauses of the new act and the administration of the old one, and also to ask such questions as we may wish at that time.

I was interested to hear the minister's report on the administration of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, and in particular to learn of the few complaints which had been received by the department. I think this is a point we should all consider. I recall that when we had before us the bill which became the act, speeches were made which sought to disparage the necessity for this type of legislation on the ground that in the various provinces in which it had been put into effect there had been so few complaints that is was thought the enactment of such legislation was scarcely necessary.

However, I like to take the other view and think that Canadians, generally speaking, are law-abiding people. When legislation is brought down the average Canadian reacts to it in a law-abiding manner, even if heretofore he has had different views and has acted in a manner different from the requirements of the act. He now pulls in his horns a bit and says, "After all, this is the law and I must abide by the law." I believe that is why, once legislation of this sort is enacted, we have so few complaints.

I am sure the minister will agree with me that even where we have complaints, a great many of them are readily settled by bringing the two parties together, or sometimes merely by a telephone call to the employer who had not realized that he had offended. Likewise, the complainant sometimes is at fault and when it is brought to the attention of that person he or she will readily admit that possibly he or she has imagined some of the things about which complaints were made. I know this has been the case in some instances, and I am sure it is the case with regard to many of the instances which come to the attention of the department by reason of the administration of this act.

This is a rather momentous year, Mr. Chairman, in labour matters in Canada. We are told that it will not be long now until two major labour congresses in this country join in one large organization. I am sure that is a step we all welcome. I think it is not so much a matter of joining as it is a matter of admitting to themselves that, after all, they have the same objectives and must operate together under one head.

However, this amalgamation of interests in itself presents problems to the government, just as it will undoubtedly present problems to the two congresses themselves and to their local affiliates. I think this would be an appropriate time to draw attention to the fact that the government has not yet got down to a review of our labour laws. We in this party urged such action as long ago as the special session which was held in 1950, at the time the whole country was much upset over the strike of the railway workers. At that time we took particular exception to the institution of compulsory arbitration.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of the record to quote briefly some of the comments which were made during the debate that took place on the bill brought down by the government at that time in an effort to form a basis for the settlement of that strike. Hon. members of this house who were here then, and others who are here now and who must have followed the deliberations of parliament on those very contentious matters, will recall that the clause in that bill to which we took particular exception was the clause which instituted a type of compulsory arbitration. Speaking on that occasion the Leader of the Opposition had this to say in part, and I quote from page 26 of Hansard for August 30, 1950:

> Section 5 definitely and without any reservation provides for compulsory arbitration.

Then he went on:

> But compulsory arbitration, which is a principle that has not been regarded as acceptable in labour legislation in this country, is not something which, it seems to me, should be suddenly introduced in dealing with an emergency of this kind.

That, Mr. Chairman, has been one of our difficulties right along, that we wait until an urgent situation is upon us and then all of a sudden we try to solve it by some means or other that presents itself to us, without taking into consideration the long-term view.

On that same day the Leader of the Opposition had this to say:

> Compulsory arbitration! That is a moderate term. I do not believe that any legislative body in this country, federal or provincial, would ever in its cool and calm senses consider for a moment the introduction of compulsory arbitration of this kind with no definition of the terms under which it was to be carried out.

Later that same day, after an amendment had been introduced, I find these words at page 61 of Hansard:

> Over the years there has been free collective bargaining between the representatives of management and the workers in our great railway organizations. It is highly desirable that the principle of free collective bargaining be retained.

I quote now from page 72 of Hansard for the same day, when the Leader of the Opposition said:

> The amendment now before us is simply a further attempt to carry new principles into legislation which at some future date may operate as a precedent, and those who find that being done will regard it as very unsatisfactory indeed. This section neither assures to the Canadian public the continued operation of the railroads in the months and years ahead, nor does it assure the workers the basic right of collective bargaining—

Then I skip a couple of sentences, and he went on:

> I wish to make it quite clear that I regard it as something that is not only unsatisfactory to those directly affected by the limitation imposed by this section on the long established principle of collective bargaining; it is also unsatisfactory to the people of Canada because the bill offers no assurance that this will not happen again. It offers to the workers none of the assurances that their rights are going to be protected in the years ahead.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote one short sentence from my own remarks on that same date, which will be found on page 75. I said in part:

> I cannot see how those in the house, regardless of the party leadership they follow, who in their hearts believe in a system of free enterprise, to which we give unlimited lip service, can vote for a section like this which disrupts the management-worker relationships which have been built up in this country over a period of 50 years.

I have quoted those few short sections—and I could have quoted at much greater length, but it is not my desire at this time to delay the committee—in order to place on the record a few excerpts which will show the stand we in this party took at that time. We then asked for a review of Canadian labour legislation. We had some reason to expect that such a review might be undertaken. We asked the government to bring together the representatives of labour, management, and its own officials to consider a revision of the labour code. The government failed to act and now, some five years later, almost nothing has been done in this direction. Here we see another example, Mr. Chairman, of government stagnation in matters of national importance.

A couple of years ago in the industrial relations committee we were assured by the minister that the department was at work on a revision of the labour code. Last year I asked again when we could expect some action. We have had no intimation whatever to date that such a revision will be forthcoming or even, I might add, any indication that the department is actually working on it, other than the hints which have been thrown out from time to time, none of them, I might say, very concrete.

In speaking of the necessity for a revision of the code, I should like to draw attention to the fact that conditions in this country have changed. The conditions under which workers find themselves employed today are far different from those under which they were employed a few years ago. The hours of work have been radically reduced; rates of pay have been changed, and as I mentioned before the amalgamation of the two great labour congresses is now imminent. Types of labour-management negotiations have evolved which were unheard of a few years ago. As a matter of fact, I might almost say that a very few years ago some of the labour negotiations which are taking place today would have been regarded as revolutionary. Today they are accepted.

Women have taken a much more important part in the production of goods and services in this country than formerly. In this regard I might point out that despite the fact that women have entered more and more into the labour market of Canada, there are still no women commissioners on either the civil service commission or the unemployment insurance commission. I know all the excuses which are given to this house for that lack. I cannot believe this situation could not be corrected, one way or another. However, the excuses still hold and not a new one has been added in the time I have been in this house.

There have been a few women appointed to committees, under certain circumstances, but those committees have been called only spasmodically or not at all. The reason given has been that there were subcommittees at work day by day and week by week. Eventually they will have a report to make about this particular situation or that, and then the committee will be called together to hear the report. In many instances the reports were not received and the main committees were not called together. Once again we see the old technique of appointing a committee and then smothering it.

Since I have already spoken of the participation of women in the labour force of this country, I should like to make a few remarks with reference to statements made by the minister when he mentioned what had happened to the women's bureau. He mentioned that the bureau has now had some nine months of full operation. I look back at previous estimates and I find that in the estimates for 1953-54, in which the appropriation for the women's bureau was first set out, the amount set aside was $21,560, but that only $2,560 was spent during the year. Then last year, with the appointment of a director imminent, the minister budgeted for $24,090. Shortly after the estimates were passed the director was appointed and commenced her duties.

I am sure the first few weeks must have been confusing to her, and she must have had considerable difficulty in deciding just what required her attention first. In any event, when we come to the end of the year we find that instead of having spent $24,000, only $9,107 had been spent.

This year, with the bureau fully staffed and prepared to go ahead, has the appropriation been raised, or is there any provision for accelerating the activities of the bureau? No; the appropriation is approximately the same as last year, at $24,600. We would like to know what the bureau is doing and what are its plans. What are they going to do? The minister has said they have already undertaken a survey of married women who are working. I saw something in the newspaper to that effect over a month ago. About April 1 it was stated in the press that a questionnaire had been sent out to women's organizations.

I realize that women's organizations do tremendous work, and I am sure that from their ranks valuable information could be secured. But, after all, we have the women's division of the national employment service serving right across the country. These offices are well staffed with qualified personnel who undoubtedly could provide that information at what might be described as the professional level, rather than the hit-or-miss result which is bound to follow from a casual distribution of questionnaires sent out only to persons belonging to women's organizations. I do not approve of the method used in this instance. It is far from efficient, and I cannot see where it will produce the desired information.

I heard subsequently that this scheme had been dropped. Very soon thereafter I saw the article in the newspaper, so I presume this is a sort of off again on again procedure. The minister now says there is to be another survey in connection with occupational distribution of women workers, and a survey concerning their earnings. No doubt these surveys will produce interesting figures and information. But if they are to be undertaken in the same manner as the other survey I cannot see how we can hope to obtain definite or conclusive results. Further, I do not see how it can be done on the very small amount of money appropriated for this bureau for the ensuing year. It is my impression that the hands of the bureau are tied, because I do not see how, with such a small appropriation, any plans could be carried out.

I would draw attention to the fact that we now have in Canada a labour force of 5,391,000, and that women comprise 22·33 per cent—almost 25 per cent—of that total labour force. In other words 1,204,000 women are gainfully employed in Canada. Their numbers have more than quadrupled in the last 10 years. Yet in the budget for the Department of Labour, amounting to something more than $6,500,000, the sum set aside for the women's bureau is only $24,600. I realize full well that the research facilities of the department are available to the bureau, and that it would not be efficient for it to set up its own research facilities. I would hope the existing facilities are available to the director and her staff to the extent required. I must say, however, that the overall picture seems to show that the government attaches very little importance to women in employment.

The other big item of news on the labour front this year has been the extent to which unemployment reared its head during the past winter. We have had several debates in the house on the subject already. I heard on the radio first thing this morning that it was expected the presentation of the minister's estimates would precipitate another all-out debate on unemployment. So far as I am concerned it is not my intention to dwell at length on that subject. I have already spoken on it on several occasions, and what I said still stands. I do not intend to take back a word of it.

However, in spite of debates we have had we have seen no action. In March, the last month for which figures are available, we saw the number of unemployed swell to an unheard of total of 632,900. The April figures should be due today or tomorrow. I dare say the minister has them on his desk right now, but we do not have them. The figures last month came out on the 19th, and several times the figures have come out on the 20th.

I have been wondering whether the date of bringing down the unemployment figures has anything to do with the discussion of these estimates today, rather than following the plan which had been proposed a few days ago by the leader of the house. We had expected the estimates of another department would be brought down first and that the estimates of the Department of Labour would follow. However, as time got short and other debates in the house consumed a little more time than had been anticipated, perhaps the 20th of the month looked uncomfortably close, and it may be that the estimates of the Department of Labour are brought down now in the hope of disposing of them before it becomes necessary to release the number of unemployed persons for the month of April.

Mr. Gregg: I can assure my hon. friend that consideration had nothing to do with the fact that we are discussing the estimates of this department today.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure the minister would not expect me not to have my suspicions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Quite a coincidence.

Mrs. Fairclough: As the hon. member for Prince Albert says, it is quite a coincidence, in any event.

However, regardless of whether that was the reason for hurrying up these estimates—and I do not know the answer—we should ask ourselves what can be done. All through the debates on this subject one party or another has accused the members of other parties of having no consideration for the plight of the workers, of making no suggestions for their relief and offering no plans for the future.

Despite all those remarks, Mr. Chairman, I remember quite clearly hearing a number of good suggestions. Some of them even came from the supporters of the government itself; some came from members of this party; some came from other groups in this house. Surely all these suggestions taken together could not be discounted. Whether they would be workable is another matter. But I do not think any group in this house can point a finger at any other group and say you have no regard for the workers of this country, and you have made no constructive suggestions. I maintain that constructive suggestions have come from every quarter of the house, suggestions which have shown the concern which has been felt by hon. members over the situation in which we found ourselves last winter.

We might almost ask ourselves whether a debate on unemployment is just something that must be endured with the best possible grace by the government, after which it will resume its usual indifferent way. Ottawa, after all, like other capitals, has a rather synthetic quality, a quality which is very often present when a city is built as a capital. As we were told last evening at the dinner which was given by the federal district commission to the students who came here on the Rotary venture, Ottawa was built to house the government. It has practically no industry but government. Not too long ago I came across an article in the Hamilton Spectator. In commenting on this state of affairs the writer had this to say, in part:

> This is perhaps why its view of what is happening in the country at large is so often abstract and seems sometimes so downright unrealistic.

He was referring to Ottawa. He went on to say:

> But a man standing in line at the employment office, without work . . . cannot be expected to look at things from a long, abstract perspective. His thinking cannot be expected to stretch to the nation's broad prospects for next year or the year after; it is bounded inescapably by his own immediate prospects for next week's food bill and next month's mortgage payment. He is simply up against a harsh and immediate reality.

The article then goes on to speak of the gap which exists between the point of view of the man in the unemployment queue and government officials who sit here in Ottawa, and it says:

> Precisely because of the heartrending gap that exists . . . between things as they should be (and one day will be again) and things as they are—he and his fellows have every right to look to their prime minister and their government for a great deal more concrete help than they are today receiving.

With respect to concrete help, Mr. Chairman, I do not think for a moment the writer of this article was talking about handouts; he was not talking about the size of the unemployment insurance payments which those workers may receive if they qualify for benefits. He was talking about the broad picture of planning which it is undoubtedly this government's duty to undertake to ensure that this will not happen again.

As I said—and it was said last evening also—here in this building we are insulated against the reality of the day to day existence of some 15 million Canadians. We are unable to see the queues at the national employment offices across this land. We are insulated to a large extent from the distress of individuals. Their first thought is of their families. Here in this place an unreal atmosphere exists. It is the duty of every hon. member to dig beneath the superficialities, to come to grips with the task which is before them and to urge and urge until this government finally does take some steps to make sure that we shall not have a repetition of the situation which we endured last winter.

Several years ago a national advisory council on manpower was set up. Some very important people were appointed to that council, Mr. Chairman, and they met a few times. What happened to them I do not know. Rumours flow around these buildings like water over a dam. I have no intention of being a rumourmonger. I know what must have activated some of these people. In an attempt to find out what happened, early in the session—as a matter of fact on March 3, at page 1675 of Hansard—I asked the minister whether the national advisory council had met this year at all. The minister replied that it had not yet met in this calendar year, but that it had met last year. The following day, having felt that he was in error, he proceeded to correct that statement and said, at page 1717 of Hansard:

> This past year there have been meetings and activities of committees responsible to the council.

This bears out the remarks I made a few minutes ago about appointing councils and committees and then letting subcommittees do some of the work, but they never report to the main committee. Perhaps I had better quote the reply all over again, since I interpolated a remark, Mr. Chairman. The minister's remarks were these:

> This past year there have been meetings and activities of committees responsible to the council she mentioned, but the last meeting of the full council itself was held on November 5, 1953.

The last meeting of the national advisory council on manpower was held a year and a half ago. Since that time we have had two bad winters of unemployment. It is quite true, Mr. Chairman, that the committee was probably not set up to deal with the problem of unemployment, but I submit that the ladies and gentlemen who sat on that committee were admirably suited to undertake just such a task. They also constitute the council, and it would have taken very little adjustment to have them change their pace and consider very seriously the problems which were before Canada. What better work have they to perform than to analyse the employment situation? Why should they not supply us with answers as to how we can create jobs? What figure is dangerous in the unemployment position? What industries in this country present the greatest problems? What plans should be made for the future development of Canada, population-wise and industrially? Where does the production of raw materials and their ultimate processing fit into the picture? How much food do we need? Can we produce all of it or what proportion of it? Can we produce it with the farm labour that is available in this country at the present time?

These are questions to which we must have the answers. It is not enough to ride the tide, be it full or ebb. Experiments are costly. The government is in urgent need of detailed answers to these problems, answers which should be supplied before another winter confronts us.

As I said the other day in another debate, now is the time, in this spring of the year, when employment has started to pick up, when the edge is off the urgency, to be planning for next winter. Now is the time when the government should be undertaking these two main projects; one, the finding of answers to the problems which confront us in the field of unemployment, and two, a revision of the labour laws under which our people work today.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am going to try to be specific and as brief as possible. During this session we have gone into many aspects of the minister's department, and I do not see any point in discussing them again. Some of the things I might talk about at this time are being worked on, which is much more important than just talking about them. For example, the Unemployment Insurance Act is now before a committee, and we will have a chance to discuss that act in all its details.

Another matter I might go into at some length on the minister's estimates is the general condition of the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia and its relationship to unemployment. However, I am not going to do that at this time because a conference is commencing tomorrow in Halifax at which all the dignitaries of state will be present, including the Minister of Labour and representatives from the industry and the union. They will make a general examination of the industry and its future, and I hope will come up with some answers.

One of the matters to be considered is the proposal to close one of the major collieries in the Glace Bay area which will affect some 750 men. To that extent unemployment will be created which will have considerable effect on a large community. I mention that because I know the minister is going to be asked what he is going to do about those who will be added to the unemployment rolls if this colliery closure actually takes place. Personally I am in hopes that it will not.

This matter of anticipated further unemployment raises the question of vocational training. While the minister was making his statement I took a look at his estimates and got some idea why the Minister of Finance went into deficit budgeting. Apparently the Minister of Labour tried quite hard to help make up the anticipated deficit in the budget by cutting his estimates in a field which has much to do with the matter of unemployment. I was really surprised as I think this is the very time when expenditures in that particular field should be increased.

If you look at the estimates you will find that the grants to provinces for vocational training purposes have been cut by $109,000, while the capital grants for the purpose of assisting in the providing of vocational schools have been cut by $651,450. I have said this a good many times in the house, but apparently not much attention is paid to what we say on this subject by the experts who do the figuring. I contend that if there is one field in which we are short in Canada it is the field of vocational training.

In justifying the cut in the estimates for vocational training the minister said they had met their commitments. They may have had commitments over the last five years under the agreements with the provinces, but that does not alter the fact that the need is greater today than it was when the agreements were first signed. The agreements have to be renewed, and the way to renew them is not by cutting out the money which was necessary in the past to maintain them.

I suggest seriously to the minister that this is something he will have to consider. We should stop and think of the great need in this country for vocational training of the boys and girls who are coming out of school. We have been very shortsighted in this whole field. Of the school population across Canada, about 40 per cent go through high school, and about 10 per cent of that 40 per cent get to university. Ninety per cent of our school population go into the ranks of the employed every year with nothing to sell. If these people are to become citizens able to make a maximum contribution they must be trained in trades or other lines of work for which they may be fitted.

These young people are citizens of Canada; some of them will be running this country in the future. Instead of recognizing the need for retraining in connection with industries where thousands and thousands of people are becoming unemployed every year, the minister's department is cutting the estimates. The needs for vocational training are very great today.

If the minister will stop and think for one moment he will realize that the greatest contributing factor to unemployment in Canada, and in the United States as far as that is concerned, is automation, the displacement of man by the machine. This word "automation" is being used to make it sound a little better, but all it means is that the employer is improving his machinery so he can get more production from fewer men. Some day we will have to answer the question whether the machine is going to be the servant of man or man the servant of the machine.

Within the next few years we are going to find that automation will be putting more and more men on the street and we will be faced with the problem of retraining men for some other gainful occupation. Instead of doing that we are cutting down the very organization that is needed to train our men and women so they may make a contribution to the country. Instead of training people who might become displaced, we are going into reverse and practically cutting out these grants.

I was surprised and disappointed on looking at the estimates to see the extent to which vocational training was being disregarded at this time. I hope the minister will give further consideration to this matter and provide a vote in the supplementaries to offset the decreases in the estimates at this time. Before his estimates are finished I should like the minister to tell us why these reductions in the vocational training votes have been made. Were the provinces not interested in continuing them? Surely there must have been some correspondence with the provinces in regard to the agreements and their renewal. I should like to know what position was taken by the province from which I come, because one of the crying needs in that end of the country is a vocational training program, and this is particularly so in the face of automation.

The trouble in the mining industry in Nova Scotia today has been brought about largely by the introduction of new machinery. The Sydney steel plant was modernized, and a great deal of noise was made about the amount of money that went into that program. But this company was able to maintain the ratio of production it had in 1939 and through the war even though it got rid of 1,600 men in the process. They joined the ranks of the unemployed and moved to some other part of the country. They became displaced persons. If there had been some kind of retraining program they might have had an easier time finding other employment.

I have recommended to the minister many times something I think should be done. Whilst the advisory council on employment may serve a useful purpose, I do not think it is as practical as the kind of thing I think should be done. The men and women on the advisory council for employment are largely people who live in the city and have offices here, and they are out of touch with the industries as they exist today across the country. I may have worked in the mining industry some years ago, but it has changed. The men who are on that council may have worked in an industry some years ago, but that industry has changed.

I have recommended to the minister a good many times the type of organization I think he should have. I believe what are known as industrial councils should be formed. I believe the minister should have a council for the automobile industry, for example, of men who work in and around that industry, so that when a proposal is made by the automobile employers to make a change-over in their equipment or machinery, before that happens he can sit down with men who are aware of what the impact of that particular change is going to mean in the community with regard to unemployment. Perhaps the industry and a representative from the union, from the men themselves who understand the situation, sitting around with the minister's advisers and counsellors, would be able to work out some formula that would offset the impact that particular change-over may have in the community.

In the way things are done today, where the employer is allowed to throw into the street two or three thousand people without any thought of their investment in the community, in my opinion he is accepting no social responsibility whatsoever. Through these industrial councils the minister's department, employer and employee can sit around and discuss the question. Then the government, which is expected to handle unemployment when it happens, will have some knowledge of what might be done, before it is all tangled up and just hopes something may happen to cure the ills of that particular industry.

You have an industrial council in the building trades. That industry has had one for years. It has sat down with the minister's officials from time to time and worked out formulas that have prevented difficulties and troubles in that industry over the years. If it is good for that industry, why is it not good for the automobile industry, for the textile industry, for the mining industry, for all these basic industries across the country in which there is dislocation because of automation? You would have firsthand information from people who are involved, from people who could give you much advice on the handling of the matter.

We can talk about unemployment as much as we like, but I do not think the government, in making cuts in the labour department estimates, is recognizing the situation at all. The trend is to reduce further the machinery that has been set up under the minister's department in that particular field. I notice also that the administrative cost of the unemployment insurance commission is being cut at this time by $1,014,000.

Mr. Philpott: Maybe we are getting more efficient.

Mr. Gillis: I am not so sure of that. That will be answered in the future. You are just making this reduction. I do not think the burden of that commission is becoming less and less.

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps my hon. friend would not mind my interrupting him. Most of that was due not to a cut in the services but rather to a change-over to the Department of Public Works of responsibility for the costs of buildings and maintenance of buildings, which we used to carry in our vote.

Mr. Gillis: It might cost more in the long run. I am not going to argue the point, but I am just mentioning the fact that there is a cut. On the other hand, the hon. member for Vancouver South interjects that they are becoming more efficient. Maybe you are not paying enough wages to the people administering that act. I know the local people with whom I have contact from time to time, the managers of offices, the people who prepare claims and the insurance officers who adjudicate the claims, who are all very efficient, are very poorly paid considering their qualifications. If the minister had a million dollars to play around with, instead of cutting it off and giving it to the Minister of Finance to offset the deficit he thinks he is going to accumulate this year, it would be better if the minister used that money to increase the salaries of those who administer the act, and who do a very good job.

In that way the minister would be putting additional purchasing power in the hands of a certain section of the public, which might create jobs and offset unemployment in some industries. It is false economy to say simply, "We are not going to spend it this year; we do not need it", and let the Minister of Finance take it and maybe use it to pay the interest on the national debt to the banks. I cannot see it in that way. You should never let that amount of money get out of your hands. There are many places where you can use it in your own department.

I notice that this year there is a reduction of $100,000 in the vote for the transfer of labour. I do not think good judgment is shown in reducing that vote. If the maritime provinces continue the way they are going you may have many displaced persons on your hands in that part of the country whom you may have to ship out to British Columbia or somewhere else to find employment. Instead of reducing that grant it should have at least remained as it was, until such time as the minister was convinced that we are going to get some stability in employment and are not going to have this shifting mobile labour reserve that is developing. We call it unemployment today; others used to call it something else. But with the number of unemployed there is today that transfer of labour vote should have remained at least as it was.

Seasonal unemployment was the main theme of a very long debate in this house. The minister said, "There is not much unemployment; what we have is seasonal, and there is not much to it". Well, he is going to fight that next year, and he is appropriating the huge sum of $25,000 to combat seasonal unemployment. In my judgment, the estimates of the minister's department this year are the most unrealistic I have seen for a long time. The reason may be that the Minister of Finance has made certain promises that he is going to balance the budget at all costs and he may be going to do it in this way. But I think it is the wrong way to do it.

I have suggested a few times in the house that part of the answer to many of the problems that plague us from time to time is the guaranteed annual wage. The last time I talked about that—and I am not going to go into details now—I suggested to the minister that there are two problems which confront this North American continent in the future. One of them is the question of automation. The fact is that the big industrialists who work on the resources of this country say when there is going to be employment or unemployment. It is a heritage of the system. The minister is not going to be in any position to cure that situation until he has some say in the regulation of those who work on the resources of this country.

Machinery is being improved all the time. As machinery is improved, you are automatically going to get more and more unemployment. Accepting that proposition as a fact—and it is a fact—the next question you must face is this. You are either going to have a guaranteed annual wage, under which the employees of a given industry are going to have an income the year round, or you are going to have to amend your Unemployment Insurance Act in order to cover everybody in the country. It is one thing or the other. The guaranteed annual wage is the preferable way of doing the thing because it will make industry contribute its fair share to the maintenance of their employees. You do not just take a horse and throw it out on the street. You do not just feed it when it is working for you. You must feed it all the time.

I suggest that there is no one who today has a formula that he can say is workable or practicable. There are a great many people studying the matter. I myself have a number of ideas on it. However, I suggest that the minister should have an interdepartmental committee—and he has many qualified people in his department—who would sit down and make a detailed study of just what the guaranteed annual wage would mean in the basic industries across this country.

The automobile industry is one where you get three months of unemployment every time there is a swing-over in the model of a car. To some extent the mining industry in eastern Canada is seasonal because there is a slack period during the winter months when the St. Lawrence river is closed. The same thing is true in the steel industry. I believe the minister's department is perhaps the most capable organization in Canada to sit down and work out the details—and honestly to work at the thing—as to whether the guaranteed annual wage is a practical proposition or otherwise.

We in this country are beginning to meet problems that we are going to have to face up to. In the past we solved our unemployment problem and our automation problem by getting into a couple of wars. We do not want to do it in that way any more. As the international situation is today, it looks as though the hydrogen bomb and the atomic bomb have frightened people at least into the position that they are not going to have war. If they are not going to have war, let us not breed revolution by failing to provide at least food, clothing and shelter for people.

When you take a look at the conditions that are described from time to time in some of the booklets you pick up, which are put out by social workers who are obliged to work in the various communities and who see the impact of unemployment on family life in this country, you find that the situation is really staggering; it frightens you. I am not going to read from this publication. It is the Social Worker for April and it sets out the problem in Toronto from that particular angle. When you read it you say to yourself, "War is over, we hope. Now we face the realities of life as to whether we are going to produce for use or whether we are going to produce just in order to make millionaires". You are faced with that question. You have two contending orders of society. One is saying, "Your kind of society will not work", and we are saying, "It will work; cling to your freedom".

You cannot tell that kind of story to a fellow who is hungry, who is unemployed, who has a wife and four children whom they have taken from him because he is not able to feed them, who has been evicted from his home and has had his family broken up. You cannot tell that fellow that he has freedom, democracy and the right to work for a living. It just does not work. To him any change is welcome. We are getting all too many people across this country affected in that way. I know it is not a particularly easy thing for me to go back to my own part of the country and stand up and talk to a bunch of people who want to work, and who are hard-headed realists. All they want out of life is just a home and the right to look after their families. But if they are working two days a week, or are not able to do that, there is no use telling them to cling to the present system, that it is the best thing for them, because we have been telling them that now for 50 years. We must start to make some fundamental changes.

As I said before, I believe one of the changes we are going to have to make—and it is fairly well advanced in the United States today—is the establishment of the guaranteed minimum wage. I know about the fellow who wants to make $3 million a year for himself. He is not going to like that change. But it is not the taxes you pay or that kind of thing that matters; it is what you have left. These fellows will not be hurt too badly in the long run. Their homes will not be taken from them. They must be made to realize that the resources of this country belong to all of the people of this country.

Governments also must begin to realize that they are the custodians of the resources, that they hold them in trust and they must see that they are managed in the best interests of all of the people of this country. It is our responsibility to see that that is done. The government sets a good example in the matter of the guaranteed annual wage. All the permanent civil servants get it. Members of the House of Commons get it. All the managerial staff in industry get it. All the white-collar workers and the managers are paid whether the plant is working or not. The only people who are not paid are those who really produce in industry.

Another thing we are going to have to face up to is this matter of the age limit on getting into an industry today. If you are 40 years of age you are through working. For the benefit of the minister, inasmuch as he is going down to that conference in Halifax, I might say I am reliably informed that in that No. 1-B colliery that you are going to be asked something about, at least 60 per cent of the men employed are over 40 years of age. When you are thrown out at that age you are not only unemployed; that is the death sentence, you are through living.

I believe the government could take a cue in that matter themselves, because under their civil service regulations they also enforce that kind of thing. They keep out of employment in the civil service men and women who have reached that age, and who merely want to go in to do office work. In my judgment they are more capable at that age than they are at 20. It would not be a bad idea if the government changed the regulations in that respect. There are a great many people they could employ but who cannot find employment because of that 40-year age limit in the civil service regulations.

Mr. Chairman, I have talked for longer than I had intended. As the minister's estimates are discussed item by item we shall likely have many more things to say to him. I shall just sit down and say no more now.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to carry on a debate at this time. Some of the other hon. members have made that same statement but have carried on probably for their full 40 minutes anyway. I do not intend to do that. Most of my speeches are short.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They are as short as the occasion demands; let me put it that way. I think the Department of Labour of late has been doing something which has been long in coming, and which is going to result in a good deal of benefit to the working people of this country. I have in mind the rewriting of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Probably that is one of the most important things that will come before the House of Commons during this session.

We have been spending a great deal of time in the committee going over the Unemployment Insurance Act. I know we had quite a sitting on it this morning, and last week we had quite a go at it. We are going to have another go at it next week. Therefore I take it that it would not be appropriate to carry on any discussion on this occasion with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Some reference has been made to items in these estimates where there has been a decrease. The hon. member for Vancouver South a moment ago suggested that maybe that decrease was due to increased efficiency. I would hardly agree with that statement, because this department has to deal with unemployment. If there has been that increase in efficiency, so the department is better able to handle that problem, then I would suggest to members on the other side of the house we should be having a decrease in unemployment rather than an increase. This year has shown a tremendous increase, and I do not think the prospects are any too good for next year. Certainly the fact that we have had such a tremendous increase in unemployment would not indicate that the department is being handled any more efficiently in that respect. I do not mean to imply that the minister is not capable, and I shall mention that later in the few remarks I have to make.

Some suggestions have been made concerning the expenditure on vocational training. I am quite concerned about vocational training. I feel that is something to which a good deal of attention should be paid, but I cannot see much sense in training people to do a job when, after they have completed their training, there is no job nor any prospect of one. I am not for a moment minimizing the fact that people should be trained. This is a period of specialization. Nearly all the industries across this country are demanding specialists because we are coming to that point in our industrial expansion when, as the member for Cape Breton South indicated, we are seeing greater production by machines. There is only one result that will follow from the increased use and increased efficiency of machines, and that will be increased unemployment. There cannot be any other answer.

I am not one who would suggest for a moment that we should decrease the use of machines in order to keep people at work. I do not think that is the purpose of civilization. I believe we should increase the use of the most technical machines to the point where, if the whole operation can be performed by pushing one button, so much the better. The hon. member for Cape Breton South seems to be concerned about that, at least to the point where he suggests something is going to have to be done. Of course it is. We in the Social Credit party have advocated for years that the solution is to take away the earning power of the machine and give it back to the people the machine displaced, so the people will be able to purchase the production of that machine. This philosophy is just beginning now to slowly seep into the minds of some, and as yet it has not permeated the minds of others.

Some may say, "Well, now, that is silly; you cannot do that." We are being forced to it gradually, but in the process of being forced to it this year we have had over 632,000 unemployed. These people are not receiving enough to give them the standard of living to which they are entitled. We have family allowances, and what is that but a method of redistributing purchasing power? Certainly it is not done on a scientific basis. It is only a redistribution of the existing insufficient amount of purchasing power. Unemployment insurance is another means of distributing purchasing power to those people who are not actively employed in the production of goods and services. This principle is going to have to be continued. Another method is through the distribution of old age pensions.

This year we did increase the supplementary benefits under unemployment insurance for a limited period. As soon as that period is exhausted, then the worker is right back into the old rut. You have people with insufficient purchasing power who can buy only a limited amount of goods, and that reduces the amount of goods produced, so there is a still further decrease in the production of goods. Surely that is not such a deep secret that the members of this house or the officials of the minister's department cannot cope with it if they really get down to business.

It seems to me the minister's department is being placed in a very unfavourable position. He is being criticized for something over which he has no control. I believe we will have to consolidate two or three departments with the Department of Labour, such as trade and commerce and the department which deals with development of our natural resources.

Mr. Blackmore: And finance.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And finance, if you like, but particularly the three I mentioned. If we do not have developments in the Department of Trade and Commerce which result in extending our markets and our trade, then of course we should produce less goods for export. If we have no development of our natural resources to make available the goods and services this country can produce, then the Minister of Labour is being forced to look after the inefficiencies of the other two departments. The other departments say, "Here are these unemployed who are the result of the inefficiency of our departments; you look after them." He has no way of solving that problem. In fact, even if he were to go to the government—he can correct me if I am wrong—and ask for an increased appropriation to give these unemployed a decent standard of living, what would treasury board tell him? They would say, you just cannot have any more money. How is the minister going to efficiently care for the ever-increasing number who become unemployed as a result of the inefficiency of other departments in the government over which he has no control.

Mr. Blackmore: Including finance.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It seems to me that when we are talking about the labour department it is directly connected with these other departments I have named. The other day I said I thought there was no minister who ever headed that department who was more sympathetic to the problems that are facing him than the present Minister of Labour.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am not going to pat him on the back too much, because I think he should listen to what I have to say and then get after these other ministers who are really responsible for the unemployment problem. In this house we indicate by our actions and our speeches that the Minister of Labour is the one who is responsible for unemployment. That is not true. He may be responsible for keeping the unemployed, for maintaining them while they are unemployed, but that is all. He has said, and the government have said, that this unemployment is only a seasonal condition; after a few weeks the unemployed will be taken care of. That is not true. Even the Minister of Labour and the government have to recognize that this tremendous increase in unemployment that we are experiencing today is not seasonal. It is something that is going to stay with us for quite some time.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South indicated that in the past the solution to this problem has been the intervention of war. He indicated, further, that probably because of the H-bomb people were becoming fearful of the results of war, and the nations of the world were not going to war because of the fear of extermination. I am sure everybody would be pleased if that were true. If it is true we will not have war to come to our assistance and bolster up the old, outmoded, orthodox system that has always failed in cases of emergency. The only time it has ever come through is when we have had a major catastrophe such as war.

An hon. Member: Making a good C.C.F. speech.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The socialists are having more trouble, where socialism is practised in any other part of the world.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Mr. Blackmore: They cannot get production.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): My hon. friend says I am making a good socialist speech. God forbid! Even they themselves prosper from the fruits of private enterprise. They would not do away with it for the world. Of course no sensible person would do away with private enterprise, particularly when we look around us and see that we have more production than this system knows what to do with. How can we blame industry for our present position?

What I have said shows the thinking of socialist members in the house. I have great respect for the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but only a few moments ago he said industry was supposed to take care of the unemployed, that it was supposed to give jobs, to guarantee annual wages, to give family allowances, and all the rest of it. I do not think any sensible person will contradict me when I say that the purpose of industry is to produce goods. In the operation of producing goods jobs are made automatically. It is the government's job through the financial system to provide markets, and one of the best markets we have is our market right here in Canada, among our own people. The higher we raise our standard of living, the more industry will produce to meet our requirements and the more jobs there will be. Social Credit has given the solution.

Mr. Winch: The hon. member says it is the responsibility of private enterprise to produce and that of government to supply the market.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The government has to supply the market, whether it be through foreign trade or in some other way by the application of their financial policies. Government policy must involve going out and finding markets for our exportable goods. Government policy will do this, in conjunction with private enterprise.

Mr. Philpott: If that is not socialism, what is it?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): This is done through control of the financial policy. The other day the hon. member for Acadia gave a good example of how the government could extend our markets by the acceptance of some of the soft currencies. It was not long ago that most hon. members voted against that suggestion. Through the manipulation of that financial policy the government could extend our markets, and through the manipulation of the financial policy the government could make it possible for the people of this country to have sufficient purchasing power, whether through increased wages or salaries, increased family allowances, or national dividends, as we have suggested. I am not going to argue about national dividends at this time.

It is the responsibility of government to see to it that the people have the purchasing power to buy the goods industry is producing. When that falls down—as it has fallen down—the Minister of Labour finds himself in a helpless position. I am quite sure that if he were to ask treasury board for more money to take adequate care of the unemployed he would be told he could not have it. If I am wrong I stand to be corrected, but I do not think I am wrong. I would like to see the minister do that.

I said a moment ago that I was not going to speak as long as others have spoken. I may have exceeded my 15 minutes by a half minute or so, but I shall conclude by saying that during this session the minister has given sympathetic attention to the hearings in committees. I believe he is trying to do a good job, regardless of the handicap from which he suffers.

As the items are called I may have something further to say.

(Translation):

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit to the consideration of this house, on this occasion, a few remarks on a problem of interest to every Canadian citizen, that of the difficult position of our older workers in the labour market of this country.

During the past few years, recurring periods of seasonal unemployment have made all the more evident the difficulties and worries experienced by this very important part of our working force.

The plight of our older workers is not something peculiar to this country, but economic and social considerations would lead us to think that labour and employment conditions in their case will grow worse unless remedial measures are taken, and taken soon.

We all know that the population of this country is gradually increasing. Every year the Canadian nation as a whole is also growing more mature, and the number of our people who are over 45 years of age is daily growing larger. At the same time the proportion of young people under 20 is growing less.

In 1881 the number of Canadians over 40 years of age made up 20 per cent of the population of this country. Now this same group makes up practically 33 per cent of the same population.

At the turn of the century, there were 15 adults under 65 for every person aged 65 and over, whereas now there are only 7 adults under 65 for every person aged 65 and over.

In a survey conducted by the Department of Labour, which I have completed with other statistics, it is shown that the population of Ontario, which, allowing for certain adjustments, is fairly indicative of the general composition of the population of the whole country, was made up in 1881 of 16 per cent aged 45 and more, 38 per cent being under 20.

In 1951 this same population was made up of 31 per cent aged 45 and above, only 24 per cent being under 20. A survey of trends observed throughout the development of the Canadian nation over the past fifty years shows that, by 1971, 38 per cent of the population will be made up of people over 45 and that those under 20 will represent 17·8 per cent.

In other words, then, the increase in population and maturity in Canada is accompanied by a marked increase in the number of workers over 40.

But as the older element of the population increases another trend becomes increasingly noticeable. Casual observation reveals that employers of labour show a marked preference for workers under 40. That trend creates a feeling of insecurity, among older workers, all the more so in the wake of revolutionary changes which have occurred in our economy as a result of advanced and accelerated technology and the resultant acute competition in both our domestic and export markets.

Statistics issued by the unemployment insurance commission show fairly well how hard it is for older men to find jobs. For instance, in 1952, 36·5 per cent of the total applications for work received by the commission offices, everywhere in Canada, were from people over 45. The curious fact that this percentage remains practically constant throughout the year shows what restrictions exist for older workers with respect to job opportunities.

In the light of those figures, a fact stands out: not only must careful consideration be given to ways and means of helping older workers but, at the same time, employers themselves should seek to solve that national problem.

Many reasons have been given—most of them based on preconceived ideas—to explain the limits imposed upon the employment of older workers and the increasing difficulty with which they can share in the production of our national wealth.

In certain quarters it is said that this change which industry has undergone following extreme mechanization and application of the mass production principle has led employers to believe that older workers were slower in adjusting themselves to the new techniques and that accidents and absenteeism were more frequent among these older workers.

In this mad productivity race we have even been led to believe that older workers were slowing down production.

On the other hand, many industries have training plans which involve quite a large investment, and they have the preconceived idea that it would not be profitable to let older workers train for a job they would hold for a limited time.

Elsewhere, these same workers who are looking for work are handicapped on account of pension plans already in operation in many industries. It is claimed that to employ these older workers would make such pension plans more costly.

But, I think that the greatest wrong inflicted on our older workers is to be found in the common saying that the general public prefer and seek younger workers.

It would take too long, Mr. Chairman, to analyse both sides of the arguments I have just mentioned.

However, I think everybody will agree that during the second world war, when we had to call upon all the resources of our nation, the Canadian worker, whatever his age, did the job well, to the benefit of our Canadian nation.

Mr. A. R. Mosher, in a statement made in 1952, gave a brilliant account of the very important part which our older workers have played and of the valuable contribution they have made to victory. I would like to read that statement into Hansard. I quote:

> Nobody will suggest for one moment that a worker whose faculties are weakened by age or other circumstances has a right to a job which he cannot fill efficiently. On the other hand, in each plant there are numerous jobs which do not require the same deftness of hand or eye as would be expected of a young worker. During the war, when we sought the services of everyone who could be useful, with or without training, we found that older people could make a valuable contribution to our war effort. They were more stable and more responsible; their attendance record was excellent and they were capable of doing quite satisfactorily the work entrusted to them.
> Sure, the work given older people had to be of a particular kind and they were not asked to do work requiring too much skill, unless they could prove by tests that they were capable of doing that work.
> It has been clearly shown that older workers have a great ability to adjust themselves to a new trade and that they derive much pride and satisfaction from doing their work because their capacity is recognized.
> Moreover, it is to be noted that although industry and governments have set the retirement age at 65, many people who work for themselves, such as merchants, wholesalers and garage owners are still able to earn their living and manage their own business even to the age of 80.
> That applies equally well to farmers who, generally speaking, can still look after their farms at a ripe old age.
> A change of attitude towards older workers is essential. I sincerely believe that if an older worker still wishes to contribute to the nation's productive capacity, he should be permitted to do so.

Mr. Chairman, so far governments have done much to improve labour conditions. They have passed legislation on minimum wages, workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, retirement benefits in the industry and limitation of working hours. Nevertheless, the situation of the older workers has become a very important problem. Unless steps are taken to help older workers, especially if the industry persists in allowing the increased discrimination which is being shown against such a large proportion of our manpower, the present standards of our welfare legislation will soon have to be changed in order to ensure to those Canadians the security to which they are entitled.

The ever-depressing effects on the older men with dependents of a lack of work and security not only affects his own family but becomes a threat to the welfare of the people.

Canadians who are having serious difficulties in finding employment are now resorting to palliative measures of relief, such as unemployment insurance or a pension system which only partly meets their family needs.

At the rate at which our population is now increasing, we may expect requests for very drastic social legislation, if the labour market for older men keeps on shrinking, compelling those over 50 to cope with more or less protracted periods of unemployment or to give up their employment altogether when they reach the age of 60 or so. As a matter of fact, I can see the day, Mr. Chairman, when the government might be forced to alter the present scale of old age pension as a result of those conditions.

It is estimated that in 1961 there will be in Canada 689,300 people 70 years old or more in receipt of old age pension at a total cost of $417 million. And as this pension could possibly become payable at age 60, if working conditions of our older workers are allowed to remain as they are today it will then cost the state close to a billion dollars to support legislation of that kind.

Of course, the additional burden of this increase will have to be paid by people in the lower age group, who will also continue to assume all other costs of government administration. If this assumption is pursued a little further, we might even come to the point where all Canadians between 20 and 45 would have to carry the whole burden of our national economy. Our way of life could certainly not stand up to such conditions. The problem of older workers therefore needs the urgent attention not only of the governments but of the people themselves.

Several means were suggested in order to prevent such a situation, but I do not think it could be altered from one day to the next.

Can the guaranteed annual wage improve the position of the older worker by ensuring him either a definite income or a secure period of employment?

Could it be said that a more satisfactory birthrate might, one day, establish a better balance between the various age groups of our people? I dare hope so, Mr. Chairman.

At all events, I would like to submit to this house the opportunity of introducing in this country a national contributory pension plan where payment of a pension would solely be based on the age factor. To my mind, adoption of such a proposal would help the older worker overcome the feeling of insecurity which is becoming his lot, in view of a reluctant labour market with regard to employment possibilities.

A number of firms already have pension plans for their employees and the Department of Labour is associated with many of these programs. Any experience acquired by industry and government in the operation of these plans could serve as a basis for the study of a universal industrial pension plan. This pension plan should be flexible enough to allow an employee to transfer to another job while keeping his pension rights.

A measure of that kind has already been adopted in England following the Beveridge report and Canada should explore this new avenue of social security in order to avoid the disastrous consequences which may arise from the situation of older workers.

It is not the only means available to remedy this situation fully. But I am convinced that a study of such a pension scheme will give us an opportunity to work out an over-all plan which will include our whole employment policy regarding industry.

(Text):

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I propose to deal particularly with the requests which have been made on earlier occasions, and which were repeated today by the hon. member for Hamilton West, that there be a general review of the labour relations act and labour legislation generally. This has been under discussion now for five years; it may have been under discussion before, but it came particularly into focus in 1950 at the time of the railway strike when a bill was introduced in this house during the emergency session to deal with the situation resulting from that strike.

It will be recalled that at that time we proposed a method by which the emergency could have been dealt with and the rail services put into immediate operation without introducing the principle of compulsory arbitration. At that time we emphasized, as we have on subsequent occasions, the need for recognizing that the situation which then became a national emergency was one that called for careful examination with a view to the solution of similar difficulties in the future, that departure from the established practice not being an acceptable precedent.

Five years have passed. As the hon. member for Hamilton West pointed out this afternoon, we have had vague assurances from time to time that the labour legislation is under review. We have not seen any evidence of it; we have not been given any assurance that this is being given the consideration that it requires. Therefore this afternoon I propose to deal with this matter from the point of view of the inadequacy of the legislation as it is today and the new emphasis which has been placed upon the need for a thorough examination of labour legislation and appropriate changes which will bring our labour legislation up to date and make it an effective instrument for the extension of good will between the organized workers, management and those responsible for the enforcement of our laws.

At the time the emergency measure was before the house on August 30, 1950, at the conclusion of my remarks in which I had put forward an alternative which would have avoided the necessity of compulsory arbitration but nevertheless put the rail services into operation, I reviewed the situation and concluded with these remarks, as reported on page 31 of Hansard of August 30, 1950:

> We are sometimes inclined to exaggerate the number of disputes. If there is a strike, naturally it is noticed by everyone. What is often ignored is the vastly greater number of friendly and co-operative solutions that are reached by the system of collective bargaining that has been worked out through long years of trial and error. In finding a solution for this problem, let us not create equally great problems for another day.
> In a spirit of good will, and with a desire to bring into operation these vital arteries of the life of Canada as soon as possible, we can solve this problem in a way that will protect the rights of all our people, the rights of every part of our community, will continue the efficient operation of our great railways, and will be to the best advantage of the nation that we love.

Those remarks preceded subsequent requests that our labour legislation generally be reviewed under a procedure similar to that which had been found so satisfactory when the national war labour board was set up under the chairmanship of the Hon. C. P. McTague in 1943 with instructions to inquire into collective bargaining and related problems. Without seeking to rub salt in a wound that sometimes seems sensitive, may I point out that the very uncertain attitude of this government toward public inquiries is emphasized by the number of occasions on which public inquiries instituted by this government have proved satisfactory along with the number of occasions on which they have not.

Once again may I point out that the government has given the best possible evidence that public inquiries instituted under the Inquiries Act can be most beneficial. One outstanding example was the inquiry conducted by the board under the Hon. C. P. McTague because the report brought in as a result of that inquiry produced the labour regulations incorporated into P.C. 1003 passed on February 17, 1944, which undoubtedly had much to do with the splendid team work that has existed between management, labour and the agencies of government during these critical years.

That inquiry emphasized the fact that with the changing conditions there are of necessity changing requirements, but that there are certain basic principles which do not change and which are fundamental to the strength of labour organization and peace within the whole community in relation to problems which affect our workers. The two principles which are the bedrock of good labour relations are union recognition and collective bargaining.

I have no intention of embarking on what might be regarded as a political speech in regard to this subject, but I cannot refrain from making comment about the extent to which the Liberal mythology has extended, even into this field. I was present at a dinner given by the Trades and Labour Congress as a farewell testimonial to that great representative of organized labour in this country, Percy Bengough, just a few months ago. On that occasion the Minister of Labour, for whom personally I have the highest regard as a result of our long association, made a speech which I can only hope was furnished to him from records out of this mythology. On that occasion I heard the minister tell about what purported to be the beginning of understandable labour relations in this country. According to that mythology everything that really was good began with the Liberal governments in this country. Mr. Chairman, the applause from the other side, which cannot be reported in Hansard but to which I should like to pay notice, merely indicates the extent to which this mythology has extended into the minds of the members opposite. Here is another occasion where it does indicate that perhaps members of parliament themselves might well do a little reading of their own history from time to time. If ever there was a fabricated mythology, it was the suggestion that recognition of the rights of unions and collective bargaining began with the Liberal governments in this century, and particularly with the Liberal government under Mr. Mackenzie King.

I have in my possession an attractive souvenir. It is a gold case presented on July 1, 1872, to Lady Macdonald. On that gold case are these words:

> Presented by the International Working Men's Unions to Lady Macdonald as a testimonial of their respect for the wife of Canada's greatest statesman, July 1, 1872.

What was the reason why the international working men's unions—the word "unions" is in the plural—were giving this beautiful box to Lady Macdonald on that occasion? It was not merely a gracious gesture to the wife of the prime minister; it was in recognition of the fact that it was the government of Sir John Macdonald that in 1871 introduced the legislation which gave unions recognition, the right of collective bargaining and the right to strike. At that time—

Mr. Dickey: They did not keep it up.

Mr. Drew: I did not hear that interjection. I wonder if it could be repeated?

An hon. Member: It was not worth listening to.

Mr. Drew: I always like to hear some of these interjections. They are usually so illuminating as evidence of the extent to which Liberals themselves have been fooled by their own propaganda.

Mr. Dickey: I said that it is too bad they did not keep it up.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member now says loud enough to be heard, "It is too bad they did not keep it up". It just shows that he has not read the elementary history of Canada, because they did keep it up and I could go on for some time through the record of subsequent legislation. He does not know, of course, that in 1890, following the conviction of certain Hamilton bricklayers who went on strike in 1888 because of a local situation there, a law was passed which protected the workmen from any prosecution for conspiracy in refusing to work with or for any employer or workmen. It would be well if the hon. member for Halifax would just go back and read a little history. Perhaps also he might go back and read something about what happened under Sir Robert Borden when in 1918 he dealt with these very problems and at that time laid down certain principles which have become established principles within our labour organizations in this country, and principles, I might say, that the Minister of Labour before his political conversion would have reason to remember.

These are things that have gone right on through the piece. Since the hon. member for Halifax exemplifies the extent to which the Liberal mythology has been swallowed by some of the hon. members opposite, may I remind him that a great milestone in labour legislation and in the rights of labour came with the treaty of Versailles and the incidental features of that treaty. The labour organization of the league of nations was provided for and through the general council of that organization draft conventions were established for setting up wage machinery, hours of work and days of rest and other matters of that kind. These conventions were signed for Canada by a Conservative prime minister, Sir Robert Borden. Then the ratification of those conventions stood through the whole period of Liberal government from 1921 to 1930, and it was the Bennett government that ratified those conventions. So the hon. member for Halifax will find the record fairly clear as to the extent to which the Conservative party has continued its interest in matters of this kind.

I would also point out that, in so far as these rights are concerned, it would be helpful if we all dealt with this on the basis of the record; and, with the friendliest emphasis, may I suggest to the Minister of Labour that in future, when dealing with the rights of labour in collective bargaining and matters of that kind, perhaps the position of Sir John Macdonald should not be forgotten.

Mr. Gregg: I was dealing only with the present century.

Mr. Drew: But I am afraid that the minister omitted to read out that reservation when he made his speech, because I was there. However, it is made, and we shall take it as an amendment that would have been very appropriate at the time. Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the wartime labour regulations that were adopted following the McTague report were a very satisfactory basis of labour legislation in this country. True, there were certain features which did not meet with unanimous approval, but on the whole they did find general approval.

May I recall one interesting incident in connection with the adoption or the passing of P. C. 1003 on February 17, 1944. As some of the hon. members know, I was in the Ontario legislature at that time and in the session of that spring we introduced legislation there which applied in toto P.C. 1003 to the industries in Ontario for the life of that order in council. I may say that, not only did Ontario adopt P.C. 1003; so did Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Therefore over a large part of Canada there was uniform labour legislation by agreement, not by any arbitrary imposition of that legislation by this government, but by agreement and by the approval of the provinces of legislation which had come forward fully digested and carefully prepared as a result of this report that had been presented by Mr. Justice McTague. I should say, so that the record will be complete, that there were three members of that board; two signed a majority report and one signed a minority report which disagreed with the majority report in certain details.

Mr. Martin: Was Mr. J. L. Cohen one member?

Mr. Drew: Mr. J. L. Cohen.

Mr. Martin: And the third one?

Mr. Drew: Since the minister has mentioned it, I shall mention the other members. The majority report was presented by the Hon. Mr. Justice C. P. McTague and Mr. Leon Lalande. The minority report was signed by Mr. J. L. Cohen. That report followed a long and extensive inquiry during which the labour organizations, social organizations, individuals and organizations representing management, as well as individual representatives of management, had an opportunity to present their opinions and to discuss their views with the members of this board.

I have mentioned that today because I think we can all realize that the more generally certain basic principles become established, the more clearly will they become known to the public generally, and the more firmly will be built into our society that measure of continuing co-operation between management and labour and the representatives of all governments which will assure that type of industrial good will which should be the objective of every elected member of parliament and of the legislative bodies throughout this country.

This is not something in which those who have been engaged in the active ranks of organized labour alone have a direct interest. This is something in which every Canadian has an interest. The rights of organized labour, the recognition of unions, assured collective bargaining that is really free collective bargaining, as the basis of the advancement of relations within our industrial communities are things that are very much part and parcel of the good society we are trying to build. This is something which is just as much in the mind of one member as it is in that of another. In fact, it should be the desire of every member to see this type of legislation advanced to the highest degree in this country of ours.

It is with that thought in mind that I have risen to refer back to what happened in 1950 and to recall that the government resorted to compulsory arbitration at that time. I have emphasized the fact that on that occasion we pointed out to the government that this is an unsatisfactory principle that should not be adopted as a precedent. Since that time we have continued to urge another inquiry similar to that conducted in 1943 under the Hon. C. P. McTague.

I close these remarks with the earnest appeal to the government to end the shilly-shallying with regard to our labour legislation. We have continued to ask for a general revision of this legislation to bring it up to date in the interests of organized labour, management, our whole society and our economic strength which will depend so largely upon the good will and harmony which produces industrial efficiency and has a good deal to do with our ability to sell in the highly competitive markets of the world today.

Before concluding may I repeat my request, which I believe is a reasonable one. I ask for the appointment of a committee with the full powers of reference conferred upon the Hon. Mr. Justice McTague and his associates in 1943. I have no hesitation in saying that I would even hope that the government would again appoint Hon. C. P. McTague, who showed such great wisdom and judgment on that occasion. But whether it be Mr. McTague or someone else similarly qualified, with others representing management and labour and such others as the government may deem fit to sit upon such a board of inquiry and proceed as soon as possible to examine this whole situation, I ask that such a committee be again appointed.

The need for examination of our legislation and an up-to-date code which would appeal to all Canadians becomes more obvious as we see this great association of two major labour congresses in Canada which will bring together a large part of organized labour in this country. It will be to their advantage, and it will be to the advantage of management which has such a great responsibility not only for the welfare of organized labour but also for the strength of our trade, internal and external. It would be to the advantage of the whole economy if at this time we now could have a comprehensive review and report by a committee which would examine the whole subject and make recommendations upon which up-to-date, modern and progressive legislation could be introduced into this house at the next session of parliament.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I have just a brief word to say. I have listened attentively to the statement made by the Minister of Labour. I do not think it is fair for anybody to suggest that that statement was shilly-shallying. It shows splendid co-operation between the minister and all his workers and he paid his tribute to them.

Somebody said that there was not any bringing together of labour and management. I am going to give a concrete example in Fort William where the Minister of Labour, through his representative, brought labour and management together. In the strike of the elevator workers things were at a standstill when the Minister of Labour appointed

Mr. Taylor of Toronto, and it was not long until that strike was settled. I think this is a splendid example of how the Minister of Labour and his representatives can bring labour and management together.

I appreciated the suggestions made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. He says some things that are good and some things that are maybe a bit better. But when he emphasized vocational training, as others have done, I think he was wise. He also said that perhaps the officials in the minister's office are not paid enough. I am going to speak of these two things.

With regard to vocational training, I have spoken before of the things that have been done in Fort William to help labour. This vocational training is something that is being practised in Fort William today. The board of education takes high school pupils out to the Canadian Car plant. They will take them down to the vessels and to the elevators. They will take them to the fire halls. Perhaps one of the last groups to place their case before the high school pupils was the engineers. It is a well known fact that today there are not enough engineers in Canada to fill the jobs available. Therefore the engineers took this opportunity of placing before the high school pupils this need. The high school pupils were taken to McKellar hospital to see the work that the doctors and the nurses are doing. They were told that there is a great demand for nurses. This is putting the thing into practice. What are the other cities of Canada doing to put across this vocational training program? I should like to know. I should like to hear somebody say what is being done. Do it first, even before you tell it.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said that perhaps the officials were not paid enough. I know this is true. I know in our vocational training office in Fort William the employees are not paid a living wage. Perhaps I should not say that, but it is a fact. I know of the case of one young man with a wife and family. He ran into debt. There was not much hope for him, but he obtained some help some place. I do not think a young man should be obliged to work in any office without getting in that office at least the same pay as that received by those in the income tax office.

I have another matter I want to mention. In Fort William we now have a strike in progress at the Canadian Car plant. From reports in the papers, according to the mayor of Fort William attempts are being made to settle this thing as soon as possible. The minister of labour from Toronto is up there. I should like to see the Minister of Labour called on for his assistance. If that is done, I am convinced that soon management and the union will come together and the strike will be settled. I just pay my tribute to the minister, not because I sit close to him but because I admire the way he does his work, without bluster or noise and not very much advertising.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Labour has had quite a number of suggestions laid before him this afternoon, Mr. Chairman. It is my purpose to underline some of these suggestions and to add to the list. There are, indeed, a good many problems that require his attention and his study and I hope that action by him will be the result of that attention and that study.

However, before I go into the list of items I want to lay before the minister in one way or another, I must confess that when the Leader of the Opposition made his speech this afternoon it prompted me to send to the library for a certain volume of Hansard and also brought back to my mind certain facts of history. The Leader of the Opposition twitted my hon. friends across the way about what he called Liberal mythology. I have some Liberal mythology here which I shall come to when I get through with the Leader of the Opposition.

First, I want to talk about history, and this is not mythology. I come from Winnipeg. When a Winnipegger hears a Tory talking about the great love of the Conservative party for labour, he remembers 1919. He remembers a certain telegram that a gentleman by the name of Arthur Meighen sent to Winnipeg suggesting that certain people should be deported and that the legislation would be introduced afterwards. The volume of Hansard for which I sent to the library contains a record of what went on in the House of Commons on June 6, 1919. Sir Robert Borden, presented today as the friend of labour, was prime minister. I find that on that day the House of Commons was discussing a bill which had to do with government purchasing methods. As a matter of fact, Sir Robert Borden was speaking. The statement he was in the midst of making was broken off on page 3211 of Hansard for June 6, 1919, with a dash, whereupon he said:

> My colleague the Minister of Immigration tells me that there is a very important bill to which the attention of the house should be directed at once with a view to its being assented to this afternoon. I would therefore ask that this debate be adjourned to be resumed again this day, if the house will consent.
> Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

I ask hon. members who are interested in history, and interested in what has gone on in this house in days gone by to get this volume and just look at the four pages 3211, 3212, 3213, and 3214 of Hansard for June 6, 1919. Most of us know, because we sometimes measure the number of pages it takes to record our own speeches, that it takes about seven or eight pages of Hansard to cover 40 minutes in this house. This means that a page of Hansard is equivalent to about 5 or six minutes. I am asking members to consider what happened under a Conservative government as it was reported on less than four pages of Hansard. Now, members can do their own arithmetic, but that looks like 20 minutes or so, although it might have taken a few minutes more in view of the trip to the other place that was included in that period of time.

Starting near the bottom of the second column of page 3211, the house proceeded to give first reading to a bill to amend the Immigration Act for the purpose of deporting certain people from Winnipeg. On that page and on the next two pages, you will find that the bill was given first reading, second reading, considered in committee of the whole and given third reading and passed. What was the next item? Did they go back to this other business they had interrupted? No, a message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and the house went over to the Senate where royal assent was given to a batch of bills, including the bill that had been put through that day.

Mr. Michener: With consent?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, the Liberals consented to it, and Mr. D. D. McKenzie was the Leader of the Opposition at the time.

Mr. Martin: What did Mr. McKenzie say?

Mr. Knowles: He did not say very much.

Mr. Martin: He did not say, "With consent"; the interjection was wholly unwarranted.

Mr. Knowles: Does the Minister of National Health and Welfare know what Mr. McKenzie said? I think the minister should get this book and read it before he interjects.

Mr. Martin: I have read it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. McKenzie said:

> I have no desire to obstruct the minister but would he say in what form this legislation comes before the house?

There was no attempt to hold back the bill. It took unanimous consent to go through these three readings all in one day. There was connivance apparently, so far as the Liberals were concerned. But surely it is apparent that the real villain of the piece was the government of the day, the Conservative party, which put through that legislation in that fashion.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend has said that so far as the Liberals were concerned there was a certain amount of connivance. There is nothing in the record that justifies that observation.

Mr. Brooks: You should have said that there is nothing in the record.

Mr. Knowles: The minister can speak for himself, but if an attempt were made while I was a member of the house to put through legislation of that kind, with all three readings in one day, and I did not object, I would take some measure of responsibility for it. Most members of this house know I certainly would object. My point is that when the Leader of the Opposition sets out to give the history of the Conservative party with respect to its attitude towards labour, I think he should include all the items and not overlook this one to which I have just referred. I might mention also the attitude that was taken by another Conservative government towards unemployed people during the period 1930-35.

I agree with the view expressed by the hon. member for Hamilton West and the Leader of the Opposition that there should be a review of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I think the time has come for a further look at our labour legislation. But I suggest that Canadian labour is not going to be fooled by this interest in the academic side of the labour problem, particularly when spokesmen for the Tory party make two speeches this afternoon without making any reference to the really important issues that are of concern to labour today such as the guaranteed annual wage. If the Tory party wants to address itself to Canadian labour, I suggest it should deal less with the history of the past, less with academic matters, and should concern itself more with the issues that are of concern to the working people of this country today.

As I indicated when I rose to my feet, I wish to underline some of the problems which have already been laid on the minister's desk and I wish to urge that he give them very serious study. He has under him a number of boards and commissions and officials who are well qualified to help him with this study, well qualified to do some of it for him. In the final analysis any decisions as to policy would have to be taken by the minister in conjunction with his cabinet colleagues. But meantime I urge that he seek the advice of his officials and the members of the various boards and commissions which come under his direction, in the hope that some real headway might be made in dealing with some of these problems.

As has been already indicated, one of the most serious problems on his desk is that of unemployment or, to put it in other words, the necessity of achieving full employment in this country. I agree with those who say that this is not a problem solely for the consideration of the Minister of Labour. It is a problem for the consideration of the entire cabinet. But it does seem to me that it is the particular job of the Minister of Labour to bring before the cabinet as a whole the urgent need for full employment; and it is also his job to bring to the cabinet suggestions as to ways and means by which full employment might be achieved.

One of the suggestions we have made from this corner a number of times was made again today by my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South, namely the institution of the guaranteed annual wage. We were interested in the valuable speech made on this question some weeks ago by a member on the government side of the house, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). His suggestion was that the time had definitely come when the Minister of Labour should make a very thorough study of this question with a view to making a start on the guaranteed annual wage in some sector of the Canadian economy at an early date.

Since this suggestion came from one of the members sitting behind the minister, I was disappointed that he did not see fit to deal with this question when introducing his estimates today. However in that regard he did no worse than the hon. member for Hamilton West or the Leader of the Opposition. I would remind all three of these hon. members that this has become a most important issue, so far as the workers in this country are concerned. I remind Liberals and all other members in the house that the idea is certainly growing in Canada—and it is right that it should—that workers have just as many rights as business, industry, capital and all the other factors that make up our economy.

I said I was going to go along with the Leader of the Opposition by making some references to Liberal lore. I have in my hand an interesting book which I shall identify in a moment or two, and from which I shall read a paragraph or two. A certain gentleman was making a speech in support of a certain resolution, and this was what he said:

> Not only does the resolution recognize that the labour problem is a world problem; it recognizes also that the labour problem is a human problem. The resolution is based on the assumption that human personality is more important than any considerations of property.

I could not agree more. But to say that human personality is important, and to leave it only as a matter of words, is not good enough. I go on with the quotation where, referring to the resolution, he said:

> It is founded on the belief that ethical and human considerations ought to stand above considerations which are purely business or material. It is an expression of the belief that industry exists for the sake of humanity, not humanity for the sake of industry.

I am sure some hon. members will now know the author of these words, although they do not come from a certain book to which hon. members might think they could trace them. Rather I am quoting from a speech delivered at the last national Liberal convention but one—the convention held in Ottawa in 1919. This speech was made by Mr. Mackenzie King who, on that occasion, was proposing to the convention a resolution on labour and industry.

In support of the resolution he went on to ask some rhetorical questions as to what was in the minds of those who had come back from overseas; and in that connection he said this:

> They have interpreted the unrest of the world today in words the workman himself is using; they are saying that "man does not live by bread alone", that while wages may be one thing, wages in themselves are not enough. It is not enough to have work one day and unemployment the next.

Mr. King said that in 1919. It is true today; in fact under today's conditions it is even more staggering a blow for people to have to go through periods of unemployment and insecurity, be they short or long.

Mr. King went on to say:

> It is not enough to have work one day and unemployment the next; to have work at one time and then, when sick, to be helpless in the matter of meeting the great problems of invalidity, of dependence and the like, where these things arise through the organization of industry as it is, rather than through the fault of the workers themselves.
> So taking the resolution as it is drafted, the purpose as I have said is to recognize that as between the different provinces and the dominion we must endeavour to co-operate in working out a new industrial order, whereby, for the multitudes of men and women who spend their lives in industry, there may be a greater measure of economic and social freedom, and a larger measure of social justice.

Mr. Chairman, our contention today is that those words uttered by Mr. King in 1919, and others like them, should be put into something real and concrete in the form of full employment and a guaranteed annual wage, together with some other points which I shall mention in a moment.

But since I have quoted from what Mr. King said when he was proposing the resolution on labour and industry at the last national Liberal convention, but one, I would invite hon. members to look at Mr. King's speech and at the resolution itself. The resolution is found at pages 204 and 205 of the book put out following the convention. It is a lengthy resolution, but I would note just in passing—and I call this to the attention of the Minister of Labour; and perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton West will be interested in it, too—that one of the points laid down in that resolution 36 years ago was the principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Mrs. Fairclough: How long ago was that?

Mr. Knowles: Just 36 years ago; don't ask the Liberals to do anything in a rush. They don't do things overnight. This, of course, was also the same resolution in which it was proposed—and remember that this was under the heading of labour and industry, so that, as Mr. King put it, workers might enjoy a greater measure of economic and social freedom and a larger measure of social justice—this was the resolution which included such things as an adequate system of insurance against unemployment. Note that it refers not just to unemployment insurance, with capital letters, but to "insurance against unemployment". Mr. King was referring to insecurity from any conditions which were beyond the control of the workers themselves.

It also called for insurance against sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability. It called for old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits which should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces. And so on, and so on. As I say, it is a lengthy resolution. But my point is that it was long ago laid down—and we believe that the Canadian people agree with it completely—that human personality should come ahead of considerations of property, and that it is the job of government, supposedly of the people, to plan our economy so that instead of unemployment and periods of sickness without income, instead of insecurity, there will be full employment and something of the order of a guaranteed annual wage.

I call upon the minister to give more active and more vigorous study to the question of full employment than in fact has yet been done. I call upon him before these estimates are passed to tell us what studies he has given to the question of the guaranteed annual wage.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question? I have followed his advice and sent for the volume of Hansard and I now wish to ask him a question regarding it, if he will permit me.

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell: The hon. member did not recall to our minds the situation which existed in Winnipeg at that time, such as I think has never existed in this country before or since, when law and order were threatened in a way they have never been threatened before or since. The hon. member greatly emphasized the fact that legislation was passed in this house in short order. It was passed by responsible people. He will agree with that. I should like to read briefly the legislation that was passed—

Mr. Winch: What is the question?

Mr. Macdonnell: —and ask the hon. member whether he agrees that this legislation, which was directed against what we now call communists, was justified or not in the circumstances. I shall read briefly from page 3212 of Hansard of 1919.

Mr. Knowles: I have no objection to this so long as it does not come off my 40 minutes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I read:

> Section fifteen of the act to amend the Immigration Act passed at the present session of parliament is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:
> "41 (1) Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or of Canada, or of any of the provinces of Canada, or the government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies . . ."

And then, later on:

> —or by word or act, creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada—

I just want to ask the hon. member whether, in view of the situation which existed, he considers that legislation which included words of that kind was unreasonable legislation at the time and whether he feels it necessary to be so critical of responsible men who, in the circumstances of the moment, and with the danger which faced them, thought it reasonable to pass legislation quickly at that time.

The Chairman: Order. For fear that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should attempt to answer in as many words as the question was put, I would ask the committee whether they consider an extended discussion on what after all is an amendment to the Immigration Act which was passed 36 years ago is strictly relevant at this time?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer both you and the hon. member for Greenwood at the same time. Although what was under discussion formally at that time was a bill to amend the Immigration Act, it was directed against certain labour leaders in the city of Winnipeg. Those labour leaders included persons like John Queen, William Ivens, A. A. Heaps, George Armstrong and J. S. Woodsworth, as well as others whose names stand high in the history of my city. So far as the question about responsible gentlemen is concerned, I stake my claim that this was irresponsible legislation on the fact that in due course these people were elected to responsible positions by the people of Winnipeg. History has given its verdict against what was done here on June 6, 1919.

I suggest to the hon. member for Greenwood that even if, which I do not admit, he could make a case for the legislation having any validity at all, surely his own respect for the rule of law and for parliamentary procedure cannot permit him to condone what was done on that occasion. Instructions were sent by wire to Winnipeg with the advice that legislation would be passed afterwards, and parliament overrode all its normal rules of procedure to put that legislation through both houses in one day.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South is asking a question that would take me off into another debate that you, Mr. Chairman, might not like. I suggest that he can pick up the debate on the Criminal Code of a year or two ago, and he will see where I dealt with this whole question much more fully than I should on this occasion.

Hon. members are aware that the reason I raised this very dark chapter in Canadian history was the incompleteness of the report on his party's attitude toward labour that was made by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party.

To get back to the list that I had when I started, I urge the Minister of Labour to give serious attention to two or three other matters which are of real concern to working people of this country. One of them relates in part to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Because it can be discussed under that act I shall mention it only very briefly here. He knows what it is because he heard the questions that I asked the delegates from both labour congresses at the committee meeting this morning. I feel very strongly that the time has come, and labour feels this way, too, that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be amended so as to provide for unemployment insurance benefits to include what is sometimes known as a sickness benefit. If I may go back to Mr. King in 1919, it is just as serious to be unemployed and without income because of illness as it is to be without income because there is no job.

The minister heard the delegates from the labour congresses say this morning that labour would be willing to pay its share of the extra cost to provide that kind of coverage. I am awfully disappointed that the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which are before us do not include an extension of this kind. I urge him to study this matter thoroughly and vigorously. If it means that he must have discussions with his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I am sure that colleague is always available for discussion and for help and advice. He told me earlier today that he always boosts good causes. Here is one to which he can give a real boost. I dislike the statement that was quoted to us, but this is one that I know is correct, because I have heard it from the Prime Minister, namely that the Prime Minister has told at least one of the labour congresses that sickness benefits included in unemployment insurance might be regarded as a case of bringing in health insurance through the back door, and that could not be done without an amendment to the constitution.

I admit that a sickness benefit could be one aspect of health insurance. If so, and if a constitutional amendment is necessary for health insurance, then that argument has validity. But I would point out also that sickness benefits for workers under the Unemployment Insurance Act could be regarded as a form of unemployment insurance.

When the Liberals met in 1919 they did not talk about unemployment insurance; they talked about insurance against unemployment. Mr. King presented the resolution and said that so far as the workers were concerned loss of income because of illness is just as serious as loss of income from any other cause. I suggest that a constitutional amendment is not necessary to include sickness benefits in the Unemployment Insurance Act. It would be part of the Unemployment Insurance Act and would be a step forward in giving the type of coverage which I think all Canadians should have. Here is an opportunity for the Minister of Labour to give real leadership in connection with a very important social advance that is needed in this country.

Again I suggest that the minister study this matter with the officials of his department, with the unemployment insurance commission and with all others who have material on it and I hope he will come up with something of this nature at the very earliest possible date.

I wish also to urge the minister to study the question of the mobility of pension rights. I think he is in a particularly strong position to study this question, for two reasons. First, he is the Minister of Labour and is concerned with collective agreements and all conditions involved in labour arrangements in this country. He is also the minister who has charge of the Government Annuities Act so that he has experience which could be brought to bear on this other question.

I need not go into it in detail as the minister knows from the discussions we have tried to precipitate in this house before just how we feel. Some of us feel that one of the things needed for labour at the present time is the right for a worker to move from one employment to another and carry with him his pension rights. Many a worker is frozen in his job even though he may be able to get a better one because he cannot afford to lose his pension rights. On the other hand many industries fail to take in employees over a certain age because of the pension rights problem.

I do not want the minister to say that this is exclusively a problem for the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Finance. They should be involved in it also, but this is a problem which is on the desk of the minister. It is an extremely important one and I urge him to give it active consideration.

Mr. Philpott: I know the hon. member would not want to leave a false impression by the statement he made today about the attitude of the different parties toward the emergency legislation at the time of the Winnipeg strike. I am rather surprised that the hon. member did not make reference to the speech made by the hon. member for Quebec South, who made one of the finest speeches of his career in defence of the Winnipeg strikers.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, despite your attempt to keep me away from the 1919 strike my friends on all sides seem to want to keep coming back to it. I am pleased to note their interest, and I have no objection to the interjection made by the hon. member for Vancouver South. It is good to know that there was one Liberal with a capital "L" who had a little small "l" liberalism in his soul at that time, and I believe that hon. gentleman, the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), still has.

If I can get back again to my list I want to say a word about a question which did get mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West and by the Leader of the Opposition, namely the procedures involved in the event of a labour dispute. Those two hon. members referred to what happened in 1950, all of which is a matter of record and familiar to most of us. I do not intend to go into that, but I would remind the minister that on January 11 of this year, as recorded on page 64 of Hansard, I asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister been made aware of the concern felt by the railway workers of Canada over the loss of their right to strike? Is the government taking steps either to assure these workers that they still have that right or to establish a satisfactory alternative?

Perhaps I had better be fair to the minister and read his answer in full, which was as follows:

> This question, I think, divides itself into two parts. In the first place the Minister of Labour has been made aware of the concern which would be felt by the non-operating unions of the railways in the event they were deprived of the right to strike. In the second place I am sure my hon. friend has noted that the general conference committee of the non-operating unions of the railways have been meeting in Montreal recently and are discussing questions directly related to the second part of his question. In due course the Minister of Labour would expect to be told about the conclusions reached at these discussions and I do not think that in the meantime the Minister of Labour should anticipate these reports.

That was on January 11; it is now May 19. I hope that during the discussion of these estimates the minister will bring us up to date on that question. It is a question about which I could speak at some length, but I am going to boil it down by reading a few sentences from the minutes of a railway union meeting held in Vancouver in the early part of this year. I do so because the sentences which I shall read express my own views and seem to me to deal most cogently with the matter. I would point out that these are the views of railway workers who might be inclined to be prejudiced to their side of the case and therefore hon. members should note the fairness and objectivity of this approach, particularly as indicated in the last sentence which I shall read. First of all, I note in these minutes this statement:

> A lengthy and representative discussion in which all delegates participated was summarized by the chairman who pointed out that the glory of the English law was its predictability. Men and organizations could determine in advance whether a proposed activity was legal and within the law, or otherwise.

There then followed some discussion as to what happened in the matter of the strike which almost broke out in 1954, but for the threat made by the Prime Minister, and then I read this:

> For a government to stand idly by during a long and protracted period of negotiation and fruitless arbitration and then suddenly intervene with the purpose of changing the law in order to deny its protection to one side in a dispute is the ultimate in caprice and despotism, in no manner different from the unpredictability of the law in ancient and modern dictatorships. As a very learned Englishman once pointed out: A despotic prime minister and a rubber-stamp parliament do not add up to a democracy. Other countries when confronted with a similar situation still find it possible to intervene in the public interest—

Note that "still find it possible to intervene in the public interest".

> —without threatening the destruction of the freedoms of common people. They do so by taking over and administering a threatened and essential industry until the disputants themselves reach an accord.

I wanted to read those sentences because it seems to me that they do two things. They point out how strongly the railway workers feel about what happened in 1954 when they felt that their right to strike was taken away from them. The other thing that those sentences do is to point out that these same railway workers put forward at least one alternative suggestion. It is in that spirit that I lay this problem before the minister as I thought I did by my question on the orders of the day on January 11 of this year.

I feel most strongly that the right to strike must not be set aside unless some more satisfactory way of dealing with labour disputes can be found. Any other way would have to be satisfactory to all concerned. I call upon the minister to give more serious attention to this question and I ask him to deal with it during the course of the discussion on these estimates.

There were other matters on my list but I think I have given the minister enough for now. If he solves these problems, then I will give him the others.

Mr. Starr: Since it is about seven minutes to six, I wonder whether I can call it six o'clock. If not, I am prepared to carry on till six.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: There does not appear to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Starr: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The estimates of the labour department as presented here today and as they have been presented in past parliaments give members of this house an opportunity to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour certain things that they feel should be corrected and certain things that they feel should be injected into the labour code in order to improve the working conditions of the labouring force of this country. At this moment I should like to deviate from the severe criticism of the Minister of Labour and inject a pleasant tone by saying to him how much I have appreciated his co-operation on the many matters I have brought to his attention and the expeditiousness with which he dealt with those matters, entirely to my satisfaction and to the satisfaction of those who were very much concerned.

During the past year we have been faced with a great deal of unemployment in Canada, more so probably than in any other year for a number of years. I had the opportunity to express my viewpoints on that problem in Canada, and it is regrettable that the government did not see fit to endeavour to remedy that situation. As a result, unemployment has not decreased to any extent, but has increased. Certainly, if not throughout Canada generally, it has worsened in various parts of this country. I feel that the Department of Labour and this government should make strenuous efforts to alleviate the present condition of those who find themselves unemployed.

There is a particular subject that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I suggest that he ascertain whether his department can institute some laws to rectify a situation where management in certain instances in Canada, in requisitioning labour from the national employment offices, makes very stringent requests as to the type of employees it is willing to take on its payrolls. I feel that this stringent type of requisition discriminates against a great many of our people. In certain industries at the present time a person who is over 35 years of age cannot obtain a job. If he weighs less than 160 pounds, he is not wanted in that industry. If he is less than five feet 10½ inches tall, he is not employed for that particular reason. Some of these requirements also apply to the female help in these particular industries; they must be at least five feet four inches tall in their stocking feet.

It is no fault of anyone that they happen to be born of short stature or that they are over 35 years of age. There are a great many Canadians who at the age of 55 are very capable workers and are able to perform their labours very satisfactorily; and they are of mature age, so that they probably carry out their duties in a more comprehensive manner. The weight requirement is one that seems to be very strongly urged, and I see no particular reason why a man weighing less than 160 pounds is not able to do certain jobs. Nevertheless, it is a fact that industries are discriminating in some instances, because of their requirements in the categories of height, weight and stature.

If at all possible some labour law should be implemented whereby the provinces could model regulations after this law, in order to bring about a discontinuance of this type of discrimination. The result is that those who have established themselves in particular municipalities where this industry is functioning, and have purchased homes and raised families, find that they are unable to secure employment. Certainly they cannot dislocate themselves from their communities and families and go elsewhere looking for jobs. On the other hand, this type of industry is requisitioning labour from other parts of Canada, thereby creating a situation that is worsening the present problem of the municipalities in regard to the provision of homes and every other facility required. At the same time those people who are residents and already established in those municipalities cannot secure employment.

I notice that in the estimates there is a substantial decrease over the estimates of the previous year—over $3 million. Of course, the two main items are under unemployment insurance. I am quite satisfied with this decrease, as we have urged time and time again that spending should be cut, but I am a little worried about the decrease in vocational training, and I hope that every consideration has been given in regard to this decrease so that the work of that particularly worth-while department is not hampered in any way.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I shall only take five more minutes.

An hon. Member: Let him go ahead.

Mr. Starr: I also suggest to the Minister of Labour an amendment to the B.N.A. Act which will make the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act applicable in all provinces of Canada be considered and be instituted. As the leader of the official opposition has said this afternoon, our labour laws are antiquated. I feel that as soon as possible the government should consider the revision of all labour laws. This should be done in co-operation with management, labour unions, and the government, all of them sitting down and exchanging their ideas on what would be best for the working men and women of this country. The aim of the labour department should be one of providing steady work and steady pay all the year round. Of course, the co-operation in this respect should come as a result of labour and management working together towards that end. But the important thing is that the government should institute economic policies which would ensure steady work and steady pay. I feel that the government should reconsider its economic policy with a view to stimulating industrial expansion and a reduction of cyclical unemployment. Everyone is satisfied that much of the recurring unemployment, which brings suffering and hardship to our people as well as substantial losses in production, is not all attributable to seasonal climatic factors. With this in mind I urge the government to take vigorous action to remedy the situation and to aid through scientific and financial means the development of new processes and new industries which will tend to maintain high levels of employment and production throughout the entire year.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this item gives the opportunity for a reference to several matters of importance of this kind. The situation in which labour finds itself is one that is challenging to the imagination and one that demands the utmost courage in the administration of those things that require to be done in order to maintain employment. The degree to which Canadian labour is mobile today and to which our population in general is mobile is indicated by the statistics given recently by Gilbert Jackson and his associates, to the effect that 50 per cent of Canadians change their addresses between each ten-years' census, that 18 per cent move to another address within their province and that 9 per cent move to another province. Indeed, the vast magnitude of the problem is indicated by the fact that of the civilian labour force of 5½ million persons 3·3 million dropped out of that labour force in 1954 and 3·4 million entered it. In other words, it is a changing scene in the field of labour relations.

This afternoon, as I listened to my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South referring to the dangers of automation, I thought he but repeated the age-old fear that has always been with man since the beginnings of the industrial revolution; in each generation, as inventiveness makes possible a greater production through the medium of mechanization, man fears the change for many people believe it brings about continuing and extensive unemployment.

In our own time we have had experience with the vast changes that have taken place in the production of plastics. As machinery has developed and national production has increased, further and more extensive fields of production have been opened and vistas of employment have resulted that could never have been anticipated otherwise. Indeed, in an examination made by the Brookings Institution some time ago, it was estimated that by the year 1980 the average weekly hours of work will be down to 30 but that the gross national production will have been increased during that period in the United States by some 65 per cent.

While each generation fears that mechanization will reduce employment, each generation in succession has found that while mechanization has expanded to a degree beyond the belief of anyone of even 50 years ago, nonetheless employment has been extending by the extending field of other production. I think it was Professor Wener of Harvard University who recently made the prediction—and he is an authority with a world-wide reputation—that by 1980 there will be few factories with 100 employees and less, and that by that time one person pushing a button will have taken the place of 100 employees in the present state of mechanization. On the other hand, he predicts that in the extending field, as man's standard of living under private enterprise expands, the extent of employment will be maintained at a reasonably high level.

I should like the minister to have dealt somewhat more extensively with the unemployment situation, even though it was dealt with recently at length. What are the figures today? What have been the results in the last three or four weeks? All of us know that there has been a reduction in the actual amount of unemployment but is that reduction not slower than it was last year and vastly slower than it was at the same period in 1953 and in 1952? What is our economic position? Are the departments of government operating each in a closed section peculiar to itself? I ask that question because some reference was made to it by my friend the hon. member for Hamilton West in what I thought was one of the best speeches that she has made, if not the best, since taking over the responsibility of speaking on behalf of this party on labour problems. She covered the situation thoroughly and dispassionately but with a realism that is often absent in the discussion of a problem which permits of an emotional impulse such as does that of unemployment.

What about this advisory council on manpower? My hon. friend the minister was kind enough today to give me a list of the officers and members of this council. It is one that is made up of outstanding men and women. The joint chairmen are R. B. Bryce, secretary of the privy council, and A. H. Brown, deputy minister of labour. Labour is represented by Percy Bengough, formerly president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; Donald MacDonald, secretary treasurer of the Canadian Congress of Labour; Gerard Picard, Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and J. B. Ward, Railway Brotherhoods and joint legislation committee; the employers by outstanding industrialists such as Hugh A. Crombie, Philip Gruchy, William Mainwaring and Allen Ross; the women by representatives of the National Council of Women, Mrs. Allen Turner Bone and Mrs. Flora D. Jutras; the veterans by Colonel Baker of the National Council of Veterans Association and Mr. Kennedy of the dominion command of the Canadian Legion; industry by the president of the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association, Mr. McRea; and the president of the Canadian Metal Mining Association, Mr. Fraser.

These people operate or were intended to operate in co-operation with the representatives of the departments of national defence, labour, agriculture and other departments of government in which manpower plays a large part. But at a time when unemployment is rising, why does this council not meet? What is it? Is it window dressing or decoration, outstanding names without the use of their ability and capacity? What is the explanation? At a time like this, when a council such as that with its vast experience should be utilized for the benefit of the Canadian people, why is it kept in cold storage? I should like the minister to answer that when he replies. What is the manpower situation in Canada? Surely, there must be some body that brings together the statistics on immigration, agriculture, the labour force and the like. Yet we have never been able to secure any authoritative statistics on the subject.

Even on the question of unemployment the government cannot agree with itself. One department says there are 630,000 unemployed up to April, and another department says 390,000. The minister has a revised version that does not even equal the lower figure of the two. Surely, there must be some body that would bring together in proper relationship the manpower situation in our country.

Mr. Gregg: May I ask the hon. member a question? To what does he refer as the "revised version"?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have never been able to get an exact figure from the minister. The figure he gave was much lower than the figures given by the unemployment division and by the bureau of statistics. Is the minister now prepared to give us what the revised version is?

Mr. Gregg: I am prepared to say that I have never given any version lower than that of the dominion bureau of statistics figure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In any event, the minister did not accept the higher figure that was given by one department of government. I have never heard from his lips an authoritative statement as to what the proper statistic was in reference to unemployment.

I should like to ask him this. Is it not a fact that his department has been looking into the question of a national registration for Canadians in order to determine the manpower of this country, and in order to determine the degree to which immigration either increases or decreases job opportunities, as is contended in certain circles? What happened to this national registration episode of a few months ago? Is it not a fact that the government had a plan at that time? Did the plan not actually go forward to the extent that the entire machinery for the registration of manpower was built up, including the printing of the necessary registration forms and certificates? What was the purpose? Does the government have any intention of proceeding with the plan which the officials of his department were engaged upon for so long in the preparatory work? Does the minister consider today that national registration is necessary in order to determine the degree to which manpower is available in industry, in agriculture and in general for the economic development of our country, as well as for defence production and the like? Will the minister place before the house and the country the general plan that his department had in mind in the preparation of this comprehensive system?

Is it because of the fact that this council recommended the national registration that it has not been used or its prestige drawn upon since November, 1953? These are questions that the Canadian people would like to have answered. Certainly, the degree to which chaos is present in labour matters in this country indicates that the Department of Labour lacks direction, lacks system and lacks, not authority but direction. I ask the minister when he replies to state what has been done in this regard and what was the reason for the preparations for a national registration. Has it since been decided to discontinue the plan? When was that decision made and why?

Having asked the minister that, I pass on to one particular field of unemployment that has aroused a great deal of ill feeling, and properly so, amongst Canadian National Railways employees in this country. To what degree does the Department of Labour co-operate with Canadian National Railways in order to assure that the men who find themselves out of work are offered alternative opportunities of jobs? Recently I was in Nova Scotia for that great event when the first train crossed the causeway and Canada became annexed to Cape Breton. As a result of this accomplishment, a considerable number of Canadian National Railways employees find themselves out of work. What is the plan, and what is the attitude to be? What is the degree to which the Department of Transport co-operates with the Department of Labour in connection with this very important problem? Certainly, so far as Canadian National Railways employees are concerned, they strongly resent being pushed around as they are today. They believe, and I think properly, that there have been too many men without actual railway experience promoted to high positions. This has caused deterioration in their morale, and that is understandable when they see promoted to high positions men whose experience in the railway world is either little or non-existent. I ask the minister: To what degree is there co-operation, or is each of these departments—transport, agriculture and defence production—a closed compartment operating on its own?

There is one means of providing many jobs across this country, a means which would require an attitude of co-operation between the Department of Transport and the Department of Labour, and I go to the province of Saskatchewan for a moment for an example. The same situation prevails in the maritimes today. The people find themselves in a position where, as a result of a lack of power, they are unable to have the industry to which they are entitled. This incontrovertible fact applies equally to the western provinces, particularly Saskatchewan.

During the days of the expansion of our defence facilities there was a tremendous centralization in the central provinces. Today as a result of the development of atomic energy we expect that by 1963 power can be produced for civil purposes by atomic energy at a price comparable to the present production by coal. Within the next 10 years there is a possibility that atomic power will be produced at a price comparable to the cost of producing hydroelectric power today under the best circumstances. Is there any co-operation between departments of government to that end? With the resources in the maritime provinces, is there any reason why an atomic energy pilot plant to produce power for civil purposes should have been set up in the central provinces rather than in the maritimes or in western Canada?

One of the major responsibilities of government today in maintaining employment will be the degree of co-operation between those in charge of atomic energy and those in industry. What we have to do today, above everything else as I see it, is to decentralize our industry and to give to the have-not provinces the opportunity to have atomic energy for civil development, and thereby bring about an economic situation in Canada in the near future where atomic energy will be put in overalls for the benefit of the Canadian people. That is one thing, in the great over-all plan, which I believe should be evolved in order to ensure jobs and employment in all parts of the country.

Secondly, there is the question of discrimination in freight rates. That is a matter that is holding back employment in various parts of our country. While I do not have the latest figures before me, I do know that, strangely enough, in Saskatchewan, with a socialist government in power, we have there a higher degree of unemployment—or have had during the months of January, February and March—than in any other part of this country. And when my hon. friends of the C.C.F. tell me that only their hearts are moved for the man who works, I ask them to go to the province of Saskatchewan and see what has happened there on more than one occasion.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Put down the figures.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend is aroused. I say to him that I gave the figures only a few days ago and I do not like to offer repetitious argument by placing the same statistics on the record day after day. I gave them the other day. Once they are on Hansard, then they are on Hansard, and can be read. And if my hon. friend cares to look back to a time about three or four weeks ago he will find that I set out in detail the comparable figures from Saskatchewan.

Indeed, when I listen to my hon. friends assuming the garb of piety, I ask myself why was it that, in some of the government industries operated in Saskatchewan by the government of that province, as soon as the profits went down and the losses rose the man who worked for the government was immediately put out of work and put on unemployment insurance, or arrived there ultimately.

Mr. Pouliot: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what happened there. I dislike mentioning this, but I think the record should be clear in that regard, that by whatever organization a business is operated, whether by a state or by private enterprise, it operates to maintain jobs only when there is a profit return. And there are no jobs in losses, no matter whether the operation is government owned or privately owned.

I mention Saskatchewan—and this example could apply to other parts of Canada—because we have vast pulp resources in northern Saskatchewan. A very large concern has been desirous of opening a pulp and paper mill in northern Saskatchewan capable of employing a very large number of men. Yet that pulp and paper mill finds itself in a position where it cannot do so. Power is available; the market is available; but the freight rates, discriminatory as they are, deny the opening of that industry.

In that connection I am going to make one or two quotations, because I have a suggestion to make to the minister in connection with the manpower council. These are the representations made to the Prince Albert chamber of commerce on this matter, and what is said here would be applicable to all parts of our country that are subject to the discrimination that freight rates schedules impose on those parts of the country that should be developed. The presentation I have here states that the Prince Albert chamber of commerce are . . .

> . . . seriously concerned about the present stalemate in the negotiations for a freight rate schedule that would make the operation of such a plant economically feasible . . .
> Establishment of a pulp and paper mill in the area would not only provide permanent employment for several hundred people but would provide additional employment for woods operations during the winter season, such employment coming at that season of the year when the unemployment peak in Saskatchewan is at its highest level.

Then it goes on to mention a matter in the minds of people generally across Canada, as we export employment in the form of our raw materials processed in another country and irreplaceable here. Then it goes on to say:

> Canada has already attained the reputation of being an exporting nation of her raw materials rather than an exporter of the finished product. Many thousands of cords of pulpwood are exported annually from Saskatchewan to mills in the United States because facilities for processing are not available in this province.

The same argument applies in the maritime provinces where exactly the same situation exists in the matter of freight rates. The brief continues:

We contend that a long range view of the whole matter must be taken into account.

It goes on to point out that the development of the natural resources in our country should be on an equal basis in all parts of the country.

Then there is this singular circumstance in regard to the freight rates schedule:

Another point that appears to us very inconsistent is that the freight rate—

That is, the rate from Prince Albert.

—to Chicago is $16.56 per ton while Winnipeg, an intermediate point and approximately one-third of the total distance, is $26.40 per ton.

Now, the effect of that is simply this, that it is better, it is cheaper and it is more economical to ship Canadian pulp into the United States to be manufactured there. It is $10 a ton cheaper to do it that way than to ship it to Winnipeg, which is only one-third of the distance, as compared with the distance to the American market.

The brief continues:

Surely the railways cannot justify this variation on the basis of per mile haulage costs . . .

We are of the opinion therefore that the Canadian National Railways, as a national railway, should be prepared to assume a share of the risk and make its contribution in a venture that will contribute materially to the development of the country and the establishment of secondary industries to manufacture our products.

I ask the minister this: To what degree are there negotiations between his department and the Department of Transport to encourage production in Canada, fabrication in Canada and processing in Canada of resources such as these which, at the present time, are produced here, and shipped over to the United States which, as I said before, is a process of shipping employment to the United States at the expense of the Canadian workers?

I ask the minister this: Will he outline in general something of the comprehensive picture, something by way of a general plan that operates in the minds of the government today to meet this problem, one that is so serious to those who are unemployed and so serious to the future development of this country?

These are but one or two matters that I thought might be of some interest, and upon which the minister, with his wide knowledge of his department and of the plans that his department is making to meet this situation, would be able to comment to the committee and to the country. These are some of the things that, in my opinion, deserve attention. I ask the minister these questions once more, and I ask them in order. Why has this manpower council been laid aside? What was the reason for the work done by the Department of Labour on a national registration plan? Is it intended to launch such a plan? If it is not, how much was spent on the proposition before the decision was made to discontinue any further consideration of national registration to meet the competing claims of industry, of defence production and of agriculture and all the other claims upon the manpower of our country?

Finally, to what degree is there a relationship between his department and that of the departments of agriculture, transport and the like, to the end that in a community of council employment may be secured for many who are unemployed today?

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, I positively am going to speak on a subject which a great number of members of this house and of the previous parliament would consider a little boring. However, I do wish to speak about the problem of the older workers. On three occasions in the last parliament I dealt with this. I want to deal with it tonight because, in my opinion and in the opinion of a great number of men and women in my riding, there is discrimination against men and women who have over the years gained much experience and know-how and have the ability to stick to jobs if or when the jobs are available to them.

I hold in my hand a resolution that was passed by 600 people in my riding, asking that I again bring this matter to the attention of parliament. I have a great deal of pleasure in doing that because I feel it is of great importance. I might say to my good friend from Prince Albert, who has just taken his seat, that there possibly is much more to be told about potential freight rates in Canada than has been told up to the present time.

Before I go on to say what I intend to say I should like to tell a factual story. I think it will throw a great deal of light on what will affect the trade policies of Canada in the years that lie immediately ahead. As hon. members know, we have passed a most favoured nations trade treaty with Japan. We recognize that in doing so we have brought about friendly relations with that oriental power, but the cost of production in that country is so extremely low that one of these days we shall have to meet it whether we like it or not.

The story I am going to relate has to do with a shipment of logs that were cut from trees on Vancouver island. They were shipped to Japan for processing. They were shipped back to British Columbia and landed in Vancouver for transshipment to Montreal. A question arose with respect to the Japanese consul who was negotiating the transfer. I am quite sure that my figures are correct. If you are a Canadian by birth or by naturalization and are operating in the lumbering industry in British Columbia and wish to ship material from the coast to the east across Canada on either of the two railroads, the cost is $1.43 per 100 pounds, not per 100 feet. The representative of Japan went to one of the two railroads. I will not discriminate; I know which railroad he went to. He asked to see the shipping clerk, and he inquired of him what amount of money he would charge him for shipping those processed logs to Montreal. Well, the shipping clerk thumbed it over and he said "The rate is $1.43 per 100 pounds". The representative of Japan said: "I am not going to pay that. Before I pay that I will ship those processed logs back to Japan and by water from Japan to Montreal".

Well, it was a small shipment of some 260,000 feet. There is a compensating clause in the freight rates which they utilized rather than completely lose the business. The result was that Japan was able to ship the 260,000 feet of logs, which had been grown in British Columbia, to Japan and back from Japan to the port of Vancouver. He was able to ship from Vancouver to Montreal for 47 cents per 100 pounds. I can visualize along with the hon. member for Prince Albert that there is going to be increasing difficulty with respect to freight hauling when the people of Japan produce sufficient goods to be able to send much of their production to Canada and to other countries on the North American continent.

The real thing that I wish to speak on tonight is this. As I have already said, I have spoken on this three times before. I do wish to congratulate the Minister of Labour on the work that he and his department have done over the last five or six years with respect to the employment of handicapped people. They have done a good job. I am not going to take any credit for the advertisements and the material that they have put in the various papers across Canada, asking employers to give assistance to men and women in that particular category. At the same time I shall not take any satisfaction from the fact that it might have happened after or even before I spoke on this subject. That is neither here nor there. The fact remains that under our regulations we are discriminating against men and women of experience. I should like to quote from a guest editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of March 11, 1955 as follows:

> What in the name of God are people going to do when they reach 40?
> That was the question posed by Mr. Phil Kearns, president of a united auto workers local, when he complained against refusal of some plants to hire men over that age.

Twenty-five or thirty years ago I, possibly like a great number of other people, thought that that was a good policy. I am not so sure but that I advocated it from the public platform. But whether I did or not the fact remains that the labour unions of Canada and the United States were the first to recommend that. They should not be eternally condemned for making that recommendation. I believe conscientiously that there are a great number in the labour organizations of Canada and the United States who feel today that that has not been a successfully operating policy.

I recall during the sittings of the last parliament I consulted the Parliamentary Guide to find the number of men and women sitting in the house who were over 45 years of age. I believe we had 252 members approximately in the house and of that number there were more than 166 who would be disqualified because of age if we adopted the principle that those over 45 years of age were unfit for public service.

This is a very serious and grave situation and one to which the Department of Labour and the Department of Finance should give additional consideration in the immediate future in an effort to rectify it. I should like to quote from the Ottawa Citizen of February 5, 1953, as follows:

> Warns Against Retiring Useful People
> The fact that a man had reached the accepted retirement age of 65 does not mean that he has out-lived his usefulness to his company, Dr. B. D. B. Layton, assistant director of health services, department of health and welfare, told the Aylmer Rotary Club last night.
> "We should be very thoughtful about arbitrarily relegating the '65 year older' to the discard", he said.

I could not agree more. It will be recalled that only a matter of months ago we retired one of Canada's outstanding scientists in the person of Jack Mackenzie. Dr. Mackenzie and I served together in the first war. Of all those in the public service of Canada, I think possibly Jack Mackenzie was one whom we as taxpayers and citizens could least afford to let go. Yet because of an arbitrary ruling he was relegated to the ash heap shortly after reaching 65 years of age.

I could enumerate many other instances, as I am quite sure all hon. members could. Has the time not arrived when we should consider this whole problem in the light of modern conditions and in the light of the atomic age into which we are entering? The hon. member for Prince Albert, who just preceded me, referred to what might happen in the immediate future with respect to atomic power. I am quite happy to go along with him and I hope sincerely that his predictions are correct.

But I do suggest that if suddenly overnight we were to develop atomic power for civilian use in the various cities, towns and communities across Canada, we would throw into a complete tailspin the economic development that has been brought about by the use of hydroelectric and other forms of power. I am sure that none of us would want to see that; I am sure that we are all desirous that this process be a progressive one and that we will be able to start in a small way and bring about this atomic development to the point where we can use it to its greatest extent for peaceful purposes across the length and breadth of our land.

When I last spoke on this matter of people being thrown into retirement because of age the Ottawa Journal quoted what I had said. I do not intend to quote my words in full, but I should like to refer briefly to that article, as follows:

> "In my opinion, the sooner that wrong is rectified, in respect of these men and women, the better it will be for the people of Canada and for the service they receive from their civil servants; the better too will it be for the government that makes the necessary corrections."
> After his address, Mr. MacDougall told the Journal that to bar men in the prime of life from the civil service on account of age was "rank discrimination against experience".

I reiterate that sentiment tonight. I do not intend to make any accusations, but following my previous remarks on this subject I had an official statement that one reason why men of 40 or 45 years of age could not be taken into federal employment was that it would be actuarially unsound to do so because of the pension plan. I was sceptical at that time about the pension scheme. I recognized of course that if a man or woman was brought into federal employment at 45 years of age naturally at 65 years of age he or she would not be able to draw as large a pension as would the person who had come in at 25 or 30 years of age. I had a confirmation of that from one who ought to know his statistics with respect to these things, because he has offices in many places in western Canada. The Vancouver Sun published an editorial on this subject on April 21, 1955, under the heading "Pension Bogey Exposed". I quote:

> The letter which The Sun reprinted Wednesday from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer—a wife's broken-hearted story of a husband "too old at 43" to get a job—told a story altogether too common in industry and business. And altogether too unnecessary.
> One of Canada's leading actuaries and pension plan experts states that this sort of tragedy is unnecessary. He is William M. Mercer, head of William M. Mercer Ltd., Vancouver.
> The stock excuse for turning away the over-40 applicant for a job—no matter how experienced he may be or how able—is "you are too old to fit into our company pension plan."
> "But it is only an excuse," Mr. Mercer tells The Sun. "It's nonsense to say it. The real reason why employers and personnel managers are reluctant to take on middle-aged applicants for jobs is that they are usually married and have children. It's not so easy to fire such a man if he turns out a misfit, as it is to fire a young man."

I would hate, Mr. Chairman, to think that the reason there is completely defined, but I believe in all conscience that there is some reason for believing the statement made by Mr. Mercer. If by any chance any of us in this house who are today 40 or 45 or more were to be suddenly thrown upon the labour market, I am quite sure that under the present regulations a great number of us would be told precisely what the married man of 40 or 45 is now being told in the various personnel offices of industry throughout the length and breadth of Canada. To me that is a very unfortunate circumstance, for surely if a man is in his mid-forties, is married, has a family and is desirous of educating his children, it is unchristian—if I may use the word—that he should feel in his heart that, though he has had years of experience, because of the fact that he is a married man with a family, he is unable to gain employment in many of the industries throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

I do not think we can blame industry entirely. Of course, industry is the great hirer of men and women, and thank God that is the case; but it seems to me that we in this parliament and this government have some responsibility with respect to this very issue of which I speak. Maybe industry will not follow our example, if we set a good example, but if industry did not follow our example at least we would have the satisfaction of knowing that we set a good example for it to follow. That example would be set if the government made a study of this situation and were able to announce in the very near future that men and women of 40 or 45 when they apply for positions in the federal civil service would in future receive similar treatment to that given to men of lower ages today.

There is something that can be said over and above what I have already said with respect to men and women of that age. We all recognize that, as far as physical vitality is concerned, younger men and women have it all over us; there is no argument about that. On the other hand, we have to appreciate that experience is one of the great teachers, and the experience of men and women in various vocations in life has steadied them, matured them and, like Scotch whisky, has aged them all for the better. They are in a preferred position because of that experience and their desire to raise their families and educate them, whereas younger men and women have not yet reached complete maturity and stability in respect to the vocations that they are going to follow in the later days of their life. I wish to plead emphatically that the administration give this problem its earnest consideration now—not next year or the year after, but now. If they set a good example for industry and for mercantile establishments throughout the length and breadth of the country, and draw into service men of the categories of which I have spoken, I am quite sure that the results to the taxpayers of Canada will be most happy and most satisfying.

It might be slightly out of order, Mr. Chairman, but it will save time in further discussions if I conclude with another request that is of paramount importance in the area that I have the honour to represent in this house. It has to do with the Department of Labour. I believe that men and women who wish to save for a rainy day and are not fishing around to get on unemployment insurance after we have completely revised the act, men and women who have gone into semi-retirement, can today procure up to $1,200 a year. It seems to me that for many of those people throughout Canada it would be a fine step if we amended the act so that those who were desirous of participating to a greater extent than they are now allowed to do under the law might be able to procure $1,800 per year instead of $1,200 per year.

The people in my riding are not all numbskulls by any manner of means, though some of you might think they are when they send me down here, but the fact remains that there are some deep thinkers there. I know at least a few hundred people to whom individually and collectively this is a very important matter. If it is important in the riding of Vancouver-Burrard, I am sure that it must be important in dozens, and even hundreds, of ridings throughout Canada. Again I would ask the government to take this suggestion under advisement so that if those people of whom I have spoken are desirous of investing in the future welfare of Canada to the extent of $1,800 in annuities per year, the government may make it possible for them to do so.

Many of those people in that range of which I have spoken are men and women who have saved for a rainy day and they believe in the future of Canada. They believe in the soundness of investment with respect to government annuities. When they hold that belief, I think it is our duty in this House of Commons to give them every opportunity to invest to the maximum according to their desire.

I was going to quote from an address delivered in the other house by the junior senator, Hon. Nancy Hodges, on the question "The challenge of present-day estimates of old age." I am not going to take further time of the committee in giving to you some of the points that she raised. However, to my hon. friends to my left I will say this. If they want further information on it, and do not want to look up Hansard, if they will apply to Liberal headquarters and get the Liberal Advocate of February 15, 1955, they will find the address there.

The problem of age in this era, the problem of men and women living much longer than they used to live, is one that must be given consideration. I think I am safe in saying that when I was in skirts, with long golden hair hanging down my back at four years of age, the average length of life in Canada at that time was 45 years. That was a long time ago. Now, with modern medicine and modern scientific development in drugs, physiotherapy and all the various other aspects that make it easier for men and women to live longer, we have come to a state where, according to the actuarial statistics of insurance companies, it is expected that men will reach not only the biblical three score and ten but three score and ten plus two. I believe the age expectancy is now 72.

I recall that, not more than a few days ago, a gentleman in the House of Commons with whom I was speaking was telling me about his father who had retired from the publishing business when he was less than 70 years of age. The publishing company were lavish in their praise of him and they presented him with a purse. The amount of coin that was in the purse was not divulged to me, but I do not suppose it was very heavy. But they said to him, "You have been a great employee of this paper and for the excellent service that you have rendered in the part of the country where this paper is located, we are going to give you a life subscription to the paper." He was 68 years of age when he retired. He is now touring the Mediterranean at 83 or 84. When he reached the age of 72, his old paper wrote to him and said, "Your life expectancy has been reached and your life subscription is herewith cancelled."

That is the sort of thing that makes me feel strongly on the subject that I have discussed tonight. I conclude by hoping and even praying that the administration will not only give this matter serious consideration but that, having seriously considered it, they will forthwith take off their mitts and dig in order to bring about the things that I have been advocating.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the question of unemployment has been thoroughly discussed in this chamber, and the views of this group are on the record. The question of unemployment insurance was discussed when the bill was under consideration, and that bill is now before the industrial relations committee. I am therefore not going to take the time of the committee to discuss those matters that have been so completely dealt with. However, for years I have been greatly interested in vocational training, particularly of the young and displaced employed persons who require it, in the rehabilitation of the disabled and in finding suitable employment for our older workers. I listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has just said. I might say that I heartily support his plea on behalf of the older workers at this time.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South this afternoon dealt effectively and, in my opinion, fully with the question of vocational training. Like him, I regret to see this reduction of $200,000 in the estimate for that purpose. Like him, Mr. Chairman, I believe that, instead of reducing that estimate, under present circumstances in Canada there is every need to increase it.

While we have a serious unemployment situation, I have noticed from time to time in recent years that there is a growing shortage of skilled workers such as first-class carpenters, plumbers, decorators, painters and of artisans generally who have thoroughly learned their trades and are capable of undertaking the particular kind of work in which they are trained. Industry in this country, such as the construction industry and those engaged in housebuilding and other types of building, need increasing numbers of skilled persons if they are to carry on with the programs they have in mind. If we are going to use to advantage the human resources that are available in Canada, we must extend greatly our vocational training program.

Personally, in this day and generation, I think it is a crime to allow the natural capacities of many Canadians to go undeveloped and unused just because we fail to provide the machinery to see that they get the necessary training, guidance, leadership and opportunities. I think it is an injustice particularly to our younger people who seek opportunities. I think we should do everything possible to provide those opportunities by means of a considerable expansion of our vocational training program. Such training is an advantage to the young persons or older persons concerned, and in the long run it is certainly an advantage to Canada and will pay good dividends. That is all I am going to say on that point because I do not want to take the time of the committee at this stage to deal at length with these questions that I want to mention because they are of concern to a number of my constituents and because I have been particularly interested in them for some years.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South also mentioned the great technological improvements that are coming about in all countries at this time. I think it is safe to say that technological advance is now developing at a furious rate, a tempo that was never conceived of prior to the last five years.

About six weeks ago I had the opportunity of having a discussion with a young man from Great Britain who was interested in labour problems and who had made a considerable study of them. He brought to my attention the studies that are being undertaken in Great Britain in this respect to meet the problem which it poses, even in a country where they give more attention to this question than we have in Canada so far. He gave me one illustration to show what planning can do in relation to a technological advance that displaces a large number of workers. He told me about the Lyons catering people—they are the people who have the tea shops all over Great Britain—who recently introduced one bookkeeping and cost accounting machine into their headquarters in London that was capable of doing in less than three hours the work that 250 clerks would do in a week. There was a tremendous displacement of personnel when they introduced this machine into their offices. For some months prior to putting the machine into operation the management of the company and the employees considered the whole problem, so that when the machine was introduced every one of those 250 displaced clerks was re-employed in some other position.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that is an example that we could very well follow in this country on a larger scale. In my opinion the question of technological improvement has not been scientifically approached by government, by employers or by organized labour. It is not sufficient to get up and complain about the question in this house or in the country. It is a very complicated thing that requires a considerable amount of study, and a considerable amount of understanding of the problems of management and labour. It will require some technical advice and scientific information. I suggest that if we are going to meet this question of technological improvements successfully in the years to come, we have to set about doing something seriously now. I suggest to the minister that we should have some form of special committee established to deal with this problem of the displacement of workers as a result of technological improvements. This committee should be composed of the representatives of government, management and industry, representatives of the employees and possibly scientific or technical advisers, economists from the universities or other sources in this country.

It is a complicated question. It is not going to be solved overnight. I believe we have to give it very serious study. I am not acquainted from firsthand knowledge with the technological advances that are taking place in most industries in this country. I am, however, acquainted with the technological improvements that are taking place even in the operation of the small lumber companies in the interior of British Columbia. For 50 years these companies have been content to operate with the standard type of mill and one type of woods operation. They employed about the same number of people to produce 1,000 feet of logs or 1,000 feet of lumber. Technological improvements, even in some small industries employing not more than 10 men, have been necessary in order to produce lumber competitively.

I can think of one small mill now where within the last five years technological improvements have taken two men off the carriage, which is now automatically operated; three men have been taken off the pond where they serve the jack ladders; two or three men off the cutoff saws and edgers, and another dozen men have been displaced in the piling operations in the yards. All this has taken place in quite a small industry. So far as the woods operations are concerned, power saws, bulldozers, heavy trucks and big equipment are today making it possible to produce the same amount with fewer men. A few years ago the production of 1,000 feet of logs per day per man, on the skidway and ready to roll into booms, was considered good. Today they are producing 3,000 feet of logs per day per man. These developments have taken place in a very small section of the industry which has not developed to anything like the same extent the larger industries have. It indicates the problem we are facing at this time. I do suggest to the minister it is a problem that should receive serious consideration, the problem of the displacement of labour as a result of technological improvements and advances.

I should like to say a few words with respect to the employment of older workers. As I said before, I fully support the remarks made by the previous speaker. This is a very serious problem. I know dozens of older workers, men with excellent experience and training in various trades who, because of their age, are at the present time unable to find employment. I know this is a difficult problem. I want to say that the officials of the national employment service in my constituency do everything they can to find employment for this type of person. I know the managers in Nelson and Trail make a point of visiting employers and doing everything they can to find employment for these people. In the smaller centres it is particularly difficult to find employment for these people who are so well able to earn their living and whose experience, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said, is so valuable and who could make important contributions to the production of this country.

Here again I do not think the government, government departments, the civil service commission or employers have really done all that it is possible to do to solve the problem. In this respect the minister knows that on several occasions I have brought to his attention the fact that the civil service commission refuses to place applicants in various departments because of their age. Only last fall I brought to the minister's attention the case of a veteran, almost in the prime of life so far as physical condition was concerned, and with many years' experience in bookkeeping. He had been employed for six or seven years in the Department of Veterans Affairs, but had to leave when the department was subject to economy cuts. In this case the man is capable of making an excellent contribution but because of his age the civil service commission failed to recommend him for a position, although he passed with high marks and had excellent qualifications.

At this moment I want to say that I will have more to say about this when the civil service estimates come before the committee. I have come to the conclusion that the methods of the civil service commission are the methods of the horse and buggy days when today we should be using the methods that suit the tempo of today's activity. I think government departments have been reluctant to do all that is possible with respect to placing older people in the government service. I might say that I have heard about political patronage when it comes to the appointment of persons to the public service. I have not experienced much of that since I have been a member of this house. I have not seen much of it, but I have seen a good deal of what I would call departmental patronage. I have seen positions held vacant for five or six months. People who have been ready to step in, and were No. 1 on the list, have become fed up and disgusted, and got other jobs; and in those circumstances those whom the department wanted to have the jobs were placed in those positions. I bring this fact to the minister's attention.

I do not think we are doing enough by way of providing employment for our older citizens. There seems to be a certain prejudice against employing older persons in some sections of industry, and also on the part of individuals who employ labour. As I said before, studies have been made in Great Britain in connection with technological improvements and advances, and studies in connection with the employment of older workers. Studies have been made in the United States by various groups concerning the capacity of older workers to provide a satisfactory service.

A most interesting study was carried out last year by the University of Illinois. In this connection I would quote from the Ottawa Journal of March 19, 1955. This article is most informative, because it seems that some employers seem to be impressed with the view that only the younger people can deliver a full day's work. They overlook completely in many cases the value of experience and maturity of judgment. This article bearing the heading "Older Workers Serve Well", and with a Chicago dateline, states:

> The Civil Service Assembly says a new study shows the older workers are as efficient or better than employees under 60.
> The assembly cited a study made and evaluated by the University of Illinois, which rated a sampling of workers on over-all performance, absenteeism, dependability, work quality, output and ability to get along with others.
> The university contacted supervisors in 20 companies who told what they thought of the competence of 1,025 workers in their 60's and 70's.
> In over-all performance, supervisors rated 16 per cent of the older workers as excellent, 32 per cent very good, 36 per cent good, 15 per cent fair and 1 per cent, poor.
> The supervisors reported that 70 per cent were absent less often than younger workers, 23 per cent about the same and 7 per cent more often.
> On dependability, 50 per cent were judged more dependable than younger employees, and 6 per cent less dependable.
> Comparative percentages for work quality were 36 per cent better, 57 per cent about the same and 7 per cent poorer.
> More than 75 per cent of the older workers had production records equal to or higher than those of younger workers.
> Thirty-three per cent get along with others better than younger workers do, the study showed. Sixty per cent are on a par with younger employees in this standard and 7 per cent do not fare as well.

I think this study clearly indicates the capacity of these older people, on the whole, to perform satisfactory service. I do urge the minister's department to do more than has been done in the past, not only to aid the government in employing more applicants in this age group, but to obtain greater co-operation from industrial and individual employers so that these older people who are found more often in the smaller towns and cities will receive employment. In many cases they are not old enough to receive pensions. However, they are anxious to work; and I ask the government to do everything possible to give as many as possible of these people the opportunity to do the work they are anxious to do and who, in performing this work, would be self-supporting, in conformity with their personal wishes.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for a moment or two regarding the construction of vocational schools, because today these schools are more essential than ever before. Today many of the students from academic schools go directly to the assembly lines in factories, and from their first day of employment receive very fair remuneration. In those trades that require training and skills this is not the case; so we have vocational schools filling a need in this country which cannot be filled in any other way.

With costs of education as they are today, many municipalities are unable to supply the new schools required in those communities. The program we had in the past, of making grants in conjunction with the provinces in which these schools were located, served as a source of encouragement to the municipalities and the provinces to build the schools required.

This evening I am asking the minister to do everything within his power to continue this very important work in connection with the construction of vocational schools. Under the British North America Act the building of schools is the responsibility of the municipalities. However, I do not think the fathers of confederation ever realized just to what extent the cost of education of the children in this country would increase. I do not think they ever visualized that every child in this country of ours would have an opportunity to attend a high school or a university; but that is the situation we have today. Indeed, I think we have advanced far beyond the wildest hopes of the fathers of confederation; and in advancing that far the costs of education to be borne by the municipalities have increased to a point where they are unable to carry the load by themselves.

I would ask the minister to take a good look at the requirements in Canada in respect of the building of vocational schools; and I hope he will be able to tell me that the usual grants will be continued for another year.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, consideration of the estimates of the Department of Labour affords an opportunity, especially for those of us who have the honour of representing labour constituencies, of making known to the house our humble opinion, which is undoubtedly also the opinion of those we have the pleasure of representing, namely the working people.

On several occasions, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) gave the house statistics from his department. He has often accused us of quoting exaggerated figures, especially as far as unemployment is concerned. I have often been personally accused of quoting figures which did not correspond with those of the Department of Labour. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the statistics of the Department of Labour, now as always, do not give a true picture of the situation in Canada. These statistics are supplied to the department by the various offices of the unemployment insurance commission in Canada and deal only with people who are looking for employment or periodically draw unemployment insurance benefits. If the department would only care to consult the different labour unions throughout the country, it would find that the statistical data given to us and the public are equivalent to 20 per cent of the actual number of unemployed. If the potential of our manpower in Canada is around 5,300,000 workers, I do say and maintain that actually about 15 per cent of these workers are unemployed.

May I be permitted a suggestion, Mr. Chairman? What would prevent the department from setting up a committee which could be called an advisory committee and which would include, for instance, representatives from the labour unions, management associations, the Canadian manufacturers association, the Canadian retailers association and the various boards of trade. These public bodies might meet from time to time and, with the information they are able to get, give the department a true picture of employment in Canada. In this way, the government would have more reliable statistics; it would be acquainted with the general situation and we would not be irresponsibly accused of quoting exaggerated figures. Moreover, it would make the government realize that there exists at the present time in the country a most alarming situation to which the government can no longer remain indifferent.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Certainly.

Mr. Maltais: Does not the hon. member know that an advisory committee such as the one he is now advocating is already in existence?

An hon. Member: He does not know. He was in Florida when that committee was set up.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, it is very gratifying to be entrusted with the task of looking after the interests of our constituents but it is a pity to have to hear the nonsense coming from the members in the rear of the house who seem to represent their constituents only through their interjections, and their foolish and silly remarks.

Mr. Habel: We are stating facts!

Mr. Dufresne: The hon. member for Charlevoix asked me if I knew that such a committee already exists. If there is one, the department never mentioned it to us, and it never published any report nor any statistics.

The advisory committee I just suggested would be very efficient and be of assistance both to the minister and to his department.

Coming back to unemployment, I was going to say when I was interrupted that the government evidently is relying upon the passage of time for a solution. Although the situation remains most alarming everywhere in the country, especially in the city of Quebec and in the riding I represent, in spite of the many representations I have made for nearly two years, both in the house and elsewhere, in spite of the requests made by the various public bodies of Quebec city, the government remains deaf and does nothing to solve this alarming and sad state of affairs.

With respect to Quebec city most particularly, as I said, nothing is being done, no plan is being made. The Prime Minister, who, however, represents a riding included in the very city of Quebec, where such a great number of unemployed can be found, does not seem to be moved by the poverty which is rife, and is not even thinking of putting into effect any program of sufficient importance to cope with the situation. And what is more, hundreds of workers who during the war and since then had been employed in different arsenals, especially those of Valcartier and Quebec, have been laid off since January, which, of course, has not helped a situation that was already critical.

I know that when I inquired about that from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Dickey), I was told that there were no contracts. That may be so. Let us hope that we will have no contracts and that another war will not claim once again the pick of our youth.

But, why not, for instance, turn these wartime industries into peacetime industries? If we were able to find money to make ammunition for war purposes, we should be able to find some now to prevent our people from dying from starvation and to safeguard in particular our human resources. So much could be done in these industries which, little by little, become empty, as unemployment increases, plunging our families into poverty and threatening to dislocate completely our local economy in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this does not agree with the numerous promises we have heard made during the last general election, when the Liberal spokesman, with the Prime Minister taking the lead, were promising employment to all Canadians.

The Prime Minister even went around the world in a gesture of friendship and good will. Nobody blamed him for it, but one day during his journey he met a large group of Canadian soldiers and told them that they would soon have the privilege to return to their country where they would find enough employment to ensure their own livelihood and that of their families. However, what happened? Many veterans came back here either from Europe or Korea, and now we see a good many of these poor men, who risked their lives for their country, gave their best years and sacrificed themselves, still waiting for their reward. They lead an aimless life, not knowing what to do, and the government, which had promised them heaven on earth, has not yet awarded them the promised subsistence, well deserved though it was.

There has been talk of a dominion-provincial conference in the fall, where this delicate problem would apparently be discussed. But, meantime, what are the thousands of people going to do who have nothing to eat and are living on public welfare funds, that can no longer stand the strain?

Yet, Mr. Chairman, projects are not lacking, particularly in the city of Quebec. I have mentioned two of these projects in particular in the two years I have had the privilege to sit here. I spoke about the reclamation of the Lairet river and urged the deepening of the St. Charles river. These are two far-reaching projects which, no doubt, would provide work for hundreds of workers.

My proposals fell on deaf ears. Not only were my representations set aside but not the slightest regard was paid to the requests of the authorities of the city of Quebec, of the chamber of commerce of Quebec as well as a number of other similar important organizations.

Mr. Chairman, why should the implementation of these two projects be refused? Not on account of a lack of urgency; not because these two rivers are not, as I have said, a constant threat to public health; but I am now inclined to believe that this request is being rejected because it has been made again and again by a member of the opposition and because they want to play politics with us, even with the hardships of our own people.

However, in 1930, Mr. Chairman, a depression arose following a too long term of the Liberal party in office. This crisis was equally felt in the city of Quebec, but in order to help the unemployed, we carried out a big enterprise at l'Anse au Foulon, which, at a certain time, employed at least 3,000 workers from my riding. This project was achieved under a Conservative government. I only wish that this example could be an inspiration for the Liberal party.

Mr. Chairman, we are told that the government took many steps to help the unemployed. In my opinion, unemployment insurance is only a palliative and a poultice for the cancer which is gnawing at our population.

Mr. Boisvert: A poultice is not meant for cancer.

Mr. Dufresne: I did not know that my hon. friend, the member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), knew so much about medicine. I thought of him rather as a lawyer.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is simply a matter of common sense.

Mr. Dufresne: However, I see that he is a member of the Liberal party. I merely wanted to tell him that the Liberal party has never resorted to anything but poultices and it is still the case.

Mr. Chairman, public works are advocated. Such undertakings can only bring temporary relief under conditions such as we are now going through, but they have become necessary owing to the serious condition in which the workers of Quebec city now find themselves and which is a source of hardship for our working people's families who do not have enough for their maintenance.

The working people are not the only ones to complain. Merchants are also complaining and making efforts and sacrifices which I would say go beyond human capacity in order to avoid bankruptcy. Those that deal in the necessities of life are at this time carrying a greater amount of credit than they can really afford to. But those who are a little better off, with that kindness of heart which is characteristic of our people, as everybody knows, have taken over the government's job and have been feeding the hungry. I have already said so and I repeat it now. Unemployment is entirely a matter for the federal government who should be courageous enough to face up to the facts. As I was saying the other day, this is no time for palavers, for conferences. We must help those who are suffering, those who need help. That is the government's duty.

Mr. Chairman, when one looks at the government's actions, one wonders, sometimes, what logic there is in them. I have already praised here our part in the Colombo plan. Once more I express the hope that this plan will continue and be augmented as much as possible. What exactly is its purpose? To provide employment through large scale undertakings carried out in India, Pakistan or other Asian countries.

The lack of logic in all this is abundantly clear. Millions are given to various Asian countries in order to give employment to people who live thousands and thousands of miles away. And yet, nothing is found to give to Canadians. Not only are no jobs created, but those that existed have already been done away with. Such has been the case of Quebec city arsenals.

With regard to my own district I have already given the reasons why unemployment is worse in Quebec than elsewhere. I would like though to say that there is another reason, one which is possibly more important than any which I have already indicated.

Unemployment in this country is, in my opinion, due to the sharp competition of goods brought into this country from various foreign parts, particularly from countries with a living standard far lower than ours.

I am no political economist, but the least observant mind, the man in the street, could tell us that when it is possible to buy in Canada imported goods twice as cheap as we can produce them ourselves, we are facing unfavourable competitive conditions which are gradually stifling our industry and thus creating unemployment.

I think it is the duty of the government to take drastic but necessary measures in order to protect our industries, and especially our labour market, in such fields as textiles, electrical appliances, footwear, rubber goods, etc.

In the city of Quebec the basic industry has been for a number of years the footwear industry. Now in 1954 it seems that, on the basis of information available to me, we imported from England almost 2 million pairs of shoes, while several of our manufacturers in the city and district of Quebec were compelled either to close down or, in the case of those who could stand the competition, to stay open only two or three days a week.

How can we meet competition and create employment when certain products, which are now coming from Hong Kong, are selling on the Canadian market for $1.05 less than they cost us to produce?

For instance, shoe merchants are now importing from Hong Kong running-shoes that children and sportsmen wear in the summer time at the price of 90 cents. On the other hand, the Canadian rubber industry, which is one of the most important and gives employment to a great many people, on account of our living standard, which is, as we all know, superior to the living standard in Hong Kong, cannot produce a shoe of similar quality and sell it for less than $1.95 to retailers. It can therefore be said that, while selling both products for the same amount, the retailer prefers to buy the goods cheaper, even if he has to buy them abroad.

This, to my mind, is unfair competition, because the Canadian people cannot be asked to reduce their living standard to such an extent as to equal that of Hong Kong and other Asiatic countries.

The other day, I heard this somewhat surprising remark from the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe): "We must buy in order to sell." And I also heard the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) reply to this announcement as follows: "My mother always taught me that it was necessary to sell in order to buy." This is very logical, Mr. Chairman. If you have not the necessary money, you cannot buy. If you cannot buy, there will be stockpiling. If there is stockpiling, manufacturers cannot pile up more stocks from day to day, and there will necessarily be unemployment.

I therefore ask the government to undertake a very serious inquiry into this situation which is getting somewhat hopeless in certain parts of the country.

I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) to speak on behalf of workers who are begging for work and are asking the government's assistance; I ask the minister to make his colleagues of the cabinet understand that the situation is serious and cannot be tolerated any longer, especially in Quebec city.

I know that the members of the cabinet are human beings and that when they have been acquainted with the deplorable situation prevailing in our district they will be bound to look for a solution. Under such circumstances, the solution does not lie in mere poultices, but in important steps that will bring about work first and then prosperity.

We hear about communism. As I stated the other day, communism, especially in Italy, was the result of misery and poverty. Here we fear communism and we have reason to do so. We must fight communism and I believe one of the best ways of doing so is to feed all those who are hungry, by giving them work.

Canada is enormously rich and it is illogical to see some of our fellow citizens deprived of everything while near at hand there is abundant wealth.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat my request to the hon. minister. I know that he will take my remarks in good part and that he will strive to alleviate hardship in the homes of many of our fellow citizens.

Mr. Boisvert: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Again?

Mr. Boisvert: As I am interested in the welfare of the unemployed, would the hon. member tell me how many people were without work in the city of Quebec on January 1, 1955, and how many there are now?

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, it is a very interesting question to which I will most willingly reply. There were, on the 1st of January, 1955, in the city of Quebec, more than 20,000 unemployed and at present the number is about two or three thousand less. While some of those who were out of work at that time have been able to find jobs, either in construction or in some other industry, this decrease has been almost offset by all those whom the government has dismissed from the Valcartier and Quebec arsenals.

(Text):

Mr. Maltais: I wish to rise on a question of privilege. A moment ago the hon. member who has just resumed his seat was advocating the creating of a committee to advise the Minister of Labour on labour conditions in this country. At that particular moment I rose and asked the permission of the member to ask a question, and he agreed. My question was to this effect: Is the hon. member aware that such an advisory committee has already existed for a few years? I then took my seat and did not say another word. Some hon. members from different quarters of this house said that the hon. member was not aware of the fact because he does not attend the session and was not aware of what was going on.

Mr. Dufresne: I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: We cannot hear two points at one time. I shall hear the hon. member for Charlevoix. I will decide on any question of order before leaving the chair. I shall hear the hon. member for Charlevoix and then the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. Maltais: The hon. member, speaking very good French, used some qualification, saying he was very interested in those remarks, and he used the French words "niaiserie" and "niaiseux", which according to the dictionary would imply a simple fellow or the kind of man who is foolish. Since I did not say anything regarding the hon. member, I would say, Mr. Chairman, that it is not fair to call me a niaiseux; it is unparliamentary.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have heard the hon. member for Charlevoix, and I have had the advantage of having the French expression used translated for me already. It is not up to the Chair to decide whether remarks are complimentary or pleasing, but to decide whether they are unparliamentary. I find myself unable to rule that the expression used by the hon. member for Quebec West is unparliamentary.

Mr. Winch: I move the adjournment of the debate under standing orders. It is now ten o'clock, and I ask you to call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Winch: I have asked you to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Quebec West raised a point of order before ten o'clock and I will hear him.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He did not raise a point of order.

Mr. Dufresne: I was raising a point of order, Mr. Chairman, just in order to mention the fact that there was no question of privilege in the few words that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais) was saying.

The Deputy Chairman: Whether or not there was a question of privilege involved was, in my opinion, for the Chair to decide. It being ten o'clock, shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, should the Department of Labour be completed tomorrow, we will go on with agriculture.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Picard.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

DISTANT EARLY WARNING SYSTEM—TABLING OF AGREEMENT FOR CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to table copies in English and in French, Mr. Speaker, of an exchange of notes between the Canadian ambassador in Washington and the Secretary of State of the United States of America, dated May 5, 1955, constituting an agreement between the Canadian and United States governments covering the construction and operation of the distant early warning system.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

CANNED MIXED FRUIT—REFERENCE TO GATT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Finance? Has the minister now seen press reports that the government is sounding out other GATT countries regarding an increase in the tariff on mixed fruits and that this is one of the one or two other items, along with ethylene glycol, which he mentioned in his budget speech? Are there any other items slated for a tariff boost at this session?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the house will have appreciated the manner in which my hon. friend beclouds the issue by the wording of his question. He asks, has the minister now seen press reports. The answer is yes. Then he goes on to say, "and that this is one of the one or two other items... which he mentioned in his budget speech." I presume if I answered yes to that in connection with one question he would say I had then agreed that mixed fruits were in fact among those being discussed at Geneva, and I have no intention of saying that. So if my hon. friend would drop the "and" I could answer the question.

Then as to the second question, "Are there any other items slated for a tariff boost at this session?" I made it clear in my speech as reported at page 2738 of Hansard that there were in fact two items by name. I also said at page 2739 that it may be necessary to introduce those items—that is, the question of ethylene glycol and possibly one or two others —into the resolution as amendments at the time we are in committee. And, sir, we will give the house notice of any such resolution in the normal way.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Does the minister care to answer my first question with the word "and" deleted?

Mr. Harris: The answer I gave yesterday was that these negotiations are secret.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RADAR WARNING LINES—COST—CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Arising out of the action of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in tabling these agreements between the United States and Canada, is the minister in a position to advise what is Canada's proportionate share of the cost, in respect of the distant early warning line, the mid-continent line and the "Pinetree" line? What is Canada's proportion of the expenditures being made, and in the construction work done by the United States to what degree is Canadian sovereignty maintained?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give the exact proportions of cost borne by the two countries in respect of the three lines, because the total cost has not yet been determined. However, I might make a short statement on the point raised by my hon. friend in the last part of his question.

Hon. members will recall that the statement on the over-all joint Canada-United States warning system, published as appendix B to Hansard of February 22, 1955, emphasized that experience has shown that projects of this nature can be carried out most effectively by vesting responsibility for all phases of the work of construction and installation in a single authority. Accordingly it had been agreed that Canada would construct the mid-Canada warning line and the United States the distant early warning line.

Inquiries of the Ministry

This exchange of notes establishes conditions which will enable the United States to build the distant early warning line as rapidly as possible in the interests of the defence of the two countries. At the same time it preserves the principle enunciated in the joint declaration of February 12, 1947, on defence co-operation, that all co-operative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its own territory. In particular the agreement provides for the effective participation by Canada in the operation of the distant early warning system, the character of such participation to be determined on the basis of studies to be carried out during the construction phase. These studies are already under way, but I should point out that they will not be completed for a considerable time and for the present there is nothing to be added to the statement made by the Prime Minister on the matter in this house on February 22 last.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there anything secret about the cost of the mid-continent line, or the McGill fence, which is being constructed by Canada? Now that we know that the cost is being borne by Canada, what is to be the total cost of this line?

Mr. Pearson: As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing secret about the cost of the mid-continent line, which is being borne by Canada, but I have not the figures. Indeed I am not sure whether the total figures are available yet, because all the costs of construction are not known. There is nothing secret about the matter, however, and as soon as the costs are known they can be made available to the house.

TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, based on his speech of April 5 at page 2739 of Hansard. Has he any words of comfort or advice to give to the car dealers of the country in the matter of a rebate of excise taxes on stocks then on hand?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered the question, perhaps not adequately, in the answer I gave the other day in reply to the request of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

[Mr. Pearson.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MELVILLE, SASK., ACCIDENTS—INQUIRY AS TO SPECIAL PRECAUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport. Have investigations been made into the two accidents which occurred on the Canadian National main line near Melville, Saskatchewan? If so, have any special precautions been taken to prevent further accidents?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is out of town today on official business. The intention of the hon. member to ask this question was brought to my notice as I was coming into the chamber. Since it is necessary to obtain part of the required information from the management of the company in Montreal, I am taking this as notice.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

173. Departmental administration, $685,605.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening we were discussing resolution 173. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, before this resolution is carried I have just a few remarks to make concerning the debate of yesterday. It is not often that a cabinet minister is described by members of the opposition as being sympathetic. That fine word was used yesterday with reference to the Minister of Labour. The greatest tribute paid to him by hon. members who engaged in the discussion was the friendliness of that discussion. For the first time during the session the matter of unemployment was considered objectively, with a view to bringing relief to the unemployed. I am not going to refer to all the speeches that were made, but all members seemed to be in good disposition and made many useful suggestions for the improvement of labour conditions throughout the country.

I believe the real advisory council and the real board of inquiry is just this House of Commons. Hon. members belonging to all parties, who are familiar with conditions in their own constituencies and in the country at large, are in a much better position to offer suggestions and perhaps are better qualified than supposed economic experts or even judges. I sympathize with the minister because so many suggestions have been made, and naturally he must make a choice. That will take a little time, because the more suggestions that are made, the more time it will take to make a selection.

The hon. lady member for Hamilton West suggested that the advisory council should resume its activities. Then the Leader of the Opposition followed her and suggested that a board of inquiry should be set up. The two suggestions are entirely different. I was surprised to hear one suggestion being made by the labour expert of the official opposition and the other by the Leader of the Opposition himself. They should discuss things together before making such pronouncements, in order to present a united front to the House of Commons.

I have always advocated that members of parliament should have the widest possible opportunities not only to make suggestions but to make recommendations to the government. This can be done in many ways, but it can be done particularly at the meetings of the industrial relations committee, where members of all parties gather to study labour problems and the labour situation at large.

Besides what may be said to him by members of the House of Commons, the minister has the advantage of having an organization in his own department dealing with these matters. I refer to the unemployment insurance commission, which has offices spread right across the country. They report not only on unemployment but also on employment. My personal experience, and this must be the experience of my colleagues, has been that the work done by the employment offices is most useful, not only to the government because of the information conveyed to them but mainly to those who are without work and who obtain employment through the services of the employment branch of the unemployment insurance commission.

Some years ago those engaged in lumbering did not come under the unemployment insurance commission. Some hon. members, and I was one of the first to join with them, insisted that these men should enjoy the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It has worked out that way. The former minister of labour listened to our requests and made a favourable decision; therefore in my constituency there are many people who enjoy the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act when they are engaged in the lumbering business.

It is precisely on account of that fact that the number of unemployed has increased. It is to be regretted, of course, but it is due to the seasonal nature of the occupation, and those men, with their families, are very fortunate in getting the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act when they are out of work. I am most appreciative of what is done by the Minister of Labour for them.

Along with other members I have the responsibility of dealing with quite a large correspondence. When those men expect an answer from the unemployment insurance commission and it does not come as soon as they would like, they write their member of parliament in order that he may put pressure on the bureau to see that they get what is due them as soon as possible, because they are in great need. Then the member of parliament writes on their behalf to the unemployment insurance office, to the chief commissioner of the unemployment insurance commission, or to the minister, in order to give them satisfaction. It gives us an opportunity to familiarize ourselves with those problems. I do not complain about it, though it represents a good deal of work.

Without deprecating the speeches that were made by all the hon. members who spoke yesterday, I wish to say that the hon. gentleman who has put his finger on the spot is the hon. member for Cape Breton South. He said yesterday that unemployment was due in large measure to automation. He defined it, at page 3919 of yesterday's Hansard, as "the displacement of man by the machine". It is true. At the time we discussed the matter before the railway and shipping committee some years ago it was very unfortunate that some miners in Nova Scotia were deprived of work because of the dieselization of the Canadian National Railways. That was due to new machines.

At that time I joined the hon. member for Cape Breton South in protesting against that measure because I thought the old locomotives, which were good enough to haul large numbers of cars from coast to coast, were still of use, and it was important that they should burn coal in order to provide work for the miners of Nova Scotia, who deserve a lot of sympathy. But it was decided that the company had to go ahead with the times, that it was important to have diesel locomotives and to lay aside the good old iron horses that had done such a good job. This is one case where many good men of the railway were laid off. Some of them were transferred elsewhere, and some became unemployed.

There are many causes for unemployment. I do not intend to mention them all today. I mention only a few of which I have personal knowledge. For instance, in my county we have a branch of Canadian Arsenals Limited. Work there depends on the contracts that are given to the company for the manufacture of munitions. When peace is advocated throughout the world it is only natural that the manufacture of munitions will decrease accordingly. We cannot have peace and war at the same time. Most of the munitions were sold to other countries, and when contracts expired it was only natural that the number of men employed should be reduced. It is very unfortunate, but this is the way it works. I understand quite well that it was not the fault of the government. There again I am in a difficult situation. I have explained it to the men, who understand it is much better to make progress toward peace than to have a war that would destroy homes and people and leave the country in a complete mess.

There is the question of good understanding between employer and employee. In that regard a very apt suggestion was made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and I am the happier to mention it because he is not in the chamber at the present time. He suggested that industrial councils be established for various industries, in the same fashion as there are councils in the building trades.

This is a very good suggestion. The government cannot impose drastic conditions of employment on employers. It cannot be done. Employers must show good faith and a willingness to co-operate with the staff and personnel of their organizations. To me it was one of the ablest suggestions offered during the discussion yesterday. The same thing exists already in the building trades, and it is satisfactory. Why not use it in other industries?

It cannot be done tomorrow. It will take some time to do it. Persuasion must be used to make both parties understand the situation and finally come to an understanding that would be for the benefit of the country. But if employers were aroused against employees, if the employers were to believe that the employees' requests were extravagant, it could not work. I hope there will be good understanding between the employers and the employees in all branches of industry in this country. I am sure the best man to bring about such a happy conclusion is the Minister of Labour himself. He has done so much.

If we look at the estimates we see all the items that are mentioned under the Department of Labour. It is quite astounding to see all that is done by this department, including vocational training and all that sort of thing. I wish the minister good luck and I know the future will not be as dark as it was painted at the beginning of the session, because there must be peace on earth to men of good will.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Bell: Most of the remarks on this first item, Mr. Chairman, have followed the general pattern of praise for the department in various degrees and then suggestions, also I suppose in various degrees. I should like to say that I personally recognize that the labour department has been going through rather strenuous times these last few years, with the unemployment situation as it is and with the increase in legislation that has been necessary. I feel that these extra duties are being handled in very fine fashion, and a word of praise from me along the lines I mentioned earlier is in order.

So far as suggestions go I have one personal gripe against the department, and if the few remarks I propose to make could be considered as suggestions I should like to just leave them with the house. I say there is a great tendency in Canada, on the part of the labour department and the other groups and associations who compile statistics of various kinds in connection with labour, to consider the over-all national picture too much and leave out the regional aspect. It is a recognized fact that unemployment is regional. There are many other phases that affect the labour department which have also been unanimously considered as regional. Naturally I have a personal gripe, in that the maritimes and the Atlantic regions, which have very particular and peculiar problems with respect to labour, are being ill-considered in this respect.

Having said that I believe we are getting away from the regional aspect to a certain extent in our consideration of labour and its problems in Canada, I should like to reflect on some of these small matters in the maritimes which I feel present a particular regional aspect as contrasted with any sort of national study that might be presented by the department and these other agencies.

First of all, I suggest that we have a particular problem of low wages in the maritimes. In a recent issue of the Financial Post figures were given showing wages in the construction industry and pointing out that they are climbing. The table setting out these figures is divided into the principal metropolitan areas in Canada, showing the various trades as well as unskilled labour. I am not going to put these figures on record because I am embarrassed by the low wages that are listed for Halifax and Saint John. If hon. members will just take my word for the fact that the figures are so low I am embarrassed to put them on the record, that will serve to illustrate my point.

Second, I should like to refer to the older citizens who are coming into a position of increasing importance in our life today. The problems of people over 45 who are attempting to obtain work are well known to everybody. The older people in the Atlantic region are a definite problem, even more than in the central region, because jobs for which they are fitted are not available. Such jobs as night watchman and other supervisory jobs are only connected with large industry and large buildings which, as a result of our small-scale economy, are not found in that region.

Third, I think the fishermen present a definite regional problem. They are now being considered for unemployment insurance. While I do not wish to go into that question, I feel that any arguments concerning the administrative difficulties that would prevent any sort of unemployment insurance being extended to these fishermen should not weigh too heavily. These fishermen will always be in small organizations, and they will be in various areas. There is no possible chance there will ever be a great concentration of them.

The coal industry of the maritimes is another industry that needs special consideration. It definitely presents a regional problem. I believe it is today that a meeting is taking place in Halifax, to which reference has already been made in this debate, in an attempt to alleviate this situation.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to the general geographic conditions that would make the labour situation in the maritimes, and its interrelated fields, a special consideration. I would mention briefly the immobility of labour that exists down our way, and the difficulties that have to be considered in this respect. I refer also to the small markets that exist in this region, and the tremendous drawback that factor is to any attempts at manufacturing in that area.

Having said that we have these various regional problems, and having said that I feel the various people who compile labour statistics are not giving us adequate consideration from a strictly regional standpoint, I throw out these few suggestions to the department and other groups that may, in the future, compile such statistics.

First of all I feel that we always seem to wait too long before attempting to catch up with a problem. There are two very good examples of this in New Brunswick that are of recent date. I refer to the Marysville textile shut-down of two years ago, at which time we lost one of the main industries in our community. When the mill was finally shut down, through the combined efforts of provincial, federal and local authorities it was possible to relocate most of the workers through a vocational training plan.

I feel that the situation in this case has been righted to some extent. But why was it that we had to wait until the thing had dragged on and dislocated so many people? Why could not plans have been made in advance to meet this special problem, a problem which was really unique, though I realize that other textile plants have been closed down in Canada. I doubt, however, if there have been many other cases in which a community has been dependent upon one mill.

I would refer also to the Milltown textile mill which, as hon. members may know, has been able to continue in the area due to some sort of unique co-operative plan. It has been another experiment, and I believe a fairly successful one. However, their production is not what it was.

The various co-operative measures of all authorities have been appreciated. I suggest that here are two regional matters that could have been dealt with, and concerning which plans could have been made. It was not necessary to wait until a difficult situation developed. Plans and research could have been carried out long ago to cope with these problems.

It would be interesting to have a statement from the Minister of Labour about these two matters when he sums up in closing the debate, because I think they are unique experiments in Canada and we could probably get some helpful information if we knew just what had been done. Incidentally, vocational training grants were very helpful in Marysville. We hope that any reduction in the estimates will not affect these regions in the Atlantic provinces, which depend so much upon assistance of this kind.

Then I would refer to the various articles, particularly those dealing with research, compiled by the Department of Labour. I have before me a most commendable article dealing with labour research to which reference has been made by other speakers. This is prepared by the Canadian Congress of Labour, and I seem to detect in it the hand of Mr. Forsey. It purports to be a survey of economic trends in the Atlantic provinces. This work is startling and revealing, and I suggest that perhaps officials in the Department of Labour might work along similar lines. It may be that they have done research work that is just as good, dealing with regional aspects of the matter, but I must say they have not come to my attention. I just mention this in a friendly way.

Then I noticed in the press a few days ago that on the occasion of his trip to Nova Scotia to accept an honorary degree at Acadia University the Minister of Finance referred to the economic survey being planned. He said, and I have no reason to doubt his word, that special consideration will be given to the economic aspects and problems of the Atlantic region. We hope this purpose will be carried out. It serves as an illustration of what I have been saying, that special attention should be paid to the regional aspect of the matter.

Then I have two other points in mind. I believe many will agree when I say there should be closer co-operation among various departments of government. This lack of co-operation has a particularly unfortunate effect on labour when one considers that in connection with such matters as immigration and labour, for example, there are so many overlapping duties and responsibilities. Yet we do not know of any co-ordination between these branches of government. I imagine that there is a considerable amount of co-operation; but surely the time has arrived when we must really get together. If this were done it would eliminate much of the trouble we now have in connection with the distribution of immigrants.

For instance, it was only a few days ago that the hon. member for Quebec West referred to the surplus labour force available at Seven Islands. I am not saying anyone is responsible for this; I am simply pointing out that if there had been a close liaison between the immigration branch and the Department of Labour this condition at Seven Islands might have been avoided. It would seem that this is another suggestion falling within the ambit of those special duties which, it seems to me, rest with the Department of Labour.

Then it would seem that there could be closer co-operation between the Department of Finance and the Department of Labour. I was interested reading the other day in a United States newspaper about a method used in the United States to eliminate labour surplus areas. I do not know whether it would be possible to implement such a plan in Canada but, briefly, in the United States it appears that groups interested in finance and labour are charged with the responsibility of getting together and making decisions as to whether certain areas are labour surplus areas. The labour surplus condition could develop from a local economic condition, such as the shutting down of an industry, or for some other reason. Under this scheme, when an area is declared labour surplus it is given official assistance by the federal authority. In this way defence and other industries can locate where labour surplus is in evidence, and thus receive federal assistance.

I would like to apply that principle to the maritime provinces and, in particular, to the situation at Marysville. At that point there was a shut-down of industry, and a special problem developed. However, a very skilful labour surplus was available there. Why would it not have been possible for some other industry to come in and make use of that labour surplus? I suggest, further, that it might have been possible for the department to work out with the Department of Finance some scheme of special tax concessions, perhaps involving amortization over a period of 20 years and permitted as a deduction from the federal taxes imposed on an industry.

Had such an inducement been offered an industry may have been able to come in and locate. As the situation stands today the municipality must bear the responsibility. It must offer various tax concessions and assessment relief and, as we know, the municipalities cannot afford special assistance at that time. I do urge, therefore, that there be closer contact and co-operation among departments of government.

There is one further matter I would discuss with the minister, and that is the matter of local advisory committees. We have in Canada many complex problems in local areas. In that connection I think immediately of the national harbours board, which today is big business. With the approval of the department, local advisory committees are being set up in the different ports to advise the permanent officials as to local needs and plans. I understand that for some time there have been local advisory employment committees in various areas of Canada.

I suggest, however, that the responsibility for the organization and co-ordination of these local committees should not be left to the local unemployment insurance officer. The department should make definite plans for co-operation, and should advise how a group could function. I realize that there may be some interdepartmental advice and assistance in this connection, but I do feel there should be a greater measure of guidance and co-operation. For instance, recently the department published an interesting and useful booklet on the subject of older workers, setting out the problems of this group. I believe that publication was well received and probably was helpful in assisting those charged with the responsibility of looking after those workers.

In conclusion I should like to refer to an article to sort of tie in the suggestions I have made. The article is entitled "This Changing Canada". It is taken from Canadian Business, published by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and is dated May, 1955. It is mainly concerned with industrial growth and manufacturing, and was written by Richard L. Edsall. He is referring to employment in manufacturing and the increases that have taken place across Canada, and says:

> Going 'way back, of course, you find a sharply different picture. In 1870, when the first Canadian census was taken, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick employed 13 per cent of the country's factory workers; by 1952 this figure was only about 4 per cent. Even more surprising, those maritime provinces had a greater number of manufacturing employees in 1870 than they had 69 years later, in 1939. In the same 69 years, manufacturing employment in Quebec rose to 330 per cent of the 1870 level, and in Ontario to 365 per cent. The 1870 figures are not completely comparable with later ones, but even so they show in startling relief both the relative and absolute decline of manufacturing in the maritimes.

Further on, Mr. Speaker, the author has this to say:

> This points up, once again, the need to study regional as well as over-all national changes. It may be clear enough on a national scale, for instance, that the food and beverage industries have slipped in relative importance. But if you unthinkingly assume that this applies more or less equally to all areas including the maritimes and prairies, you will miss seeing the true impact that this industry's rate of growth can have locally.

I leave that with the minister and his department. I should just like to say that the economic picture in the maritimes is very good. We are quite optimistic about the future. But I do feel that some of our modes of life and regional considerations, particularly labour, must be given that extra help we need to put us back on a very good national footing.

Mr. Philpott: I have no intention of holding up the passing of this item, but I wish to take a few minutes chiefly to correct the history of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Before I spend a few moments on the history of the Leader of the Opposition, may I take a minute or two to congratulate him on his fine television performance last night. It was as expert a performance as I have seen, at least since I saw the Minister of Fisheries a week or so ago. If they both keep on improving they will soon be in the class of Anne Francis, who is also very photogenic.

The history of the Leader of the Opposition that I particularly want to refer to was not so much the particular point he made last night, but rather the remarkable statement he made the other day that the Conservative party in Canada was entirely responsible for bringing about confederation. That amazed me for two reasons; first because of where I sit in this house, and second as a former associate editor of the Toronto Globe, I am sure that particular statement would have been news indeed to the founder of that paper, the late Hon. George Brown. Therefore I want to suggest in all kindliness that I hope the next time we have a party in the railway committee room I shall have the privilege of pointing out to the Leader of the Opposition that sitting right in the middle of the fathers of confederation is Hon. George Brown, who certainly was not a member of the Conservative party. If I remember correctly, the reason the Conservative party for about 60 years used the title "Liberal Conservative party" was the contribution made by the Liberals as well as the Conservatives to the confederation of Canada.

I do not intend to go into the rather remarkable version of history given yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in regard to the Winnipeg strike. I happen to know a great deal about that strike, because I had partly written a novel about it. I think it was about the worst novel ever written in Canada. It was so bad I threw it away. In any event, I had to do a lot of studying of the Winnipeg strike to write it.

Without labouring the point, apart from the fine speech I mentioned in the house yesterday, made by the dean of the house, the hon. member for Quebec South, if the hon. member will look at the speech made by the uncle of the present member for the Magdalen islands, the late Lucien Cannon, he will see that the version of history he gave yesterday was certainly not complete. There were voices raised in the house at that time about the mistakes that were made.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit an interjection?

Mr. Philpott: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: I went only so far as to say that on June 6, 1919, there was no opposition offered by the Liberal party. That was the only point being discussed at that time.

Mr. Philpott: I welcome that interjection. It is because I know the hon. gentleman opposite has such a high regard for accuracy that I did not think it was a good thing that a mistaken impression should go into the records of this house.

Mr. Dufresne: On a question of privilege, I should like to remind the hon. member that when he spoke of the late Hon. Lucien Cannon as being the member for the Magdalen islands, he never was.

Mr. Boisvert: No; you should listen more carefully.

Mr. Philpott: I may tell the hon. member for Quebec West that I was referring to the uncle of the present member for the Magdalen islands.

There are two other points I wish to discuss for a minute or two, Mr. Chairman. The first is to give what support I can to the very eloquent plea made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, namely for a study of ways and means to help fit into the Canadian picture the people who have got beyond the age when they find it easy to get steady employment. That is something which should be close to the hearts and should be engaging the minds of all members in this house. The second point is to give very definitely qualified support, strictly qualified support, to the recommendation made not long ago by the hon. member for Spadina, with whom I almost always agree, on the question of a study of the guaranteed annual wage. I say I give it qualified support because one of the reasons I believe it should be very carefully studied is that I am by no means convinced that the guaranteed annual wage, as it has been advocated so far in Canada, would be on balance a good thing for all ordinary working people in Canada.

Perhaps it could become a good thing for certain industries. On another occasion some time ago the hon. member for Hamilton West referred to the stop and go system in the manufacture of railway cars. Perhaps through better planning and more systematic purchasing by the two railways we could have something more in the nature of steady employment, which in turn would help to give in effect a guaranteed annual wage. It does seem to me that in any industry where the workers and the management could get together and could show how, by stabilizing employment, they could cut costs and give consumers of Canada products at lower prices, then of course you could justify the guaranteed annual wage on that basis.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say that the great danger I see is the rather indiscriminate and unstudied advocacy of the guaranteed annual wage as a mere slogan. I would think any large employer of labour in Canada who was compelled to accept the principle of a guaranteed annual wage when he felt it was not in his own interests to do so, who was compelled to keep on his payroll all year round a certain number of workers whether or not they could be profitably employed, would feel inclined to cut back or drastically reduce the number of workers he would retain on his payroll.

I am not stating that as my studied conclusion. I am simply stating it as a reason for urging upon the Minister of Labour that before too long a proper body be set up to study all the effects of the guaranteed annual wage. I for one do not believe we will ever get ahead in this country if this guaranteed annual wage is brought about as a result of the coercion of one side or the other in industry. I do not believe in the coercion of workers, and in the state of society in which we live I do not believe in the coercion of the people who provide employment. I think a guaranteed annual wage would be a great mistake unless it was shown to the employer as well as to the worker that it was to their mutual interest.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, obviously the discussion on the first item of the estimates of the Minister of Labour has opened up quite a wide field of debate. Naturally I am tempted to pursue the line which has just been followed by the hon. member for Vancouver South with reference to what he has termed as the guaranteed annual wage but which I think is being more aptly termed in some quarters as the guaranteed employment year. The danger he mentioned of a cut-back in productive activity is undoubtedly an important consideration in that connection. I was pleased to note that this was a subject for considerable study in the research carried on by the U.A.W. union. If the hon. member has not studied some of their proposals I commend them to his attention.

At the beginning of his remarks the hon. member for Vancouver South gave us another chapter in the history lesson we have had during the course of this debate. I do not intend to participate in that history lesson, but I am rather tempted to move for a few moments into the realm of philosophy which was being pursued last night by the hon. member for Prince Albert. Those hon. members who heard his remarks will recall that at the beginning of his speech the hon. member gave us quite a philosophical discourse upon the ramifications of the industrial revolution as it affected employment. He referred to some remarks that had been made earlier by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. The hon. member for Prince Albert had this to say in part, and I quote from page 3939 of Hansard of May 19 as follows:

> While each generation fears that mechanization will reduce employment, each generation in succession has found that while mechanization has expanded to a degree beyond the belief of anyone of even 50 years ago, nonetheless employment has been extending by the extending field of other production.

The hon. member had prefaced that general statement by suggesting that he felt the hon. member for Cape Breton South had but repeated a rather old fear which has always been with men since the beginning of the industrial revolution, that as inventiveness makes possible a greater production it also brings about a continued and extensive unemployment.

I would venture to suggest that when it comes to making a philosophical analysis of our industrial society the hon. member for Cape Breton South penetrated just as far into those implications as did the hon. member for Prince Albert. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is quite aware that over the course of years new fields of productivity have been opened up. I think that problem was very much in his mind, and I should like to quote his words as recorded on page 3919 of Hansard, as follows:

> Within the next few years we are going to find that automation will be putting more and more men on the street and we will be faced with the problem of retraining men for some other gainful occupation.

Earlier the hon. member had posed the question of whether man was going to be master of the machine or the machine master of man. It would appear to me that in that statement and in his reference to the need of retraining the men who are going to be replaced he was pointing out to this house that in the process of the industrial transformation which is proceeding, as he suggested at an ever-increasing pace, we must not lose sight of what that process has done and is doing to the human beings who are involved. That seemed to me more to the point in a discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Labour than to ramble into philosophical generalities indulged in by the hon. member for Prince Albert. Unless the Minister of Labour and every hon. member of this house are concerned with what is happening to the human beings involved, an expanding productivity does not mean a great deal.

I shall pursue this matter only to the point of using one illustration of how we cannot disregard the effect this changing technology has on the lives of human beings. An event took place in my own district within the last year or two. At various times there was a suggestion in the local press that the Department of National Defence had plans to build something like 100 houses to provide accommodation for the personnel of the air station. The fact that this was in contemplation was a matter of great interest to those concerned in the construction trades. As these reports continued they anticipated, and I would say quite rightly, that when that construction project was undertaken they would have an opportunity for employment. As individuals they may have qualified for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, and as people with homes in that district they naturally made their plans according to the prospects. Rather than leave their homes and go to some distant part of the country they said, "We will stick it out; we have this prospect of a period of useful employment before us, and we are going to stay put."

Then a decision was made that these houses were not to be built directly under the auspices of the government, but rather that a plan setting up a limited dividend housing corporation would be the best way to deal with that situation. I am not suggesting at the moment that was not the best way of dealing with that particular situation, but the point I am trying to make is that once that step was taken the opportunity for employment in that area where this action had been anticipated suddenly vanished into thin air. It was announced that the houses were going to be erected as prefabs, and that the prefabs were going to come from another part of the country.

That is an example in a small way of the unnecessary uncertainty which individual workingmen have to face as the technology of production changes. Somehow or other it should have been possible for those men to have been forewarned that their prospective means of livelihood was going to be whisked out from underneath them because of another method of housing production. The fact that it may be a more efficient and economical method of housing production is small comfort to those tradesmen, who because of that situation have lost some work at wages that would have enabled them to live in comfort and decency. That is the kind of problem I, as a member of this house, have in the back of my mind.

I heard the hon. member for Cape Breton South suggesting the need for retraining, and I would add the words "and reorientation", of the working people of this country to meet these changing conditions. One of our responsibilities in this house is to apply our minds and our thoughts to how that can be done, and that is one of the responsibilities which we hope the Minister of Labour and his department will be increasingly willing to assume as time goes on.

This debate has gone on at some length, and I intend at this time to mention only one other point. I should like to add a few words in support of what was suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in respect to the need for consideration of a wider coverage, tied in with unemployment insurance, for unemployment resulting from illness. I suggest that increasingly the normal pattern for coverage against loss of income from sickness is becoming closely allied to the pattern which has been followed under our unemployment insurance plan. I know that in the area from which I come a very large number of workers are covered for that purpose by various local arrangements between employers and employees and various insurance companies. The pattern in its application is very close to that of the present unemployment insurance plan. Employer and employee each contributes half the cost of that plan; the premium is paid by a payroll deduction, and benefits payable are in many instances somewhat comparable to those which are made out of the unemployment insurance fund. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is becoming increasingly evident that a much more logical, efficient and economical arrangement would be to have that type of coverage closely allied with our present unemployment insurance arrangements on a national scale.

I have heard the Minister of Labour discuss and advocate the need for greater mobility of labour in this country. I suggest that one of the greatest disadvantages of the present type of plan which covers people for loss of income through sickness is that it tends to make labour more immobile, that a man is not able to move from one employer to another without losing the coverage for sickness that he may have enjoyed in his former employment. The only logical way such a plan can be developed is through some such agency as we have in our unemployment insurance commission.

I suggest that there is really no great reason why any serious objection to that development should come from the employing interests. I know on a good many occasions I have heard people in management, particularly in the office end of management, complaining about the time-consuming efforts in which they have to engage in order to make the multiplicity of payroll deductions involved. Here is a manner in which great economies, taken in total, could be effected. All deductions and all arrangements and correspondence involved could be combined and simplified to bring about a broader basis of coverage, both for unemployment through loss of a job and unemployment because of sickness. These two could be combined in one simple deduction plan that would cover workers not only in a particular firm at a particular time but also wherever they might be called upon to go in the course of finding useful work within our Canadian economy.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, as we all know, each month the dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Labour issue a news release showing the unemployment for the previous month. In May, 1953, this release was made on the 20th day of the month. In May, 1954, the release was made on the 19th day of the month. Last month, April, the release was made on the 19th day of the month. Today is the 20th day of May, and there has been no sign—

An hon. Member: Yesterday was a holiday.

Mr. Hees: —of the appearance of any news release showing unemployment in April. The material that goes into these news releases is available for several days before the news release is made. If you look at the news release, you will see the heading states that it is to be made available at ten a.m. on a certain date. The material is not just made available on that date, of course; it is known several days before, and there is no doubt that the Department of Labour is familiar with that figure today.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe we are entitled to ask why this release has not been made public. I think it is for the same reason that consideration of the estimates of this department was pushed forward ahead of the estimates of the Post Office Department, so the government could try to get the labour discussion out of the way before it became necessary to publish what are obviously going to be embarrassing figures regarding the unemployment situation.

Seeing that the government does not choose to make these important figures available at the time they should, when this debate is in progress, I think it is only fair that we should examine past figures and try to estimate what the figure is likely to be. If you examine the figures for the past three years you will notice there is a fairly consistent pattern of increases and decreases in unemployment, as employment ebbs and flows during the periods of relatively high and low employment in these years.

Let us take, for example, the first four months of the last two years and compare them. In 1954 unemployment in February increased over January by 7 per cent. This year unemployment in February increased over January by 8 per cent. In 1954 unemployment in March increased over February by 2 per cent. This year unemployment in March increased over February by 3 per cent. So you will see there is a fairly consistent pattern month by month, and it holds good if you go back several years.

In 1954 unemployment in April decreased from the March figure by 3½ per cent. In estimating what the figure may be for April of this year, I think it is fair to assume that as unemployment increased this year at a slightly greater rate for the two previous months, it would decrease at a slightly greater rate than last year for the month of April. Therefore, instead of assuming that unemployment would decrease from March at the same rate as last year, 3½ per cent, I think it is fair to assume it would decrease by 4½ per cent from March. Applying that figures to the March unemployment figure of 633,000, I arrive at an estimated unemployment figure for April of 605,000.

That is the situation, Mr. Chairman, which I believe the government are most anxious to hide. They are most anxious to hide it because they described the unemployment situation as merely seasonal and regional in referring to it in the speech from the throne. When the suggestion was made to the Minister of Labour that he might extend supplementary benefits beyond April 15 his reply was, "Well, after all, there will not be many unemployed at that time."

As I have pointed out, there are a great many unemployed as of this time, and there were a great many unemployed during the whole winter when the Prime Minister refused to deal with the matter. He brushed it aside as something of no consequence and finally, when he did come to deal with it because of the great pressure brought to bear on him by opposition members of parliament and the provincial premiers, he put forward to the provinces a proposition that can only be termed a cheap substitute for the proposition put forward in 1945 by this same government. It is a cheap substitute put forward by a government which in 1941 and 1945 accepted the principle of federal responsibility for unemployed employables.

The offer put forward by the Prime Minister at the dominion-provincial conference is very inadequate, because it places far too heavy a load on the provincial and municipal levels of government, which do not have the sources of taxation available to bear these very heavy costs.

I think the most important thing of all in the handling of the unemployment situation by the government to date is the fact that the government has refused to make any attempt to meet the need of providing more jobs in the country today. If the government refuses to face this need, then it is up to opposition members of parliament to make suggestions in the hope that perhaps in a year or two, after the government is sure that no credit will accrue to the opposition for such suggestions, they might possibly be adopted.

Let us look at the possibilities in this country for increasing job opportunities. We live in a country that can produce enough food to support several times our present population. We have almost limitless sources of hydroelectric power, coal, oil, natural gas, and uranium from which we can produce atomic energy. We have also almost limitless supplies of timber, iron ore, copper, zinc, lead, nickel and practically every other mineral that is used in manufacturing industries today. Yet for some unknown reason we in this country seem perfectly satisfied to ship most of our mineral wealth out of the country in its raw state, and buy back much of it in the form of finished articles which have been processed in other countries, thereby giving employment to foreign workmen.

I think it is about time we asked ourselves why we do not process far more of our raw materials right here in Canada and provide jobs for Canadian workmen, instead of being content to go on month after month with unemployment figures in excess of 600,000 and not be willing to face the fact that something must be done about this critical situation. You cannot keep on passing it off, as the government seem determined to do, as something of no consequence, something which is merely, to use their own words, seasonal and regional.

In addition to the raw materials we have right here in Canada, and the almost limitless sources of power of one kind or another, we also have large supplies of capital; and we have proved we can attract it from outside. We also have the supply of brains necessary to make an important industrial expansion possible. Why do we not do something about it? I am going to make some suggestions to the government as to what they can do to get this thing moving.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, we must realize that in a free country we cannot simply issue a command and have industrial expansion start. The government must create an attractive economic atmosphere within the country or new industries will not be started and present industries will simply not expand. You cannot just command them to do it. Unless we do create an attractive economic atmosphere in the country we are going to continue to be primarily a producer of raw materials to be shipped out of the country to provide work in foreign factories for foreign workmen, and then buy back many of these finished products in Canada. That, to me is the ultimate in stupidity.

What should we do to create this attractive economic atmosphere? I am going to make five suggestions to the government, and I think they are practical suggestions. First of all, to encourage new industries to start and present industries to expand, I say we must make it easier for new industries to show their first profit. We can do that if we will reduce taxation on the first profits an industry makes.

As a suggestion, I urge that on the first $20,000 of profit, before taxes, we reduce the rate of tax from the present 18 per cent to 15 per cent, and raise the ceiling from $20,000 to $25,000. I believe the fact that the present rate of tax jumps, from 18 per cent on up to $20,000, to 47 per cent on the next $1,000 of profit is a severe handicap to the expansion of small industry. I believe the government would induce a great many small industries to expand beyond their present limits by making the increase beyond the top of the lower bracket, at the present time $20,000, to up to say $50,000 at an even rate instead of making a sudden jump to 47 per cent.

It is obvious that if two men who are in business are making $20,000 today, who by taking some chance could expand, find that by doing so they will have to give the government half of the next $1,000 they earn, they will go on producing at the same rate and not expand. However, if there were a steady rate of increase in taxation from say $20,000 up to $50,000 it would encourage the expansion of small industries which might turn into big industries.

Second, I suggest we make it possible to sell more goods, both here and abroad, by lowering our costs as a result of the reduction of sales taxes by at least 25 per cent. The government argue that this cannot be done because there will be a loss of revenue. Any businessman knows, Mr. Chairman, that if his cost is so high that he is losing business it becomes advantageous to him to reduce his selling price to the point where people will buy considerably more of his goods. He knows that the greater volume of goods sold, multiplied by a smaller unit profit will, if it is properly worked out, give him larger total net returns than formerly. In the same way, if we reduce the cost of the goods we sell by reducing our sales and excise taxes materially, it will make it possible to sell more goods. The larger volume of goods sold, multiplied by a smaller unit tax, may, I believe, very easily equal or exceed the present total tax revenue.

[Mr. Hees.]

The third suggestion I make is that we should make a really worth-while reduction in income taxes. The last income tax reduction was simply a token reduction. It amounted to less than 25 cents per week for a married man with two children earning the average income for Canada. Such a reduction is not going to do very much by way of stimulating sales or plant expansion. It is not going to make people rush out and buy goods or expand their plant.

I suggest that a substantial reduction in income tax be made in the interests of making it possible for people to buy more goods. If people buy more goods, more goods will be produced; more people will be employed producing those goods, and the government will be collecting more tax revenue on more goods sold. The government will also receive more income taxes as a result of more people being employed, instead of paying those people unemployment insurance benefits or direct relief. It is simply a matter of dollars and cents arithmetic in which this government seems unwilling to indulge.

The fourth suggestion I make is that we should reduce the risk involved in starting new enterprises by doubling the rate of depreciation on plant and equipment. If a man who is thinking of going into a new enterprise, which he believes is perhaps risky, knows that his money is only going to be tied up for half the length of time it would otherwise be, he will be more likely to take the chance. We have to make it attractive for people to put money into new enterprises. We cannot force people to invest money and start new enterprises. Unless people are willing to invest money, new enterprises simply will not get started.

The fifth suggestion I make is that we make it easier to sell our goods to other countries, and to attract tourists to Canada, by stabilizing our dollar with the United States dollar.

As I have said, the government claims that taxes cannot be reduced because that would result in a loss of revenue. I say the only way we are going to solve this unemployment problem, the only way we are going to make it possible for Canadians who want to work to have productive jobs, is to create economic conditions in this country which will make it attractive for people to start new enterprises, and for people who are in small enterprises to expand. Unless people want to do these things they will not be done and our country will remain primarily a producer of raw materials which will be shipped out of the country to provide employment for people elsewhere.

When speaking last September the Prime Minister said that if the government was not smart enough to arrange its affairs so everybody could have a job, then it was incompetent. Having made some suggestions here today in a very serious frame of mind, to which I hope the government will give serious consideration, I believe that by following these suggestions the government could cure the incompetence which the Prime Minister, on their behalf, has admitted exists today.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. He has suggested reducing income taxes substantially, and reducing sales taxes. Where would he get some revenue to enable the government to carry on its business?

Mr. Hees: I have tried, Mr. Chairman, to explain to the hon. member for Fort William and other members in the house how this would be accomplished, but I shall do it again. If you are making a limited volume of sales because your costs are high—this is the sort of thing any businessman has to calculate every day of the year—then you must reduce your costs and increase your sales. I am suggesting that by lowering the sales tax materially we would lower the cost of the goods we have to sell, thus making them more competitive with the foreign goods that are entering the country today. If we can sell more goods, then we will be able to tax more goods and the greater volume of goods sold multiplied by the smaller unit tax will possibly equal or exceed the present total tax revenue. If you make it possible to sell more goods you have more people employed. Instead of drawing unemployment insurance or direct relief, these people will be earning incomes on which they will be paying income tax, and that would be added revenue to the government.

I suggest that by adopting the ideas I have put forward you will create conditions in the country which will attract capital investment in new enterprises and enable present enterprises to expand, and create a condition in the country which will mean the employment of many more people and the production of a great deal more goods. By so doing we will increase the sources which produce taxes, increase the number of income tax payers and the volume of goods sold, and I believe by careful operation we can in the long run considerably increase our tax take. Surely this is well worth trying.

Mr. McIvor: But it is not so easy.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to a matter which perhaps could be discussed more properly under item 178. However, I shall bring it forward now so the minister may give it consideration during the dinner hour and be in a position to state the government's position.

There is being circulated within the ranks of the government a document which I find stupid and utterly obnoxious, and which conceivably could be used in a wicked way. To my way of thinking it is a document which is quite illegal, because we have passed legislation banning this sort of nonsense. I hold the minister responsible because there is no one else I can hold responsible. In saying that I am not saying I believe for one minute that he has connived at what is going on or, indeed, that he condones it. However, he is responsible to the house for what I consider to be a violation of the law.

Two years ago all parties joined in hailing the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. The minister will remember the acclaim it received and the manner in which is was passed through the house because it filled a need, in the view of many of us. We think, too, that it has proven its usefulness.

I, for one, have never seen any sense in these application forms for employment in which questions are asked concerning the nationality and racial origin of applicants. I have always assumed that a person would be given a job because of his or her inherent ability, and not for any other reason. Now we find that in this act it says in section 4(5):

> No person shall use or circulate any form of application for employment or publish any advertisement in connection with employment or prospective employment or make any written or oral inquiry in connection with employment that expresses either directly or indirectly any limitation, specification or preference as to race, national origin, colour or religion unless the limitation, specification or preference is based upon a bona fide occupational qualification.

That is the law of the land. Yet I have in my hand this document which, I assume, is circulated throughout all departments of government. I make that assumption because no one particular department is named. This purports to be a personal history form. What are the questions asked? They are those which parliament agreed should be banned from such forms.

For instance, the applicant is asked to give his nationality. Yet in the subsection I read that is forbidden. The applicant is here asked to give his racial origin; again the subsection forbids it. Surely the government is not going to continue to violate the statute.

Then the document becomes even more stupid, because on the next page it asks for the names of immediate relatives, wife, husband, sons or daughters over 16. It asks for the names of the father, mother, brothers and sisters, including blood relatives and deceased parents. Then the government wishes to know the country of birth of a deceased parent. The government wishes to know the country of birth of step-relatives and blood relatives. What conceivable use can it make of such information? And if it cannot make use of that information, why ask such stupid questions? If it is going to use the information, then why is it to be used?

After all, what has my father's birthplace to do with my capacity to hold down a job? What has my mother's birthplace to do with my ability to do a job? What has the birthplace of my in-laws to do with my loyalty to Canada? Yet these questions are asked here. And not only are they asked in respect of the applicant, but also his wife—parents, wife or husband, date and country of birth.

I maintain that these questions are utterly unforgivable, in view of the legislation passed by the house and also in view of the protestations made by various members of the government. I bring the matter up because I would like the minister to find out during the dinner hour just what the government's policy is, whether it is going to pay any attention to the statements which were made in parliament two years ago, or whether it is going to continue issuing what I described earlier, and I suggest most correctly, as a stupid and obnoxious document.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the hon. member for Prince Albert is not in his seat, because at the outset of my remarks I want to comment on some expressions he used the other day. I wish I could share his optimism when he suggests that what we are witnessing in our industrial society is merely a repetition of what has happened before, and that the massive displacement of human labour that we see immediately ahead of us carries no more dangerous implications for our society than did the more primitive developments of past years.

I would point out, too, that even during those periods when much slower and much less fundamental changes were taking place, the consequences of which the hon. member for Prince Albert dismisses so cavalierly, there were many thousands of people whose lives were ruined, many thousands of people who faced a complete blank wall so far as earning their livelihood was concerned. It was not a light matter with them.

But today we are facing something much more fundamental and much more important than that. I heard the other day about a plant in Ontario in connection with which it was revealed that a couple of years ago, after all taxes and costs were paid, it had more funds in net profits than were paid out in wages and salaries. This was not because the wages and salaries were low because, in fact, they were not; they were among the highest in industry. It was because the human element of production in that particular industry has become such an unimportant factor.

Out in my own constituency we have a similar development. I want to deal with this in detail, because I think it illustrates the real nature of the problem the government and the people of Canada face today. We have in my constituency one of the largest wood pulp factories on the Pacific coast. A few years ago it was doubled in size. Just before that doubling process took place there was a merger between two very large forest products corporations. At the time the merger took place the company to which I am referring sent a prospectus to all its employees, respecting the two merged companies, explaining their plans for the future. They were very frank about their plans and their financial position, and told their employees they were going to build an addition to the plant at a cost of $17 million. All of this was to be paid out of surplus earnings of the previous few years. They said that when this addition, costing $17 million, was completed, there would be work for 100 more employees.

That, I suggest, gives some idea of the sort of problem we are facing today. When we break this down we find that it represents an investment of $170,000 per man employed. And when we realize that the cost of that investment, and the returns, must be paid by the labour of those employed in the plant, we find this rather startling picture.

The average wage in that industry was at that time $3,600 a year. Each of the 100 workers would have to produce $3,600 worth of wealth to pay his wages, to start with. He would then have to make enough to pay the depreciation on a new plant. If you put that at the very modest figure of 5 per cent for buildings and equipment—and I am quite sure it would be very much more than that—then he would have to produce, in addition to the $3,600 for wages, $8,500 worth of wealth to pay for the depreciation charges. Then presumably there would be some return on the investment, and if you put that at another modest 5 per cent we would have another $8,500. So each of these 100 new workers must produce $20,600 worth of wealth during the year, otherwise that plant cannot function.

I am mentioning this not with any suggestion at all that the workers in that industry are hard done by, or are being exploited or robbed; they are not. They are well paid, and the jobs are not very arduous. But I want to point out the discrepancy between the volume of wealth produced and the volume distributed in wages for its production, which creates for us the most appalling problems for the future.

The developments we have had in the past and the developments we have today differ not merely in degree but actually in kind. I hold in my hand a book published five years ago by Dr. Norbert Wiener, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a man who had a very large part to play in the development of the modern computing "machines of judgment", as they are now called. In this book he has some very interesting comments to make on the effect on society of the sort of machines that are now being produced. He points out that hitherto our technological developments had been confined to replacing human muscle power, or animal muscle power, but now we are producing machines that take over many of the functions of judgment that have hitherto been exercised by human beings.

He has this to say with regard to the completely automatic production unit that he sees for the future, and he suggests that the period that will elapse between the time this book was written five years ago and the time when such completely automatic units of production will become a commonplace in American industry will be from 10 to 15 years, provided we do not get involved in a war, and provided that we survive a war. He points out that if we got engaged in a war there is no doubt whatever that we would have almost a complete automation of industry within five years, from sheer necessity. He puts the figure at about 10 to 15 years. Five of those years have now gone and he has this to say about the effects:

> I have spoken of the actuality and the imminence of this new possibility. What can we expect of its economic and social consequences? In the first place, we can expect an abrupt and final cessation of the demand for the type of factory labour performing purely repetitive tasks. In the long run, the deadly uninteresting nature of the repetitive task may make this a good thing and the source of leisure necessary for man's full cultural development. It may also produce cultural results as trivial and wasteful as the greater part of those so far obtained from the radio and the movies.

Then he has this to say:

> Let us remember that the automatic machine, whatever we think of any feelings it may have or may not have, is the precise economic equivalent of slave labour. Any labour which competes with slave labour must accept the economic conditions of slave labour. It is perfectly clear that this will produce an unemployment situation, in comparison with which the present recession and even the depression of the thirties will seem a pleasant joke. This depression will ruin many industries—possibly even the industries which have taken advantage of the new potentialities. However, there is nothing in the industrial tradition which forbids an industrialist to make a sure and quick profit, and to get out before the crash touches him personally.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is the real nature of the problem we are facing; that it is not merely a temporary displacement of labour and its reabsorption in some other part of our economy. I suggest we are facing something much more fundamental, because hitherto all our assumptions of the way in which we should operate society have been based on this, that every man has to some degree or other something of value to exchange for a livelihood. Maybe he has not very much, and he gets a very poor livelihood.

Today we can see the virtual displacement of the man who has nothing but his untrained muscular power. He is the man who lands on our relief rolls at the first touch of a recession. We are beginning to see the displacement of men with semi-skilled abilities, and now we see right in front of us the imminent certainty of the displacement of men with skilled abilities for whom there is now no opening in our industries in the production of goods and services.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that our Department of Labour should be making a very intensive study of the possible effects of the distribution of goods and services, the distribution of wealth in this country, by the development of these new types of "machines of government", as a French scientist describes them, because it is something entirely new. It is not merely an extension of the old machines we have seen in the past, and it is literally going to bring us to the point where we will have goods produced and no one in receipt of income to consume them.

I was interested the other day to hear the hon. member for Cartier deal with this problem. He obviously realizes as well as anyone that we are faced with the danger of being strangled in the enormous volume of our own production, and our danger lies in the fact that we cannot get it distributed and consumed. His solution was that we should bring more immigrants into the country to consume the goods. That sounds like a reasonable proposition, but unfortunately there is a bit of a catch in it. There was a time when it might have been considered, shall we say, an economic nuisance that people who produced had also to consume; that we had to let the worker have a certain amount or he would die on us and would not be able to produce anything more. Today the picture is completely transformed, and it is a considerable economic nuisance to society that the person who consumes has also to produce. The new immigrant the hon. member for Cartier wants to bring in to absorb the surplus products will, unfortunately, be obliged, by the very conditions under which we operate our society, to himself produce, and add further to the flood of goods.

No, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to find a solution to this problem by the old assumptions. We are not going to find it by the reduction of taxation, by the reduction of income tax and sales tax and exemptions from taxation to encourage new investment. We are up against a fundamental change in our society even more profound than that which began to take place 150 years ago.

I would hope to see the government provide for the Minister of Labour a considerable sum of money to enable him to do necessary research into this problem before we are flooded with a mass of unemployed for whom we have no hope and whose conditions we are unequipped to help. I see the minister smiling agreement with that. I would suggest, however, that when he undertakes this inquiry and this investigation he should not be deterred by the fact that it is going to reveal to him that the old assumptions of free enterprise have gone by the board forever.

Mr. Gregg: I was just smiling at the many demands of yesterday and today that I have the Department of Labour conduct studies on so many matters.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I have a comparatively few words to say. Most of them will be directed to those gloom gatherers over here to my left, because some things have been said in this house in the last couple of days that display such an astonishing lack of confidence in this country of ours and this system of ours that it is about time somebody rose in his place and pointed out some of the weaknesses and fallacies in their arguments. Goodness knows, if we tried to point them all out, even those contained in the one speech we have just listened to, we would be here for the rest of the afternoon and well into the evening. I think their ideas were summed up pretty well yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Bow River, who started the crepe-hanging procession when he said, and I quote from page 3923 of Hansard of May 19, as follows:

> There is only one result that will follow from the increased use and increased efficiency of machines, and that will be increased unemployment. There cannot be any other answer.

I wonder if there has ever been a more unrealistic statement made in a labour debate. Such a statement simply flies in the face of every experience we have had in the past and everything we know. I was tempted to reply to it yesterday, but I did not think that anyone could make a statement like that. I decided to wait to read Hansard to see whether the hon. member had said what I thought he had.

Down through history we find that the more mechanization there has been, the greater production and the more jobs there were for people. We find that the more machinery we put into use the higher our standard of living. Now the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Nanaimo and goodness knows how many others down there—

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): May I ask the hon. member if he would consider that Dr. Norbert Wiener of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology was a crepe-hanger or would he consider that his opinion might be worth something?

An hon. Member: He would not know.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It so happens that I have great respect for Dr. Wiener, some of whose books I have read. I also have a tendency to read all of a book and not just pick out certain words to bolster my argument.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Has the hon. member read this book?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I thought not. Have you read any of his books?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes. I have heard arguments advanced by members of the C.C.F. who used quotations from a book, but then I find it best to go and read the rest of the book. Maybe that is the reason I am making the observations I am.

I can just imagine what the hon. member for Bow River would have said had he been in this house during the days when we were passing from the horse and wagon to the automobile. I can just imagine his worries about that. We were moving toward the use of modern machinery and he would have contended that that would produce unemployment. He would be concerned about those people who were making carriages and who would be thrown out of work, who could be put out on the streets to starve. I dare say that if the hon. member for Nanaimo had been in the house in those days he would have voiced the same opinion.

Of course their hindsight is much better than was their foresight. They are ready to stand up here and say that the things which have happened in the past have no relationship to those which are going to happen in the future. In other words, they wanted to throw history out the window. Maybe that is why they are so shortsighted, in my opinion.

I suppose when the telephone first came in they might not have objected because new jobs were being created, but when they came along and proposed to use the dial telephone instead of the manual telephone they would consider that an absolute disaster. I can just imagine them making speeches about how the telephone operators would be thrown out of work with the use of the dial telephone. We all know what has happened. Telephone service became so reasonable, the use of telephones increased to such an extent that we now find that more girls are coming out of the long distance exchange in Montreal alone than were employed servicing the manual installation throughout the city.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): How many more telephones have they now?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): They have a tremendous number more, and that is what I am telling you. The more mechanization we have, the more goods and services we have, the happier we will be and the higher will be our standard of living. I am doing my best to answer some of the observations which the hon. member made yesterday.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member has not answered any yet.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think I am making some progress toward dealing with that statement of yours.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What about the Conservatives?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Apparently the hon. member for Bow River is trying to reduce this to the political level and I cannot see any point in that. The only reason why I referred to parties was primarily to locate them in the house and then, secondly, to say how I thought their party thinking was reflected so stupidly.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Tell that to the unemployed.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think we have done pretty well during the past hundred years in this country under Conservative and Liberal government. If you really want to see some unemployment—I keep getting excited and am afraid I will use terms which are unparliamentary—just put some of these crackpots down here in office and we will soon have a good example of what unemployment means.

This is something that goes back a long way in history, almost to the beginning of time. It shows how foolish, how shortsighted, how senseless these arguments are about the introduction of machinery. I think it was the hon. member for Nanaimo who said something about the effects of primitive developments of previous years. In other words, he seemed to feel that the developments which are now taking place had no counterpart in the past, that this was something vastly different from what had gone on before.

I suppose he has forgotten about such things as the steam engine which brought us from the days when people did everything with their hands, which was about all they had in those days, to the complex industrial economy we have today. I suppose he has forgotten about electric power, the conversion of water flowing down a river into energy to turn the wheels of industry. I have a hunch that he has not read history far enough back to hear about the invention of the wheel. I do not suppose that he knows that for thousands of years after the time when men stopped—I do not want to get into any Darwin-Darrow-Bryan dispute—jumping through the trees and dropped down to the ground and commenced their upward climb to where they are today they had about one method of moving things, to drag them along the ground.

Eventually man figured out that he could pull a burden up an inclined plane. Then, if these hon. members had been around thousands of years ago when someone first got the idea of the wheel I know they would have said that that was an absolutely dangerous thing because it would mean, in the case of the thousands who had been put to work building the pyramids, that only five people would be needed to pull up a piece of stone instead of 500. I can go on—

Mr. Nicholson: What about the wheelbarrow?

An hon. Member: Pick and shovel.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I do not want to spend more time demolishing their arguments. Our ideas are shining very brightly at the moment, particularly in comparison with some of the very dull and uninteresting ones we get from all sides of this house.

An hon. Member: Where would they be?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I love these interruptions, because they show you are making an impression.

An hon. Member: What kind of impression?

Mr. Knowles: The only relation to labour estimates is that you are labouring hard.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There is an interesting point here they may have forgotten. From 1941 to 1951, when we saw the greatest mechanization and industrial development in this Canada of ours, we also increased our employment from 4·2 million people to 5·2 million people. That is another indication of what comes in the wake of machines. When I look at these labour problems that face us and I hear some of the suggestions that have been advanced by these brakes on the wheels of progress down there, it seems to me that they all boil down to two classes: the Social Credit group say it will all be well if we have some funny money, and the C.C.F. group say that it will all be fine if we can go in for a stiff dose of socialism rather than the pallid dose that the Liberal party are giving us at the present time.

An hon. Member: The Conservatives would have concentration camps for the unemployed. You might as well give us the whole story.

An hon. Member: What is going on here?

Mr. Gardiner: We are back in the days of Ishmael.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I wish to point out, Mr. Chairman, that all through history the greatest progress has come—

Mr. MacDougall: Under Liberal governments.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The greatest progress has come—

An hon. Member: In the province of Alberta through a Social Credit government.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If I pause at the right moment I can get an interruption from every member of the house, about his own party or something of that nature.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The greatest progress in our history has come in the last hundred years and under a system of genuine free enterprise. Too many people forget today that free enterprise has a stake in this country and in keeping people at work, and that all these peculiar ideas and untried theories which I referred to before and which I come back to—crepe-hanging prognostications—seem to assume that this country is going to hell in a handbasket, thanks to free enterprise. It simply is not so; and anybody who walks the streets of the country today can see that. Because of weaknesses, stupidity and shortsightedness on the part of the government that sits over there today, we have more unemployment than we should have. We have more problems than we should have, but it is no indication that we are going to solve them by taking people who know even less than the present government, if that is possible, and carrying out their ideas.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that industry and business of this country have their biggest stake in keeping people at work and keeping their purchasing power up. Having said that, I wish to say that I have not the slightest fundamental worry about the advent of automation, the increased use of machinery and the other problems which face us. I have confidence in the businessmen of this country to find the solution to these problems.

An hon. Member: What did you do during the thirties?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I know that these changes, which are bound to come and which we see coming, are not going to come overnight. That is the basis of all these arguments we have heard advanced in the last day and a half. They seem to think that these changes are going to come overnight. They are not going to come overnight; they are going to come gradually; and the opportunity will be given to our workers and to our people to retrain themselves, to relocate themselves and to prepare themselves for a greater economy and a higher standard of living than anything we have ever known.

Let my last sentence be that the most serious obstacle which stands in the way of our progress to bigger and better things in this country today is the crackpot theories and the peculiar ideas—

An hon. Member: Of the Conservative party.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —which are being advanced by these two heterogeneous collections of individuals on my left and the poorly administered government of this country, for which the gentlemen who sit opposite me must take the blame.

Mr. Byrne: I had not intended to take up the time of the house this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, but after sitting here for several days listening to the various arguments on the minister's estimates, I think I should add my voice.

Some hon. members have said to me, "You are a labour man; are you not going to speak on this question?" I have answered that I do not think it is necessary on every occasion, and I cannot at this time be asking for too much for labour after hearing the very soulful and heartrending stories of how the farmer has been faring in the last year or two. It is certainly time that we did take a look at the variation in farm income and those in industry. Farm income is steadily declining, and for that reason, as I have said, I feel that labour is faring not too badly. I note that we have had speaking this afternoon the hon. member for Broadview, an ex-brigade major and a manufacturer, certainly not in the labouring class; we have had the hon. Leader of the Opposition, P.C., Q.C., and the former president of the chamber of commerce; and we have also had speaking on this question the hon. member for Hamilton West, a P.A.

So now we come to the member for Kootenay East with "M.M." after his name, which simply stands for master mucker. I have had some connection with labour and have had calluses on my hands many times. I watched the hon. member for Broadview this afternoon using his hands to try to chop down the taxes on profits and income, and I could see the calluses plainly on the palms of his hands even at this distance. I have gone through the mill as a mucker, even up to the position of miner. "M.M." also stands for master of mineralogy. I can tell the members of the house that I do not share the anxiety of the hon. member for Nanaimo that automation or mechanization is going to do anything to injure the miners, the lumber workers or the farm workers. I did some mining and I can say with conviction that mining is really hard work.

An hon. Member: You never quite recovered from it.

Mr. Byrne: Quite obviously there is still a stoop to my back. The hon. member says I have not recovered from my efforts. That may be quite true. In the last 15 years I have seen very great changes in mining methods, and I think I can say, without being accused of bragging, that I have assisted in some ways in bringing about these improvements in methods. I can recall that not so long ago it took a crew of four miners four full shifts to drill a round in what we call chert, a very hard rock, and sometimes as high as eight shifts. The cost for labour ran as high as $50 a foot. The cost for powder and so on was of course very small, but in terms of actual labour effort and the return the cost ran into hundreds of dollars compared with the situation today. With the improvements in machines and the type of steel used, two miners today can drill the same round in four hours.

I had not intended speaking on this matter today but it so happens that only a day or two ago representatives from the miners' union were down here, and I asked them if they had any figures for last year as to the earnings of miners in the Sullivan mine. I recall that 15 years ago miners, working in the manner I have indicated and taking up to four days to drill a round, were earning about $8 a day. Mechanization has improved to the point where they can drill a round in four hours, and the figures given to me show that miners doing that particular type of work averaged up to $28 a day for the year.

That is an instance of mechanization not only making the work much easier but resulting in a great bonanza to the miners so far as remuneration for their work is concerned. To say that automation or mechanization is going to have a far-reaching ill effect is, in my opinion, simply nonsense. True, there are going to be some dislocations, but think of the people in the underdeveloped countries, such as in many parts of India, where there is no mechanization. There are beggars on the streets of the cities whose only way of making a living is to beg for 24 hours a day. The people in the rice fields sowing rice by hand are not unemployed, but I venture to say their circumstances are very much less favourable than those of any person in Canada. It is not that I do not have sympathy for those who are unemployed, but I think it is a very narrow view to take to fight mechanization and automation as the people in the textile industry did years ago in Great Britain.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): May I ask the hon. member a question? I just want to get this clear. Did he have the idea I was opposing automation and this development?

Mr. Weir: That is what your speech sounded like.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I was merely pointing out it would have very serious consequences. While I am on my feet, may I ask another question? How does the number of employees today in the mine to which the hon. member referred compare with the number 15 years ago, and what has happened to those who were displaced?

Mr. Byrne: There are two questions. Dealing with the first one, I certainly felt the hon. member was facing the future with very grave misgivings because of what he termed automation or mechanization. I say he should not do that, particularly so because the ideas of a man in his position will be listened to throughout the country and if he creates an impression of fear it will do no service to the country.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Byrne: I should like to answer the second question.

The Deputy Chairman: —but it being five o'clock the house must proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

PRIVATE BILLS

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Mr. E. D. Fulton (for Mr. Michener) moved the second reading of Bill No. 373, respecting the Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

PETROLEUM TRANSMISSION COMPANY

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B. C.) moved the second reading of Bill No. 374, to incorporate Petroleum Transmission Company.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member give the house an explanation of the bill?

Mr. Fairey: The bill we are asked to approve is for the incorporation of Petroleum Transmission Company. This company is associated with Pacific Petroleum Limited, one of the pioneers if not the pioneer in oil and gas exploration in Alberta and Northern British Columbia. This company operated originally in the Turner valley field and later in the Leduc field and still later in the Redwater and other fields in Alberta. It now has substantial production of oil in Alberta from the Leduc and Redwater fields. Since 1949, the company has been particularly active in the exploration and development of oil and natural gas reserves in northern British Columbia and the adjoining areas of northwestern Alberta, particularly in that block known as the Peace river block which, as we know, comprises an area of northern Alberta and northern British Columbia lying astride the interprovincial boundary.

I have seen the operations of this company near Pouce Coupe, which as we know is very close to Dawson Creek, and also at Fort St. John, which is approximately 75 miles north of Dawson Creek on the Alaska highway. It would appear that the explorations of this company tend to move generally in a northwesterly direction towards the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. At the present time the company and its associates control approximately four million acres of proven lands for potential oil and gas development.

It is the purpose of this Petroleum Transmission Company to build what might be called a grid or collection system to collect their products from these wells which are now operating and bring the products down for delivery to the main transmission lines such as Trans-Canada or Westcoast. It is because of the success and development of northern British Columbia that it has been possible to promise the supply of natural gas to Vancouver and parts of the northwestern United States. I might say, too, that much of the gas is wet gas and the liquid by-products such as propane and butane must be collected at a central point and delivered to a transmission system.

At the moment there is no intention of building a straight transmission line but just a collection grid system. With the future development it may be necessary, and they are asking authority, to build a transmission line themselves. I believe that is about all I need to say at the moment, Mr. Speaker, as I understand this bill will go to one of the standing committees where more details can be given.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

YUKON PIPELINES LIMITED

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 375, to incorporate Yukon Pipelines Limited.

Mr. Green: Would the sponsor explain this bill?

Mr. McIlraith: It will be noted from the bill, Mr. Speaker, that the persons seeking incorporation are in the main officers of the White Pass and Yukon railway which was built at the time of the Klondike gold rush and extends from Skagway to Whitehorse, a distance of approximately 110 miles. In the year 1942 the United States army authorities built a pipe line along the railway right of way. After the end of the war the United States army continued to operate that pipe line to supply fuel oil from Skagway through Whitehorse and through a continuation of that line to their own forces in Alaska. In addition, they permitted the take-off of fuel oil at Whitehorse for Canadian needs.

Recently the United States authorities have built a pipe line from Haines, Alaska, to supply their own forces in Alaska. This new pipe line does not go through Whitehorse or the Yukon area. The agreement under which oil is taken off the line which comes over the railway route can be terminated on 30 days' notice. It is expected that when the new United States army line is brought into use, this one will be discontinued. The significance of that is that the people in the Whitehorse area and the Yukon area will be without any convenient supply of fuel oil. The incorporators are seeking authority to have a corporate capacity to negotiate to take over that pipe line if and when it is abandoned.

This bill is in the same form as other pipe line bills, but it is different in this way, that what is sought to be transported by this company is fuel oil in a refined state for use by consumers as opposed to the usual crude oil problem we have in connection with these pipe line bills. The bill itself also contains a geographical limitation to the British Columbia-Yukon area in Canada, but does contain a provision for the building of a pipe line outside of Canada. The reason for that, of course, is that the line does go through some 20 miles of Alaska. There is in the bill also a technical provision to which perhaps I should refer, and that is the power to build a line outside of Canada for the transmission of gas. This power is not limited. It would be the intention of the incorporators when the bill is in the committee stage to submit a limitation similar to the one put forward in another pipe line bill a few days ago, limiting to Canada the right to construct a pipe line for the transmission of gas.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon): It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed legislation is to provide a corporate vehicle for the operation as a common carrier of the existing pipe line between Skagway, Alaska, and Whitehorse, Yukon Territory. This pipe line is now owned and operated by the United States army, and is shortly to be de-activated and declared surplus. No doubt it will be disposed of through the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

The applicants for incorporation, as the hon. member has just said, are officers of the White Pass and Yukon Corporation Limited, who have had much experience in the operation of these facilities. I might mention also that the cheapest method of moving oil and gasoline into the Yukon Territory and surrounding area of northern British Columbia at the moment is by ocean tanker up the west coast to Skagway, Alaska, and thence by the existing four-inch pipe line through the mountains a distance of about 110 miles to Whitehorse. If this legislation is enacted it will provide for the continued operation of the existing four-inch pipe line between Skagway, Alaska, and Whitehorse, used for the transportation of fuel and diesel oil, and for the eventual construction and operation of a new pipe line between the same points for the transportation of gasoline and petroleum products.

The opening up of the pipe line as a common carrier will make it possible for any other oil company that so desires to move its products up the coast and into Whitehorse on a competitive basis. The existing pipe line between Skagway and Whitehorse runs along the White Pass and Yukon railway right of way through precipitous and difficult mountain territory, winding its way to a height of over 3,000 feet in a matter of only 18 miles, crossing mountain bridges, through tunnels and under the protection of numerous snow sheds along the railway right of way.

The White Pass and Yukon road has been intimately associated with the operation of this line from its inception. The employees of the White Pass road are fully familiar with pumping and the other operating facilities of the system and are of course completely equipped to take over its operation.

When the United States army ceases to operate the line it appears natural therefore that the White Pass and Yukon route should function in its place, in view of the fact that the installations are chiefly on the railway right of way. I am, therefore, pleased to support this bill for the reasons given.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES, LTD.

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 376 (Letter U-12 of the Senate), intituled: "An act to authorize Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line".—Mr. Weaver.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) has asked me to move this bill a further stage, and I am very glad to do so. However, as there are two other bills of importance to those concerned, I would ask that this bill be considered at a later stage, after the others have been dealt with.

Order stands.

EQUITABLE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska) moved the second reading of Bill No. 377, respecting Equitable Fire Insurance Company of Canada.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation?

Mr. Boisvert: I do not think this bill requires much by way of explanation. The company-petitioner is seeking by this bill an extension of time in order to obtain registry from the Minister of Finance. The company was incorporated a few years ago, and when it came time to transfer the assets from the provincial to the federal company, some difficulty was encountered. Therefore the company requires one more year to complete the transaction of transforming from a provincial to a federal company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

S & M PIPELINE LIMITED

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 378, to incorporate S & M Pipeline Limited.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that the incorporators seeking incorporation by this bill are the officers of Canadian Devonian Petroleums Limited.

In southeastern Saskatchewan there has been considerable development in oil production and oil exploration work. Canadian Devonian Petroleums Limited have producing wells in that area. The problem arises of getting that oil from the wells to a main pipe line where it will be transported to the refineries. If the bill is passed, it is the intention of the incorporators to consider as their first scheme the building of a pipe line to serve the area in which those wells are situated.

By reason of the amendment to the Pipe Lines Act in 1953, any company seeking to build a pipe line, in the event of such pipe line crossing a provincial boundary, must be incorporated by special act. It is therefore necessary for the company, by reason of that provision, to seek incorporation by special act in this instance.

It will be noted that the bill is limited to the four western provinces and the Northwest Territories. The bill provides for the construction and operation of pipe lines for both gas and oil. One of the early schemes contemplated by the company has to do with the building of a branch pipe line to serve producing lines in southeastern Saskatchewan in order to get that oil to the refinery. The provision for gas pipe lines is not limited in the bill as presented, as there is in the bill as presented authority for building gas pipe lines outside of Canada as well as in the four western provinces in Canada.

It is the intention of the incorporators, when the bill is before the committee, to submit an amendment for consideration by the committee limiting to Canada the right to build main gas lines.

[Mr. Boisvert.]

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the concluding paragraph in the speech of the sponsor of the bill, because I had noted in the bill as drafted an objectionable feature, one which led to a good deal of discussion when another bill was before the committee. However, in the light of the hon. member's statement, I should think the committee would be interested in giving favourable consideration to this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES, LTD.

Mr. W. G. Weir (for Mr. Weaver) moved the second reading of Bill No. 367, to authorize Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation?

Mr. Weir: Mr. Speaker, the situation with respect to this bill is somewhat similar to the one with which we have just dealt. The applicant, Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., was incorporated under the Companies Act of the province of Manitoba by letters patent dated August 5, 1954, for the purpose of acquiring, constructing, owning and operating oil pipe lines and gathering systems.

The applicant in particular was incorporated to acquire and operate a short pipe line and a gathering system connecting the Daly oil field near Virden in Manitoba to Cromer, a pumping station on the interprovincial pipe line, and also to construct an extension from the Daly field to the Virden Roselea and the North Virden Roselea oil fields. The extension to these latter fields was completed and put into operation late in 1954.

Portions of the present pipe line serving the Daly field were laid approximately eight miles from the Manitoba-Saskatchewan boundary.

The purpose of the present application is to secure authorization in the applicant company to extend its activities across the Manitoba-Saskatchewan boundary into southeastern Saskatchewan, as the progress of oil development in the area makes feasible the construction of pipe lines.

The applicant is particularly considering the possibility of constructing an oil pipe line to serve the Alida and Frobisher oil fields in southeastern Saskatchewan, and a possible extension from such an oil pipe line back into the province of Manitoba to serve the Tilson and Pearson oil fields in southwestern Manitoba.

As was mentioned in the discussion on the previous bill, under the Pipe Lines Act, the applicant cannot construct or operate pipe lines crossing provincial boundaries without the authority of an act such as is asked in this instance.

I might add that the bill has been before the Senate and dealt with by the Senate committee which deals with these matters. It now comes to this house in its present form and, of course, will be submitted to a committee here, for further consideration.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately this bill is not similar to the others which were read a second time this afternoon. If hon. members will refer to the three preceding bills, namely to incorporate Petroleum Transmission Company, to incorporate Yukon Pipelines Limited and to incorporate S & M Pipeline Limited, they will find that those bills are in the nature of charters incorporating companies.

They have extensive provisions. For example, they name the applicants for the charter; they provide for the first directors; they also regulate everything having to do with the capital stock. Then they go on to outline in detail the powers of the company which is to be incorporated by the bill, and deal with the question of loans to shareholders or directors and with the application of certain provisions of the dominion Companies Act. They also deal with the redemption or purchase for cancellation of paid up capital, and finally they deal with the paying of commission on subscription for shares, bonds, debentures and so on. In other words, they constitute the charter of the company.

On the other hand, the bill which we are now considering does not do that at all. It merely authorizes the company which has been set up under the Manitoba companies act to go into the pipe line business. If hon. members will refer to the bill they will find that there are none of these provisions that are contained in the other charters. This bill simply says that this Manitoba company has the power to construct pipe lines for both oil and gas. Nothing whatever is said about the people who are behind the bill. There are no restrictions on the capital structure of the company; there is nothing said about its powers. We have no idea what the powers of this company are. That will be contained in the papers filed in the office of the registrar of companies in Manitoba.

Nothing is said in the bill itself about where the pipe lines are to be built. Hon. members will notice that the other charters specifically set out that the pipe lines are to be built in certain parts of the country. For example, I take the S & M Pipeline Limited charter. It says that the pipe lines are to be built in the Northwest Territories and in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and outside Canada; but in the bill we are now considering absolutely no mention is made of where the pipe lines are to go. There is nothing to show that the company will be subject to the provisions of the dominion Companies Act, to which the other companies which have been given charters must submit, and there are none of the other restrictions which are contained in these other charters.

I do not see why one group should be able to come to this house and get a bill of this kind authorizing them to do everything that the other companies can do, which have come in and told their whole story and asked for charters of which we have the details. That appears to me to be discrimination, and also it opens the door wide to companies incorporated under a provincial companies act of any province of Canada. If Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Limited, can get authority in the terms set out in this bill, then 50, 100 or 1,000 provincially incorporated companies can do the same thing.

It opens the door wide, and in my opinion breaks down the whole basis set up by the Pipe Lines Act for the chartering of companies to go into the pipe line business. This is very big business, and very important, and the companies are given very extensive rights under the Pipe Lines Act. They have power to take lands, and all that sort of thing. They are given practically as wide powers as the railways. I submit that the intention of parliament, when it passed the Pipe Lines Act, was that in each case the people who wanted to go into the pipe lines business must come to parliament and get a charter. There has been only one case in which that was not done, and I intend to refer to it in a moment or two.

The Pipe Lines Act is chapter 211 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. We find there that "company" is described as meaning:

> A person having authority under a special act to construct or operate pipe lines for the transportation of oil or gas.

A "special act" is described as meaning:

> An act of the parliament of Canada that authorizes a person named in the act to construct or operate pipe lines for the transportation of gas or oil or that is enacted with special reference to such pipe lines.

I suppose that technically the Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Limited, would be considered as a person and therefore technically this bill would come under that definition of a special act; technically getting an act through such as we are debating this afternoon might be sufficient; but I do suggest that it would be against the whole spirit and intent of the Pipe Lines Act.

When we were discussing the amendment to the Pipe Lines Act in 1953 we were questioning the then minister of transport. I now quote from page 621 of Hansard of December 4, 1953, where Mr. Chevrier had this to say:

> As I understand this amendment, it is still necessary for extra-provincial or interprovincial pipe lines to seek authority from this parliament by way of a special charter in order to apply to the board of transport commissioners for its location.

This shows clearly what the minister had in mind at that time. Mind you, there is no objection to a provincial company building a pipe line within the borders of that province. If Manitoba wants to incorporate a company to build a pipe line in Manitoba, then the Pipe Lines Act of the dominion does not apply. But that is not the case here. Presumably this company has already built lines in Manitoba and now intends to cross a border—I think the hon. member said the Saskatchewan-Manitoba border. Well, they may just as well want to cross an international border so far as the Pipe Lines Act is concerned. They should come to parliament and get a full charter in the same way that the other applicants have done over the last six years. It is six years now that applicants for charters have been coming here and complying with what I suggest is the real meaning of the act.

It is true that in 1954, a little over a year ago, the Niagara Gas Transmission Limited came here with a bill of the kind we are considering today, and I presume it is because that was done that Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Limited, are asking today for the same treatment. But the conditions were entirely different when Niagara Gas Transmission Limited came to parliament. They had been incorporated under the Ontario companies act. This company was a subsidiary of the Consumers Gas Company of Toronto and the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company of the United States. The parent companies had entered into a contract under which United States gas was to be imported into the greater Toronto area and part of the transmission of that gas was to be done by Niagara Gas Transmission Company. They were to pick up the gas in the middle of the Niagara river and bring it into the city of Toronto.

There was a great deal of discussion in the house. Hon. members will remember that the whole question of our gas policy was involved. It was felt that if Niagara Gas Transmission Limited went ahead as originally planned the result would be to prevent the construction of a trans-Canada pipe line by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. In the final analysis an agreement was reached under which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited built a pipe line in Canada from the middle of the Niagara river into the greater Toronto area.

There were all these special considerations behind the application for permission to Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to go into the pipe line business, but the fact that the charter was granted at that time should not establish a precedent for ordinary gas line charters. I do suggest that if this present policy is to be adopted, that is if this bill is passed by the house; if we allow these provincial companies to go into the interprovincial or international oil or gas transmission business merely by coming here and getting a bill through which permits them to go into business subject to the provisions of the Pipe Lines Act; if we are to be satisfied with a private bill of that kind, then we are opening the door wide to leaving parliament with practically no control over what such companies may do. We would be granting them the extremely wide powers contained in the Pipe Lines Act and in addition would be discriminating in a most unfair manner against Canadians who have followed the spirit and letter of the Pipe Lines Act by coming into this house with a bill which constituted a proper charter.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the sponsor of this bill is not present in the house and that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has made an excellent argument as to why the bill should not be proceeded with in this form, I wonder if the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) would recommend that the bill stand until another time. I do not think we should waste too much time debating it when the sponsor is not here. In my opinion a good case has not been made out for giving such wide powers to Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Limited, to approve the incorporation by letters patent without any more information than we have. We required the Westspur Pipe Line Company to tell us who are responsible and also something about the capital and their general plans. I wonder if the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa would indicate at this stage whether he would recommend that the bill stand until the hon. member who is sponsoring it is here to give further explanation.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not raised this as a point of order. I suggest to the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) that he is too late in raising this point; he should have raised it when the motion for second reading was proposed.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Weir: I understand that the objection to this bill raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is purely as to the form of the bill.

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Weir: Does the hon. member feel that that matter could be straightened out when the bill got to the committee?

Mr. Green: If it could be I think that would be perfectly satisfactory. There is only one of the usual sections in this bill, but if ten other sections could be added, provided that could be done, that would be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. Weir: Perhaps it might be better if someone moved the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Dickey the debate was adjourned.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY OF CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 379, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the first comment I wish to make in moving the second reading of this bill is that I do so because of an interest in the principle raised by this bill. It would be useless for me to deny, even if I wanted to, that recent events have played some part in my bringing this legislation before the House of Commons at the present time. Nevertheless, my interest is not in any particular personality that might be involved but rather in a principle which has concerned this parliament and other parliaments for a great many years. That principle is set out in the question: should a cabinet minister at the same time be a director of a private company?

My interest in this question did not begin only two or three weeks ago. As a matter of fact when I first came to parliament in 1942 I was concerned to discover that it was not an absolute rule that a minister give up his directorships when he joins the cabinet. Accordingly, in an effort to draw attention to this fact and thereby to suggest, at least indirectly, that such a rule should be laid down, I have placed questions on the order paper of the House of Commons on at least three occasions. The first time I put those questions on the order paper, they were answered by sessional paper No. 296-A which was tabled in the House of Commons on June 5, 1943. That shows an interest of mine dating back some 12 years. The second time was a few years later when a sessional paper was tabled in response to certain similar questions of mine; this one was sessional paper No. 160-D, which was tabled on February 11, 1948. More recently I placed another set of questions on the order paper which was answered by sessional paper No. 173-A, tabled on April 8, 1954. I shall have occasion in the course of my remarks to refer to some of the information contained in these sessional papers, but I wanted to make it clear at the outset that my interest in this question is one of long standing.

I should like also to remind hon. members that this matter has been discussed in the Canadian House of Commons on quite a number of occasions. On most of those occasions the discussion has arisen out of some other matter, but on at least two occasions the matter was discussed on substantive motions. The first of those two occasions was in 1921, when Mr. A. R. McMaster introduced a bill to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act which was designed to have the same effect that my bill has at the present time. As that bill did not pass, I have not yet been able to find a copy of it, so I do not know whether my bill is exactly the same as that one.

Mr. Harris: It is not.

Mr. Knowles: At any rate the description of the bill which can be found in Hansard during the course of the discussion of the bill suggests that there is a striking similarity between Mr. McMaster's bill of 1921 and my bill of 1955. The second major debate on this matter was in 1922. Again it was Mr. McMaster who initiated the debate, but on that occasion it was on a private member's resolution rather than on a bill.

I invite hon. members to look at the debates of those two years of 1921 and 1922. They will find some very interesting reading. Hon. members will recall that in 1921 the Conservatives were in power and Mr. King was the leader of the Liberal opposition. Mr. McMaster, who introduced the bill, was a Liberal and had played a very prominent part in the party; indeed I find he played a prominent part in the Liberal convention of 1919. He was very close to Mr. King, and I would point out that in 1921 he had Mr. King's support on his bill. That support was indicated by interjections by Mr. King in the debate and it was also indicated in a very concrete way by the vote which is recorded on page 665 of Hansard for March 8, 1921. It is always interesting to us who are now members of the House of Commons to look back over some of these ancient records and find there the names of great men of days gone by. Actually, the only person who is today a member of the House of Commons and who voted on that occasion is one whose name I am happy to mention, even though I do not agree with the way that he voted, because this gives me the opportunity to say how sorry all of us were to learn of the illness of the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) and how pleased we have been to learn that he is making good progress. The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas was, as I say, the only present member who voted on that occasion. He happened to vote against the bill.

But one other member who is still a member of the house, although he did not record his vote on that occasion, was present, because he indicated that he was paired. In this instance I refer to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who said he was paired with the then junior member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. R. H. Butts). The hon. member said that had he voted, he would have voted against the bill. In other words, the hon. member for Quebec South disagreed with Mr. McMaster, the sponsor of the bill, and he disagreed with his leader, Mr. Mackenzie King, on that occasion. Indeed it was not the only occasion when there was a difference of opinion between Mr. King and the hon. member for Quebec South. I find that Mr. Lapointe, the father of the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), and late minister of justice, was present on that occasion and along with Mr. King voted for this bill of Mr. McMaster's which would have had the effect of amending the Senate and House of Commons Act so as to prevent cabinet ministers from holding directorships in private firms.

Mr. McIvor: They were then in opposition.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Fort William is helping me out or anticipating what I am coming to. He says that they were then in opposition. He probably knows that when in 1922 these gentlemen crossed to the other side of the house they sang a different song. There is another name that interests me as I look over this list. I find that in 1921 there was a member for the north riding of Oxford by the name of Mr. Nesbitt. He was a Conservative member of the House of Commons at that time, and he voted against the bill. That name suggested to me that there might be some relationship between him and the present member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). So I looked up the present Parliamentary Guide and I found that the present member for Oxford is a grandnephew of the Mr. Nesbitt who was the member for North Oxford in 1921. I hope the present member for Oxford will redeem the family name when the vote is called on this bill.

I invite members to look over this debate. As I say, it was introduced from the Liberal side of the house and very strong and cogent speeches were made by Mr. McMaster and others. Let me read one or two quotations from the speech of Mr. McMaster. I turn first of all to page 586 of Hansard of March 4, 1921:

> I say that no man who is a minister of the Crown in this country has any time left to fulfil the duties of a director. That is my first proposition, and I think it is a proposition which will appeal as a reasonable one to members of this house. We have the best of authority for the statement that no man can serve two masters. Either he will have to neglect his duty as a minister or he will have to neglect his duty as a director, if he holds both positions at one and the same time.

On page 587 Mr. McMaster is recorded as having said:

> Now, we should be, and I trust we all are, jealous for the good name of this House. We are told by authority, almost as great as the authority I have just quoted, that we are to "abstain from the very appearance of evil". Years ago Tennyson wrote about "the fierce light that beats upon the Throne".
> Well, I do not think that light is comparable to the fierce light that beats upon men who enter parliament at this time of the world's history. I do not think that I am using the language of extravagance when I say that all governmental institutions are on trial and are being subjected to criticism which is not only strong but often bitter and often unjust.

That was not said yesterday, although it might have been. It was said 34 years ago by the sponsor of a bill similar to the one now before the house. I could go on with excerpts from the debate of March, 1921, but I will not take the time of the house to do so. I invite hon. members who are interested to get that volume of Hansard and read it. It is very interesting and very informative.

As the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has invited me to inform the house, the next year the large number of Liberals who had voted for the bill when they were in opposition sang a different song when they were on the government side of the house. There was still one Liberal of course who adhered to the principle that cabinet ministers should not be directors of private companies, namely Mr. McMaster, who himself introduced the resolution in 1922. It was a lengthy resolution.

Mr. Macdonnell: Was he the only one?

Mr. Knowles: The only Liberal who stuck by his guns? I am sorry, I have not yet taken the time to check all of the 59 who voted for Mr. McMaster's resolution in 1922 to determine whether any other of the 59 was a Liberal. Most of them appear to have been Progressives who had come into the house, together with men like Mr. Woodsworth and others. Mr. McMaster was amongst those who voted for the resolution in 1922. Mr. King and Mr. Lapointe voted against it that year. If I may offer this little bit to please the hon. member who has asked the question, I might say that the gentleman whose name I had occasion to mention yesterday was at least consistent. He voted against the proposition on both occasions. I refer to Arthur Meighen. He voted against the bill in 1921 and he voted against the resolution in 1922.

Mr. King had quite a time, as one would imagine, trying to explain why he took a different position in 1922 from that which he had taken in 1921. The gist of his argument was that he was now prime minister, that he now had about him some men in whom he had great confidence, and he just felt differently about the matter. After all, he even pleaded youth. He felt if he waited until he was an old man he might then tell the younger men in his cabinet what to do, but as long as he was just a young man that was not what he felt he should do. In fact, as found at page 1103 of Hansard for April 24, 1922, he said—

Mr. Macdonnell: Were they to be the keepers of their own consciences just like today?

Mr. Knowles: I leave that for others to interpret, although I may come to it later. As reported at page 1103 of Hansard for April 24, 1922, Mr. King said:

> There are times and places for everything. I have spoken of the Gladstone, the Campbell-Bannerman and, if you will, the Asquith tradition. May I remind my hon. friend that it was 1868 when Mr. Gladstone first became prime minister of England. He was then 59 years of age, and had had a long parliamentary experience. It was not until 1892, a quarter of a century afterwards, when he was past 80 years of age, that Mr. Gladstone sought to impose any self-denying ordinances upon his colleagues. If my hon. friend will give me time, and the occasion demands it, I shall be glad to follow the Gladstonian tradition.

That, Mr. Speaker, is just one quotation I have picked out from the interesting and much longer debate that took place in 1922 when, as I say, the resolution was defeated. I have already indicated it had the support of Mr. McMaster, the Liberal who had proposed the legislation the year before. It had the spoken support and the vote of my predecessor as the member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, and the other Labour and Progressive members who were in the house. Some others among the 59 may have been Liberals or Conservatives. I have not been able to check all the names.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I think this does establish the point I made at the outset, that this is not an issue that has arisen to disturb the minds of public men or to disturb the writers of editorials in newspapers only in recent days or weeks. It is something that has been a cause for concern across a great many years, and I feel it is a matter of principle. I freely admit some things that have happened recently have brought the question out into the open and have attracted public interest to it, but I raise it as a matter of principle which I feel should concern the House of Commons.

Someone is going to say I am talking out my own bill. I regard the bill as too important to try to rush. There is more I want to say than can be said in the time remaining before six o'clock, so that in just a moment, Mr. Speaker, I shall be adjourning the debate. The next time we come to this matter I hope to have something to say about the practice followed in the United Kingdom. I shall make reference to something that happened recently in the United States. I shall also cite the Canadian practice in terms of what our prime ministers have done about the matter across the years, particularly from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's time to the present. I shall also deal with the arguments that have been advanced against my proposal such as the argument that it is something to be left to the conscience of individual ministers, and so on. That is a preview of what I will say when I get the chance to continue my remarks. In the meantime I hope all hon. members will recognize that this matter involves a very important principle, and I hope very serious attention will be given to it. On that basis, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Knowles the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: At eight o'clock the house will revert to consideration of the business that was interrupted at five o'clock. Since the business then is to be in committee of supply, would the house agree that I do now leave the chair and let the chairman call it six o'clock from the committee?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

173. Departmental administration, $685,605.

Mr. Byrne: The interruption in my discussion has allowed me an opportunity, which normally I would not have had, Mr. Chairman, to rectify something in the early part of my speech. Evidently I have left the impression that miners are not working under arduous conditions these days, but that is not the impression I wanted to give to this house at all. I simply wanted to show that with the improvements in methods, material and equipment, and by extra effort a great showing was accruing to the industry. I did not want to create the impression that there have been only one or two improvements in the mining industry. The instance that I cited is general throughout the entire industry so that almost every type of employee working underground on production in the particular mine to which I referred receives pay ranging from an average of $20 per day to the $27 that I mentioned.

Mr. Gillis: You are talking about the metal mining industry.

Mr. Byrne: The base metal mining industry. Production has certainly increased. I believe it would be correct to say that, despite these improvements in income, the actual cost of production has not increased. A ton of ore is being produced just as cheaply today as it was 10 years ago.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Byrne: I have not as yet answered the question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo. After answering that, I would be pleased to take another question from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

The hon. member for Nanaimo asked what had become of the miners who were displaced, and how many were displaced by these improvements in machinery and methods. As I said, I had not intended to make any contribution to this debate so I do not have the actual figures. However, for a few months each year I work in the mine and I am fairly well acquainted with what has taken place. I would think that the actual labour force underground has been reduced by 75 to 100 men. This mechanization and improvement in methods has provided an opportunity for the mining company to work a very low grade of ore. I am not a mining engineer, so I cannot say exactly what the savings have been. I know they are able to mine a very low grade ore and for that reason there has been a certain measure of conservation. This has prolonged the life of a mine around which a large community has been built up and, in fact, up to very recently the community has been almost a single industry community.

In addition the same company, using these improved mining methods, has opened two additional mines. One I believe is producing up to 600 tons a day and the other one, which will be in production this year, will be producing around 500 tons. About 500 miners have been absorbed and employees from other areas have been engaged. At the Sullivan mine, where the original operations are located, a fertilizer industry has been introduced. A number of men from the mine have been re-employed, and I might say retrained, for the operation of the fertilizer plant. All in all, therefore, there has not been any grave dislocation of the men in the industry, and I can assure you that they are enjoying a considerably better standard of living. I appreciate the fact that it is not good enough, but as I said earlier I have no fear of improved methods and automation.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit my question now?

Mr. Byrne: Yes.

Mr. Barnett: I was wondering if the hon. member would care to relate the purchasing power of the wage rates which he cited the miners as receiving today to the purchasing power of the $8 per day he cited them as having received a number of years ago?

Mr. Byrne: Well, the hon. member's interjection has given me an opportunity to say again that this rate is the result of a contract system. The base rate would be $14 and some workers would go as high as $27 worked out between the company and union. Where the base rate is $13.59, the earnings go up as high as $20 per day. As to the value of the dollar compared with 15 or 20 years ago, I believe the hon. member is as well informed as anyone, and has probably done more research on the question because I understand he prepared himself for a speech on this question. I believe the generally accepted figure is about 50 cents on the dollar.

I said the original earnings were around $8 and if you double that they would be $16.

It is not every worker who would receive the $27, but there are people who are earning $27 per day. It is interesting to note that even during the time when the United States authorities seemed insistent upon a higher tariff on lead and zinc, there was no great concern. I feel that Consolidated would have survived that while some of the other companies would perhaps have gone under. There is no reason to believe that these improvements are not real. As I say, the hon. member can relate the actual value of the dollar as he wishes, but I would point out to him also that the miners are working a 40-hour week. They have more leisure time to spend fishing and so on and other pursuits.

However, I am being diverted from the point. I was going to say that the Minister of Labour should not be held entirely responsible for the unemployment we have today. There are many other factors, and the minister's job is more the finding of a solution, the administration of the labour code, unemployment insurance and so forth. However, in my view the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance have more important duties in maintaining balance in the economy.

Some hon. members have referred to the fact of the Prime Minister's stepping in at the time of the threatened railway strike in 1954, and have said that his efforts to bring the union and the railways together in an agreement reached the point of compulsory arbitration. They have also referred to the fact that at the time of the railway strike in 1950 the unions were forced to arbitrate with management in the settlement of their dispute.

I have some misgivings about the trend in this particular; but I think we must remember that employees in the transportation industry are in a different position from those who are working for industries in which prices and rates are allowed some measure of flexibility. When railway employees request wage increases, then whether we like it or not there arises the necessity for an adjustment in freight rates. Otherwise it seems almost impossible to increase wages. There is a measure of control by parliament over freight rates in Canada. Although that control is not completely rigid, when increases are authorized by the board of transport commissioners we hear a hue and cry in the House of Commons. For that reason freight rates are influenced by the action of parliament, and in this way there is not the same measure of flexibility in negotiations between railway employees and management. We should keep this in mind, and try to work out some method of settlement of disputes so that there would be an understanding that, when necessary, rates would have to be increased.

Railway workers should not be expected to subsidize other industries as, in my opinion, they have done in the past. The hon. member for Prince Albert pointed out that high freight rates had caused a certain pulp company to which he referred to abandon plans to establish in northern Saskatchewan. Therefore high freight rates was one of the reasons for unemployment. However, the hon. member must know as well as anyone else that freight rates for export wheat from the prairies are set at a figure that was considered adequate in 1897, and the railways are still required to carry export wheat at those rates.

I have advocated a better way of providing for this discrepancy, by way of a subsidy paid by all Canada. To this point however I have not received much support. But when this very large amount of freight must be carried at a very low rate, some other commodify must pay the shot, with the result that freight rates make impossible the development of other new industries.

However, these are some of the conditions we must face. Simply to say in the House of Commons that freight rates are to blame for many of our difficulties, and simply to blame the minister for unemployment, is just not facing up to the facts.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say at the moment.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, the debate on the first item of labour estimates has been somewhat long.

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Low: There are some who think it has been too long, but I am not one who feels that way about it. I think the discussion has been well worth while, every bit of it—even the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. Because while it was completely barren of ideas, and while the hon. member showed an utter bankruptcy of intellect with respect to matters we are facing, it did issue a challenge which ought to be taken up by hon. members who are trying to face these issues. Therefore I believe the debate has been exceedingly valuable.

In the course of the past two days a number of speeches have been made indicating just how seriously some members have been thinking, and how they have studied this matter. Also it seems to me some speeches have been given which show how completely at sea so many members seem to be when faced with the challenging problems of today, particularly those related to unemployment and distribution.

I pause here for a moment to pay tribute to the Minister of Labour. Over the years, since I came to the House of Commons, and since he came as Minister of Labour, I have observed his work. I think he takes it seriously. I have never yet taken a problem to him without receiving his help, nor has there been any time when I have gone to him with a problem when he has not tried to find some equitable solution. Therefore I believe he is doing a good job in his department. I have nothing but sympathy and understanding for him in the work he is doing; and I do not think it is going to help him or anybody else to solve the problems of his department by simply trying to throw on him the blame for any situation —or, for that matter, on any one member of the government. Out of the sensible discussion that can and should take place in this forum of the people can come solutions, if we are ready to seek that which is right instead of standing here day after day and taking so much time to prove who is right or who is wrong.

Therefore I hope we will bear with the minister and try to give him some help. That is why I have felt like saying to him that I feel the discussion thus far has been good because a number of positive and forward looking proposals have been made. The members have asked him to give careful study and consideration to things which they hope will be solutions to the problems we face.

I have been interested in labour problems for many years. I might tell the minister that it was because I started studying problems relating to employment and recurring recessions that I was led into the Social Credit movement. I felt as I now feel that we had, if not a complete and full solution, certainly elements of solution which, if applied, will go a long way toward reaching a satisfactory solution. We are living in a most interesting and challenging time. We are living in a time, as has already been pointed out, of a rapid expansion of the use of automatic machinery in the productive enterprises. A good deal has been said about automation in this debate, not, I feel sure, in any way that would justify any reasonable member referring to it as a spread of gloom or blue ruin.

In his speech yesterday, the hon. member for Prince Albert, in referring to mechanization, said, not in exactly these words, but I think I got the sense of what he did say, that if any generation fears mechanization because they think that it will throw too many people out of work, the next generation finds that mechanization has tended to expand employment and to bring a higher standard of living. Well, that might be so, but I point out to him, and those who think as he does, that the second generation found that it was pretty slim going while the first one was passing away; and during the time that they were doing little or nothing to find a solution to the maladjustments that came as a consequence of mechanization, people—and my sympathies are with them—were the victims of, what shall I call it, a futile effort, if you want to call it that, or an attempt to find a satisfactory solution.

I am not for one moment saying that eventually we do not find a solution in answer to the problem, but I do not believe it is necessary to allow human suffering to continue as it has been allowed to continue over so many years at times in the past. If human ingenuity, brains and willingness to face facts were applied sensibly to the problems we would not have a lot of people suffer very long; they would not have to remain hungry very long in the midst of abundance; but it is just that attitude, that everybody who puts forward an idea is a crackpot, that causes a continuation of human suffering. Anybody who disagrees with me and does not go along with the idea of laissez-faire is a crackpot. I am sorry to say that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, who I am glad to see is in his seat tonight, feels that way. His whole talk this afternoon was nothing but that, and I am very sorry to see those ideas put forward in this day of all days when the lessons of economics and of human suffering should have borne in upon him, as on us all. What solutions are possible, and how should we set about to find them?

As I say, it might possibly be that the second generation after the one that fears mechanization might find a solution. But the second generations did discover, I am quite sure of that, in every case that they required an adjustment of thinking. It required new ideas and fresh approaches to social and economic behaviour and attitudes, and then changes for the better came.

The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace says all you have to do is have faith. If that is all it takes to bring adjustments, then we should have had adjustments a long time ago, because we all have faith. We do not lack faith over here any more than you do. I just remind the hon. member that faith without works is dead. What we stand for is faith with works, and intelligent works, at that, and a little bit of courage and vision and a little less of this silly business of calling other people crackpots because they come up with ideas. If you are going to discourage anybody who comes forward with a new idea by saying that he is imbued with the idea of funny money, well, for goodness' sake, how far are you going to get?

I heard the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace described this afternoon as an innocent abroad. Well, bless my soul, I hope there are not too many innocents abroad, if we are seriously and earnestly trying to find some way to cure the problem of unemployment. I am not going to indulge in name-calling because I do not think it helps; but he particularly engaged in ridicule and referred once or twice to the crackpots in this corner of the house.

Mr. McIvor: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes, indeed.

Mr. McIvor: We should have a definition of "crackpot" to know whether it is parliamentary or not.

Mr. Low: Yes. I am not quibbling about it; it does not matter to me what it means at all. If by crackpot the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace and others like him mean someone who is really and seriously trying to find solutions to problems, I shall gladly take the name of crackpot.

The hon. member made special reference to my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River, and to what he said in this debate yesterday. He referred to him as a crepe-hanger and a crackpot. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace mentioned how senseless those arguments are about the results of the introduction of machines. Well, now, I took the trouble to look up what my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River, did say, and for the life of me I cannot understand how the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace reached the interpretation he did. I want to quote from page 3923 of Hansard, to show what the hon. member for Bow River did say:

> I am not one who would suggest for a moment that we should decrease the use of machines in order to keep people at work. I do not think that is the purpose of civilization. I believe we should increase the use of the most technical machines to the point where, if the whole operation can be performed by pushing one button, so much the better.

I do not see anything to suggest crepe-hanging about that, or blue ruin. Bless my soul, that looks as though my hon. friend is not a bit afraid of mechanization or automation, as it has been so often referred to here. The whole vein of my hon. friend's speech yesterday was like that. Therefore, I say it is hard for me to understand how the hon. member could possibly get from what the hon. member for Bow River said yesterday the interpretation that he tried to put upon it today; and yet my hon. friend did ridicule all of us in this corner, including the C.C.F. group. He called us crackpots, and he said that it would be swell if you have some funny money.

My hon. friend says that he has done some studying—perhaps he has. I would not deny that; but I shall take just a few moments to refer to the question of unemployment which we are discussing, and mechanization. I am going to take him back briefly through a little bit of history that he should have studied before he spoke this afternoon, because I think it will do him good to face facts which he did not face when he rose to his feet. Perhaps he did not think too much when he was on his feet today. Perhaps that is his trouble. Sometimes people's minds are so linked up that when they stand up the mind will not work. It is like that old steamboat that used to ply up and down the Mississippi in Lincoln's time. The stern wheel that drove it was so linked up with the whistle that when they blew the whistle the boat stopped. Compare that with the situation here.

Mr. Gillis: He may be a sternwheeler.

Mr. Low: He probably is a sternwheeler.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend blows the whistle and goes straight ahead.

Mr. Low: That speech this afternoon was entirely a sternwheel speech. As I said, I should like to take the hon. member back through a little history which I am sure he would like to forget. I would like to refer for a few minutes to the labour and unemployment situation which existed during the Conservative regime of 1930-35. I am going to admit right off that in 1930 the Conservative government did inherit from the Liberal regime a very serious unemployment and recession problem.

There is no question about that. But they faced their responsibility with what policy? Just what was their policy? Was it automation? Was it progression? Was there a real effort to find a solution? I think I can describe their policy with regard to employment during the depression by saying that it was a case of push the steam shovel into the bush, bring out the wheelbarrows and shovels, put the unemployed into isolated camps and pay them 20 cents a day for digging a hole in one place and filling up a hole in another.

That was the kind of thing they offered to the people of Canada as a solution for the depression and unemployment problem. A serious situation developed over the years. The prices of primary products declined to a disastrous level and huge piles of products came into being. But many people who wanted those products found that they could not get them because they did not have purchasing power in their pockets and did not seem able to get any.

Every time anybody said to the Conservative government, "Why don't you get some purchasing power in circulation to start the wheels of industry going again?" the answer he got was, "There is not any money". They kept on saying that all through their regime up to 1935 when they were pitched out by the people of Canada largely because they had not found a solution or begun to find a solution for the unemployment problem.

The provinces tried in every way to persuade the Conservative government to do something to start the wheels of industry turning again so that salaries and wages would flow into the pockets of consumers. We felt that that was the answer. I was associated with a provincial government in those days and I know the problems we faced. I know how difficult it was to get the government down here moving on any project because the only answer we could get was, "There is no money". No matter how much we tried to show them how money could be obtained the answer always was that no money could be obtained.

I should like to refer to a specific instance and I do this for the edification of the hon. member from Montreal. I am not angry with him, not for a minute, but I think it would be a good thing to take his pants off and let him wander around here without them for a little while. I was living in Raymond in southern Alberta when the Conservative regime first came to power in 1930 and we went into the very serious part of the depression.

I was a teacher in the high school along with the hon. member for Lethbridge. We went through the whole of that year without having one five-cent piece by way of salary from our school board. I do not know just how we lived. There were plenty of goods and services but we could not get at them because we did not have money. We had to resort to a whole lot of things such as raising gardens, marketing eggs, borrowing milk from farmers and all that sort of thing. It is true we got along, and perhaps in some respects we were the healthiest, fattest and nakedest people in the world. But I want to tell you right now that it was tough going and I would not like to have to go through it again. I would not want my son to have to go through such a thing.

The school district could not pay our salaries because they discovered they owed the bank $67,000. They could not pay because they could not collect their taxes and the arrears of taxes had been hypothecated to the bank. Then the bank said, "No more". You could not blame them under the circumstances, but when they said "No more" we faced the problem of keeping the school running with 700 children and 18 or 20 teachers with no money available.

That was quite a problem but the people faced up to it and I think with some vision. I am wondering what the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace and his party would have done under the circumstances. Here is what we did. We realized that the goods and services were there in abundance in the community; we realized there were people willing to work, willing to apply their efforts to making more goods from the raw materials; prepared to give their efforts in distributing what was already in existence. We realized there were people prepared to teach the schools, to work for the city, to continue to give their services provided they could get goods in return. Willing workers and goods and services were available. The only thing that we needed was tickets of claim. Instead of sitting there wringing our hands, waiting for the next generation to solve the problem—

Mr. Blackmore: Like the Conservatives.

Mr. Low: —we had the faith of work. What did we do? We simply went to the town hall and had a chat with the mayor, the council and the secretary treasurer of the town who was a pretty forward-looking fellow. We said to him, "We will be prepared to continue teaching your school provided you will issue some tickets of your own; if you cannot get money at least you can provide some intermediary in the way of tickets or scrip."

They went to the Raymond Recorder and gave them a job of printing those tickets, which read, "The town of Raymond will pay to the bearer on demand $10 toward taxes, light rates or water rates." Those were handed out to us in payment for our services. We took them to the local storekeepers, the coal people and others, and said, "Will you accept these things in return for groceries and other things we need." They said, "What good are they?" "Well, you can take them to the town hall and pay your taxes with them; you can exchange them for your water rates; you can buy sugar with them from the sugar factory." We had arranged with the sugar factory to accept them in payment for sugar and also with the coal men to accept them for coal.

When these storekeepers saw that it was possible to get these things they said, "Certainly, we will accept them." What happened? When they made a sale for one of these $20 or $10 pieces of scrip, quite often they had to make change in cash which began to dry up their scarce supply. So they went to the aluminum company and had them punch out aluminum disks saying, "We will pay to the bearer on demand 50 cents in groceries", or in hardware and so on. They passed those out. So with a pocket on one side filled with paper and a pocket on the other side filled with aluminum disks we walked the streets and were happy.

We even went so far as to establish foreign trade relations with Lethbridge twenty miles away. It was not very long until the stores, dealers and even the restaurants in Lethbridge and other places were accepting Raymond scrip because they knew they could exchange it for sugar from our town, for eggs, for butter and that sort of thing that came from the farmers in our district. They had no trouble over them. I remember the time when they gave me my first salary in over a year in this scrip. My wife and I went on a real tear. We went into the city of Lethbridge, 15 or 20 miles away, and proceeded to go to a picture show and go to the Greek restaurant for a meal—the first time we had been able to do such a horrible thing for well over a year. How joyful everyone was when goods began flowing in!

The upshot of it was that Raymond and district became a veritable oasis in an economic desert. All the teachers wanted to go to teach in Raymond because at least they were getting something with which to buy goods. This went on for several years. Let me first tell you that the only ones in the district who were not happy were the bankers, who sat in their offices and saw business bypass them and go to the town hall, which became the banker. All we did was recognize that the goods and services were there, that willing people were there and the consumers were there. The only thing that was not there was the tickets to claim those goods. We said that, if the country would not do something about it, this district would do something on its own and provide its own tickets. So tickets were distributed for services rendered and the goods were automatically distributed.

I cite that for my hon. friend and his colleagues who think as he does, to show them that it takes a good deal more than just faith to move goods, as it takes more than faith to move mountains, but you will move mountains of goods if you use good sense as well as good faith. I would not advocate for one second that the same kind of process that was used in the town of Raymond be used in every community in Canada, but what I do point out to my hon. friend and his colleagues is this. The principle of what was done in the town of Raymond could have been applied on a national scale by the Conservative government with the same result that we had in the town of Raymond, but they did not have the imagination or the courage. They had the Bank of Canada, and they could have used it. The whole trouble was that they were going to sit there and let faith do the job, and faith just did not do it. As a consequence people suffered.

We have demonstrated without doubt that the ideas we put forward are not new and untried ideas; they are not crackpot ideas; they are ideas that have succeeded. Believe me—I point this out to my hon. friend—they have succeeded so well and we were getting along so beautifully in that district that a nurse in the city of Calgary, 170 miles away, a nurse we had never heard of, went to the courts and took out an injunction against the town of Raymond to prevent it from using its own form of purchasing power.

An hon. Member: Funny money.

Mr. Low: It was not the nurse who was interested in it. There were men who were hiding behind a woman's skirts, as they often do—people who saw in what we were doing a danger to their best vested interests. That is what was happening. As I said, it was only the bankers of the day who were unhappy about the situation. Yet, I say, a representative of a do-nothing party now stands up in this house and has the temerity to call the Social Credit group crepe-hanging prognosticators. Some of us have made a deep and realistic study in connection with the increasing use of automatic machinery to replace manpower in the chores of production. I am sure my hon. friend from Notre Dame de Grace will admit that the use of automatic machines does make it possible to produce things faster and cheaper than ever before. If he does not, he had better do some more reading, because that is the effect of it.

Now, what happens when, through the use of automation, things are produced faster and cheaper than ever before? It was that very question which I faced at university when I came face to face with the Social Credit solution. I was working on a project that had been given to me by the professor of economics at that school. This was the project. I saw some possibility through my studies that the frequency of major depressions was accelerated by the increase in the speed with which things could be produced. So the professor suggested to me carrying on some studies in this respect. In the course of my studies I discovered this when I developed two graphs. One graph that I drew, based on exactly historical fact, indicated the space in years between major depressions. Then I superimposed upon that graph another one indicating the results of scientific studies with respect to the increase in percentage in the productive capacity of the economy through mechanization.

I was surprised, and so was my professor, to find that as the speed of production increased the time between major depressions in years declined almost exactly in inverse ratio, indicating that as we increase our speed of production we find it much more difficult to distribute the abundance that we can produce. I sought for and discovered this, which my hon. friend ought to discover in his reading: that the process of producing goods and services today, especially through the use of machinery, does not succeed in distributing salaries and wages, dividends and profits and compensation in all forms of purchasing power in sufficient quantities to enable the people to buy back what they have produced. As a consequence, gradually surpluses pile up, and when those surpluses have piled up to a certain point and big inventories have accumulated, the wheels of industry stop. When the wheels of industry stop people are thrown out of work, there are less salaries and wages to distribute, and as a result we fall into a depression. We do not get out of a depression until we take corrective action of some sort. Thus far, I point out to my hon. friend, the only way we have pulled out of major depressions in the past—that is, really major depressions—has been through war. That is the only way we got out of the depression of the thirties. We came out of it as a consequence of war and producing things for war purposes. During that wartime fully a third of all we produced, the top third, was skimmed off and sent abroad and given away as gifts to our enemies. We prayed that they would not send it back in the forms in which they wanted to send it. We also must remember that the purchasing power generated in producing those goods remained at home.

My hon. friend ought to take note of these things and do a little careful study.

Let me just point out briefly, in closing, something that my hon. friend should also have kept in mind. I have said a good deal about the period of the Conservative regime from 1930 to 1935, during which little or nothing was done to haul us out of a depression. Now let me remind him of some of the things that have been done since. I have already pointed out that the war had done more than anything else to bring us out of the depression and restore purchasing power. I certainly decry the idea of waiting for wars to bring us out, but that is what will have to happen if we have many people with the mentality of my hon. friend from Notre Dame de Grace, because he will wait for the war.

We will never pull out any other way with his scheme of laissez faire. What else happened? What happened was that a very astute politician who used to sit across from us on this side of the house listened to this talk, listened to these ideas that were being put forward by those whom my hon. friend calls crackpots and said: There is something politically worth while in this. What did he do? He said: When these two million people who are now engaged in military effort come back and are rehabilitated into civil life and productive effort in Canada, what in the world are we going to do with all the production? We have not been able to any more than distribute what we have produced during the war without these two million.

He recognized that mechanization was going on apace, that automation was appearing, that the very things the hon. member spoke about this afternoon, automatic telephone exchanges and all that sort of thing, would soon be here in an increasing amount. So he said that something had to be done. How did he tackle the problem? He brought into being the family allowance program which has done a great deal to stabilize the economy and provide purchasing power to cover that part of production for which salaries, wages, dividends and profits just were not distributed and could not be distributed under our mechanized method of production.

He went further. He increased old age pensions to do a similar thing for people who had got beyond the years of productive effort. He also brought in increases in war veterans allowances and the like and, furthermore, developed what I think is one of the most balanced programs to look after unemployment that I know of, the unemployment insurance program of this government. All of that has served to distribute purchasing power to keep economic activity at a high level. But I point out to my hon. friend that, in spite of all these things, with the increasing rate of automation and the increasing displacement of manpower by automatic machines, in spite of the fact that we are spending billions for defence purposes to help our neighbours and allies, in spite of all these things we have developed this year 600,000 unemployed.

Well, for goodness' sake, it is about time somebody woke up to the facts. That alone is an indication that automation is catching up on us, that we are in a period of serious dislocation, and that we are going to have to face this situation sooner than my hon. friend thinks. We are going to have to put our minds to this whole business and study ways and means of making a proper adjustment of purchasing power so that our people can continue to buy.

Let me point out to my hon. friend that machines do not get married and raise families. They do not have to have wages and salaries to keep going, and they can work for a fraction of a cent an hour where it takes $1 an hour at the very minimum for a man to keep body and soul together. It is about time we began looking at these things sensibly. I say to the hon. member that it is a dangerous thing for him or anybody else to stand up on the floor of the nation's forum and call people who have put forward positive ideas about how to meet these difficulties and adjust our dislocations, crackpots, funny money artists and all that sort of thing. They have no solution at all.

I think it is necessary for the Minister of Labour, his unemployment insurance commission, perhaps others in his employ, and certainly all of us in the house to give very careful study to what we can do to make proper adjustments in the economy consequent upon automation. In my judgment it is a question of adjustment and the maintenance of a free flow of purchasing power to keep economic activity at a high level. If the Conservatives ever do come to power with the same attitude as that portrayed by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace I predict that Canada will suffer the most tragic and intensive depression ever dreamed of by a frightened people.

But I say it need not be. It will be utter stupidity if it is allowed because depressions come about as the consequence of foolish policies of foolish men and can be cured and prevented by the positive policies of thinking men. Out of intelligent discussion of our problems solutions can be developed, but I say that no solution is to be found in silly ridicule or name-calling such as we had this afternoon. We have faith. We believe this country can slide into the golden age if we use our God-given brains to make the adjustments we ought to be making to meet the social and economic dislocations that occur through ever-increasing automation.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, when the previous speaker rose he referred to the speech of the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace as being barren of ideas and then he proceeded to spend all his time answering barren ideas. I find it difficult to understand how one can go about refuting ideas that were never presented.

Mr. Blackmore: Did you overlook that scrip?

Mr. Ellis: I feel I should show some deference, Mr. Chairman, in entering into the family quarrel between the two sections of the Conservative party in Canada, the Social Crediters in the west—

Mr. Low: Do not forget you were classed among the crackpots.

Mr. Ellis: —and the Conservatives in the east. I did feel in listening to the hon. member for Peace River that he put forward some very cogent ideas, but I was not unaware of the fact that the ideas he presented were more in line with socialist philosophy than anything I have ever read in Social Credit publications. If the hon. member were to get up in the house some time and explain to us the A plus B theorem I think he would be getting closer to basic Social Credit philosophy. But what he does is to pick out a few ideas which are actually basic criticisms of the free enterprise system. He referred to the fact that only in time of war has the free enterprise system provided full employment and in the next breath he defended free enterprise. It seems to me that to be consistent one cannot criticize the banking, financial and economic systems of Canada in one breath and in the next breath proclaim himself as a great champion of the free enterprise system.

Mr. Low: I am a free enterpriser first, last and all the time.

Mr. Ellis: He told us about what the Social Crediters did some years ago, but in view of the fact that in the province of British Columbia a former Conservative is premier, a former Conservative is finance minister—

Mr. Low: Even they see the light once in a while.

Mr. Ellis: —and a former Conservative and director of one of the Canadian chartered banks is financial adviser, it seems rather strange that the speeches made by the hon. members to my left at that time are still being made at this stage in 1955 long after they have shed any Social Credit mantle they ever possessed. I will not pursue the matter further at this point. My only comment regarding the speech made by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is that, apart from being barren of ideas, I think it was typical of the attitude of mind of—and we should be thankful for it—a small segment of our population, the attitude that business can do no wrong, the old idea once expressed by Charles E. Wilson that what is good for General Motors is good for the United States. I think Al Capp dealt the death blow to that in his comic strip. He had a character known as General Bullmoose who stated on quite a number of occasions, "What is good for General Bullmoose is good for everybody." I thought that when the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace was speaking this afternoon he took the attitude that whatever was good for business must of necessity be good for the workers and the farmers. Business was out to take care of the working people of this country; business was out to maintain high wages and so forth. I need make no further comment on that point.

During the course of this debate we have been treated to a number of lectures on history, and as a teacher of history I find it very difficult to resist the temptation to refer to one point of fact that perhaps elaborates the comments made the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He referred to the labour difficulties in the city of Winnipeg, and to the fact that at that time a Conservative government, with indecent haste, passed a statute with the connivance and support of the Liberal opposition which had the effect of denying to Canadian citizens the fundamental rights which have always been considered to be part of the rights of British subjects. It was a government of the same party to which the hon. member for Prince Albert belongs. From time to time that hon. member has spoken in this house on the need for a bill of rights, and I agree with him 100 per cent. Certainly, however, the action taken by the Conservative government at that time would be in defiance of any bill of rights contemplated by any member of the house.

I can come closer to the present day with a little history. This morning I received a copy of the 128-page edition of the Regina Leader-Post, published of course in connection with our golden jubilee to be celebrated this year. In this special edition of the Leader-Post some of the history of Saskatchewan and the history of Regina is outlined. There is on page 10 of the third section a little bit of history in connection with an event which occurred in the city of Regina on July 1, 1935.

[Mr. Ellis.]

Hon. members will recall that under a Conservative regime the answer given to the single unemployed men was to put them away in relief camps, as they called them, for an indefinite period of time. In some cases it certainly went on for four years. The single unemployed men were expected to stay in enforced idleness, removed from their families and friends, taken out of the ordinary community life which I think all young Canadians would hope to enjoy, and with absolutely no hope for the future. These men, after being incarcerated in these relief camps or concentration camps for a period of time, decided that they wanted what we all believe to be the right of every Canadian, the right to work for a living. They took the only measure open to them and decided to come to the foot of the throne at Ottawa to lay before the government of this country their reasonable requests.

What were the requests of this group? The Regina Leader-Post story sums up the requests of the strikers at that time. There were six requests that they had to make of the Conservative government. The first was work at 50 cents an hour for unskilled men and at union rates for skilled men, for a five-day 30-hour week. In other words, they would work by the hour. They were anxious to spread the work around. It was not a question of making a great deal of money. All they asked was the establishment of a work and wages program to give them employment, even if it was a question of employing them on an hourly basis for only 30 hours per week. Then, they asked for compensation, social and unemployment insurance and the guarantee of their right to vote; recognition of the leaders of the strikers for negotiation purposes and an end of military control of relief camps.

No hon. member would suggest that these requests were unreasonable or out of line. When these men set out for Ottawa they got as far as Regina and, according to the bit of history in the Leader-Post, when the advance party arrived at Regina, they made a favourable impression. At that time the present Minister of Agriculture was the premier of Saskatchewan. These men made a good impression in the city of Regina, and when they came to the city every effort was made by the citizens of Regina to meet with them and to extend hospitality to them.

After a period of protracted negotiations the leaders of these single unemployed went to Ottawa to talk with the members of the Conservative cabinet. One newspaperman gives this report of an interview between one member of the delegation and the late Prime Minister Bennett. Mr. Bennett is quoted as saying:

> I ask you if you think you are playing the part of good citizens when you work against a country that is doing the best it can for you?

Now, there was an example of the attitude of the prime minister of Canada. Don't you fellows realize we are doing the best we possibly can for you? Ingrates coming to us and complaining! The thing is fantastic. These men were presenting their requests to the Conservative government at that time and they asked for a reasonable audience from the government. They were told by the Prime Minister that this country was doing all that it could, meaning the government was doing all it could, for them, and therefore they should be satisfied, be good citizens and go back to their relief camps where they should wait until the end of the depression. Here was the old idea that prosperity was just around the corner. If you waited long enough some day we might have a return to good times.

When the negotiations broke down, we know that on July 1—I am going to quote from the newspaper historical account—the following happened:

> Then without warning steel helmeted police, mounties and Regina city police among them, moved in on the meeting at 8.20 o'clock. Five or six of the "strike leaders" were arrested and were being led away when some stones were thrown.

In other words they arrested a number of men who had previously announced in the city of Regina that they were ready for arrest at any time. As a matter of fact, they might have welcomed it in order that they might present their case before the courts. They would not have damaged their case by being arrested for the simple exercise of their right as citizens to request action from the government. We know that as a result of that riot one man was killed and over a hundred people were injured, most of them Regina citizens. Most of the relief camp strikers never left the Regina stadium where they were billeted. There were over a hundred injured and a great deal of property was damaged in the city of Regina. There is the story. When the single unemployed men in Canada asked for work and wages, the Tories gave them bullets and tear gas. Is it any wonder that the attitude of the people in my part of the country towards the Conservative party underwent a dramatic change? Our people will never forget the brutality and callousness of the last Conservative government in this country.

When I heard the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Conservative party in Canada, get up and make some trips back into the history of this country to try to present the Conservative party as the friend of the workingman, I could not help but cast my mind back over those last days of the Conservative administration in this country from 1930 to 1935. Then, of course, according to Liberal spokesmen the depression was supposed to have ended in 1935. The other day in this house the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke of the great depression from 1930 to 1935. Let me tell him that there were over half the people of Saskatchewan on relief in 1936. Nothing the Liberals did at that time helped to bring about a solution of the unemployment problem. I mention this simply because the Leader of the Opposition has seen fit to go back into history to try to do the impossible, that is to try to portray the Conservative party as the friend of the workingman. A number of references along the same line were made by other speakers for the Conservative party. The hon. member for Greenwood the other day made an interjection with regard to the Winnipeg Labour trouble, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre answered, and I think rightly, by naming some of those people involved at that time, some of the people who were the most respected citizens in the city of Winnipeg. There was John Queen, who became mayor of that city, and Mr. J. S. Woodsworth who was perhaps the most respected man who ever sat in this House of Commons.

But I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Greenwood make some reference to those gentlemen in terms which indicated that they were communists of that time; I believe he said something to that effect.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question? If he will read what I said he will see that I said nothing of the kind. There is no man in the House of Commons who respected Mr. Woodsworth more than I did. I am glad to say here he was in my house as a guest.

What I did point out was that at that time what they were faced with, here at Ottawa, was signs of disorder such as there had never been. I read the clauses in the amendment, and I asked whether anyone would doubt what kind of men those clauses were directed against. It was communism. I do not care how good were the men the hon. member has mentioned; they were not the only people concerned. And the things that went on—well, if he will read them he will see that they were very different from those which would have been done by men like Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. Ellis: Of course I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member, but I certainly did not say that he mentioned those names in particular. But I think he will agree that the law certainly was applied, and as a matter of fact those gentlemen spent time in jail. Whether we now say that was an injustice—that may be. But, nevertheless, as a result of the law of that time certain men who certainly were not criminals or who were not guilty of any crime did spend time in jail. As a matter of fact, I believe one of them was elected to office while he was in jail.

Mr. Pouliot: And there was Arthur Meighen's telegram.

Mr. Ellis: To get back to the question to which I was referring, following the period of 1935, it would seem that the hon. member for Vancouver South was under the impression that the depression ended in 1935. I have here the number of people who were on relief in 1936, and there were 1,310,000 people on relief at that time. And yet the hon. member for Vancouver South seems to think that the depression was over, and that we had reached that corner around which prosperity was found.

I wish to make one reference to the remarks made the other day by the hon. member for Prince Albert. This is not the first occasion upon which he has made reference to the unemployment situation as it affects his province, and mine. In view of the fact that he has placed on the record two references to Saskatchewan which I think are inaccurate and misleading, to say the least, I wish to place a couple of figures on record, and to stress the fact that in Saskatchewan the problem of unemployment is related directly to farm income.

Saskatchewan is not an industrial province whatsoever. It is strictly an agricultural province. Secondary employment in Regina, for example, is related directly to farm income. I have received a communication from my own city regarding the unemployment situation there. I might say that the Trades and Labour Congress and the Regina labour council of the Canadian Congress of Labour in my city formed a joint committee to make a further investigation of the local situation, and they will be making a recommendation in due course. I wish to point out that in Canada as a whole we find that less than 14 per cent of those in the labour force are agricultural workers, whereas in Saskatchewan the reverse is true. There are not more than 25 per cent in the labour force of that agricultural province who could be classified as industrial, manufacturing or construction workers. And to get that 25 per cent figure you have to add in a number of store employees.

So you find that essentially Saskatchewan is an agricultural community. You cannot possibly compare the unemployment picture, for example in the city of Regina, with that in an industrialized city like the city of Windsor. And of course it is utterly fantastic to draw a parallel of that kind.

At no time have I or any member of this group made any effort to attach blame to any one part of the country so far as unemployment is concerned. It is a national problem. Unemployment is something that affects the entire dominion. But I do wish to repeat and to stress once again that in Saskatchewan unemployment is related directly to falling farm income.

I know the hon. member for Prince Albert will agree with me when I say that unemployment in Saskatchewan is directly related to farm income. And farm income is one of those things over which the provincial government has very little if any control. In our province our farmers are engaged in the production of agricultural commodities for overseas markets. Very little of our wheat is consumed here; we are on the export market. Consequently the policy adopted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce will determine the condition of agriculture in Saskatchewan. And indirectly of course it affects the employment picture in my own city. I have the figures here—

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the hon. member a question? Apparently he is going to base his argument on the fall in income of the farms in Saskatchewan last year. Was that not entirely due to the fact that there had been crop failures, and that the elevators had no room in which to put the wheat that had already been produced in other years?

Mr. Ellis: Well, Mr. Chairman, the reason there was no room was that the wheat was not being sold—wheat which should have gone out of the country to overseas markets.

Mr. Gardiner: The reason there was no room was that we had had the three biggest crops ever grown in Saskatchewan in the three preceding years.

Mr. Ellis: Well, I am not going to get into an argument over that just now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In interrupting the hon. member for Regina City I realize that he could quite easily say that the same type of interruption might have been made earlier in the debate. However, may I take this opportunity to point out to the committee that recent interjections would seem to show we are in grave danger of passing from a debate which should deal with labour to a debate based very largely on the Department of Agriculture, and possibly on the Department of Trade and Commerce. I realize the hon. member for Regina City is entitled to refer to anything which he considers has had an effect on labour; but I would ask him, and hon. members who follow him in the debate, not to go into detail about causes of conditions concerning an entirely different department to any greater extent than is absolutely necessary. It must be kept in mind that we are now discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Ellis: I have no intention of pursuing the matter further.

I have in my hand a news release issued jointly by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics showing the number of unplaced applicants at employment offices in various regional and local offices throughout Canada. I would note, incidentally, that this information is for February 17, which apparently is the latest information available. It reveals increases in many offices throughout Canada. If we get into the figures I would point out that in the prairie region, with special reference to the city of Regina, there was from January 20, 1955, to February 17, 1955, an increase of 135 in the number of unplaced applicants. In the city of Calgary there was an increase of 687 and in Edmonton an increase of 1,693.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about a comparison with the year before?

Mr. Ellis: The other evening the hon. member for Prince Albert was challenged by the hon. member for Winnipeg North to put figures on the record, and he refused to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Chairman; just a moment. On a question of privilege, I said I had already done so; and I repeat that now.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Where did you do it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Look at Hansard.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have, and I cannot find it.

Mr. Ellis: I happen to have Hansard here, and—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The percentages are there.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Percentages?

Mr. Ellis: I note the percentages are, yes. However, I do not think there is much point in going into that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ellis: I am not going to take the time to go through Hansard. The hon. member for Prince Albert was not prepared to be interrupted in the middle of his speech for two or three minutes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Read the percentages.

Mr. Ellis: However, I shall read the figures that I have in my hand from the dominion bureau of statistics. I note that as of February 17, 1955, there were applications for employment on hand in the national employment service offices as follows: In Regina, the figure was 5,160; in Fort William-Port Arthur, 7,391; in Edmonton, 14,592. I am not going to try to prove that the unemployment situation is any worse in Alberta than it is in Ontario, or that it is worse in British Columbia than it is in some other place. That is not the point I am trying to make. My point is that unemployment is a national problem. I do not think any useful purpose is served by some hon. member trying to cast aspersions on some particular provincial government. I would say to the hon. member for Prince Albert that if he has not enough confidence in the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in his province to let him carry on the provincial battle in that province, we of the C.C.F. have full confidence in our premier and the members of our government and the members of our legislature to carry on the provincial battle in the legislature.

There is not much to be gained by trying to malign a provincial government during the course of a debate of this kind. I realize that an election is taking place in Ontario, and perhaps some of the remarks of the hon. member might have been pointed in that particular direction. But I do want to refer to one other point which he made. It was not a point so much as it was a sort of inference; but the inference was sufficiently obvious that the hon. member for Temiscouata was able to get it right at the moment. He tried to convey the impression that the reason why there were so many unemployed in Saskatchewan was that the crown corporations have been laying off their employees, and these employees have been crowding the ranks of the recipients of unemployment insurance in that province.

I am going to put on the record some pertinent figures in that regard. I am going back two years. There is no use in going back a month or so. Let us go back a couple of years at a time when unemployment began really to surge ahead and become an increasingly serious problem in that province. In 1953 there were some 408,000 unplaced applicants at unemployment offices throughout Canada. At that time there were 3,700 employees of crown corporations in Saskatchewan. In 1955 the number of unplaced applicants in the national employment offices throughout Canada had risen to 632,913, as of March, 1955. And during that same time, when unemployment was increasing, the number of employees in crown corporations went up to the present figure of 4,000. Therefore, we find this picture. In 1953, there were fewer employees of crown corporations; there were fewer unemployed in Canada.

I am not going to argue whether unemployment has gone up. I say it has gone up, actually. Be that as it may. To leave the impression that the unemployment situation has been aggravated by wholesale dismissals of crown corporation employees of course is utterly absurd and not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. member give us the figures?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Will you give the figures?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will give the figures.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): You have never done it yet.

Mr. Ellis: I was sitting in my seat in the house when the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked the hon. member for Prince Albert to put the figures on record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: See March 15, 1953 Hansard at page 2033.

Mr. Ellis: He referred to the speech he had made in this house and I shall not take the time to look up the debate. I should have thought it would have been quite in order to place the figures on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the box factory employees?

Mr. Ellis: With respect to the Department of Labour, I want to re-emphasize the comment made by an hon. member on the other side of the house a short while ago that the Minister of Labour is in a very unenviable position as Minister of Labour. In view of the very serious unemployment situation in Canada, it is only natural that the public mind would be thinking of the Minister of Labour as being the chief villain in the piece so far as unemployment is concerned.

Some hon. members have already pointed out that the Department of Labour does not possess the powers to deal effectively with the general question of unemployment. Unemployment is something which must be put on the doorstep of the Prime Minister and the entire cabinet. Certainly the Minister of Labour is not in a position in his own department to deal effectively with a problem of that magnitude. Therefore, any criticism that we have made in respect to unemployment is certainly not levelled at the Minister of Labour. I am quite certain that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance possess far more powers to deal with the general questions of unemployment and related economic problems than the minister of the labour department who is charged with very limited responsibilities in this connection. But I do want to refer to one question that was raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the other evening, and it is the only one I want to emphasize. I refer to the question of vocational training.

For some time we have been a little concerned about the future of vocational training in Canada. I believe questions have been asked in the house with respect to the future of the vocational training program, and the answers were not too satisfactory. It would appear that vocational training is not getting the proper consideration that it deserves from the government. At a time like this vocational training is of more importance than ever before.

A great deal has been said about automation and technological advances in general. As we approach closer and closer toward this perhaps ultimate goal of automation, there is less and less room in the labour force for unskilled labour. There might have been a time a few years back when a part of our labour force consisted of largely unskilled labour; but gradually the numbers of unskilled labourers required in our labour force have been diminishing and as our requirements of unskilled labour diminish it is all the more important to get skilled persons to take on the various jobs as they arise throughout the country.

We know that throughout Canada a great many of our young people are leaving school at an early age. Not too many of them are going on to college and university. These young people have to be equipped to take jobs in the increasingly greatly industrialized era that we are entering. It is not something that is just starting; it has been going on for a long period of time, but there is an acceleration of that tendency today. Certainly now is the time when we need greater emphasis on vocational training, not just for our young people. What about our older citizens, particularly those over 40 years of age?

Yesterday, my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, referred to the closing of 1-B colliery in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. He pointed out that 60 per cent of the men who were put out of employment in that mine were 40 years of age and over. What is going to happen to those men? Mining has been their life work. Certainly, employment opportunities have to be provided for them somehow or other. If a man has been brought up as a skilled craftsman in his own particular line of work and suddenly he is denied further access to that type of work, he has to be given the necessary opportunity to adapt himself to a new type of employment. Now is the time when we should be giving an increasing emphasis to vocational training, not only for our young people but for our older people, those people who are being displaced day by day through this whole process of automation.

It seems to me that the government has taken a retrograde step. I do not know the reason for it. Has the Minister of Finance something to do with it? Has he figured that he has to lop off expenses by cutting down vocational training grants? If so, it is a shortsighted policy.

Mr. Harris: It is always the same. If you do not cut expenditures you are doing something wrong. If you do, then you are shortsighted.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any question in the minds of people throughout this country that at this time there is a need for the extension of vocational training facilities rather than a curtailment. If the minister knows some other answer, if he knows how we are going to fit workers, particularly older workers, who have not had an opportunity to learn the types of skill necessary to take on a different type of employment, perhaps he has the answer; but it seems to me that you have to provide employment for these men, and to be perfectly realistic about it you have to fit them to take new types of employment. Rather than cutting down on vocational training we should be extending it. I am quite sure that the board in my own city would be most happy to co-operate in the extension of vocational training facilities in that area to take care of this great need.

Mr. Harris: Can my hon. friend tell me how much money was spent in his city out of this grant for the elderly people he is talking about?

Mr. Ellis: I am referring to this vocational training grant for the training of tradesmen.

Mr. Harris: That is what the hon. member was talking about.

Mr. Ellis: I do not want to be led off the path by an interjection from the Minister of Finance. I am satisfied that the minister is fully cognizant of the need for the extension of vocational training. I think it is a question of convincing his colleagues in the government that now is the time to extend the vocational training facilities in this country rather than to curtail them.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I want to make one or two comments upon the remarks made by the hon. member for Regina City. It seems to me that there ought to be certain decencies in the political life we are engaged in, and I think it is a poor piece of business, particularly for a teacher, to spend his time sneering at one of the great public servants who toiled for this country as few people have toiled. I refer to the man who was prime minister from 1930 to 1935.

Let us be honest and admit that the period from 1930 to 1935 was a time when not only did world trade dry up but western Canada dried up. I was in business during those years and it was my duty to go to western Canada and I saw things there during the drought that I never thought possible. I saw sights that reminded me of what I imagined the Sahara desert looked like. But for people to come along now and criticize the men of those days, overlooking the situation as it existed then, and overlooking that we have new financial tools—we have the Bank of Canada which was set up by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—is not good business.

Mr. Quelch: The hon. member must have forgotten that 1932 was one of the heaviest crops western Canada ever had but the price of wheat was only 19 cents a bushel.

Mr. Macdonnell: I said the years from 1930 to 1935. There may have been one good year and I did not say that all the years were drought years. So far as the price of wheat is concerned, I pointed out that world trade had dried up as well as western Canada. The only thing I want to say is that for anyone to sneer at the men of those days who were doing the best they could in the light of those days is a poor piece of business. As a matter of fact it was R. B. Bennett who took the pioneer action of guaranteeing the price of wheat.

Mr. Ellis: Would the hon. member permit me to make a statement. I did not intend to create the impression that I was sneering at R. B. Bennett. I was criticizing him, not personally, but as one of the leaders of the Conservative party.

Mr. Macdonnell: If the hon. member says that he was not sneering I accept his word, but that was the impression I got. That is why I rose to my feet because I considered R. B. Bennett to be a great citizen who served this country in times of incredible difficulties and it is a poor piece of business to be trying to diminish his reputation.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister not going to answer some of the many questions?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I have followed this far-flung discussion yesterday and today and have made a great many notes. I think it would add to the orderliness of the discussion if I were to state that as we reach the particular items in my estimates I shall do my utmost to answer the questions and comments and criticisms that have been made with regard to those items. I would make one reservation in that I did promise that I would reply to a criticism made before dinner by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I would like to do that. If we do not reach the fair employment practices item, which is only the third or fourth item, before 9.58 o'clock I shall answer his comment then.

Item agreed to.

175. Annuities Act—administration, $1,015,522.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I have had some correspondence recently in connection with annuities. The trouble seems to be that there is no cash surrender provision in connection with annuities. I think it was 1951 when the government introduced a bill containing a cash surrender clause. I am sure the minister must remember this. As I say, if a man takes out an annuity he cannot possibly get his money back. This is what the department tells me.

I should like to ask the minister if the government has any intention in the near future of amending the annuities act so that under extenuating circumstances the annuitant would be able to get back his money. In the case I have in mind a man has lost his car and is forced to sell some of his household effects. He has an annuity but he cannot touch it. Perhaps the minister can answer me now, or even later. Apparently the bill that the government brought down before to which I have referred was dropped by the wayside somewhere.

Mr. Gregg: It is not the intention of the government, at this session at any rate, to bring in an amendment to make the equity in an annuity refundable. The whole act has had consideration, but the particular provision just suggested would seem to be out of harmony with the original intention of the annuity plan which was to encourage thrift for old age.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mrs. Fairclough: When the supplementary estimates were up for consideration in March they contained an item of $26,000 on which very little explanation was given. I believe I intimated to the committee at that time that when the main item came up I would ask some questions about it. If my memory serves me well, I asked what that $26,000 was for and was told that additional commissions had had to be paid because of additional sales of annuities which had not been anticipated by the department. At that time, again I am trusting to my memory, the Minister of Finance agreed with that statement. Despite that and the fact that I gained the impression that he expected this picture to continue and that there would be more annuities sold this year than there were last year, I find the same amount in the estimates appropriated for commission to agents as there was in the estimates for last year, that is $270,000. I should like to know just what the situation really is. If the trend is towards greater and greater sales, that is poor budgeting. If, on the other hand, it was a once-in-a-lifetime sale, I would be interested to know just what it was that caused the additional expenditure of $26,000. Was it a general increase in business, was it industrial coverage for a large number of people, or just what did occasion that $26,000 additional appropriation?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, the explanation given in regard to the supplementary estimates was correct, that the sales that were made last year had accrued commissions for which we did not have enough money. Perhaps my hon. friend would permit me later on to refer more definitely to her inquiry with regard to comparing the amount set out for commissions this year, $270,000, with the $296,000 for last year. I should be glad to do that.

Mrs. Fairclough: I asked this question of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Labour not being in the house at the time this item was passed. He did not have the information at his fingertips. I intimated that I intended to ask the Minister of Labour whether this was a general increase; was it one large coverage that was sold, or just what did occasion that amount of $26,000? I am sure the minister follows me. If there was a general increase in business, why is that amount not appropriated for this year also? If the sale of annuities is becoming so popular and the agents so active that they are gradually increasing business, then why is an increased amount not in the estimates this year?

Mr. Gregg: That is the point I should like to make sure about. I can say that the increased amount of commission asked for in the supplementary estimates was due to a general increase in business last year. I cannot for the moment say why we were a little pessimistic about future business in making up what is here our main estimates for this year.

Mrs. Fairclough: I understand that there are two groups of agents, ordinary salesmen and postmasters.

Mr. Gregg: Our sales force is pretty steady.

Mrs. Fairclough: I notice also that in this department, quite apart from the commission, last year there was an expenditure of $1,009,597, as against an appropriation of $997,528. I suppose that the increase of $26,000 would be included in that. Despite that, the appropriation for this year is even another $6,000 higher than the expenditure. It is hard to reconcile these figures without taking out the $26,000. You really have to add the $26,000 to the original appropriation of last year, and you get $1,023,000. The estimated expenditure is $1,009,000. I do not want to pin the minister down at this time of night to a full statement on expenditures, but I rather think that if we got to the bottom of the $26,000 we would get an idea of what the rest of it is about.

Mr. Thatcher: I too do not wish to hold up these estimates at this time of night but I do want, for the third consecutive year, to object to this expenditure. In my opinion it simply cannot be justified. During 1955 the government is proposing to spend $1,015,000 on the administrative costs of annuities. I think it is worth while noting that such an amount is about $18,000 more than last year. I think hon. members, as they look at this expenditure, should keep in mind the original purpose of this annuities legislation. The original Government Annuities Act was passed in 1908. The reason it was passed was to help people of moderate means to put away money for their old age. Since that time of course old age pension legislation has been passed. Despite that fact I still think there is a place in our over-all social security system for annuities. As a matter of fact, I am one who thinks that probably the ceiling should be increased from $1,200 to $2,400. At the same time, I feel very strongly that this annuities department should be placed on a self-sufficient basis. There is no earthly reason why the taxpayers of Canada should be subsidizing these annuities. It is worth while noting that, in addition to this administrative item, the government is paying out a substantial sum each year to keep the fund on a sound basis. During 1955, I believe, it is about $250,000. In past years the sum has been considerably higher.

That means that this year the taxpayer of Canada is subsidizing the annuities branch, or to be more exact, those who hold annuities, to the extent of $1,265,000. Since this legislation originated, the over-all subsidy now totals more than $32 million. Now, I contend, as I have contended in the past, that government policy in this respect should be changed. I am all in favour of government annuities being sold at cost; I think that is sensible. I do not think the government should try to sell these annuities at a profit. But I certainly do not think that the government should continue to sell annuities at a loss.

If such a policy were followed the annuities branch could still sell these annuities at less than insurance companies could sell similar policies. I take this attitude tonight particularly because so few people are benefiting from this subsidy. Last year a total of 18,466 individual and group contracts were issued. That means, in other words, that the taxpayer of Canada subsidized each and every contract, for administrative costs alone, to the extent of $54. As I see it, the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of Finance, should give serious consideration to changing government policy, so that these annuities are sold at a price which is sufficient, first of all, to cover administrative costs, and secondly, to keep the fund solvent.

I can see no reason whatever why the taxpayer of Canada should be called upon to subsidize a scheme which is used by only a small minority of our population, most of whom are in no need of such government assistance. Moreover, I see no reason why the government must employ 174 people at the taxpayers' expense, simply to sell an article at below cost and in competition with existing companies. Today it is not always—indeed, very frequently it is not—people in low income groups who buy annuities. Quite often it is people who are in the higher wage category who buy the annuities.

Many people say that the cost of government should be brought down. If hon. members believe that fact, I suggest that this is a good place where they could start trimming. Therefore I move:

> That item 175, on page 31 of the estimates, which calls for an expenditure of $1,015,522, be reduced to the sum of $1.

If I need a seconder, the hon. member for Chicoutimi will second this motion.

Mr. Sinclair: Party solidarity.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to say a word or two about the amendment now before the committee. First of all, may I say that I do not hold any annuities. I have never been able to buy any, but I can see the advantage of having them. I would agree with the mover of the amendment to the extent of saying that the department, particularly the annuities branch, is overmanned. I think some economy could be practised in that regard and maybe they could save enough money to balance the accounts. But I do not think it would be a good thing to do away with the government annuities branch. I maintain this is one instance where the ordinary working individual has an opportunity to make an investment which gives him a fair and decent return.

Mr. Thatcher: I think so too.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre says he agrees with that.

Mr. Thatcher: Just make it self-sufficient.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It seems to me that to give the ordinary little man a place to invest his money so that he can draw a fair amount of interest on it and have some security is a worth-while thing to do. It is the sort of investment that is not available to him from any private organization I know of at that rate of interest. I have investigated the matter with the insurance companies and I find that what they have to offer cannot compare with government annuities.

I want to take exception to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Selkirk. I would be very sorry indeed to see any cash surrender clause provided in the annuities legislation whereby the money could be withdrawn. To me that is a safeguard to be retained. I do not think any person who has worked hard to save enough money to invest in an annuity so that he can have some form of benefit in his later years should be allowed because of financial stress or simply because he wishes to do so to withdraw that money and then live in poverty after that. I can understand the hon. member's concern. There might be an elderly person who had a doctor bill that should be paid, but I would be the last one in the world to say that they should cash in their annuity in order to pay a doctor bill, much as I would like to see them pay it. My experience is that the doctors probably can get along a little bit better than the person who is in such need that they want to cash their annuity in order to pay the bill. Then they would not have the benefit of a monthly annuity payment to assist them in their old age.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

No, Mr. Chairman, I would not sanction a cash surrender provision being put into the annuity legislation. I think it should be left exactly as it is. If a person has an ordinary straight annuity they should be protected against all claims so that they will be able to draw their monthly cheque to assist them in their time of need and be able to make use of the assistance which they worked so hard to provide.

Mr. Harkness: Possibly I should not even speak on this particular subject because I happen to possess one of the annuities which I took out in the year 1928. In view of what has happened in Alberta in the last three or four weeks it may be I am disqualified from sitting in the house because I have one of these annuities. I am not too sure of my position from that point of view. My main reason for rising was to ask, with reference to the very considerable amount of $475,177 estimated for this year for staff wages, and being part of the total of $1,600,000 odd, whether it is all charged against the general annuities scheme or whether it is a straight contribution by the people of Canada towards the plan.

Mr. Gregg: It is a straight contribution of the taxpayers towards the annuities plan. I should like to refer to the question of the hon. member for Hamilton West. In both cases, for 1954-55 and for 1955-56, the answer is that it was a case of underestimating at the time the main estimates were prepared. We are called upon in October to make up our estimates, and at that time it was not clear how much would be needed for commissions. We asked for $26,000 more last year, and I have to tell the Minister of Finance that we will be asking for $35,000 in the supplementary estimates this year. If I have permission, I should like to refer, before ten o'clock is called, to the very special question raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. He charged that the government is violating the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. He based his charge on a document which he held in his hand and which he indicated called for certain information that was contrary to the spirit and the letter of the act. I should like to tell him and the house that the unemployment policy of the government is of course conducted by the civil service commission—the employment policy, I mean. I have heard so much about unemployment!

Mr. Knowles: The truth will out.

Mr. Gregg: The carrying out of the policy of the federal government in employing staff is the task of the civil service commission, and the commission does attempt to carry out fully the letter and the spirit of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. Needless to say, the government believes that should be done.

The hon. member kindly sent me the document he had in his hand this afternoon, and I was glad to see that it was not an application for employment in the civil service at all but rather a confidential questionnaire used for security purposes only. It is used in connection with personnel occupying vulnerable posts so far as security is concerned. I am told that only with persons holding or applying for posts that may give access to vital information or some other similar matter is this form used.

In view of what I have said, I hardly think its use in this way is contrary to section 11 of the act which reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to require a person to employ anyone or to do or refrain from doing any other thing contrary to any instruction, direction or regulation given or made by or on behalf of the government of Canada in the interests of the safety or security of Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I must take issue with the minister on this subject. In the first place, the act deals with something more than with forms of application for employment. The act states in subsection 5 of section 4:

> No person shall . . . make any written . . . inquiry in connection with employment that expresses either directly or indirectly any limitation, specification or preference as to race . . .

And so on. This is a written inquiry. It certainly is not a questionnaire concerning employment. It is a written inquiry, and the minister tells me now that this inquiry is only used in those tender, soft spots where security may be at stake. But how is the security of Canada safeguarded by finding out what a civil servant's father's nationality was? How is the security of the state furthered by finding out the nationality of the dead parent of a civil servant? I may say I did not get this document from the person who received it originally from whatever branch of the government it was he was in. I got it from an intermediary. I am informed on what I consider to be good authority that the position this person was seeking was as sensitive as that of member of parliament, and members of parliament are not allowed to know too much.

I am quite certain that despite the belief of the minister this form has been used in other departments of government. I have no objection at all to the most stringent security regulations. After all, they are necessary. I cannot imagine, from the point of view of security and protecting Canada against possible treachery—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. At the moment, the committee is entirely out of order, for which I am responsible. I understood that for some particular reason it was the sense of the committee that the minister should be given an opportunity to reply today to a question asked earlier. Apparently the minister's reply is of such a nature or the item is of such a nature that it is going to provoke quite a debate which obviously belongs under resolution No. 178 dealing with the administration of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. I am afraid it cannot be continued under an amendment to reduce the item for the administration of the annuities act. There is an amendment before us on item 175. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mrs. Fairclough: I believe that some of our members wish to speak to this question and since it is now past ten o'clock I ask you to call it ten o'clock.

Item stands.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock, shall I report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again?

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall take the committee of the whole on Bill No. 188, the Government Employees Compensation Act, committee of the whole on Bill No. 279, the great lakes fisheries convention; the second reading of Bill No. 351 respecting Canadian National Railways; second reading of Bill No. 352 respecting the inspection of meat and meat products; the resolution stage of the bill with respect to national standards for agricultural products; the resolution with respect to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act; the second reading of Bill No. 5 to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; the second reading of Bill No. 350 to amend the Blind Persons Act.

If I might have the indulgence of the house for just one moment, I would ask the serious consideration of all members to the business of the house for the next few weeks. We had all, I think, hoped earlier, if I may say so, that we might conclude the session some time about the middle of June. I should like to point out that there are six or seven committees still functioning and meeting two and in some cases three times a day. It would be desirable to get the committee work cleaned up, I would hope, during the course of the next week, if at all possible, so that very shortly after that it would be possible to meet in the mornings in the house.

What I say now is not by way of criticism at all of anyone or any group, but often we find, sir, that in the last two weeks we have to do more contraction perhaps of what members would like to say and do than should be necessary if we started a little rationing a little earlier. I should like to point out that in this particular debate on labour we took almost nine hours, I think about eight and three-quarter hours, to carry the first item. We took a little over three hours to carry the first item last year, and I do not think there is any particular reason for that. We had a long unemployment debate in both sessions, so I just appeal to hon. members to bear in mind that if we would have the time to give full consideration to all the business that is going to come before parliament we might consider, beginning on Monday, endeavouring to find a way to state party positions and individual positions with perhaps a little less debate than we have had.

Mrs. Fairclough: If I could comment on the minister's remarks and his reference to the fact that the debate on the first item of labour estimates last year took but three hours, I would remind him that it was about the next to the last day of the session and the whole thing was considered very quickly with the co-operation of both sides of the house.

Mr. Harris: That is my point. If, beginning on Monday, we would state our positions of course on all legislation and on all estimates, but nevertheless keeping debate down to a minimum, we would not have to contract an important debate in the last week.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a question? Will the business on Tuesday be a continuation of that which is not concluded on Monday?

Mr. Harris: I hope we will take the remainder of the legislation on the order paper, having disposed of all that I mentioned for Monday.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister what he intends to do about setting up the committee on atomic energy?

Mr. Harris: I am not in a position to say. I shall try to answer that on Monday.

It being nine minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS AND CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 188, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act—Mr. Gregg—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Compensation.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, this bill was before the standing committee on industrial relations and from the study it was given there, it was decided that a clarification might well be made at two places in the bill. When we reach those, I shall ask one of my colleagues to move the amendments.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the amendments to which the minister refers now being in our hands, we are quite satisfied with them and will indicate our acceptance when the time comes.

I would just like to say one word about this bill in general. I know the minister recognizes the concern we feel about the phrase which occurs all through this bill indicating the province. "The usual place of employment" is the term ordinarily used. We are very much concerned lest any misunderstanding of the intent should at any time hold up payment or consideration of payment to an injured workman. We ask the minister to make sure there shall be no delay at any time, and that no controversy shall arise as to the province which shall have jurisdiction over any workman. The minister is given the power in this act to name the province. I hope that at all times the matter of settlement will be expedited, rather than have any workman suffer by reason of delay or confusion.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Compensation and persons eligible.

The Chairman: May I point out to hon. members that clause 2 has been amended in the committee by the insertion of a comma after the word "Majesty" in line 27. Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Mr. Churchill: That is not the amendment we understood was to be presented. It was not just the insertion of a comma, but a change in the phraseology.

Mr. Sinclair: I move:

That clause 2 of the bill be amended by deleting subsection 1 of section 3 of the said act as it appears in the bill and that the following be substituted therefor:

"3. (1) Subject to this act,

(a) an employee who

(i) is caused personal injury by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, or

(ii) is disabled by reason of an industrial disease due to the nature of his employment, and

(b) the dependents of an employee whose death results from such accident or industrial disease, are, notwithstanding the nature or class of such employment, entitled to receive compensation at the same rate and under the same conditions as are provided under the law of the province where the employee is usually employed respecting compensation for workmen and the dependents of deceased workmen, employed by persons other than Her Majesty, who

(c) are caused personal injuries in that province by accidents arising out of and in the course of their employment, or

(d) are disabled in that province by reason of industrial diseases due to the nature of their employment, and such compensation shall be determined by the same board, officers or authority as that established by the law of that province for determining compensation for workmen and dependents of deceased workmen employed by persons other than Her Majesty or by such other board, officers or authority, or by such court as the governor in council may direct.

Mr. Winch: This is a small point, Mr. Chairman, and perhaps I may have misunderstood you, but as you read the amendment I noticed that the verb was "is" under (c) and then under (d) you said "are". Is there any reason for that difference or is that only a slip of the tongue?

The Chairman: May I read (c) and (d) again in order to remove any misunderstanding. They read as follows:

(c) are caused personal injuries in that province by accidents arising out of and in the course of their employment, or

(d) are disabled in that province by reason of industrial diseases due to the nature of their employment, . . .

And so on. The word "are" is used in both cases.

Mr. Winch: I understood you to say "is".

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Government Employees Compensation Act

On clause 4 (renumbered as 5)—Death of employee at place other than that of employment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This point has to do with clause 4. I should like to ask the minister whether he would give some consideration to adding the province of Saskatchewan to the province of Alberta as therein provided. The clause reads:

> Where an employee is usually employed in the Yukon Territory or in the Northwest Territories, he shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be usually employed in the province of Alberta.

Great developments are taking place in the Northwest Territories immediately north of the northern boundary of Saskatchewan, and there will be further developments in the near future. Those developments being contiguous to the province of Saskatchewan, should any proceedings be taken in respect of compensation to a person entitled under the act, provision should also be made for the right of that person to have it regarded, for the purposes of this act, that he be employed in the province of Saskatchewan. I do not think any of the territories are north of the province of Manitoba, but if they are the province of Manitoba should be included as well.

I suggest that is in keeping with the developments that have taken place in the territories. A few years ago these developments were exclusively in the areas of the Northwest Territories contiguous to the northern boundary line of Alberta. Today, however, with the developments taking place in the Northwest Territories directly adjacent to the northern boundary of Saskatchewan, I ask the minister whether he would not consider adding the province of Saskatchewan in that section.

Mr. Gregg: This will become clause 5 if the amendment is passed, but perhaps you would permit me, Mr. Chairman, to answer my hon. friend on the point he has just made. I can tell him no representations were made to the standing committee on industrial relations with regard to the province of Saskatchewan with respect to compensation applicants from the Northwest Territories. I admit that strong representations were made on behalf of the province of British Columbia. But when consideration was given to all the factors it did seem to my department that a more expeditious carrying out of these applications could be done for the present at least through the province of Alberta. I can assure members from British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba that if as we go forward it appears there are advantages to be gained by having it done in several provinces rather than in one, I will certainly give full consideration to the matter if I am minister of labour, but I do not think it would be useful to do it at the present time.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister explain why it is more expeditious for a person coming within the ambit of the act and working immediately north of the northern boundary of Saskatchewan, for example, to be deemed to be employed in the province of Alberta? As I recollect the statistics I have seen, at least half of those employed are from the province of Saskatchewan. Why should those people, for the purpose of so-called convenience, be deemed to be employed in the province of Alberta? I can understand section 5 very well. It states:

> Where an employee, other than a person locally engaged outside Canada, is usually employed outside Canada he shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be usually employed in the province of Ontario.

I can understand the reason for not having a multiplicity of loci for employment purposes, but I cannot understand why there should be this concentration of development in the Northwest Territories into the province of Alberta. I feel this is happening not only in connection with the matter before us now but with regard to other matters. I think the minister might give consideration to the request, which in my opinion is reasonable. Certainly the experience in the last couple of years of those of us who live in Saskatchewan has been that there is a continuing channelling of the development in the Northwest Territories and also in northwestern Saskatchewan into Alberta.

I believe this is not an unreasonable request. Certainly an equal number, if not most, of the employees in the areas north of Saskatchewan are from Saskatchewan, and there is no justification whatever for deeming them to be usually employed in the province of Alberta. I know that practically all the developments taking place in northern Saskatchewan, and even in Saskatchewan as a whole, are being by-passed in favour of developments in the city of Edmonton and the province of Alberta. While that city is represented in the government by a minister who is concerned with northern development, nevertheless we in Saskatchewan believe—and believe fairly, I suggest—that we have a right to consideration; and that area of northern Canada which will become greater as the years go by should not, by legislation or otherwise, be channelled into any one direction, namely in the direction of the city of Edmonton.

When I make this statement I am expressing a view held generally in Saskatchewan, without regard to party considerations. We believe these developments contiguous to our province should not be considered as the monopoly or the right of a province not contiguous to the areas in question.

At the moment I am not considering an amendment, but I do feel that the minister's argument, when he says it would be more expeditious for a person north of Saskatchewan to have to go into Alberta to have his claim considered under the compensation laws there provided for government employees, has behind it an explanation other than the convenience of the individual. I would ask the minister to explain how it is considered there would be any added convenience for an employee in the area north of Saskatchewan, where major developments are now taking place, to do as he has suggested. I would ask him to tell the committee why it would be more convenient that such person be subject to the law of Alberta, as a resident of that province would be.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, on this same subject—and I am speaking with a view to obtaining information rather than of making a statement—I understood the minister to say that the procedure he has suggested would be more expeditious. I understood him to say that both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon would be considered in this instance as coming under the workmen's compensation act in Alberta.

I cannot understand why this should be so, and I am asking the minister for some enlargement of his earlier statement. The Yukon is north of British Columbia. All the systems of transportation to the Yukon go through British Columbia, either along the Alaska highway, or by the air lines from Fort St. John. Therefore I suggest that, from the standpoint of operating with expedition, communication by transportation passes through British Columbia either by road or by air.

Then in addition I believe the workmen's compensation act in British Columbia is just about the best to be found anywhere in Canada. I suggest, therefore, that from the standpoint of expedition and equity in the matter of transportation, and from the standpoint of the excellence of British Columbia workmen's compensation legislation, these claims should be handled by the province that is closest. I fail completely to understand the statement by the Minister of Labour, and I hope he will explain not only what he means but how his department came to the conclusion he has indicated today.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Vancouver East. I can see no reason why Alberta should be selected for the purpose indicated. I do not know what the minister will think of my suggestion, but I am wondering why the section should not read in this way:

> Where an employee, other than a person locally engaged outside Canada, is usually employed outside Canada, he shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be usually employed in the province immediately south of his location in the Northwest Territories.

I do not see why any one province should be picked out in this instance. And I certainly agree with some other statements made by the hon. member for Prince Albert in this connection. If we are going to select any province I cannot see any better argument for selecting Alberta than there would be for the selection of any other province, including Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, this matter is of importance, of course, but I wish to point out that it will have no importance in the development of the province in which these claims are handled.

During 1954-55 we have had in the Northwest Territories a total of 294 claims, 156 of which required only local medical aid. Since I brought in the amendment before—and, by the way, this is not a new amendment; it is just a carrying forward of existing procedure—the matter has been very thoroughly worked out with the government of the Northwest Territories and with the department of government here in Ottawa responsible for their administration.

There were a number of factors to be considered. For instance, the ordinances of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories are based upon Alberta rates. It is basic, of course, to this legislation that the benefits be similar to those available to workers in the same area. If one were to take the relatively small number of accidents that occur among federal government employees in the northwest country and were to have the employees of some companies claiming in British Columbia, others in Alberta and others in Saskatchewan, I am quite sure it would make for more delay than if they were to be done through one channel.

It is not necessary, of course, for an applicant to travel to make his claim. He can make it where the accident takes place. The experience we have had and the discussions which have taken place in the committee would indicate that at least for the present the suggested procedure would be in the best interests of the claimant. It is not because of the benefit to the administration, but rather because we can give better service to the claimant who suffers an accident and submits a claim on account of that accident.

Mr. Winch: I do not wish to hold up this legislation, but I would ask the minister to explain why he considers this is for the benefit of the claimant. What is the advantage for the claimant who is injured in the Yukon or in the Northwest Territories when his application must go through Alberta? I agree with the minister when he says there is no advantage to any province that handles these cases, because the federal government reimburses that province only to the extent of the actual expenditures and a share of the administration costs, in accordance with the amount of work that has to be done. Actually it is an added burden on a province; therefore I am looking at it only from the point of view of the person who is injured. From that point of view, and that alone, I maintain that in the interests of the claimants they should be permitted to go to that province that can give them the best return. And I say, with all due respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan, that British Columbia can do that. Where is the advantage to the claimant who must go through Alberta, and not through Saskatchewan or British Columbia?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I can give that at once. If the legislation required that the applicant should go through the province immediately to the south, British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan, it would be necessary to take a map of the Northwest Territories and say that those who are working within certain limits shall go to Saskatchewan, and none other. Those who are working in those limits shall go to Alberta, and none other. I can visualize prospectors flying over the Northwest Territories, not knowing when they pass those imaginary lines. It would be a very great deal of work to undertake for a very small amount of employee compensation work involved.

Mr. Winch: Where do prospectors come in under this act?

Mr. Gregg: Employees of the federal department of mines who may be prospecting in the north country would certainly come under this act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps the minister can explain the difference between the workmen's compensation acts in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba? Is there any difference between the acts? If so, in what particular; for in determining the matter of expedition I do not think the minister answers the criticism when he says that after all there are not going to be many cases. Everyone will join with him in the hope for a minimum of accidents. Why do you choose the province of Alberta? Has it a better workmen's compensation act than the other provinces? Can the minister say in what particular the act is better? If the act is not better, there is no serious difficulty in the way of altering the section to read, "in the province directly south of the place where the accident has taken place", or words to that effect.

The minister said you would need a map. Well, that is not very difficult. You know what the parallels are. If it is within a certain parallel, then it is the province of Saskatchewan; if it is within another parallel it is the province of Alberta, or the province of British Columbia. I repeat, this is another example of what we in the province of Saskatchewan most definitely resent, namely the concentration of developments in the northern parts of Canada adjacent to our province which are more and more forcibly, and under legislation and direction, finding their way from our province into the province of Alberta.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Winch: I have one more question. I am very interested in this matter. Just what were the strong representations that were made by the province of British Columbia? I have not seen them. The minister said strong representations were made. May I ask what they were?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, they were very much the same as my hon. friend has made to this committee, but they were by members from the province of British Columbia before the standing committee on industrial relations.

I should also like to tell the hon. member for Prince Albert that the primary consideration in this matter, in the opinion of the members of the committee, and in the opinion of the department, is the speed with which a claim may be processed and the applicant taken care of. I will state to him in general terms that the workmen's compensation benefits in the province of Alberta are not quite equal to those of the province of British Columbia or of the province of Saskatchewan. The difference, however, is not very great.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the minister himself had some doubts as to the efficacy of his rule of thumb, for I see that under clause 10 a substitution is to be made. A little later the following provision is to be made:

> Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the minister may make regulations for determining, for the purpose of this act, the place where an employee is usually employed . . .

Why is the minister, by order in council, to have the power to override clause 4, which provides that the employee shall be deemed to be usually employed in the province of Alberta? Clause 10 provides that the minister may make regulations for determining, for the purpose of this act, the place where the employee is usually employed. Why does the minister ask for the power in a later clause to override the absolute powers of clause 4?

Possibly he can explain that at this time. It might clarify the reasons for clause 4; for it seems strange to me that in one section of the act provision is made that such and such a province shall be deemed to be the place where an employee is usually employed, and then another section provides that the governor in council may, by order in council, make regulations for determining, for the purposes of this act, the place where an employee is usually employed. To me that does not seem to make sense. Why the definite provision in one section, and in a later amended section the provision that the governor in council may himself alter the express words of a statute?

That is another power we did not object to at the time, but it is certainly a most unusual thing to say in one section that a person shall be deemed to be resident within a certain province as far as the application of the act is concerned, and then in another section that the minister, through the governor in council, whatever the actual words of the statute may be, may change them at his whim for any reason. I cannot understand why there should be any insistence on the provision that for the purposes of this act the person shall be deemed to be usually employed in the province of Alberta. Why is it so necessary to make explicit reference to the particular province unless there is some purpose in mind?

Expedition does not appeal to me, which is the argument the minister put forward. It is equally expeditious whatever the western province may be. I suggest that the Alberta compensation act is believed by his departmental officials or himself to be a more effective or efficient act than the acts of the other provinces. If that is the reason, then let us have the information. It will clarify the matter a great deal.

Mr. Gregg: The clarification of the expression "usually employed" in the discussions of the standing committee had no particular relation to the item which is now before us, namely the matter affecting the Northwest Territories. It was felt by the committee that there might need to be a clarification of that expression "usually employed" as it appears in various places in the bill. In order that this might be done, whether the accident took place within Canada or whether it took place in another part of the world with respect to a Canadian civil servant, there should be authority to make a clarification, if it should be necessary; but it has nothing particularly to do with this matter of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Winch: I still have one more question to ask the minister, because I think it is only right that hon. members should have a clarification of what is meant and what the plans of the department are. In my day I have had a good deal to do with many hundreds of workmen's compensation cases. I can see some of the problems under this section. If the section goes through the way it is now and a person is injured in the Yukon or in the Northwest Territories, will he be considered as coming under the compensation act of the province of Alberta? What are the particulars the department has worked out in the case of a person injured in the Northwest Territories who becomes either a total disability case or a permanent partial disability case?

I am certain the minister must know that if an injury occurs in a certain province, or in this case in a territory, it would have to go through the province, but the home of that person may be somewhere else. He may be on partial disability or total disability, and then he would come under the compensation laws of that province, in this case the province of Alberta.

If his home were in British Columbia—and I imagine as far as the territories are concerned there must be quite a few who consider their homes to be in that province—if further medical examination or attention were required, or if there were to be an adjustment in the degree of disability, then the board of that province could function only with the authorization of the workmen's compensation board of Alberta.

Although the number of injuries that might occur in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon would likely be small, I would imagine the majority of those concerned would not be residents of Alberta. I think we should hear from the minister whether consideration has been given to that phase of the problem, and what determination has been arrived at as to how these cases can be handled. Is the situation to remain as it is now, so that no matter whether a man is a TD or PPD he will have to go through the province of Alberta in order to obtain any adjustment in the way of medical attention or hospitalization?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend will look up certain portions of the proceedings of the committee—I will send him the page numbers—I think he will find a complete reply to his question. Under the old act, if a man were injured in the Northwest Territories he came under the laws of Alberta regardless of where his home base was. The intention of this bill is to provide that federal government employees working in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon who are injured will come under the laws of the province in which the federal department establishment under which they are employed is located.

If an official from Ottawa who is on a department establishment here proceeds to the Northwest Territories and meets with an accident, he will receive compensation under the Ontario laws. The same thing would hold true if he were a federal civil servant who proceeded from Vancouver or Victoria to the Yukon and met with an accident. The man injured would come under the laws of the province in which he was usually employed, in that case British Columbia.

There was a long discussion in the committee because there was some fear that there might be a misunderstanding of the phrase "usually employed". The minister was given the right to work out regulations to cover that point. If a government employee was usually employed and had his base in Saskatchewan and was injured while working in the Northwest Territories, he would come under the provisions of the Saskatchewan law. Only those working under establishments or in federal offices located within the Northwest Territories come under this special dispensation applying to Alberta.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, perhaps at this point I could ask the minister a question. As the minister has said, this point was the subject of considerable discussion in the committee. I think the reason it did not have more discussion was that members from British Columbia did not oppose it too strongly, though it was mostly British Columbia members who objected to it.

I think there should be some clarification of this situation. Both in the standing committee and in the committee of the whole the minister has referred to the phrase "usually employed" as meaning the place from which the pay cheques are issued. I should like to know how many federal offices there are in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Gregg: I do not believe I have that information here. There are offices of the unemployment insurance commission, and there would be offices of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I could get that information, but the number of federal employees in offices there would not be very large.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am not concerned with the number of employees, I am concerned with the number of offices located there from which employees would receive pay cheques.

Mr. Gregg: I have not that information.

Mrs. Fairclough: I imagine there would not be very many.

Mr. Gregg: My guess would be probably eight or nine federal departments.

Mrs. Fairclough: If that is the case that would seem to wipe out the minister's argument that you would have to draw a map. If there are only eight or nine offices all you would have to do would be to make a list showing that this one belonged to Alberta, that one belonged to Saskatchewan, this one to British Columbia and so on. As the minister has said, if a man is injured in a particular part of the country it does not necessarily mean under this act that he will be dealt with in the place where he is injured. As a matter of fact this act would take him away from the place where he was injured and put him under the jurisdiction of the province in which he is usually employed.

I think all you would have to do to clarify the matter would be to delete this subsection, then simply name the offices located in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories and allocate them to the nearest province. I believe it is as simple as that.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When we were in committee we spent a tremendous amount of time dealing with this particular section, and after a great deal of debate and argument the minister brought in an amendment which met with the unanimous approval of the committee. As far as I can remember everybody seemed to be satisfied. I think the hon. member for Prince Albert was somewhat confused, because as I understood him he seemed to think this had to do with natural resources. Of course it does not deal with that.

The purpose of this act is to provide that those who are usually employed—I am using that phrase in the meaning of the amendment—in British Columbia will now be cared for under the British Columbia Act; those who are usually employed in Nova Scotia will come under the Nova Scotia legislation, but those who are usually employed in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon will come under Alberta. It is merely a matter of convenience of administration.

As the minister has pointed out, there is some difference in the compensation rates of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, but the difference is quite small. It would apply only to those few cases where the employees are based in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories. I cannot see any necessity to do away with this section. We went over all this very carefully in the committee and the minister brought in an amendment which I think met with complete agreement, and I do not see why we should thrash out the whole thing again.

Mr. Byrne: If the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Vancouver East had been on the committee I think I would have had more support for my suggestion, and it would have done away with any controversy that might arise over this very question. I suggested that we should have a uniform compensation act to cover civil servants right across Canada. I see no reason why the civil servant who happens to be working in British Columbia should receive benefits which are above those received by those residing in Alberta, or New Brunswick, for that matter.

If the administration, investigation and so on are to be left in the hands of the provinces I think we in this parliament could write a compensation act that would be all-embracing and as good as that of any of the provinces. Then all this discussion would have been unncessary. But I did raise the question also of the Yukon being connected more closely with the province of British Columbia, and that therefore the administration would be simpler if it were handled through British Columbia. The minister gave a satisfactory answer to that question, and in view of the fact that we do not have all-embracing legislation we could well accept this clause as it now exists.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to argue the matter, but I must say that I am very much impressed with what the hon. member for Kootenay East has said, that as far as employees in the Northwest Territories are concerned, in those areas outside of the provinces, there is no reason whatever why there should not be a workmen's compensation act applicable to them. Such a workmen's compensation act of course could not be made applicable by a federal statute to causes of action that might arise among federal employees within the several provinces.

However, I brought this matter up, not having been present in the committee and not knowing it had been brought up, simply to direct attention to the fact that we have seen this as a regular course in Saskatchewan, that for some reason or other these great developments that are taking place in areas north of our province, both as regards shipments out of the goods that are produced and shipments in of the necessary machinery, manpower and the like, seemed to be definitely removed from the ambit of any company operating in Saskatchewan and to be definitely directed through the city of Edmonton, regardless of whether or not it was more convenient. This is but one further indication of the type of thing to which we take strong exception in the province of Saskatchewan.

Having said that, I do not want to belabour the matter but I do tell the minister that he certainly finds himself in a most paradoxical position. In section 4 it is definitely established, if the present section passes, that the person shall for the purpose of this act be deemed to be usually employed in the province of Alberta. In section 10, if that section is passed, the minister will be able to say that section 4 does not apply, and by order in council he may direct that the person shall be considered to have been employed in some other province. That looks to me like draftsmanship that has not been very carefully done. It certainly will create definite difficulties in future cases.

Having said that, in order to bring the matter to a head and in order to cover the situation referred to by my hon. friend from Saskatoon, I move that all the words after "employed" in section 4 be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "in that province which is south of the area in which the accident occurs". It would then read:

> Where an employee is usually employed in the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, he shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be usually employed in that province which is south of the area in which the accident occurs.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I ask this question in that regard. Suppose a person is usually employed in Nova Scotia, would that case automatically be handled by the province which is immediately to the south? Supposing they were in a section north of Saskatchewan; their case would then be handled by Saskatchewan?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is correct.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then we are in exactly the same position the hon. member for Prince Albert is complaining about. He is complaining because some of those who happen to be north of Alberta or north of Saskatchewan are going to be dealt with by Alberta, but he has no objection whatever to those living in Nova Scotia being handled by Saskatchewan if they happened to be working north of Saskatchewan. That is not solving the problem either. Some of those people living in Nova Scotia might want to be serviced in British Columbia, for instance, and they may be working immediately north of Saskatchewan. What is he going to do with them? That is not going to help the problem. It is just going to create confusion.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, as far as I can follow this discussion, the trouble is that most of those taking part in the discussion are a little too provincial-minded. This is not a provincial act; this has to do with federal employees. Regardless of where that federal employee is farmed out, the employer is still the federal government. The minister, in the amendments he brought in, has cured the fears that we had in committee.

I was a member of the committee. We discussed this for a long time and we sent the minister back with this, and be came back with it at another meeting. What the hon. member for Prince Albert is complaining about is exactly what we complained about, but I believe the minister cured it in section 10. That is why section 10 was brought in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why have section 4? Why should section 4 not be entirely deleted?

Mr. Gillis: It was because of the wording of section 4 that we made the suggestion to the minister. He proved to the satisfaction of the committee that the adjudication of claims that occur in the Yukon and Northwest Territories are more easily handled at the present time through Edmonton than any other section that has a region set up for compensation purposes. It was suggested in the committee that that may be all right now, but it may be changed in future. Under section 4 of the act it is mandatory that they still remain in Edmonton.

Then it was suggested that there should be more flexibility as far as the minister and his department are concerned, and that there should be a provision that would give him the opportunity to change by regulation the place where the person was usually employed if other circumstances arose before this act was gone into again. It was because of section 4 that section 10 was brought in. If the hon. member would read it I think he will realize that if later there are changed circumstances, if the minister deems British Columbia or Saskatchewan the proper centre for the employees under discussion, then under section 10 he has power to make the change without coming back to another committee and to the House of Commons. If you will read section 10 again I think you will realize that it cured the matter as far as the committee was concerned.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Let me put this section 10 on the record once more. I hate to be arguing legal points with my hon. friend, because this is not my field. This provision is aimed at bringing flexibility into clause 4, which is firm as far as the adjudication of claims that arise in the Northwest Territories is concerned. Section 10 reads as follows:

> Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the minister may make regulations for determining, for the purposes of this act, the place where an employee is usually employed, and generally for carrying the purposes and provisions of this act into effect.

After listening to the discussion, as we did for several days, and after the discussion we have now had, I think the hon. member for Prince Albert will agree that because of the firmness of section 4 in providing that the adjudication had to be done in Alberta, this section 10 now gives the minister the power to make a change if he so desires, if it is more advantageous to have the adjudication done in British Columbia or Saskatchewan.

As to employees coming under this act, first they are employed through the federal government here in Ottawa, and you have them from Newfoundland clear out to the Northwest Territories. It is for the purpose of providing some adjudication machinery that this act is written. By and large I think most of these people will be centred in Ontario anyway because, no matter what department it is, they take their employment through the civil service commission or the department right here in the city of Ottawa, and they are sent out from here. If they are injured in the Yukon or in Newfoundland they automatically come back to Ontario for adjudication. It is only the odd one you run into that might cause friction, as anticipated by the discussion here this afternoon. I want to say that this act is a great improvement over the old one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Gillis: The main discussion in the committee was on the point that has been discussed this afternoon. But in the judgment of the committee the establishment of section 10 has given the minister the necessary administrative latitude to cure the occasional situation that might arise under section 4.

I believe the bill without any amendment serves the purpose for which it was intended. I could not support any change such as that suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert. After writing in that word "south", when you sit down and write a claim the first thing you have to do is consult a compass and say, "Exactly where am I in relation to this claim?" I think the provision is flexible enough as it is now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate all that my hon. friend has said with regard to the purpose being to make this legislation flexible. But what you do, if you pass it in its present form, is this. At the moment I am not speaking of the amendment; I am replying to my hon. friend. You have section 4, which definitely says:

> Where an employee is usually employed in the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, he shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be usually employed in the province of Alberta.

Section 10 says the minister may, by order in council, make regulations for determining, for the purpose of this act, the place where an employee is usually employed. Those are contradictory statements. You cannot have both. If you are going to have section 10, then I submit for the consideration of the minister that section 4 should read in this way:

> Subject to the provisions of section 10, where an employee is usually employed in the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, he shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be usually employed in the province of Alberta.

In other words, in the event that no order in council is passed section 4 will be the determinant. But section 4 will only be the determinant subject to the provisions of section 10. I mention that point because I think the minister should give further consideration to that section, even though the amendment I suggest be not adopted by the committee.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should clear up a procedural point before we go any further with our discussion. Clause 2 of this bill deals with sections 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the act. I called clause 2 of the bill. The Minister of Fisheries moved an amendment to clause 2, which was carried. I then called clause 2 as amended and clause 2 as amended was carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

An hon. Member: Yes.

The Chairman: I then called clause 3 of the bill and clause 3 was carried. I then called clause 4 of the bill which was a clause added by the committee. At this point the hon. member for Prince Albert rose and commenced to discuss section 4 of the act, which is a part of clause 2 of this bill. I raised no objection and the committee raised no objection because, as can be seen from the printing, it was a natural mistake to have occurred. At the present time I take it that, by consent, the committee is dealing with clause 2 of this bill. We are dealing with Government Employees Compensation Act an amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert to a part of clause 2, namely section 4 of the act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

The Chairman: I have the amendment before me, but I need further clarification. Will the hon. member for Prince Albert kindly let me know whether he refers to the first "employed" or the second "employed" in the wording of the original section?

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member for Prince Albert can correct me if I am wrong, but it is my understanding that the amendment he first moved is to be replaced by an amendment which would add to this section the words "subject to the provisions of section 10".

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

The Chairman: This situation leads me to request hon. members in future to draft their amendments with as much particularity as possible. The amendment I have before me is apparently to a part of clause 2 where we are dealing with section 4 of the act. The words I have before me are these:

> That all the words after "employed" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "in that province which is south of the area in which the accident occurs".

If I use those words after the first "employed" in the original section I arrive at this result:

> Where an employee is usually employed in that province which is south of the area in which the accident occurs . . .

I thus arrive at a section which has no meaning whatsoever. On the other hand, I can find some meaning if I apply this amendment after the second "employed" in the section. It would then read as follows:

> Where an employee is usually employed in the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, he shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be usually employed in that province which is south of the area in which the accident occurs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the discussion which has taken place, if I may be permitted to do so I should like to withdraw the amendment I moved. May I have the consent of the committee?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I then ask to amend section 4 by adding these words:

> Subject to the provisions of section 10 hereof,—

That is at the beginning of the section, which continues as follows:

> —where an employee is usually employed . . .

And so on. I move that amendment so we shall not be in the position of having passed two sections which are completely divergent, contradictory and paradoxical. I suggest that the minister give consideration to that point. Otherwise you have a definite section, then later on you say the section can be changed by the governor in council. I submit that the wording therefore should be:

Subject to the provisions of section 10, where an employee is usually employed . . .

And so on. I so move.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I think I understand now what the hon. member for Prince Albert means, but I cannot see why the amendment is necessary. I would take it that wherever the word "usually" is used section 10 applies and the minister may use his discretion in naming the place where the man was usually employed. It seems to me that is so clear that confusion may be created if we amend section 4 in the way proposed by the hon. member for Prince Albert. I understand his meaning and I think I know what he has in mind, but it seems to me that his endeavour to put that meaning into the legislation does add confusion. Maybe the minister can state when he is answering whether or not my interpretation of section 10, which he himself brought in, is correct.

Mr. Gregg: I am certain that the explanation given by the hon. member for Prince Albert was not in the minds of the members of the committee when they asked me to work out an amendment to section 4 which would be a new section 10 of the bill. To my mind it is a very simple amendment. Perhaps it may not be the answer, but it was put before the standing committee with the intention of providing a means to deal with cases where there might be difficulty in defining the words "usually employed". It has no special application to the Northwest Territories as such. It applies to the whole administration of the act. In the light of the thought given to the matter not only by the officials and law officers but by the standing committee, I think we would be much happier, when the bill becomes a part of the act, if the wording were to remain as it is now.

Mrs. Fairclough: I cannot agree with that. I am sure every member of the committee who took part in its deliberations realized that this was a very confused piece of legislation from start to finish. We could not agree on what was the place of usual employment. The wording of the old act, which referred to the place where the worker was ordinarily resident, had been changed, though many of us thought the expression in the old act was the better term. We could not see that changing it to the place of usual employment was any improvement, and it created the difficulties we have encountered today. I think even this committee is now confused as to what is the place of usual employment.

The minister has said repeatedly that the place of usual employment is wherever the pay office is situated, the place from which the man gets his pay cheque. I am sure that has not been in the minds of most of the people who have spoken this afternoon, and I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert that section 4 of the act which is amended by clause 2 of the bill certainly comes into conflict with the amendment which will now be clause 4 of the bill.

I fail to grasp the reason for any opposition to including the words, "subject to the provisions of section 10." It seems to me it merely clarifies the intention of section 10 and does away with the possibility of an administrative officer saying some time in the future, "There is your section 4 and it stands. If your place of usual employment is the Yukon or the Northwest Territories, then you are governed by section 4", without ever turning over the page and looking at section 10. I think there should be a reference in section 4 to section 10 because, as the minister has said, the whole idea of including section 10 is to clarify section 4, so why not say so right in section 4?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the proceedings of the committee that dealt with the bill. Although I was not a member of the committee I was an observer of the discussion that took place, and it appeared to me that in certain quarters there was a good deal of unnecessary misunderstanding of the references in the bill to the place where a person is usually employed. To anyone familiar with the manner in which provincial workmen's compensation laws are carried out that is a well known and well understood term. It has been in common use, as far as the workmen's compensation act of British Columbia is concerned, for a number of years, ever since the arrangement came into being changing the method of paying compensation from the province where the accident occurred to the province where the workman was usually employed. As far as I am aware there has been no difficulty in reaching an understanding of the meaning of that term in relation to people coming under the jurisdiction of the workmen's compensation act of British Columbia.

There was a good deal of discussion in the committee with respect to the matter of jurisdiction in the case of employees of the federal government in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I listened to the discussion, and as I understand the situation brought about by the amendment now before us, if we apply the proposed section 10 to section 4 we are in effect giving the Minister of Labour a new administrative latitude which was not the intention of the minister when he introduced the proposed section 10 in the committee. As I understand the situation, when the minister introduced the proposed section 10 in the committee it was for the purpose of giving him the power to define the term "usually employed" if any misunderstanding should arise as to what was intended by that term. It was for that purpose only and really had no relation, as I understood it, to this section dealing with place of employment in the Northwest Territories.

I think we should be clear. As far as I am concerned I have no objection to giving the Minister of Labour the right, if certain developments should take place that make it desirable, to fix the place of usual employment for people in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories in a province other than Alberta. I would be quite prepared to support that move.

Having listened to the argument, I think the minister is on sound ground in leaving Alberta as the primary place for the time being. But that might not necessarily continue to be the case. On the other hand, it does seem to me that if you attempt to correlate the proposed section 10 with the provisions of section 4, which refers to the Yukon and Northwest Territories, you are creating an understanding which I certainly did not believe to be the purpose of the minister when he introduced it in the first instance.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived: Yeas, 9; nays, 47.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Clause 2 as amended agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Regulations.

The Chairman: This is clause 4, which was added by the committee on industrial relations. I shall read it:

4. Section 10 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

10. Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the minister may make regulations for determining, for the purposes of this act, the place where an employee is usually employed, and generally for carrying the purposes and provisions of this act into effect.

Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in committee I raised objection to this clause, because I thought it was putting under a regulation the method of interpreting the meaning of words in the statute. I said in committee that this doubtful expression, "usually employed" should be defined in the interpretation section. I thought it was a rather new departure to give the minister freedom to interpret a phrase in a bill. In fact I believe it is a fault in drafting, which I recognize as a difficult art, that there should be so much confusion over the use of the expression "place of usual employment". I wish to record my objection to this method of interpreting that phrase.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: Then clause 4 in the bill has been renumbered by the committee as clause 5. Shall clause 5 carry?

Clause 5 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GREAT LAKES FISHERIES

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES SIGNED SEPTEMBER 10, 1954

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 279, to implement a convention on great lakes fisheries between Canada and the United States.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole upon a bill is not debatable.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations at this time, mainly as a result of the very illuminating evidence we heard the other day in the fisheries committee. For the benefit of those who may not be as familiar with the situation as those of us who heard that evidence, may I say it was revealed that as a result of the lamprey menace in the great lakes the trout fishing in lake Huron is now completely ruined. That industry was valued at $5 million a year, was engaged in by both Canada and the United States, and has now practically disappeared. The federal department of fisheries in conjunction with the corresponding department of the United States are now making a joint effort to stamp out the lamprey menace and put the fishing industry of the great lakes back on a paying basis.

It is unfortunate that this action was not taken years ago, because the trout fishermen are suffering a heavy annual loss, and until the industry is restored in that area the loss will continue. I am glad to see the Minister of Finance in his seat, because he has never been too far away from the great lakes, and would be more familiar than most with what is taking place there. Under the convention the two senior governments are going to undertake this joint effort, which had been carried on previously by eight states in the United States and by Ontario in Canada.

The evidence in committee disclosed that weirs have been constructed in creeks and streams up which the lamprey have gone to spawn. The evidence disclosed that in their last year the lampreys grow from a length of four or five inches to 18 inches, having fed mainly on trout. It is when they go up to spawn that the challenge is placed before the two departments concerned. What alarms me is that the situation had reached a point where it was almost beyond immediate control by any department, simply because research work was not undertaken years ago when it was learned that the lamprey was becoming a curse to the fishing industry. With the situation today, even if all the eels going up to spawn are caught it will still be seven years before the evil can be stamped out.

We find in the estimates for the Department of Fisheries, under item 145, a vote of $355,000 to provide for the share of this federal government in the administrative expenses of the great lakes fisheries research committee established jointly with Ontario. This sum is also to provide for a program designed to eliminate lampreys in the great lakes.

Evidence in the committee disclosed that $50,000 a year has been set aside for research work, part of this sum to be paid by Ontario and part by the dominion. No doubt a greater sum will be paid by the agencies in the United States because, after all is said and done, one of the great lakes, namely lake Michigan, is in their country. Lake Michigan has been infested with this curse to the same extent that lake Huron has, so I would assume that in due course they would pay more than we ought to pay. It appears that the program calls for work to be done in lake Superior, to hold the line at the more southerly end of that lake where it empties into the lower lakes. I agree that this is sound business. I do not agree that no attempt should be made to eliminate this curse in lake Huron and re-establish the fishing industry there on a sound basis.

It appears that there are some 50 streams in the north channel of lake Huron up which these lampreys go to spawn, and apparently these are the only streams up which they go. That in itself is important. I was worried for fear that they were spawning all over in the different streams of the different lakes. They told us in the committee that these weirs or contraptions they have for destroying the lamprey cost anywhere from $5,000 to $10,000, depending on the proximity to accessible roads and that sort of thing. That would be the cost in lake Superior.

It has not been my practice at any time since I have been a member of this house to ask any department of government to spend money just for the sake of pleasing somebody who thinks it should be spent. Here is an industry that is very important to a great many people. It needs to be invigorated. I am going to make a suggestion to the minister in the hope that he can persuade his colleagues on the front benches to accept it. I hope it meets with his approval because, after all is said and done, if one part of our national economy is disturbed or crucified to the extent of $5 million annually it affects the whole economy.

I know the minister would be only too anxious to re-establish the trout industry without delay. It cannot be done overnight. I am very glad this action is to be taken without further delay. While the scientists do not claim to have perfected a device to completely destroy the lamprey, they are working on different projects. As a matter of fact one of the witnesses suggested that through some electrical means, or sound waves, they might be able to exterminate the lamprey without injuring any other fish.

I said these weirs or contraptions cost anywhere from $5,000 to $10,000. I am going to suggest that the minister place in the supplementary estimates an amount sufficient to take care of weirs on these 48 or 50 streams where they know probably 90 per cent or even more of the lamprey go to spawn. We all agree that the attack must be made in lake Superior to hold the line. But let us at the same time re-establish the fishing industry in the other great lakes, particularly the trout industry.

One may say that the fishing industry in the great lakes is greater in poundage and in dollars and cents than it has been in the past. I admit that. A great many fishermen are fishing oftener and are using more nets and greater efficiency as time goes by than they did years ago; but I am going to tell the minister this. I said it before when I made a few remarks on this subject. In my part of lake Huron the fishermen are going broke. Some of them have been using up their surplus. One fisherman I have in mind has a terrific overhead. He is a very capable fisherman. Because of the lamprey and other things that affect the fishing industry he has been operating in the red to such an extent that he cannot continue any longer.

I urge that we rehabilitate the trout industry in lake Huron, and at the same time hold the line in lake Superior. It is going to be a seven-year job before it will be completed. With the greater knowledge these scientists have and will be obtaining, the problem will be licked. It is just too bad it was not tackled years ago. If the area is not too remote and is accessible by boat, the department can complete work on the 48 or 50 weirs with the amount that is being immediately provided, and then they can work in lake Huron; but the work will not be done at a cost of less than $200,000, and that amount will have to be spent yearly until this curse is eliminated.

I would suggest—and I hope the minister will agree with me—that we might better spend $250,000 or $500,000 a year to remove this curse and save an industry that produces $5 million a year. That sounds like common sense. I hope the members of the treasury board and the members of the cabinet will agree with this suggestion. Let us not wait for five years to spend $250,000, when we can do it today. It is too bad the department did not start 10 or 15 years ago when they knew the curse existed.

When the figures were given the other day they disclosed that we produced almost 15 times the amount of trout five years ago that we produced last year or the year before. It was quite apparent to some that something ought to be done. I make no apology for saying this. The responsibility should have been accepted, no matter what government was in power. Research is not new. They knew what was going on. They had been experimenting for some years on methods to eliminate this curse. Those methods should have been proceeded with at great haste. I would ask the government to appropriate an extra $250,000 or $500,000 a year to re-establish this $5 million industry.

The lamprey are now preying on the trout. After the trout are gone they will turn to the whitefish. The lamprey will be found not only in lake Huron but in all the other lakes as well. I sincerely hope the government will agree to the suggestion. I think the sum of $50,000 for research is picayune. That is the amount to be expended by the federal and provincial governments. What is needed is $100,000, $200,000 or $500,000 a year. That is needed to prevent the loss of $5 million. That is not pin money. These fishermen work hard to earn what they make. They make a great contribution to our economy.

As I said earlier, I never make it a practice, and I do not intend ever to make it a practice, to ask for moneys unless I think they can be wisely spent. I do not know of an instance where this government could spend money more wisely than in an effort to destroy this pest and at the same time re-establish the fishermen.

I suggested the other day in committee, and I would like to put it on the record here, that in conjunction with this program of eliminating the lamprey eels in these streams off the north channel the government at the same time should restock the lower end of lake Huron, that is near Sarnia, with trout fingerlings. The minister indicated in committee the other day that they were working in full accord with the Ontario government, and I am sure that if arrangements could be made to restock this area these fish would gradually find their way along both shores. I suggest also that this be a co-operative effort with the level of government with which you are dealing on the other side.

Perhaps next year when the estimates are being considered and it is found that these contrivances are not as successful as it is hoped they will be, sufficient money will be voted for research so we can do our part in re-establishing the fishing industry on the great lakes.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in listening to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, because he spoke most sensibly and realistically. The fishermen along the shores of lake Superior are appreciative of this legislation. Men make their living from this industry in places such as Heron Bay, Marathon, Terrace Bay, Schreiber, Rossport, Nipigon, Port Arthur and Fort William. These men tell me the fish are getting scarcer. I should like to ask the minister if compensation could be arranged for the catching of these lamprey eels. Such compensation would be attractive to the younger element among fishermen.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from British Columbia I may not have the same direct and immediate interest in this question as the hon. members who have preceded me, but I do want to say that I found the evidence given before the committee in connection with this bill most interesting and informative. I think everything possible should be done to accelerate the program being initiated by this legislation.

I gathered from the research experts who appeared before the committee that they are hopeful they have devised a method of dealing with the mature lampreys as they enter the streams to spawn, but I gathered also that they are not quite so certain the methods they are considering to deal with the lamprey before it reaches maturity have reached the point where they can be assured that these lampreys can be disposed of at that stage. It seems to me if it should be found that further appropriations for research would expedite the efforts to deal with the lamprey in the earlier stages, and thus get around the necessity of having to wait for six and seven years, it would be a worth-while expenditure.

This bill proposes to ratify an international treaty arrangement. Just how effectively this will work out will depend a great deal upon the attitude taken by the United States counterparts to the Canadian members of the international commission to be set up. I feel it would be appropriate for this parliament to indicate that there is a desire on the part of Canada that everything possible be done to accelerate this program and restore the fisheries in lakes Huron and Michigan. But I would suggest that before the minister brings an increased appropriation before parliament he should ascertain through this international commission that the United States people are prepared to do their share. Then any increased appropriation by us would be worth while. Otherwise it might be throwing good Canadian dollars down the drain, or I suppose one could say letting them run over Niagara falls.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we are all aware of the importance of the fishing industry to the economy of Canada. The report of the Department of Fisheries for 1953 indicates that for that year the total catch was approximately 1·8 billion pounds; the income of the fishermen amounted to $91·8 million, and the catch had a market value of $179 million. When we look at the matter from that point of view we can readily understand the importance of this industry to the national economy, as well as its tremendous importance to a great number of our population who must depend upon the industry for a livelihood.

When introducing this measure the minister referred to other international commissions which had been set up, such as the international Pacific halibut commission, the Pacific salmon fisheries commission and others. I am sure these different treaties have commendable objectives and in the main are achieving the desired results, but we do not agree with all the regulations which have been passed in order to accomplish those objectives.

It may seem a little strange that members from British Columbia should wish to speak on Bill No. 279, to implement a convention on great lakes fisheries; but in view of the importance of fisheries to our economy I should like to make two or three observations. The bill would appear to have two main purposes, research and lamprey control. This was a very interesting subject which came up for debate in the committee. I must confess my ignorance of the lamprey situation. In fact, I had not heard about it until it was brought to our attention by the minister in his introductory remarks. But after seeing the film that was shown on the occasion of the committee's meeting, and also hearing the departmental officials as they outlined the problem, it certainly indicates a very serious situation existing in the great lakes. I am sure that this measure that has been introduced will be very welcome to every member of the house, and of course, doubly so to the fishermen who are concerned. Therefore, I should just like to indicate, Mr. Chairman, that we are supporting this bill, and we hope that the efforts that are being put forth to control the lamprey menace and also develop the interests of the fisheries in the great lakes will be successful. Therefore we in this group welcome and support the bill.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the hon. members who have spoken in approval of the substance of this bill. I do not think there is any need for me to make any lengthy remarks at the present time. I spoke at some length at the resolution stage of the bill. My parliamentary assistant went into it in some detail on the second reading of the bill, and when we were before the committee on marine and fisheries we had before us two top scientists of our department, specialists in freshwater fisheries, whose evidence I know was found to be of very great interest to members of the committee. The committee reported back the bill with no amendments, but with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Lambton West that perhaps we should be doing more on this.

I should perhaps just answer one or two of the points that have been made here. The question was asked why we had not gone into this problem earlier. The administration of the great lakes fisheries is not under the federal Department of Fisheries but under the province of Ontario. The province had been concerned for some time about the depredations of the sea lamprey. For those of you who are from the inland provinces, the sea lamprey is a member of one of the lower orders of eels whose normal habitat is the sea and which comes into rivers to spawn. Many years ago the lamprey came up the St. Lawrence and were able to change their environment to the extent that they lived in lake Ontario without returning to the sea and spawned in the streams flowing into lake Ontario. They have been there for some years and have not done too much damage there. However, they passed through the locks around Niagara and entered lake Erie and lake Huron. They did little damage in lake Erie, because the streams flowing into lake Erie come through flat ground not suitable for spawning. However, in lake Huron and lake Superior they have found river conditions ideal for spawning and so have become a great problem. The lamprey must go upstream to spawn in the spring of the year, just after the break-up. The male and female lamprey lay and fertilize the eggs, from 60,000 to 100,000 eggs per female, which hatch out during the summer. The small lampreys drift down to a mudbank and lie there four years burrowed in the mud. In the fifth year they come down to the lake and begin their destructive activities.

In that one year, as the hon. member for Lambton West reminds us, they increase in length from four inches to 18 inches, feeding entirely on the blood and body juices of other fish, the principal victim being the lake trout, a most valuable fish. The whole great lakes fisheries are very valuable, both in the size and the species of catch. The fact that this lake is in the centre of a great populated area cuts down the difficult problem for fisheries of the transportation of fish. The difficulty in the province of Ontario was in trying to handle this problem by itself, since across lake Superior there are eight states similarly affected by the different fisheries regulations. There was obviously not much point in the province of Ontario launching a large-scale lamprey control program if nothing was done across the lake, because population of lamprey move back and forth.

In 1946 the federal government was asked by the province to take action, and since that time we have been negotiating with the federal government of the United States to try to bring about an international agreement similar to the very successful ones we have on the east and west coasts. The one difficulty with the United States government was not lack of willingness, because their fishermen have been more affected than ours; it was the lack of federal jurisdiction. In the American states the primary jurisdiction over fisheries rests with the state governments. However, the United States government was able to work out a plan acceptable to the states and a bill is before congress at the present time to approve this treaty. When this bill is approved by parliament and congress, the commission can begin its work.

In our estimates last year, when we saw it was likely that this commission would be approved, we had an item of $150,000 for lamprey control and $15,000 for research, to begin control by our department. We spent $161,000 of that last year. It is always difficult to get a program like that under way and, of course, we have no federal fisheries officers in the great lakes area. This year we have raised that vote to $330,000, which is the amount our scientists and engineers tell us can be usefully spent this year. We have increased our research vote also. We are putting up $25,000, and the province of Ontario is matching that. This is all in anticipation of the work of the commission. It is true that we are concentrating our lamprey work on lake Superior. I think there is good reason for that. The lamprey is just now entering lake Superior, and we think we can stop that entry now by concentrating our attack there and so saving the lake Superior fisheries. The next step, having learned the methods which are most satisfactory, will be to move back into lake Huron. It will be a long process, because the lamprey has a seven-year cycle. The most effective way to kill it is as it is going into the stream to spawn, which happens only once in a cycle. But we are also engaged in the poisoning of the mudbeds in which the small lamprey lives for four years, which will cut down the incidence of lamprey even in the intervening years. I do not think there is too much point in trying to restock lake Huron until we have substantially cut down the lamprey population for I do not think we should be restocking the lake for the lamprey to feed upon. The hon. member for Lambton West has pointed out that there is a loss of $5 million a year in the commercial catch of lake trout as a result of the depredations of lamprey. That is true for that species but there has been one offsetting factor. As the population of lake trout fell off, populations of other fish have increased because the food used by the lake trout became available to them. The result has been that, despite the lamprey, the value of the total catch of all species has not declined very much. We consider that the job of this commission is to provide the scientific knowledge for what we call scientific management and control of the fisheries to restore the balance between the lake trout and the other commercial fish. Lamprey control is only one aspect of that scientific control.

The hon. member for Fort William asked if there was any commercial value to the lamprey. Unfortunately, there is not. There is a small market among some Europeans for smoked lamprey. The lamprey is a very low form of fish; it has cartilage instead of bone and is not even a good eel. It is very difficult to catch in the lake because it does not feed on any bait except live fish. As far as next year's budget is concerned, that of course will be recommended to parliament and to congress by the commission when it is set up. I may say that I heartily agree with the hon. member for Lambton West that Canada has received good value for what this parliament has spent on the work of these international fisheries commissions. Last year's increase in the catch of salmon and halibut paid for the costs of these commissions many times over.

You will notice that in the convention attached to the bill provision is made for the division of costs by the commission. The reason for that is that these fisheries are of more importance to the United States than they are to Canada, for one reason. We share Ontario, Erie, St. Clair, Huron and Superior, but the states have lake Michigan entirely to themselves. Therefore they have more at stake. It may be therefore that the division of costs will be a little bit heavier burden on the states than on ourselves. I thank the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Fraser Valley for their remarks. Our province of British Columbia is a long way from the great lakes, but we are the people who have seen the value of such treaties and what they can do to restore fisheries which were apparently on the way out. Our scientists are convinced that by this co-operative work with the federal government of the United States and the province of Ontario and the eight states across the way, we can restore the great lakes fisheries.

Mr. McIvor: Will the minister answer a question? Have you considered giving a bonus or compensation to anybody who catches these eels?

Mr. Sinclair: These lampreys are there by the million. They are worthless but we are spending money killing them where they are most vulnerable.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): The point I attempted to make, Mr. Chairman, was that the department not only hold the line in lake Superior, but that they do something more this year, not wait until next year or the year after. I think they should do something this year when they know that they have some 50 streams running into the north channel. It is not as though they are all over lake Huron. They are there probably within 50 or 60 miles. I think that an effort could be made this year to kill these lampreys when they go up to spawn. If it is too late to do anything this year, maybe preparations could be made so that something could be done next year. My argument is that there is no occasion for delay. You are now tackling the problem. I say that you should accelerate that attack.

Mr. Sinclair: May I again point out that the vote we have today is really on an interim basis in anticipation of the establishment of the commission. We hope the commission will start its work this summer. We have done the necessary engineering to spend effectively this $330,000 on weirs and electrical fences in the present year. I am sure when the commission makes its first report we shall be able to do the engineering work to take care of any larger program they may recommend. At the moment I agree with our officials who say that the most important work should be in lake Superior, to kill them there and then to move back into lake Huron and lake Ontario.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): But, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to the matter of dollars and cents, your officials spoke of the matter the other day. They are highly qualified men and I am certainly one of the members of that committee who was glad to hear their evidence. They said that these weirs which are built on these streams or tributaries to the lake would vary in cost from $5,000 to $10,000 depending on the accessibility to highways, boats or that sort of thing. Here in the north channel you certainly have accessibility by boat. There is no question about that fact. I see the minister who represents that particular area sitting in his seat. I am going to suggest that he read what has been said today and what was said a few days previously.

After all is said and done, I agree—and I have said this before—that you should make your attack in lake Superior where you know you are going to meet with success because they have only been in there recently. You know where they are spawning. You also know that these cursed things come up about 50 streams running into lake Huron and in that north channel. It is not as though you had to wander all around lake Huron. Why hesitate to spend a quarter of a million dollars this year? Unless you do spend it you are going to continue to lose $5 million worth of trout a year from these lakes; that is not only for us but I mean for the United States. Half of that should be our portion. Unless that money is spent you are not going to kill the lampreys in lake Huron. You are not going to re-establish the trout fishing in lake Huron. In all seriousness I suggest that this is a common ordinary dollar-and-cent proposition where you invest $100,000 or $250,000 or half of that and your return is probably $1 million or $2 million a year. There is no man with common sense who will disagree that that is a good economic policy for you to follow. After all, you are not going to stamp out the curse of the lamprey eels in lake Huron by killing them up in lake Superior. They are still going to exist in lake Huron. After they take your lake trout, the next thing will be the whitefish. In all seriousness I suggest that an effort be made to accelerate the attack by including lake Huron in your program.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Convention approved.

Mr. Nowlan: I wish to speak for a moment on clause 3. I did not speak on clause 1 because I made it plain at another stage of the proceedings that this party was heartily in favour of this act. But clause 3 brings in the convention itself. I was interested in what the minister said a few moments ago and I was wondering whether he could amplify that for the benefit of this committee. I do not think this matter was raised before. At least it was not dealt with in detail as far as I know in the special committee to which this matter was referred.

As the minister pointed out, the great difficulty in dealing with this thing in the past has been the question of jurisdiction. You have at least eight American states on the south of the great lakes and you have the province of Ontario on this side. As to the constitutional question, as I recall the constitution the American states have the residuary powers and the American congress have the specially delegated ones. The reverse is the situation in so far as Canada is concerned or at least that is the situation today under the decisions and so on and so forth.

Just what is the position in so far as these American states are concerned? Have they delegated their authority to the American congress? And if so, how? Right now, of course, everyone is frightened. Everyone is prepared to co-operate. But suppose that five or six years from now the situation is relatively under control and then we will say the state of Michigan passes regulations which are contrary to the regulations which may be passed by this commission. Would that state or any other state be in a position to do so or have they, either by legislation, by contract or in any manner delegated their authority to the American congress so that the Dominion of Canada knows that they are dealing with the duly authorized authority? In one of the articles of the convention, namely article 10, we find this provision:

> Nothing in this convention shall be construed as preventing any of the states of the United States of America bordering on the Great Lakes or, subject to their constitutional arrangements, Canada or the province of Ontario from making or enforcing laws . . .

And so on. The convention is obviously drawing a line of distinction—at least that is suggested by article 10—as between Canada and Ontario on the one hand and the American states on the other. I would ask the minister to clear up that point for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. Sinclair: There is no jurisdictional problem in Canada about any of these treaties because the federal government has control over the fisheries. The province of Ontario is our agent in the control of sport fishing and the great lakes fisheries. As far as the American states are concerned, our legal officers were concerned about this matter and have looked at the arrangements made now. These American states have agreed to give the federal government the necessary authority for this period of 10 years. The commission is just for 10 years, and then is subject to renewal to be worked out.

Mr. Nowlan: How have they agreed?

Mr. Sinclair: I am sorry, but not being a lawyer I cannot answer that question. But it was to the satisfaction of our law officers. We have a parallel situation with regard to the international salmon commission on the west coast. The American waters are in the state of Washington which has control over fishing there and that state has given the necessary authority to their federal government now for the last 18 years. The arrangement is most satisfactory as far as regulations are concerned.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Coming into force.

Mr. Nowlan: Did the minister say that similar legislation is now before congress?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: In what stage is it before the American congress? Has it been submitted?

Mr. Sinclair: It has been submitted. We have been assured that the states concerned are all pressing to make quite sure that it is passed by this session of congress.

Mr. Nowlan: It is not the intention to proclaim this legislation until that legislation has been passed by the United States congress?

Mr. Sinclair: When it has been passed by the United States congress we will proclaim it. We hope to have the commission set up this year.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSOLIDATION OF LEGISLATION—AUTHORIZATION FOR OPERATION OF TELECOMMUNICATION SYSTEM, ETC.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 351, respecting Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Drew: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out when introducing the bill, its primary purpose is to consolidate into one statute the legislative provisions relating to Canadian National Railways. A complete enumeration of these legislative provisions is set forth in the second schedule of the bill. This schedule shows that there are no less than 23 enactments that are to be repealed in whole or in part. As this means that at the present time each of these 23 statutes must be consulted in order to determine the exact provisions of what I may call the charter of the Canadian National Railways, I am sure that no further arguments than this are needed in order to persuade hon. members of the desirability of consolidating all of these provisions into a single statute.

In examining the bill it will be found that, though in some instances the wording in some sections has been altered to conform to modern standards of drafting, only five changes in the enactments applying to the company are made. Three of these are intended to give the company (1) power to operate a telecommunication system; (2) power to construct short branch lines, and (3) power to operate motor vehicles for the carriage of traffic. The fourth change is being made so as to authorize officers and employees of the company to act as directors of partially owned subsidiaries; and, finally, the last change is the setting up of a simple procedure to extinguish the charters of constituent corporations.

Some of the subsidiaries of Canadian National already possess powers to operate telecommunication facilities and motor vehicles, but it is considered that it would be more convenient if these powers were vested in the parent company itself. I should like to say a few words further to that subject at the end of these remarks.

I should now like to say something with regard to what I have described as short branch lines. As will be noted from the text of the bill itself, section 183 of the Railway Act, which permits railway companies in general "to construct, maintain and operate branch lines not exceeding in any one case six miles in length", is not applicable to Canadian National Railways. The powers of the company to construct railway lines are to be found in section 20 of the Canadian National Railways Act which empowers the company to construct railway lines, branches and extensions, etc., in respect of the construction of which parliament may authorize the necessary expenditure or the guarantee of an issue of the company's securities. In simpler words, this means that the company may not undertake the construction of branch lines or extensions, even though they are less than six miles in length, until the necessary expenditure for the specific branch line or extension has been approved by parliament. It happens not infrequently during the interval between annual budgets that the management of the Canadian National Railways receives applications from industries for short spur lines to serve their plants; and I think that it obviously is desirable that the railway should be in a position to respond to these applications and build the required trackage as quickly as possible.

It is proposed, therefore, to give the company the power to construct railway lines, branches and extensions which do not exceed six miles in length, and so to put it in a position comparable to that of the railway companies governed by section 183 of the Railway Act to which I referred a moment ago. As in the past, however, the decision to construct such line, branch or extension will remain subject to approval by the governor in council, and it will still be necessary that its location be sanctioned by the Minister of Transport. Having regard to the fact that all other railways in Canada governed by the Railway Act may, subject to that legislation, proceed with the construction of branch lines and extensions not exceeding six miles in length without parliamentary approval, I think it would be timely to free the Canadian National Railways from the disability affecting it and endeavour to place it on a footing similar to that of its competitors.

Under existing legislation, section 8 (3) of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, only directors of the Canadian National may represent the company on the board of directors of any partially owned company. For reasons of greater convenience it is proposed to authorize not only the directors but also officers or employees of the parent company to serve on boards of directors of these partially controlled companies.

With respect to the extinguishing of the charters of constituent corporations, I may say that there is no provision in the statutes for the surrender of a charter of a railway company which is usually incorporated by special act and it is, therefore, necessary to obtain an act of parliament. As will be seen from the first schedule of the bill, the Canadian National Railways system comprises a large number of constituent companies. It is hoped that the setting up of a simple procedure to extinguish the charters of constituent corporations will facilitate the steps now being taken by the management to simplify as much as possible the corporate organization of the railway.

I wish to assure hon. members that this bill is the result of long and careful study by the management of the railway, the various government departments concerned and the cabinet. After second reading of the bill, if it is the pleasure of the house to adopt it, I shall propose that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Officials of the company will be in attendance at the committee to explain the various provisions of the proposed legislation.

I should like to add a particular word with regard to the apprehension which appears to exist in the minds of persons engaged in the operation of trucks and buses on highways that it was intended by this legislation to enable Canadian National Railways to enter competitively the field of highway and bus transportation. I think that what I said in the discussion of the resolution should perhaps have set aside any doubts as to the intention of the government on that score in presenting this legislation, but on rereading one or two sections of the bill I think it may be found that they might lend themselves to an interpretation that there was the intention on the part of the government to give very broad powers to Canadian National Railways with regard to highway transportation when such is not the case.

During the discussion of the resolution I said, in explaining this particular power in the bill, that the railways in the past had been under the disability that at times, when consideration has been given to the abandonment of a short line, the railway has been in the rather peculiar position before the board of transport commissioners of being unable to offer, on behalf of the railway company itself, to undertake to provide motor service in lieu of a passenger train. They have had to produce the undertaking of some subsidiary to provide that service. They have no power to operate motor vehicles, so that they are unable to give a formal undertaking that they will establish a motor service as an alternative to the train service that they propose to abandon.

As I said then, Mr. Speaker, it is not intended there should be any change of policy with regard to the powers of the railway so far as highway transportation is concerned. However, it does seem that section 18 of the bill might lend itself to the interpretation that all of the companies enumerated in the first schedule of the bill were declared works for the general advantage of Canada. I think it will be necessary to make amendments to the bill when it is in committee in order to avoid giving to the railways broader powers than we have in mind.

From an examination of the list of companies appearing in the first schedule to the bill, particularly part III, where there are a large number of companies mentioned, it will be seen that it is clearly an error in drafting that has led to the impression that it was the intention of the government to declare as works for the general advantage of Canada, for example, the operation of a company called Canadian National Railways (France) or Central Vermont Transit Corporation.

I think if that list is examined carefully it will be found that perhaps the reason for the present disquiet with regard to this policy in highway operations arises from the fact that Canadian National Transportation, Limited, is included in these companies in part III. It is my intention, therefore, to avoid any doubt, to move that the act be amended so as to exclude, as works for the general advantage of Canada, the operations of the companies mentioned in part III of the schedule to which I have referred.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian National Railways, through its company, Canadian National Transportation, Limited, has very comprehensive highway powers; but it is not intended to give such comprehensive powers to the Canadian National Railways. As will be found by reference to the bill, it is intended only that the parent company shall have powers in conjunction with or substitution for a rail service. This is designed primarily in order to regularize the pickup and delivery services in the metropolitan centres, and to give the company corporate powers to enable it to provide trucking or bus services in cases in which rail line abandonment would not be permitted by the board of transport commissioners unless a formal undertaking with regard to road transport were submitted.

As I said earlier the primary purpose of the bill is to consolidate a large number of enactments relating to the Canadian National Railways. I have no doubt that for that reason the bill will commend itself to the house, and I think it will be found that the other changes are in the interests of the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has referred to a section which has already caused apprehension on the part of truckers as well as others; and what he has just said has not removed the reasonable cause for that apprehension.

He has on several occasions used the word "intention"; but what we must consider is what the effect of the legislation is, as we examine the bill before us. It is not sufficient to say that the government intends to do certain things; what we must examine is what powers we are placing in the hands of this agency of the government by the measure before us.

The minister has merely stated that it is proposed to remove from part III of the first schedule the name of Canadian National Transportation, Limited.

Mr. Marler: If the Leader of the Opposition would permit me to clarify that point, the point I wished to make was that it was intended that the companies referred to in part III of the schedule would not be declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada—not that a particular company should be dropped, but that the companies in part III of the schedule would not be declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. Drew: Then it was with particular reference to Canadian National Transportation, Limited, that the minister spoke in making the remarks he did about withdrawing them from the application of clause 18.

Mr. Marler: All, in effect, are to be withdrawn.

[Mr. Marler.]

Mr. Drew: But clause 27 is one which confers upon the railway company the rights already referred to by the minister, when he mentions that the company may, in conjunction with, or in substitution for the rail services under their management or control, buy, sell, or lease motor vehicles of all kinds and maintain and operate motor vehicles on highways in Canada or elsewhere for the carriage of traffic, and may charge tolls therefor.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a subject that can be disposed of by a removal of the list of companies from the names of those set forth in part III of the first schedule, so that it will not have application to section 18. What section 27 clearly does is to make it possible for the railway companies to organize, in conjunction with or in substitution for rail services, services by motor vehicles.

That may be desirable. There are many cases where I feel sure that there would be agreement that, in substitution for a short line over a difficult route, it might be highly desirable and convenient to provide such service. It may be debatable, it may be arguable, that it is desirable that the railway company should have power to engage in long-range trucking and in long-range passenger service by motor vehicles, or in other activities of that kind.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the bill as it is now drafted places no limitation upon the powers of the railway company to enter into that field. That brings us back to certain matters that were before the house last year. It will be recalled that, after long years of litigation, there was a case from New Brunswick which was carried to the Supreme Court of Canada and from the Supreme Court of Canada to the privy council. That case is reported in the Law Reports (1954) Appeal Cases, page 541, and is the case of Attorney General for Ontario and others, appellants, and Israel Winner (doing business under the name and style of Mackenzie Coach Lines) and others, respondents.

In that case the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada was reversed. It was declared that interprovincial transportation fell within the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Then, having obtained this result, for which very large sums of public money had been spent during litigation that extended over some considerable time, the government completely changed its attitude. Having obtained the judgment it sought, it then proposed to do the very opposite. And we find reported at page 4196 of Hansard for April 28, 1954, the brief statement of the then minister of transport in regard to a conference which had just taken place at that time. This brief statement by the minister of transport at that time sets forth exactly the position that was taken by this government after it had obtained a judgment of the privy council, which places the full authority over intra-provincial traffic of this kind which they had sought for some time. These are the words of the then minister of transport:

The federal-provincial conference on highway transportation convened in Ottawa on Monday of this week and completed its business this morning. I think it is safe to say that the conference was a successful one.

In view of the position of the federal government that it was reluctant to enter the field of extra-provincial highway transportation, it suggested to the provinces that they control and regulate such extra-provincial undertakings in the same manner as that in which they were controlling intra-provincial movements. The provinces seemed to be willing to accept this suggestion. Thereafter there was drafted a bill which was submitted to the conference for its approval. Dependent upon the reaction of the various provincial governments to this draft bill, the federal government will be willing to give consideration to enacting at this session of parliament legislation which would make the proposed bill valid.

That bill was introduced during the session. It was assented to on June 26, 1954. It was known as the Motor Vehicle Transport Act. I must confess that there seems to be a form of special simplicity that is an inherited quality of ministers of transport. The minister of transport said last year:

The provinces seemed to be willing to accept this suggestion.

Why would they not? They had been fighting this case through the courts for years. They had carried it to the privy council; they had lost. Then, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had succeeded in obtaining a judgment from the privy council, which he regards so lightly, he then came back here and, having reported the case to his colleague, the minister of transport, the minister of transport decided that they did not want what the decision gave them, and so they offered to hand this control back to the provinces, and the provinces seemed to be willing to accept this suggestion, according to the minister of transport. But there was a joker, as there is so often, in the measure put forward and enacted as the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, which purported to place under the provincial authorities the issuing of licences and the control generally. We find under section 3, the governing section in regard to the operation of transport, the following:

(3) (1) Where in any province a licence is by the law of the province required for the operation of a local undertaking, no person shall operate an extra-provincial undertaking in that province unless he holds a licence issued under the authority of this act.

(2) The provincial transport board in each province may in its discretion issue a licence to a person to operate an extra-provincial undertaking into or through the province upon the like terms and conditions and in the like manner as if the extra-provincial undertaking operated in the province were a local undertaking.

Then we find in section 5 this important provision.

The governor in council may exempt any person or the whole or any part of an extra-provincial undertaking or any extra-provincial transport from all or any of the provisions of this act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not pointing out here for the first time what the effect of that was, because this is what I said when this measure was before the house last year. I am referring to page 5940 of Hansard of June 14 of last year:

The truth is that under clause 5 the whole of this bill can be swept aside by order in council at any time. If it is important that this bill be now put into effect, it is equally important that this legislation remain in effect until parliament has been consulted in regard to the matter, unless there are some reasons which have not been placed before us for the extremely wide power which would be conferred upon the government by the adopting of the measure as it stands.

This is an important subject, Mr. Speaker. This is a subject which is of interest to Canadians generally. In this tremendous country of ours, with its expanding development, transportation by rail, by highway, air or water is all part and parcel of that dramatic development which is now taking place.

Surely it is appropriate that we should assure the most effective type of legislation we can have when we are called upon to deal with any aspect of this great problem of transportation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I made that observation I was urging that the bill go before the standing committee. That was not done. I moved at that time that the second reading should not be proceeded with but that the bill should be referred to the standing committee. There was another reason why that should not have been dealt with at that time, and there is a reason why this bill should not be dealt with now. In April of last year there had been a conference of governments of Canada. That conference had been told that this government wanted the control of all intra-provincial as well as extra-provincial transportation to remain under the control of the provincial governments and under their licences. If that is so, then that applies to all transportation by motor vehicle. Anything else would render provisions of this kind utterly meaningless.

If any railway is to be given power to enter that field under a federal law, and that federal law is to override, as it must, if it is within the constitution, a provincial measure, then the situation would simply be that by indirection this government would once again be invading the provincial field, in spite of the fact that it had purported to consult them in regard to a matter of this kind.

There is a very important principle at stake here. There is a principle at stake which has been discussed in this house before. This government goes through the motions of calling a conference of the provincial governments. Then it places something before them. The provincial governments go home thinking that they understand what this government intends to do, and after they go home satisfied with what was told them so reliably they find that by some indirect method this government invades the very field that they said they were not going to invade. That is exactly the proposition before us in this field.

The Minister of Transport had this to say when the motion providing for the introduction of this measure was before the house on April 26 of this year, as reported at page 3198 of Hansard:

> There is no intention on the part of the government, in adding to the powers of the railway that of owning and operating motor vehicles, to make any sinister change of policy. We merely intend to make a change which will enable the railways, in effect, to do through the parent company what they have been doing already through subsidiary companies.

Then there was certain discussion, and an interjection in the debate, and the present minister went on as follows:

> I do not think it would be an infringement, Mr. Chairman. I believe it is competent for parliament to empower a federal corporation to operate motor vehicles. I do not believe, for instance, that merely because the power is derived from parliament the operator of the motor vehicles could claim he would not be subject to the laws of the province in the operation of those vehicles. I think my hon. friend could find many examples of dominion corporations operating motor vehicles strictly in conformity with provincial requirements.

There is the old axiom qui s'excuse, s'accuse. The very fact that the minister was so emphatic that there was no sinister purpose indicated the fact that at least the purpose could be open to question. There was perhaps ground for apprehension in the loose draftsmanship, but such change as he has indicated he proposes to make in committee certainly would do nothing to remove that apprehension as to the powers conferred by section 27.

I do not believe that it is necessary for the declaration in section 18 to be applicable to any of these operations to make section 27 fully operative. That I submit is particularly so in view of the closing words of the section. Not only does it confer upon the railway company the right to operate in conjunction with or in substitution for the rail services under their management, or control certain motor vehicle operations, it states that they may charge tolls therefor. If they are permitted by a dominion statute to charge tolls, then surely the operation of tolls is being conferred by this dominion act. If the act relating to the railways is within the competence of the parliament of Canada, then it would override provincial legislation. If there was any question about its overriding provincial legislation, the government could always refer to section 5 of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, which provides that by order in council they can negative the effect of the act anyway.

The experience of hon. members of this house has surely not been such that we have any reason to doubt that the government would use section 5 of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act if it found any difficulty in permitting the Canadian National Railways to operate this service.

Let us just see where this goes. If this right is given to the Canadian National Railways, is that an indication that the government is going to do the same kind of thing it does with regard to the C.B.C. and give to the government-chosen agency rights which deny fair competition as between private enterprise and government agencies? If so, then it must confer the same right on the Canadian Pacific.

An hon. Member: They have it.

Mr. Drew: As a matter of fact I was going to say that they have it anyway. If this power is given to one railway, what about the Ontario Northland railway and what about the other railways right across Canada from British Columbia to Newfoundland? Every one of those can then demand, and with justice, equality of competitive position with the Canadian National Railways. You will have broken wide apart the principle enunciated last year in this house by the Minister of Transport when he told the members of the house what they had decided on at the conference of governments. You will be once again repudiating a clear understanding between this government and the provincial governments arrived at at a conference of that kind.

By the procedure being followed in this case you have another of those indirect methods of breaking an implicit understanding between governments which has been repeated over and over again in other legislation. I submit that this bill contains an important principle, a principle which relates to the undertaking upon which the Motor Vehicle Transport Act was introduced. They had their judgment giving them authority; they then purported to confer upon the provincial governments the supervision and licensing of motor vehicle transport. They come forward now with an amendment to the general act covering the Canadian National Railways which would change the position they took at that time, which would repudiate the position they took at that time, and then they would be able to protect anything that was done under section 5 which can vitiate the whole effect of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act.

I submit that before this bill is proceeded with there should be another conference with the provincial governments. I submit that it is an honourable obligation of this government to call together the representatives of the provincial governments and discuss the effect of section 27 of the act now before us and find out whether that was what was contemplated at the time the governments met last year, and whether that would be a satisfactory arrangement.

I submit that anything short of that would be a dishonourable course in the face of the understanding which was placed before the house last year. It was no doubt made on the expectation that the provinces were to retain the licensing power, the establishment of rates and everything else; but this act specifically states that the railways shall set tolls. Presumably that in turn would come before the transport board. This is not the sort of thing that should be brought before the house in this way.

In the deliberate delay in order to justify the course they were following they brought the motor vehicle transport bill in last year in June at a time when it was not a practical possibility to follow the regular course and submit it to the standing committee. The bill went through the house over our objections as to the procedure being followed. We now have a new device. I do not know whether the government has decided that it was wrong in abandoning the rights it had obtained under the judgment of the privy council; we do not know the whole story, for the whole story has not been told this house.

But whether we have the whole story or not, I submit that, in view of the fact that this government on its own initiative consulted the provincial governments last year, this measure should not proceed until they again consult the provincial governments in regard to the effect of this section. I say that because this section goes far beyond any mere consolidation of the act which we have under consideration. As a matter of fact I question very much if this should have been brought in in this way, because it is a provision far from a mere consolidation of existing statutes. It introduces a completely new principle in regard to the operation of the railways.

I do not wish to be misinterpreted in regard to this. In what I am saying at this time I am not presenting arguments as to the desirability of this right being conferred upon the railways or otherwise. I think every hon. member here wants to see the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and every other railway in this country in a position to give the most efficient, the most economical and the most progressive type of service to the people that it possibly can. Within our constitutional authority and within our honourable obligations to the provinces, where an undertaking explicit or implied has been given, then I think that the hon. members of this house will be found ready and willing to confer such rights as will improve the opportunities of the railways to perform the kind of services they do on behalf of the people of Canada.

We must remember of course that trucking and bus services are also a large part of the transportation system of Canada, just as are the air and boat services. The point that I am making is that this privy council decision in regard to the operation of motor vehicles was given in accordance with the government's wish and following the argument of the Canadian government, and they then turned around and purported to hand back to the provinces the very rights they had gained by the privy council judgment, subject to the joker clause in section 5. But the fact remains that the intention was clear, as stated by the minister of transport last year in the statement that I have read to this house, which was made here on April 28, 1954.

I am not going to move an amendment at this point because I hope that the Minister of Transport, confronted with the statement made by the minister who was minister of transport last year, on April 28, will recognize that there certainly would be a failure to carry out a reasonable understanding with the provinces when they proceeded to force through this house by the government majority a section which would challenge the very clear understanding that the provinces had when they met this government last year.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with the voice that I have today, I shall not be imposing on this house for very long. That is almost an invitation for some of my friends in the house to express pleasure that I have a bad cold, but I notice that their kindness and courtesy keep them from doing that.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not comment at any length on the phase of the matter which has been opened up by the Leader of the Opposition. It seems to me that if the government is in any difficulty over this matter, it arises not from the section of the bill that is now before the house but rather from the course that was followed last year when the government sought to get out from under an obligation imposed on it as a result of a court decision. We shall be glad to study all the various angles of this matter, but we shall bear in mind in particular the fact that the chief competitor of the Canadian National Railways is in some instances in the truck and bus business. We do not feel that obstacles should be put in the way of the Canadian National Railways having the same opportunity which is now enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

There are just one or two other things on which I wish to make a comment. First of all, I confess to an interest in the legal and constitutional aspects of legislation of this kind. I suppose that, as I am a novice in this field, my interest is sharper than might otherwise be the case. I notice in particular the long list of ancient enactments which are to be repealed in whole or in part by the bill the minister is now presenting to parliament. I was interested particularly in the fact that one of these enactments which is to be repealed in part is a statute which was passed before July 1, 1867. It always intrigues me how we can amend legislation which the parliament of Canada did not even enact, even as it intrigues me that we now find it possible in the parliament of Canada to amend the British North America Act even though it was passed in another jurisdiction. Perhaps the very mention of that right gives the answer as to how pre-confederation statutes can be amended. I suppose that in the long run it is the crown which is doing the enacting and if the crown's advisers or parliaments change from time to time it is still possible to do this sort of thing.

One of the pieces of legislation being repealed by this bill is section 3 of chapter 37 of the statutes of 1852, which was entitled "an act to incorporate the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada". I have in my hand a copy of the statutes of the province of Canada passed in the sixteenth year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria and in the first session of the fourth parliament of Canada. It is an ancient and musty volume. As a printer I enjoy looking it over and realizing that it was all set by hand. A very good job was done by my fellow tradesmen of that day, considering the difficulties of setting type by hand. However, there is this interesting section of this ancient statute, a statute passed before Canada came into being in 1867, which we are now repealing. It reads as follows:

> III. And be it enacted, that the gauge of the said railway shall be five feet six inches; and the fare or charge for each first class passenger by any train on the said railway, shall not exceed two pence currency for each mile travelled, the fare or charge for each second class passenger by any train on the said railway shall not exceed one penny and one half penny currency for each mile travelled and the fare or charge for each third class passenger by any train on the said railway, shall not exceed one penny currency for each mile travelled; and that at least one train having in it third class carriages shall run every day throughout the length of the line.

This particular railway, according to the preamble or clause 1—they are one and the same in this statute—was to run from the city of Toronto to the city of Kingston and thence to the city of Montreal. Obviously, it is time that a section, if it is still the law of the land, that prescribes a gauge of five feet six inches for the railway running from Toronto to Montreal, were repealed. I ask what has happened through the intervening years. Has the railway running on that line been breaking the law, because it has been running on a gauge less than five feet six inches in width? If the government feels it is now necessary to repeal this archaic section, are not some of the other sections in the same statute equally archaic? For an obvious reason I am not going to take the time of the house to read some of the other archaic sections, but I suggest that there are a number that are quite out of date. If it is now found necessary—and I confess it intrigues and puzzles me as to why it should be necessary—to meddle with legislation that was passed before there was a dominion of Canada as we now know it, what about some other statutes that were passed at that same time? There was the Cobourg and Peterborough railway; there was the Toronto and Guelph railway; there was the Galt and Guelph railway; there was the Grand Junction railway; there was the Hamilton and Toronto railway. These are all in this same volume of statutes of 1852. Incidentally, I find that in all of these statutes that I have checked, the provision for a gauge of five feet six inches is spelled out. That is not now the gauge, so far as any of these railways are concerned. Yet those sections in these other acts are not being repealed. The Fort Erie and Goderich line and the Montreal-New York Railway system are also mentioned. The next one I notice is the Quebec Temperance hall association—but that is not a railway. I would ask the minister if he could explain why it was found necessary to pick out for repeal that one section of the many statutes in respect to railways passed by the old province of Canada; yet apparently it was not found necessary to deal with any other sections of the many statutes in respect to railways passed prior to July 1, 1867.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, it is not my intention to speak at any length. There is really just one other matter to which I shall refer, and I shall do it in a very brief manner simply by reading to the house a letter which came to me shortly after our debate on the resolution preceding this bill. I may say that, if the house wishes to have the signature to this letter placed on the record, I have the authority of the writer of the letter to indicate who sent it to me. I note Mr. Speaker, that you wish me to give the name, and I shall do so. The letter reads as follows:

79 Dunraven Avenue,
Winnipeg 8, Man.,
April 28/55.

Dear Sir:—

This letter was addressed to me.

—At this time, when there is so much discussion in the commons about the C.N. Railways, I thought you should know what happened to my husband.

He was laid off effective November 17/54. Last week he received a 'phone call asking if he was available for work with the railway. He was working at the time at a low rate of pay and so decided to go back to the railway to better ourselves financially and also because of six years' time spent in the railway service.

On April 23rd he was told to report to Transcona shops on Monday, April 25th. He quit the job he had, returned to the railway and at 3 o'clock the same day, Monday, April 25th, he was given a letter stating he would be through on April 29th due to a "reduction in staff". Eight men were hired and three were let out. Incidentally, I never heard of Donald Gordon taking a cut in salary to help their so-called economy drive.

Yours truly,
(Mrs.) J. B. Johnstone.

Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I do not think I need to make a speech on employment matters so far as the C.N.R. is concerned. That letter speaks volumes. It is a common practice in these days, in speaking of a certain "ism" with which we are having to struggle in the world, to refer to it as being Godless. I ask you, what is more Godless than treating men like that?

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this measure. I was much interested in hearing what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) had to say with regard to this particular bill which is before the house. A slight reference was made to it by the Conservative party when the resolution was before the house. I was pleased indeed when I heard the Leader of the Opposition speak in much stronger terms. I was not at all surprised, though, to note the stand which was taken by the C.C.F. party when they said they were in favour of Bill No. 351 as it stands, because that would only be extending the power which the C.N.R. seeks so as to equal that which other railways enjoy. The thought came to my mind that maybe it is wrong to have the C.P.R. enjoy such privileges and that two wrongs would certainly not make a right.

Before I go too far with what I intended to say, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer more particularly to what was said the other night. When the resolution was before the house, I was much concerned about this bill particularly when I saw reference made to motor transport. I guess I must be a little bit suspicious when it comes to that subject, because I have been dealing with it ever since 1937 when the agreed charges legislation started in this house and in 1938 when that legislation was passed. The other day when this resolution was before the house I went to some lengths to elicit some information from the minister in charge of it. Briefly I just want to review that discussion in order to show the point that I am going to raise. In the debate on April 26 of this year, as reported at page 3195 of Hansard a reference was made to this matter by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra who had this to say:

The second question has to do with the sentence which says that the C.N.R. is to be given power to operate motor vehicles. I understood from the minister last night that the company is already operating motor vehicles through a subsidiary company, but will he give a further explanation as to whether there is to be any change in the C.N.R. policy of operating motor vehicles?

That was all that he said on that occasion about it. I know he was concerned about it because those remarks show some concern. Then the Leader of the Opposition today went considerably further in expressing the importance of this proposed bill and his alarm over it. It seems, Mr. Speaker, that on the part of this government there is a tendency—whether or not it is intentional, I am not in a position to say, although I think probably it is intentional—of always trying to centralize power in Ottawa and of attempting to infringe upon the rights of the provinces. I shall exemplify that point a little bit further. I want to say at once that I do not believe that is the minister's purpose. When we were in committee discussing railway matters and agreed charges, Mr. Donald Gordon, who is president of the C.N.R., did not make any bones at all about his position with regard to motor transport. He made it quite clear that they were out to do everything they could to get rid of their competitors as far as transport problems are concerned. There was no secret about that. Hence when I saw in this bill the provision for motor transport, I was alarmed, and rightly so, because we in western Canada know what it means whenever the railways propose an increase in freight rates, supposedly, as they say, because of truck competition. It is we, the ones who are in the non-competitive areas, who get soaked by the increase. Therefore we must be ever alert to that invasion of our rights. When this question was before the house I put this question briefly to the minister. As reported at page 3196 of Hansard I said this:

> I wish to draw the minister's attention to the portion pertaining to the operation of motor vehicles. The minister will recall that when we were discussing Canadian National Railways in the special committee some time ago the president, Mr. Donald Gordon, made extensive reference to the operation of motor vehicles by the C.N.R. That is particularly important to me, because I wonder what significance this provision has with regard to the expansion of the services already in operation by the C.N.R. and the C.P.R.
> The C.N.R. and the C.P.R. operate motor vehicles now, and I am wondering whether, if the C.N.R. gets permission through parliament to operate motor vehicles, the railway may be in a position of being able to override the provisions of any province regarding the issuance of licences for motor vehicles. I should like the minister to clear up this matter for me when he replies. As the situation stands today, if the railways want to operate motor vehicles in the city of Calgary, for example, they have to get a licence from the provincial government, and they must show need—

I want to emphasize that point. Under present conditions they must show need.

> —before any more licences are issued so the industry will not be overcrowded, and in order to satisfy other precautions laid down by the province.
> It was pointed out to us by Mr. Gordon, president of the C.N.R., that the railways were now using the operation of motor vehicles to extend, as he put it, competition with the trucking industry of Canada.

I made one slight further reference which I think I should put on the record. As reported on the next page I said this:

> I am very much concerned about this matter, and I ask the minister to comment at some length on the statements I have made, particularly pertaining to the operation of motor vehicles by railway companies and the use of agreed charges.

I may say that I am not so greatly concerned at this moment about the matter of agreed charges, but I am definitely concerned about the invasion by the federal government of further provincial rights.

When the minister was speaking, I think he gave a forthright statement; and I think I so expressed myself when I was speaking on that occasion. But I think the minister probably was deceived because when he, as he indicated this afternoon, took a second look at this bill, he found that it should have a few changes in order to make certain that some of the extensive powers which were being passed on to the Canadian National Railways were not carried out, in fact. But make no mistake about it, I do not think that Donald Gordon was deceived by it; not for a moment. Nor do I think that the solicitors who assisted in drawing up this legislation were deceived by it because they are too clever men to be deceived in that regard. I am not implying for a moment that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) is not just as clever, but, with all the duties he has, I can quite understand how his advisers even, or certainly Donald Gordon along with his advisers, could have slipped this over on him. That is very clearly brought out when the minister indicates that he has taken a second look at it and now proposes to bring in some amendments. Of course we do not know what they are, and as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out a while ago we must take only what is before us. We have the bill before us and we have all looked at it very carefully. We look upon it with some alarm. At page 3198 of Hansard of April 26 the minister answered me in this way:

> At all events I should like to assure the members of the committee, and particularly the hon. member for Bow River, that there is no intention on the part of the government, in adding to the powers of the railway that of owning and operating motor vehicles, to make any sinister change of policy.

I am glad the minister said "sinister change" because that is exactly what is being done. Even though it may be unknown to the minister himself, it is a very sinister change of policy. The minister continued:

> We merely intend to make a change which will enable the railways, in effect, to do through the parent company what they have been doing already through subsidiary companies.

I agree again with the Leader of the Opposition that last year when the Motor Vehicle Transport Act was passed the federal government made it very clear in the house and to the provinces that they did not want to interfere in any way with provincial rights as far as trucking is concerned and that even though they had the right to govern interprovincial trucking business they wanted to pass that right on to the provinces so there would be no confusion. Yet despite that assurance and despite the legislation that was passed they now come with a bill which usurps every attempt to control trucking by the provincial governments. The minister went on to say:

There is no suggestion either that in granting this power the railway shall be free from the necessity of complying with the requirements of provincial governments so far as provincial laws apply to the operation of motor vehicles owned by the company.

I say again that I believe the Minister of Transport really believed that, but as he looks over the bill now I think he finds that he was in error in believing it. My reason for saying that is that the minister, having had a second look, has now said that he will have to bring in some amendments so that this power cannot be passed on to the railways. Of course, we do not know what the amendments are but we will find out. Then I went on to say:

May I ask the minister this question? Would that not be infringing on provincial rights? Could we legally put something like that in federal legislation, which would be a violation of provincial rights?

This happens to be the section that the Leader of the Opposition quoted but I think I should put it on the record again for the sake of continuity. The minister said:

I do not think it would be an infringement, Mr. Chairman. I believe it is competent for parliament to empower a federal corporation to operate motor vehicles. I do not believe, for instance, that merely because the power is derived from parliament the operator of the motor vehicles could claim he would not be subject to the laws of the province in the operation of those motor vehicles.

May I point out to the minister that if the bill is passed in its present form that is exactly what the railway companies would be able to do. They would have overriding rights over any provincial legislation. The minister continued:

I think my hon. friend could find many examples of dominion corporations operating motor vehicles strictly in conformity with provincial requirements.

I am pointing this out, Mr. Speaker, because I want the house to understand thoroughly the position which I took on that occasion. I was fearful of this very thing and I tried to indicate it to the minister so that he would be on the alert for anything of this nature. I am not going to say it was because I spoke on that occasion that the minister took a second look at the legislation, but nevertheless he did so and as a result he has now indicated he intends to bring in certain amendments. On that occasion I had this to say:

May I ask the minister this? Suppose the province decided that it was not necessary to have another trucking concern within the province or within the city where the company was making its application. Suppose the province said they would refuse to grant a licence on the ground that the operation was not necessary. Would they be able to do that if we granted the company parliamentary authority to carry on this type of operation?

The minister answered:

There are some constitutional aspects of that question which I would hesitate to try to dispose of summarily. I suppose the question would come up as to whether it was an integral part of the railway operation. All I can say to my hon. friend, and I hope he will be satisfied with it, is that there is no intention in the legislation to relieve the railways of the necessity of complying with the requirements of the province in the operation of these motor vehicles.

There again I think the minister intimated very clearly that, so far as he was concerned, he did not think that power was in the bill but, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you I think it is there.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. gentleman consider this a good point for him to break his speech?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, I would think it is a very good point to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when we called it six o'clock I was speaking in the debate on second reading of Bill 351, and I had pointed out that there were things which had crept into the writing of the bill which, in my opinion, were not then known to the Minister of Transport, and that when he gave his statement to the house the other day saying, in effect, that it was not the intention of the government to extend the powers of the railways over truck transport any more than it then possessed, he made that statement in all sincerity. I believe he did, but that he had one put over on him when those who framed the legislation drew it up. I think the minister would almost agree with my statement in that particular.

I should like now to go a little further with what I was saying before six o'clock, when I was pointing out the minister had indicated that there are one or two places in the proposed bill where he intends to have some changes made. He did indicate that where part III of the first schedule refers to the Canadian National Transportation, Limited—

Mr. Marler: And the other companies in part III.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And the others, too. He did indicate that he is going to have it changed so that it will make sure that there is not any misunderstanding with regard to the powers being allotted to the railway companies.

Mr. Marler: Yes.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And, as the minister says, to any other companies to which that may apply.

Mr. Marler: To which part III applies.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, to which part III applies. Well, that is a very broad statement, because I do not know to just what other parts part III of the first schedule applies. So again I must take what is in the bill.

I am afraid however that there are other parts of the first schedule that would appear somewhat suspicious—that is, parts other than the one to which the minister referred. For instance, there are several references in the first schedule to the Canadian National Express Company. Now, the Canadian National Express Company operates trucks. To what extent they could go ahead and operate trucks to accomplish the same purpose, I do not know.

Then, reference is made to the Canadian National Transfer Company.

Clause 27 in the bill gives the railways extreme powers, when it authorizes them to operate motor vehicles of all kinds and to lease them. It gives power to——maintain and operate motor vehicles on highways in Canada or elsewhere for the carriage of traffic and may charge tolls therefor.

Unless that section were done away with, too, it seems to me that, regardless of whether the minister changes something in the first schedule, the railways would still have the power to enter a province and start a trucking business. As I said the other day, they could operate a truck line between Calgary and Edmonton, regardless of the protests of the province—and this, even though the schedule was changed.

Clause 27 is indeed a most dangerous one for the provinces, because the railways could go in and override any provincial legislation contemplated by the provinces, or legislation then in existence.

Then, too, there is contemplated in clause 18 of the bill a most dangerous provision. I would draw the minister's attention to the very first line of that clause where it says: "The railway or other transportation works". In that section, regardless of whether or not the minister removes some of the items in the first schedule, that line in clause 18 which refers to "the railway or other transportation works" could include, in my judgment, any type of truck transport the railways might want to operate. And unless it was indicated specifically that "the railway or other transportation works" excluded those referred to in clause 27, then the railways would be able to operate in any way they saw fit. But if it was indicated in clause 18 that the "transportation works" excluded those referred to in clause 27, the section so amended might have some bearing on that matter. Then in the second part of clause 18 it refers to "the works of every company that is comprised in Canadian National Railways". There, too, is a tremendous leeway for the company.

So again I draw to the minister's attention the fact that, even though he were to remove part of the first schedule—which he says he is going to do—I do not think this action alone would be sufficient, because there are other places in the proposed bill that would give the railways the right to carry on operations as fully as they intend to. Because certainly the term "Canadian National Railways" is used on many occasions, and it seems to me that term is broad enough to allow the railways to operate trucks in any manner they see fit.

I say again that I do not think for one moment this was an oversight by the railway company, because they are too shrewd, by far, to allow a thing like this to escape their attention, particularly when on almost every occasion they have made particular efforts to squeeze the trucking business out of existence—not merely to put it on a fair, reasonable and competitive basis, not at all, but to squeeze it right out of existence so that they can monopolize the whole transportation system.

Oh, if we wanted to go into agreed charges —that, too, is another matter. But, mind you, they would hardly need agreed charges if this bill went through as now framed. They would have no competition from the trucks. Mr. Gordon said in committee, in effect, he was not going to give trucks any advantage. He could get rid of them. And, make no mistake about it, that is what they have in mind.

Mr. McIvor: May I ask the hon. member a question. Does clause 25 say that all trucking shall belong to the railways, or is other trucking expelled?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Well, that just draws my attention to another expression I would like to bring to the attention of the minister. Clause 25, to which the hon. member for Fort William has referred, says in the very first line:

The national company—

That is, the national company—

—may carry on all business that is customarily carried on by express companies, including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the handling of express money orders or other methods of transmitting or handling money, securities, or other articles of value.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I know I am referring to the bill, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not refer to it again.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but can we not get away from a discussion of the clauses? I know it is tempting, for the purpose of making an argument, to put certain clauses on record, particularly when most of one's speech deals with one clause or another. But at this stage I think we ought to get away from a discussion of the clauses. That is what the rule says.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Your Honour will realize that I referred to the clause because the hon. member for Fort William had made specific reference to it. And that is another point to which I would draw the minister's attention. There is an important background in this of which I think we should take cognizance. The reason I am so concerned is that the bill proposes to insert the words—and the Minister of Transport has already made reference to this, so I suggest I am not out of order in repeating these words—

The works of every company that is comprised in Canadian National Railways but is not incorporated by or under the laws of Canada are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

That appears in two places in the clause—"for the general advantage of Canada"—and indicates the damage which could result from any bill using those words, particularly this bill.

To give some idea of the importance of that clause in the bill I wish to refer to another article from a prominent individual in Canada who is now dead. I draw to your attention again, sir, that those who put that expression in the bill knew without doubt what they were doing. I refer to the particular words that I mentioned a moment ago "for the general advantage of Canada." To give you some idea of the tremendous importance of this section, I want to quote from an outstanding authority on legal matters, the former chief justice of Canada, the late Right Hon. Sir Lyman Poore Duff, when he commented in the course of replying to certain questions referred to the Supreme Court of Canada by the governor general in council in October, 1929, as follows:

The authority created by section 92 (10) (c) is of a most unusual nature. It is an authority given to the dominion parliament to clothe itself with jurisdiction—exclusive jurisdiction—in respect of subjects over which, in the absence of such action by parliament, exclusive control is, and would remain vested in the provinces. Parliament is empowered to withdraw from that control matters coming within such subjects, and to assume jurisdiction itself. It wields an authority which enables it, in effect, to rearrange the distribution of legislative powers effected directly by the act, and, in some views of the enactment, to bring about changes of the most radical import, in that distribution;—

This is one example in the bill. I continue:

—and the basis and condition of its action must be the decision by parliament that the "work or undertaking" or class of works or undertakings affected by that action is "for the general advantage of Canada", or of two or more of the provinces; which decision must be evidenced and authenticated by a solemn declaration, in that sense, by parliament itself.

That has reference to the British North America Act, Mr. Speaker. When the framers of this legislation put the section under discussion in the bill they knew that when this transport bill was given this wide power and Canadian National Transportation, Limited, was included in that, along with similar expressions, they were taking away from the provinces every vestige of control over trucking within their boundaries.

The British North America Act has this to say about the expression "for the general advantage of Canada". Section 92 of the British North America Act reads:

Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures.

92. In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

Subsection 10 (c) enumerates them and reads:

Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

By placing these words in the bill, the railways are permitted to enter any province, even though that province has enjoyed the exclusive rights over transportation and trucking for 100 years, and usurp the whole powers of the province.

Mr. Dufresne: They always have since confederation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Even though they have exercised such powers, there is no reason why we should delegate that by statute, and it would be a very bad mistake, Mr. Speaker, to do it.

The late Sir Lyman Duff recognized the importance of that section in the British North America Act, and he pointed out that wherever the federal legislation has drawn on it and has used that expression, it has been used for the express purpose of taking absolute control of those subjects over which provincial governments have always exercised their jurisdiction. We must be very careful in this house that we do not exercise any more powers of centralization than we already have.

I suggest to the minister that when he brings in his amendments to the bill, which he says he intends to do, he should not overlook changing clause 18 and clause 27 and all those other parts of the bill which refer to motor transportation. I hope he will see that these clauses are withdrawn from the bill and that there are no further infringements upon provincial rights.

There is just one more word that I should like to say in regard to this matter. When the bill is referred to the committee, I hope the minister will make the order of reference sufficiently wide so that all parties concerned in this matter, the trucking organizations, the railways and others, will have the right to come before the committee and state their case and have this legislation drawn up in the interests of all of Canada.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall trespass on the time of the house for only a moment. There are one or two provisions of this bill which I must take exception to. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) objected to this legislation on the ground that the trucking provision was a violation, or an invasion, of provincial rights. Frankly, I cannot get too excited about that aspect of the act, although I am sure my colleagues, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon), will comment on it. I oppose this bill for another reason.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the main purpose of the Canadian National Railways should be to run a railway. It seems to me also, that the main purpose of the executive and the officials of that company, should be to concentrate all of their efforts on running that railway, in a successful way.

Any hon. member who looks at the C.N.R. balance sheet, even in a superficial way, knows that so far the present management has not been able to make a financial success of our government-owned railway. Three years ago Mr. Donald Gordon and the government came to this parliament, and asked for a reorganization of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. The net effect of that reorganization was to wipe out more than $1 billion and substitute therefor non-interest bearing stocks. The government told us at that time that, if the reorganization was proceeded with, future balance sheets of the Canadian National Railways should be a good deal better; the profit and loss statement should improve. To a degree perhaps it has, but the over-all picture is still pretty bad as far as the Canadian taxpayer is concerned. But this year once again the Canadian National Railways have shown a huge deficit of $28·7 million.

All Canadians realize the role which the Canadian National Railways have played and are playing in the opening up and in the developing of the Dominion of Canada. Most of our citizens are willing to finance capital expenditures for the Canadian National Railways when they are used for that purpose—namely the opening up of the Dominion of Canada. But in my opinion they are neither willing nor anxious to pay taxes to permit the Canadian National Railways to embark on a lot of side enterprises apart from railroading merely to duplicate or compete with existing facilities. Such a trend is becoming more prevalent every year within the Canadian National Railways.

Last year, despite the fact that the railroad was operating at a substantial loss, the government came to us and demanded the fantastic sum of $20 million to build a luxury hotel in the city of Montreal. They asked for that huge sum, despite the fact that there were already dozens of other hotels in Montreal, and despite the fact that the existing Canadian National hotels, for the most part, had over a period of years not been profitable.

The bill that is before us tonight permits the Canadian National Railways to go into a good many business enterprises other than railroads. For instance, one clause of this bill permits the company to construct or acquire telecommunication facilities in Canada or elsewhere in the world. I ask hon. members to note the word "elsewhere". What is the government policy in regard to telecommunications? What new investment is proposed? What extension is planned elsewhere in the world? Precisely how will this extension help the Canadian taxpayer? I think the minister should answer those questions.

This afternoon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) assured parliament that, as far as trucking was concerned, this bill proposed no great change in government policy. I think he made that statement to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I hope the minister will pardon me if I say that it is a little difficult for hon. members to accept his words at face value. Because what is the minister saying? He is saying in effect: "We want these new powers which will permit the C.N.R. to go into trucking, but we are not going to use them". Why ask for powers which will not be used? I just do not see the logic of such a position.

As I read clause 27, the C.N.R. would be given wide and comprehensive powers which would permit them if they so desired to go into both the trucking and bus businesses. Such a development would inevitably mean a substantial investment by the taxpayers of Canada. Surely, before this bill passes, the minister should tell parliament what investment the C.N.R. proposes to make in trucking, and precisely why this step is necessary.

I cannot convince myself that the C.N.R. should go into the trucking business at this time. I think such a step would be undesirable; I think it would be unfortunate; and I think it would be contrary to sound business principles. What is more important, I do not think it would be in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer.

Clause 29 of the bill is even more revealing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member probably heard me ask the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) not to refer to particular clauses. Reference to particular clauses of a bill is usually made in committee and not during the debate on the second reading. Would the hon. member be kind enough not to refer to particular clauses.

Mr. Thatcher: This is a bill to permit the C.N.R. to go into the trucking and bus business. But in addition it may go into such businesses as wharves, docks, dockyards, slips, elevators, offices, warehouses and other buildings. Just where is this going to end? If the C.N.R. were going to finance all these side enterprises out of profits I probably would not have much objection, but such is not the case. Today the C.N.R. has invested substantial sums of money in sidelines other than the railways, and it is taking the money for such unnecessary expansions directly from the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer. Before hon. members agree to the passage of this bill they should realize that every single Canadian is going to have to dig down into his pockets to help finance the expansions which Mr. Gordon and the government are planning.

It seems to me that Mr. Gordon and the C.N.R. officials first of all should make a financial success of running their railroad. Then when they have done that, if they so desire they can come to parliament to ask for additional money to run these sidelines.

I was disappointed this afternoon when neither the Leader of the Opposition nor the hon. member for Bow River moved an amendment to this bill. It seems to me that the matter is too important to rush through, so I am going to move an amendment. I may have trouble finding five hon. members to stand up, but I shall worry about that when the time comes. I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon):

That Bill No. 351 be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition expressed the belief that a conference should be called with the provinces before this matter was settled. If he believes that, and I am sure he does, I hope that he will find it possible to support this amendment, which would make it possible for his wishes to be carried out.

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 351 now before the house, and entitled "an act respecting Canadian National Railways", cannot be of small concern to those who uphold and favour private enterprise in Canada. Nor can it fail to retain the attention of true Canadians, particularly the staunch defenders of provincial autonomy, as guaranteed by the British North America Act.

We note that the main purpose of the bill is to enable the Canadian railways to operate a highway transport system in any of the Canadian provinces and even from one province to another.

According to the bill, the Canadian National would be entitled to operate a trucking business for the transport of goods as well as a bus service for the transport of passengers.

Mr. Speaker, more and more the government is launching out into a dangerous socialist policy conducive to nationalization of the transport system, whether by rail or motor vehicle.

Little by little a nefarious centralization policy is being developed, which, on the one hand, will gradually destroy private enterprise and, on the other hand, deprive provincial authorities of powers which belong to them de jure and de facto.

To allow the Canadian National to operate such a transportation system would be a serious breach of the principles recognized since confederation and would amount to a systematic and gradual scuttling of private enterprise.

The contents of this bill show that the government intends to practise unfair and unjust competition with regard to people who invested considerable capital, or small savings, in transport companies for the conveyance of goods or in bus companies for the transport of passengers. Should this bill be passed, it would be a serious encroachment upon the most elementary definition of democracy, because it would also cause a slow but painful and sure death to the transport industry in Canada.

I cannot bring myself to believe that the idea behind this bill originated in the mind of the Minister of Transport, for whom I have the greatest regard. I do fear, however, that it may be the irresponsible work of some powerful bureaucrat whose influence within the Canadian National Railways and the Department of Transport overshadows the influence that should be exercised first and foremost by the minister.

It is inconceivable that such a bill should have been introduced without due regard for its disastrous consequences, not only for the existing transportation industry but also for all Canadian taxpayers. It must be remembered that the proposed new subsidiaries connected with the Canadian National Railways, and whose establishment parliament is being asked to ratify by this bill, will be set up with the money and to the prejudice of the people.

All existing private companies already give full and complete satisfaction to their customers, whether it be for the transport of passengers or freight.

Those companies, large and small, were generally established as a result of enormous sacrifices made in the best interests of the patrons as well as in that of the operators. The competition they will now have to face will be considerable and it is to be feared that most of them will eventually fold up or face bankruptcy. Private enterprise is certainly in no position to face government competition, a competition which can, at any time, drive out private competition because of the vastly larger capital at its command. It must not be forgotten that it may call upon the people's money as it wishes.

Should the Canadian National Railways one day take a fancy to remain alone in the transport business in this country and to eliminate all their competitors, they could achieve their purpose with the greatest of ease. Might, in this case, would make right.

Not being subject to the laws in force in the various provinces of this country and being subjected to no authority but that of the board of transport commissioners, which comes under federal jurisdiction, the Canadian National Railways can, at any time, wage a price war upon those which stand in their way. On the railways' recommendation alone the board could approve of a reduction in rates in any of the provinces of this country, with no regard for possible consequences.

Why should the Canadian National worry about profit and losses in its operations, since this is a government owned business? If, at year's end, it finds itself facing a deficit, it can always call upon the Canadian government to use its majority in this house to vote such amounts as are necessary to make good the deficit. One fact which will be forgotten then, as it so often was in the past, is that in this case, as in others, it is the Canadian taxpayer who always foots the bill.

This measure, Mr. Speaker, sets a very dangerous precedent and jeopardizes the future of private enterprise. It brings us a step closer to a reprehensible centralization, which wide-awake people are trying to check. What is worse, some sections of that bill are nothing less than a direct provocation to the provincial authorities, which, up to now, had control over the transport industry in Canada.

The section of the bill which prevents provincial authorities from exercising their jurisdiction over the operation of various Canadian National services making use of the provincial highways, which were built with moneys collected in the respective provinces, is an invitation to disorder. It is not the first time, by the way, that the Liberal government of Ottawa sets such a bad example.

Even if it were only for the reason I just mentioned, I hope that the Minister of Transport will agree to withdraw the bill now before the house, for the protection first of private enterprise in Canada and then of the poor taxpayer who cannot foresee in the future that relief so urgently needed.

Mr. Speaker, since this discussion has been mainly on two sections of the bill to which a majority of members seem opposed, I wonder if the Minister of Transport could not split up this bill into two parts? Why not bring down a bill to consolidate the existing legislation which is enacted again in this Bill 351, and then bring down a special bill on the question which concerns most members as well as the provinces and all those who hold a position in our private transport industry?

I know I shall be told, Mr. Speaker, that when drafting these sections, a section of the British North America Act, that is, section 92, subsection 10, paragraph (c), was used as basis; it reads as follows:

> Such works as, although wholly situated within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

It is amusing to note, Mr. Speaker, how that charter known as the British North America Act is by-passed by the government when it suits its own purpose, and also how abusively and skilfully it is resorted to when, again, it serves the government's purpose.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Transport will not prove indifferent to the flood of correspondence he received, particularly from the chambers of commerce of Quebec province, from the federation of those organizations, and a number of other groups which are availing themselves of our road transports. I hope he will alter, if not the whole bill, at least the two sections relating to the point I just mentioned. I hope he will pay particular attention to my remarks and that, when the two sections we oppose are brought before the committee, he will not hesitate to invoke that same section of the British North America Act and strike them out of this legislation for the benefit of this country as a whole and of all of its citizens, and more particularly of private industry which otherwise would go to rack and ruin as it would have to face a centralization firmly established by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the hon. minister to give serious consideration to my remarks and to those of the hon. members who preceded me, and I am convinced that when the house is in committee, the two controversial sections, which are known to everybody though I am not allowed to quote their numbers, have been eliminated.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would not have had anything to say on this bill were it not for the fact that we are now faced with a motion. As far as I am concerned, I do not intend to support the motion to give the bill the six-months hoist. In my judgment, I have always considered that particular line of action to be a rather cowardly way, if I may say so, of getting out of making a decision. Either the bill is right or it is wrong and it should be either voted for or voted against. I do not think we accomplish anything by asking someone, six months from now, to make a decision on something on which we should make a decision now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member to revise the expression he used when he said he thought it was a cowardly way of reaching a decision. It is no doubt a reflection on the person who moved the amendment. The hon. member is usually wise and reasonable. He could perhaps modify that expression by deleting the qualification "cowardly".

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, I was not making that reference apply to any particular person. But if you consider it to be offensive, I will say that it is following the line of least resistance.

An hon. Member: Ducking the issue.

Mr. Gillis: In other words, ducking the issue. As far as I am concerned, one of the crying needs in this country today is for a national transportation system. When you take a look at the freight rates across this country, with the development of transportation in the air carrying both passengers and cargo, the St. Lawrence seaway which will provide another means of transportation fairly well across the country and the trucking business that is being built up straight across Canada, if we are sensible I think we must realize that some time someone must have the courage to take hold of the whole transportation system across the country, bring it under one regulatory body somewhere and see if he cannot get some sanity into the whole system, with the possibility of the equalization of freight rates, whether the transportation is by air, land or water, by means of trucking or by railroads. I think that procedure is a "must" and that it will have to come. I think this bill is a step in that direction. First, it is an attempt to bring under one set of covers all of the statutes that have to do with the Canadian National Railways so that it will be a handy reference for anyone who wants to talk about railway legislation.

As far as the C.N.R. is concerned, may I say that I have served year by year on the committee that looks after their accounts. I have served on that committee fairly continuously since coming to the house. While the railway is doing many things that we do not like, nevertheless we must recognize this fact. This railway is serving many sections of this country that otherwise would not be getting any service at all; if it is to be on a straight commercial basis, there would be no service. If you are going to measure the service of the railway and its value to the country in terms of dollars and cents, then you will tear up a great deal of the mileage of the Canadian National Railways.

When someone says that in this house a couple of years ago we wrote off a huge debt for the Canadian National Railways, may I point out that we did no such thing. We relieved the Canadian National Railways of a debt which they inherited, not one which they built up. The Canadian National Railways took over many operating railroads in this country when they were in bankruptcy or when they should have been put into bankruptcy. But instead of doing that, the C.N.R. took over those companies and also their bonds and continued to pay these bonds and the interest on them year by year, a procedure which piled up a huge deficit charged to the Canadian National Railways but which should have been written off in a bankruptcy court many years previously. Most of the members who have been here for some time and who have taken an interest in the struggles of the C.N.R. realize that the writing off of that debt was something that was proper. But do not think it was charity to the C.N.R. It was no such thing.

In the second place, unless the truckers, the airways and others are prepared to sit down and to come under one set of legislation, with someone in authority to regulate the future of transportation in the country, the situation is going to get worse and worse all the time. At least this is an attempt to get gathered together all of the legislation pertaining to that particular system so that you may have a handy reference and see exactly where the pieces of legislation fit in. If we want to measure the C.N.R. in terms of dollars and cents or profits, then we shall be obliged to discontinue a great deal of service across this country. I know that no member of this house is prepared to do that. In my judgment, the expansion in other fields is merely an attempt to get money in order to continue the service that is necessary. Unless they get that money, the C.N.R. are not going to be able to serve many of the unprofitable sections they are serving today.

I am prepared to make a decision on this bill now. There are many sideline issues that we can argue with Mr. Gordon. We do argue them with him and we shall continue to do so. However, I do not think they should be confused with this particular bill. I see nothing wrong with the bill. I think it is a step in the right direction. I think that we are going to have to go further than this. I think we are going to have to have transport under some regulatory body in order that we may get some sanity into freight rates on transportation by sea, land and air. This is something that must come, and it is not too far away. As far as I am concerned, I am prepared to support this bill now and to take a look at it in the future to see whether it is working out properly or otherwise.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When the hon. member began to speak, he indulged in some petty name-calling, something which it was his privilege to do if he so desired. But I think he knows quite well that the only possible motion that I could have moved, if I wished to have this bill turned down, was the one which I did move. That was the reason I proceeded in such a manner and no other.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In what the hon. member is stating now I do not think he has a proper question of privilege. He is complaining about the qualification which the hon. member used in connection with the action he has taken.

Mr. Thatcher: I am finished anyway.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may think that the expression used by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) with respect to the motion moved by him was perhaps too strong. There are others who may perhaps think that it was not strong enough. In trying to have the rules observed and decorum preserved, I usually ask the co-operation of the member who has used a strong expression or one that may be called offensive. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South has co-operated quite gracefully. He has modified his expression. At this moment I therefore do not think the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) can complain about anything.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I feel much as does the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. I feel that this matter of hoisting the bill for a matter of six months would be most important and most essential at this time. More particularly am I of that opinion because, by that procedure being adopted, we shall find that the dominion-provincial conference will probably have sat during the intervening space of time and it might well give the premiers of the various provinces as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) an opportunity of discussing the importance of the issue at hand.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said that he is prepared to make a decision now. May I say that we all appreciate the readiness of the hon. member for Cape Breton South to make a decision now. But we all understand that he is a socialist and that as such he does not at all mind putting everything under one head in this fair dominion. Therefore I can well understand his taking that attitude. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke on this subject this afternoon he was undoubtedly thinking along the same lines and expressing support for the C.C.F. attitude that the best way to cure the ills of the country is to bring everything under one head.

In supporting the amendment that the bill be not read at this time but six months hence I do so for three particular reasons. First, I consider that it involves an infringement of provincial rights. This topic was fairly well discussed this afternoon. Second, as I understand it, the C.N.R. was formed with the knowledge that the Canadian taxpayers were taking over a pretty poor business risk. We had businesses that were bankrupt and the Canadian government stepped in for purposes best known to itself at that time. Each of us can read the history of what happened, but apparently it was considered essential to keep our northland open in an economic way. My third reason is that we are apparently going to try to put out of business now the truckers who are actually subsidizing this very railway at this time. In other words, it is being done in the same way as my C.C.F. friends do in my own riding when they get the I.W.A. to support them and the Social Credit members of that organization also have to contribute 50 cents apiece to help to put me out of office. They have no alternative because the majority rules. The same thing applies here so far as the truckers are concerned.

To deal with each of these points in its own perspective, let me refer first to the question of the infringement of provincial rights. This evening the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) mentioned that the late Chief Justice Lyman Duff had brought to our attention the necessity of exercising caution in respect of the infringement of provincial rights. I believe he did that in 1929 when dealing with a water act. Then earlier than that there was the case of Luscar Collieries Ltd. v. N. S. McDonald which is to be found in 1925 and 1927 Canada Supreme Court Reports. It was a very similar case and the justices of the day found reasons for bringing a spur line of some 5½ or 5¾ miles under the jurisdiction of the C.N.R. They did so not by reason of the fact that it was in the interests of Canada under section 92 (10) (c) of the British North America Act—they scrapped that idea altogether—but rather by reason of the fact that they decided it was in the interests of Canadian National Railways, the spur was an integral part of the railway and must be treated as such. Since the railway at that time was already nationally owned it was found that was sufficient reason to bring it under federal jurisdiction.

My second reason for opposing the bill is that when the C.N.R. was formed it was done with the full knowledge that the Canadian taxpayers were taking over a poor business risk. The people of Canada realized at that time that there were many bankrupt railways involved by reason of the fact that unnecessary risks were taken by venture capital to open up various regions of Canada with the hope that Canada would grow by such leaps and bounds that everybody would be wealthy who owned shares in these railways. I draw to the attention of my C.C.F. friends again that private enterprise capital is quite ready to risk money when it thinks it has an even chance of succeeding, and that was the case at that time. Unfortunately the country was not ready to be opened up as quickly as these people had hoped with the result that Canadian National Railways was formed to take over many of these bankrupt or practically bankrupt companies.

In taking over these railways we discovered they were not and could not be profitable because they were not constructed along profitable routes. There was not sufficient industry or a large enough number of people along the lines to make and keep these railways profitable. So the railway business began to go into other fields, and that is the danger I see in the bill now before us. Last year we voted an expenditure of some $20 million to enable the railway to go further into the hotel business. If we take over some of these trucking lines and still discover that Canadian National Railways will not pay, then I can envisage the minister coming back at another time and, in the national interest, taking over the restaurants along the C.N.R. routes because if we take them over they will probably make the railway pay. From that point we might possibly proceed to take over the wholesale houses because they supply the restaurants. This thing could keep on enlarging to the point where we will truly have the nation for which our C.C.F. friends have long hoped.

As to my last point, I feel it is wrong to ask the Canadian taxpayers, in effect, to subsidize an industry that is today oversubsidized. When the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific were built we gave them certain rights such as the control of oil lease lands in the province of Alberta. That has certainly helped to a major degree in the case of the C.P.R., more particularly with respect to their control of Consolidated Mining and Smelting at Trail. I believe that well over 50 per cent of that company is owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Those things helped to add to the general economy of the railway.

They were done in the past and so we have no quarrel with them because they were inherited as the railways made their way across the nation. That was a part of the agreement. I am not going to quarrel with that at this time but I do take issue with the taking over of good sound trucking businesses, as a good number of them are, because of the inability of the C.N.R. to operate as economically as it should. That would be a tremendous help to the railway and possibly it might be able to break even.

I know that Donald Gordon explained to the railway committee that there were specific reasons for the loss that the railway showed last year. One was a bookkeeping matter having to do with depreciation, the difference between user and line depreciation, as he outlined it to us. The loss might have been $5 million less by changing the form of depreciation. Another reason was one that I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be very pleased to hear. Last year, when the unemployment situation was so critical, Canadian National Railways kept some 6,000 to 7,000 men at work that the C.P.R. would never have retained.

I have not given too much thought to the matter of whether or not that was right, but offhand I do not think so. I do not think the state should keep people working for it unless there is something for them to do that needs to be done. In this instance these people were kept at work and were paid considerably more than comparable men in other industries who were dispensed with and had their jobs taken away from them.

Mr. Nicholson: Have you any shops in your riding?

Mr. Hahn: Yes, there are C.N.R. shops in my riding, and I can tell you a good deal about them. This very thing is going to have a drastic effect on them. I am sure the minister will bear me out when I say that it was only a couple of weeks ago I asked for certain information as to why our shops are being gradually closed. I am waiting for a return, and perhaps when I receive it I shall have more to say at some later time.

But at this time, and in connection with this bill, the essential factor is that we are discussing a proper way to carry on the business of the nation. I would say the C.N.R. should not be the body that keeps people on the job, just for the sake of giving them work. We should have an economic system set up in such a way that those people would have work, not just an occupation.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask a question. Is the hon. member now referring to the large number of men employed by the Canadian National Railways for the shovelling of snow in the wintertime?

Mr. Hahn: Am I complaining about it?

Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

Mr. Hahn: Well, if that is the only way the Canadian National Railways have of getting rid of their snow, then I would say they have to get rid of their snow that way, and I would certainly say they should keep the men employed.

Mr. Gillis: But that is exactly what you are complaining about.

Mr. Hahn: If those are the people to whom Mr. Gordon was referring, people at Winnipeg and other points—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They were not the ones he was referring to.

Mr. Hahn: He said at that time that they were kept unnecessarily because there was not work for them, but that he was keeping them. There were 6,000 or 7,000, as I recall it—we can get the figures—who were doing practically nothing but drawing their pay. They were on the job. Read the minutes of proceedings; it will do you good.

Mr. Gillis: He was talking about the snow shovellers.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, he was not talking about the snow shovellers. Do not mix it up.

Mr. Hahn: I am in some doubt as to who is making this speech, Mr. Speaker, but I presume we will soon find out.

Mr. Philpott: Get back to the trucks.

Mr. Hahn: I am not too concerned about the trucks just now. My contention is—and it is the contention of possibly every right-thinking businessman—that if you are going to have a proper economic system in this nation you will have to have jobs for people to stay at work, so they will have work if and when they want it. In the meantime, to give them work in this way is not good enough. It is in the Lord Bennett fashion, where, on the prairies, it was said that when a road needed gravelling a wheelbarrow was all that would be used, rather than a bulldozer.

Mr. Pouliot: No one would shovel snow for funny money.

Mr. Blackmore: What do you know about funny money? Let us hear what you think funny money is.

Mr. Pouliot: I mean your scrip, your rubber stamp.

Mr. Blackmore: No such thing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hahn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I can see that the hon. member for Temiscouata and I will have to get together and discuss the funny money situation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): He would not understand it then, even.

Mr. Hahn: Oh, I am satisfied he is capable of understanding. All he needs is a thorough explanation of it and, realizing the length of time he has been in the House of Commons, and what he has contributed to the nation during his life as a parliamentarian, possibly I will learn a good deal about parliament, at the same time.

Meantime my suggestion is that we must stop putting the Canadian National Railways into various forms of business in which private enterprise is engaged, and in which it is doing such a good job. I am satisfied practically all members would agree that, so long as the private individual finds the risk is a reasonable one, he will accept it and carry on the operation of our trucking business. And I would say further that it should be the purpose of government to go into business only at such times and in such places as private enterprise is not willing to take the risk, and the government should do so only if and where it feels that it is necessary that a particular type of business should be begun.

(Translation):

Mr. P. E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, because the bill now before the house entails encroachments upon the rights of the provinces, it is fitting that strong protest be voiced against those encroachments and I shall do so now although very briefly.

If the bill is passed in its present form, operations of the Canadian National bus and truck companies would come under the jurisdiction of the federal board of transport commissioners. It is an ill-chosen time to encroach upon provincial autonomy.

The Canadian National has no right to be placed in a privileged position toward its competitors. It should be subject to the same regulations and enjoy the same privileges as other similar organizations.

If there is one firm on which provincial authorities should keep an eye and whose operations should be supervised by those it serves most directly, it is the Canadian National.

As everyone knows, and I have said so many times, the province of Quebec is not getting from the Canadian National Railways the treatment to which it is entitled in all fairness. More often than not, the company's management has turned a deaf ear to our claims and requests.

As far as my particular district is concerned, the minister knows that the railway line from Montreal to Chicoutimi has long ceased to meet the needs of our population.

Twelve hours to cover 300 miles is far too long for the pleasure one gets on such trains where, most of the time, there is no dining car.

Stations along this line leave much to be desired in the way of comfort. The Canadian National Railways service in our part of the country is that of an old railway line built almost 70 years ago to serve the few villages of settlers then established in the Lake St. John district.

Today, with its grade crossings, its old station and its dilapidated buildings, it mars the city of Chicoutimi.

We have always had trouble getting some necessary improvements and our efforts were not more fruitful when we asked for the St. Felicien-Chibougamau railway.

I should hope that the Minister of Transport will soon be in a position to give us some better news on this matter. I have no intention of reverting now to this subject.

I merely wish to record my opposition to this bill because it contains clauses which encroach upon provincial rights and also because it carries us a step further along the road to the artificial paradise of the socialists and their state paternalism.

Canadian National Railways

The Canadian National Railways are not as yet able to operate at a profit. They are a sick business, as was recently stated by Mr. Fairweather, vice-president for research.

Their ailments and failings will not be remedied by giving them power to enter into the truck and bus business.

Their management will only find there a further opportunity for piling deficit upon deficit. Mind you, I do not think they lack the required ability, but I am convinced that they have to feed a white elephant which had to be taken off the hands of those who had brought it forth to save them from bankruptcy.

The Canadian National Railways are putting up a new hotel in Montreal. It should, by the way, be called Chateau Maisonneuve. A recent article in Maclean's magazine showed how logical it would be to give it that name, which has been recommended by the people of my province. This establishment will be rented to American capitalists. Will the same thing be done with the bus and truck lines which it is proposed to organize under the terms of this legislation? If these services are profitable, why not keep the profit? If not, why set them up?

The Canadian National is already enough of a drain on the taxpayers' pocketbook. It should not be given the means to be a further charge upon them. I therefore second the motion introduced by our colleague, the member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher). I do so because I am against centralization in any way, shape or form, and against socialism, even when it is advocated by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to waste the time of the house in useless repetitions; nevertheless I wish to voice my opposition to the passage of Bill No. 351 and explain why I shall vote in favour of the amendment.

While I do not have the advantage of being a lawyer, I shall risk an opinion in a field where I can very possibly err.

In my humble opinion, if the bill is adopted without amendment, it will remove from the jurisdiction of the provinces the various bus and truck lines and connected highway transport services operated by the Canadian National Railways.

While I know it is against the rules to discuss in detail the particular section which will create that situation, I can well say that this will be one of the general results—and not the least—of the adoption of the bill.

I stand to be corrected if I am wrong but I think that, even if in this case we do not infringe upon the letter of the constitution, we are surely going against its spirit.

It is quite easy to foresee, without too great a stretch of the imagination, the development and the importance that might be taken on some day by what the bill calls, in questionable French, "les ouvrages de chemins de fer ou autre ouvrage de transport". This means the possible development of fleets of trucks for the transport of goods, and of bus lines with many powerful units for the transport of passengers. And all that outside the jurisdiction of our provincial legislatures, which are nevertheless responsible for transport and traffic legislation within their boundaries, as well as for the onerous job of building and maintaining a highway system which is extremely costly for our provincial and municipal administrations.

Anyone conscious of the sometimes unbounded ambitions of the Canadian National Railways officials can well wonder whether the new transport organizations authorized under this bill will not some day become more important than all those which at the present time come under private enterprise.

We would then be faced with a strange and abnormal situation where provincial jurisdiction in a most important field of its own would be practically inefficient and inoperative, since it could not operate in a very important part of its sphere, which would then be under the jurisdiction of another political body.

But, even if this bill did not threaten to facilitate the gaining of a foothold in the field of provincial autonomy, the fact remains that it would represent a socialist measure which should be rejected, because it does not correspond to a real need and would in no way remedy the few abuses or inconveniences that may result from or be maintained by the present system.

On the contrary, this legislation would involve unfair competition with private enterprise, which has made considerable sacrifices in order to set up a suitable system, and would make the taxpayers responsible for the liabilities of a competitor who frequently shows a deficit, which he passes on to the taxpayer, instead of paying for his errors himself.

I would, moreover, Mr. Speaker, point out another fact which is familiar to me: there are a great number of small communities and remote and sparsely populated localities, where the larger transport organizations are not interested in operating, because there is no profit in it. These limited territories are served by individuals who are able, owing to their work, their efforts and their sense of economy to operate with a small margin of profit which allows them all the same to earn their living and, at the same time, be of help to the communities they serve.

It is to be feared, Mr. Speaker, that any future transport organizations of the Canadian National Railways of Canada will enter these territories and operate at a loss while competing unfairly with pioneers who have had and still have the merit of being self-supporting and do not ask their patrons to pay for their occasional losses. If, in these nice spring days, the Canadian National Railways suddenly feel the fever of expansion, they could, instead of embarking upon new ventures which will probably result in new deficits, try to calm this fever by undertaking urgent works which are actually and exclusively within their field, such as the construction of the railway line connecting Chibougamau and St. Felicien.

(Text):

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, when I took my first look at this bill and saw that it affected some 65 companies and dealt with 23 individual statutes, I decided that it would certainly take a Philadelphia lawyer to speak intelligently on the technical aspects of it. Perhaps, then, I may be forgiven if tonight I speak on it as the son of an ex-employee of the Canadian National Railways, one who started with the old Grand Trunk Railway, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), over 60 years ago. My only regret is that because of ill health he cannot be here in the gallery tonight. As a matter of fact, I gained some experience from being close to the railway and taking my first trip on it when I was four years old by riding with my father in the caboose.

It seems to me that in spite of all the expressions of affection for the railway which we have heard from all sides tonight, there still continues the tendency to snipe and bark on every possible occasion at the operations of this great company. It has its weaknesses, we all know that; but these weaknesses can be magnified many times if we continue to attempt to make a political football of its operations. We should consider the aspect of employee morale in connection with our criticisms. I wonder how we would feel if constantly, day after day, there was someone who had some new axe to grind in connection with the company that might employ us? Therefore, I say, by all means let us make this a business type operation. Let us give it the opportunity to be run as a good business. I do not think we will have accomplished that unless we are prepared to accept the ordinary principles of company organization and operation in the direction of this great public enterprise, the same principles used in connection with the direction and operation of our largest private corporations.

If we ask the people to look at the company in that light then I think it is clear that we should expect those who direct the enterprise to look on their duties in the same way. We should expect adequate direction from the head people of this corporation and we should expect them to appear before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines once a year ready to make a complete disclosure of the operations of the company. If it so happens that we are not satisfied with their stewardship during the previous year obviously there is only one answer—they need replacing. But they should not be harassed from day to day into the ensuing year.

When I look at this act I wonder if one of the failings in connection with the direction of the company can be found in certain observations by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who indicated in the house that he was loath to see a type of arbitrary control concentrated in one man. As a matter of fact I think the president of the Canadian National Railways would welcome the additional advice and help which he would get from a larger board of directors.

It is unheard of that a company of this size should be operating with a board of directors of seven and directed with an executive quorum of only four. The board of directors should be representative of the best business minds in the country. I am sure that there is no dearth of material and I am sure that there would be no reluctance on the part of anyone if the government should see fit to increase the membership on the board of directors, even to fifteen. Let us have the advice of the best businessmen we can get and avoid any indication that we are running a one-man show.

I think in the company there is unswerving loyalty to the president, but I think also that the employees ask if it is not possible that within the ranks of that great organization there are men of a calibre who could head the enterprise which they may have served in for most of their adult years. For the maintenance of employee morale I think it will be necessary in the future to indicate to these employees that there is no job not open to them, not even at the top.

I think also that there is a necessity for better public relations. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to the obligations which had been handed down and placed upon this railway. It is time that we told the public the true story of that burden and indicated in its true relationship the job which the company is doing and can do.

I come now to the question of stewardship. It seems to me that we must attempt if it is at all possible to get this company, this management, on all fours with the provisions of the Companies Act. I like to think that everyone in this country is a shareholder in this railway and that once a year the members of the standing committee hold voting proxies for those people. Once a year the management should come to them and make a complete disclosure of the operations of the past year. It may be that we are not entitled to information in advance which may affect company policy, but I am quite sure that at the end of the year at the time when ordinarily shareholders would pass a resolution confirming the acts of the directors for the previous year a full disclosure should be made to that committee. In regard to reports and opinions when dealing with companies I should like to read from Masten and Fraser's "Company Law of Canada", page 658:

> As regards the right of inspecting reports and opinions, the principle is that, shareholders having a common interest in the company's property, an opinion having regard to such property paid for out of the company's earnings is the common property of the shareholders; but the principle does not apply where the interests of the company and the shareholders are adverse and the parties are sundered by litigation: Woodhouse & Co. Limited v. Woodhouse (1914) 30 T.L.R.559.

Then I think of the employees of this company as being shareholders, and I quote from the same publication at page 720:

> A by-law or resolution of the directors will be invalid and ultra vires of the company if it operates unequally towards the interests of any class of the shareholders: North-west Electric Co. v. Walsh (1899) 29 S.C.R.33.

I think of these employee-shareholders as being a special type of shareholders and I wonder when such agreements are entered into as the one with the Hilton corporation if we are not passing bylaws or resolutions which are ultra vires of the company because they react unequally towards the interests of a class of shareholders. When we do that we foreclose those people from an opportunity to get to the top in their chosen profession.

Then in connection with borrowing money and the provision of the Companies Act in connection therewith, in the case of an ordinary company it is necessary for two-thirds of the shareholders to confirm a borrowing bylaw. This is protection for the shareholders of the company, so that there will not be any steamrollering which may affect the physical assets or the securities of the corporation unless two-thirds of the shareholders approve. Yet in the operation of this company over the last year we have seen a tendency to steamroller special provisions in connection with borrowing money in connection with which we have not been given adequate information.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that I am not supposed to refer to specific sections in connection with this legislation, but I do not believe I can pass without saying this. Unless there is some general provision in connection with the holding of these directorships, it is possible for even Conrad Hilton himself to be appointed to this board. I see nothing in here which restricts the appointment of the chairman of the board to a person who is a Canadian citizen.

In addition I note something unusual as well, that the president of this company may not be a director—a very unusual type of arrangement, as you find that in the Companies Act it is necessary that the president of the company be on the board of directors. I wonder what type of operation we can expect, unless the man who is closest to the administrative functions of the company is sitting around the table with the rest of the directors. These are provisions which must be studied closely.

There are aspects we have talked about today in connection with federal and provincial jurisdictions, but to make this company work and work well there are the problems of personnel and their morale. Let us see that between meetings of the standing committee this company is allowed to plot its own course and do its own job. Let us free it from the everyday sniping, but then once a year bring it strictly to account before the shareholders and make full disclosure of all the facts that should be presented at any annual shareholders' meeting.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, there are very few occasions when I have the pleasure of thanking a member of the opposition for services rendered. This time I want to express my appreciation to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) for having confirmed in every way what I said the other day about the powers of the chairman of the Canadian National Railways. In that respect I have some excerpts, one from a deeply Conservative paper, the Ottawa Journal, and another from the Toriest of all Tory papers, the Post-Record of Sydney, which I shall read. The other day I said that it was the Tory policy to prevent members of parliament from inquiring about what is being done. I do not wish to disturb my hon. friend. I shall try to be as gracious to him as he has been gracious to me, but I want him to know the truth about the management of the Canadian National Railways and its dealings with the parliament of Canada.

There are two policies. There is the Liberal policy and there is the Conservative policy. The Liberal policy is to the effect that members of parliament have an unquestionable right to secure information from the management of the railway and to exercise the necessary control over the expenditures. That is the Liberal policy.

An hon. Member: Why don't they follow it?

Mr. Pouliot: This is why the committee is called, to hear the statements of Mr. Gordon and his staff. Then there is the Conservative policy, which is to the effect that the Canadian National Railways shall be left alone to manage the company in a true business manner without any interference from politicians like my hon. friend from York West, the member for Temiscouata, and all of those. It is the kind of policy of laissez faire which has been so well described by Thackeray in his essays, which my hon. friend must remember better than I do, as he is younger than I am and his reading of that must be fresher in his memory. The Tory policy is a policy of laissez faire. Let well enough alone; do not intervene in the good management of the Canadian National Railways; leave them alone; they are experts and they know what they have to do. We politicians must bow to them. We must let them do all they want, always provided that it is not done by the politicians, and provided that the politicians do not interfere with the management.

My hon. friend from York West suggested that the number of directors should be increased. Why? No one is consulted. Why should we have more? At the present time there are six or seven, and Mr. Gordon pays no attention to them, just as if they did not exist. My hon. friend suggests that they should be more numerous. Why not consult the members of parliament? We have the committee. As a classical example, I asked Mr. Gordon to tell me the price that he had paid for fence posts—something like that, but bigger. My hon. friend would be surprised. Mr. Gordon has very much confidence—and I am very glad that Mr. Gordon was not a professor of philosophy. He told me that it was unethical to inquire about the price paid for fence posts by the Canadian National Railways. We do not have the same ethics.

An hon. Member: They were not political fence posts?

Mr. Pouliot: No, they were supposed to be made of good timber—cedar fences. Then my hon. friend was a learned barrister at law and he had the law in hand when he told us that the decisions of the company must be confirmed by two-thirds of the shareholders. He had a big book and he quoted precedents, just the same as he would have done before parliament sitting as a high court—the high court of the land. My hon. friend knows one thing and many more; but there is one thing that he does not know or that he has forgotten. It is that the companies incorporated by virtue of the Companies Act of Canada or the companies act of any province are supposed to make regulations to govern their meetings. Although my hon. friend has not been sitting here long he is too experienced a member to ignore the laws of the land and he is too conversant with them to do so. It is too bad that, instead of wasting his time in reading a big book on company law, he has not read the previous reports of the railways and shipping committee which contain extremely interesting material.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I have them here also.

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend has read those reports, he has read them too quickly, and he did not have the time in which to memorize what has been said by Mr. Gordon. As reported at page 226 of the report of 1952 we find the following:

> Mr. Pouliot: No, no. Mr. Gordon, I asked for the bylaws of the railways and I see in this section there is a mention of the board of directors. I wonder why you have any objection to letting us have the bylaws of the board of directors of the railways.
> Mr. Gordon: Are you referring to section 11, Mr. Pouliot?
> Mr. Pouliot: Yes. The board of directors of the national company are mentioned there and I take the occasion to ask you this question, because I had a copy, a summary, an extract of the bylaws that were passed in 1927, and I wondered why I could not have the bylaws of the board of directors of the company.
> Mr. Gordon: Well, it is a little confusing; this board of directors reference in section 11 has to do with the Securities Trust. Now, is it the Securities Trust that you want the bylaws in connection with?

The Chairman: I think Mr. Pouliot just sees the words "board of directors".

The chairman was not a mind reader.

Mr. Gordon: There are no bylaws in connection with the Securities Trust that I know of.

My hon. friend will be much surprised to hear this:

Mr. Pouliot: No, no, but as the board of directors of the railway is mentioned there, I am asking why we could not get a copy of the bylaws governing the board of directors of the railways.

Mr. Gordon: I think I can make a general statement here. There are all sorts of bylaws tacked up on station walls, bylaws cautioning against spitting on the platforms, with regard to nuisances, and so forth. Certainly we will give you those.

Mr. Pouliot: But I am referring to bylaws concerning meetings.

Mr. Gordon: There are all sorts of bylaws affecting the internal day-to-day management of the company that are not appropriate for release. They have to do with all types of matters.

Mr. Pouliot: Such as playing poker on the train?

Mr. Gordon: Yes, we will give you a bylaw covering that. We do not approve of poker on trains.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell you in black and white what I would like to have. I would like to have a copy of the bylaws covering the passing of resolutions.

This is what is referred to in the company law so that meetings of the board of directors are orderly.

Mr. Gordon: The passing of resolutions?

Mr. Pouliot: What I would like to know is the constitution of the company in virtue of the will of the board of directors.

Mr. Gordon: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: You must understand what I mean.

The Chairman: Do I understand, Mr. Pouliot, that you wish to have copies of any bylaws that delegate to the directors the power to pass and to deal with matters by resolution which ordinarily would be dealt with by bylaws?

Mr. Pouliot: No, no, it is not that; what I want is very simple. I want a copy of the bylaws of the board of directors governing their meetings.

The Chairman: As to when the meetings are to be called?

Mr. Fraser: Or what their powers are?

Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

I will ask my friend the hon. member for York West to listen to this. I am not speaking. It is Mr. Gordon who is speaking.

Mr. Gordon: There is no such thing, Mr. Pouliot. What happens is this, the board of directors meets on a date which is agreed, and in practice we meet once a month. During the course of the board of directors' meetings, questions which come up for discussion sometimes call for formal resolutions covering legal matters, such as the execution of a mortgage or the release of property, or things of that kind. That is just a normal, ordinary resolution and it says "Resolved that the company agrees to do thus and so". Now, there is nothing formalized in bylaws about that. They proceed in the ordinary way any board of directors proceeds. There is, as I say, a public list of bylaws which refer to the conduct of the public in respect of company property, trespassing, spitting on the platform, committing nuisances on trains, and things of that kind.

I will not continue. My hon. friend and my colleague have enough. There are no bylaws governing the meetings of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. Those meetings take place haphazardly according to the wish of Mr. Gordon.

I want my hon. friend to realize that I have observed the most parliamentary language in respect of this matter and that a suggestion or criticism is not an offence. I am sure that my hon. friend is not offended by what I have said to him. Mr. Gordon had no reason to be offended when I made a similar suggestion to him. But he does not accept any suggestion from anyone. So much is that so that we had this incident one day in the committee when reference was made to someone who could have disagreed with him. I said, "You would have fired him at once if he had disagreed with you". He then used an expression which is used in duelling, namely touché; and he happened to be.

The Ottawa Journal which belongs to the same political faith as does the hon. member for York West wrote an editorial on April 29. They headed the editorial, "Donald Gordon No 'Czar' ". It reads in part as follows:

If Mr. Pouliot had more experience of the facts, circumstances and processes which make a corporation or business tick he wouldn't talk such nonsense.

In other words, I would not say that Mr. Gordon could not be at the same time president and chairman of the railway, but I say that for the very good reason that the railway is not like an ordinary corporation, a bank or industry of some kind where the stock is owned by the shareholders and the shareholders meet to elect their directors who represent private interests. In the case of Mr. Gordon of the C.N.R. it is not a matter of private interests. It is public interest because the stock is owned by the people of Canada, and that is why Gordon has to be checked. Otherwise we will have much to complain about him, the same as happened with Sir Henry Thornton. It is very unfortunate. I do not say that to be unpleasant to Gordon. I have no grouch about him, but on the other hand the time has come when parliament should put its nose in that business contrary to the suggestion of the Journal. The editorial goes on:

He would know, to begin with, that Mr. Gordon, as president of the Canadian National and chairman of its board, isn't some sort of czar or mogul issuing edicts right and left to servile trembling subordinates, but mostly one member of a board, largely taking the advice, and sometimes compelled to take the advice, of his executives and fellow directors.

They are all experts over there. If the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) knew more about it he would not have spoken as he has done, because I consider him an honest and straightforward colleague. It is a case where ignorance is bliss. The Journal goes on to say:

And Mr. Gordon, in this position, is on all fours with the head or president of any corporation—

It is untrue.

—be it a railway, a bank, an insurance company or a big manufacturing industry.

It is untrue for the reason already mentioned.

In certain circumstances, of course, where there may be lack of unanimity among board members or executives—

There is no lack of unanimity. They are not consulted. It is well known that there cannot be any lack of unanimity because Gordon decides alone.

—it is up to the president or chairman of the board to make a decision; to give the leadership which is implied by his position. But that is far different from his being a dictator, the sole voice or arbiter in all that concerns operation. No corporation could be run in that way—

Well, after having said that I was wrong the conclusion is that I was right, although they do not give me credit for it.

—nor any other institution for that matter. Not any more than it could be run by a babel of voices without some voice in the end having a final say.

This is the most illogical article that has ever been published by the Ottawa Journal, but I am happy with the conclusion. I am thankful for that just the same as I was thankful to my hon. friend for some of the statements he made which confirm my statement. I think if I read fast I will have the satisfaction of putting on record this editorial from the Sydney Post-Record of April 28, another Tory paper. The Journal is Conservative, the Post-Record is Tory, the two shades of opinion of the Conservative party. The editorial is headed, "Job With Authority", and reads:

A Liberal member of parliament protests that Donald Gordon is too much of a dominant force in running the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Gordon is C.N.R. president—a big man doing a huge job. Canadians certainly do not want a weakling at that post. The accusation of Jean-François Pouliot is frivolous although he himself is in earnest about it.

Thank you, Sydney Post!

His complaint is funny but also a little disturbing. The mighty C.N.R., spanning the continent, with a far-flung network of branching lines, has the attributes of the circulatory system of a living creature—which it is in the functions it performs, supplying the lifeblood of this young giant of a nation. The C.N.R., the property of Canada, is too vital to the country to be made the plaything of politics. It must have strong and authoritative management.

That is the same thing as my hon. friend has said, the same thing as the Journal has said, the same thing as all Tories everywhere are advocating now and have advocated from the time of Arthur Meighen, Borden, Bennett, Mackenzie and Mann and all those fellows. My young friend said I would like to see the founder of the C.C.F., Mr. Woodsworth, in the gallery, that he would have been proud of that. I will tell him I would have liked to see Arthur Meighen in the gallery. He would have cheered and the Speaker would have had to call him to order. He would have been elated to hear the hon. gentleman. We do not know whether the spirits of Sir Robert Borden and Lord Bennett in the great beyond are not rejoicing with him over his statement. Mackenzie and Mann must be very happy with his speech. I must finish before ten o'clock. The editorial continues:

No one is accusing Donald Gordon of inefficiency or laxness on the job. Instead it appears there are a few complaints in the House of Commons because he is doing it "too well". That's what it amounts to when we analyze what was said. Mr. Gordon simply is making an effective fist of the job he was appointed to do, without political interference but accountable in his performance to the nation.—

But not to the committee. No one can know the price of fence posts.

—And Canadians at large—this seems certain—don't want any political monkeyshines interfering with the job.

Monkeyshines! We are monkeyshines according to this Tory sheet of Sydney. Members of parliament are insulted because they forget—

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall continue the order of business as outlined on Friday night.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 24, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DREW—SIGNIFICANCE OF USE OF WORDS "ROYAL ANTHEM"

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the opening of the house yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in private conversation asked whether I would join with him in asking those present to sing the first verse of "God Save the Queen", as had been done last year. Naturally, I agreed wholeheartedly with the suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the Leader of the Opposition if he would raise this matter on the orders of the day.

Mr. Drew: I am rising on a question of privilege, in view of the statement that I made a proposal of which I was unaware at the time. The Prime Minister used these words, as reported at page 4001 of Hansard:

> Today the people of Canada are celebrating officially the anniversary of Her Majesty's birthday. In this house, as in other years, we will be evidencing our devotion to Her Majesty by continuing to give consideration to the public business of her Canadian subjects. But with your permission the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and I would like to suggest that before doing so we stand and sing together the first verse of the royal anthem.

I was not aware of the words that were to be used, and of course I do not suggest that there was any discussion of the actual words that would be used. I did not have an opportunity to mention this yesterday, because naturally the members all rose immediately and sang "God Save the Queen". In view of the fact that there is a tendency for statements placed on record to establish precedents, and that my name was joined in this suggestion, I do think it appropriate that I should ask the Prime Minister what was the significance of the words "royal anthem" used on this occasion.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I assure the Leader of the Opposition that there was no other intention than to express our devotion to our beloved sovereign by singing the anthem which is a prayer for her success in this life and happiness in the hereafter. I had given no previous thought to the way in which it could be described. It is the anthem which has been spontaneously accepted by the loyal subjects of Her Majesty and her predecessors throughout the commonwealth. I hope it offends no one to call it the royal anthem.

It seems to me it is significant that the loyal subjects of our sovereign throughout the commonwealth should wish to express in the form of a prayer their devotion to the beloved head of this great organization of which we are all the loyal subjects, and proud to be so.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: This subject, I think, could more properly be raised on the orders of the day. The Leader of the Opposition had reason to raise it as a question of privilege because he had been associated with the suggestion yesterday and therefore I allowed him to state his point. If there are to be any further questions asked with respect to the exchange between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition I think they should wait until we reach the orders of the day.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In connection with the question that was raised a moment ago by the Leader of the Opposition on a question of privilege, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, is it not a fact that "God Save the Queen" is our national anthem?

Mr. St. Laurent: "God Save the Queen" has never to my knowledge been adopted by any act of parliament or any resolution or any proclamation. It has by usage, I think, been spontaneously accepted by all the subjects of the British crown that they express their devotion to the crown in that form. I do not know any Canadian who is not glad to participate to the extent of his vocal powers in singing that hymn.

Whether it should be called a national anthem or whether it should be called a national prayer, I really do not know. I know it is honoured by all Canadians, and I know there are a good many Canadians who also like to pay similar honours to the other hymn, "O Canada". There have been debates in this house about national anthems and national flags. I do not think a debate over national anthems has ever been any cause of division. The debate over the national flag has caused expressions of very contradictory feelings, and I do not think Canada gains anything by controversies of that kind. I have always regarded both the tune and the words of "God Save the King" as an expression of devotion to the throne which is an essential part of our social organization, and I hope it will long remain a central part of it.

There have been suggestions that some of us on this side of the house objected to the word "royal". I think that is absolute nonsense. The hon. member and I expressed, I think, the feelings of practically all Canadians when we were considering the bill with respect to the royal style and titles. The hon. member recalls with what deep emotion and unanimity the sentiments we both expressed on that occasion were greeted by all our fellow members in the house. I hope that also will remain true.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. What is the national anthem of Canada? Is it "O Canada" or is it "God Save the Queen"? If the Prime Minister is not able to give a definite answer, is he as Prime Minister concerned about the matter, and is he prepared to bring in a recommendation to the house and to the people of Canada as to what is our national anthem?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to bring in any recommendation to the house to establish anything by law as a national anthem. I do not think that procedure has been necessary in any country of the commonwealth. The spontaneous feelings of the people of the commonwealth have always sufficed to indicate to them in what manner they could best express their devotion to the crown.

Mr. Winch: Will the Prime Minister answer my first question? Is there a national anthem for Canada?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know of any legislative provision made in this house or in the parliament of any other of the nations of the commonwealth establishing by legislation that such or such is the national anthem.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VALUATIONS, DRAWBACK APPEALS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 410, to amend the Customs Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the essential purpose of this bill is to clarify and bring up to date certain sections of the Customs Act.

The present law only requires vehicles to report to customs when conveying dutiable goods. As the house is aware, my department is now charged with the administration of other regulations such as those involving the health of animals, insect infestations and diseases of plants, etc., and in addition the departments of immigration and health are concerned that everyone crossing the border should report.

An amendment is being proposed to the valuation sections which clarifies and confirms our present principles of valuation. It is also proposed to limit the period following the date of entry for appeals against original appraisal.

The tariff board will be empowered to hear appeals from departmental rulings affecting export drawback as well as domestic drawback. At the present time, if goods are diverted from use for which free entry or a lesser rate of duty was accorded, we can only make demand for the proper duty from the person found in possession. It seems desirable to also hold the original importer responsible in cases of this kind.

At the present time a lien holder has only 30 days from the date of seizure to apply for a judicial order to declare his interest in the goods or vehicle seized, and it is proposed to extend this time to 60 days. I shall be glad to give further details when the bill is up for second reading or when we get into committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MELVILLE, SASK., ACCIDENTS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I directed a question to the Minister of Transport in connection with accidents on a certain section of the C.N.R. line in Saskatchewan. I wonder whether the minister is now prepared to answer my question.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise that on April 6, at mileage 71·4 on the Miniota subdivision, there was a freight train derailment caused by a broken rail. An investigation was held by the railway company and it was found the broken rail was due to a rare type of fissure.

On May 14 at Birmingham on the Touchwood subdivision a freight train was derailed, the cause being a soft track due to a water pocket under the track, which in turn was caused by frost. This accident occurred at three o'clock in the morning and the investigation disclosed that the track had been patrolled the previous evening, so this act of nature occurred with little warning.

In neither accident was there personal injury suffered. The management assure me that constant vigilance is maintained to prevent accidents of this kind.

PORT MANN, B.C.—ALLEGED LAY-OFFS AT SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I regret I did not give notice, but perhaps he will take it as notice. Will the minister explain to the house why lay-offs are continuing at the Port Mann, British Columbia, shops of the C.N.R. and give the reasons therefor? Will he say whether or not there is any possibility of re-employment, or are more lay-offs expected? If so, will he give the reasons therefor?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I shall take the hon. member's question as notice.

POLIOMYELITIS

SUGGESTED DISTRIBUTION OF SALK VACCINE BY PUBLIC AGENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a dispatch over the week end from Washington which quotes Senator Neuberger as saying "the Eisenhower administration could learn a lot from our neighbours in Canada about a polio vaccine program".

In view of the fact that the cost of carefully tested vaccine for three immunizations is $1.50 in Canada compared with $3 in the United States, I wonder whether the minister could assure the health and welfare of Canadian children by having all the available vaccine in Canada handled by public agencies?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to comment on the earlier observations of my hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Noseworthy: Modesty forbids.

Mr. Knowles: Just bow.

Mr. Martin: I think I would want the house and the country to know that there has been the fullest co-operation in this matter between the federal government and all the provincial departments of health. In this important matter I think it would be well for all of us to recognize that there are circumstances that bear the most objective of considerations.

With regard to the second part of what my hon. friend has said, I can only say that the source of the vaccine in this country at this time is the Connaught laboratories at the University of Toronto, and as a result of arrangements made between the federal and provincial governments in anticipation, the supplies that are being distributed at the present time to selected age groups come from that source. There is at the present time no importation from commercial concerns.

Therefore I think my hon. friend may conclude—and be happy with the reply I gave his leader the other day—that there is no disposition on the part of any government in Canada to deal with this situation in a way that is not in the interests of those particularly concerned.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

FLOOD CONTROL, ASSINIBOINE RIVER—ENGINEERING REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the government intend to implement the report of the P.F.R.A. engineering branch with regard to flood control on the Assiniboine river?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am not just aware of what my hon. friend is referring to, but I shall look up the matter and give an answer later.

Canadian National Railways

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSOLIDATION OF LEGISLATION—AUTHORIZATION FOR OPERATION OF TELECOMMUNICATION SYSTEM, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Marler for the second reading of Bill No. 351, respecting Canadian National Railways, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, to conclude what I said last evening, we must revert to fundamentals. Anyone will realize that there is a basic difference between the Canadian National Railways on the one hand and the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other company on the other hand. In the first place, Canadian National Railways are owned by the people of Canada whom we represent in the House of Commons, and all private companies are owned by their shareholders, who can decide about the management of their own companies by virtue of the companies acts of Canada and of the provinces. This distinction is essential, and it is the reason I have insisted so much on parliamentary control over the management of Canadian National Railways.

This Bill No. 351 is a great improvement because it contains many suggestions I have made, and especially those made on April 29. I do not take credit for their inclusion in the bill. I give the whole credit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and to the government. Since I am precluded, not because of the rules of the house but because of a practice which might be changed when the committee on rules reports, from mentioning the clauses of the bill I cannot refer to each one by number. However, I might say that if my colleagues take the trouble to read the bill they will realize that many important enactments are made concerning the bylaws governing the meetings of the board of directors and the qualifications of the directors of Canadian National Railways with regard to the subsidiary companies.

There is something new that I have not suggested. It is that officers and employees of the subsidiary companies can be appointed to the board of directors of such company. I am opposed to that. I cannot move now that the particular section be changed, but the members of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines may wish to take the matter into consideration when the bill comes before that committee. In my view it would be an error to appoint as directors, and so give the power of control to, any of those gentlemen who are in the management of any one of those subsidiary companies.

That being said, and since in each matter there is a part that is good and a part that is not so good and we have to weigh what is good and what is bad, I would say that in this case this bill is so much better than previous legislation I cannot do otherwise than vote against the six-months' hoist. I shall conclude by saying that the Canadian National Railways are a necessity in this country, because we must have railway competition. The Canadian taxpayer has made great sacrifices to promote the Canadian National Railways, and to give the railway the opportunity to serve the people of Canada at large we must take advantage of this new legislation. If it is not perfect now it is better than it was, and it could be made still better in due course. Therefore, sir, I shall vote against the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher).

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I find myself completely at a loss to understand the furor of opposition by the Conservative party, the Social Credit party and the triumvirate independent party to the second reading of this bill. The Conservative party, the Social Credit party and the triumvirate independent party under the leadership of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) all believe completely in free enterprise.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Do you not?

Mr. Winch: No. They are completely sold on the idea that the best interests of Canada and the economy of Canada can be served by wide open competition; and yet, Mr. Speaker, it was most amazing to listen yesterday to speeches on this bill in which they expressed their opposition to such competition. In all their presentations they indicated that they did not want competition, unless of course it was only among companies owned privately. When it comes to competition between a privately owned company and a company owned by the taxpayers of Canada they do not want it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is not true at all.

Mr. Winch: Well, sir, if I may make my remarks I shall do so. If my hon. friend does not like them, I cannot help it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I just want you to state the facts, that is all.

Mr. Winch: But his facts are not facts at all. Mr. Speaker, I am basing all my remarks on the introductory words of the Minister of Transport when he moved second reading of the bill and the comments made by the Conservative members, and I include the Leader of the Opposition. I am very glad he is here today, because I intend to refer to his remarks and to the statements made by the members to my left, the Socreds, and the independents.

I have always understood that those who support private enterprise believe in competition. I have always understood that they believe in businesslike methods and efficiency; and if a company cannot stand competition, then it is a case of the devil take the hindmost. That is private enterprise as I understand it.

May I deal first of all with the purpose of this bill, which is what? I cannot understand anyone who believes in private enterprise, based on efficiency and businesslike methods —and especially when it comes from lawyers —opposing this bill. What have we before us? We have a bill which will consolidate in one act of parliament all the operations of the Canadian National Railways. As was pointed out by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton), who is a lawyer, now we have an operation that consists of 65 companies and 25 acts of parliament. On a basis of efficiency and businesslike operation, surely it is in the interests of all that 65 companies and 25 acts of parliament should be consolidated into one act. For the life of me I cannot understand any criticism when it is levelled at a desire to consolidate 65 companies and 25 acts into one act of parliament. To me that is common sense; to me that is efficiency. To my way of thinking it should meet with the acquiescence of everyone, businessmen and legal men alike.

I now want to come to the matter of private enterprise and competition. You know, sir, I was amazed at the speech made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. I understand that he is called a brilliant leader of the opposition. I understand that he was—perhaps he is now—a very prominent member of the legal profession. Well, I will not challenge that, but I certainly cannot understand it because I never heard a more confused speech in my life than the one made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke on the second reading of this bill. He wants competition and he believes in free enterprise. My interpretation of his remarks is that he believes in competition and free enterprise so long as there is no competition from a company owned by the taxpayers of Canada.

I want to quote from the remarks made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition, recorded on page 4024 of Hansard. The remarks are to be found in the third paragraph of the second column, as follows:

> Let us just see where this goes. If this right is given to the Canadian National Railways, is that an indication that the government is going to do the same kind of thing it does in regard to the C.B.C. and give to the government-chosen agency rights which deny fair competition as between private enterprise and government agencies? If so, then it must confer the same right on the Canadian Pacific.

Then an hon. member interjected:

> They have it.

I am admitting now that I was the member who said, "They have it".

An hon. Member: You are quite wrong.

Mr. Winch: Somebody says "You are quite wrong". The remark came from the Conservative benches. I continue with the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition:

> As a matter of fact I was going to say that they have it anyway. If this power is given to one railway, what about the Ontario Northland railway and what about the other railways right across Canada from British Columbia to Newfoundland? Every one of those can then demand, and with justice, equality of competitive position with the Canadian National Railways.

I repeat that:

> Every one of those can then demand, and with justice, equality of competitive position with the Canadian National Railways.

I should like to know why the Canadian National Railways, owned by the people of Canada, cannot be placed in a competitive position with the other railways in Canada.

An hon. Member: Haven't they got that?

Mr. Winch: My hon. friend asks, "Haven't they got that?" I am not going to spend time rereading what I read just now, but he should read it for himself. I cannot speak for the other provinces of Canada, but I can speak for British Columbia. The British Columbia electric railway operates in that province, and I have never heard of any Conservative or socred raising his hands in holy horror at the thought of the British Columbia railway taking over the Pacific stage lines which operate not only in British Columbia but on an international basis. They are operating now in Vancouver from the same ticket office and the same station.

I might mention the Canadian Pacific Railway. I cannot remember hearing of a Tory or socred raising his voice in horror in opposition to the C.P.R. owning the Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway on Vancouver island, which has taken over through a subsidiary both the passenger and trucking rights on Vancouver island through the purchase of the Vancouver Island Coach Lines and the Island Freight lines. For years they have been operating that subsidiary, and I know that in Port Alberni the station and ticket office of the E. and N., which is owned by the C.P.R., is used by the coach lines and the freight lines of Vancouver island. To my knowledge that is the situation in British Columbia, in the case of this privately owned railway.

Why this opposition on the part of those who believe in equality and equity for private enterprise? Tories to my right and socreds to my left are going to deny to this company owned by the people of Canada the rights enjoyed by private shareholders, many of whom are not even residents of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: What we want is that they should not be given more rights than can be given under this bill.

Mr. Winch: We will come to that. I am speaking from knowledge, and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) should know that as well. However, I notice that he did not speak on the bill or raise that point.

Mr. Fulton: Too many C.C.F.'ers were speaking yesterday.

Mr. Winch: In his concluding remarks the Leader of the Opposition suggested that the bill should be held over until a dominion-provincial conference was called. I know what I am saying is correct because I am referring to his remarks as reported on page 4025 of Hansard of May 23. Here is what the Leader of the Opposition said:

> I submit that before this bill is proceeded with there should be another conference with the provincial governments.

I can appreciate that statement, but I am puzzled to know what is the policy of the Conservative group in this house. First of all we have the Leader of the Opposition saying that before this bill is proceeded with there should be a conference with the provincial governments. I checked back on a statement made by another Conservative member of this house which received a great deal of editorial support. I refer to a speech made on May 10, 1955 by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) to be found on page 3647 of Hansard. The hon. member said:

> I am suggesting that by dealing with dominion-provincial conferences the executive here, the cabinet, is not fulfilling its responsibilities to the House of Commons itself. This is a place where government programs should first be put forward, not at conferences.

What is the Conservative policy on this? In complete compliance with the wishes of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre the government have brought forward their program in the form of this bill, but then we are told by the Leader of the Opposition that it should not be done by the cabinet, that the government should call a dominion-provincial conference.

We must realize that the railroads of Canada initially came into being because the taxpayers of Canada granted them rights. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre does not like this bill because it may cost the taxpayers some money. Many years ago the people of Canada gave the C.P.R. a subsidy of billions of dollars. They were given the right to everything contained in a strip 20 miles wide on each side of the railroad across the Dominion of Canada. On Vancouver island the E. and N., which they purchased, have been given the right to everything on the ground, above the ground and under the ground. The taxpayers of Canada have paid plenty.

The Canadian National Railways were taken over on what I consider was a wrong basis. We cannot do anything about that now, but instead of taking over the roads concerned on a bankrupt basis a capitalist Conservative government of Canada took them over in order to save private enterprise, and the taxpayers of Canada have been paying for it ever since.

Now we have this bill before us. I think the consolidation feature is right, because it brings into one act the operations of some 65 companies and 25 acts. This act, as I read it, is only asking that the Canadian National, owned by the people of Canada, shall now have the same rights as are being exercised by private railway companies in Canada. I cannot speak for all, but I do speak from my knowledge of the British Columbia Electric and the C.P.R. in their operations in British Columbia. Why cannot the C.N.R. have the same rights?

As I read this act the major thing for which they are asking is what the Conservatives and the socreds have always asked, that government operations shall be on an efficient and businesslike basis. If the Canadian National Railways find that it is inefficient and unprofitable to operate a line they ask for the right—which they have not had before, except as a subsidiary company—to be allowed to replace that passenger and freight transportation with passenger bus and truck lines so as to give service to the people who have been served by the railway itself.

An hon. Member: As a monopoly.

Mr. Winch: That is not what the bill states, and you find it in a certain section. I do not believe the cabinet minister would stand up in this house and deliberately give a lie to the House of Commons. The minister stood in his place only yesterday on the motion for second reading and explained the situation with respect to an application before the board of transport commissioners. He said the C.N.R. were in a difficult position because they wanted to be able to say that towns and municipalities would be served in some other way.

I cannot understand any supporters of free enterprise demanding by their opposition to this bill that the C.N.R. should operate on an inefficient basis. We have a request that they should be allowed to operate on an efficient basis. I also know something about dominion-provincial relations and, unless I am wrong, if it comes to a straight provincial operation on truck lines and passenger lines, they do come under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Fulton: Not if this bill carries in its present form.

Mr. Winch: My hon. friend says no. If that is the case, then I should like to know why two railways that are operating motor passenger and truck lines in British Columbia go before the public utilities commission of British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: Because they were not under this act. That is the whole point. This act will exempt the C.N.R. from that.

Mr. Winch: If my hon. friend from Kamloops is correct then I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Transport to make it clear by an amendment that they do come under that jurisdiction. But I have read this act and I still believe they do. I do not believe that, in a matter of this nature, we can override strictly intraprovincial operations.

Mr. Gillis: The bill has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Sinclair: What you need is advice from a good lawyer.

Mr. Winch: Sir, I have tried to present my views on this. I do not say that I agree completely with the entire consolidation and all the clauses dealing with the five changes in the provisions, but I do say this, and I admit it is a complete repetition. I can in no wise understand any member of this House of Commons who objects to any consolidation of acts so you have all the powers in one act.

An hon. Member: Nobody objects to that.

Mr. Winch: We all heard the hon. member for York West, and the fact that they oppose this going through at this time demonstrates that. They did not object—

Mr. Hamilton (York West): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I did not make any remark of that type at all.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a question of privilege. If the hon. member who has the floor has misinterpreted what the hon. member has said, he may ask the hon. member to make a correction now or he may wait, if the hon. member who has the floor does not acquiesce, until the hon. member has concluded and then he may explain.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, if I have misinterpreted the statement of my hon. friend I shall retract right now, because I want the facts. The opposition to this bill means that they do not desire consolidation. It also means that they do not believe in competition. They are afraid of it.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mr. Winch: It also means, because of the amendment now before us, that they are not prepared, even those who believe in private enterprise and competition, to support it. I am going to name them again; the Conservatives, the socreds and the triumvirate of independents are not prepared to face competition. They are not prepared, because of the existing powers of private companies, to grant the same right to a company owned by the people of the Dominion of Canada through the government of Canada.

I am going to oppose the amendment which is now before the house. To me it is a back door escape for people who are not prepared to make a decision. It is a method, legal in parliament, of not making a decision which I think should be made at this session. Those are my opinions. Although there are two or three points on which there is some disagreement with regard to this bill, they can be discussed in committee; but the principle of the bill is entitled to receive the unanimous support of the members of this house.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, if I could have two or three minutes in which to present my views with respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, I should appreciate it very much.

I wish to say at the outset that the hon. member who has just finished was speaking through his honourable hat, if he owns such a hat. The fact is that he misinterpreted entirely the reason we object to this bill. I want him to know right off that we are not afraid of competition. We want our Canadian National Railways to be put into the best possible competitive position. We in this party have demonstrated through the things we have done provincially that, in all cases where a crown corporation and a privately owned corporation are thrown into competitive fields, we have tried sincerely to lay down such regulations that they will have equality as to their competitive position. That is the stand we take now.

Here is the way in which we look at this bill that is now before us, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company operates trucks on the highways of the provinces through a subsidiary company which is in every respect subject to provincial laws and provincial regulation.

Mr. Winch: And owned by the C.P.R.

Mr. Low: Surely. That is all right. If my advice is correct, and I believe it is, the Canadian National Railways want to do the same thing, and I must point out that they can do the same thing. If they want to do it and really carry out that desire, nobody is going to take any exception to it, except for this. If they attempt to operate truck lines under a subsidiary company or companies and begin to cut rates below cost in order to ruin and destroy their competitive trucking companies, then I would object and I would expect every redblooded Canadian to object.

But, Mr. Speaker, it appears that the Canadian National Railways want to go beyond the operation of trucks and truck lines under subsidiary companies owned by themselves. They want to operate their trucking companies under their own name, and they also want to come under the Canadian National Railways Act. At no time has the Canadian Pacific Railway asked this parliament to give them trucking rights by federal statute. That matter intrudes into the provincial field of authority. But the Canadian National Railways have asked this parliament to pass section 27 of the bill now before us, which section is clearly an invasion of provincial rights. Of course my hon. friends of the C.C.F. agree with it because they are centralizers.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, no.

Mr. Low: We have had many examples of their support of those things that will centralize authority in the federal government, and here is another one. Bill No. 3 was another. I could go on and name others if I had the time to do so. The bill we are discussing does not merely seek to put the Canadian National Railways on an even basis with the Canadian Pacific Railway so far as competition is concerned. If it did that, Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I would support it, because I stand for equality of competitive rights. We want the Canadian National Railways to have every right and power that is necessary for them to have in order to operate efficiently. However, we object to having clauses like clause 27 slipped into what is supposed to be a consolidation of the various acts that govern the Canadian National Railways.

It is for those two particular reasons—first, that such a provision has no business here in a consolidation of acts and, second, that it invades provincial rights—that I certainly am going to support the motion to give the bill the six months' hoist.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I think the members who have spoken for this group have expressed our position quite clearly. However, the hon. member for Peace River has raised a straw man here that I think is not too important. The Canadian National Railways are at present operating a bus service from Kamsack across part of my constituency to Flin Flon. This service has been introduced in order to meet the competition of the bus companies. This bus line runs across a territory that is serviced by the Saskatchewan government bus corporation. As far as I know the Saskatchewan government has not objected to the operation of this bus line. I am convinced that the Canadian National Railways had to clear it with the Saskatchewan government before this service was inaugurated.

Mr. Low: Because they had not this authority to do it without doing so.

Mr. Nicholson: Even with this section written into the law I think it would still be necessary for the Canadian National Railways—

Mr. Low: Not at all.

Mr. Nicholson: —to get the permission of the respective provincial governments that set up standards with regard to the size of vehicles and the speed at which they may travel on the highways. As I see it, it will not give the Canadian National Railways authority to disregard the laws of the various provinces in the country.

Mr. Trainor: Why not put it in the act?

Mr. Nicholson: I think it is taken for granted that the British North America Act gives to the provinces certain jurisdictions.

Mr. Trainor: What is the objection to putting it in the act?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nicholson: Since apparently in Saskatchewan at least it has been possible to work out arrangements between the Canadian National Railways and the provincial government, which has a bus service over part of this area, I do not see that there will be any real problem in connection with carrying out all the provisions of this act.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I ask the hon. member a question? How would he interpret section 18 of the proposed bill?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could wait until we reach the committee stage.

Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with the motion now before the house, namely that this bill be not now read a second time but that it be read this day six months hence. I wish to indicate our position in regard to that motion. At the same time I also wish to deal with a series of misstatements which have been made this afternoon, and which indicate the confusion that exists with regard to this measure.

It seems perhaps appropriate that the socialists should be the allies of the Liberals on this occasion. I can think of no more fitting occasion for that alliance to be openly declared.

Mr. Sinclair: And the socreds with the Tories.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no. The hon. minister is a little bit ahead of himself, as often happens. As far as that is concerned, we stated our own position.

In this particular case I could not help observing the crocodile tears being shed by the hon. member who spoke a few minutes ago, when he felt that it was almost a crime for anyone to question the word of the minister with regard to any aspect of the legislation now before us. The fact is that some of us still reserve the right to discuss these things, and propose to do so. But never in this house, in the comparatively few years I have been here, have I heard so much nonsense wrapped up in so few words. I have never heard such a complete misstatement of facts as that by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Winch: I quoted from Hansard, sir.

Mr. Drew: Yes; and in quoting from Hansard the hon. member showed his capacity to misunderstand a sentence which he had barely finished quoting. He said those who were opposed to this measure are opposed to consolidation. That is not only nonsense, it is completely untrue. We made it clear that we were dealing with a particular aspect of this bill. He then went on to say that we objected to competition. Oh, my; oh, my! What new apostles of competition are now emerging in this house! Here we have the hon. member for Vancouver South now rising as the exponent of free enterprise.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Drew: Yes; the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). Let us keep them clear. I would not want for one moment to confuse the two. I am referring to the hon. member for Vancouver East. The suggestion that we are opposing competition merely indicates that he got to his feet without knowing anything about the subject he was discussing. He went to some length and in a very plaintive tone repeated several times that we are objecting to the Canadian National Railways being given the same powers the Canadian Pacific Railway already has.

Let me read exactly what powers the Canadian Pacific Railway has with regard to road transport. These powers are found in the letters patent issued to Canadian Pacific Transport Company Limited under the Companies Act, and I think it is well to put them on record so those who read Hansard—and fortunately there are many—will understand what nonsense the socialists talk when they try to enter a debate of this kind straddling the fence on free enterprise and efficiency. Here are the actual powers conferred on Canadian Pacific Transport Company Limited by the incorporating act under which they operate:

(a) 1. To carry on the business of transportation of passengers and goods of all kinds by land and water.

2. To purchase, construct, hire, operate, maintain, repair, let, sell and dispose of conveyances, vehicles and vessels of all kinds drawn or propelled by any power whatever, including wagons, carts, trucks, carriages, automobiles, omnibuses, boats and aeroplanes.

3. To carry on the business of forwarders, transportation agents, warehousemen and wharfingers and to construct, purchase, lease, hire, use and dispose of wharves, buildings, plant and appliances requisite for such purposes;

(b) To purchase, rent, take, hold and enjoy lands, wharves, docks, warehouses, offices, elevators and other buildings in Canada or elsewhere to be used for the purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or its steamship connections;

(c) To enter into arrangements with a railway company or steamships company or other transportation company, and to obtain from such company any rights, privileges and concessions which the company may think it desirable to obtain, and to carry out, exercise and comply with any such arrangements, rights, privileges and concessions.

There are the powers conferred upon the Canadian Pacific Transport Company Limited. The hon. member for Vancouver East says, "But why not let Canadian National Railways have the same powers?" He suggests they are just being given the same powers in section 27 of the bill now before us. If there was anything in that argument of course it might hold water, but it does not. Let us see what powers the Canadian National Railways have, quite irrespective of section 27 of the bill. These are the powers of Canadian National Transportation Limited under letters patent issued pursuant to the Companies Act, and are the powers under which they are carrying on business. Listen to the similarity to the Canadian Pacific powers. They are:

(a) To carry on the business of transportation, for hire, of persons, goods, wares, merchandise, mails, property and things of every description, on land, water, and by air, or combinations thereof, by any means whatsoever, except by rail and except as a railway company;

(b) To manufacture, buy, sell, hire, lease, import, export, operate and deal in vehicles, vessels, aircraft equipment, apparatus, engines, machines, mechanical contrivances or devices of every kind and description, using any form of motive power, which may be required, used or capable of being used in connection with any such business, and all machinery, accessories, parts, appliances, tools, supplies, materials and things required, used or capable of being used in connection therewith;

(c) To interchange traffic with any railway company by container system or any method deemed desirable, and to furnish all necessary cars, trucks, equipment and apparatus, also to make agreements for the conduct and regulation of such traffic;

(d) For the better carrying on of the business of the company to carry on the business of warehousemen, warfingers and storers of goods, wares and merchandise of every kind and description.

What could be covered in the way of transportation, Mr. Speaker, that is not covered by that? This is the company that carries on all business other than rail service. This company has full power to buy and sell motor vehicles, aircraft, ships and everything that can be used for transportation outside of railway vehicles themselves, which are covered by the general Railway Act. The situation is that Canadian National Transportation Limited, the subsidiary dealing with these types of transportation, has just as wide powers as the subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company engaged in the same field outside of rail activities. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, far from Canadian National Railways not having the powers the Canadian Pacific has, it has precisely the same powers under a federal act, and can carry on under that authority without having section 27 of this bill.

The thing every hon. member should ask—in this case the hon. member for Vancouver East, as well as other members—is why we are asked to pass section 27. Either section 27 means nothing or it means that some new powers are being conferred over and above these wide powers I have just read in the act under which Canadian National Railways can buy and sell automobiles, aircraft and ships. It means nothing, or we are not being dealt with in complete frankness by the minister on this occasion. It is one or the other. If this means something more than the right to operate under the wide powers conferred by the federal act to which I have referred, then we are awaiting an explanation from the minister that we should have had long ago.

We should not take section 27 as necessary. Section 27 is not needed, as the hon. member for Vancouver East said, to give the Canadian National Transportation Limited the same powers as the corresponding company of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is not needed to give any of the other companies powers they already have, conferred by federal statute.

The Canadian Pacific Company was incorporated in 1872. There have been well over 100 amendments to that act, but they have no such powers today. Why is this power now being conferred upon Canadian National Railways, when it has all the powers to do all the things covered by the descriptive terms I have read to the house? Why does it need this section, unless it is to by-pass the very act that was introduced in the house last year to meet the representations of the provincial governments at the time the government asked the provincial governments to take over the control, supervision and licensing of extraprovincial as well as intraprovincial transport?

When the hon. member for Vancouver South talks about our seeking to deny competition, he is talking plain, unadulterated rot. I should say the hon. member for Vancouver East. I shall correct that immediately before I cause the hon. member for Vancouver South to rise to his feet, because I would not suggest that the hon. member for Vancouver South would make any such completely factious argument as that which we heard this afternoon. I may disagree with him fairly extensively as it is, but even with that reservation I repeat that he certainly would not say some of the things that have been said this afternoon, even though the socialists are now allied with the government in this rather mysterious demand for special powers for the Canadian National Railways, which have not yet been explained and which need explanation in view of the extremely wide powers they already have.

No, Mr. Speaker; unless this is intended to override provincial authority, let the minister stand up and say that the draftsmanship was not satisfactory and that they will remove section 27. I pointed out yesterday that this measure purports to be a consolidation. Let us proceed with the consolidation and leave out of it something that has nothing to do with consolidation of the legislation. This is a new section, an unnecessary section, unless there is some hidden meaning.

Perhaps some question may be raised as to why we should even suggest the possibility that there is a hidden meaning. The Canadian National Railways, as a railway organization, is made up of many thousands of people. I am convinced that the rank and file of workers in Canadian National Railways want their company to operate on a basis that will stand the ordinary tests. They want no special favours. I am satisfied that those men also want the people of this country to be told, with complete frankness, exactly what is being done. We have not been dealt with frankly in a number of cases. Just let me illustrate a few.

Hon. members will recall when the manager of the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg was removed because he did not roll out the red carpet quickly enough to suit the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), who at that time did not occupy quite such an important position—that is, in the open, at any rate.

Mr. Rowe: What would he want now?

Mr. Drew: At that time we were not dealt with frankly. There is no question about the fact that a very gallant veteran of the last war, a man who had established a fine reputation as manager of one of the largest hotels in this country, was removed simply for the petty reason that it was thought he had not shown due deference to those who were associated with this government and who were visiting that hotel at a very busy time, when many were travelling in this country.

Then there was another occasion when we were not dealt with in complete frankness. We have prided ourselves for a long time because we operate hotels like the Fort Garry, the Chateau Laurier, the Chateau Frontenac, the Vancouver, the Bessborough in Saskatoon, the Macdonald and all the other fine railway hotels right across this country. We have claimed that we had service as good as, if not a little better than, was to be found anywhere. Then the Canadian National Railways, with public funds, proceeded with plans to build a huge hotel in Montreal, where all these trained hotel experts should have been given the opportunity to show their years of experience in management, and what was done? There was a surreptitious deal made with a high pressure United States hotel organization to run this hotel, and we cannot even find out the details of this transaction. No, Mr. Speaker, we have not been dealt with frankly.

We were not dealt with frankly then. There was no excuse for that, and there was no excuse for the removal of Mr. Pitt from the Fort Garry hotel. We did not get the details there. We did not get the whole truth. There was no excuse for what was done in Montreal in bringing this outside company to discredit the experience of Canadians, many of whom are so good that they are the managers of big hotels in the United States. Then we come to this particular case, and we have a section placed before us that is quite unnecessary in the face of the powers possessed by Canadian National Transportation Limited, unless there is a hidden reason. That is exactly why this matter should not be proceeded with until the honourable obligation of this government to deal fairly with the provincial governments is carried out.

The hon. member for Vancouver East ridiculed the suggestion that there be a conference. Perhaps his group were not allied with the Liberals at that time, but a year ago they did not ridicule the suggestion that there be a conference, when the privy council decided that the federal government had full authority over extra-provincial highway transportation.

Mr. Winch: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not ridicule the idea of a conference. I asked for an explanation of the two points of view of the Conservative party.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a point of order. The hon. member can make his position clear after the Leader of the Opposition has concluded his speech.

Mr. Drew: In so far as that position is concerned, it will be recalled that the federal government had obtained the authority it wanted over extra-provincial highway transportation. At that time the government did not find it so difficult to bring the provinces together for a conference. After that decision had been rendered in April, the federal government asked the provinces to send their representatives to consider this subject in detail. They met here and this government proposed that in spite of the privy council decision, the provinces should take the full authority and the licensing control of extra-provincial highway transport. The provinces agreed, and to implement that undertaking a bill was presented to this house in June. It was passed and is on the statute books today. It is on the statute books at the request of this government.

If there was any reason whatever last year to call the provinces together to discuss that matter, there is far more reason to call them together now, when this government proposes to introduce a section which will have the effect of giving powers which unquestionably would conflict with those powers that were conferred upon the provincial governments at the request of this federal government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, by all means let us have a consolidation of the acts. If this is really just a consolidation with which we are dealing, let us limit it to a consolidation. There is one other section with which I am going to deal, not extensively but just to illustrate how extraneous matters have been brought into this bill. Section 22 creates an entirely new situation. At the moment the Canadian National Railways may—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition will excuse me if I interrupt him again, but I have asked hon. members not to refer to the sections of the bill while discussing second reading. I am sure he can deal with this particular point without referring to the precise section.

Mr. Drew: Hon. members know there is a section in this bill which provides that the Canadian National Railways will have certain powers in regard to short branch line construction. It is provided that if the line does not exceed six miles in length it may be dealt with by obtaining the approval of the governor in council and filing a plan. The bill also includes a provision that, in any case, if parliament sets aside money for the construction thereof the railway may proceed to deal with it.

Now, that is a very different authority than that which is conferred upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific may construct branches and extensions under authority granted by the board of transport commissioners. Under the new provision the Canadian National Railways is going to be allowed to do this by order in council. We know it is a loosening up process. You will recall the restriction that all contracts must be by tender, and provision that in certain cases, if the contract does not exceed $15,000, tenders need not be called. The same principle is being applied here.

The Canadian National are not going to be called upon to go to the board of transport commissioners for approval if the branch line does not exceed six miles in length; they may get permission by order in council. In fact, the railway can construct the line in any case if, tucked away in the estimates somewhere, there is an item dealing with that particular line, even though parliament may not have passed any bill dealing with that extension.

I have not heard any suggestion from any member of the Conservative party that the hands of the officials of the Canadian National Railways be tied in any way in operating on a basis of free competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway or with any other railway in this country. I would be the first to oppose that; I would be the first to oppose any restriction on the liberty of the Canadian National Railways to compete freely with the Canadian Pacific, and why should I not be? It was the Conservative party that brought the Canadian National Railways into existence. I know that during the years that followed, in one of those oversimplifications, the slogan was coined "Competition ever, amalgamation never."

We believe in competition; we believe in competition between government agencies and private agencies. We believe in fair competition. We believe that will be in the best interests of all the people of Canada, because in that way we can have some assurance of efficiency through the competitive methods that make for efficiency in ordinary business operations. But we do not think we should be asked to include in what is a consolidation measure these special sections that have nothing to do with the consolidation, but embody entirely new principles, and vicious principles; for we believe in real, equal competition between government agencies and private enterprise in this country engaged in the same field.

There the situation rests, Mr. Speaker. We cannot move an amendment to clauses at this time. I have entered this debate again to deal with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, and I have also taken this opportunity to deal with certain misstatements that have been made here so freely this afternoon.

Mr. Winch: Where do you stand on the amendment?

Mr. Drew: If you will just contain yourself for a moment I shall let you know. I intend to deal with it in my own time, not in yours.

We have stated, Mr. Speaker, that these sections should not be dealt with here. We have stated clearly why this government owes an obligation to consult the provincial governments. They know from their experience last year that this can be done quickly. They know it does not need to hold up the bill, unless there is substantial objection to it. If there is substantial objection to it by the provinces on the ground that it restricts the rights and obligations which this government asked the provinces to assume last year, then it is time we knew that. We should know it before we deal with these clauses.

I said yesterday that at this point I did not propose to move an amendment, because in committee the minister can withdraw these clauses. I hope he will do that unless he is prepared to get in touch with the provinces, who can certainly deal just as promptly with this now as they did last year after the privy council decision affecting this whole question.

There is no reason at all why this legislation cannot be dealt with during the course of the present session, and still have an appropriate expression of opinion from the provinces. To refuse to do this would only strengthen the apprehension that has already been expressed that the government is indirectly trying to change the effect of the legislation passed by this house last year.

I repeat, in view of the almost unbelievable misinterpretation of my remarks by the hon. member for Vancouver East, that we are in favour of consolidation. We want a speedy consolidation which will facilitate the handling of matters under this legislation, but we do not want any new powers conferred which were not discussed with the provinces last year, without those powers being fully disclosed to us. We do not want an evasion of the very responsibilities this government asked the provinces to assume, by any trickery or any lack of frankness in handling matters of this kind in this house.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): The Leader of the Opposition referred to me by mistake several times during the course of his speech. I want to make it very clear that he was referring to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), not to myself, not that I would have any objection to being associated with most of what my old friend the hon. member for Vancouver East said in his speech.

At different times in my life I have had the honour of standing with the Leader of the Opposition, and at times I have had the honour of standing with the hon. member for Vancouver East. For the sake of clarity it should be indicated on the record that the Leader of the Opposition referred to me only once when he said something about having a close look at clause 27. Well, I propose to take a close look at clause 27 when we pass this stage of the bill and deal with it clause by clause.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, and also so there shall be no uncertainty about it, I wish to make it abundantly clear that it was only by inadvertence that I referred to the hon. member for Vancouver South, because in the course of my remarks I was referring to the extraordinary statements made this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words at this time, to make clear once again the position we take in regard to this bill. There certainly can be no question that this party does not object in any way to a consolidation act. We think that is long past due and should be done; but we do object to a great many things that are in the bill before us.

Certainly we have never on any occasion objected to free competition. We have emphasized on many occasions that we think the railways, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, are entitled to compete with the trucking and other transport systems clear across this country. The only thing I have objected to on almost every occasion is the unfair competition that the railways are endeavouring to provide by legislation. It will not be competition; it will be an instrument to destroy their competitors.

We think it will be wrong from a national standpoint for the railways to have such powers over their competitors. They will not be competing with them; they will be strangling them so they will have a complete monopoly of all transportation in this country. That is the thing we object to. We have no objection to this bill in so far as it consolidates railway measures. We have objection to the exceptional powers that would be given to the railways, to the Canadian National Railways particularly, if this bill should go through in its present form.

It would not be necessary, as I indicated yesterday, for the railways to put into effect the agreed charges contracts they now have the legal right to enter into, and that is a very potent weapon in strangling the competition from trucks. Under this legislation they could go much further than that. They could violate all provincial legislation if this legislation is enacted in its present form.

Some hon. members said that when the railway took over some of the bus lines in Saskatchewan they went to the Saskatchewan government and obtained permission to do certain things, and that the railway had to comply with provincial legislation in that respect. Of course they did then, but this bill was not law at that time. If this bill goes through, under clause 27 and clause 18 the railways will not have to ask permission from the provinces. It is the greatest intrusion on provincial rights that I have seen in the 20 years I have been a member of parliament. It is the concern of every hon. member to see that clause 27 is not passed. It should be deleted from the bill entirely. I gave the minister credit yesterday for having one slipped over on him. I hope he is not desirous of having such tremendous powers placed in the hands of the railroad. He has indicated that there are certain parts of the schedule that he wants to change. I think I indicated yesterday that there were some parts other than those contained in the schedule that should be removed. This would certainly apply to clause 27, which should be deleted entirely.

If the minister would get up now and say he is prepared to do that, I am sure a great deal of the opposition would be dropped. Not only should that section be deleted, but the other parts of the bill which refer to transport by motor vehicles should also be deleted.

We have an amendment before us. As I said a moment ago, we are in favour of the consolidation, which we think is overdue; but this is a package bill containing not only the consolidation but these other matters which have been slipped in. This practice has become common in the last few years; I do not say on the part of the minister, but it is done intentionally by those who draw up the bills in order that it can be said, as was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East, that we are voting against this consolidation. Nothing could be further from the truth. What we are voting against is this unwarranted power being given the railway company to enable it to strangle its competitors, and this invasion of provincial rights.

It would appear that the hon. member for Vancouver East is in entire agreement with this, because he said he was going to support the bill. Then he found he was getting into deep water, as indicated by the questions put to him during the course of his speech, and he began to back-paddle a little. He said he was in favour of the bill except for one or two minor points. When asked what those were he never referred to them, and has not done so yet. I suppose we can take it for granted, since apparently he was speaking for the party, that the C.C.F. are in favour of the federal government overriding provincial legislation in a case such as this. Apparently they are in favour of the centralization of power.

They would not even put up with private enterprise. The hon. member for Vancouver East indicated that he does not support private enterprise at all, and there was no qualification in his statement. I suggest to some C.C.F. members that they be careful when making statements of that kind, because many of them are making their livelihood from private enterprise, and making a fairly good living at that.

I want to say that we are not opposed to this consolidation, as we believe that all these measures should be brought into one act. What we do oppose, and oppose strenuously, is this extraordinary power being given to the C.N.R. under clause 27. We think it should be deleted. We have no choice but to vote for the amendment because of the package principle which has been followed in connection with Bill No. 351.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the matter of public transportation I do not believe the people of Canada are too much concerned about the straw man of provincial rights which has been raised in this house. I endorse what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he contended that this problem of public transportation must be viewed as a whole, and that we must evolve a plan which will give the public transportation at as low a rate as possible. I think this provincial rights issue is simply a bogeyman that has been introduced.

I was a little surprised that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre should introduce this amendment with the argument which he put forth. If the Canadian National Railways are losing money each year I would imagine, in the light of his attitude in past years, that he would be the last one to oppose any move that would enable the Canadian National Railways to put itself in a position where it could avoid heavy deficits each year. I have every sympathy for the taxpayers of Canada and would like to help them all I can, and I therefore think the Canadian National Railways should be given every assistance in reducing these deficits.

I submit that one of the reasons for the annual deficits of the Canadian National Railways can be traced directly to the Conservative party. I notice that they take every credit for having initiated the Canadian National railway system, but when that was done they did not consider the welfare of the people of Canada. When this system was set up first consideration was given to the welfare of the bondholders of what should have become bankrupt railroads. There have been no more able spokesmen for the C.P.R. in this house than the members of the Conservative party. I notice that the new Conservatives, the socreds, are most anxious to climb on the bandwagon and take up cudgels on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. One would almost imagine that the Canadian Pacific was going to offer a full slate of candidates of its own at the next federal election.

To speak of free competition in the matter of public transportation is about as unrealistic as to advocate free competition in the distribution of public services such as hydro-electric power. The Canadian National Railways belongs to the people of Canada. Accusations are being made in this house by independents, the Social Credit and the Conservative parties, in connection with certain rights being granted to the Canadian National Railways which they contend would not be good for the people of Canada.

We must remember that the Canadian National Railways must appear annually before the members of the House of Commons. If there is misuse of the powers that have been granted I shall be ready, along with other members of parliament, to attack the minister and the Canadian National Railways for such misuse of power. I say again that if we are honestly concerned over the welfare of the taxpayers of Canada we will do everything possible to enable this railway system to so operate that it can provide transportation for people and goods at the lowest possible cost, and perhaps be able to rid the taxpayers of this annual deficit. We shall examine their operations once a year in democratic fashion, as we have done in years gone by.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make one correction. It seems to me there should be some relation to facts when we are discussing these matters. The last speaker pointed out that when the Canadian National Railways was put together it was a matter of assembling various lines, and suggested that in doing this the government of the time, which was a Conservative government, overlooked the interests of the shareholders. The real question was not about shareholders but whether the creditors could be paid.

We must remember that since that time the government has forgiven hundreds of millions of dollars of debt due to it. The shareholders so far have been out of the picture, and we really should not bring them in as if in some way they had been badly treated. They have disappeared from the picture, except perhaps in one or two small lines where the shareholders may have got something. In talking about these things we should pay proper regard to the basic factors.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was sorry that in spite of the sound and fury in which the Leader of the Opposition indulged, he did not make clear to us how he and his colleagues are going to vote on the amendment which is now—

Mr. Drew: So that I may remove any concern from the hon. member's mind, I intended that this should go before the committee, and I expressed my hope that the minister would remove these sections. It is certainly my intention to vote against the amendment now before the house.

Mr. Knowles: That is good. We now know how the Leader of the Opposition is going to vote. I think he should reconsider the charge made a while ago that there was an alliance between this group and the Liberals across the way. Now he says that when the vote is taken he will be voting along with us. These charges are risky, because what we vote on in the House of Commons is not a matter of alliance among parties but rather we vote on the issues that come before us.

I appreciate the dilemma in which our friends at the south end of the chamber find themselves with regard to a package bill. The hon. member for Bow River indicates that there are things in this bill that he wants; but he must vote for the amendment, which is the six months' hoist, because of his opposition to one or two features of the bill which he does not like. We are all in that position at times. I have been in the position where we have been presented with a package proposition and I had to vote for something I did not like or vote against something I did like, because of the overriding considerations of the measure before us.

On that basis, Mr. Speaker, it seems to us in this group that on balance this legislation should in principle be supported and sent to the committee. In the main it is a consolidation of the many statutes with regard to the Canadian National Railways, and it will make possible a more efficient and more effective administration of that system on behalf of the people of Canada.

I must confess, even if there are one or two minor points about which there is some question, that I am surprised that there should be any number of members of this house who want to do what they can to prevent this bill from being supported in principle, which is the effect of the six months' hoist. I shall not mind that being quoted against us on occasions when we move the six months' hoist to legislation with which we disagree.

Like the Leader of the Opposition, I feel a number of things have been done by the management of the Canadian National Railways which I do not like. I did not like the Pitt affair in Winnipeg, not at all. I still do not like the way in which the Canadian National Railways board of directors sold two Canadian National hotels and two summer resorts. I do not like what has been done with respect to the Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal, in that it is being let out for management purposes to the Hilton chain in the United States. I certainly do not like the way employees have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways during the past several months. I had something to say about that yesterday when I read a letter to the House of Commons. Likewise I am bitterly disappointed that it has taken so long for the Canadian National Railways to reconsider the position of their pensioners, particularly those in the lower brackets and, if I may go one step further, I say particularly those whose only pension is $25 a month.

I hope some of these matters will be given more serious consideration than has yet been the case. But, even after one has registered all the complaints he has against the management of the Canadian National Railways, it is still a fact that we want the Canadian National Railways to have a decent and proper charter, which is the purpose of this legislation. For that reason it seems to us that this bill should receive approval by being given second reading, and if one takes that position one must oppose the six months' hoist which is now before the house.

So far as the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bow River are concerned, far be it from me to defend the Minister of Transport, as too many things he does call for attack as far as I am concerned; but he made a statement yesterday which cut the ground from under a good deal of what has been said by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Bow River. He admitted that some change might have to be made so it would be clear that a certain section of the bill did not make all the companies mentioned in a certain schedule works for the general advantage of Canada. He specifically referred to Canadian National Transportation Limited.

The Leader of the Opposition today listed the powers Canadian National Transportation now has, and they seem to be even greater than those that are suggested in the relevant part of the bill. It strikes me that all that is sought is a consolidation of the powers and rights that now obtain so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned. If our friends to the right and our friends to the left and those to the far left—geographically, not politically, of course—favour consolidation, they should support the bill rather than the six months' hoist.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in so far as this bill consists of a consolidation it is admirable in purpose and necessary for the railway company, but it seems very clear that under the guise of a consolidation of statutes the government intends and intended to bring into effect provisions which in my opinion parliament ought not to accept. The Leader of the Opposition has dealt with those provisions in detail, and I do not intend to cover the ground covered by him. Certainly the arguments he advanced have not been met, and it seems clear to me that one or two sections in this bill are deliberately designed to take the government out of the quagmire in which it placed itself last year when it tried to play both ends against the middle.

First it went to the privy council, it went to the courts, in order to uphold the right of the federal government to control motor transportation. Then, having succeeded, it came to the conclusion that it could not discharge its responsibilities and had an act passed by parliament to remove it from the difficulties in which it found itself. Now again, under the subterfuge of consolidation, it is endeavouring to restore to itself the powers which the provinces had the right to expect under the agreement made at the conference and also under the statute passed at the last session of parliament.

Indeed, in looking over the act I find that seven of the 47 clauses are new and in no way consolidations. In addition to that, there are two major subsections that are completely new. As one listened to the arguments here one might also conclude that consolidation of the statutes in the manner requested by the government is going to solve the difficulties of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Marler: Who said that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nobody said it, but as I listened to the argument it is apparently one of the aims to lead the Canadian people to believe that the difficulties of the Canadian National Railways will be solved in this manner. There was a large deficit last year; there was a decline in earnings of $55,985,000. Freight revenues, amounting to 80 per cent of the total amount of the revenues, were materially reduced in consequence of conditions generally prevalent in the country. Freight traffic was down 8 per cent in tonnage and 10 per cent in ton-miles. Passenger traffic was down 1 per cent. Express shipments were down 3 per cent. Communication revenues were up 7 per cent. The number of hotel guests was down about 3 per cent. Those figures indicate the difficulties of the Canadian National Railways at this time.

However, I believe that a major consideration today in changing this condition would be the encouragement and improvement of the morale of the 100,000 Canadians, both men and women, who are employees of the railway company. The matter of the basic pension for those who have retired is one that has caused proper resentment on the part of railway employees. To learn what the situation is, all one needs to do is to go across this country and talk to the employees who are all desirous of making their contribution in bringing about improved conditions. They contend—and I think rightly—that too many high positions in the Canadian National Railways are now being filled by the promotion of men who are not railway men. That is a subject that one hears discussed on every hand. It is a subject that deserves attention and it is a contention that deserves to be answered. Try as we will to obtain answers to questions, we find that the Canadian National Railways is one institution as to which, when questions are asked in parliament, delay rather than expedition in answering seems to be the general rule.

The second thing the employees complain about is that nothing has been done to remove from their hearts and souls the overhanging danger of compulsory arbitration as it was enforced by the will of this government in 1950. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, an act was passed by parliament respecting the railway strike then in progress. The expression "compulsory arbitration" is as inconsistent as is "coercive agreement" and expressions of that kind. At that time I made this statement, and it applies as particularly to today as it did then. I refer to Hansard of August 30, 1950 where, as reported at page 73, when I spoke on the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act, I said this:

> . . . in spite of what the Prime Minister said last evening, this section—
> That was section 5.
> —represents the most direct move ever made in any country to set up provisions for an arbitrator in a labour dispute with absolute power to determine. This is a terrific power to place in the hands of one man. It is a power unequalled in its amplitude in any other country having the democratic concept of government. There is no one in this parliament who at any time did not wish to give support to the assurance in our country of continued railway transportation. That was and is our attitude. No one had objection to paragraphs 1 and 2, and to the noble preamble. What is being done in this section of the bill is what we take our objection to, namely the granting of uncontrolled and untrammelled power to one person to determine decisions in trade union matters and to change the provisions for settlement of labour disputes that have existed for over seventy years.

That power that was used by the force of the majority supporting this government in 1950 at the second session hangs over the railway employees today. The one thing they resent above all others is the fact that they are placed in a position different from that of any other labour men in this country in that they are subject to coercive action and to being denied the rights of collective bargaining which are available to other employees.

Then reference has been made to these policies that no one can understand, such as the sale of the hotels. That is something that deserves to be explained. Mr. Donald Gordon has put out a book entitled "Our Railroad"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member at this point. It seems to me that he is getting a bit away from the subject matter to which our attention should be directed. Some latitude has been given. The hon. member will recall that, when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke today, he made the statement that with respect to the Canadian National Railways this house had not been treated with frankness, and he presented certain illustrations. Among others he mentioned the Pitt incident, the contract to the Hilton chain and many others.

Carrying on in that vein the hon. member is apparently not making these points matters of illustration but rather a substantial part of his speech. He has dealt with the matter of questions not being answered by the C.N.R. management through the minister and he has complained about delay. He has dealt with the action taken by this government to help settle a strike in 1950. Now he is going to go into the subject of the contract with the Hilton chain with respect to the hotel in Montreal.

If the hon. member wishes to insist on treating these points in this fashion and if he puts up the argument that he is not repeating any of the arguments used by others in debate, and that what he is now saying is completely different or completely new, it will be difficult, of course, for me to invoke standing order 40, subsection 2. I will ask for the co-operation of the hon. member because apparently he has all his notes before him and is prepared to present his views on the subject. I have been listening carefully not only to him but to all those who have spoken since the beginning of this debate today. I have also had the privilege of listening to several hon. members who spoke yesterday on the main motion and again today on the amendment. I fear that at this moment the hon. member is taking us into the area of repetition. I should like him to co-operate with the chair and try to avoid repetition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon and yesterday several of the matters that I have dealt with were referred to, and they were referred to without objection from Your Honour. One speaks of co-operation, and I am all for co-operation, sir—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member at this time because he has just said that several points on which he has been touching were dealt with yesterday. That is precisely my point. Standing order 40, subsection 2, reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker or the Chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance and repetition . . .

The language of that section was simplified by the rules committee in 1927. As it read previously, it stated that tedious repetition must be avoided either in respect of one's own arguments or in respect of arguments used by others in the same debate. (See Journals, page 243, Tuesday, 15th March, 1927). That is my point. If the hon. member tells me today that I should allow him to repeat some of the points that I allowed to be referred to yesterday, I am justified in the position that I am now taking by virtue of standing order 40, subsection 2. I am asking the hon. member to touch on other subjects and not to repeat arguments used by others. We have heard about the Hilton contract from the Leader of the Opposition and from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We have heard about section 27 invading provincial rights from the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Bow River, the hon. member for Vancouver East and the Leader of the Opposition. I think that I, who have listened to all these speeches, am capable of judging what repetition means in this case because I have heard the same arguments over and over. I am merely asking the hon. member for Prince Albert not to repeat arguments used by others or his own arguments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the greatest respect, I cannot understand what Your Honour has in mind. Unless you have a prepared speech, you follow what has been said in the course of a debate, and you take the arguments and either agree with them or reject them. What I am trying to place before the chamber is that this consolidation is a mirage if it is to be considered as settling any of the difficulties of Canadian National Railways. This consolidation is a meaningless piece of work unless these problems I have spoken of are to be met by parliament. Surely the fact that somebody else may have mentioned one or the other does not deny me the right to refer to these arguments in support of the contention being advanced that the bill in its present form is merely a back door method on the part of the government of interfering with provincial rights which were to be respected under the agreement of June, 1954, as reinforced by a statute of this parliament.

As far as the present bill is concerned, and this is the point I am making, the problems facing the Canadian National Railways—the deficit, the aroused feelings, the lost morale on the part of these worthy employees—are not going to be solved in any way by a document such as this which holds out no hope of meeting the serious situation in which Canadian National Railways finds itself today. I mentioned hotels, and Your Honour says they should not be referred to. I have to be parliamentary, but no more inexcusable piece of work has ever been done by the railway company and its directors than the disposal of four Canadian National Railways hotels at a price far below what could have been secured if ordinary business principles had been applied.

Mr. Knowles: Why were they disposed of at all?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why dispose of them at all, my hon. friend says. I repeat that, but apparently repetition of actual facts and desirable conclusions is looked upon with a certain amount of suspicion. I repeat what I have said. The bill in its present form is merely a means whereby the government, having agreed to measures that on the face of them gave every appearance of a sincere desire to preserve and protect provincial rights, is seeking by the back door method to bring in a section which, as it now stands, will permit Canadian National Railways to override provincial authority and give them a field of authority above that conferred upon the provinces last year by an act of this parliament passed in June of 1954.

Sir, what is needed today is not a consolidation of statutes, although that is helpful. What is needed is an attitude of mind upon the part of those in authority on the Canadian National Railways that will bring about a restoration of morale among the railway employees and give them that impetus and desire to assist they had at one time but which has been torn from them by the attitude of those in charge of Canadian National Railways within the last several years. As far as the consolidation is concerned, there will be no argument about it whatsoever, but I ask the minister to say when he replies why, under the guise of consolidation, he brings in by a back door method sections which designedly contravene everything declared as an abiding principle one year ago and which will not have the effect of improving the administration of Canadian National Railways but will have the effect of undoing that which was done with such expressions of sanctity last year when a bill was brought before the house and ultimately translated into legislation.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) made the statement that we have a committee of parliament which will permit us to examine. That does not meet the situation at all. As far as the minister is concerned, let me say to him that it has been more difficult for parliament to get information expeditiously than it was in the past. Assurance has already been given that the bill will go before a standing committee of the house, but parliament has a right to ask on this occasion that there will be some realization on the part of Canadian National Railways and those in charge of its operations of what the little man on the railway says today. For some reason the encouragement he should be receiving is not being provided, and the opportunity to expand and develop the business is being denied him by methods which he believes to be detrimental to the company that he honours and that we honour. I am opposed to the six months' hoist and I say that so far as the sections having to do with consolidation are concerned they necessarily should be accepted. But after the bill has been considered by the committee and the minister has given further consideration to the sections that in our opinion are and will be detrimental to the operation of the railway an opportunity will arise on third reading to ascertain what is the will of the majority in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: May I go over the point I raised a moment ago with the hon. member for Prince Albert because I want to make sure that not only he but other hon. members will not misunderstand me. When I rose the first time to ask the hon. member not to repeat some of the arguments that had been advanced, I was asking his co-operation at that moment. It was because of his later remark to the effect that I had allowed reference to some points to which I was denying him the right to allude that I felt justified in elaborating on the question of repetition.

I do not wish to encourage hon. members to repeat either their own arguments or those used by others, but may I say that if the rule is not enforced as regularly as perhaps it should be it is because, as hon. members will realize, it is one that is very difficult to administer. How can you tell if a member is repeating until you have heard him, and once you have heard him he has completed his repetition and therefore you cannot ask him to swallow his words. Therefore the only thing the Speaker can do is to ask hon. members for their co-operation, and that is what I was doing with respect to the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Whenever a debate lasts a certain length of time, it is almost inevitable that in the latter stage of the debate these repetitious arguments will occur. The words may not be exactly the same but the ideas are quite similar, and that is precisely why the rule exists. Once all arguments on a given subject have been presented, hon. members should decide the matter by the putting of the question. That is the spirit of our rule. One should not abuse freedom of speech by repeating one's own arguments or arguments used by others in a debate. I do not think one should extend the freedom of debate in this house by claiming the right to repeat over and over again arguments that have been used by others. The rules are to the effect that one must be free to debate and to present all the arguments that are pertinent to the subject, and then the matter should be brought to a decision by a vote. This is the spirit of our rules.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the main motion carry?

Mr. Argue: Will you call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The house will now consider private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES, LTD.

The house resumed, from Friday, May 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weaver for the second reading of Bill No. 376, to authorize Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this is a somewhat different pipe line bill from the ones we have been accustomed to in recent years. According to the explanatory note:

> The purpose of this bill is to authorize Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., a company incorporated under the laws of the province of Manitoba, to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line or pipe lines.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, when one starts to speak on one of these private pipe line bills one misses the former member for Fraser Valley who always took an active part in these discussions.

This bill is entirely different in its structure from the pipe lines that we have been considering since the passage of the general Pipe Lines Act. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) pointed that out very clearly last Friday when he spoke on this bill. The bills that have come before us as private pipe line bills were in effect bills granting charters to incorporate companies. In those bills was a long list of provisions similar to the provisions contained in practically all of the private pipe line bills we have discussed since the introduction of the general Pipe Lines Act. We in this group view this bill with certain suspicions although things may turn out better than we expect. This bill simply authorizes a company chartered under the laws of Manitoba to enter into the pipe line business. There are no further details as to the area it intends to serve, who will be the directors, what will be the capital or as to the many other provisions which are spelled out in other pipe line bills we have discussed.

We are very interested in knowing why there should be this short form of bill. The other bills which came before this house were to some extent the result of lengthy debates in the house by members of all parties, particularly those on this side, who were anxious to protect Canadian interests in the development of natural resources and to see that Canadian requirements, particularly with respect to the distribution of gas and oil, were met prior to the requirements of anyone outside the country.

The other companies were aware of the discussion that had taken place, they were aware of government policy with respect to the building of pipe lines for the distribution of gas and oil, and were willing to comply with the established procedure in order to have their bills come before this house in a form following the common practice. They were willing to come before the committee and state what they had in mind, what their intended developments would cover, and on several occasions when requested by members of the committee, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), who has been most active in this type of debate, they agreed to amendments to their bills in order to meet specific objections by opposition members, and on some occasions by members on the government side.

We cannot understand the reason for this short-cut type of bill. We are afraid it may be the commencement of a breakdown of the practice which has been established during recent years in connection with private pipe line bills. We have only the bill in front of us on which to form an opinion, but in our view it can mean several things if adopted in its present form. It certainly would appear to provide for very little control over the development and building of pipe lines. Second, it could mean the breakdown in protection for the public which has been built up after considerable effort both inside and outside the house. Third, it could possibly destroy the opportunity for the parliament of Canada to satisfactorily develop a national policy with respect to the development and distribution of gas, oil and petroleum products.

For these reasons we in this group feel we shall have to oppose second reading. We feel the bill is unsound in principle, in form and structure. We feel we must do this unless the sponsor can assure the house that this company will be agreeable to amendments being introduced in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines which will meet the objections raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and this group and thus place this bill on a par with other private pipe line bills that have come before this house. If the sponsor of the bill can assure the house that these objections will be met in full then I think this group can support the motion for second reading.

Mr. Weaver: I will be quite willing to agree to meet the objections raised by hon. members when the bill is in committee.

Mr. Winch: Are we going to hear from the hon. member?

Mr. Weaver: I can assure the house that the company is quite willing to agree to amendments in committee that will meet the objections raised by hon. members.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have just one or two observations to make with respect to this bill. Today we discussed other pipe line bills, more particularly in the committee, and at that time we were given much more information than we have been given in connection with this bill. As this bill is so short it is quite possible that many factors may be involved which would be discussed in full in the committee. For that reason I do not feel that we can particularly support this bill until such time as it comes before the committee because we have too little knowledge of what the bill purports to provide in the way of benefits to those to be served by Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd.

If I may be so bold, I would suggest that the government consider the necessity of having some uniformity in bills of this type. New oil and gas discoveries are being made from time to time and there is a direct need for information being given before we are asked to vote on a bill as brief as this one. The hon. member sponsoring the bill has told us that the company will be willing to accede to the request made for revision, and I have no doubt that certain requests will be made for revision of this bill. However, I do not see why we should leave so much to chance; I cannot see why we should not know just what the company has in mind in order that we can consider a bill such as this with confidence.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY OF CABINET MINISTERS

The house resumed, from Friday, May 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 379, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of making part of my speech on the second reading of this bill on Friday, May 20. At that time I dealt mainly with history and made reference to certain sessional papers which had been tabled in days gone by, in response to questions I had asked showing my long-standing interest in the question as to whether or not cabinet ministers should be at the same time directors of private companies. I also invited hon. members to read the very interesting debates on this question which took place in the House of Commons in 1921 and 1922. I made reference to these debates of 1921 and 1922 both for their own sake and to support my contention that this matter is not one that has arisen in the public mind only recently but rather one that has been the concern of members of parliament and the concern of public men for a good many years.

I indicated at the close of my remarks on Friday that I would make reference today to certain practices connected with this subject matter. I must say quite readily that I have not been able to ascertain that any country where the situation is similar to ours has legislation of the kind proposed in my bill, making it a statutory provision that ministers not hold directorships in private companies. Particularly I must say that there is, as far as I can ascertain, no such legislation in the United Kingdom or in the United States. However, hon. members are aware of the practice in the United Kingdom which in more recent years in particular has been quite definite in that, as a matter of routine and as a matter of practice, ministers do not hold directorships in private companies. They exercise a very scrupulous practice in relation to private legislation that comes before the parliament at Westminster. Then, too, all of us are aware of what happened recently in the United States in the case of Mr. Charles Wilson, who found it necessary because of public opinion to divest himself, not only of any authority he exercised by way of directorship, but also of his holdings in a very large corporation in that country, before taking a post in President Eisenhower's cabinet.

I cite these examples freely admitting that they show that there is no legislation along this line, but also showing that there is a very strong feeling in countries like ours that cabinet ministers should not be directors of private companies.

I should like to say a word about the practice in our own country, particularly with reference to the most important member of the cabinet. I am not referring only to the present situation, but to the situation across the years. As I understand it, previous to Sir Wilfrid Laurier there were prime ministers who held directorships in small firms, but Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave up all but one small, shall we say, family directorship. In the case of the prime ministers we have had in Canada since that time, they have divested themselves of any and all directorships they might have held. That was the case with Sir Robert Borden; it was the case with the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen; and it was the case with the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. I understand that the late Lord Bennett—he was Mr. Bennett at the time—gave up his directorships at the time he became the leader of the Conservative party in 1927. In the case of the present Prime Minister, as can be seen by reference to sessional paper No. 160-B, tabled on February 11, 1948, in response to questions of mine, he was sworn of the privy council on 10th of December, 1941, and five days later resigned all of his directorships. The sessional paper to which I have referred lists those 11 directorships which he resigned immediately after becoming a member of the cabinet. Of course, that was a long time before he became prime minister, but subsequent sessional papers have indicated that the present Prime Minister does not hold any directorships.

In other words, so far as the prime ministers of Canada are concerned, it is an accepted practice that in their view they should not be directors of private companies while they hold that very high office. Now, in view of my admission that I have not been able to find legislation comparable to my bill, the question arises—and it is a fair one—why ask for legislation; why not leave it, as the Prime Minister suggested, to the conscience of each individual cabinet minister?

First of all I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that things have changed a good deal since the early days when the Senate and House of Commons Act was first put into effect and when it was felt that the only kind of relationships that could exist between the people and the government in a business sense were in the terms of contracts or small offices that might involve emoluments. Things have changed considerably, particularly in this day when the government is involved in so many things in our economy and particularly in view of the change in respect of income tax and succession duty legislation. There are all kinds of ways today in which there is contact between private corporations and the government which were not the case in the earlier days of this country. I submit that on that score this whole question should be reassessed.

I have read a great many times, as other hon. members have done, and with a great deal of interest, the independence of parliament provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act. As hon. members know, squarely in the middle of the Senate and House of Commons Act there are ten or a dozen sections which make it a matter of statute that no member of parliament is to hold, while he is a member of parliament, any job under the crown to which any emolument is attached, no matter how small that job or that emolument might be. It is also made statutory that no member of parliament may have any contract with the government. No member of parliament may sell anything to the federal government, nothing whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker, as strongly as I can I make the point, that matter is not left to conscience. It is not left to my conscience or to the conscience of any other individual member whether we should try to get some little job under the government while we are members of parliament or whether we should try to get some contract with the government. It is laid down by statute that these things shall not be done.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the case of cabinet ministers the situation is even more important and more crucial. If it is not left to the conscience of individual members of parliament whether or not they do things that might compromise the independence of parliament, I submit that it should not be left to the individual consciences of cabinet ministers. I suggest that there should be regulation there as well. I suggest there should be a statutory provision so that it will be crystal clear that no cabinet minister can have any other duty or obligation which can conflict in any way with his full-time responsibilities to the Canadian people as a cabinet minister.

As I say, I have read with considerable interest the independence of parliament provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act. I have also examined with some interest what the attitude of parliament has been across the years towards these provisions. Hon. members may know these facts but even if they do, they will not mind my recalling them to them.

There was an occasion when no less a person than the Speaker of the House of Commons was obliged to resign his seat in the House of Commons and to resign his speakership at the same time because he violated one of the independence of parliament sections. He happened to be the first Speaker under a Liberal regime. I hasten to add that in the examples I shall give in a moment I shall be quite fair; I shall name instances where both Liberals and Conservatives ran afoul of that particular law. In this case it was Mr. Speaker Anglin who represented a constituency in New Brunswick and who edited or owned a newspaper down in Saint John. I believe the name of it was the Freeman. It turned out that that paper carried some federal government notices or paid advertisements, and the committee on privileges and elections felt that procedure was a violation of the independence of parliament provisions in the Senate and House of Commons Act. As a result, Mr. Speaker Anglin was obliged to resign. Some time after the session of 1877 he ran in a by-election, was re-elected and came back to the House of Commons and was again elected to the Speaker's chair.

I may say that the late Mr. Anglin's re-election as Speaker in 1878 was not without an extremely acrimonious debate. I invite hon. members who are interested in our past as a parliament to read particularly the real "knock-'em-down and drag-'em-out" oratorical battle that took place between Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who was then Liberal prime minister, and Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the Conservative opposition. Sir John objected strenuously to Mr. Anglin's even being seated back on the floor of the House of Commons before a Speaker had been elected, let alone his being elected as Speaker of the House of Commons. There may have been other occasions, but certainly on that occasion the result of that debate was that there was a recorded division as to whether or not Mr. Anglin should take the chair in 1878 as Speaker of the House of Commons. All of that fight and all of that furore was over the incident to which I have referred, namely the appearance in the Saint John Freeman of certain notices or advertisements inserted there by the federal government. The insertion of those notices was regarded as a violation of the independence of parliament provisions.

Let me come on down the years a bit, Mr. Speaker, and remind the house that in 1932 there was a Mr. Jones in the House of Commons. That was not my present colleague of course. This was Hon. George B. Jones who was the then Conservative member for Royal. He turned out to be the principal partner in the firm of Jones Brothers which had sold certain merchandise to the Indians, who were wards of the federal government. As a result of investigation in that case Mr. Jones resigned, although he too was re-elected. Similarly in the early part of this century there was the case of the then Liberal member for Glengarry, Mr. J. T. Schell, who, it was found, sold crates worth $5.50 to the dominion government. The matter was referred to the committee on privileges and elections. In his case he was able to satisfy that committee that this had been done without his knowledge, and he was not called upon to resign.

From their knowledge of history probably hon. members are more familiar with certain events that took place in 1915, during world war I. At that time certain matters were referred to the committee on public accounts. As a result, two Conservative members of parliament—Mr. Foster from Kings, in Nova Scotia, and Mr. Garland who represented the constituency of Carleton—were obliged to resign. Mr. Foster was involved in some war contracts rather directly. In the case of Mr. Garland, it appears that he was one of the proprietors of a drug store here in Ottawa; and the record indicates that it was a boy working in his store who made to the federal government certain sales out of which he made a considerable profit. Mr. Garland was held responsible for this action.

If I may say so, to put it in language that will be understood, when I read in the Hansard of 1915 the things that Sir Robert Borden said about Mr. Garland and Mr. Foster, both of whom were his own members, I was reminded of what the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said when the case of Mr. Dewar, the former member for Qu'Appelle, arose in this house a few years ago. In other words, on all of these former occasions as well as in the case of the former member for Qu'Appelle—perhaps that case is a little bit different, although it included an involvement of a kind with a contractor who had relations with the government—in all these cases the house took an extremely serious view of the situation, and in all cases where the prime minister came into the picture, right across the years as leader of the house, whoever he was, Liberal or Conservative, he took an extremely serious view of any of these steps that seemed to involve a violation of the provisions of the independence of parliament sections of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

If we as a House of Commons have taken such a serious view of these things which, when we look at them, seem to be rather minor, should we not take an equally serious view of what I am concerned about in this bill that I present to parliament, namely the matter of cabinet ministers being directors of private companies.

When I began my remarks on Friday I said—and I ask the Prime Minister and others to remember it—that I raised this matter as one of principle. I do not raise it for the purpose of making an attack on a particular cabinet minister. Nevertheless I am going to mention something in relation to a particular cabinet minister because his case is, I think, a rather scandalous example of a bad practice. But I must say to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that the person whom I hold responsible, the person whom I think the house has to hold responsible for the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) continuing as a director of the Guaranty Trust Company of Canada is the Prime Minister who said very clearly in the house the other day that he felt the matter should be left to the conscience of each individual cabinet minister. That is what I think is wrong. It is that as a principle which I am attacking.

I ask hon. members to listen to one or two sentences I want to read from the annual report of the Guaranty Trust Company of Canada for the year 1954. Incidentally, there is no question about it, on page 2 of the report the Minister of National Revenue—and that title is given to him in the report—is listed as one of the directors of the company. In this same annual report there are of course a number of propaganda or advertising paragraphs urging people to do business with the company. One of the paragraphs is entitled, "Administration of Estates", and reads in part as follows:

> Guaranty Trust Company of Canada makes an ideal executor or administrator of an estate.

I skip a few sentences, and then I read this:

> Each estate is in charge of a senior trust officer, supported by the advice and guidance of the executive officers, directors and local advisory boards . . .

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, once upon a time a Speaker of the House of Commons had to resign because some government notices appeared in a paper that he owned in Saint John, New Brunswick, but today the Prime Minister says it is all a matter of conscience when he has a colleague who is a director of a company which is administering estates, a director who, according to that company's advertising, gives his guidance and advice to that company's clients in such matters as succession duties. Yet, the same person sits on the other side of the table as Minister of National Revenue levying those succession duties. How can one be on both sides of the table at the same time?

I said a moment ago that I mention this only because it strikes me that it is a scandalous example of a bad practice, but the person I think we all must hold responsible for the continuation of this practice is the Prime Minister who, as he will readily admit, has taken the responsibility for laying down the principle that these things should be left to the conscience of individual cabinet ministers. I think that day has gone. I think the time has come when, if it is not left to our consciences as individual members of parliament whether we maintain the independence of parliament required by the Senate and House of Commons Act, the same statutory provision should be there so far as cabinet ministers are concerned.

As I say, I present this as a matter of principle. I present it as something that for my part has been a matter of long-standing interest. I present it as something that has been the concern of parliament right across the years. I hope very serious consideration will be given to it. I do not know what is going to happen to my bill. I know what happens to most bills that are introduced from the opposition side of the house. They do not get along very well the first time, but still it is true that across the years good ideas introduced on the opposition side of the house do have their way of being accepted in one way or another, and I hope that the principle I am presenting to the house in this bill will sooner or later be accepted, and sooner rather than later.

As for the Liberals, they of course can vote either way so far as precedent is concerned. I pointed out the other day that in 1921 most of the Liberals voted for a bill having the same effect as mine would have but in 1922 practically all the Liberals voted against a resolution to the same effect. In the case of the Conservatives, back in 1921 and 1922 most if not all of them voted against any statutory provision of this kind. Nevertheless I think that the Conservatives would do well to read what Arthur Meighen said on those occasions. In fact he was almost prophetic at one point where he said that the time might come when something along this line would have to be done. I have not checked with Arthur Meighen to find out, though he could be seen by those who are close to him, but my suspicion is that he who in 1921 and 1922 did not want this kind of legislation but wanted it crystal clear that no cabinet ministers should hold directorships, might say that if after all these years this kind of thing is still going on, the kind of thing to which I have alluded by reference to the annual report of the Guaranty Trust Company of Canada, it would appear that there is no solution to it but to bring in legislation to make it clear that being a cabinet minister is a full-time job.

I will be quite happy if the Prime Minister will make the kind of announcement that will make this legislation completely unnecessary. I do not need to spell out what the terms of that announcement would be. Perchance as he thinks the matter over he will agree with me that, rather than leaving it to the individual consciences of cabinet ministers and rather than leaving it as a responsibility resting upon the conscience of the Prime Minister alone, it might be better to have parliament make the decision. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I think we would be true to the best traditions of parliament, and we would be true to the concern of those who have gone before us in this place right back to 1867 if we would give very serious consideration to what is involved in the principle of the bill.

As I pointed out, long ago it was felt that any individual private member who did anything to compromise the independence of parliament should resign his seat, and that course has been followed on a number of occasions. I suggest that the position of cabinet ministers is even more important, and I hope that very serious consideration will be given by the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet and by all members of the Liberal party, the Conservative party and the other parties in the house to what I suggest is a very important proposition.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I quite realize that we have had this afternoon a historical recitation mixed in with a form of innuendo of which I am quite sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was quite unconscious. In reciting the tales of bygone offences against the independence of parliament provisions he cited on every occasion, as I recall it, offences under the act which were specific in the sense that the statute forbade them but in addition all were offences in which the person concerned was in fact, or at least in theory, profiting financially.

At no time throughout the 40-minute speech he has just concluded has he made any such reference with respect to any present instance of that kind, and I repeat that in order that the hon. member will agree with me that he is speaking generally at the moment for the purpose of amending a statute.

Mr. Knowles: I am not only happy to agree with that statement but I think, in view of my agreement, the minister should not impute to me the throwing out of innuendoes.

Mr. Harris: I am glad to do so because, as I said in my opening remarks, I am quite sure the hon. member was perhaps unaware of it, but listening to his remarks from this side—and I do not want this to be an argument—the cases he cited were not cases in support of the proposition he was making. I have made my point and, as I said before, I am sure my hon. friend did not mean to put the matter in that light. I will therefore make the obvious remark that there is a distinction to be made between offences under the independence of parliament provisions and what is being suggested here. What is being suggested by this amendment is that members of the cabinet shall not engage, either directly or indirectly, in any other activity, be it honorary or active, because doing so would not be desirable in the interests of the public service of Canada and not that, in effect, the minister himself may be profiting by the activity in any improper manner.

Since my hon. friend agrees that there is no such suggestion in this case, I would turn my attention to the amendment itself. The amendment is to the Senate and House of Commons Act. It purports to lay down by statute a bar against certain persons being members of the cabinet. On that point I want to ask my hon. friend if I am right in two deductions I have made from the wording of his amendment. The first is that he has excluded from the operation of the amendment persons who would be directors or connected in any official capacity, if you will, with a company incorporated under a provincial statute.

Mr. Knowles: For the purpose of laying this matter before parliament in the form of a bill, I kept it as simple as possible by not having too many aspects to which people like the minister might object. For that reason, I deliberately limited it to companies incorporated under federal statute.

Mr. Harris: Very good.

Mr. Knowles: I knew there would be strong objection if I had included companies incorporated under provincial statutes.

Mr. Harris: I assumed that was what my hon. friend meant to do by the wording of his amendment. There is just one other question. The house will forgive me if I adopt this somewhat unorthodox approach because I want to understand what is in my hon. friend's mind at the moment. In the final lines of the paragraph we have this, that certain persons shall not be eligible, in effect, to be members of the Queen's privy council for Canada and ministers of the crown. I take it from that there may be persons, members of the Queen's privy council and not members of the cabinet, who may thereby remain directors of any company incorporated under a federal statute?

Mr. Knowles: There are two of them in the house right now, on the front benches of the official opposition. There are people like Sir Anthony Eden and Sir Winston Churchill, who are members of the Queen's privy council for Canada, more or less on an honorary basis. I thought this provision should extend only to those who are actually cabinet ministers. If the minister has any more questions, perhaps we could turn this into a press conference.

Mr. Harris: I have no other questions. I assumed this was what my hon. friend had in mind. There is a distinction, of course, which is easily drawn to the attention of the house, and that is that in the mind of the hon. member it appears to be in order and proper that members of the ministry should hold directorships, and presumably other forms of active participation, in the management of the affairs of a company, so long as that company is not incorporated by this parliament.

Mr. Knowles: That is not a fair statement.

Mr. Harris: Then, under the Companies Act.

Mr. Knowles: I think this form of questioning is not only out of order but is highly unfair. I would be prepared to go further, Mr. Speaker. I put my bill in its narrowest terms knowing full well that if you ask for too much in this house people like the minister pick out all sorts of technicalities that are supposed to invalidate a proposition. I am quite prepared to go further, if that is what the minister wants. The minister will recognize that what is set out in this bill is a principle, and he cannot get away from it even by this kind of cross-examination.

Mr. Harris: I had concluded my cross-examination, Mr. Speaker, and I gather my remarks were not acceptable. The hon. member talks about a principle. What is the principle? The principle is surely the protection of the public service. I do not understand how my hon. friend supposes that a director of a corporation incorporated not by this parliament or under the Companies Act of Canada, would be in a position where he could carry on his activities under a provincial statute, if you will, and not offend the principle that my hon. friend is trying to assert.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister be willing to amend my bill and include companies incorporated under provincial statutes?

Mr. Harris: My intentions are going to be made clear in due course. I wanted to point out to the house, and I think I have, that there is no principle here based on what I judge to be the real purpose of the amendment. My hon. friend, of course, is trying to take the position that he is doing something which would improve the public service of Canada. Yet he supposes that on these treasury benches there could be two ministers, one of whom before he was sworn in was a director of a federally incorporated company and who would have to divest himself of that obligation, and alongside of him could sit another person who was a director of any number of provincially incorporated companies and there would be no objection to that.

Mr. Knowles: If that is the minister's only objection, we can amend the bill very quickly.

Mr. Harris: I am only referring to my hon. friend's definition of his principle. I have yet to find a principle if he would permit that kind of conduct.

Would you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSOLIDATION OF LEGISLATION—AUTHORIZATION FOR OPERATION OF TELECOMMUNICATION SYSTEM, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Marler for the second reading of Bill No. 351, respecting Canadian National Railways.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group support this measure not only because it is necessary for the operation of our nationally owned railway and because it is a tidying up of existing legislation, but also because it gives to the Canadian National Railways, as I understand it, the right to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway on an equal basis. Certainly, if we are to expect from our nationally owned system a railway that will compete successfully with the privately owned system, we should be prepared to give it all the powers that the Canadian Pacific Railway now is able to exert in the transportation field.

We in this group particularly expect from our nationally owned railway system not only service as efficient as that from the privately owned railway but in fact a better service, a service that meets the needs of the Canadian people more adequately than that given by the privately owned railway.

In its operations the Canadian National Railways should, as I hope they do, look at the general economic well-being of the nation, and should not be governed solely by economy considerations. I am sure the Canadian National Railways do not like to show a large deficit year after year; but I believe more important than whether or not the Canadian National Railways may show a deficit is the kind of service that they may be able to provide to Canadians generally. Certainly, I believe that adequate service to the Canadian nation by the C.N.R. is more important at any given time than a C.N.R.

balanced budget. Since the Canadian National Railways is a nationally owned system, it might be cautious in laying off large numbers of employees, because by doing so it merely adds to the general employment difficulties of the nation. When the government is responsible, as it is, for full employment, we would not want the railroads doing anything that would unduly add to that responsibility.

We naturally understand the position of the C.N.R. in wishing to modernize its railway and to economize to the greatest possible extent. But I cannot help having full sympathy for those who find themselves displaced, and particularly the case mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In the main we look to the nationally owned railway system for the provision of service. I for one do not like to see any large and substantial whittling down of that service in an attempt to balance the budget of the C.N.R. I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) grinning. I do not think it is any worse for the C.N.R. to have an unbalanced budget than it is for the whole Canadian nation to have a nationally unbalanced budget as we have this year. Either one may be more in the interests of the nation at any given time than a precisely balanced budget.

Members of parliament, certainly those from the prairie areas, are having brought to their attention, more frequently in recent weeks and months, instances of a severe curtailment of railway service. My information may or may not be correct; but I have been informed that while the prairie area has been one of the main areas in which some services have been reduced, yet the main objective for reduction of services could shift from that area to another area.

I have said that we all like to see a balanced budget, yet I cannot help but sympathize with the people in those areas who suffer a cancellation of services or a reduction of services. I have obtained from the board of transport commissioners the record of reduction of train services and the closing of stations, at least as far as maintaining a station agent is concerned, since January 1, 1953. I find that in the province of Saskatchewan alone in 1953 there was a reduction affecting 19 trains and 9 lines in that province. The next year there was a reduction of service by only two trains on one line. In this year to date there has been a reduction of train service on 7 railway lines. This means that in the period from January 1, 1953, to the present there has been a reduction in service on 17 lines. This compares with a reduction of service in the same period on 5 Canadian Pacific Railway lines. There may be reasons to explain the much larger number of C.N.R. lines that have had train service reduced, but certainly we expect from our C.N.R. as few reductions in our train service as possible.

I hold in my hand a table entitled "Removal of Station Agents in Saskatchewan granted since January 1, 1953". It says that on the C.N.R. in 1953 station agents at 3 points were removed; in 1954 station agents at 11 points were removed; and in 1955 to date station agents at 3 points have been removed. I believe in every case a caretaker has been substituted for the services of the station agent. But, as the minister knows a caretaker does not accept C.O.D. orders, and of course he is not able to transmit telegrams, and in fact can only give to the people in that community a very limited service compared with the service given by a station agent.

I have had brought to my attention a further unwarranted reduction in train service that is being contemplated by the C.N.R., namely, a proposed reduction in its present daily passenger service between the city of Weyburn and the city of Regina. This follows a cancellation of the passenger train service between the city of Weyburn and the town of Radville in 1953. The people in that area are very concerned about the reduction in train service. The mayor of the city, Mr. J. H. Stavely and the chairman of the chamber of commerce, Mr. D. Mann, have met with railway officials and have placed before them the position of the people in the area around the city of Weyburn and in the Radville district.

As I have said, we can quite understand the C.N.R. wishing to save as much as possible through cutting down railway services; but surely there is more to be considered than merely balancing the budget. It is true that the C.N.R. has applied for a trucking franchise along the Regina-Weyburn route in order to substitute a trucking service for the reduced services as far as freight and express are concerned. Communications I have had oppose this move. In fact it would be an unnecessary duplication of service.

Since as a nation we must maintain our railways, to the extent that freight traffic is removed from the railways by the railways themselves and placed in a trucking service, we the people of Canada are paying for two types of service. It is true also that as a nation, or as a province, we have to maintain our highways. Therefore, it is in the national interest that in so far as possible a national transportation policy should be adopted that will permit our railways to provide the very best service and protect the general interests of the Canadian public.

Until we have a national transportation policy we are going to have more and more uneconomical competition between our trucking and railway lines. Trucking services, altogether apart from those operated by the railways in direct competition with the railways, will take away from them much of their traffic and the nation as a whole must maintain the rail services and therefore must pay for the maintenance of the railway right of way and at least reduced railway services. The nation as a whole must pay for the highway services and maintain the highways.

I am hopeful that the government will adopt a national transportation policy which will prevent further curtailment of the services that the railroads have provided and not make it necessary for the Canadian public to bear the cost of the duplication of services.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and I think considerable attention to what has been said by the various hon. members who have participated in the debate on this bill. I think without exception all hon. members who have participated in the debate approve of the principle of the consolidation of what I might call the Canadian National legislation. However, one or two members have said that under the guise of consolidation or under the subterfuge of consolidation other things were being done in the legislation now before the house.

I do not think that those terms aptly describe what has been done because when I look back on the proceedings in connection with this legislation I find that the principal changes to be made were set forth in the resolution itself which made it perfectly clear that the purpose of the legislation was not only to consolidate the existing legislation but to make five particular changes. When I made a statement at the resolution stage of the bill I drew that to the attention of the house. Likewise when I made a statement on the second reading I endeavoured to point out the five changes which this legislation would bring about so far as Canadian National Railways was concerned.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) taxed me with a lack of frankness with regard to this measure and I want to say right away that I plead not guilty to that accusation. I think I have made it perfectly clear that no attempt is being made by calling this measure a consolidation to embody in it additional legislation of which the house has not had the fullest notice. During the course of my remarks at the resolution and second reading stages I made it quite clear what purposes the government had in mind in bringing forward this legislation at this time. I should like to deal particularly with the powers which it is proposed to give to the railway company in the matter of what I might term highway transportation. In that connection I said yesterday, as reported on page 4021 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the Canadian National Railways, through its company, Canadian National Transportation, Limited, has very comprehensive highway powers; but it is not intended to give such comprehensive powers to the Canadian National Railways. As will be found by reference to the bill, it is intended only that the parent company shall have powers in conjunction with or substitution for a rail service.

In order to particularize the type of transportation services to which the bill was intended to apply, I then went on to say:

> This is designed primarily in order to regularize the pickup and delivery services in the metropolitan centres, and to give the company corporate powers to enable it to provide trucking or bus services in cases in which rail line abandonment would not be permitted by the board of transport commissioners, unless a formal undertaking with regard to road transport were submitted.

During the debate at the resolution stage when dealing with services in substitution for rail services I explained the position of the railway company very fully. I do not think I have anything either to add to or subtract from the two statements to which I have just referred. I think they set forth fully and frankly the exact powers that we wish to give to the Canadian National Railways.

If it had been the sinister purpose of the government to enable the Canadian National Railways to exercise the extensive powers it has through its subsidiary companies I believe it would have been possible to have made use of the legislation to which the Leader of the Opposition referred yesterday and this afternoon, the Motor Vehicle Transport Act which was passed last year. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition read to the house the extensive powers of Canadian National Transportation, Limited, and I was glad that I had said yesterday that it was not our intention to declare that these works should be for the general advantage of Canada. There is no intention whatever on the part of the government to broaden the already broad powers which the subsidiary company possesses and to which the Leader of the Opposition referred this afternoon.

I should like to emphasize that the reason we wish to give these powers to the railway company is that they are in fact exercised by the railway company and not by the subsidiary. Pickup and delivery services of the railway company are carried out by the railway company itself and not by the subsidiary in the principal metropolitan centres. I understand that that is not the practice of the Canadian Pacific Railway. As I said yesterday, it is proposed to regularize this situation by giving the railway company the corporate powers necessary for that purpose. When I presented the resolution, I said, as reported on page 3198 of Hansard of April 26, 1955:

> There is no suggestion either that in granting this power the railway shall be free from the necessity of complying with the requirements of provincial governments so far as provincial laws apply to the operation of motor vehicles owned by the company.

There is no intention on my part of going beyond what was said by me during the resolution stage or yesterday on the second reading, though it may perhaps disappoint some hon. members of this house who I gather would like to see the very broadest powers in the matter of highway transportation vested in the Canadian National Railways. I had thought, and it had been so represented to me, that the powers in the matter of highway transport contained in the bill were subject to considerable restrictions, first of all, in the enumeration of the powers itself, and, second, by the use of the expression "in conjunction with or in substitution for rail services." It was believed, and quite honestly I shared that belief, that this was a restriction of the highway transportation powers which it was proposed to give. But, after listening to what has been said by hon. members during the course of this debate and the representations that have been made to me since the bill has been made public, I have come to the conclusion that the bill itself does go beyond the limits which I had set forth when the resolution was presented. For that reason I should like to supplement what I said yesterday with regard to the amendment which we proposed to meet.

I might perhaps sum up as briefly as I can the amendment that I contemplate in order to meet the limitations which I had in mind, so that the bill will conform entirely with what I said, both in the resolution stage and yesterday. I said first of all yesterday that it was proposed to amend the bill so that the declaration that the railway or other transportation works of the company are works for the general advantage of Canada should not extend to the companies listed in part III of the first schedule to the act. Part III of the first schedule includes of course, as I said specifically yesterday, Canadian National Transportation, Limited. In the same sense, it was never my intention that the declaration contained in the bill to the effect that the transportation works were works for the general advantage of Canada should extend to cover the highway transportation activities of the Canadian National Railways, under the section of the bill by which it is proposed to give them power in this matter.

Finally, because I believe the matter should be abundantly clear, I would also propose that the powers which would be granted to the company should be exercised subject to provincial legislation applicable to persons generally.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you realize that the effect of the amendments that I contemplate is to give to Canadian National Railways the corporate power to operate motor vehicles in connection with its pickup and delivery services and moreover to exercise similar powers in the case of the abandonment of rail lines where the supplying of bus services or truck services in lieu of rail services is made a condition of the order of abandonment granted by the board of transport commissioners.

In effect that would put the railway company in the position of having the corporate powers to carry out these activities and leave it in the position in which it is at present of requiring it to conform to provincial legislation so far as the carrying on of these operations is concerned.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but do I understand that it is now his intention to incorporate in the amendment a specific provision that the powers conferred upon the Canadian National Railway Company by section 27 will be subject to provincial legislation in regard to highway traffic and the setting of tolls and regulation thereof?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, if I might answer the question in reverse, I would say that I do not attach any importance to the provision with regard to charging tolls for the services, and I would be quite prepared to see it disappear without any hesitation, because I do not believe it is at all essential. So far as the other power is concerned, the power to own and operate motor vehicles under section 27, it is intended that it be exercised subject to provincial legislation applying to persons generally.

Mr. Drew: Again I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but I think we should be clear on this. The minister has said "it is intended". I would point out that it is not a matter of what is intended; it is what the act says. I have asked a fair question. Does the minister propose to introduce an amendment which will specifically declare that the Canadian National Railway Company in operating such services as are covered by section 27 will be subject to provincial regulations, licensing and toll rates?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I thought it was already perfectly clear from what I have said, but if the Leader of the Opposition does not feel my answer was sufficiently categorical I wish to say it is my intention definitely to propose an amendment in that sense. I hope the Leader of the Opposition is satisfied that this is the kind of categorical answer he would like to have.

Now, I wish to emphasize particularly that there is no intention whatever to make use of the act to which my hon. friend seemed to attach so much importance both yesterday and this afternoon, the act respecting extra-provincial motor vehicle transport. If it had been our intention to make use of that provision, probably most of this debate would have been quite unnecessary, because it would have been possible under that act, if we had in mind the sinister purposes which have been attributed to us, to make use of section 5 of the act and enable Canadian National Transportation, Limited, to exercise the very full powers which it now has. But nothing has been further from our minds, and we have no intention whatever of doing it.

Mr. Speaker, one final word. The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon spoke about the C.P.R. powers respecting branch lines. I will agree with what he said, so far as he went. In other words, he made it perfectly clear that Canadian Pacific Railway was in a general sense subject to the provisions of section 183 of the Railway Act, which requires the approval of the board of transport commissioners where a branch line exceeds six miles. He seemed to have forgotten the fact that that applies, not throughout the whole length of the C.P.R. mileage, but that it has the right under its charter to construct branches off its main line of any length west of Callander, Ontario, without the approval of the board of transport commissioners.

In the legislation which is before the house it is not the intention to grant similar powers to the Canadian National Railways. It is intended, as I have said both at the resolution stage and yesterday, to give it the power to build lines not longer than six miles in length without the necessity of parliamentary approval.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Meat Inspection

MEAT

INSPECTION OF PRODUCTS ENTERING INTERNATIONAL AND INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 352, respecting the inspection of meat and meat products entering into international and interprovincial trade.

Mr. Charlton: Does the minister wish to make a statement?

Mr. Gardiner: In rising to move the second reading of Bill No. 352, an act respecting the inspection of meat and meat products entering into international and interprovincial trade, I may say that experience over the years has brought us to the conviction that where we have made provision in acts of this kind to enact measures with regard to interprovincial trade as well as intraprovincial trade, we have run into difficulties whenever these measures have been brought before the court.

We have been advised that at this time amendments should be made in this act for the purpose of removing some of the doubtful sections of it. The main purpose is in order to provide for changes which have taken place. The act as it now stands provides for the regulation of the inspection of canned foods such as fruits and fish. Fish are now being taken care of under an act under the fisheries department and therefore that is not required. It is the intention to bring in a general standards act which I hope to bring forward immediately following this particular bill, in order to take care of the other matters which will be removed.

This bill provides for an act dealing specifically with the health inspection of meat and the sanitary inspection of premises and equipment in plants engaged in interprovincial and export meat shipment. Legislation in that respect has existed since 1907 under the Meat and Canned Foods Act, which act deals also with the grading and inspection of any canned foods including fish. Certain minor amendments were desired in the meat inspection legislation to provide for inspection fees to strengthen the authority of the act with respect to plant sanitation requirements and health supervision of imported meats and meat products.

As the provisions of the present act relating to meat inspection have no relation to the provisions with respect to canned fish, fruit and vegetables, the government consider that the occasion would be appropriate to introduce a bill for a separate act having to do with meat inspection. The bill does not in substance differ materially from the meat inspection provisions of the Meat and Canned Foods Act. It provides that meats or meat products shall move interprovincially or for export only from establishments which meet prescribed conditions with respect to sanitation and in which all meats and meat products have been inspected and passed for health. It provides also that imported meats shall be subject to inspection on a basis similar to that prevailing in Canada. It is proposed that when the required regulations have been made under the new legislation, the corresponding regulations under the Meat and Canned Foods Act can be revoked.

I should like to move second reading of the bill.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I do not think much discussion is necessary on this bill. As I understand it, it is simply taking out the meat inspection part of the Meat and Canned Foods Act and putting it into a separate bill. That is my understanding of it. Of course, as the minister said, import restrictions for imported meat products are to be taken under this bill now.

This bill has been in use for many years. It is a wonderful thing for the protection of the consuming public in that all plants having to do with interprovincial or international trade must be inspected by inspectors of the health of animals division. Confidence in a product makes for higher consumption of the product and naturally, in many cases, increases the price to the producer of those various products.

As to many small plants across the country which are not now under inspection, there is some justification for believing that it might be a good idea if, in co-operation with the provincial and municipal officials, there could be some way of utilizing the services of existing veterinary inspectors in various localities across the country in order to see that these other small abattoirs and killer stations come under some kind of inspection similar to that provided in this bill. They are, of course, under inspection now by municipal authorities. But I regret to say that there are some cases in which that inspection is not satisfactory. Some cases have been known where meat has been sold over the counter when it was not fit for human consumption.

I think something could be worked out. I think there has been good co-operation between most of the provincial governments and the federal authorities along that line. By working through the provincial governments and the municipal authorities I think something could be worked out along that line. I wonder whether the government has ever given consideration to that matter or whether they would give consideration to something along that line.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in supporting this bill may I say that I think perhaps the matter of meat inspection is something that needs to be made uniform. The question that occurred to me is whether or not the present standards have been found to be sufficiently comprehensive to cover the situations arising in different parts of Canada. I believe it is the intention of the minister to introduce another bill called the standards act under which the standards will be established so that the inspection set up under this bill can be directed by standards which will be uniform throughout the whole of Canada. In the general trend of business today, with Canada taking her place as the leading food manufacturer, I think this kind of legislation is a necessary and a good thing.

I should like to have from the minister a statement as to whether he expects that this legislation will result in a large increase in inspection staff over what he already has under the present act, namely the Meat and Canned Foods Act. What steps have been taken to co-operate with the various provinces with a view to getting the inspection uniform? There is provincial inspection of small abattoirs. I understand this has to do largely with canned goods. But the matter of inspection and of having uniformity will be a good thing for Canada. On those two points I think we can support the principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Interpretation.

Mr. Pallett: This is the interpretation section, Mr. Chairman. I gather that much of the interpretation of the bill will depend on the use of the words in this section. I refer the committee to the definition of inspector as it appears in paragraph (b):

> (b) "inspector" means a person appointed or designated as an inspector pursuant to section 7;

I would refer the committee to section 7. I do not find any person designated as an inspector in that section. There is an inspector referred to but not designated. Again, in paragraph (c) we find this wording:

> (c) "meat product" means
> (i) an animal carcass,
> (ii) the product or by-product of an animal carcass, and

(iii) a food product containing any product or by-product mentioned in subparagraph (ii), prescribed as a meat product for the purposes of this act;

I point out for the committee's consideration that, before this act could have any teeth, the meat product would have to have all three of these particular characteristics. I suggest that it was not the intention that this bill should mean that the product must have all three characteristics.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry, I was interrupted by a suggestion of an amendment and I did not hear what the hon. member had to say. I wish he would repeat it, if he does not mind.

Mr. Pallett: I was merely referring to the definition of "inspector" in clause 2 (b) as being a person appointed pursuant to clause 7, and in clause 7 there is no designation of a person as an inspector. Then in clause 2 (c) there is a definition of "meat products", and items (i), (ii) and (iii) are set out and are joined by an "and" which would indicate to me that for a meat product to come within the definition in this clause it would have to have all three characteristics. I certainly do not think it was the minister's intention, although I do not know, that in order for a meat product to be so classified it would have to have all three characteristics.

Mr. Gardiner: In so far as the first suggestion is concerned, clause 2 (b) reads:

"inspector" means a person appointed or designated as an inspector pursuant to section 7.

Clause 6 and not 7 provides for the appointment of inspectors and clause 7 says that an inspector may at any time enter any place and so on. The inspector does those things. Under clause 6 (2) the minister can designate any person as an inspector for the purposes of the act, and then clause 7 goes on from there.

Mr. Pallett: But clause 7 is the one referred to in clause 2 (b), not clause 6. If it means clause 6 I suggest it should say clause 6.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. The inspector is appointed under clause 6.

Mr. Pallett: Should not clause 2 (b) refer to clause 6 instead of clause 7?

Mr. Gardiner: I think so. I will check on it in the meantime while we are going through the others, but I think the hon. member is correct.

Mr. Pallett: Then in clause 2 (c) I think you should add after subparagraph (ii) "and/or" rather than simply "and".

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that clause 2 stand for the present?

Mr. Gardiner: I think you had better allow it to stand and I will have that checked.

Mr. Bryce: Is the whole of clause 2 going to stand?

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 2 has been allowed to stand.

Clause stands.

On clause 3—Export and interprovincial movement of meat products.

Mr. Pallett: In clause 3 the word "prescribed" is used in several instances. Prescribed by what, by regulation or by the act?

Mr. Gardiner: In what line?

Mr. Pallett: In line 6 it says "complied with prescribed conditions." In line 9 it says, "was slaughtered in prescribed manner". In line 10 it says, "was inspected as prescribed before and after slaughter." In line 12 it says, "the meat product conforms to prescribed standards". In lines 17 and 18 it says, "packaged and marked as prescribed." In line 19 it refers to "prescribed evidence that the meat product conforms to prescribed standards", and at the end of the paragraph it refers to "inspection in prescribed manner". Who will do the prescribing?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Green: No.

An hon. Member: In the prescribed manner, yes.

Mr. Gardiner: We will read it and see what it says. It reads:

3. (1) No person shall export out of Canada, or send or convey from one province to another, any meat product unless

(a) the meat product was prepared in an establishment that

(i) complied with prescribed conditions, and

(ii) was registered and operated in prescribed manner . . .

I do not think there is anything to misunderstand about that.

Mr. Pallett: Who does the prescribing?

Mr. Gardiner: The conditions are prescribed in the regulations. There is nothing in the act which prescribes the conditions. They are prescribed in the regulations which the governor in council is given the authority to make. Section 4 says:

(1) The governor in council may make regulations for prohibiting the carriage to a destination outside the province in which it was received of a meat product unless . . .

It goes on prescribing again, but the regulations are made by order in council.

Mr. Pallett: I agree that clause 2 (f) says that "prescribed" means prescribed by regulation of the governor in council and the governor in council is given certain authority to make regulations but he is not given authority to make the regulations found in clause 3. I appreciate that under clause 2 (f) "prescribed" means prescribed by regulation of the governor in council, but authority is not given under clause 4 to make the regulations referred to in clause 3.

Mr. Gardiner: Subclause (f) of clause 2, which we have allowed to stand, states that "prescribed" means prescribed by regulation of the governor in council, and clause 4 provides for that.

Mr. Pallett: With respect, clause 4 does not give authority for the governor in council to pass the regulations that are referred to in clause 3. Certain authority is given, but not to the full extent.

An hon. Member: It is in clause 5.

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is fully covered by clause 4. The regulations are provided for in clause 4.

Mr. Pallett: I may be wrong but it has always been my understanding that the governor in council can only pass regulations the authority for which has been given in some act. I suggest that authority is not contained in the measure for the regulations mentioned in clause 3.

An hon. Member: In clause 5.

Mr. Gardiner: Clause 4 and clause 5.

Mr. Low: I think you could regulate anything under clause 5.

Mr. Gardiner: They both give the power to make regulations.

Mr. Pallett: Well, I have done my part to try to prevent the minister getting into trouble.

Mr. Gardiner: I am simply pointing out that we have had legislation on the statute books in the same form since 1907, and so far as this particular matter is concerned we have simply followed what we have had since that time. We have operated under it all this time without any difficulty.

Mr. Drew: Since this question has been asked, how, for instance, under either clause 4 or clause 5 can the governor in council pass a regulation governing the type of evidence that is to be given as provided by clause 3? I can see nothing in clauses 4 or 5 relating to that.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: The kind of evidence that will be given will be based on the regulations.

Mr. Drew: But it mentions prescribed evidence. Under what part of clauses 4 or 5 is there any provision by which the governor in council can make regulations defining the type of evidence that would be prescribed evidence? I am referring to subclause 2 (b) of clause 3.

Mr. Gardiner: Subclause 2 (b) reads:

> the importer has obtained and produces prescribed evidence that the meat product conforms to prescribed standards.

Let us assume he imports it from the United States. The prescribed regulations in the United States are practically the same as our regulations, and evidence would have to be submitted that is the case before the product would be allowed to be distributed in this country. That has always been a condition of our actions up to date. Meat products brought in from another country and sold in this country have had to conform with our regulations here, although they were probably not stated just as specifically as in the present legislation.

Mr. Charlton: They have to conform to the regulations here, Mr. Chairman, but do they have to bear a mark of inspection from the country of origin?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they have had to for some years. I cannot state the exact year when the United States conformed to our regulations or we conformed to theirs, but as my hon. friend knows we have veterinarians who inspect the products and animals that are going into the United States in order to see that they conform to their regulations. It is the same coming the other way.

Mr. Charlton: What about the Argentine, for instance?

Mr. Gardiner: It would be the same. Whatever comes from there has to conform to our regulations. It does not matter where it comes from.

Mr. Lennard: How do you know it is properly inspected?

Mr. Gardiner: We inspect it at our boundary if it has not been inspected.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to ask the minister if this provision covers turkeys moving from one province to the other?

Mr. Gardiner: Turkeys?

Mr. Bryce: Would this provision cover the movement of turkeys from Manitoba to Ontario or from Saskatchewan to Quebec, something like that?

Mr. Gardiner: It includes all meat and meat products moving from one province to another.

Mr. Bryce: What I was anxious to know was whether turkeys raised in Manitoba and British Columbia and moved east are subject to a change of grade in that movement? Is the federal department responsible for the grading once they cross the provincial boundary?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the provision in this bill covers any meat or meat products moving from one province to another. Those products have to be prepared in certain plants that are properly inspected and the animals themselves have to be inspected to make sure that they meet certain health conditions. Then, those products can move into the other province. Now, what regulations are in the province when the products arrive, I cannot say and I cannot be certain that we will be responsible for those.

Mr. Bryce: I am anxious for the minister to tell me whether his department will grade the turkeys that I produce in Manitoba for shipment across a provincial boundary. Will you department grade them A, B, C?

Mr. Gardiner: Just a moment until I make sure. Yes, all meat products are covered by this bill. I was just looking to make sure that the standards bill did not cover poultry as a separate item from other products.

Mr. Bryce: I want to appeal to the minister to devise some means of assuring that, when a farmer sells his turkeys and gets an A, B or C grade, that grade will be carried right through to the consumer. It is only fair that if a man sells a C turkey it should be sold to the consumer as a C turkey. Merely by crossing the international or provincial boundary, it should not be possible for the turkey to get a higher grade. I hope the minister will see to that.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not just so sure that we have the authority to see to that. My friend said something about crossing a provincial or international boundary. Well, when these products get over to Britain, for example, we have inspectors there to make sure that the products arrive in Britain in the proper condition. However, I am not so sure that we can be certain as to how they are going to be sold in the stores all over Britain.

Mr. Bryce: I know there are enough lawyers in the civil service to devise a law to protect the A, B, C grades which the farmer receives for his poultry, and make sure they are carried right through to the consumer.

Mr. Yuill: So far as the grading of turkeys is concerned, the grades are already definitely established. You cannot, by any stretch of your imagination, call a grade C bird anything but a grade C bird. There are certain characteristics that are native to that particular grade. I do not think there is anything to worry about. I have bought and sold a good many tons of poultry in my day and I never had any difficulty in establishing grades. There is only one possibility and that is that when you are buying you may have a tendency to lose a grade or have a certain shrinkage of grades by the time the product gets to the final packers at the packing plants or marketing boards. I think that the grade will hold right across the board from Alberta or British Columbia down to the maritimes. There are certain recognized standards and I believe they are uniform across the board. I am very happy to see this legislation introduced because I feel it is a good thing. I have had years of experience in the meat business and I know there has been a lot of meat shipped and sold under conditions that were anything but satisfactory. I believe this is a definite step in the right direction.

There are other things that I feel should be taken into consideration. I do not know whether or not this bill applies to fish, but I believe it would be advisable if there were a closer scrutiny of the quality that is sold under brand names. I have had occasion to buy fish particularly that was not what was designated on the wrapper. If they are going to put meat in cans I think the same thing should apply. In general, I am in agreement with the bill as presented.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Regulations.

Mr. Gardiner: There is an amendment to clause 5.

Mr. Gregg: I move:

That section 5 be amended by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (g), by deleting paragraph (h) and by re-lettering paragraph (i) as paragraph (h).

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Charlton: Not quite so fast; I did not catch the significance of that amendment. Apparently it is to add the word "and" after paragraph (g), was it?

The Deputy Chairman: It is to add the word "and" at the end of paragraph (g), deleting paragraph (h) and re-lettering paragraph (i) as (h).

Mr. Gardiner: Paragraph (h) is left out.

Mr. Charlton: Paragraph (h) would be automatic; it would not be necessary to prescribe a class or kind of meat that was unfit for human consumption. Apparently paragraph (g) would exempt any person or meat product from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this act. Would that apply to local butchers, individuals killing animals for their own consumption or for sale on the local market? Would it apply to anyone else?

Mr. Gardiner: The regulations now provide for that, and that is because we have no control over that sort of thing when it is done provincially.

Mr. Charlton: Where it is not to be sold outside of the province, you have no control?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: Then the paragraph just means that anyone who is selling locally is exempt from this bill?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—Seizure.

Mr. Gardiner: I have an amendment to clause 8 which reads as follows:

That clause 8 be amended by deleting subclause 4; by renumbering subclause 5 as subclause 4; by adding the word "and" to the end of paragraph (a) of the new subclause 4; by deleting the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b) of the new subclause 4; and that the semicolon after the word "section" at the end of paragraph (b) be changed to a period; and that paragraph (c) of the new subclause 4 be deleted.

Mr. Gregg: I so move.

Mr. Charlton: I think we had better have a definition of this amendment before we pass it.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps we can have it read as amended.

Mr. Lennard: It would not be any clearer then.

The Deputy Chairman: Are you asking the chairman to read it as amended? I would assume that there is no necessity to read paragraphs 1, 2 and 3, which have not been changed. The present paragraph 4 will come out and paragraph 4 will now read:

The governor in council may make regulations
(a) respecting the detention of articles seized under this section and for preserving or safeguarding any articles so detained; and
(b) respecting the disposition of articles forfeited under this section.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Charlton: I have a question with respect to subclause 2 (b) of clause 8, which reads:

Meat products and other things seized pursuant to subsection (1) shall not be detained after
(a) the provisions of this act and the regulations have, in the opinion of the inspector, been complied with, or
(b) the expiration of 90 days from the day of seizure, or such longer period as may be prescribed with respect to any meat product or other thing,—

So far as I am concerned there is some confusion in this wording. It says: "the expiration of 90 days from the day of seizure or such longer period as may be prescribed." In one place it says that it shall not be detained after 90 days, and in another place it says: "or such longer period"—

Mr. Martin: As prescribed by regulations.

Mr. Charlton: Why not leave it open; why mention 90 days?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, of course, it is better to have some definite time. There has to be some special reason for lengthening the time.

Mr. Charlton: Ninety days does not mean a thing.

Mr. Lennard: There has been a lot of thought put in on this bill.

Mr. Charlton: The paragraph says that it shall not be detained after the expiration of 90 days; then it goes on to mention "or such longer period".

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Therefore, the "90" does not mean a thing.

Mr. Gardiner: The time is 90 days unless authority lengthens it.

Mr. Charlton: You might as well have 10 in there.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Hahn: I am not at all sure that I am satisfied with the deletion of subclause 4. I say that because two or three years ago a well known cat and dog wholesaler on the Pacific coast had beneath his cat and dog food label a canned product which apparently contained some food that we were sending over to Europe for human consumption. Many of the labels came off those particular cans. I do not know whether this happened, but an unscrupulous merchant might be willing to take advantage of the fact that we were sending food to destitute people to sell some of that cat and dog food for human consumption. Subclause 4 is the type of regulation that is required in Canada. In an instance such as the one I have described I am not satisfied that some merchants might not take advantage of the fact that a label had come off a can of cat and dog food, or that a mistake had been made in the labelling machine, and sell this cat and dog food for human consumption.

Mr. Gardiner: The subclause that is taken out reads:

> No person shall sell or have in possession for sale a meat product that is unhealthy or unfit for food.

That is the same provision that is contained in the Food and Drugs Act of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Paragraph (c) reads:

> Respecting the marketing, treatment or disposal of meat products that are unhealthy or unfit for food.

That is also covered by the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Martin: Not better, but just as good administration.

Mr. Charlton: You would not have jurisdiction in that case anyway. This paragraph does not mention exporting out of the province. It is just a blank paragraph. You would not have any jurisdiction anyway, in two of the cases.

Mr. Gardiner: This is taken out by request because it is already provided for in the Food and Drugs Act.

Amendments agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Bryce: Who will be the inspector? Will it be a veterinary surgeon or somebody appointed by the government?

Mr. Gardiner: We have two kinds of inspectors; we have a veterinary inspector and a lay inspector. They are all appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. Low: Were there amendments to clause 2?

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether it is the intention to move an amendment to clause 2?

Mr. Gardiner: We are looking for it.

Mr. Martin: We are just having a caucus.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of National Health and Welfare is giving free legal advice.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, after our caucus we have decided that the words "section 7" in clause 2 (b) be changed to "section 6". Clause 2 (b) reads:

> "inspector" means a person appointed or designated as an inspector pursuant to section 7.

It should read "pursuant to section 6" because the inspectors are appointed under section 6. I move the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Pallett: What about the definition of "meat product"? Are you leaving that as it is?

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is all right as it is and my legal friend agrees with me.

Mr. Lennard: That does not say that it is right.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Why should this be under agriculture at all? Would it not more properly be under the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Gardiner: We have just been taking out the sections that should be under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL STANDARDS AND REGULATE TRADE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee on the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish national standards for agricultural products and to regulate international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products and to provide that the governor in council may make regulations for the licensing of dealers to deal in any agricultural products shipped from or to a place outside the province in which such dealer carries on business, and for the issue, cancellation and suspension of such licences, including the prescribing of fees for the issue thereof.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, at the present time there are five statutes prescribing national standards and grading requirements for various agricultural products. These statutes are the Canada Dairy Products Act, 1952; Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act, 1952; Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1952; Meat and Canned Foods Act, 1952; and the Maple Products Industry Act, 1952.

The purpose of the new act is to provide acceptable, uniform authorities for establishing grade standards and to perform the grading and inspection for all agricultural products previously covered by five separate acts administered by the Department of Agriculture.

The new general act is patterned after the Canada Dairy Products Act enacted in 1951 which has proven satisfactory for dairy products. It provides authority for establishing substantially the same regulations as now exist but is considered to have the purposes and intentions more clearly defined and restricted to the established and accepted field of federal jurisdiction specifically related to grade and quality standards for agricultural products.

The act will provide as in the past for the actual grading of certain products by federal graders, and for others, the application of the established grades and standards by the trade with subsequent checking of the applied standards by federal inspectors and detention until they are made to comply with the official standards when found necessary.

The provisions of the act will apply where the products enter into interprovincial or export trade, or where, as a result of legislation on the part of a province or the voluntary action on the part of an individual, the product bears a grade name established pursuant to this act. Compulsory grading of a product moving intraprovincially will therefore depend upon action by the provinces.

In addition to defining standards and carrying out the grading and inspection operations, the act provides as in the past for regulatory services with respect to such matters as packaging, marking and shipping of products, operation of grading establishment and dealing in products exported from or imported into a province.

It will be noted by the hon. member for Selkirk that what he was talking about is really provided for in this legislation.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, the minister has given us a good explanation of what is to come in the bill which is to cover the legislation now to be found in five different acts. I do not think there is need for any general discussion until we have the bill and see what it actually contains. However, there are a few remarks I should like to make at this time.

I am not saying that it is not a good idea to have farm products graded, but the fact is that while everything a farmer sells is sold under grade not many of the articles he buys are sold in that way. There are many consumer products sold across this country which are not graded in any way. They are supposed to be marked, but the contents may not be fully graded. For instance, you cannot tell by looking at a shoe whether or not the sole is all leather.

An hon. Member: Or cardboard.

Mr. Charlton: You have to try to grade such an article yourself at the time you purchase it. I think it would be good business on the part of this government to see that other products are sold to the consumer under grade.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the comments made by the hon. member who has resumed his seat. He may not be aware of the fact but he is advocating some social planning. He does not want to interfere with free enterprise, but under free enterprise we have some inferior products being marketed. I am all for that, but that really is not why I rose to speak.

About 20 years ago we had quite an extensive inquiry into price spreads and at that time it was found that consumers were at the mercy of many of the canning and processing companies. I had hoped that before now we would have a more uniform standard in Canada so that if you bought a can of vegetables marked "choice" you could expect a choice product. However, we do not seem to have made very much progress in getting uniform standards to apply to all preserving or canning companies in Canada.

When the people where I live sell their wheat it is subject to very rigid standards. Those who sell pork products must sell according to grade. As the hon. member for Selkirk has pointed out on a number of occasions, when a hog is one point lower than a certain standard the farmer must pay a heavy penalty. It is not unreasonable to ask that those engaged in canning or processing should observe certain standards.

Those of us who come from the west are in the habit of buying apples which are carefully packed and labelled. When you buy a fancy grade you know that when you open the box you will find exactly what you expect. But when we come to Ontario we find that unless we buy British Columbia apples we invariably get some inferior apples regardless of the price we pay. It seems to me that, if the farmers in one section of Canada are expected to produce a product according to fixed standards, the Minister of Agriculture should be able to report more progress than he has in seeing to it that in all parts of Canada those who produce agricultural products would be encouraged to produce a uniform product, and those who are engaged in canning sell choice quality products in cans that are labelled "choice quality". In standard or choice canned goods, whether canned in the east, in the west or in the central part of Canada, there should be goods of similar qualities. At some time before the bill is passed I should like the minister to indicate what progress is being made in seeing that products which enter into international and interprovincial trade should measure up to standards which are applicable to all parts of Canada.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the resolution will require long discussion. Certainly when the bill is brought up for second reading we shall have much fuller discussion on it, but it seems to me that this would be a good chance to ask the minister if his proposed bill does provide some protection for livestock dealers in Ontario who have for years past been victimized by dealers in this way, that these dealers will pay a certain rate for feed grain and when the feed is delivered they find it has been adulterated and they have got an inferior quality. Quite a number of complaints have been registered in this house against that sort of thing, and unfortunately the blame is placed on the western farmer rather than on the unscrupulous dealer who is doing that sort of adulteration. I believe that a good deal of that is being done, not only in Ontario but also in British Columbia.

An hon. Member: It is not the farmer's fault.

Mr. Low: It is not the farmer's fault at all; that is well known. But I am wondering if the measure which is contemplated by this resolution does make provision for regulating that sort of thing.

Mr. Gardiner: As my hon. friend knows, grain marketing is not under my department; it is under the Department of Trade and Commerce. The wheat board, which handles this product, operates under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and so does the board of grain commissioners, and all the grading of grain and everything associated with that is under the board of grain commissioners and does not come under this bill. This bill deals with dairy products, fruit, vegetables, honey, livestock and livestock products, maple products, meat and canned foods. Those are covered by the five acts which are now being brought under this one.

Mr. Low: I listened very carefully when the minister read his list of matters which the act is supposed to cover, and I did not hear him mention grain and feed grains. That is the reason why I asked the question. It seems to me that, though the wheat board has control of the marketing of grains and though the wheat board comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce, it would be possible to have a measure brought in by my hon. friend's own department that would cover the licensing of dealers as he contemplates licensing dealers in other products, so that inspection and checking could be carried out perhaps through powers delegated to his inspectors from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Gardiner: Unfortunately the condition is exactly the same in connection with the grain as it is in connection with the apples. My hon. friend from Mackenzie was speaking about buying apples in Ontario and buying them in Saskatchewan. We do not grow apples for sale in Saskatchewan. They grow a few in his part of the country, but very few apples are grown for sale in Saskatchewan. About the only person who grows them for sale, that I know of, is the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, who does not happen to be here tonight. So we buy our apples from outside the province, and all the apples we get are more or less under the control of the federal authority. The grading and inspection and that kind of thing are more or less taken care of. For example, here in the province of Ontario, I drive to Toronto and on the way back I see a stand at the side of the road and I stop to buy a pound of apples. I look at them to see if the grade suits me. But there is nothing we can do in this parliament to regulate that kind of trade. That is intraprovincial trade. When we try to regulate that by means of an act, the act, when it goes to court, is declared ultra vires. One of the reasons why we are putting through this legislation at the present time is to take out of the act some of those provisions that are in now which, if it ever came to court, would result in one or other of the five acts here proposed being thrown out and declared ultra vires.

Mr. Nicholson: With regard to canned vegetables produced in Ontario and sold all over Canada, is it not possible to enforce the regulations so that they would be up to standard?

Mr. Gardiner: They are covered by regulations which are provided for in this act.

Mr. Nicholson: It seems to me that there is a wide variation among the products put up by different canners in Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: I think that the bill really provides that the product has to be properly described on the wrapper that is on the package. If it is not properly described on the wrapper that is on the can or package, then action can be taken against whoever is responsible for that, the person who is selling it at the last point of delivery or the person who sold it to him, whichever is declared to be the case.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder if the minister could have a uniform standard set for all over Canada, so that a product labelled "choice quality" would be the same in British Columbia as one would find in the maritimes, for fruit and vegetables which are canned and which go into interprovincial trade?

Mr. Gardiner: They are all graded uniformly and have been for years, but I quite agree with my hon. friend that when you buy a can of peas, for example, one can does not necessarily taste the same as a can put up by some other packer. I think that is what he has in mind, namely, that when you buy a product thinking it is grade A or whatever the top grade is, you ought to get a product that is always the same. I agree that in some cases you do not. Nevertheless it is described and comes within the qualifications that are put on the grade of the product. All the products are graded when they go into interprovincial trade or into international trade, but they are not necessarily all graded by us.

Mr. Charlton: Since the hon. member for Peace River has brought up the matter of grain going into Ontario, perhaps if the minister would look up his regulations he may find that they now have jurisdiction over mixed feeds. Some of the grains coming in could not be called mixed feeds; they could be called mixed seeds; but surely there is some way to regulate the matter.

Mr. Gardiner: There are regulations with regard to shipping in wheat seed and feed grains, and people can be prosecuted for breaking those regulations.

Mr. Charlton: That is with regard to seed grain.

Mr. Low: Am I to understand that it would be possible for some sort of breaking of the federal law governing the kind of thing I have mentioned and about which many dealers in the far western provinces have complained for years? If the matter cannot be handled under the Department of Agriculture, would it not be possible to have some measure brought in, say, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that could regulate the grade?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. Gardiner: I am neither a lawyer nor a constitutional lawyer, but we have been dealing with this thing now for 20 years. My understanding is that when grain is shipped from the west to, let us say, Goderich or any other point in eastern Canada, it is shipped there and delivered to the individual who bought it. The transaction that took place between that individual and a farmer in Ontario is an intraprovincial transaction and the government of the province of Ontario or the legislature of Ontario can and do take action to regulate that kind of trade that takes place after that. Through the grading of grain in the west we can control what it is that is delivered to the person at any particular point. But after it gets to that point and is being delivered outside of there, whatever action is provided for is provided for provincially. If we attempt to deal with it we get into trouble.

Mr. Huffman: In view of what the hon. member for Mackenzie has just said with regard to the quality of British Columbia apples, I wonder how he can claim such high regard for B.C. apples that were recently found to be so inferior in Scotland. I believe that commodities grown and canned in southern Ontario are without peer. They will claim the attention of particular purchasers.

Mr. Tustin: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Mackenzie. I realize immediately that when he buys canned goods he does not even look at the label. There are three grades of canned vegetables, namely standard, choice and fancy, which is the best grade. Not only are these canned goods all inspected and graded but most of the products that go into the cans are graded before canning. Today in Ontario, under the Ontario marketing act, these products are graded when they go to the factory. I hear some of my hon. friends over to my left laughing.

Mr. Fulton: It is empty laughter.

Mr. Tustin: There is a staff of inspectors in Ontario and in the rest of Canada working under the Department of Agriculture. These inspectors go to these factories and inspect these goods frequently. But the point is this, and I come back to it again. There are three grades. If you buy the standard grade, you get the poorest quality. But if you want a real good grade, you buy the fancy grade. That is why there is such a great difference in the quality of the product. If you are going to buy canned goods, always look at the label and know exactly what you are buying.

Mr. Argue: I do not intend to enter into any discussion as to the relative merits of grades of agricultural products in Ontario as compared with agricultural products in any other province. I think this resolution now before us could be extremely important if the legislation introduced in fact carries out the suggestions made in this resolution. The resolution reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish national standards for agricultural products and to regulate international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products and to provide that the governor in council may make regulations for the licensing of dealers to deal in any agricultural products shipped from or to a place outside the province in which such dealer carries on business, and for the issue, cancellation and suspension of such licences, including the prescribing of fees for the issue thereof.

I suggest that this resolution is sufficiently broad in scope that it should contain all of those resolutions and all of the powers that have been suggested from time to time by the farm organizations of this country when they have asked the government to establish legislation that would be governed by a board of livestock commissioners.

Some reference has been made to the Canada Grain Act and to the board of grain commissioners. Faulty and inadequate as that legislation may be, nevertheless it is vastly superior to any legislation we have had to date in Canada dealing with interprovincial and export trade in other agricultural products. While it is true that a feeder in Ontario may not be definitely certain as to the quality of the feed product when he buys it from a commercial organization, nevertheless if that farmer is able to purchase directly from the wheat board a quantity of grain which has been graded according to the standards of the Canada Grain Act and which has the stamp of approval of the board of grain commissioners, that feeder is assured of getting a quality product.

The trouble is not with the regulations under the Canada Grain Act. The difficulty is mainly not in the standards established under the Canada Grain Act. The difficulty is that so far the government has failed to adopt legislation that, with respect to feed that he purchases from a dealer, will guarantee to the eastern feeder the same standards as those that are provided for in the Canada Grain Act. I should like to see the government establish a board of livestock commissioners that will have the power to do all of the things mentioned in this resolution and additional things. I should like to see the standards that are set up for livestock and other agricultural products taken right back to the producer so that when the producer delivers a carload of beef to a packing company he is certain to obtain for that beef the grade and the price for that grade that may be finally approved by such a board of livestock commissioners.

In the legislation that is adopted I think it is important not only to see to it that proper standards are set up but to see that the benefits from those standards shall accrue to the producer. I should like to see this legislation carried even another step forward. I should like to see a national livestock marketing board or some type of national livestock selling agency so that the producers themselves may have some control over the buying and selling of their products. Certainly the resolution we have before us this evening is the type of resolution that would be of great benefit to the producers if properly enforced.

I am glad that the government at this time is consolidating acts so that the public may know what power the government has and what legislation it is actually using. When the minister is considering consolidation of acts, he might look at his act which is entitled "An act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace"; another act entitled "The Agricultural Products Board Act"; and a further act entitled "An act to provide for the marketing of agricultural products in interprovincial and export trade". That is a series of acts that certainly in many ways duplicate and overlap and it is a series of acts which, I may say incidentally, are little used. I therefore think it is a step in the right direction that the legislation is being consolidated. I should like to see the government go one step further and establish a board of livestock commissioners such as that suggested by the hon. member for Yorkton in his resolution under "Notices of Motions", to be found at page 15 of today's order paper and which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into early consideration the advisability of appointing a board of livestock commissioners in Canada for the purpose of regulating and controlling the assembling, grading, transporting, marketing and exporting of livestock and livestock products, and that such board should include adequate representation appointed on the recommendation of the producers' organizations.

If the resolution before us tonight were expanded to include the proposition advanced by the hon. member for Yorkton I think we would have legislation that would not only be more effective but legislation that has been requested by our many farm organizations.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 411, to establish national standards for agricultural products and to regulate international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL EXISTING LEGISLATION AND SUBSTITUTE NEW ACT

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to repeal the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, chapter 301 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and to make provision by means of a new act for all substantive rights relating to quartz mining in the Yukon, including the rights to stake and acquire mineral claims and leases, and to provide for certain modifications in the administration of the law.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the legislation to which this resolution relates is of an unusual character in parliament. Legislation on mining is normally provincial and a matter of provincial jurisdiction, but so far as the territories are concerned most matters of a provincial character are handled by the respective commissioners and councils. There is an exception though in the case of matters relating to natural resources. The natural resources of the Yukon and Northwest Territories are held by the federal government in the same way as the resources of the western provinces were held by the federal government before 1930. The resources of the soil and subsoil in the territories were originally governed by regulations established under the Dominion Lands Act which was passed in 1872 and which was replaced by the Territorial Lands Act in 1950.

There are two exceptions to the general coverage of the Territorial Lands Act. They are the Yukon Placer Mining Act which governs placer mining in the Yukon, and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act which covers quartz mining in the Yukon. The Yukon Placer Mining Act was passed in 1906. It was the governing act for placer gold development in the Yukon following the Klondike rush ten years earlier, and it still governs placer mining for gold near Dawson and elsewhere. There is no intention to modify the Yukon Placer Mining Act at this time.

[Mr. Argue.]

The Yukon Quartz Mining Act was passed in 1924. Prior to that time quartz mining was governed by regulations under the Dominion Lands Act, as all mining in the Northwest Territories is now governed by regulations under the Territorial Lands Act. The act of 1924 simply put in statutory form the regulations in force at that time. It provides no authority to make general regulations and there has not been any overall revision in the 31 years since it was passed.

But conditions have changed considerably since 1924. The development of the Yukon is proceeding at a steadily increasing pace. Conditions of mining and prospecting have changed, and there is no doubt that the act has become out of date in respect of many of its provisions which are of importance to mining in the Yukon. Some of the clauses in the present act are not capable of proper interpretation. Some others do not take into account many improvements that have been devised in recent years in the field of mining legislation, and some others are not as favourable to mining development as more advanced clauses existing in the legislation of several of the provinces.

In the intervening years since 1924 we have been shown a great many defects in the provisions and operation of the act. Revision is required, I submit, if unsatisfactory and out of date provisions are not to have a deteriorating effect on the development of the Yukon. The legislation contemplated by the resolution before the house is to achieve that revision. The original intention two years ago was to repeal the Yukon Quartz Mining Act entirely and to have quartz mining in the Yukon placed under the Territorial Lands Act, the same as mining in the Northwest Territories. It would have meant almost no statutory provisions and everything would have been covered by regulations of the governor in council.

A bill to achieve that purpose was placed on the order paper at the session of 1953-54, but it became clear then that there was considerable opposition in the Yukon to this course, and of course the hon. member for the Yukon did voice that opposition very strongly. The opposition was mainly to the abolition of statutory provisions. It seemed that most of the prospectors in the Yukon did not wish to have the entire regime, including substantive rights, subject to control by regulation. Because of that opposition and differences of opinion it was decided that the best course would be to have an impartial and expert examination of the situation by a qualified man with wide experience in mining in Canada. I took the advice of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I discussed the matter with various interested persons, including the hon. member for the Yukon, and I asked Mr. George Edward Cole if he would serve as commissioner. Mr. Cole has been in the mining industry in Canada for 53 years. He worked in the British Columbia, Ontario and Manitoba mining fields. He had overseas service from 1915 to 1919. In 1928 he was appointed chief inspector of mines for Manitoba and in 1930 was appointed director of mines for that province. He retired from that position in 1945. From 1941 to 1945 he was president of the association of professional engineers of Manitoba. He is a past president of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy.

Mr. Cole interviewed most of the people in the Yukon who are interested in mining, as well as the mining people elsewhere in Canada. He spent some weeks in the Yukon and looked thoroughly into the whole situation. As I say, he discussed it with a number of people, including the hon. member for the Yukon, who has always shown a special interest in mining in his territory. Then, he submitted his report to me on June 18, 1954. I believe it is a very good report and has clarified the position considerably. When I was in the Yukon last summer I discussed the report personally with many of the mining and prospecting interests there. After these discussions, after studying the mining laws of the various provinces, and after thoroughly studying the report, I became convinced that Mr. Cole's recommendations were basically sound. The Cole report has, therefore, formed the basis of the new legislation to be introduced by this resolution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since the Cole report forms the basis of the legislation I feel that the best course to follow would be to outline the recommendations which the report contains. I believe, however, this would be a good point to move the adjournment of the debate before I deal with the various points made.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue tomorrow with the business that I indicated on Friday night.

Mr. Green: When the minister announced the business of the house on Friday last, I asked him about the government notice of motion on the order paper providing for the establishment of a committee on atomic energy and research. At that time he replied he was not in a position to say when it would be put on for debate, but he would try to answer on Monday. The minister said nothing about it last night nor tonight.

I point out to him that on February 3 of this year the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Macleod, as found at page 795 of Hansard, stated:

> —it is the intention of the government to propose a committee to study atomic energy as well as research generally.

Then, on March 29, the government placed on the order paper a motion to set up this committee. That is almost two months ago, yet we have no word as to when the government proposes to proceed with the setting up of this committee. I point out to the minister that he is hoping to get this house prorogued by the end of next month. I believe the time has come when the government should take steps to set up this committee, and I would ask the minister when it is proposed to move the motion.

Mr. Harris: All that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has stated, Mr. Speaker, is quite correct. I feel I should point out, however, that what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said on February 3 was that we would propose a committee. Consultations were had after that with interested persons and the personnel obtained. Then, on March 29, a motion was put on the order paper. I believe everyone recalls that the minister concerned left for Australia within five or six days thereafter and only returned on May 5.

Since that time I have not found it possible to call this item, having in mind the fact that we have legislation on the order paper and we are still attempting to get legislation into the hands of the committee. I gave consideration to this a week ago, and at that time it did seem to me that if we hoped to bring the session to a close reasonably soon it would be necessary for the committees to complete their work rather than adding to their work. For that reason it seemed to me that, unless there was an urgent need for this committee at this session, it would be desirable not to call it. Now, this particular committee is not one that can be dealt with in one, two, three or four meetings or even in as many weeks. In the past there has been serious and leisurely consideration of these very important matters. On past occasions the committee has travelled outside of Ottawa, and I would expect it would if it were set up now.

Under the circumstances, I do feel it would not be desirable to proceed with this motion, unless as I have said there are reasons I have not been informed about why we should proceed with it at the present time. However, if hon. members feel there are reasons I would be glad to hear them and consider the matter further later this week.

Mr. Green: During the session last year we were given to understand that a committee on atomic energy would be set up this year. This is a field in which there have been rapid developments in the last year. We now have intimations from members of the government that atomic energy is to be used for peacetime purposes and that private industry has been invited to participate. I think the minister is quite wrong when he intimates there is no hurry about this question. I suggest that this is one of the questions about which parliament should be informed. The purpose of having such a committee was to help keep members in touch with this development.

I urge upon him that the government proceed without any further delay to get the committee set up and at least get the work started. I think we could finish the work on atomic energy before the end of this session.

Mr. Harris: As I have said, I will consider all the representations that are made. I am informed that what my hon. friend says in the latter part of his remarks is not so, and it would not be likely that the atomic energy portion of the work of the committee could be completed in any reasonable time. However, I shall be glad to consider it and discuss it with him and any other members who may be interested.

Mr. Knowles: With regard to the business for tomorrow, do we go on with Friday night's list from the point we had reached or do we pick up any of the items that have been moved up a stage or two in the meantime? I think it may be more satisfactory if the minister would tell us, one, two, three, what he has in mind for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: I do not know what my hon. friend has in mind. I have not been in the house for the last hour and a half.

Mr. Knowles: We have been making good progress in your absence.

Mr. Harris: Fine; I shall stay out from now on. I understand that we are dealing with the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. Then, we have the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the Blind Persons Act. I am delighted to know that my hon. friend thinks they will all be completed before six o'clock tomorrow night. In that event, I shall provide a further menu by saying that if hon. members will consent we will then take the estimates of the departments of post office and agriculture. If, however, there should be a debate on the motion to go into supply, I will indicate some matter of legislation for the remainder of tomorrow. Thursday and Friday we will take post office and agriculture.

Mr. Knowles: My question related to the matter of third reading of Bill No. 352 and second reading of the other bill in the name of the Minister of Agriculture. Those are the things we did while the minister was out.

Mr. Harris: What does my hon. friend want to take up tomorrow?

Mr. Knowles: I am not asking for anything but information. However, perhaps we can straighten it out tomorrow.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and/or the Minister of National Revenue, since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the Auditor General personally about this matter, and I am informed by him that a search of the files shows that the only correspondence and written representations dealing with the matter I have in mind is the letter which has now been tabled in the radio committee. Under the circumstances I would ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

INCOME TAX BUILDING, WINDSOR

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams since the first day of January, 1950, which passed between any department of government and any corporation or person relating to negotiations for the purchase or acquisition otherwise of land required for income tax office premises in the city of Windsor.

NATIONAL REVENUE—DOCUMENTS SHOWN TO PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For photostatic copies of documents in the possession of the Department of National Revenue concerning advances or payments made or given by John T. Drohan, since deceased, to James Dempsey sometime during the year 1951, which said photostatic copies were shown by the Minister of National Revenue to the premier of Ontario on or about April 26 or 27 last.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to oppose this motion and I wish to say with reference to it that I have already indicated to the house that I communicated certain information respecting the estate of the late John T. Drohan to the premier of Ontario in his capacity as provincial treasurer, under the agreement between the governments of Ontario and Canada, which has already been tabled in the house. That agreement provided for the exchange of information concerning provincial and federal succession duties.

By the terms of the Dominion Succession Duty Act I am under an obligation not to disclose any such information to anyone whomsoever who is not entitled by law to receive it. In this, as in all other matters, I have scrupulously refrained from disclosing such information to anybody not entitled by law to receive it. I therefore cannot be held responsible for recent publicity which has occurred in relation to what is alleged to be information lawfully disclosed by me.

In view of the express provisions of the Dominion Succession Duty Act I am unable to comply with the request now made of me that I disclose any such information to the house or any committee of the house. Because of the statutory bar the government has no option but to oppose this motion and also the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member allow his motion to be dropped, in the circumstances?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division:

NATIONAL REVENUE—DOCUMENTS SHOWN TO PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any photostats or other reproductions or facsimiles of any documents sent or shown to the premier and/or provincial treasurer of Ontario by the Minister of National Revenue at any time since April 25, 1955.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will perhaps be good enough to tell me whether he does not consider that his motion is substantially the same as that which has just been voted upon by the house.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, there are certain differences between them, but substantially they are the same. Since my motion would probably meet with the same fate I might as well leave it to Your Honour to deal with as you wish.

Mr. Speaker: If hon. members will read this motion and the previous one they will see that the language is almost identical, except that the hon. member for Prince Albert asks for documents since April 26 or 27 while the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre refers to documents since April 25.

That is about the only difference. Since the hon. member was kind enough to indicate to me that it was substantially the same, I merely invoke citation 325 of Beauchesne's third edition, which is to this effect:

A motion or amendment cannot be brought forward which is the same in substance as a question which has already been decided, because a proposition being once submitted and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the house.

Therefore I declare the motion to be out of order.

WESTERN FLOODS—REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence and telegrams, since the 1st day of May, 1955, received by any department of government from provincial governments, rural municipalities and local improvement districts, requesting assistance and compensation for the flood losses in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and the replies thereto.

Mr. St. Laurent: There is no objection to the production of all these documents, but I should like to make two observations. First, we would send the usual courtesy communications to the governments which have written to us to ascertain if they have any valid objection to the production of what they have sent us. Second, in producing the documents we will not try to determine whether they constitute requests for assistance and compensation, but will file all those that refer to the damage caused by storms since May 1, 1955.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is agreeable.

Mr. Speaker: The motion will carry, subject to the observations made by the Prime Minister.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED RELEASE OF INFORMATION—DOCUMENTS SHOWN TO PREMIER OF ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue arising out of the statement he made earlier today. Did the photostatic copies of documents to which he referred and to which the motion referred deal only with matters covered by the succession duty act? Were those documents in the possession of the department or the executors of the Drohan estate?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): As I have received no notice of this question I shall take it into consideration.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, of which notice may be considered to have been given on May 9. Will the minister say when he will be in a position to answer my questions which have been on the order paper since the 9th of May, and which appear as No. 5 today?

Mr. McCann: Question No. 5 will be answered in due course.

EFFECT OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if in the light of the statement made earlier this afternoon by the Minister of National Revenue it is the view of the government that agreements entered into between the federal and provincial governments can have the effect of overriding the provisions of federal legislation such as the succession duty act?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No agreement could have the effect of overriding the provisions of the succession duty act, but there is a special section in that act providing for the making and implementing of such agreements.

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to bring down the estimates of the Department of National Revenue before the Ontario election is over?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question. Arrangements for the order of business in the house are being made by the leader of the house in conference with representatives of other groups in the house. I shall bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the Minister of Finance, who is acting as house leader, and ask him if he will give the hon. gentleman an answer.

INCOME TAX—DEDUCTION OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO POLITICAL ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if any of the district officers of the income tax department are allowed to permit the deduction for income tax purposes of contributions to political organizations or political candidates?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. Political contributions can be made. The donor of those pays the tax, and they are not deductible expenses in his hands, nor are they revenue if they go through the proper channels to the person who receives them.

COAL

REPORTED CLOSING OF NOVA SCOTIA MINE—INQUIRY AS TO RESULT OF RECENT MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys if he will inform the house whether any progress was made at the conference held in Halifax on May 20 in regard to keeping 1-B colliery at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, operating after May 30; and second, was any progress made in regard to securing additional markets for the Nova Scotia coal industry?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Cape Breton South for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question.

At the invitation of the government of Nova Scotia a meeting was held in Halifax on Friday, May 20, with the premier of Nova Scotia in the chair, to review the problem presented by the closure of No. 1-B colliery at Glace Bay. My hon. colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen), and I attended this meeting, accompanied by officials of the Department of Labour and the dominion coal board. Also present were representatives of the provincial government, the executive of district 26, united mine workers, and executive officers of the Dominion Coal Company.

The problems of finding markets for the coal from this and other collieries of the area were most carefully studied. The effect on the market for coal of imports of low cost residual fuel oil was reviewed, and the possibility of developing additional outlets for coal was thoroughly canvassed. The effects on the life and economy of the area of the projected closure were brought out, and the problems of finding alternative employment for over 700 miners affected were stressed.

The meeting was investigatory only, and I can report that factors that could have a bearing on this difficult situation were brought forward and carefully examined. One promising line of investigation having to do with markets abroad was developed and is being intensively pursued at the present time by the Dominion Coal Company, the dominion coal board and officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

If successful this may enable the company to maintain this colliery in operation without causing additional difficulties in the marketing of coal from other collieries in the province. I expect to be able to report upon this at a later date, possibly when the estimates of the dominion coal board are before the committee; but since the negotiations are presently under way I would prefer to avoid being more specific at the present time.

[Mr. Gillis.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO RECENT VISIT OF NATO COUNCIL TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the minister of external affairs. Will the minister state why a press release having to do with a visit to Montreal by the permanent representatives to the NATO council last Sunday and Monday was apparently released at noon on Wednesday, May 18, but was sent to members of this house only today? Second, has the minister any statement to make with respect to the significance of this visit and its results?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as to the first point raised by the hon. member I shall look into the matter to see if the facts as alleged are correct. If they are found to be so I shall inquire the reason for the delay.

As to the second question, I can only say that it was a routine visit of the permanent North Atlantic Treaty Organization council to inspect certain defence establishments in the United States and around Montreal. There is nothing I can report beyond that. If any report is to be made it will be made by the council when it returns to Paris.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—APPOINTMENT OF CROWN ATTORNEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he could indicate when he expects to be able to table the correspondence between himself and Mr. Parker relating to the position of crown attorney for the Northwest Territories, for which an order was passed some time ago.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Very shortly; I should think probably tomorrow.

HIGHWAYS

SUGGESTED NATIONAL AUTHORITY TO COPE WITH DEATH TOLL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the government give consideration to a suggestion made at the national highway safety council conference that legislation be enacted to make possible a national authority to cope with the terrific death tolls taking place on our highways?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That is a matter which will certainly receive consideration, but at first blush it would appear to require an amendment to the constitution to give parliament the right to legislate in any way except in the field of criminal law with regard to highway traffic.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROVISION OF RECREATION SPACE FOR PAGE BOYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, having regard to the health and physical fitness of the page boys I wish to thank the Minister of Public Works for granting us a green spot in which to keep fit. The minister thinks boys are more valuable than grass, and my point of privilege is that it was on this same spot a year ago tomorrow when we lost our great Christian athlete, "big Lionel".

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL EXISTING LEGISLATION AND SUBSTITUTE NEW ACT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 24, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Lesage—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to repeal the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, chapter 301 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and to make provision by means of a new act for all substantive rights relating to quartz mining in the Yukon, including the rights to stake and acquire mineral claims and leases, and to provide for certain modifications in the administration of the law.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, at the adjournment last night I was about to outline the recommendations of Mr. Cole, which formed the basis of the legislation which this resolution seeks to introduce. The first recommendation is that there should be no change in the placer mining act at this time. I have already mentioned this last night.

The second recommendation deals with the question of whether quartz mining in the Yukon should be governed by statute or regulation. Mr. Cole recommended against the original plan to cover mining in the Yukon entirely by regulation. He stated that the Yukon mining fraternity wanted to have the essential privileges of prospectors safeguarded by statutory provisions. The recommendation of Mr. Cole was as follows:

I therefore recommend that the rights of the prospector to prospect and stake claims anywhere in the Yukon Territory be protected by statute and that all administrative procedures of such prospecting and staking, including the number and size of claims, the method of staking, the use of cairns, the recording of claims, the granting of leases and all other matters connected with the disposal of mining rights should be provided for by regulations.

The bill has been drafted along those lines. All the substantive provisions of the present act are covered by sections of the bill to be introduced. The administrative procedures will be provided for by regulation of the governor in council. The result will be to give full and adequate protection to all matters of substance. Such matters cannot be changed without an act of parliament.

As a matter of fact we shall have put rather more into the statute than Mr. Cole recommended. For instance, in the act will be a provision as to the number of claims that can be staked, a provision as to the size of claims, and much of the procedure of an important character with regard to the recording of claims will also be in the act. This is to ensure full protection to the Yukon prospectors.

I want to give the assurance that the placing of procedural matters in regulations will not in any way endanger the privileges now enjoyed by prospectors. I wish to stress that only the detailed procedures of administration will be governed by regulation. The compromise recommended by Mr. Cole and embodied in the bill will provide for flexibility in administrative procedures, but will assure protection of substantive rights.

Regulations in respect to the administration of natural resources are not new to the people in the Yukon Territory. The Territorial Lands Act is applicable to the Yukon. Lands, as far as surface rights are concerned, timber, oil and gas rights, quarrying, dredging for minerals, are all administered by regulations. One of the pertinent recommendations of Mr. Cole deals with the question of withdrawing areas from ordinary staking, and to grant reservations or concessions by public competitions. This is an important matter. The virtue of that procedure is that it enables an area that is capable of development only on a large scale and at high cost to be bid on by companies which have the resources to develop it.

An hon. Member: Are you talking about oil development now?

Mr. Lesage: I am talking about mineral development—quartz mining. The procedure is often of distinct advantage for the development of a region. In answer to the hon. member for Yukon I might say that the Pine Point development is a good example of the necessity at times of granting so-called concessions. The Pine Point concession in the Northwest Territories is really much too large to be developed by small holders, and it is susceptible of development only on a very large scale. The granting of reservations or concessions often encourages capital and enterprise to come into a region. However, there has been and there is considerable opposition in the Yukon to the governor in council having any right to grant concessions or reservations.

Mr. Cole recommended:

> I believe that a healthy condition exists in the Yukon in so far as the individual prospector is concerned and that the time has not yet come when "the governor in council should be given the right to withdraw areas in the Yukon Territory from ordinary staking or to grant reservations or concessions by public competition."
> I would recommend that the granting of reservations or concessions be reviewed if and when conditions change.

Since, as I have said, in this new bill we are following the recommendations of the Cole report, the bill to be introduced consequently contains no provision to enable concessions or reservations being granted. This is also due to the objections we have received from the prospectors in the Yukon, and to the objections that were very strongly made by the hon. member for Yukon himself.

The fourth recommendation of the Cole report deals with the method of staking. Under the present act claims staked in the Yukon require only two posts to be marked; that is to say, a location line is established. The rest of the claim is supposed to be a square based on that line. All corners of the claim are not marked on the ground. The so-called two-post staking or single-line staking is such that the boundaries of the claim are not marked.

An important question referred to Mr. Cole was whether this should be done away with and four-post staking substituted. Four-post staking requires the marking of all four corners of a claim and the establishment of all four sides. As a matter of fact, only the Yukon, British Columbia and Alberta now have two-post staking. The Northwest Territories and all other provinces have four-post staking. If we go across the border we find that Alaska, Utah, Colorado, Oregon, Nevada and many other states have four-post staking or even more than four-post staking, and require all boundaries to be marked.

There are some prospectors in the Yukon who are much attached to the two-post staking. I know the hon. member for Yukon disagrees with Mr. Cole on that score and I expect him to give reasons for two-post staking.

Mr. Simmons: I am not the only one, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lesage: But that does not mean the hon. member is right, sir. The disadvantages of two-post staking are certainly very great. There is no doubt about that. That is the reason it has generally been done away with. The greatest defect is that it does not adequately mark a claim and so it leads to overlapping and confusion, and to "fractions". One has only to look at a survey chart to see that this is true. It makes the maintenance of accurate records and claim sheets virtually impossible. The situation has been pictured to me by a leading man in the mining industry in Canada recently as being so bad that he said he would not consider buying a Yukon mining claim without surveying it as well as all neighbouring claims.

Mr. Green: Does that apply to British Columbia as well?

Mr. Lesage: He said in the Yukon, in conversation with me.

Mr. Green: There is the same law in British Columbia.

Mr. Lesage: He said he could have no assurance that the claim he might buy would not be covered or overlapped by another valid registered claim. To quite an extent, I am told—even though I do not have to discuss it here—that the situation parallels that in British Columbia, because they have only two-post staking.

Mr. Green: He did not know much concerning what he was talking about.

Mr. Lesage: Maybe he did not, but he has been in the mining industry all of his life.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Can the minister tell us where this authority carries on his business?

Mr. Lesage: In the Yukon. He has interests in the Yukon, but his claims there were surveyed a long time ago. He said he thought the situation was detrimental to mining development in the Yukon. Mr. Cole went into that question of four-post and two-post staking very fully, and I believe it is worth putting on record his recommendation and his conclusion on that score:

> In the final analysis the strongest argument used in favour of two-post staking is that it is better adapted to the rugged western terrain. In fact, it is about the only reasonable argument offered. That it is easy, simple and quick is hardly acceptable where a matter of acquiring title to mineral land is involved. And with changing conditions in the acquisition of mineral claims, the fact that the two-post method has been used for years does not measure up to modern needs. Nor is the four-post staking any more difficult to understand than the two-post method, although it must be admitted that it demands more work. All of which prompts the inclusion of a question asked by a prospector, "Do you want to do it right or do you want to do it easy?"

I am still quoting Mr. Cole's report:

I am of the opinion that four-post staking can be and should be used in the Yukon Territory despite the many areas of rugged terrain.

I am convinced further that if the prospecting fraternity of the Yukon accept the four-post staking as an endeavour to improve the prospector-purchaser relations in their territory, it should stimulate the interest of those financially able to develop the mineral resources of the Yukon, to the mutual advantage of all concerned.

The present Yukon Quartz Mining Act, section 26, has provisions for the staking out of a claim "in case it is found impossible, owing to the presence of water or other insurmountable obstacle to set post No. 2 in its proper position . . ." etc.

I am confident if study be made of this provision for witness posts then an effective plan can be devised for four-post staking.

However, some suggestion has been made that the two-post staking could be used in some areas and the four-post in others. This would not be a compromise, rather would it lead to more confusion.

In my opinion it is one method or the other, and I have expressed myself as being in favour of four-post staking.

The bill does not include a clause dealing with the method of staking. It will not be in the bill. This is, as the Cole report recommends, a procedural matter. However, as it is a question of importance I wish to make clear now what the Cole report says and what is the intention as to what will be the regulations and what will be in the new act.

The fifth recommendation of the Cole report had to do with the surveying of claims. I quote the recommendation:

I am of the opinion that the minister should have the right to demand that an unsurveyed claim be surveyed within a reasonable time—depending on the circumstances that may arise.

The new act will provide for this. The old act also provided for the same thing.

The sixth recommendation deals with the requirement to take out leases. The present act does not require leases to be taken out after any specified period or even before substantial mining operations occur. We do not believe it is satisfactory to have claims remaining simply as claims indefinitely. In his report Mr. Cole recommended:

A limit of ten years after the recording of a claim be set as that at which a claim holder should take out a lease.

And in order that those presently holding claims may be brought to comply with a time limit, such as may be applied to future claim holders, I would suggest further that present claim holders be given a period of ten years—from, say July 1, 1954 (or such other date as may be found advisable), to take out leases so that all claim holders may be on the same basis.

The bill will provide accordingly.

I have now given a brief summary of the recommendations of the Cole report. I have gone into them in detail because they form the basis of the proposed legislation. I wish to emphasize, however, that they are not simply the views of one man. Last night I cited the great experience of Mr. Cole, one of the best qualified men in Canada to give an expert opinion on these questions.

Mr. Simmons: May I interrupt the minister? What does Mr. Cole know about mining in the Yukon? I should like to know that.

Mr. Lesage: He has been concerned with mining in British Columbia and two or three other provinces. He made a special study of mining in the Yukon when he was appointed, with the approval of the member for Yukon, with whom Mr. Cole discussed the matter personally to his great satisfaction. The hon. member for Yukon expressed his dissatisfaction only when he noticed that Mr. Cole's report did not give expression to all his opinions on the matter.

Mr. Simmons: May I interrupt the minister? The minister intimates that I knew all about Mr. Cole's appointment long before the appointment was made. I did not know a thing about it until after the appointment was made. I did have an interview with Colonel Cole and found him to be a very fine gentleman, but I did not know at that time he was a proponent of four-post staking and a series of regulations without the stability of an act. I have changed my mind completely.

Mr. Lesage: I just wish to say that in making his report Mr. Cole did not do so as a proponent of four-post staking. His recommendations included four-post staking in the Yukon for the various reasons he gave in his report, not because he was a proponent but because after having studied the matter he felt that should be the method of staking in the Yukon and would be of great benefit there.

I do not want to enter into a discussion at this time. When the bill has been read the first time, distributed to interested parties and received second reading, I shall propose that it be sent to a committee where all interested parties can be heard and the matter can be discussed. I have an open mind. I do not believe I can be accused by anyone in the house of having anything but an open mind. I am open to conviction at all times.

What I wish to say, though, is that up to now I have not been convinced that Mr. Cole was wrong.

I also wish to emphasize that the views expressed by Mr. Cole are not the only ones on which we have relied. The department has received a great many representations on various subjects, and this is to the knowledge of some members of the house. As I said last night, in the session of 1953-54 a bill was presented to the house which would have brought quartz and placer mining in the Yukon under the regulations established under the Territorial Lands Act, as is the case in the Northwest Territories. Considerable opposition was voiced to that way of proceeding, and it was for the purpose of trying to break the deadlock that, after consulting people who know a lot about mining in Canada and my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, Mr. Cole was appointed to give an expert opinion. We now have the expert opinion and we believe it is sound.

Mr. Cole is not the only man who has advanced ideas, and the bill to be introduced follows the recommendations that have been made. That will be a very good basis on which the committee can go to work to consider these technical matters, and they can be discussed there without anyone getting mad at anybody else. I am concerned with what is in the best interests of the Yukon. That is really what we have at heart, and what we want to do is further the development of the Yukon. As I said, the views in the report have been adopted not only because they are those of Mr. Cole but also for other reasons, among them being the fact that they are in accord with mining experience elsewhere in Canada—

Mr. Herridge: Not in British Columbia.

Mr. Lesage: No?

Mr. Herridge: No.

Mr. Lesage: —and also in the northwestern states of the United States and Alaska where, as an example, you not only have four-post staking but six or seven-post staking.

Mr. Herridge: They want to change to the British Columbia system.

Mr. Lesage: Some may like to change but others do not want to change. It is a very difficult question and one that I believe should be discussed in the committee where expert advice can be had. That is why I shall propose later that the bill be sent to a committee. It is a highly technical matter and really one for committee discussion.

[Mr. Lesage.]

I leave the Cole report for the moment because it dealt only with a few matters of major policy. There are also a number of other provisions of the existing law which require modification. Apart from matters referred to in the report, the following are the principal new provisions in the proposed legislation. First, miners' licences will be required before claims can be staked and held. These are not now required. I discussed this matter with various persons, including my friends from the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines two weeks ago, and they agree with the proposal. That is at least one point on which we agree. There will be annual renewal of these licences, and free licences will be given to people who have prospected or owned claims in the Yukon for 25 years.

Mr. Simmons: They all have long beards already, without waiting 25 years.

Mr. Lesage: This provision is to please the member for Yukon. Second, the size of claims would be reduced from 51·6 acres to 40 acres.

Mr. Green: This is to be in the regulations?

Mr. Lesage: No, this will be in the act. Only strictly procedural matters will be covered by the regulations.

Mr. Simmons: But smaller claims will create far more fractions, and I thought that was what you were trying to get away from.

Mr. Lesage: I cannot agree with that for various reasons that I am ready to discuss at any time with the hon. member, but I do not believe we should take up the time of the house with such technical matters. The bill will go to a committee and I believe we can have a very good discussion there. But it is my duty to say what are the principles of the bill to be introduced. The number of claims that may be staked would be increased from 8 to 12. The reason for the change is to get claims to a size that will facilitate the preparation of claim sheets and maps, and make available to prospectors up to date information as to what land is open for staking.

The new claims will be 40 acres, and that has a great advantage to it. The sides of claims will be 1,320 feet, which means a quarter of a mile by a quarter of a mile, so if you take four claims together it will represent an area half a mile square. You do not run into fractions of acres. You can have fractions of miles, but they are divided evenly. Another advantage is that most claim sheets and mining maps are on an inch scale and the change will assist in recording and mapping claims.

A third provision will have to do with the staking of additional claims where a discovery claim is located in a new area. This will be new to the Yukon. The purpose is to provide added incentive for the prospecting of new areas. A fourth aspect of the bill, not dealt with in Mr. Cole's recommendations, will provide that the amount of representation work to be done yearly on claims will be increased from $100 to $200. The $100 figure was set quite a number of years ago, in 1898. Surely, sir, work which was worth $100 in 1898 is worth more than $200 today.

Mr. Simmons: That is a good way to drive the little prospectors out of the country.

Mr. Lesage: The figure is certainly much too low. Let us see what is done elsewhere. The other provinces require much more work. In Newfoundland, for instance, it is 40 eight-hour days; in Nova Scotia, 80 days' work; in New Brunswick 45 days' work; in Quebec, 25 days' work for the first year; in Ontario, 40 days' work. Taking into account the higher prices in the Yukon, the requirement as to representation work in the Yukon is now the lowest in Canada.

Mr. Simmons: May I just interject—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Simmons: I have a note here which says that many prospectors feel there is a move on foot to put the individual prospector out of business by means of these unwelcome changes, such as the requirement for $200 worth of assessment work.

Mr. Lesage: I do not believe the hon. member will contend that if the requirement of $100 worth of work in 1898 did not drive the individual prospectors out of business, $200 worth will do it today. After all, $200 worth today represents much less work than $100 worth in 1898. Perhaps the hon. member is right, but the advice I received was that persons holding claims should not be able to simply sit on them.

Mr. Simmons: I do not think they do sit on them.

Mr. Lesage: I believe the $200 requirement will restore the work requirement to something like the amount which was involved when the act was passed in 1924, at which time it was left at $100 which was the figure established in 1898.

Now there will be an additional provision. Credit for representation work done prior to the recording will be allowed up to the value of $400. The sections respecting geological and geophysical work have been clarified, and credit of up to 10 years will be allowed, whereas it is now only three years. Finally, the royalty clause has been revised to take into account developments in mining and administrative practice in recent years. The general effect of this will be to reduce the royalty requirements slightly, which should assist mining in the Yukon.

I have given some of the more important changes that will be embodied in the new legislation. The bill will be quite lengthy, but I repeat that all substantive rights will be protected. The matter is complicated. As I said a few moments ago, in order to give a full opportunity to study the bill as well as a full opportunity for interested parties to present their views, at the appropriate time I shall propose that the bill be referred to the select standing committee on mines, forests and waters.

In the committee I intend also to bring forward the proposed regulations, which is not customary, in order that we may have a complete picture of the whole question and so all interested parties may make representations. Then the interested parties and members of parliament will together be able to provide the kind of mining law for the Yukon that will really be in the interests of the development of the Yukon. If we have to amend the bill, we will amend it.

Mr. Simmons: The minister has painted a very rosy picture, Mr. Chairman, of how this proposed legislation will benefit mineral resources development in the Yukon Territory, but I emphatically do not agree with him. It is quite evident that the government intend to introduce a bill that will completely revise the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, notwithstanding the fact that numerous protests and representations have been made by the mining fraternity and the people of the Yukon Territory for the retention of the present act, with a few minor amendments to bring it up to date.

Mr. Lesage: Not the people, but some people.

Mr. Simmons: It is all the same in the long run.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I wonder if I might ask the hon. member what he means by "the mining fraternity"?

Mr. Simmons: I mean the mining industry in general; prospectors, mining scouts, engineers, everyone connected with the mining fraternity.

Mr. Byrne: And the miners' union?

Mr. Simmons: Yes, and the miners' union, too, if you want to know that. Let us take a look at the wording of this resolution. It seems to me it is very misleading. In other words, it is a lot of eyewash so far as I can see. Listen to it. It is all right to laugh now, but listen to this:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to repeal the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, chapter 301 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and to make provision by means of a new act for all substantive rights relating to quartz mining in the Yukon, including the rights to stake and acquire mineral claims and leases, and to provide for certain modifications in the administration of the law.

I should like to impress upon hon. members that the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act contains all the substantive rights and protection, including the right to stake and acquire mineral claims and leases. The crux of the resolution is contained in the last two lines, which read:

> . . . and to provide for certain modifications in the administration of the law.

That is the catch. Let me tell you, it does not pull the wool over my eyes. This most certainly means that we are going to have distasteful legislation forced upon us by the arbitrary enactment of a series of regulations, some of them covering procedures, as the minister just said, which will take away from the stability of the act. I am inclined to believe that the minister has been hoodwinked or ill-advised by his departmental officials, some of whom have probably never been in the Yukon unless possibly for a day or two on a Cook's tour.

Mr. Herridge: Never staked a claim.

Mr. Simmons: To be honest with you, I doubt if some of them would know the difference between a frying pan and a gold pan. For the last four years they have been trying to force distasteful legislation upon us.

Mr. Gillis: That is true of all mining.

Mr. Simmons: I am sorry to have to take this stand in opposition to the minister, for whom the people of the Yukon have a high respect. It is quite obvious that the proposed legislation will be based on the recommendations contained in the Cole report. A few comments on the Cole report might, therefore, be interesting and timely.

As the minister said last evening, last year Colonel George E. Cole of Winnipeg, Manitoba, was appointed by this government to report on matters concerning the administration of quartz and placer mining in the Yukon Territory. In his report dated Winnipeg, Manitoba, June 18, 1954, he makes five main recommendations. I shall just summarize these briefly, Mr. Chairman:

1. That to a large extent the Yukon Quartz Mining Act be eliminated and a series of regulations substituted therefor.

2. Areas of the Yukon Territory should not be withdrawn from ordinary staking to grant reservations or concessions.

We agree with him entirely on this point.

3. A system of four-post staking similar to that now in effect in eastern Canada and Alaska should replace the existing two-post, single line method now in effect in the Yukon and British Columbia.

4. A time limit should be set within which a claim owner must have his mineral claim surveyed.

5. A claim holder should be compelled to take out a lease within a reasonable period of time.

Colonel Cole suggests a limit of 10 years after the mineral claim has been recorded.

In all fairness, at the outset I might say that Colonel Cole is held in high esteem not only for his personal qualities but also for his many years of service to the mining industry. While holding my personal respect and admiration for Colonel Cole, I feel I would be remiss in my responsibilities if I did not state frankly my opposition to certain of his recommendations, which were probably preconceived by officials of this same department. In doing so I feel assured I am expressing the views of an overwhelming majority of people domiciled in the Yukon Territory.

These recommendations are most objectionable to at least 95 per cent of the people associated with prospecting and mining development in the Yukon Territory. Surely it is not the intention of the government to proceed with legislation that is contrary to the wishes of the great majority of the mining fraternity. I am most emphatically in agreement with the submissions of the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines, the Yukon territorial council, chambers of commerce, boards of trade and others.

Mr. Lesage: I am sorry to interrupt, but while the Yukon council did not agree completely with Mr. Cole's report, they did not object to the whole report.

Mr. Simmons: I shall bring that up later and read the resolution into the record.

In order to acquaint the house with the wishes of the various organizations and the people in the Yukon Territory I am going to quote several telegrams and letters I have received on the subject. These letters and telegrams will support my view that no changes in the present act, without the knowledge and against the wishes of the united interests of the mining industry in the Yukon Territory, should be made. In other words we do not like to see an acceleration of the trend away from democratic procedure.

Mr. Herridge: You represent the people.

Mr. Simmons: That is what I intend to do.

Mr. Sinclair: Beware of Greeks bearing gifts.

Mr. Simmons: Let me answer the interjection by the hon. member for Kootenay West by quoting the words of Tennyson:

> Because right is right, to follow right
> Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence.

Here is a telegram from Frank E. Woodside, manager of the British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines. It is as follows:

> Understand mining bill based on Cole report will be introduced shortly. One hundred per cent Yukon Territory prospectors favour present two-post staking method. Four-post method in Yukon definitely impractical. All prospectors absolutely opposed governing by regulations and strongly favour mining acts. Present Yukon Quartz Mining Act with few minor amendments considered most satisfactory. Prospectors would like to know what few people endeavouring force through these regulations against wishes practical Yukon mining people. Urge you do everything possible prevent passing this very unpopular legislation.

Mr. Herridge: You will get lots of help.

Mr. Simmons: Here is one signed by A. R. Hayes, Speaker of the Yukon territorial council. It will be understood that the Yukon territorial council is an elected body. In other words this resolution is the voice of the Yukon. It reads as follows:

> Whereas the Cole report has been widely read and studied by the people of the Yukon Territory and has met with great disapproval; and whereas the criticism of this report written by Dr. William V. Smitheringale has been given wide publicity throughout the territory and in the opinion of the council has met with the approval of the people of the territory:
> Now therefore be it resolved:
> That we, the Yukon territorial council now in session, strongly urge that the Hon. Jean Lesage, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, place before the members of the House of Commons and have consideration given to the proposals of Dr. Smitheringale as set out in his submitted brief on the Cole report.

I have copies of Dr. Smitheringale's criticism of the Cole report. I would be glad to send a copy to anyone wishing to have it.

Mr. Green: Was that resolution passed unanimously?

Mr. Simmons: Yes, unanimously; but that does not mean anything to the people over there. Then here is one from the Whitehorse board of trade:

> Whitehorse board of trade has passed the following resolution condemning the Cole report and recommending Dr. Smitheringale's criticism and recommendations also that present Yukon Quartz Mining Act be retained with minor amendments as this act worked to the satisfaction of the mining fraternity since 1924. We are therefore opposed to four-post staking and regulations in any form as proposed in the Cole report.

Then I have a lengthy letter from the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines. I do not wish to take up too much time in debate, so I shall quote only the concluding paragraph which says:

> Our executive committee feels confident that by far the majority of prospectors and mining companies active in the Yukon Territory are satisfied with the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act. No one appears to know just who the persons are that desire to scrap this "time tested" act for a series of regulations that are unwelcome among the prospectors and company scouts. Our committee realizes that from time to time certain minor amendments, such as one now required for use of cairns instead of posts in certain areas, are necessary, but see no reason for any radical changes in the Yukon mining laws. May we point out that prospecting and mining development are more active in the Yukon than ever before, with large numbers of new prospectors and mining companies entering that territory each year. We believe it would be most unwise for the department to take any drastic action in respect to mining laws that would discourage the existing enthusiasm and well laid plans for future development of that territory's rich mineral resources.

I have many more communications along the same lines, but I do not wish to take the time to place them on record in full. However, I must point out that the government has been made well aware of the wishes of the people in the Yukon in connection with this matter.

They sent Colonel Cole to the Yukon last summer to make an inquiry. What did he do? Well, he reported to the minister to the effect that the mining industry were quite happy with the Yukon Placer Mining Act, "so leave it alone." He also intimated that the people were quite happy with the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, but that they did not know what was good for them, "so change it."

Did you ever see such contradictory advice? On the one hand he recommended that the department should leave the placer mining act alone because the people of the Yukon were happy with it. On the other hand, although the people were happy with the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, he recommended that it should be changed, and this contrary to the wishes of the people and of the mining industry.

Why is it then, if it is reasonable to conform to public opinion on placer mining operations, that it is not also reasonable to conform to public opinion on quartz mining matters?

I might say that the statements contained in Dr. Smitheringale's report have been widely accepted by the mining fraternity. Dr. Smitheringale is a geologist and mining engineer with many years of practical experience in the Yukon as compared with Colonel Cole's record of experience, which is more confined to legislative matters. The people of the Yukon Territory cannot understand why the government would accept the Cole report as a basis for making changes in our Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

The suggested changes in the act made by Colonel Cole, and the comments on his suggestions, together with the opinions of Dr. William V. Smitheringale of Vancouver and Whitehorse, have been carefully studied by everyone concerned, and it is the considered opinion that Dr. Smitheringale's conclusions are basically sound and should be followed. Dr. Smitheringale knows the country, the people and the problems associated with the mining industry and is held in high esteem. We have every confidence in his integrity and ability.

Mr. Lesage: His employers do not agree with you.

Mr. Simmons: I do not care what his employers say, the fact is the people back him up 100 per cent.

Mr. Lesage: His employers in the mining industry.

Mr. Simmons: You must realize that there is one company up there trying to get the mining laws changed and that is the reason.

It is agreed that some minor amendments are required to the existing act. However, there appears to be no necessity to scrap an excellent act that is most popular among the large number of prospectors and other mining people. It is felt that the wishes and opinions of the large majority of practical mining people active in the Yukon should be considered and that the proposed legislation along the lines of Colonel Cole's recommendations should be reconsidered.

It is the considered and practically unanimous opinion that the granting of reservations or concessions of mineral lands in the Yukon Territory, the arbitrary enactment of four-post staking and repeal of the present two-post staking, the endorsement of compulsory surveys of mineral claims and compulsory applications for leases would be contrary to the true spirit of free enterprise, resulting in unjustifiable hardships to the prospecting and mining fraternity domiciled in the Yukon and in several years of confusion, uncertainty and frustration. Therefore, in my opinion, any proposed legislative action should be confined to amendments to the existing act.

[Mr. Simmons.]

I find it difficult to reconcile certain aspects of Colonel Cole's investigation. For example, why was he selected for this task and who made the selection? Without reflecting in any way on his proven integrity and ability, it is a fact nevertheless that he has indicated in his tenure of office with the Manitoba department of mines that he long has been a proponent of four-post staking and regulations rather than the stability of an act.

Further, why select an individual from one of the only three areas of Canada where mining is administered under regulations rather than someone from the several provinces where at least 90 per cent of metal mining is done and where mining administration under an act has been well proven. Better still, why not an individual from the area involved in such investigation?

Two-post staking is a time-tested, proven and entirely adequate method of establishing claims in such mountainous areas as British Columbia and the Yukon. I am surprised that Alaska should be cited by Colonel Cole as an illustration of the practicability of four-post or seven-post staking.

We are all aware that this is simply a direct and natural extension of the practice within the United States and, unfortunately, is practically impossible to change now. It might well be noted in this connection that these laws were inherited in part originally from the Spanish and are widely admitted by United States authorities to be most unsatisfactory and, in fact, almost unworkable.

Surely under these circumstances we can well afford to look to Alaskan practice as evidence in support of two-post staking. It might also be noted that there is currently a very strong sentiment among the mining fraternity of Alaska for a change in the method of staking.

In spite of the kindly sentiment expressed in regard to the prospector there seems little hesitation in burdening him with considerable unnecessary work and expense in four-post staking. In this matter also Colonel Cole's opinion disregards the will of the majority entirely.

If some of these four-post proponents would refer to Dent's Canadian School Atlas of 1940 they would see some very fine reference maps of the Canadian provinces which were compiled by the Edinburgh Geographical Institute. These relief maps show that the greater part of Manitoba and all of Ontario and the greater part of Quebec have elevations of 2,000 feet or less.

Compare these elevations with the topography of western Alberta, British Columbia and Yukon Territory. I might point out, Mr. Chairman, that Kluane lake in the Yukon has an elevation of 2,525 feet above sea level while mount Logan not far to the southwest of lake Kluane has an elevation of 19,850 feet. Or step clear across the Yukon to Frances lake, the elevation of which is 2,000 feet, and from the head of the east arm of this lake one may walk to the summit which has an elevation of around 9,000 feet.

How would some of these four-post proponents like to put four posts on the top of it? It would, no doubt, teach them to be more sympathetic and considerate of their fellow man.

Whatever the geographical and topographical aspects may be in eastern Canada it is certain that in the Yukon and in British Columbia these conditions are such as to make four-post staking a practical impossibility.

If anyone has ever staked claims in mountainous country they will be forced to admit it would be virtually impossible to stake out four corners of a claim with any degree of accuracy. Even in a flat country like Ontario claims are by no means square, or even of any particular shape.

All one has to do to verify this statement is to look over a claim map of some of the older districts, say Kirkland Lake for instance. It is at least 1,000 times more difficult to set out a square in the mountainous areas of British Columbia or the Yukon. With two-post staking and a reasonably accurate map as a guide one can pretty well tell the location of any claim.

The four or seven-post staking required in Alaska was cited. The complaints one hears about this method in Alaska and in the western states, where similar requirements are in force, would certainly lead one to the conclusion that stakers would much prefer the two-post method of British Columbia or the Yukon.

Some of Colonel Cole's objections to two-post staking are really amusing. It is infinitely simpler to run a survey along one boundary if overstaking has occurred than to have to run four boundaries of each claim to determine just how much overlap has occurred. Further, if his fear of fractions is as great as indicated, then all that is required is to stake out one of each four claims as a fractional claim to begin with, and claim all open ground up to 60 acres.

Colonel Cole does not differentiate between legitimate staking and wildcat staking. During a boom anyone who purchases claims for more than a nominal sum without first of all having a survey of some kind run deserves to lose his money. Sorting out holdings staked out under the two-stake per claim method is easier, cheaper and quicker than with four posts as he suggests. Even under boom conditions, a prospector always knows the discovery he has made is covered by his claims when staking by the two-post method. In almost every case he will stake along the strike, throwing a claim each side of his location line. If he follows along the outcrops he will not let any showings escape him. He would be a poor staker if he wandered over 1,500 feet from the strike of the deposit or deposits he is staking in that same distance.

As a rule the original discoverer of any mine receives little or nothing for his labours, probably having had to sell out long before he should have done owing to economic stresses. Then—and this has never yet been made clear—who are those interested who desire revision of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, and who wish to force upon us four-post staking, regulations, compulsory surveys and compulsory applications for leases? Naturally, I am puzzled about the mysterious "easterners". There seems to be an implication that the two-post system is causing "easterners" to withhold from participation in new found exploration and mining. What a joke!

Perhaps the following companies, who are or who have been active in the Yukon Territory, are not included as "easterners" such as Con West, Ventures-Frobisher, Noranda, Teck-Hughes, Prospectors Airways, Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, Newmont—

Mr. Lesage: Most of them are in favour of four-post staking.

Mr. Simmons: No, I have letters from practically every one of them, and I can prove it.

Mr. Lesage: So have I. What about Prospectors Airways?

Mr. Simmons: There is one man in that. Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, New Jersey Zinc, Kennecott, Anaconda, American Smelting and Refining Company, American Metals Company, Trans-Continental Resources, Newkirk interests, Karl Springer interests and many more too numerous to mention.

No doubt there are certain minor amendments which will benefit the existing act, as for example I am unable to determine from the existing act how protection can be secured for a vein striking out under a lake more than two claims wide. There seems to be no provision for witnessing a submerged claim such as there is for claims in British Columbia and some other provinces. I am of the opinion that certain minor changes in the existing act would be practical and justified, but there is absolutely no adequate reason for the introduction of regulations covering procedure in place of the act, or the entire changing of the existing method of claim locations, as recommended by Colonel Cole.

There are a few comments that may be made regarding Mr. Cole's suggestion that a claim must be surveyed within a certain length of time. It is my feeling no survey should be required as long as the annual assessment work is being done. In nearly all areas, particularly in the Yukon, most claim holders are far removed from others, except in a few of the more developed areas. It is far more important to find an ore body than to have a survey run. Further, surveys are expensive, and the average prospector does not have funds available for that kind of work, but is well able to handle his assessment work as it consists largely of his own labour. To have a claim surveyed in the Yukon would cost about $500 per claim, the equivalent of five years' assessment work, and the claim owner only gets credit for one year's work. If they are going to reduce the size of our claims, it is going to cost a prospector much more. I cannot understand it at all.

Such a requirement would be confiscatory as far as the average prospector goes. If the claims are of sufficient value, then the purchasers from the prospector will see they are surveyed to protect themselves. It is obvious this suggestion is ill-advised as, in some particular cases, it would force the prospector to abandon his claims. Surely the government does not want to see the prospector being forced to abandon his claim.

An hon. Member: It looks as if they do.

Mr. Simmons: The British Columbia and Ontario acts are by far the most definite acts of their kind now in force. Very few discretionary powers are left to the whims and fancies of government officials, and even those powers are sometimes abused. These acts have been in force over many years and have been tested and proven sound. These acts should be compared to the one in New Brunswick, where the minister of mines is empowered to do anything he desires at his discretion, there being no recourse to his actions. That feature of the New Brunswick act has scared and is scaring capital away from that province, and is doing more and more harm as time goes on. We do not want such a condition in the Yukon.

[Mr. Simmons.]

Prospectors should not be discouraged in any way. Almost without exception some prospector makes the first strike in a new district, and often where the so-called experts of various kinds state emphatically that such an element or mineral could not be found.

Mr. Herridge: The officials of the provincial department did that in the Salmon river valley.

Mr. Simmons: From that point on geologists, geophysicists and others take over. Regardless of scientific developments the prospector will always have a very important part in mine development and should be encouraged in every way possible. If this new bill comes into force, I am afraid it will discourage many prospectors.

Mr. Lesage: You have not seen it yet.

Mr. Simmons: I do not care if I never see it, to be honest with you.

Mr. Lesage: When you see the act you will have to withdraw most of the things you have just said.

Mr. Simmons: I think I can read it off by heart now, though I have never seen it. The only bright spot in the recommendations contained in the Cole report is where it is recommended that areas in the Yukon Territory should not be withdrawn from ordinary staking to grant reservations or concessions. We agree and are pleased to support him in his stand that reservations or concessions should not be granted. Granting concessions to induce capital to develop the country is not required, and would undoubtedly prove detrimental. The minister in his remarks mentioned something about the Pine Point concession. How many of these concessions are applied for and developed?

An hon. Member: They are still waiting.

Mr. Simmons: They are still waiting. In most cases all that is ever done with a concession is to give it "a lick and a promise". If the first results are not satisfactory the officials of large companies lose heart, and are generally afraid to ask for further funds, the net result being large areas are damned outright or with faint praise, and are eliminated from the possible areas others will look over. Concessions would hog the mineral potentialities of the country to the detriment of individual prospectors and syndicates. Concessions always tend to hold back rather than to encourage prospecting and the discovery of new deposits.

For many years past mining in the Yukon Territory has been administered under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act. The people of the Yukon have been very happy with these acts which have been kept up to date with modern developments by occasional amending acts of parliament. This has meant that all proposed changes in mining legislation have been brought out into the open and have been thoroughly discussed by members of this house. The people of the Yukon want their mining laws administered under acts wherein any proposed changes would be presented to and discussed in parliament. There is general agreement that some further minor amendments should be made in the present act in order to deal with problems which have come to light in recent years. But the people are unanimous in their desire to have our mining laws governed by an act and not by regulations in any degree.

Let us go back into some history of how this happy state of affairs occurred, because things were not always so happy in the Yukon prior to 1924 when our mining laws were administered by regulations under orders in council. Back in 1898 mining matters in the Yukon were administered by regulations passed by orders in council. This procedure caused so much dissatisfaction with and resentment of the administration of mining that in 1900 Mr. Justice Britton of the supreme court of Ontario was sent to the Yukon to study placer mining problems. As a result of the consideration given to the problems at that time the Yukon Placer Mining Act was enacted in 1906. This act has given entire satisfaction. There are no regulations under this act.

Perhaps I should explain that at that time placer mining was the dominant industry and held the centre of interest in the Yukon Territory, and that people did not become interested in quartz mining until after 1906 when quartz mining continued to be administered under regulations. I might also mention the fact that there was very little interest in quartz mining at that time in the Northwest Territories, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

Another point of interest is that there was throughout Canada general dissatisfaction with the administration of mining matters by regulations and under orders in council. This dissatisfaction was so widespread that the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy presented a brief to the government in 1910 advocating the administration of mining laws by means of an act of parliament.

As a result the Canada mines act was prepared for the twelfth Canadian parliament upon principles advocated by that institution, and was introduced in this house in 1912. Had that act passed there would have been no necessity for the Yukon Quartz Mining Act which was enacted in 1924. Unfortunately the Canada mines act of 1912 was not passed.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, is that for over 50 years the people of Canada who are interested in developing the mineral resources of this country, wherever they may be, have advocated the administration of mining laws under acts of parliament—and have always been opposed to the instability created by administration under regulations —so that today mining matters in all provinces where there is any degree of mining activity, such as Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, administer their mining laws under acts of provincial parliaments.

Let us now go back to the Yukon Territory and see what happened to quartz mining there. As I told you previously there was very little activity in quartz mining in 1906 when the Yukon Placer Mining Act was passed, so there was no great concern whether quartz mining was administered under an act of parliament or under regulations which could be changed overnight without the foreknowledge or approval of the mining industry. However, the quartz mining industry was soon due for a decided change and acceleration in pace. It picked up rapidly and public dissatisfaction with and resentment of administration by regulations and orders in council developed. Public feeling and resentment to this unhappy state of affairs developed to such an extent that in 1924 the mining industry in general became dissatisfied, distrustful and aroused by administration by regulations so that the Liberal government of the day allowed an opposition member, the Hon. George Black, to sponsor the Yukon Quartz Mining Act—a highly popular and time-tested act—which was approved by parliament. There is no provision for the arbitrary enactment of regulations under this act, something for which we are truly thankful. That is the way we want to keep it.

Despite all this history, not only in the Yukon Territory but throughout the provinces, of public disapproval and resentment of the administration of mining matters by regulations, and the almost universal desire to have mining matters stabilized under acts of parliament, the government has apparently decided that it knows much better about what is good for the mining industry in the Yukon than does the industry itself. What did it do? In 1952 the government brought in a bill to repeal both the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act. This bill was introduced in the other place but it died in the House of Commons. Since then

I am sure it has been realized that the proposed repeal of those two acts was a mistake.

The intention was to extend the Northwest Territories mining regulations to the Yukon Territory. This bill was introduced without my knowledge and without consulting anyone in the Yukon Territory. In other words, the people of the Yukon were going to take this dose of medicine whether they liked it or not. Fortunately this bill died in the house. I say "fortunately" because I cannot conceive how any action could have been more highhanded, unpopular and undemocratic.

Let me again emphasize the fact that in 1952 the government intended to repeal both the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. Now it intends to leave the Yukon Placer Mining Act alone, while it still obstinately continues to insist on forcing upon us distasteful legislation by completely revising our Yukon quartz mining laws, because that is what this proposed legislation intends to do. Why it is being done is beyond my comprehension and, as you must have gathered, it is against my advice and the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the people of the Yukon.

The Yukon Quartz Mining Act, passed in 1924, has been an admirable act.

Mr. Lesage: That is your opinion.

Mr. Simmons: It certainly is. It has been, it is yet and it always will be. It was framed with the assistance and the advice of the mining fraternity—both the prospectors and mining companies—and it has met the situation peculiar to the Yukon. We must remember that the Yukon is different topographically from any other section of Canada except the province of British Columbia. It was therefore natural that the Yukon Quartz Mining Act should follow the pattern which had been developed for British Columbia, and with which the prospectors were thoroughly familiar.

In the Yukon Territory mining is an old industry and the prospectors and miners and people working in it have developed over the years, by trial and error and the sweat of their brows, and experience in the conditions peculiar to the territory, a set of mining laws which they know and understand, and with which they are generally satisfied. I am sure that all hon. members can plainly see why they are reluctant to have our mining laws tampered with.

In any legislation which we pass with a view to assisting mining resources development, we must be sure that annoying details of legislation are eliminated. In these days when there is so much criticism of legislation by regulations it is easy to understand why the Yukon people, who have been quite satisfied with the Yukon quartz and placer mining acts, are reluctant to see any drastic amendments such as have been proposed to our mining laws on the recommendation of Colonel Cole. May I have leave of the house, Mr. Chairman, to continue for another three or four minutes?

Mr. McCulloch (Pictou): Just three.

Mr. Simmons: I could continue this all night, if necessary. I have all this material to make use of yet.

Mr. Lesage: You had better go on now because after seeing the bill you could not say the same thing. You had better say it now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Simmons: The mining fraternity does not want the lauded flexibility of regulations which can be changed overnight without their knowledge, and often to their detriment, in place of the stability of an act. I share their view that there is everything to be said in favour of retaining the present mining acts rather than administering our mining laws in part by regulations. Undoubtedly the retention of the present act, with slight amendments to bring it up to date, would be preferable and in the interests of mining resources development in the Yukon. The adoption of regulations in part, in lieu of the stability of an act, is certainly a retrograde step in our democratic form of government.

It is quite obvious, therefore, that as soon as we have sufficient population and industry the people in the territories will welcome self-government which will enable them to run their own affairs as they deem fit, and consistent with the wishes and needs of the people of the particular areas, rather than have forced upon them distasteful legislation which they do not wish to accept. Surely the government is not going to completely ignore the wishes of the people in this regard.

Amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act at the present time have to be submitted to parliament and so become known to the electors and to the people affected by them. If these laws are revised and regulations substituted in part for them, parliament cannot be consulted or informed as to what the government is doing and has no opportunity to approve, object or offer amendments. In other words, it will rob parliament of its power, and this will be most unpopular in the Yukon. Any part of the proposed new act providing for regulations will be most unsatisfactory as it is generally felt that the present act has been working satisfactorily for a number of years and that any changes necessary should be confined to the existing act rather than be made by a revision with enactment by regulations.

The Yukon Quartz Mining Act, as I have said before, is a very good one. With a few minor changes it is as good as, if not better than, any mining act in Canada, and the mining can be carried on very satisfactorily under it. Again let me reiterate that I am unequivocally opposed to regulations in any form in so far as they relate to our mining laws, as I believe in the business of the country being carried on under statutes as much as possible. We have heard very few complaints from prospectors or mine operators regarding our mining laws.

At the present time prospectors and mining development are more active in the Yukon than ever before, with quite a number of additional companies planning to operate in that area during the coming season. More and more prospectors are also looking to the Yukon as a favourable area in which to search for mineral deposits. The mining fraternity is entirely familiar with the Yukon Quartz Mining Act on the whole and are satisfied with its provisions and the protection it affords them. So why change it? To my way of thinking the present act is a pretty fair mining act, far better than it would be if altered to suit Mr. Cole's way of thinking, which leads me to believe that the less some government officials have to do with administering our mining laws by regulations the better and more smoothly business can be carried on.

There are a few government officials who do not have any grasp of the true conditions of business, and certainly not of prospecting or mining. They fall into two types, those who become very arbitrary and insist on deciding everything according to their personal views, or those who are afraid to make any decisions. The present act is pretty definite on almost all subjects and should, therefore, not be altered to give officials more discretionary powers, for that can only lead to abuse. The administration of the mining laws in the Yukon prior to 1924 will bear me out in these views.

I cannot conscientiously support this resolution, Mr. Chairman, against the wishes of the people of the Yukon who are bitterly opposed to the recommendations contained in the Cole report as a basis for any proposed drastic changes in our mining laws. The prospecting and mining industry must be safeguarded and unhampered by mandatory orders emanating several thousand miles distant from the scene of mining operations in the territory. I have refrained from extreme statements as I do not wish anything I have said to be interpreted as meaning that I am personally hostile to the minister presenting the resolution.

An hon. Member: Do not be too timid.

Mr. Simmons: I do wish, however, to reiterate my determined opposition to the proposed new act for the reasons given.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we have listened to a remarkable speech, and I am very happy to associate myself—

Mr. Dechene: Undoubtedly.

Mr. Green: —with the stand taken by the hon. member for the Yukon. He has been here since 1949; in the first parliament in which he served he was the member not only for the Yukon but also for the Northwest Territories. Therefore he also has a knowledge of mining conditions in the latter area as well as in the Yukon. Throughout his service as a member of parliament he has loyally supported the Liberal party. I do not believe there has been one occasion on which he has voted against his party. He may have done so on a minor matter but generally speaking he has been a loyal supporter of the Liberal party. Today he has had the courage to stand up and criticize this measure brought in by his own party.

Mr. Lesage: He does not even know what is in the bill.

Mr. Green: He deserves the respect and not the laughter and scorn of members of the house. Some members on the government side think this is a laughing matter. Here you have an hon. member who has stood up and spoken for his people regardless of the stand of his party.

Mr. Dechene: Oh, oh!

Mr. Green: Oh, go on back to Athabaska.

Mr. Dechene: I will come back.

Mr. Green: For that he deserves respect. He certainly has mine.

Mr. Dechene: You do not need to insult anybody.

Mr. Green: I am sure he will have the respect of the people of Canada at large. He is not in the position of members representing a province. There are, for example, 22 members from British Columbia. This hon. member alone represents one group of people; he represents the Yukon Territory. The government should listen to his views. I am amazed that the minister would introduce a resolution, as he has done on this occasion, against the views, wishes and advice of the hon. member for the Yukon. What on earth have we got left of representative government when that can happen?

Furthermore, the hon. member has pointed out that he is supported by a unanimous vote of the Yukon territorial council. There, we have a council that is entirely elected, chosen by the people of the Yukon and not appointed by Ottawa, as was the case until a very short time ago. The Yukon territorial council has met and taken exactly the same stand as the hon. member for the Yukon. Yet, their recommendations are to be ignored by this dictatorial government.

Let me point out to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources the coincidence that just a year or two ago this department of northern affairs was set up and attention was focused on northern Canada. Yet here today you have the minister bringing in a measure in defiance of the wishes of the people of the oldest part of northern Canada.

Mr. Lesage: For the good of the Yukon; that is what we are doing.

Mr. Green: Just a few days ago, on May 13, the hon. member for Kootenay West asked the minister about certain motor vehicle ordinances that had been given effect to in the Yukon. The question and answer can be found at page 3776 of Hansard for May 13. On that occasion the minister was in favour of the independence of the Yukon territorial council. I quote first what the hon. member for Kootenay West said:

> Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that you put me in order. I have been asked to bring to the minister's attention certain motor vehicle ordinances that have been given effect in the Yukon.
> Mr. Lesage: On a point of order; I am sorry, but this involves a territorial ordinance and I have nothing to say about it. There is autonomy in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

There is not much autonomy in the minister's attitude here.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Green: I am making my speech.

Mr. Lesage: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe the hon. member who is now speaking can say that I have changed my mind, because the other day when I rose on a point of order the hon. member who was questioning me was dealing with a matter under the jurisdiction of the local council, whereas the natural resources of the Yukon Territory are under the jurisdiction of parliament and have to be administered by this government.

The Deputy Chairman: I may say at this moment that I do not feel the point of order raised by the minister is a point of order. I think it is one of the many we have before us which really come under the heading of personal explanation, and that except in cases of very obvious misinterpretation of one's remarks these points should be withheld until the conclusion of the speech by the hon. member who has the floor.

There is a point of order worrying me at the moment which I draw to the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It is the prohibition against quoting in one debate on one subject in this house any argument from another debate of the same session. I would ask the hon. member to make his argument without quoting from another debate in the same session.

Mr. Green: I am quoting from a discussion of the estimates having to do with the Yukon Territory. I submit I am in order in quoting that on this resolution which deals also with the Yukon Territory. It is not as though I were quoting from a different debate; I am quoting from a discussion of the estimates.

I repeat, the minister said this:

> There is autonomy in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to perhaps appear stubborn, but I cannot agree that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is in order in quoting from a debate on the estimates, even though it was on the estimates of this department, a matter relative to automotive transport, and using this argument in the same session on a resolution dealing with an amendment or repeal of the quartz mining act. I am sure the hon. member can make this argument without going that far.

Mr. Green: Well, I will not quote, Mr. Chairman. I merely say this. On an earlier occasion the minister defended himself by taking the position that he would not interfere with what was done by a regulation of the territorial council. Today, on this other measure, he is taking the position that he will not listen to the Yukon territorial council; he is ignoring the stand that they have taken on this question. If there is to be democracy in the Yukon, as there is in the rest of Canada, then I suggest that the hon. member for the Yukon and the members of the territorial council are the ones whose advice should have been taken on this question and not the recommendation of an engineer from Manitoba.

The hon. member for the Yukon has read extracts from letters from the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines. Some hon. members might wonder why it is that there is a chamber of mines that deals with mining both in British Columbia and in the Yukon. The reason is that there is the closest association between miners in British Columbia and in the Yukon Territory. The territory was opened largely by prospectors and miners from British Columbia. The hon. member for Yukon, himself, is a native son of British Columbia. Until the construction of the Alaska highway all the traffic to the Yukon went up the west coast from Vancouver, Victoria, and the other coastal ports and eventually got by rail from Skagway into the Yukon. The Alaska highway, too, starts in British Columbia and runs across the north-eastern portion of our province into the Yukon Territory. Air connection to the Yukon is also made from Vancouver, although there is in addition an air service from Edmonton into the territory.

In mining matters British Columbia and the Yukon have been closely associated for the last half century, and that is why they have this chamber of mines dealing with problems facing the miners in the two areas. As the hon. member has said, the topography of the Yukon and of British Columbia is much the same. The highest mountains in Canada, I believe, are in the Yukon Territory. They are far higher than those in British Columbia.

Many years ago, about the turn of the century, the British Columbia legislature placed on the statute books a mineral act which was a codification of mining laws, and it has been eminently satisfactory ever since. Before that mineral act became law there was litigation of all kinds over mining claims. In fact, most of the litigation in the province had to do with mining. But once that act was placed on the statute books, mining litigation fell away, with the result that since that time the lawyers have had a hard time making any money out of mining disputes in my province.

There have been no regulations under that act; everything is written into the act. It refers to the method of staking and the other details in connection with staking—everything is written into the act. And as the hon. member for Yukon has said, Yukon adopted the same system some years ago. You see, one of the big difficulties about having regulations rather than having everything written into a statute is that those regulations may be interpreted one way today and another way tomorrow. Furthermore they may be changed. The cabinet may meet and decide to make a change, and this can be done. There is not the same difficulty in the matter of permanence and stability when the law is placed on the statute books, rather than having it in the form of regulations.

I do not think there is any doubt that the people of the Yukon feel as the hon. member has stated about the possibility of having part of the mineral law made up of regulations. When the bill introduced late in 1953 was under consideration a wire was received from the Hon. George Black who, as hon. members know, for many years represented the Yukon here in the House of Commons, as did also his charming wife, Martha Black. She was here from 1935 to 1940.

The Hon. Mr. Black had this to say about substituting orders in council for statute mining law in the Yukon:

> That will be most unsatisfactory to Yukon miners. It is reverting to dictatorship of early days.

Many members in the chamber this afternoon knew George Black, and most people in Canada know his record. I suggest his views on the subject should carry great weight, just as should the views of the hon. member who now represents the Yukon.

Mr. Lesage: They have carried weight.

Mr. Green: Well, nothing seems to have carried much weight in the minister's mind.

Mr. Lesage: Oh yes. You did not see the bill.

Mr. Green: I do not think much weight has been attached to Mr. Black's proposals because Mr. Cole has been able to ride roughshod over all such recommendations.

And that brings me to Mr. Cole's report, where he says that he is in favour of four-post staking. I might point out that in British Columbia we have had two-post staking since the enactment of our mineral act. Under that system a prospector can stake out eight claims by placing posts in five different spots. For example, for one claim he will put a stake at one side or one corner, and the next stake 1,500 feet away; then he can claim 1,500 feet out from those stakes. By putting two other stakes beside those two he can claim 1,500 feet in the opposite direction. The result is that he can stake eight claims with 16 stakes; but in order to do that he has to be in only five different spots on the mountainside.

On the other hand, under the four-stake system he would have to put a stake at every corner. Today the minister has mentioned groups of 12 claims. Under the two-stake system the prospector would have to drive in only 24 stakes, many of them driven beside each other, whereas if the four-stake system were used he would have to set out 48 stakes. So I say this is an extremely serious matter for prospectors, and it is extremely unfair that men in the Yukon should be forced to work under a system of that kind.

The reasons given by Mr. Cole for his recommendations are very enlightening, because I believe they go to the root of this whole matter. I turn to that portion of his report which bears the heading, "Two and four-post staking, which?" He says:

> This question proved to be the most contentious given to me for investigation. There is a marked division of opinion between the westerners and easterners as to the merits of the two methods . . .
> Those prospectors who had lived in British Columbia or the Yukon have grown up with two-post staking. Yet it is passing strange—

And I suggest the use of those very words in this man's report shows how biased he is all the way through. And he uses words of this kind at more than one place in his report—sarcastic, sneering words about any suggestion in favour of two-post staking. He says:

> Yet it is passing strange that in a terrain as rugged as either British Columbia or the Yukon, Alaska has held to the four-post method—or should it be referred to as "seven-post" for three more posts are required to designate the location line.

The hon. member for the Yukon has explained that the Alaska miners wish they did not have this seven-post staking system. Then Mr. Cole goes on to say:

> The westerner views his two-post method with a fervour almost vehement—

And again we see a sneering remark about these western prospectors.

> —and one at least has voiced his disregard to an eastern counterpart in the words, "If you don't like two-post staking out here you had better go back east."

What kind of statement was this for a responsible man to put in a report to the government? Then it goes on to say:

> However an easterner describes it this way, "If a prospector is selling claims that he hasn't got—"

And there again, another sneering remark, insinuating that these prospectors are trying to sell claims they do not own.

> "—the two-post staking is wonderful."

And then he goes on to say:

> Now the eastern exploration and development companies have moved into the Yukon in search of minerals. They are used to the four-line staking which prevails in all parts of Canada east of Alberta.

The hon. member for Yukon has given evidence today that practically all of these companies actually working in the Yukon are satisfied with the two-post staking system. Mr. Cole goes on to say:

> The easterner with the wherewithal—

And here come the money interests, the Toronto stock exchange, and so on—> —to carry on exploration and development is sensitive of the fact that the four-post staking has merits that the westerner fails to appreciate.

And then there is this remarkable paragraph, again showing his bias:

> Attention has already been directed to the fact that the money for exploration and development is coming from outside and particularly from the east. What are the points of contention that eastern interests desire to have settled? They feel that the four-post staking offers a measure of security of tenure that is lacking in the two-post staking. It is reasonable—

And here he is speaking for the eastern interests.

> —then, for the interests putting up the money to ask the people of the Yukon to co-operate in this regard.

The minister has accepted this report. In other words, the miners in the Yukon are to be sacrificed for the benefit of eastern interests. It is just that simple. That is the statement by this Mr. Cole in his report to the government which report the minister has seen fit to accept.

I suggest that that is a most flimsy foundation upon which to work out a new quartz mining law for the Yukon. The minister will never get the approval or support of the mining people in the Yukon for a measure based on recommendations of that kind. That one recommendation itself should have been enough to condemn Mr. Cole's report. The minister should have called in his own member and the members of the Yukon territorial council and taken advice from them instead of trying to ram this measure down the throats of the people of the Yukon.

I suggest that after the bill has been introduced the fair thing to do would be to allow it to stand until next year. Let us see exactly what the minister has in mind; let these people in the Yukon have the necessary time to study the bill and of course let the eastern interests study it as well. That cannot be done between now and the end of the session. The minister talks about having the bill referred to a committee but that would mean that the bill would be law within the next week or two if the government members stood by the government as they have a fixed habit of doing. It certainly would not give the people of the Yukon an opportunity to check the merits and demerits of this bill. I suggest that nobody would be hurt particularly if that course were followed. Let the bill be introduced and then let it lie on the table so that it may be considered by everybody interested. Then next year amendments could be put through the house which will give satisfaction to the great majority of the people.

Certainly any measure that passes this house should above all give satisfaction to the people of the Yukon. They are the ones who live in the territory; they are the ones who believe in the territory; and it will be by their efforts that the Yukon will grow and eventually become a province of Canada. But you will never be able to build a province in that northwestern part of Canada by ignoring their wishes, as is being done in this instance, and forcing through legislation against their recommendation.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the committee because I know that at least a dozen members are waiting to speak on this resolution. I think we had better leave our principal speeches until the second reading of the bill. We heard this afternoon a most informative, and I for one think a most courageous, speech by the member for the Yukon. There is no doubt that from the information he gave to the committee and from the information which other hon. members have received he was speaking for a great majority of the people whom he represents. While I was listening to him I thought that he must have inherited his father's independence. His father was a federal government official on the Arrow lakes in the early days of this century and was well known for the strong stands he took on issues about which he felt keenly.

Like the hon. member for the Yukon, I have every respect for the minister and I am confident that he is concerned about the proper development of Canadian natural resources. He has evidenced interest in the subject in general and has shown concern about certain developments in connection with the Columbia river. We appreciate that interest and that concern. I think other hon. members will agree with me when I say that I think in this instance the minister is receiving poor advice from his officials, and is accepting that advice. I think a reconsideration of the whole matter would be fully justified.

I notice that the Minister of Fisheries has stayed in the chamber this afternoon. The Minister of Fisheries has the ability to appear to be reading a document in a most interested manner when in fact he is listening intently to what is going on. I have experienced that on former occasions. I am quite sure that the Minister of Fisheries is very interested in this matter and could make a most interesting speech on the question of the mining laws of British Columbia.

The minister is a mining engineer and for some years was secretary to the minister of mines of the province of British Columbia. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned, we had great difficulty with the mining laws of British Columbia until the early days of this century. Then under the McBride administration the mining laws were redrafted and they remained almost unchanged until a Liberal government came into power in British Columbia. The minister will remember that after some years the Liberal government made several amendments to the basic mining laws of the province which were required because of changing conditions and circumstances. I well remember the minister of mines making a speech in the provincial riding of Nelson-Creston where there is considerable mining activity. This was a meeting of mining men and I remember him saying that in his opinion British Columbia had the finest mining laws in Canada. I wonder if the Minister of Fisheries will disagree with that statement today. I should like to hear the Minister of Fisheries express an opinion on British Columbia mining laws.

The hon. member for the Yukon has pointed out that the basic law in the Yukon is based to some extent upon the experience in connection with the mining legislation in British Columbia because of the similarity between mining conditions and the terrain in British Columbia and the Yukon. When we have the finest mining legislation in Canada in British Columbia, according to the opinion expressed by a cabinet minister of a Liberal government in British Columbia, I cannot for the life of me understand why this government wants to change the situation and impose a different type of legislation in the Yukon.

I know that many hon. members on this side of the house appreciate that the hon. member for the Yukon is taking objection to this legislation because of the satisfaction they have had with the present law, which to a large extent is based upon the mining laws of British Columbia which a member of a Liberal government in British Columbia stated were the finest mining laws in Canada. I can understand the hon. member objecting to any change being made, but I think his main argument on this occasion is that he is speaking for the people of the Yukon and that the government in introducing this legislation has overlooked completely or disregarded completely the wishes of the majority of the people in the Yukon.

The hon. member referred to the opposition of the Yukon territorial council, an elected body that surely expresses the opinion of those concerned with mining in the Yukon, being close to them. Then, as the hon. member said, there is strong opposition from the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that it was because this chamber of mines functions on behalf of British Columbia and the Yukon, because the conditions are very similar and they represent people who have similar problems and a similar attitude to basic mining law and to mining legislation. We have the branches of the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines at Vancouver, the chamber itself, the central body, the branch at Whitehorse and the branch at Dawson City also expressing opposition to this legislation. Here we have the parent body and the body at the Yukon and the local bodies which are in touch with the mining situation and the two major towns in the Yukon, Whitehorse and Dawson, expressing opposition. We have the chamber of commerce at Mayo also opposed, and the board of trade of Whitehorse; and then various meetings of rank and file miners have expressed their opposition to this legislation. There have been many other individuals also, including prospectors, mining engineers, geologists and individual mine operators.

That is a massive weight of evidence and a massive weight of opposition against this legislation. For the life of me, I cannot understand the minister proceeding with this bill in view of the apparent opposition of the great majority of the people in the Yukon Territory.

The minister referred to the Cole report as being the basis for this legislation. I have a copy of the Cole report here and have read it through once or twice. In mentioning that he based the legislation on the Cole report, the minister did not deal very fully with a report made in reply to the Cole report by Dr. William V. Smitheringale, entitled "An Analysis of the Report on Matters Concerned with Administration of Quartz and Placer Mining in the Yukon Territory". This qualified engineer—I judge with a great deal of support, according to the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon—expresses some severe criticism of Mr. Cole's proposals. As far as I can understand from listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon, Mr. Cole is a highly qualified man in certain fields but he visited the Yukon only for a short period. I think I am correct in saying that. He based his report on that brief visit, whereas this other gentleman bases his reply to this report on long knowledge of and experience in Yukon mining conditions.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, in view of the opposition of the people of the Yukon, and in view of the fact that this legislation will replace legislation that has proven so satisfactory throughout the years, that the minister would be well advised to let the bill lie on the table for another session so that all those interested will have an opportunity to go into the matter and make their representations to the government, and so that members of the opposition and people in the country generally who have come to realize that the government, in pressing this legislation, is doing so in a most undemocratic way in opposition to the expressed wishes of the great majority in the territory that the legislation is intended to cover, will be considered.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I am certainly not going to take up very much time this afternoon, and I do not intend to repeat the arguments that have been so well put forward in this house today. It seems to me that it took a great deal of courage on the part of the hon. member for the Yukon in one way, and then when you look at it in another way, anyone who has the backing of all the people of the Yukon Territory must, of course, voice his opinion according to their wishes. I grant you that that has not been the case always on the part of members of the house. Therefore I should like to commend him for his stand and the action he has taken here this afternoon.

He has given us a full and informative address, laying before us those things which concern his people in the Yukon and presenting a realistic approach to the problems with documented evidence. We in this house must take full recognition of those things he has laid before us in his well rounded discussion of these problems. It is apparent that the people of the Yukon were not consulted, according to the evidence that has been presented. Of course, I am not too surprised, because I can think of several cases during this session already where the people concerned have been left out in the cold in regard to being consulted until some unwarranted action has been taken by this government. Now they are making retractions. That was done in the case of Bill No. 3, and also the act relating to the consolidation of the Railway Act. Here we have another case, another one of three cases, where highhanded action has been taken, and a member from the government side has had to stand up for his people in opposition to the government on this proposed resolution.

The least that could have been done would have been to hear all interested parties in the Yukon and not here, particularly before some committee of this house, which would necessitate people having to travel from the Yukon many thousands of miles to submit their case. We should not ask people to spend many hundreds of dollars and take time away from home to come down here to present their case before a committee of this house, when this government should have moved into the field where the act is enforced. They should move into that field at the convenience of those people and give them a chance to make their wishes known.

Mr. Philpott: Could I ask the hon. member a question? He suggested that members on this side had spoken against Bill No. 3. Is it not a fact that all members of this house spoke in favour of Bill No. 3, except the small group which he represents?

The Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. member replies, I had better point out to the committee that we are discussing, not Bill No. 3 but a resolution on the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to take part in this debate, chiefly because the Minister of Fisheries indicated that my friend, the hon. member for Yukon, should beware of Greeks bearing gifts. Certainly I hope that anything I shall say will in no way embarrass him, in his very honest effort to convey to the minister the true feelings of his constituents. Yes, it may be unusual that someone from the banks of the Humber might be speaking about something that takes place on the banks of the Liard or of some other river. I listened with considerable interest to the minister both last night and today, and I made fairly full notes on what the minister had to say. As I glanced through them, I have wondered if there has been any connection between the reasons which he has given for the necessity of bringing in this new act and the actual reasons. I might take a look at a few of them.

First of all, he said that the Yukon had some unusual characteristics. Second, he said that mining legislation usually came within the jurisdiction of the province and that it was unusual that federal legislation was required. Third, he said that the territorial council handled certain matters of administration in the territory but were not seized of the right to legislate in connection with mining claims. He said that the natural resources were a federal job. He traced the history of the legislation dealing with mining. He indicated that we had had this act almost without change since 1924. I understand there have been seven subamendments since that time. He said that conditions have changed. He is not sure whether this act is fair to the mining prospectors at the present time. He said revision is required. All of these statements are about as wide as you could possibly make them but none of them discloses an inherent reason for changing this legislation. The minister referred to Colonel Cole's report. One of the most striking paragraphs in this report, in my opinion, is to be found at page 3, at about the sixth or seventh line:

> There is in the Yukon an inherent determination that an act should prevail. While I do not share that feeling with the mining people of the Yukon I am of the opinion that a compromise, mutually satisfactory to the government of Canada and the people of the Yukon Territory can be devised.

Just what state have we reached in connection with the administration of the affairs of the people of this country when we have to reach a compromise between the wishes of the people and those of the government? I was always led to believe that the government reflected the wishes of the people. Here we have a situation where we are apparently now going to be asked to arbitrate between the wishes of the people of the Yukon and the wishes of the administration, as reflected in this new legislation proposed by the minister.

It is indicated that certain changes must be made. I have heard about two-post staking and I have heard about four-post staking. The conclusion that I have come to is that the only experience displayed by those who advocate four-post staking must have been obtained in a four-poster in a Whitehorse hotel. The indication that two-post staking is not adequate for this job is the contention that it is holding up development by new scientific methods. Yet the minister has said that there is no intention to give out concessions of any kind under this act. Surely that is where scientific development and the new methods of using scintillometers and other equipment of that kind would be reflected. He has said that there is no intention to make any concession to people who might be using those types of methods.

As a matter of fact, everyone should take the opportunity of going to the Yukon. You will find that it is not necessary to have large development companies take over this type of exploration. All this type of the newest and latest equipment can be handled by the new type of prospector. On the Liard in northern British Columbia, in the corner of the Yukon, I have seen six and seven private aircraft sitting there waiting to go on with a prospecting program, each one handled on the basis of an individual partnership of prospector and pilot, and each one having at its disposal some of the latest type of prospecting equipment. Apparently there can be no reason for revision on that score.

Then we find that it is indicated that two-post claims result in the fractional or marginal type of mining claims. I might refer the minister to the mining act of the province of Ontario which is contained in chapter 236 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1950. There he can see that, even with established townships and places where bearings can be taken for surveying, that act as well indicates that even with the four-post type of mining claims in Ontario, fractional claims may exist even there.

Mr. Lesage: Surely. But they will be fewer in number.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Then he talked about the question of the work involved in this type of mining claim. When we talk about two-posters and four-posters, I think there is an inclination to believe that we are just doubling the amount of work and that that is not too much. Leaving aside the question of the character of the country which has been described by every hon. member who has spoken so far, the fact is that there is probably four times as much actual physical work and expense involved; and in a territory of the type of that in which these mining prospectors are working, it becomes a heavy time-consuming and expensive proposition.

Then it has been indicated that this question of doing work on the claims is one which is difficult to check under present circumstances and that with the use of regulations we are going to be able to handle the matter a great deal better. Let us be frank about it. No matter whether it is an act or a regulation, there are people who will undoubtedly attempt to get by, if they can, without doing the work. British Columbia has spot checking in connection with development work on claims. I would strongly suggest to the minister that he might take some of his help, who have been so good at drafting this type of legislation, and send them out for a few months to handle the spot checking chore in the Yukon. If he did that, I am quite sure that they would not be quite so anxious to get us into regulations in this connection.

I am wondering whether, in fact, this legislation is not the thin edge of the wedge. When there is an undertaking that no concessions will be granted, I am wondering whether that does not mean there will be no concessions granted in the immediate future but that, with regulations being provided under the new legislation, such concessions may be granted in the future without reference back to the house. I can understand there may be companies which are quite definitely interested in this type of legislation. I listened to the hon. member for the Yukon read the list of those who support his viewpoint. He covered pretty well most of the substantial and practical mining development and exploration companies. I wonder whether this type of legislation is not much more pleasant to those who make their living by taking the sucker's dollar, whether they be from Bay street or anywhere else, by simply selling something off a map. Of course this legislation would assist them to a great extent. They could sit in their offices and sell the best of claims simply from a piece of parchment.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I find myself becoming increasingly interested in the subject matter of the resolution before the house this afternoon, and increasingly inclined to agree with the proposition advanced that this is not a piece of legislation which should be rushed through the house at this time. I do not know what percentage of the members of the house have the necessary qualifications to deal with this kind of legislation, qualifications such as the hon. member for Kootenay West suggested the Minister of Fisheries had, but certainly when this matter affects so vitally the people of the Yukon, who can only speak in this parliament through the voice of one representative, and is a matter which also involves complicated considerations in respect of mining, I feel the house should hesitate to rush into a decision so obviously contrary to the wishes of most of the people of the Yukon Territory.

Reference has already been made to the connection between mining law and conditions in the Yukon Territory and those of British Columbia, and I suppose that may tend to have the effect of making British Columbia members rather prone to take the position that extension of the basic mining law of British Columbia into the Yukon Territory is the logical and most desirable method of approaching the question. On the other hand, I for one am not inclined to say that is necessarily and irrevocably the case. Nevertheless, from such limited experience as I have had of the operation of the mining laws of British Columbia, I do feel that the statement made by the hon. member for Kootenay West, which he claimed had been vouched for on the authority of a Liberal minister of mines of British Columbia, is one with which we can agree to a great extent.

Certainly I suggest no one can claim that mining development in the province of British Columbia has been materially held back, nor have I been able to see any great reluctance on the part of some of the mining interests, to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred, to come into our province because of the particular type of mining law we have there. I had very limited experience in doing a little two-post staking several years ago, and while I do not claim that that in any sense makes me an authority or puts me in the class of having been a professional prospector, nevertheless I do know enough about the matter to realize that the argument being advanced that in mountainous and rocky terrain the two-post staking system has advantages has a good deal of basis in fact.

I know that particularly if one is trying to travel over that type of terrain on snowshoes and through underbrush it is much easier to do a proper job on one line than on a multitude of lines. I am quite interested in the fact that someone like Dr. Smitheringale should have taken the trouble to make an analysis of the report submitted to the government by Dr. George E. Cole, which analysis indicates that the conclusions reached by Dr. Cole with respect to the Yukon situation do not necessarily represent the only valid conclusions that can be drawn. In his report Dr. Smitheringale discusses the relative merits of two-post and four-post staking, and points out that the conditions imposed upon an individual by mountainous terrain are really different from those prevailing in the flatter country characteristic of most of Canada east of the Rocky mountains. In that regard he says:

> The four-posters readily admit there is less work involved with two posts, but overcome such an admission by stating a two-post claim is not properly staked, is poorly defined . . .

Later in his report Dr. Smitheringale comes out quite bluntly and says:

> Moreover, allow me to flatly contradict anyone who says a claim, staked by two posts, is not as rigidly defined as one staked by four. Colonel Cole, as well as all other responsible people, government or private, knows beyond argument that the boundaries of any claim or any plot of ground, no matter how staked, are not fully defined until such time as an accurate land survey has been made . . . and registered . . .

I lived in one of the mining areas of British Columbia during the time of a staking boom, and certainly my limited observation would indicate that what Dr. Smitheringale says is in point of fact borne out. I happen to know that Dr. Smitheringale is no newcomer to the mining game. It was in 1933 that I first met him. At that time he was the manager of a mine which was under development and was one of the people chosen by the British Columbia mining department to deliver lectures to prospectors on subjects which are of interest to them, under a plan carried on by the British Columbia department of mines. With a long experience in an area such as British Columbia, back of an experience in the Yukon Territory, I would suggest that Dr. Smitheringale's opinion in this connection may very well be as valid as the one that has been expressed by the engineer whose recommendation the government apparently is prepared to take.

I have quoted briefly from Dr. Smitheringale's remarks and tried to suggest to the house he is a man with sufficient qualifications to express an informed opinion, in order to further advance the argument that we in this house are getting into something of a very complex nature. It is a problem that could vitally affect the future of mining in the Yukon Territory, and one about which we should not be asked to hurriedly come to a decision in view of the objections which have already been raised to the proposed legislation. We all hope that this session is coming towards its close, and therefore the detailed work of committees should not be such as to prolong the sittings of committees at this time. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is the type of bill that needs a detailed and thorough examination by a committee. It is the type of bill, as has been suggested, upon which all those concerned should have an opportunity of making representations and presenting their detailed briefs.

Under the present circumstances it would be most difficult for a committee of the house to give this bill the kind of consideration that it should have, and to bring in a report to the committee of the whole so that the measure could receive adequate consideration or amendment at this session. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I felt I should like to complement the remarks which were previously made by my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West. I feel that we who come from British Columbia have a very valid reason for believing we have good mining laws, mining laws which have been developed out of a long experience in the mining industry. These mining laws result from the fact that British Columbia, once it passed the fur trading era, owes its very existence as a province to mining activities.

I know that in some respects we have always regarded the Yukon Territory as the child of British Columbia, especially so far as mining is concerned. I have heard old-timers in the Cariboo mining country tell what happened when word of the discovery of gold in the Yukon reached that area. The placer miners dropped their tools and started the trek to the north. I suppose from that beginning mining in the Yukon and in British Columbia have had a close association. It is not only the result of easily established lines of communication, but in large part a matter of the inherited tradition which was carried from British Columbia into the mining development of the country to the north of us.

So, Mr. Chairman, I feel it is not only fair but proper that, with that background, those of us who come from British Columbia should view with a rather jaundiced eye any proposal which would make the mining law of the Yukon Territory a basically different arrangement from that which we have in British Columbia.

The Deputy Chairman: The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Gillis: If the minister wants to speak, it is all right.

Mr. Lesage: I just thought we could finish up by six o'clock and have the bill distributed as soon as possible to the interested parties.

Mr. Gillis: I know that hope is doomed. I should like to compliment the hon. member for the Yukon upon the statement he made this afternoon and the manner in which he handled the proposition. I believe he demonstrated that, regardless of where you sit in the house or how close you are to the minister, matters that affect the people you represent are your first consideration. I was pleased to see the hon. member stand up, well prepared, and make the arguments that he did.

I feel that listening to him and listening to the minister this afternoon would convince anyone that this is not just a Yukon or a British Columbia problem. It is a problem that affects the whole country. The hon. member pointed out he was opposed to permitting the government to carry on the future development of that portion of the country under regulations rather than under an act that would spell out what the development was going to be. I believe his opposition and his talk this afternoon was timely. What has retarded development, and built monopolies that control resources in many provinces of Canada, has been the very thing he feared may take place if this basic act is thrown away and the minister is given power to make regulations from Ottawa. The departmental officials may be doing business with someone from Bay street whose only concern would be grabbing large territories, staking them out and putting in a closure clause which would prevent anyone going in there in the future even for the purpose of exploratory work.

This condition prevails in some of the provinces. I know it prevails in my own province today. One coal company and one or two metal companies have practically everything in the province staked out and no prospector is permitted to go in there and do any prospecting, with the result that no development is taking place. I think the hon. member is absolutely correct. I know you cannot argue the details of a bill you have not seen. However, despite the fact that we have before us only the resolution in which the minister asks for the privilege of bringing in a bill to deal with this matter, I think the hon. member was well advised this afternoon to take the position he did take, and to put on record, chapter and verse, for the guidance of the committee who will be looking at the bill at a later point, all of the implications he sees within the legislation. The hon. member comes from the area affected; he represents those people, and he knows what the development has been in the past under regulations, and having regard to ministerial powers. He is absolutely right when he takes the stand that the development of that part of the country should be carried out under a basic act that spells out just exactly what can be done to protect the rights of the people in that area, so that they can go out and prospect, and have a share in its future development.

I would recommend that any hon. member who sits on the committee should read the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Yukon. There is not sufficient time now to discuss the different methods of staking, and that sort of thing; but I believe the arguments the hon. member made this afternoon are valid. I am convinced that the procedure of developing that part of the country by regulation, and by remote control, is a wrong one. I know it has been done in some other provinces; and the hon. member fears the same thing may take place in the Yukon. There can be no doubt other provinces are greatly in need of development at this time; but very little can be done about it because one is not even allowed to go in and do a little prospecting so that the country may be developed. It is all sewed up; it is closed out. The minister can do what he likes and do it in any way he likes; one might think he had the lease of a section of land, only to find out that the minister had decided to give it to somebody else—and without even consulting the person who was interested.

That sort of thing can go on under regulations. I believe the time has come, in connection with our work in the House of Commons, when, in considering legislation, no one who is sitting behind the scenes and who has not discussed the matter with members of parliament should be permitted to write regulations around an act of parliament, completely destroying its use.

I was glad to hear the minister say that in addition to introducing a bill he is going to bring in regulations written around the bill. While the minister may do that, there is nothing to prevent someone later on writing other regulations, without consultation with anyone. I think members in the House of Commons should continue to hammer against the trend to proceed by way of regulations; otherwise we will be losing the powers of parliament. If we are content to sit here and pass legislation, and then have the whole thing run by regulation from behind the scenes, and by men who are not responsible to the people of this country, as are members in the House of Commons, then parliament will have reached the position where it is being managed from outside. And already there is too much of that going on.

I would hope that the hon. member for Yukon, who did us a service this afternoon in the speech he made, will not suffer any repercussions within the inner circles of his party because he has had the courage to get up and to do what any member of parliament should be obliged to do, and that is to stand on his feet and, regardless of where proposals may come from, represent his area and fight for his people.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, as it is almost six o'clock, perhaps you would call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Lapointe: We will be taking estimates of the Post Office Department and the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention to move for interim supply tomorrow? The Minister of Finance told me last evening that he would be doing so, and I thought he said it would be tomorrow.

Mr. Lapointe: If the leader of the house so announced, then we shall do so. However, I have no word of it.

Mr. Green: He may have said that it would be Friday, but I understood it was tomorrow.

Mr. Lesage: It has to be done before the end of the month.

Mr. Lapointe: It would be tomorrow or Friday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

LEGISLATION CONFIRMING NORTHERLY PORTION

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY—TORPEDO TUBES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Did the Canadian Locomotive Company Limited of Kingston receive a contract for torpedo tubes from the Royal Canadian Navy in or about the month of May, 1953, as announced in the Canadian press on the 13th May, 1953?
2. If so, has such contract been completed? If not, to what extent?
3. What was the price per unit, or if a cost plus contract, what were the terms thereof?
4. What is the total expenditure under this contract to date?
5. Was the contract for the above order not previously awarded to another contractor?
6. If so, what was the name of the said company and why was the change made?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. No. Contract suspended October 29, 1953, pending service decision on the torpedo for which the tubes are designed.

3. Cost plus 7½ per cent on production. Cost plus 5 per cent on self-manufactured tooling.

4. Nil under production contract. (Expenditures on development work have amounted to $251,929.99.)

5. Yes.

6. Dominion Engineering Company Limited. Agreement as to contractual terms could not be reached.

*NATIONAL REVENUE—COMMUNICATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Knowles:

1. Did the Minister of National Revenue communicate to the premier and provincial treasurer of Ontario any information concerning any payments or contributions made by the late Mr. James Drohan to Mr. James Dempsey?
2. On what date was such information communicated?
3. Was such information communicated in writing? If not, in what way was it communicated?
4. Was such information requested by the premier and provincial treasurer of Ontario?
5. When and how did the Minister of National Revenue first become aware of the information so communicated?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, this question calls for an oral answer. My answer is the following. The Minister of National Revenue has no right and is expressly forbidden by statute to disclose to anyone not legally entitled thereto the information which he disclosed to the provincial treasurer of Ontario, who was legally entitled thereto. The Minister of National Revenue has not in fact disclosed this information to anyone not legally entitled thereto.

The Minister of National Revenue has never confirmed that all or any part of the alleged information which has been discussed in the press and in and outside the House of Commons in connection with this matter is the same in whole or in part as that which he disclosed to the provincial treasurer of Ontario. For him to do so would be a disclosure of information in contravention of the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

The Minister of National Revenue cannot, without making a disclosure forbidden by the statute, either indicate the nature of the information communicated to the provincial treasurer of Ontario or other details, other than to say in reply to the questions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that the said information was conveyed to the provincial treasurer of Ontario on April 27, 1955.

I suggest, sir, that this also is the answer to the questions put yesterday by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if he will consider answering the part of my question which asks when and how the Minister of National Revenue first became aware of the information which he communicated to the provincial treasurer of Ontario on April 27?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my full answer is given in the statement which I have given to the house.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to revert to the matter on which the minister just made his statement, to ask him one very simple question to which a categorical yes or no answer can be given without in any way invading any of the secrecy provisions. Did the minister procure the documents in question from the executors of the estate or were they documents in the possession of his department?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, in fairness, I am a poor, uneducated man as far as legal matters are concerned. I ask the hon. member, do you consider it fair to try to trap me into answering questions from one who is supposed to be well trained in the legal profession? In my statement I have given what I believe is a fair, honest answer with reference to the questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Prince Albert. If you wish to ask further questions, be good enough to give me notice of them according to the tradition of the house, or put them on the order paper.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, notice was given yesterday, and it is a simple question. Did you get the documents—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister get the—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister secure these documents from the files of his department? Surely that is not a question that requires notice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member put a question and the minister has given a reply to the best of his ability, which reply may not be satisfactory to the hon. member. Now the hon. member is putting the question again. I do not think matters will be further advanced if the question is repeated, because apparently the hon. member would get the same answer.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if it is fair for him to suggest that we put our questions on the order paper when he neglected to answer at least three parts of my question, which has been on the order paper for over two weeks?

Mr. McCann: I suggest that if the hon. member will read the statement he will find that all his questions were answered.

Mr. Knowles: Did the premier of Ontario request that information? We have had no answer to that or to two other parts of my question.

RADIO SAGUENAY LTEE.

Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John):

1. Will the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation include in its network the private television station to be erected by Radio Saguenay Ltee, at Jonquiere, Quebec?
2. If so, on what date?
3. What proportion of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programs will be relayed by this television station?

Mr. McCann:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. The proposed television station to be erected by Radio Saguenay Ltee, as all other private television stations under established policy, may if it so wishes secure free of charge all C.B.C. national service programs by microwave connection or kinescope recordings from the time they go on the air.

BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS —COMPETITIVE RATES

Mr. Starr:

1. Has the board of transport commissioners made any regulations in respect of the manner in which railway competitive rates may be acted upon and put into operation?

2. If so, what are the regulations presently in effect, in respect to competitive rates?

3. If such regulations have been made and none are presently in effect, what are the latest regulations with regard to the manner in which railway competitive rates may be acted upon and put into operation?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Yes.

2. (1) Competitive rates comprising reductions from existing published rates, which, owing to the exigencies of competition of transportation services not subject to the board's jurisdiction, are urgently required to be brought into immediate effect without previous notice to the board, may be acted upon before filing with the board, but the initial carrier, or duly appointed agent, must forthwith publish such rates and file the same with the board, effective as from the date of the movement of the traffic. The filing advice covering the filing of such schedule shall be accompanied by a clear statement of the reasons for such publication, the name of the party for whom the rate was made, the rate and the name of the carrier with whom competing, the rate which would otherwise apply in the absence of such publication, and such other information as will satisfy the board as to the bona fides of the action taken.

(2) Competitive rates (local or joint) comprising reductions from existing published rates may be published without prior notice where such action is to equalize existing rates of competing routes (subject to recognized differentials, if any, between rail and water carriers) between common points of carriers subject to the board's jurisdiction. The filing advice shall be accompanied by a clear statement of the necessity for such action and detailed reference to the rate and tariff authority of the existing published rate of the other carrier or carriers.

(3) Competitive rates may be published to expire on any date subsequent to the effective date thereof provided that such date of expiration is shown in the schedule when issued.

3. Answered by No. 2.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

COAL AND STEEL SUBVENTIONS AND REBATES

Mr. Gillis:

1. What amount of money was paid the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, for the year 1954, (a) as subvention for the movement of coal; (b) for the movement of steel; (c) as a drawback on coal used for metallurgical purposes?

2. What amount of money was paid the Sydney and Louisburg Railway, (a) as a subvention for the movement of coal; (b) as a rebate under the Maritime Freight Rates Act?

Mr. Pinard: Return tabled.

POSTAL SERVICE

NOVA SCOTIA—ALLEGED DELAY IN MAIL DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. Purdy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Postmaster General or to the parliamentary assistant. My question is this. In view of the serious inconvenience being suffered by a large number of patrons of the post office in Nova Scotia due to the delay in mail delivery, caused chiefly by a two-hour change in the time of the so-called mail train leaving Halifax, will the department at once take active steps in an endeavour to correct this situation?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, may I assure the hon. member that the department will take the matter into consideration and will as rapidly as possible make the necessary inquiries.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARTILLERY CENTENARY CELEBRATION—WEAPONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether all the weapons of war in front of the parliament buildings today are the property of the Canadian government?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know they are all the property of the Canadian government, with the possible exception of the "Nike".

PROPOSED DEMOLITION OF PART OF QUEBEC CITADEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, of which I gave notice. Has the minister received a protest from the Quebec historical society concerning the decision by the Department of National Defence to demolish an old part of the Quebec citadel called "Le Bastion de Gaulle" to make way for a new building for the Royal 22nd Regiment? Is it the intention of the department to reconsider this decision?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I have received one or two letters with regard to the matter raised by the hon. member, as a result of which the matter is now being reviewed.

REPORTED APPEARANCE OF CANADIAN SOLDIER IN EAST GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister any information regarding a Canadian army private by the name of Cross who is allegedly in the eastern part of Germany? Has he any information as to whether Private Cross went of his own volition or was taken to East Germany forcibly?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I have no further information other than has appeared in the press, except the fact that Private Cross proceeded on leave on May 2 and was due to return on May 18. When he did not return he was posted as absent without leave, and that was the first indication the brigade in Europe had of the matter. It is being investigated by our security people in Germany.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FROM PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received from the government of Manitoba a request for emergency assistance with respect to flood conditions in that province? If so, what steps are being taken by the government to make such assistance available?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I received notice of the hon. member's question only a few minutes ago. No request has been received in the Prime Minister's office nor in the offices of the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Agriculture, but I understand a request was made in the usual form by the attorney general of Manitoba to the Department of National Defence for the assistance of members of the armed forces in patrolling and repairing the dikes on the Assiniboine river. That is the only request from the government of Manitoba that appears to have been received up to the present time.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—REFERENCE IN DEBATE TO HON. MEMBER FOR GRENVILLE-DUNDAS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a question of privilege in connection with an error which I made in the course of a speech on Friday, May 20. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am indebted to one of the members of our protective staff for calling my attention to this error.

Mr. MacDougall: Don't tell me he reads your speeches.

Mr. Knowles: I think hon. members should be aware of the fact that we are being watched by those who surround us.

Mr. Martin: Only the hon. member is being watched.

Mr. Knowles: I referred to a vote which was taken in the House of Commons on March 8, 1921, and I indicated that the present member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) voted against the motion which was before the house on that occasion. It has since been drawn to my attention that although the present member for Grenville-Dundas was elected in 1921, he was not elected until December of that year. The Mr. Casselman listed in that vote was Mr. O. D. Casselman, who represented Dundas county at that time. Apparently there are quite a few people in that area by that name. I am happy to make the correction, so that the record will be accurate, and I am happy also to do so because it gives me the opportunity, as one party whip to another, to send best wishes for a speedy recovery to the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas.

HOUSING

REGENT PARK PROJECT—REPORTED DELAY IN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Has the attention of the Minister of Public Works been drawn to the report in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that the Toronto city council cannot proceed with the Regent Park South housing project owing to delay in completing the federal-provincial agreement? Can the minister comment on that, and indicate the cause of the delay?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): To the best of my knowledge there is no delay on the part of the federal government, nor in fact do I know of any delay.

GRAIN

WHEAT—EFFECT ON CANADA OF SALE BY UNITED STATES TO ITALY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to comment on what effect the recent sale of wheat by the United States to Italy will have on Canadian wheat exports.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am unable to comment on that question, because I do not know. If a sale of wheat is made by the United States, the same sale will not be made by Canada.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Harris moved:

That a sum not exceeding $257,705,895.34, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $3,122,487.50, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 216, 219, 221, 223, 224, 229, 520, of the said estimates be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956.

Mr. Macdonnell: I understood the minister was going to make a statement by way of explanation.

Mr. Harris: I shall make it now; then it will not be necessary to make it on the bill.

As hon. members are no doubt aware, this is a vote of one-twelfth of the estimates to cover expenditures during the month of June. There is an additional vote of one-twelfth in respect of seven special items having to do with items where money is urgently needed at this time of the year.

I give the usual undertaking that if the resolution and bill are passed there will be no restriction whatsoever on the opportunity and privilege of hon. members to discuss items in the normal way on the estimates.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Harris moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1956, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $257,705,895.34, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956; and

2. The sum of $3,122,487.50, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 216, 219, 221, 223, 224, 229, 520 of the said estimates; as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 413, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1956.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—$3,122,487.50 granted for 1955-56.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, can the minister say a word as to the reason for the extra money that is required by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, covered in clause 3, and which is referred to in schedule I.

Mr. Harris: I have just been depriving myself of my notes in order to be of assistance to the staff of the house in reporting this discussion, but in this particular case I think my friend is aware that we do a lot of extraordinary work in the summer with the assistance of university students and the like, who go out on survey parties. We need the money at this time rather than in the fall.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is any additional expenditure required this year by reason of the unemployment situation, or is it just normal?

Mr. Harris: This is the result of a long period of endeavour in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to expand the work of exploration to be of assistance in the development of the country.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

334. Departmental administration, $1,546,388.

The Chairman: May I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that this resolution may be found on page 54 of the main estimates, and the details commence on page 440. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say just a word, if I might. As hon. members know, I have been acting for the Postmaster General since his unfortunate illness. I am sure all hon. members will be glad to know that he is making very good progress indeed, and that he hopes to be back in his place in the house at a very early date; and no one hopes with him more sincerely than I do. But I would not want to misrepresent the situation. During his absence the person who really has carried the brunt of his work is our colleague, the hon. member who is his parliamentary assistant. While I am going to remain in the committee and take my constitutional responsibility as the temporary incumbent, the hon. gentleman knows far more about the estimates than I do, and I hope hon. members will feel it will be quite satisfactory to have him answer the questions and make the opening statement as well.

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, I thought probably hon. members would prefer it if I gave a more or less general report on the operations of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, before proceeding to a discussion of the estimates for the fiscal year 1955-56 which are now before the house for consideration.

The fiscal year which closed on March 31, 1955, was the largest in the history of the postal service from the standpoint of the volume of mail handled and revenue collected. The increase in the number of pieces handled during the year was approximately 6 per cent. This resulted in a total of approximately 3,355 million pieces. The revenue increased from $129 million to $151 million, which is approximately a 17 per cent increase.

It is estimated that on the 1954-55 year's operations there will be an apparent surplus of revenue over expenditures of approximately $5 million, but this does not take into account the rental on accommodation supplied by the Department of Public Works on the one hand, or the amount involved in free postage privileges on the other. The annual rentals on buildings provided by the public works department is estimated by that department at $13 million for the last fiscal year. The free postage privilege represents an amount which is estimated as being in the neighbourhood of $5 million.

During last year the department completed the reorganization of the postal service in accordance with the major recommendations made in the Woods-Gordon report. The benefits of this reorganization and the subsequent decentralization of authority to field officers are already being felt. There have been considerable improvements made in the service during the fiscal year, which have resulted in greater efficiency and increased economy.

As the human element enters to an appreciable extent into the operations of the postal service it is impossible to entirely eliminate irregularities due to individual errors, but the department is continually endeavouring wherever possible to take the necessary corrective measures. This is why we appreciate the cases which have been brought to our attention from time to time, which have enabled us to make inquiries and take remedial action when necessary.

Unfortunately many of the complaints made are based on incorrect information, and are often attributable to a non-observance by the complainants themselves of the regulations issued by the department for their guidance. It is largely for this reason that we request exhibits in the way of envelopes or wrappers when dealing with complaints. During the year there have been numerous extensions of service. In the rural districts the number of rural mail routes has been increased by 56. In addition there have been 574 extensions granted, and the frequency of service has been increased in the case of 80 routes. As a result direct service has been given to more than 21,500 additional householders.

In regard to letter carrier delivery in the urban centres, in addition to the points where letter carrier delivery has been inaugurated there have been numerous extensions of existing routes, so that the total number of points of call made by letter carrier has increased by 93,500.

Group boxes have been installed both on rural routes and on the periphery of letter carrier delivery. This service is becoming increasingly popular and at the present time constitutes the method of delivery to more than 4,000 families, who in the majority of cases formerly had to go to the post office for their mail.

Since the amendment to the Post Office Act providing that the Postmaster General may increase the rate of payment to mail contractors under certain conditions, more than 5,000 applications have been received. Upward adjustments have been effected in over 3,500 cases, and the actual additional expenditure through these adjustments is now approximately $850,000 per annum, which will be increased as additional cases are dealt with and adjustments granted.

Some 35 new motor vehicle services have been established. Some of these superseded rail services, in some cases due to the withdrawal of the trains, and generally the change has resulted in an improvement in the mail service.

The last fiscal year was the initial year of the five-day 40-hour week in the operating service. This resulted in an additional expenditure of approximately $4,600,000 and involved additional staff to the extent of 1,400 employees. The additional volume of mail handled and the improved service given have necessitated increases in staff, but these increases bear a very favourable comparison with the increase in the number of pieces handled and the increase in revenue.

The policy of the department is to reduce overtime wherever practical and this has been accomplished to a large extent by the employment of casual or part-time help. Overtime is, however, necessary, particularly at the Christmas period when the volume of mail increases manyfold, and also on statutory holidays.

There has been continued improvement in the letter carrier delivery service to those residential areas which receive one delivery a day, and although there were a number of complaints when the one delivery per day was established, these have been considerably reduced. The five-day week and delivery on six days a week involve a rotation problem which cannot be avoided, so that deliveries must be made periodically by relief carriers who are not so well versed on all the details of the routes as are the regular letter carriers.

As regards revenue postmasters, that is to say the postmasters who are in charge of the small offices, the department, after extensive study, is introducing a new system of payment. The annual rates of compensation which are already being paid in some instances and which will be paid in all cases in future will be based on the work load of the office rather than the actual revenue. This will be a much fairer system in so far as the individual postmasters are concerned, as in a number of cases the revenue did not properly reflect the work of the office.

The employment conditions of revenue postmasters are further being improved under the terms of the Public Service Superannuation Act. It is estimated that 1,200 additional postmasters will now fall within the provisions of that act. This is a privilege which is greatly appreciated by these hard-working postal employees. Further, 28 offices have been raised from a revenue to a semi-staff basis. This means that the postmasters and staffs of these offices are now paid according to a classified fixed salary wage, and receive benefits comparable to those enjoyed by civil servants. In addition 22 semi-staff post offices have been reclassified to full staff basis, which means that employees in those offices will have the full status of civil servants.

One of the features which has an important bearing on the public service is that of postal accommodation. Unfortunately at the present time our accommodation is inadequate in many centres. This is due to two main factors, namely the continued appreciable growth of the postal service, and the fact that during wartime and in the period subsequent thereto the building program was somewhat retarded.

During 1954-55 some 35 projects of different sizes were completed which will facilitate service to the public. There are in addition 61 projects which are either under construction or for which tenders have been called. These include such large buildings as the post offices at Vancouver, Winnipeg, Regina, and other comparatively large centres. Furthermore, there are 181 projects for which plans are being prepared and studied further, both by the public works and post office departments.

The department is continuing to study and develop the most economical and efficient method of mail handling. We have also initiated a program of work simplification. Significant progress is being made along these lines which we feel will further improve the efficiency of the service. The department is pioneering and developing a system of electronic sortation, and is also developing mechanical facing-up machines which will not only speed up the handling of the mail but will render the performance of post office tasks performed by the individual employees less onerous and laborious.

The number of employees in the postal service, including mail contractors, now totals approximately 50,000. Of these approximately 23,000 are civil servants, 13,000 are mail contractors and the balance, approximately 14,000, are the postmasters and assistants in revenue post offices.

There has been a continuous development in the transportation of mail by air. In the domestic service, the increase in the weight limit of "all-up" letter mail to eight ounces has resulted in a sharp increase in the volume carried, with corresponding advantages to the mailing public. In the international sphere the department has extended its services wherever air transportation is available, and has developed air transportation to many international points for parcel post and other categories of mail in addition to letters.

A reduction in international air transportation charges has enabled the department to reduce postage rates to the mailing public, and also to extend the 10-cent air letter form to any post office in the world.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the acting minister in hoping for, in the name of all members of the official opposition, the early return of the Postmaster General. At the same time I would express our congratulations to the parliamentary assistant who is acting for him in the presentation of his estimates.

The parliamentary assistant has painted a rosy picture of the activities of the department, but I must say the Canadian public certainly had the right to hear of great improvements in the Post Office Department, especially since this year the estimated revenue of the department—that is for the fiscal year 1954-55—will be $132 million, which means $22 million more than last year, while the expenditures will show an increase of $13 million.

I would imagine that with this increase of $13 million in expenditures the department must have made great improvements all across Canada. The situation must be very different from what it has been in previous years. During the discussion of the present estimates I hope the parliamentary assistant will have the opportunity of giving us many examples of these improvements. There is, however, one place where I believe improvements are greatly needed. I refer to the problems of the suburban areas of our great cities across Canada.

By its policy the Post Office Department, in previous years, has caused a great deal of hardship to the people who are settling in the suburban areas around these big cities. In practically every new housing development in Canada the post office was always the last service to be offered to the people. Most of the time the municipal authorities were spending hundreds of thousands of dollars—even a million dollars—to provide the new suburbs with water, sewage and streets. The school boards were spending money. The telephone companies and power companies were trying to help these people. Usually the only thing missing was the postal service.

The postal service is always given about a year or two after these people have been established. Most of the time they were obliged to practically form an association and then enrol the support of the chamber of commerce, the municipal council and the churches in order to get even a mail box. I remember a few cases of that kind. Then they had to work for years following the same routine and making appeals to their members to get a certain service. Most of the time their campaign to get postal service was blocked by some sort of semi-secret regulation in which there was always some clause that prevented any improvement. There was always some regulation standing in the way; the houses were too far apart, they were so many yards apart or there were not enough houses on the street, and so on and so forth.

After the municipalities and the school boards had spent millions of dollars, it is hard to imagine that the Post Office Department would not believe in spending $25 for a mail box or a half hour or an hour of the mail carrier's time just to give these people some service. It sounds ridiculous, but I have witnessed some real hardship in my own riding.

I remember that in Three Rivers we had such a new district where most of the men were labouring men who worked until six o'clock at night in an iron foundry. It was then too late for them to go to the post office, which was at least two miles away from their houses. They therefore were obliged to send their children there after school, either by bicycle or bus, just to get, most of the time, a bill or some advertisement by mail. That situation lasted for more than two years. Improvement was always blocked by some regulation saying that between two houses there was a distance of over 80 yards. Finally after many representations the situation was corrected, but it took a long time. For these people the situation was really discouraging. I therefore hope that with the great surplus the department has this year—I mean now that the department is rich—we shall have some definite planning to look after these special cases.

Speaking about special cases, may I say that we have one in my riding, and it is a fair illustration of what these regulations of the postal department are like. In my riding we have an island called Wayagamack island, where we have one of the biggest paper mills in Canada. We have about 25 families living on this island, which is connected with the city of Three Rivers by a bridge. It is, in fact, within the city limits of Three Rivers. The people on that island have had mail service since 1917. They had that mail service until January 31, 1951, when the collapse of the bridge across the St. Maurice river stopped the mail for a while. On August 13, about eight months afterwards, the communications were repaired and the service was re-established, so everything was all right. This service these people had enjoyed for over 30 years was re-established. But unfortunately the postal department discovered there was a certain regulation they could apply, and they cancelled the service.

Ever since then these people have been trying to get their postal service re-established. They tried to get it by means of all kinds of requests. They sent requests and even delegations to the deputy postmaster general, but to no avail. After having had the service for 30 years, we now find that the postal department have decided these people are not entitled to it. If the department felt for 30 years that these people deserved the service I think it sounds rather silly all of a sudden to invoke some regulation in order to stop such a service.

Now that the department has a great deal of money on hand, or has a great surplus, I think it is about time something was done. I suggest that at the next session of parliament a committee of the house should be set up to study these regulations. So far as I know the regulations are not codified. I think it is time the government set up such a committee, in which people with experience from all across Canada could sit around a table and discuss these regulations. I am quite sure there are some regulations that must be absolutely out of date and of such a nature that they do not fit into the regular life of our Canadian people.

For instance, there are certain regulations which state that in order to get a post office, a town must have so many people; that in order to have delivery of mail in certain areas by carriers there must be a certain population, and so forth. These regulations worked very well for a while, but I think it is about time they were reviewed. I believe this would be a grand opportunity for the government to set up a committee to discuss these matters. Most members have had a good deal of experience with these things, and cases are different from one end of Canada to the other.

I know, for instance, that in the city of La Tuque, north of Three Rivers, delivery by mail carrier has been an electoral promise for the last 30 years. It sounds a bit strange that a city of the importance of La Tuque cannot get service by mail carrier. I know there is always some regulation in the postal department which says that for such and such a reason these services cannot be provided, but I think all these regulations should be reviewed. Now that the department has enough money to make some real improvements, this is the proper time to correct the situation and remove the hardship from the people of these cities.

There is another point I should like to raise, having to do with a situation that I think is not quite fair. It has to do with the cost of mailing letters between Cap de la Madeleine and Three Rivers. The two cities are adjacent to each other, and are only separated by the St. Maurice river. Many of the people of Cap de la Madeleine work and do their business in Three Rivers, and the reverse is also the case to some extent. It is rather surprising that the people there have to pay an extra cent to send mail from Cap de la Madeleine to Three Rivers and vice versa, when on the island of Montreal a letter can be sent a distance of 10 or 15 miles at exactly the same rate of postage.

I think these matters should be discussed and corrected. I believe it would also be good for the people of Canada if the regulations were codified so that every time a special situation arose in some part of Canada the people of the area would be able to look at the regulations and see what they had to do to get mail delivery. Up to now the practice has been that they have to write the deputy postmaster general, who issues a certain regulation to the local postmaster. I do not think this is the proper channel to have to go through. I believe the regulations should be set forth in codified form so that people all across Canada can go to the book and find out exactly what is what so far as mail service is concerned.

I was very pleased to hear the parliamentary assistant refer to a few improvements in the postal service, but I can assure him that the people of Canada, who had to suffer a tremendous increase in the rates of postage last year, should receive much better service than they used to get and are getting now.

The reduction in service from two deliveries to one delivery a day has hurt a lot of people. I know that on a certain street in my riding there is a man who is a great reader of the morning newspaper, Montreal Matin, and the poor man does not get his paper until around six o'clock at night. He is very disappointed. I think something should be done to rectify these special situations. Before we are finished with these estimates I hope the parliamentary assistant will be able to tell the house what great plans the Post Office Department has for the coming year, and will be in a position to announce to the house and the people of Canada great improvements in the postal department in the near future, because the department costs the people of Canada a lot of money and had quite a surplus during the last year.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, the members of this group would also like to express their keen desire to see the early return to active duty of the Postmaster General, with his genial personality. I think I can honestly say that if there is any cabinet minister whose absence we feel keenly it is the most pleasant Postmaster General of Canada. We are looking forward to the day when he will be in his place again and able to resume his responsibilities. We were highly impressed a year ago, when he was under very severe fire from the opposition, with the able manner in which he held his own ground.

At this time I should also like to express the appreciation of this group to the many thousands of employees of the Post Office Department. It is one department of government, in my opinion, in which you can notice a pride of service that is not found in any other department. Perhaps it is because the Post Office Department is many years old that we find a situation where even the humblest of civil servants in the department takes an intense personal pride in his responsibilities and in the fact that he is rendering a worthwhile public service.

Contrary to the attitude just expressed, I believe that on the whole the service rendered by the Post Office Department to the people of Canada is excellent. We retain our right, of course, to criticize what we consider are shortcomings here and there. That is our responsibility. However, I think the average Canadian is very much impressed by the most efficient service the Post Office Department is rendering to the people.

At this time I should also like to express the appreciation, as I know many other individuals and organizations have done, of the people of the lower mainland of British Columbia for the setting up of a metropolitan postal area there. In our opinion this step was long overdue. The cities of Montreal and Toronto and the areas surrounding them have had this great privilege for a goodly number of years, and Vancouver, the third largest metropolitan area in Canada, had to put up a fight in order to gain recognition.

I should like to say to the acting minister that when he set up the metropolitan area we were pleased to have him endorse the principle enunciated by the Postmaster General just before his illness. We were most pleased to see that the Acting Postmaster General did not desert the decisions of the Postmaster General in his absence. However, I should like to point out to him that there are many little isolated places within the metropolitan area which he omitted to include at the time. I sincerely believe it was only an oversight. However, there are places that to all intents and purposes are part of this lower mainland metropolitan area. I hope it will not be too long before places like Port Moody, Port Coquitlam, North and West Vancouver will be included.

While I am speaking about the local situation I should also like to put in a plea for the early establishment of sub-post office facilities for the people of East Burnaby. This was one of the things mentioned at the time the Postmaster General was still able to assume his responsibilities. He did assure us that serious consideration would be given to this matter. We feel that the people of East Burnaby should have some sub-post office facilities so they would not have to spend the time going to North Burnaby, South Burnaby or New Westminster if they want to do any post office business.

Last year I noticed what in my opinion amounted to almost an admission by the Post Office Department that it was one of the few remaining departments of government in which patronage was still tolerated. While it was not said this system was endorsed, one almost got that impression. I should like to make a plea that any sign of patronage be removed at a very early date, because I think the prestige of any department of the public service is to a certain extent dependent on the absence of patronage. In so far as civil service matters are concerned, I believe we are getting away from pork barrel politics, and I should like to see the last vestiges of it removed from the Post Office Department.

I hope the recently announced regulation concerning the deduction of holiday time as a punishment for tardiness is not being applied. I feel that if there are civil servants who repeatedly show up late for work, they should be dealt with as they would be in any other line of employment. The civil servant who insists on being tardy should no longer be retained by the civil service; that is the only honest way of dealing with tardiness. I feel that this business of taking away a man's holiday which he needs, whether he is a tardy civil servant or otherwise, is not to be commended. After an adequate warning the civil servant should be dismissed, rather than have his holidays taken from him.

In connection with the civil service I may say also that I hope the government will see its way clear to setting an example in the matter of fair employment practices. Rather than granting the 40-hour week only to those postal employees who work in an area where the 40-hour week is prevalent, the department should grant the 40-hour week to all employees, irrespective of what industry in the area may be doing. I feel also that some attention might be given to what I sometimes feel is the rather rapid turnover in employees in the Post Office Department. There seem to be a great number of postal employees resigning and taking other jobs. I think there could well be reasons for this large number of resignations. I do not believe it speaks very well for the post office as an employer when they have to hire large numbers of new employees to replace the members of the civil service who have left.

I listened with a good deal of interest to the speech by the hon. member for Three Rivers. He was complaining about the same thing that many of us are complaining about, and asked for a change in the regulations covering suburban areas. I do not know what change in the regulations he would want, but so far as I can determine there is really no policy in the Post Office Department covering service to growing areas of Canada. There seems to be a tendency to feel that once the post office is established it must remain the centre of distribution regardless of what happens to the area involved. It is readily understandable that those who are operating such post offices would wish to retain this ever-expanding area of service under their personal direction.

I believe the department should have definite conditions—I know that is what the hon. member for Three Rivers meant—that must be complied with before new services can be rendered. We should be able to look at the policy and determine whether or not a section is entitled to door to door delivery; whether it is entitled to these little red mail boxes connected with the pick-up service, or whether it is entitled to postal facilities in the corner store. There should be a policy that would enable us to determine whether an area would be entitled to the erection of a sub-post office. We feel that the policy of the department in connection with these things is far too vague. It may well be that the wheel that creaks the loudest first gets the grease, or it may be that the community that has the most influence with the department is able to get attention first.

We of the lower mainland feel we should not have had to use many of the tactics we had to employ in order to get the 4-cent letter rate. We feel that there should have been a policy covering such matters. I would once again, as I did a year ago, appeal to the acting minister to reduce the first class letter rate. I feel it is an imposition on the people who really need the mail service of Canada to ask them to subsidize the advertising of commercial enterprises. I feel we could very easily lower the 5-cent first class letter rate to 4 cents and still make ends meet if we raise the second class mail rate. I believe you would make many postal employees happy if you imposed such an additional tariff on second class matter, because it would discourage the use of this medium for the promotion of Rinso soap and things of that sort.

I was in the New Westminster post office some months ago, and saw the arrival of monthly magazines. I would call the attention of the acting minister to a recent innovation of the daily newspapers. In my area one may receive a daily newspaper for $1.50 a month, I believe it is; and if one agrees for the period of a year to pay an additional 40 cents a month to the local carrier boy one is entitled to choose from a number of magazines which will be delivered by mail. We in New Westminster are not particularly keen about the magazine known as True Story. We regard it as that much trash, and we used to get only one mail bag of this magazine each month. However, since the introduction of this offer at 40 cents a month the New Westminster office receives a dozen mail bags filled with issues of this one magazine. When one considers that the number of magazines available was extensive, that the list was very long, one can imagine at once the additional burden placed on the post office by this innovation of the daily newspapers.

There may have been a time in Canadian history when second class mail required the advantage of a subsidy. There is a howl in certain sections of Canada when mention is made of subsidies for useful purposes, including the sale of our wheat overseas and the sale of Canadian foodstuffs to the people of Canada as well as to other people in other parts of the world. However, I have yet to hear many objections to this hidden subsidy to commercial firms in Canada. If these were essential and the most useful forms of advertising I might not feel so keenly in the matter, but I do not see a particle of difference between Oxydol and Rinso soaps, and I see no reason whatsoever why our faithful civil servants should have loaded on their backs week after week hundreds of pounds of this useless trash, particularly when they might be rendering a much more useful service to society.

There is one more point I would like to raise, one which up to now I have not had a suitable opportunity to call to the attention of the Acting Postmaster General. I had written about it to the Postmaster General, assuming that in his absence mail would be placed on the desk of the Acting Postmaster General or, failing that, at least on the desk of the parliamentary assistant. Instead of that I received a reply from the deputy postmaster general enclosing confirmation of an earlier decision by a lesser official. I resented that, because I feel that when I as a member of parliament write a letter in which I call into question some of the activities of a department, I should receive something more than a reply from a member of the civil service. I feel that is not the customary procedure. No other department of government has ever treated me in this way.

This is what happened. While the postmaster at Port Moody was absent on his holidays there was removed from the post office, by an alleged theft, the sum of $500. The Post Office Department is now withholding $50 a month from the salary of the postmaster at Port Moody until the $500 is recovered. I am told that in many post offices, even in offices as large as that at Port Moody, the postmaster is held responsible for what happens in his absence, even when he is away on holidays. If this is so, then certainly we are not helping those people to take holidays. I do not think postmasters should be held financially liable for whatever may happen in their absence.

I hope the Acting Postmaster General will look into the situation. The postmaster in question is one of the most highly honoured in the community.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I understand the hon. member to say that he had written me a letter to which I had not replied?

Mr. Regier: No, I wrote to the Postmaster General. However, I had assumed the letter would be placed on the desk of the Acting Postmaster General, or at least on that of the parliamentary assistant. I regret that for various reasons I was not able to call it to the attention of the Acting Postmaster General. I mention this merely to emphasize to him the way many members of parliament feel in regard to the Post Office Department; that there is a self-styled postmaster general of Canada who has no right to be a postmaster general because he has not been designated as such. In saying this I am referring to the deputy postmaster general.

I feel that the procedure of making the postmaster at Port Moody pay for something that happened in the post office in his absence is most unwarranted. This man is most highly regarded in his home town. He is a veteran of the first world war. On two separate occasions, at great risk to his own personal safety, in cases of fires in that town he saved for the Post Office Department thousands of dollars. He has been an alderman for many years; and to have him thus penalized for something he had nothing to do with is not, in my opinion, a fair procedure when dealing with a good and faithful civil servant.

Then I have one other complaint, which I think is nation-wide. This complaint deals with the renting of post office buildings. I do not think we can argue that the government of Canada ought to own all the many small buildings in which post offices are housed. I do not think anyone would be logical in asking for that. I notice from the public accounts that in the year ending March 31, 1954 no less than 1,946 public buildings were rented by the government of Canada, through the Department of Public Works, where the rental was less than $250 a month. I assume that most of these buildings housed post offices. The total rental paid in that fiscal year for these buildings was $1,432,442.

I do not think one could argue against that expenditure. Indeed, on the whole we have expressed our satisfaction with it. A man who lives in a building and permits the government to use part of it as a post office is certainly entitled to receive some compensation. It would be poor business for the department to go out on a limb to the extent of erecting public buildings in every little hamlet in Canada.

However, the Department of Public Works, again chiefly on behalf of the Post Office Department, paid out in rentals in that same year the sum of $3,399,051. This was paid to people who received rentals for buildings in excess of $3,000 a year. In looking over the rates of rental paid I noticed that in one case it went as high as $2.20 a square foot a year. This is an exceedingly high rate for some of the smaller centres of Canada. In most of the urban centres of Canada adequate facilities might well be rented for $1 a square foot a year. That is considered a fairly high rate of return. I am just wondering why in some cases rentals are so high.

This is what I do not like to see happen, Mr. Chairman. Somebody is offered a lease by the Post Office Department, which agrees to rent a certain specified building for a 10-year period at a fixed yearly rental. This individual, who possibly does not even own a lot, much less a building, can then take the lease and walk over to see his bank manager and say, "I have an agreement with the government of Canada which will pay me for this accommodation so many dollars a month for the next 10 years. I am willing to assign my rent to you. Will you lend me the money to buy the lot and put up a building?"

If we are not careful, Mr. Chairman, this is what can happen. A man can rent a building costing $25,000 for $500 a month. He is assured of paying the cost of the building through monthly payments of $250 without investing any money of his own whatsoever. He can receive a net return of $250 a month, yet make no contribution whatsoever to the public interest.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Will the hon. member permit an interruption at this time? The Post Office Department does not rent buildings; it obtains them through the Department of Public Works. We tell them of our needs.

Mr. Regier: I fully realize that, Mr. Chairman. At the same time I also realize that the Department of Public Works will not put up a building for the Post Office Department unless the Post Office Department asks for a certain building to be put up.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): We ask for appropriate accommodation. We do not ask them to put up a certain building in a certain place. We want a building in a suitable location which will meet our requirements.

Mr. Regier: I am glad to have the parliamentary assistant now put the blame for what is happening on the Department of Public Works. If that is the case we shall raise the matter again when the estimates of the Minister of Public Works are before us. If that is the proper time to raise it, we certainly shall do so. However, if it is good business for an individual to put up a building in such heavily populated areas as the city of New Westminster, the municipal district of Burnaby, the city of Port Moody, the area around Surrey—and I know it is happening in other parts of Canada—if it is in someone's selfish interests to put up a new building and lease it to the government of Canada, it is also good business for the government of Canada to own such public buildings and collect its own rents. If it were not profitable for those individuals to put up those buildings they would not do it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary assistant has twice raised the point that this is not a matter for the Post Office Department; it is no concern of ours. Surely the hon. member would not mind saving it until the minister who is responsible has his estimates before the committee.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I shall end this discussion now. However, I am not fully satisfied that the Post Office Department is not in great measure responsible for obtaining certain accommodation from the Department of Public Works. I am not satisfied that it does not exercise some influence on whether or not public buildings are to be erected and owned by the government of Canada.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, we in this group are pleased to associate ourselves with the remarks that were made earlier in regard to the improvement in health of the Postmaster General and his return here in the very near future. We are looking forward to the day when he can return to his seat in the house next to the Acting Postmaster General.

I should like to compliment the parliamentary assistant on the very capable and efficient way he presented his report on the doings of the department in the past year.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam mentioned the new postal regulations having to do with the metropolitan area of New Westminster and Vancouver, under which my constituents come. I should like to associate myself with his commendable remarks in that respect. I want to compliment the government representative on the fine way in which the meeting was conducted. We possibly set a precedent, in that for the first time we had members of the Social Credit party, the C.C.F. party and the Liberal party in one room discussing a problem on which we reached an agreeable solution. However, it did call for some help from the people of Burnaby, who took it upon themselves to conduct a plebiscite and help the matter along. We in the area are very happy that such changes were made. The people in the north part of Surrey, which is now to be known as the North Surrey postal area, are very happy about the situation.

However, I am not on my feet for the purpose of extending only complimentary remarks. I am very happy to have the privilege of doing that and to pass them on, but for that reason I feel the department should know something else. In the course of his review the parliamentary assistant did indicate that the department was anxious to receive any information as to complaints, suggestions or recommendations the people had to offer, and would give them some consideration.

During the time I was at home at Easter, and earlier, I had occasion to meet with the letter carriers, the rural route carriers and the mail contract carriers, and discuss with them some of the problems with which they are faced. It might be possible to deal with some of the problems in a regulatory way.

Others are problems that are common to the nation as a whole and should be made known here.

With respect to the contracts of the rural mail carriers, I find that the population of the area in which I live is growing rapidly. The Postmaster General and his parliamentary assistant are aware of that. That also applies to the departmental officials. There are some 15 rural routes which terminate in the postal district of New Westminster. Because of the increase in population in that area and the contracts having been let at an earlier time, we of that area find that while the mileage remains the same the number of stops is continuing to mount. It would be very interesting indeed to discover what discrepancy, if any, exists between the rates paid to United States rural route carriers, the prairie rural route carriers, the rural route carriers of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and those in the mountainous area of British Columbia, including the lower mainland.

Another matter that bothers them considerably is the question of overtime and extra help. The report by the parliamentary assistant indicated that his department is cutting down on the amount of help that was supplied. These rural mail carriers are unhappy about that, as they feel they are being penalized. It is true that for a long time changes have not been made in respect of the regulations. From December 12 to December 31 the mail is particularly heavy when everyone is getting parcels or more mail than usual. These men have to do their own sorting, and are not given additional help.

I know under our system of mail contracts it will be said they should realize that when they put in their bid. That probably is an answer that could be made. I shall deal with that point shortly. It is found that during the week these rural mail carriers work as much as 16 hours a day, as well as eight hours on Sunday, in order to get out the mail as efficiently as our post office officials have the right to expect them to do. They work also on statutory holidays such as May 24 and December 25. It is most unfortunate that of all the people in the nation only parliamentarians and rural mail carriers have to work on a holiday such as May 24. If these days are permitted as holidays for the ordinary civil servant we should go a step further and grant the same privilege to these 13,000-odd mail carriers.

Usually when a route is put up for tender there are about 350 boxholders on the list, but quite often within a very short time the number of boxholders may increase to as many as 900, as has happened in my own area. Many of these men when bidding on these routes do not appreciate the potential growth, and they are afraid to bid high for fear they will not get the contract. It may be said that as they have contracted for the route they should go ahead and suffer the consequences, but I do not think the Canadian taxpayers expect these men to make deliveries to 500, 600, 720 or 802 boxholders when they have contracted to make deliveries to only 350. I do not think the public feel they should have to do that at the original contract rate.

This contracting system is actually unjust, for the reason I have just outlined. It is an antiquated system. It is something like the old tax collector who tendered for his job of collecting taxes. It is true that the mail carrier does not bring in revenue, but in order to obtain the contract he must underbid others for that particular job. Quite often the results are not the best, and poor service is given to the public.

I know the department was familiar with conditions on one rural mail route two or three years ago. In this case a particular individual had underbid for the route, and he obtained the contract. For four or five days after he took over the route people failed to get their mail, or it was misdirected. It was found the man could not read or write properly. More efficient men had bid on that route but were unable to get the contract. I must congratulate the postmaster at New Westminster for taking an active part in this matter and seeing that this man was replaced. But in the meanwhile there was this misdirection of mail, which would not have occurred had the proper man obtained the contract.

Oftentimes a route is changed and tenders must be called again. The experienced man knows the difficulties that will be encountered, but when he puts in a reasonable bid quite often he is underbid by someone who may have supplementary income, or who has little knowledge of how the mail should be carried and what work is involved. Yet that man gets the contract and we lose the benefit of the experience which the other man has to offer.

I have one case in mind in which a man was not given a contract in the beginning, but later on he replaced a most inefficient man, the one I spoke of earlier. This man had been with the department for a matter of 18 years.

Mr. Campbell: Who is "we"? The hon. member says "we", and I should like to know if he is referring to the department.

Mr. Hahn: I am referring to the people in the area to whom this man delivers mail. I happen to be one of those in the area and the "we" would include the people in the area. I think this is a matter that should be taken into consideration. We should consider the experience possessed by some of these men, and should take into account the lesser efficiency of a man who may underbid on a contract in order to get a particular route.

It may be true that the lowest tender is not always accepted. Frequently these men are brought into the district office and their bids are discussed, in the hope that they will bring them down to the lowest bid. The department is desirous of hiring the efficient and experienced carrier. I must say it has been found quite frequently that the department has been asked by some of these inexperienced people who have taken contracts that they be given increases, and quite frequently they get the increases from the department. The department realizes that their original bid was too low. But the result of all this is that the person with the greater knowledge of the route and who could have given the most efficient service does not get the job. Someone else gets the job, and then the rate is brought up to that at which the other man tendered.

Frequently the stock answer to a request for an increase is that the department does not feel that an upward revision in pay is justified, but should the man so desire the department will on 90 days' notice open the route for tender and the man will be free to bid again. That is the stock answer that is given when many of these experienced route carriers make these requests. They want to bid whenever there is an increase in pay because of changes in the number of boxholders, rerouting, or for some other reason.

This is a most unfortunate situation, and I do not think we are treating these men properly. They do not have a 40-hour work week; they do not receive any superannuation; they are not under the sick leave provisions, and they are granted no annual holidays. They pay their running expenses, which average about $100 a month, and they do not get the same benefits as do the letter carriers. They tender on labour.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam mentioned one of the other problems with which letter carriers have found themselves faced, namely this matter of subsidized advertising carried through our mails. Incidentally, this same complaint applies to both the letter carriers and the rural route carriers. As the result of an active advertising campaign on the part of the newspapers, as was explained by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, there has been a tremendous increase in the number of magazines which the letter carriers and rural route men are asked to carry. Two years ago it was rather usual for the letter carrier to have only two days on which his mail was particularly heavy, by reason of the fact that he had to carry more magazines on those days than on any others. However, today he has a heavy day every day.

The hon. member mentioned True Love magazine, I believe. I have others I could add to that list. There is Popular Science. The New Westminster post office used to receive a bundle and a half. Today they get 20 bundles of Popular Science. As to Parents Magazine, two years ago they got two bags; now they get 10 bags. Reader's Digest and other magazines are received in proportionate numbers.

According to the statement of the parliamentary assistant the post office is losing money. It is true it showed a $5 million net profit, but he said it failed to pay $13 million in rents to the Department of Public Works. In other words on a business basis it lost $8 million last year. In effect we are subsidizing these magazines. Whether they are cheap or whether they are good is not the important factor. It is the advertising contained in them that is supposed to be paying these charges, and not necessarily the householder, whether or not he buys those magazines.

The service to these magazines and to the publishers of other periodicals is greater than that given to air mail or first class mail. That, of course, is a situation which should not exist. We find that the postman notifies each publisher of the old and the new address. He notifies the United States publisher once and the Canadian publisher twice. He does not get any pay for this extra clerical work.

That raises a question that was mentioned earlier in respect to docking them one day's holiday for each three hours or five hours—I forget which it is—of time they are late within the year. These clerks quite frequently spend anywhere from 15 to 30 minutes a day after hours or during their lunch hour in redirecting magazines. This Post Office Department gets nothing for that service, nor do the men. However, if they happen to be 15 minutes late for a matter of three days—I forget just what it is now—or three hours late in the year, they lose a full day. Yet they do not get paid anything extra, whether it is 15 or 30 minutes extra they have to spend. I do not think that is playing the game fairly.

It is not unusual to see these letter carriers redirecting mail for 15 to 30 minutes of their own time. These misdirected magazines and periodicals are forwarded for 90 days, as is all first class mail; and then they are treated as first class mail and there is no extra charge to the magazine publisher. A letter carrier finds it impossible to get his regular work done in regular hours. As I said, he gets no credit for this extra time put in after hours or during his lunch hour. It does not matter actually on what part of his route he happens to be when lunch time comes. If he is two or three miles away from the post office he is given no credit for the time spent travelling back and forth to get his lunch, etc. I would not say that he should necessarily receive any extra time for travelling, but we should not penalize him, as we are doing according to this regulation that was posted as of April 1, in respect of one day lost for three hours that he may have lost through coming late during the year.

I return to the magazine question. At the present time the clerk notifies the Canadian publisher twice, and then he returns the magazine to the company. Some of these publishers never take notice of a change of address. On examination I have discovered that there are certain magazines such as Eagles magazine and Western Grocer, which the larger publishers find it more economical to send to the Post Office Department and then have the clerk spend his time returning it to the publisher, and it never does get to the man who has subscribed to it originally. He apparently does not bother to get his address changed properly. As to one particular magazine that was drawn to my attention, namely Motor Coach Conductors and Operators the same address was kept on that magazine for ten consecutive years. I am not so sure that it does not still come to the same post office.

Such a condition should not exist, under which we continue to charge our clerks one day holiday for being the equivalent of three hours late during the year, and at the same time give them nothing for redirecting this mail; especially on heavy magazine days, which is every day now. Fifteen to thirty minutes are given to the Canadian people of the time of these men who deliver the mail.

There are certain recommendations I would propose that might be instituted. One is that we as the parliament of this country should ask our magazine publishers to have their magazines labelled in a particular place. I do not know whether hon. members have taken the time to study the magazines at all. If you do so, just ask yourselves what you would do if you were a clerk and received a magazine that had to be redirected, let us say, back to the publisher. Do you know where you would find the publisher's name? I venture to say that if you brought 50 magazines in here you would find the addressor's name in 50 different places. That is a situation that should not be tolerated. If we want to use people's time properly we should ask that the name of the periodical and its address should be properly placed, let us say, on the inside cover or on page 1 or page 2, or some uniform place. It would not take anything from the cover of the magazine which seems to be the important thing but it could help these letter carriers and others in the postal department. It would save them considerable time.

The location of the names of the individuals to whom the magazines are addressed is something that might also bear some uniformity. It is helping cost the taxpayers this $8 million deficit that we will actually have for the year. Because it is costing us actual cash I think the people of Canada would be quite within their rights in asking that if a certain magazine reached a particular volume, the company should set up its own delivery system. Carrier boys deliver magazine such as Liberty and other publications, and I see no reason why the post office should subsidize magazine delivery.

There is another difficulty that is encountered. If you go into any large post office you will find magazines of all kinds stacked there. One magazine is to be delivered on May 24, let us say, another on May 27 and another on May 29. In this way we are providing a warehouse for some of these publications. Householders expect their magazines to be delivered on a particular day, and the person who takes the brunt of the blame is none other than the letter carrier. We cannot blame the householder. He has a right to expect that the magazine should be in his hands on the first Monday of the third week in the month, or whatever day it may be. However, by reason of the fact that the mail may be particularly heavy a great burden is loaded upon the letter carrier, who is not being treated in the same way as the ordinary worker in our cities and towns.

There are instances of mail coming into the post office marked, "Do not open until Christmas", or with instructions not to deliver it before a certain date. The post office personnel are particularly careful to try to please the person sending the mail and the person who is to receive it, but at times such as the Christmas season, when the amount of mail is particularly heavy, no one should expect mail to be kept in the post office for any length of time. However, in their co-operative way the post office personnel try to serve the public as efficiently and as well as they expect to be served. They provide this service at a very nominal charge, but I do not think they should be expected to do so.

I suggest that magazine publishers should be told that their magazines will not be held for delivery on a particular date once they arrive in the post office. Efficient operation is not only a matter of getting the mail to the post office but of dispatching it as quickly as possible, and it should be gotten rid of as quickly as possible.

Another problem that is of concern at particular times of the year has to do with heavy catalogue deliveries. To the best of my knowledge the catalogues have to be tied in bundles by the letter carrier on his own time. In the case of a city such as New Westminster the catalogues are shipped there by freight, and the freight rate of course is very low. Then they are delivered by letter carrier at the local rate of 18 cents each. I do not know where our business sense has gone. The letter carrier has to tie these catalogues into bundles on his own time. It is his own time because we do not pay him anything extra for it. Then he has to deliver them to householders some distance from the post office at a rate of 18 cents each. It is economically unsound. The catalogues come in burlap sacks, and then they are handled in the same way as magazines. They are stored until ready for release according to the wishes of the particular firms.

These catalogues are entirely advertising and nothing else. Why should the letter carriers be burdened with them? New Westminster post office is not a particularly large one. There are only about 100,000 householders who receive their mail through that office, but I find that the average shipment of catalogues to the office weighs some 34 tons. As you can well understand, that represents a great number of catalogues.

In most of our major cities and towns you will find mail order offices. If a person wishes to place an order with Simpsons-Sears or the T. Eaton Company or any other mail order house he can go to the mail order office and give the attendant his order, rather than use the mail to send the order to the company. At these offices he can either pay for his order or, if he has a credit account, the matter can be looked after in another manner. Instead of all these catalogues being handled through the post office, as they are today, I suggest that the different mail order houses be instructed to use a card system. I understand that some now do so to a certain extent. They should be asked to use a card system wherever possible to notify their customers that the catalogues are available at the local mail order office. Otherwise the postal rate for carrying the catalogues should be increased. The present rate for the handling of these items is only 18 cents which is unreasonably low.

Another complaint has to do with overtime. This question has been discussed in the house from time to time, but I for one am not satisfied that it has been handled properly. I am satisfied that if the deputy postmaster general or any of his staff were to check the larger post offices they would find postal clerks and letter carriers working after hours readdressing mail. This does not happen once or twice a year but once or twice a week, or oftener, and each time it may take a matter of 15, 20 or 30 minutes. If a person in industry has to work 10 or 15 minutes overtime he is paid for half an hour, but that does not apply in the Post Office Department.

The postal clerks and letter carriers are told that if they want to put in overtime they must come in earlier the next morning. If a letter carrier is in the habit of coming to work at 6.30 a.m. he should anticipate when he is going to have a particularly heavy load of mail and arrive at 5.30 a.m. Then the postmaster will recognize that the man is there for an extra hour and will give him an hour's overtime. I do not know whether it is because we mistrust our civil servants who deliver the mail that we have this kind of thing, but in my opinion we should not expect people to spend their evenings doing extra work and not pay them for it in the same way that industry treats its workers.

Another ground these men have for complaint is the fact that the check-up time, so far as letter carrier routes are concerned, is usually during the month of July. As everyone knows, July is a vacation month, and only about 65 per cent of the householders on a route are receiving delivery of mail. In the months of April and October, for example, 70 per cent or more of the householders are receiving mail, but by taking the month of July it is found that the figure is 65 per cent. Magazine subscriptions usually lapse at that time of the year. Catalogues are not distributed then, with the result that the mail is considerably less than usual. In speaking of the various letter carrier routes, it just means that once the fall and winter months are here the chore becomes more difficult. It means these carriers have to cover 70 per cent or more of a route which was actually set up on the basis of 65 per cent.

There is one other fact that was drawn to my attention, and that concerns the matter of carriers' garments. On April 5 of this year I had tabled a return of sessional paper No. 112-E concerning the type of garment being used and the suppliers thereof. Question No. 3 read:

Who were the five chief suppliers of (a) summer weight trousers; (b) winter weight trousers, during each of the past five years?

The answer was Master Craft Uniform Company, Registered, Quebec, for the years 1950 to 1953 and Maurice Pollack Limited, Quebec, for 1954 and 1955. I find that particularly interesting because the letter carriers complain that whereas formerly their uniforms lasted for two or three years, they are now very fortunate to have a uniform last for more than two or three months. I do not know if there is any relationship between the fact that letter carriers are being docked $20 per month for clothing and the fact that there is a new supplier. I am not in a position to say. If it is a matter of $20 per month, as I have been led to believe, then that totals to a $240 per year deduction. I am not prepared to say that is correct because I have not checked with the minister or any of the departmental officials, but I think it is $20 per month. If that is so, I would strongly urge that consideration be given to the fact the men feel they would be much better off buying their own uniforms and getting the $240 because the old uniforms lasted them for two or three years.

I am quite aware of the fact that the recommendations I have made are going to cost money. There is only one possible place from which this money can come. My suggestion is that the second and third class mail, which frequently receives the same treatment as first class mail, be handled on a sound economic basis. If it costs more money to handle third class or second class mail, then certainly we should expect those people who use the service to pay the extra cost of it. I am not interested in where they are going to get the money, but I dare say the natural and obvious place would be from the advertisers who use the mails and whom the people of Canada are subsidizing.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to have this opportunity of adding my voice to that of the preceding speakers to express by best wishes to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) and to wish him a prompt return to good health. I am also happy to congratulate those who have ensured the proper operation of the department during his absence.

[Mr. Hahn.]

The city of Chicoutimi, county town of the area which I have the honour of representing in this house, by virtue of its population, of its geographic location and of the beauty of the surrounding district, has been aptly named "Queen of the north". It is an important industrial, commercial, religious and educational centre; a progressive and lively city. It is the pride of those who live in the kingdom of the Saguenay and evokes the admiration of visitors because of its location, of its sunshine, of the warm hospitality and dynamic enterprise of those who live there.

It might possibly be perfect from a town planner's point of view if it had fewer level crossings, if the Canadian National Railways station were a more adequate structure, if its harbour installations were improved and the surrounding area beautified, and finally if the public buildings necessary to the proper discharge of various departmental activities were to be built there.

All these are things which come under the jurisdiction of the authorities in Ottawa and about which we should complain every time we have an opportunity to do so. I rise in this debate to protest against a lack of appropriate facilities, for the postal service more particularly, which is prejudicial to my fellow citizens.

I shall speak as briefly as possible and merely recall certain oral or written representations made in that connection during the past years.

One of our weeklies wrote as follows on May 8, 1952:

Chicoutimi—Following the request made by the Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Fournier replied that the federal government would do everything in its power to start work on the new central post office by this summer.

On March 16, 1953, the minister wrote me the following letter:

Dear Mr. Gagnon:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 13 regarding the construction of a public building at Chicoutimi, P.Q.

Any delay in the construction of that building is due to the fact that we do not know definitely which departments will occupy it nor what floor area will be required by each of them.

Yours very sincerely,

On April 9, 1953, I directed to the minister the following question:

Could the minister tell me which government services will be housed in that building?

The building in question is the one which was to be erected at Chicoutimi.

The minister answered:

The post office, the customs office, the unemployment insurance commission office and, I am told, other government services.

I suppose that the idea is to centralize, in this new building, the different federal offices that now exist at Chicoutimi.

He would know now which departments might use this building.

On October 27, 1953, the present minister wrote me the following:

Dear Mr. Gagnon:

In reply to your letter of the 15th instant concerning the proposed public building at Chicoutimi, I must inform you that we do not expect to be able to call for tenders with regard to that building before the spring of 1954.

Please believe me, dear Mr. Gagnon.

Yours truly,

Robert H. Winters.

In 1952, the minister advised the chamber of commerce—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit me to rise on a point of order. I wonder if these remarks about the desirability of a public building in Chicoutimi would not be more appropriately made on the estimates of the Minister of Public Works, who has the responsibility of providing public buildings as well as for providing premises for the post office. It is true, of course, that the Postmaster General does make certain recommendations to the Minister of Public Works, but it is the responsibility of the Minister of Public Works to evaluate all these recommendations. He is the only minister who could properly reply to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Gagnon: I am not speaking about the necessity of a public building for Chicoutimi for the other services of the government. I was speaking of the necessity of a building for post office purposes only. I am speaking about the urgency of building that building. Hon. members should see from my remarks that what I am now saying is in order.

(Translation):

As I was saying, the minister advised the chamber of commerce in 1952 that he would do his utmost to have the building started that year.

In 1953, I was told he was waiting for information from the various departments concerned in this project. Later on, I was notified that tenders would not be sought before 1954.

On January 3, 1954, the deputy minister wrote me the following:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 22, 1954, concerning the erection of a public building at Chicoutimi, P.Q.

The whole question of premises for the various government offices in Chicoutimi is now under consideration and, until the results of such survey are known, I am not able to tell you when construction on this new building will start.

Please believe me, dear Mr. Gagnon,

Yours truly,

Deputy Minister.

On the 15th of February, 1954, the Chicoutimi chamber of commerce sent the minister the following letter:

The Honourable Minister,

Since 1947, the Chicoutimi Chamber of Commerce has made numerous representations to the Post Office Department and to the Public Works Department, which is under your authority, to get a suitable post office in Chicoutimi.

The voluminous correspondence on the subject, the great number of photographs and other documents we sent and the visit of the Honourable Alcide Coté in June 1952 have fully shown the merits of our representations.

On the other hand, the honourable Postmaster General told us, in his letter of January 26, 1953, that his department had asked for the construction of a new building in Chicoutimi which matter now comes entirely under the jurisdiction of your department. Furthermore, on March 4, 1953, in reply to our letter of February 27th, you have told us, through your executive assistant, that a sum of $250,000 had been put in your estimates for the construction of a new building on the Tremblay site, on Racine street, but that the date of the beginning of the undertaking was not yet known at that time.

We need not tell you that the post office situation in Chicoutimi is more critical than ever before and that a new building must of necessity be constructed. For that reason we beg you to send us at your earliest convenience the following information:

A.—Has the amount of $250,000 which was written in your estimates for last year been carried over?

B.—We were informed last year that the delay was due to the drawing of plans and specifications for the new building. We assume that such work has now been completed. Is that correct?

C.—On what date do you anticipate the actual work to start?

The Chicoutimi Chamber of Commerce would greatly appreciate receiving the requested information in the near future, because that matter is of the utmost interest to our members.

Yours truly,

(Signed) A. Sincennes,

Secretary.

On April 29, 1954, I put the following question to the Minister of Public Works, as shown on page 4241 of Hansard:

Mr. Gagnon: An item of $250,000 was approved by parliament last year for that project but nothing has been done up till now. Would the minister care to comment on the project?

Mr. Winters: The situation there, Mr. Chairman, as I recall it, is that although there was that amount in the estimates last year we found this year when compiling the estimates that we were not ready to go ahead with the building. The plans had not been prepared. At the same time the postmaster indicated to me that he would like to study the whole matter of postal services in the area, and until such time as that is done we shall not be able to proceed with the building.

On May 14, 1954, I made the following remarks to the hon. Postmaster General:

Last year parliament approved a $250,000 appropriation for construction of a public building in Chicoutimi. A few days ago, when I asked the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) where this project stood and why there was no mention of that amount in this year's estimates, he answered that the Postmaster General (Mr. Coté) had told him that he would like to make a survey of postal services in that district and that his department was not in a position to proceed with this building before this survey was ended.

I would therefore like the Postmaster General to tell me what point has been reached in this survey and whether he will soon make a report to his colleague, the Minister of Public Works.

The minister knows full well that for the past twenty years and more the people of Chicoutimi, through civil authorities and chambers of commerce, have been requesting the erection of a suitable building. Present accommodation is inadequate, considering the growing needs of those people. A few years ago some land was acquired for that purpose. I know that the minister is well acquainted with Chicoutimi and that he also has some good friends there. I would therefore like him to tell me, when he speaks of his department, what his plans are with regard to Chicoutimi.

Here is part of the answer given by the Postmaster General as reported at page 4763 of Hansard:

As far as the Chicoutimi project is concerned, I do not remember whether the plan called for a building to accommodate various federal departments or whether it was only to be a postal station. I know that we had to revise this project and hold back for further study. I will look further into the matter and will be glad to give more detailed information to the hon. member. I must add that the project has not been abandoned but that it is simply under further consideration.

Finally, on October 8, 1954, I received a further letter from the Minister of Public Works, which reads as follows:

I hereby acknowledge receipt of your letter of September 21 regarding the construction of a public building in Chicoutimi.

Since returning from my trip I have had the opportunity of discussing this matter with the Postmaster General and other departments concerned. I can tell you that I have asked the building construction branch of my department to undertake the preparation of plans for this building.

Yours very truly,
Robert H. Winters.

On February 14, 1955, the minister wrote me as follows:

I have received your letter dated January 27, 1955, regarding the inadequacy of postal accommodation in Chicoutimi, P.Q.

The situation will not be lost sight of with regard to the difficulties mentioned. However it will be impossible to proceed with the immediate construction of a building in Chicoutimi, appropriations for this purpose not having been included in our departmental estimates for the coming fiscal year.

Yours very truly,
Robert H. Winters.

I made it a point, Mr. Chairman, to read part of the correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Public Works, the Postmaster General and the Chicoutimi chamber of commerce, as well as certain appeals I made in the house, in order to show all the delay in this matter and the excuses put forth for not remedying this situation, which has become unbearable.

I wish to assure the Minister of Public Works that should he be kind enough to pay us a visit at Chicoutimi, he would be received as a friend and I am convinced that having seen for himself the acute situation with which we are faced, he would immediately grant us this public building for which the land was purchased some years ago.

Here is what the Progrès du Saguenay, a daily newspaper published in our district, had to say on December 22, 1954, about the postal service in the city of Chicoutimi:

We would like to see the embarrassment of the Postmaster General if, during a stay in Chicoutimi, he had to send his Christmas parcels through the local post office. He would very likely do the utmost without delay to correct an unbearable situation. A visit to the post office, facing the cathedral, during the rush period, would show the congestion there is in that building. The number of wickets being insufficient, people have to queue up and must wait as long as half an hour to unload their parcels which become exceedingly heavy. We are not criticizing the service given by the postal employees: they are doing the best they can under the circumstances and the postmaster has enough employees to provide the best service he can in the existing building but the people cannot tolerate indefinitely such a situation.

The building of a new post office at Chicoutimi has definitely been agreed upon, but the necessary appropriations have not yet been voted. Let us hope that they will be at the next session.

One can readily understand, Mr. Chairman, why the people of Chicoutimi are so much in favour of decentralization of powers and provincial autonomy.

They know how difficult it is to get anything but statutory grants from the federal government.

We can count on our fingers the favours bestowed upon us by Ottawa since confederation, while the favours granted us by the government of our own province, especially in the past 10 years, have changed the appearance of our cities and even of our smallest villages. Our district is among those that pay the most taxes to Ottawa but, on the other hand, it is perhaps the one which receives the least in return.

We should be treated, not with more generosity because there is no such thing in Ottawa, but with more justice.

The taxpayers of Chicoutimi deserve more sympathetic attention from the government and I think the time has come to recognize it. Besides, I am satisfied that the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works are well disposed towards us and that they will at last grant our requests.

(Text):

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, in common with other members I regret the Postmaster General has not yet been able to return to his duties. I do hope however that he will have a speedy recovery and will soon be back with us.

I have a matter that I wish to bring up. I have taken it up with the department on other occasions. I am prompted to do it again because I have received a petition, and when I have finished with it I am going to send it over to the Acting Postmaster General. It has to do with my request some time ago for an airmail service to Norway House. I do not need to go into it. In the wintertime they get mail from Winnipeg, via Wabowden, and into Norway House. In the summertime they have to use the Keenora, which visits there once a week. This petition asks the department to do something about getting first class mail into Norway House more often than just once a week.

During the freeze-up and the break-up when the bombardier and the boat cannot operate, there are times when they get no mail service. I know that the weather is to blame for that.

Mr. Pickersgill: That happens in my riding.

Mr. Bryce: Yes, you and I should get together on this thing.

The plane that carries the mail during that period is quite a large one. It has been suggested by some people, who should know, that a lighter plane could land there with first class mail. They had the unfortunate experience this year of being without mail for some 5 weeks. The minister was surprised at that, but it was true.

I am not going to elaborate on it. There are 70 signatures on the petition. I know many of these people personally. They are reliable and good Canadians. They are worthy of the minister's consideration in an effort to get first class mail in there by air. If the Acting Postmaster General and his parliamentary assistant lived in Norway House they would have to prepare their mail on Monday night to get it away on Tuesday morning. That permits the mail to get into Winnipeg on Saturday afternoon. Because the mail arrives on Saturday afternoon you cannot possibly get a reply until the following week when the boat returns.

Let me give an example of how it works. A letter posted in Norway House on Monday, May 23, leaves that place on the 24th or the 25th, depending on the weather conditions. It reaches Winnipeg on Saturday afternoon, May 28. The offices or the wholesale houses receive it on May 30. At that time the mail bags for Norway House are already on the way to the station or to Selkirk. Therefore, that mail does not leave Winnipeg until the following week, and an answer will have to wait until Monday, June 6. It will reach Norway House on June 8 or June 9.

Some people seem to think that Norway House is away back from civilization, but let me draw the committee's attention to this. There are about 1,800 people in and around that district. The population is composed of Indians, half-breeds and white people. There is a large up-to-date settlement; there is a large new hospital there, an Indian agency, a detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, 2 boarding schools, missions representing the different churches, and also different day schools and a few stores. Surely, a community of this size is entitled to better mail service than they are getting at the present time.

If you look at a map of my constituency you will see that not very far from Norway House is Cross Lake, God's Lake and Oxford House. These places get an airmail service. There is also Island Lake, which receives an airmail service twice a week. I am advancing these arguments in an effort to get the department to give this matter further consideration. I appeal to the Acting Postmaster General and the parliamentary assistant, and ask them to look this over to see if it is not possible to give Norway House an airmail service for first class mail in the near future.

I have a letter from a gentleman who wants to know whether he can buy a 1½ cent stamp. I wrote back to him and told him that I had not seen one. He immediately sent me back an envelope that carries a 1½ cent stamp. I do not know how that comes about unless it is some of the cheap publicity used by the soap companies. They send out advertising matter. You take a coupon to the store and you get two articles for the price of one, or something like that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Maybe it is political literature.

Mr. Bryce: If it is, I would know something about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. Bryce: Now, when the minister replies I hope he will explain how some of these companies work it. It must be a company because the envelope carries a prominent name. It goes to the householder for 1½ cents. The cheapest rate I can get, or any of my constituents can get, is two cents. The department puts out a booklet entitled "Hints About the Post Office". I can find nothing in it about a 1½ cent stamp.

I was out of the House of Commons for about a year. When I left here there was an item of $25,000 in the estimates of the Department of Public Works for a post office in Selkirk.

Mr. Pickersgill: We listened for 20 minutes to a talk by the hon. member for Chicoutimi, which should have been delivered on the estimates of the Department of Public Works. Surely, that is not going to be looked upon as a precedent that every hon. member may follow in the committee.

Mr. Bryce: I was not going to go into it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I take a moment of the time of the committee to express my views on this particular subject? It seems to me that under the estimates of the Post Office Department, or of any other service department, the inadequacy, or the non-existence, of certain facilities must surely be a subject which is within the ambit of the resolution that we are discussing. I can understand that if the Department of Public Works had undertaken the construction of a building for the Post Office Department and some member wished to criticize the manner in which that construction was being carried on, or the speed, it would come under the estimates of the Department of Public Works. But if the hon. member is, as I think he is, dealing with non-existent facilities which he is asking the Post Office Department to bring in, then I find it impossible to rule that he would be out of order; because, if the building is not under construction, then it seems to me it surely is not within the ambit of the Department of Public Works. I hardly see how one can discuss under the Department of Public Works the construction of post offices which the Department of Public Works has not been instructed to construct. Therefore, while I can see that it is very desirable that all members should hold their criticisms and their requests down to those things which the Postmaster General can bring into effect, I cannot rule that the discussion of the need for improving or enlarging the post office facilities is out of order in a discussion of the estimates of the Post Office Department. I cannot rule a discussion of the need for improved or enlarged post office facilities to be out of order during a discussion of estimates of the Post Office Department, but I think perhaps one would be justified in saying that members would at least be indicating their co-operation if the need for the same building was not discussed under more than one department.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I am going to abide by your ruling and I am also not going to tramp on the toes of the minister. The recommendation for the building of a post office comes from the Postmaster General or the people who have to do with that. However, I am not talking about the building of a post office, I am talking about the need for a post office. Three or four years ago I brought photographs to this house to show how mail bags were left sitting around outside the door. There was no room for them inside. The hon. member for New Westminster has indicated how mail is held up for 24 or 48 hours. They simply have not room in the Selkirk post office at the present time. The space in which they have to work is deplorable. As I say, I have brought photographs to show the conditions.

I thought we were getting somewhere when I saw an item in the estimates. I am wondering now whether the officials of the Post Office Department changed their minds and decided that this post office was not needed. I will have to ask the Minister of Public Works what he did with that $25,000. During the last election they even had blueprints of the post office and, believe me, that did not help me any. This year there is no money being voted for a post office. I hope the Acting Postmaster General will look into this matter and recommend that Selkirk be given a new post office. The present building could be used to advantage for the R.C.M.P. and the Indian affairs branch. It would be good business to do that and to give Selkirk a new post office.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I imagine that there is no one who rises to speak on the post office estimates but thinks of the employees working for that department, the service which they are rendering and the efforts which they are putting into their jobs. That is particularly so because the Post Office Department, next to the Department of National Defence, is the largest employer of labour in the government. I think we have a particular respect for these employees of the post office when we realize some of the difficulties under which they labour and remember that the top man of their department has not been present in the house for some time. I am sure we all regret the unfortunate illness of the Postmaster General, for whom we have great respect. When you think about it for a few minutes you will perhaps wonder what would happen if the present status of the Postmaster General and the Acting Postmaster General were reversed. It is just possible that in that case both the Post Office Department and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration might be better off.

There was one thing in the remarks of the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General that surprised me quite a little, because to me it flies practically in the face of something we were told last year at the time the proposed and now effective increase in postal rates was being discussed. At that time the Postmaster General, as reported on page 1102 of Hansard of January 14, 1954, was referring to certain cost increases which he foresaw for his department, and he went on to say:

> These three items alone amount to $13,500,000. Expected net revenues from the increase in postage rates will be approximately $14 million, leaving only $500,000 to take care of possible normal increases in the price of basic materials and services which are essential for the operation of the postal service.

At that time the Postmaster General was crying poverty before the house. He said he simply had to have this increase in postal rates because if it did not come along his department was going to operate under a tremendous deficit. He was calculating that the increase in the postal rates would be just sufficient to permit him to end up on a break-even basis. If you read through the discussion of those several days you come away with the impression that even with the increase the post office was going to have a pretty tough time making ends meet.

The estimates originally tabled show a surplus for the present year of something over $6 million while the statement made earlier this afternoon indicates a surplus of approximately $5 million. Of course it is all hedged about with verbiage about public buildings, franking and various other things. When the Postmaster General was crying his tale of woe before the house last year there was no mention of those particular items. It is only now when the Post Office Department finds that it is wrong in its estimate that they come before us and attempt to explain away their faulty figuring. They surround the estimate with this other material which apparently has been thought up on the spur of the moment as an excuse.

In some respects I think we can feel very glad that there is this surplus, provided it is the result of more efficient operation in the post office. In that case it is a welcome situation which is far different from most other departments of government.

I would rather hope that with this surplus it might be possible for the government to examine again the question of their postal rates to see whether some reduction in some rates would not be possible.

We have had continuing promises for many years that as soon as the government found itself in a position to reduce taxation it would do so. They gave us a small example of that this year. If they were really and genuinely speaking their minds on this subject, let them give us another example. Let them take this $5 million surplus in the operations of the Post Office Department and follow through with a reduction in postal rates.

Having said that, I go on to make one or two comments on the post office and some of its operation. First I should like to deal with a situation which I think is particularly iniquitous because it is a direct reversal of what we in this party would like to think is the right way for a government to operate, that is to treat all people alike. We like to think that that is the principle upon which a government should operate. We like to think particularly that the government should treat all its employees alike.

If a man holds a job in one centre he should receive the same treatment and prerogatives as he would receive if he held the same job in another centre. We see no particular reason why there should be one set of rules and one set of standards for a man who happens to live and work for the government in Montreal and another set for a man holding the same position in Toronto. Yet I defy the gentlemen who sit over there on the opposite side of the chamber presenting these estimates to the committee to stand up and say that in the post office they have not the situation in which certain men who occupy exactly similar positions within the post office structure are being given varying treatment according to the locality in which they work.

To bolster this statement I am going to have to set it out in detail. I set it out for the benefit of the committee. Over a period of a couple of months I have tried to discuss it with the officials of the post office. I did not want to bring it before the House of Commons because it has always been my experience that once a minister takes a position in the house, no matter how stupid it is, he will never retreat from that position. However, sometimes you can get even a stupid minister—and they exist, Mr. Chairman—to see reason if you discuss the thing with him outside the house where his mistakes do not have to be brought before the people of Canada as a whole. That was my hope in this instance; but as far as I can see, I have not made much progress.

The situation is this. With the advent of the five-day week in the post office and with the department's desire to continue six-day-a-week mail delivery, it became necessary to employ certain other people who would, on a rotating basis, fill in on route after route as the regular men went off for their sixth day holiday. In order to get those men the department went to its present employees and offered them the opportunity for these particular positions. In order to make the position attractive, they gave them a title which, if my memory serves me rightly, was that of supervisory letter carrier. In connection with this matter it is important to remember that although a different title is attached to this job, the function is, without any change whatever, similar to that of the normal mail carrier, save that in the one case the mail carrier remains on the same route and in the other—supervisory letter carrier is the name of the function—he will rotate from one route to another.

Through certain circumstances which I will not go into here most of these supervisory letter carrier positions appeared to be more attractive to the newcomers to the department. By accepting that position, the newcomer to the department could get a sudden increase in salary. It brought him no higher than the men who had been in the department for a number of years but it brought him up to their level. That perhaps was the principal interest of the newcomer in applying for these positions. The result was that after a period of time the department found, first, that most of these supervisory letter carrier positions, for which applications had been made, were being applied for by newcomers to the department. Second, they found that they were not getting sufficient applications to fill all their positions. Thus, they decided to do something which I think was quite unfair.

In this connection I turn now to a series of three announcements or bulletins from the post office which dealt with these positions of supervisory letter carriers. The first one went out on February 19, 1954, and it said in effect—the government never speaks quite in this way—"We need supervisory letter carriers; here are the details of the position. The men who fill that position will have no preference in relationship to choosing their vacations over the rest of the letter carrier staff".

A week later, on February 26, the government completely reversed its position, this time issuing a bulletin saying that those who apply for the position of supervisory letter carrier and are accepted will have a preference over the remainder of the letter carrier staff in respect of their vacations.

As I have already indicated, the majority of these supervisory letter carriers were comparative newcomers to the service, and the effect of this second bulletin was to give them preference in choosing their vacation period over many men who had been in the service for 10 years, 15 years or 20 years as letter carriers, who had families, who had vacation plans and who had every reason—both because of length of service and because of personal position—to have prior consideration in respect of choice of their vacations. This was so obvious to the entire postal service across Canada and its officials that the holler which went up was simply tremendous.

Finally the department came out with one of the most amazing bulletins—for anybody who believes in decent treatment of employees—that I can imagine. It is dated March 16. It deals with this same subject and in effect it says this. I have a French version here and that is why I say "in effect", since I am not quoting directly from the English. In effect it says: If it is possible to get enough good letter carrier supervisors without giving them any preference with regard to vacations, you do not need to give them any preference with regard to vacation. But in the localities where it is impossible to recruit the necessary number of good letter carrier supervisors without giving them a preference in vacation time, we will give them this preference with regard to vacation.

What has happened since then, Mr. Chairman? In Toronto letter carrier supervisors and mail men—the ordinary letter carriers—select together from the same list in order of seniority. If a man is a letter carrier supervisor but has only five years of service he will not get a choice of vacation dates until an ordinary letter carrier with six years or ten years of service has had his choice of vacation. That situation applies in the great majority of locations across Canada. But in a minor number of cases, including Montreal, in order to bludgeon and to force the letter carriers into accepting these positions, the Post Office Department has chosen to give this preference in choice of vacation time—this preference which exists nowhere else except in these few localities across Canada—in respect of the letter carrier supervisor position, a job which is exactly the same as that of the letter carrier himself.

There are letter carriers by the hundreds—and I use that word advisedly—in the city of Montreal who have been in the service of the department for many years, who are being discriminated against. Because they are older men they have children who are going to school. They have perhaps got enough money together to be able to have a country home to which they like to go. These men are being deprived of their opportunity to take their vacations at a time when they can go with their families to their country homes in order that some newcomer to the department who has taken advantage of this particular situation to get a fast salary increase—and I have no objection to that whatsoever—may take his vacation in the months of July or August. It is completely unfair and iniquitous. To cite two cities, a completely different set of standards applies to letter carriers in Toronto and letter carriers in Montreal.

In the course of my discussions on this matter I never saw, in my estimation, more uncomfortable people than the departmental officials with whom I discussed it. We had interesting discussions that were very helpful. I am grateful to them for their help, but right across the board, starting with the heads of the department who sit in the house, it seems that I have never been able to get any sort of satisfactory answer outside of the completely ruthless one that they have got to do this in order to force these men into these positions. That was the interpretation I placed on the information I got from them, and I have never been able to get any other answer.

Having dealt with that subject and placed it on the record, may I express the hope at this point that this inconsiderate, ruthless and inequitable attitude of the department will be changed and changed very quickly.

I should now like to say a few words about the post office savings bank which was dealt with at some length in the Woods and Gordon report of some note last year. I think hon. members will recall the recommendation in the Woods and Gordon report that the post office savings bank be discontinued. I should like to quote one or two sentences from the report. It has this to say:

> . . . other banking facilities are available in the communities of 18,670 of the 22,699 active depositors.

In other words, at that point they were making the argument that in most places across Canada facilities parallel to the post office savings bank are available. The report says further:

> It is apparent therefore that the need for the facilities of the post office savings bank is not nearly as great as it used to be and we suggest that the time may have come when it could be wound up without hardship to any large number of depositors.

Finally:

> The annual cost . . . of the post office savings bank is estimated to be $377,000.

Despite this report, the department subsequently decided to continue the operation of this largely unnecessary and certainly money losing function. In thinking about the matter the thought came to me first that if we could suggest an alternative means by which facilities similar to the post office savings bank could be made available to the Canadian people generally at a figure substantially less than the current cost of the post office savings bank, we might be able to persuade the government to get out of this small banking business. I want to make it quite plain at this juncture that, while I think the government has some responsibility to lead in the provision of certain services, I feel equally strongly that when private enterprise is in a position to provide those services adequately it is time for the government to get out of the service. They certainly should not continue to operate them at a loss involving such an expense to the taxpayers as in this case.

Therefore I put forward this thought for the possible consideration of the Postmaster General, the Acting Postmaster General and the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General. In 1952 there were only 167,000 deposits made in the post office savings bank. That is the last figure I have. All the department needs to do is to agree to carry these deposits, properly insured and properly registered, from the post offices to any chartered bank branch in Canada without cost. They can then get out of the banking business in this field tomorrow and leave post office savings bank depositors in exactly the same position as they are now.

In other words, what I am suggesting is that the post office savings bank would drop out of the operation. Its accounts and operations would be placed with the chartered banking system of Canada. People who now bank with the post office savings bank would bank with a chartered bank. In cases where people cannot go directly to the bank they now have the privilege of sending their money through the mails, as we all know, but if we want them to be on a basis comparable to the present post office savings bank it may be necessary for the post office to carry these funds to a bank without charge. The interesting thing is that if the Post Office Department did that the charge incurred by the department for the cost of the postage and registration would be about $25,000 for the whole operation against the $377,000 that they are now paying.

An alternative suggestion, which I just mention, is that a person might be allowed to deposit his money with the post office, obtain a receipt and send the receipt to the bank which would in turn, on depositing the receipt with the post office, be reimbursed for the amount. The point I am trying to make in putting forward these two ideas is that the department should take another look at the post office savings bank with the thought in mind of seeing that the depositors will still get the services they are now getting but will get them through some established banking operation so that the government can get out of the business.

I should like to say a few words about twice-a-day mail deliveries. I do not agree with the attitude of the Postmaster General and the department that once a day mail delivery is genuinely satisfactory or acceptable to the people of Canada. In the statement made this afternoon it was said that the number of complaints with respect to this matter has been reduced. Of course they have been reduced. After people have complained and complained and complained for four or five years they finally throw up their hands in disgust and say: There is no use any more; we will stop complaining.

I can remember that when the income tax was first raised substantially not too many years ago there was a great deal of discussion and tremendous antipathy towards the move. We have reached the point now where we all realize, I think, that the incidence of taxation is terribly heavy, but you might say that we have learned to live with it a little bit. We do not like it but we know there is no use complaining because it is going to be crammed down our throats anyway. I think that has been the attitude of the people of Canada towards this one-a-day mail delivery. I suggest this thought in that connection to the Postmaster General. Why do we not have two-a-day mail deliveries five days a week? At the present time we give a mail delivery in most residential areas once a day, and that is six deliveries a week. If you gave two deliveries a day for five days, that would be 10 deliveries a week, which is an extra service.

The interesting thing about it is that if you examine it carefully you will find your costs for the two deliveries a day five days a week would be very little more if any more than the cost of the type of service that is now given. The operation of the department on Saturday would be reduced to a minimum. Sortage charges, overtime pay for clerks and many other things connected with Saturday operation would be substantially reduced. My information and my analysis lead me to the conclusion we could have two-a-day mail delivery five days a week on a very sound basis. I believe the people of Canada would be more satisfied with that. I feel they would far rather have 10 deliveries a week than six deliveries a week. I believe that in an era when we have come almost universally to recognize that the five-day week is in existence, the Post Office Department would receive general public approval if they realized that as well.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that a question of mine of May 11 has not been answered. I am rather interested in it. In the last six months or so the Post Office Department seems to have been subjected to a rash of thefts and robberies. My question of May 11 asked for certain information concerning thefts and robberies over the past year or so. I am amazed, first, that it was found necessary to make it an order for return. I am very surprised that the post office was not in a position, on as important a matter as money being stolen from office after office across Canada, to give an immediate answer to that question. But no, they bury it by means of making it an order for return. The question affects only one department, so there could be no reason for letting it stand for more than two weeks without an answer. The only inference I can draw, Mr. Chairman, is that the Post Office Department does not know how much money has been stolen from it, where it has been stolen, who is being charged with those thefts or what sort of success is being achieved in curbing the thefts.

I think that is a particularly poor situation for a department which has had something of the order of a quarter of a million dollars stolen from it in the last six months. Among other things, this department found it necessary to engage a man who finally turned out, only a couple of months afterwards, to be one of Canada's 10 most wanted criminals.

Here is a release from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police dated January 27, 1955, which says:

> John Keith MacDonald, 46, an ex-insurance agent, has been added to Canada's most wanted criminals list. John Keith MacDonald has been identified as John Clealand Wallace Black who is wanted in connection with the $44,500 missing from the post office at Britannia Beach, B.C., on December 17, 1954.
> MacDonald, under the name of Black, was employed in the post office as a clerk.

In other words, we have now reached the point where the Post Office Department, handling tremendous sums of money like this, is apparently letting creep into its staff—who are almost all among the finest people in Canada—criminals who are prepared to steal money from the department. Do you not think that indicates poor supervision somewhere along the line, poor care in the selection of certain employees or a loose examination of the records of the people who are allowed to handle post office funds?

An hon. Member: Perhaps it is the result of patronage.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): My hon. friend points out that perhaps this man came in under patronage. There are lots of such people in the post office who certainly did not go through the normal civil service channels. I hope, though, that even the Liberal party is not accustomed to patronizing some of Canada's most wanted criminals. I have a lot against these men on the treasury benches, but I do not think they would go that far—at least, not in between elections.

There is one point I should like to bring before the house. On March 25, I asked another question concerning the machinations of the post offices in Montreal and Toronto in connection with the T-4 returns. I am not going to go into details on that because I am coming towards the end of my time. I do want to express my regret that the question has not been answered up until now. I should like the Acting Postmaster General to lay before the house the information which I know he now has in that connection, and explain to us why it is that the government must break its own rules. In other words, the Department of National Revenue prescribed that certain returns must be in by a certain time, and a penalty was attached to failure to observe this provision. Then the post office, daddling along again probably without proper supervision or control, breaks the rules of another government department, delays these returns and generally causes considerable inconvenience to the employees in a number of Canadian cities.

It was interesting, Mr. Chairman, when they did make the return in the province of Quebec, to find that they got around to filing the federal government return first and then the provincial return. I do not know whether or not that is any indication of this government's attitude towards these two income tax systems. I mention that as well, and I think we might have an explanation of it.

In the course of this talk, Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out first the woolly-headedness of the Post Office Department in coming before this house last year and asking for an increase in postal rates, at which time they cried poor mouth and indicated they would have no surplus. Then later they come along and inform us that they have made over $5 million. I have pointed out the unfairness of their labour policy in respect to vacations for letter carriers in certain parts of this country. I have pointed out ways in which they might quite legitimately and quite properly give the same service to the people of Canada in respect of the post office savings bank and save themselves $325,000. I have pointed out the way in which they could restore the two-a-day mail delivery over a period of five days a week to the centres which are now deprived of it with very little, if any, increase in the cost of providing the service. I have pointed out a situation that is rotten in respect of thefts from the department and the way in which they are allowing the occasional person of doubtful record to creep into their ranks and sully the reputation of 50,000 of Canada's most devoted civil servants. Then, I have pointed out the regrettable situation in connection with the filing of their own T-4 returns.

I think what I have said will suffice for this afternoon.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to discuss more than one matter under this vote. I am not going to ask the Acting Postmaster General for a new post office at Vancouver. It is now being built, and we appreciate it very much.

However, there is one matter I most certainly wish to discuss this afternoon, a matter which I consider of the utmost importance—of such importance that I am going to be most careful and deliberate in anything I shall say about it. Sir, the use of the mails is very important; it is a great trust. I am hoping that after I have finished, the Acting Postmaster General or the parliamentary assistant will be able to give us some information.

In order to introduce the subject I have in mind perhaps I should give some background material. There has developed in Canada and in the United States a practice of sending goods or magazines to citizens, even though such goods or magazines have not been ordered.

I have known this for some considerable time. My understanding of the law is that if one has not ordered goods or has not subscribed to a magazine, he does not have to pay. However, I am afraid there are many people in this country—I would say even a majority of people—who do not know that they are protected by the law which says that if they have not ordered goods or subscribed to a magazine they do not have to pay.

However, there has been an unfortunate development in Canada in that some companies are sending out goods and magazines without orders or subscriptions, and then forwarding letters through the mail demanding payment. I have heard about this often, but only recently did it come to my close attention. Someone may ask why I discuss this matter under the estimates of the Post Office Department. I do so because there is connected with it the use of the mails in Canada.

I have said I am going to be very careful and deliberate. I shall speak from my own knowledge—and not only that because I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has had a similar experience. I say, sir, that in my estimation Her Majesty's mails in Canada are being used for what I call indirect blackmail, and that as a result many citizens of Canada are being placed in an invidious position, not because of Her Majesty's postal service but because of the use being made of it.

I would ask the Acting Postmaster General and the parliamentary assistant whether the law in Canada, and the regulations under that law, are adequate to take care of what is now taking place in this country. If not, will the government bring in the required amendments to the act or the regulations?

Let me place on record my own experience, to show what is happening. About two years ago someone—I do not know who—sent to Life magazine an order for a 12-months subscription to be delivered to me. I do not know who did that. I received Life magazine for 12 months and at the end of that time received a letter from Life, 540 North Michigan avenue, Chicago, Illinois, telling me that my subscription had expired.

I wrote the magazine saying that I had not subscribed and did not wish to have the magazine sent to me. It continued to come. They wrote me again saying, "You have not renewed your subscription", ignoring completely the fact that I never had one. They told me that I owed them a certain amount of money, and I replied "I have never subscribed to your magazine, nor have I renewed a subscription. I have told you once that I do not want to have the magazine sent to me." It continued to come, and I received another letter to which I replied as I had replied before. Those communications were from the United States.

But, Mr. Acting Postmaster General, last week I got something different. And what I received last week brings this matter within the purview of Her Majesty's mails in Canada. The letter I received last week was signed by a man named Charles A. Palmer, and the letterhead bore the name of Life magazine, of the United States. This letter from Charles A. Palmer, credit manager, enclosed a business reply envelope addressed to Life, Post Office Box 160, Toronto, Ontario, for the attention of Mr. Charles A. Palmer. So now it is strictly a Canadian matter, and a Canadian postal matter.

Sir, I want to read to you the letter I received, after having for months said I did not want the publication. I never sent for the publication; I have never taken any subscription to the publication. This is the letter I received through Her Majesty's mail:

I am very sorry that I have to write to you—

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report progress?

Progress reported.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

334. Departmental administration, $1,546,388.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Winch: At the time we adjourned this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, in order that the House of Commons could attend at the other place, I was drawing to the attention of the committee a factor which I thought was of importance, namely that of using Her Majesty's mails for a purpose which I said—and I will repeat it—I thought was indirect blackmail. I had outlined to the committee a procedure which was being followed by companies in sending not only goods but magazines to citizens of Canada, then sending them a bill—even although they have not ordered the goods or the magazines—and then demanding payment. This afternoon I pointed out that this is followed up, to my own knowledge, by three letters from the United States. At the time of adjournment I had pointed out that on the fourth occasion it is a letter strictly from and in Canada, thus bringing the matter within the complete jurisdiction of the postal services of Canada.

At the time of adjournment I was just starting to read a letter which I received only one week ago about a publication which I never ordered, and never subscribed to. I wrote three times to Life magazine in Chicago, Illinois, saying that I did not want it. Yet from Toronto last week, under the name of Charles A. Palmer, I received a letter. Not only did I receive a letter but I received an envelope saying that it should be sent to "Life, P.O. Box 160, Toronto, Ontario. Attention: Charles A. Palmer". If you desire me to do so, Mr. Chairman, I will file that envelope with you. I also received a bill. I have it right here and I will file it, Mr. Chairman, if you desire me to do so. This bill says "Amount due, $7.87" and "Due for copies mailed, $2.60". This, sir, is from Toronto. Here is the letter sent through Her Majesty's mail on something I never ordered, with a bill which I do not know anything about. Here is the letter:

> I am very sorry I have to write you this letter. Up to now we thought you really wanted Life—and had just put off or forgotten to pay for your subscription.

Mr. Chairman, I never subscribed to that magazine in my life, but this is what I received:

> But now that your account has remained unpaid so long that we have had to stop sending you Life—now that we are billing you only for copies already served . . .

Mr. Chairman, the letter talks about "copies already served". I have said I will file, if you require it, the bill sent me for $2.60 for copies mailed but also due, $7.87. I quote again:

> For we are members of the Publishers National Credit Service; and, as members, we have assumed a very definite obligation to other publishers and to all other business houses that extend mail order credit.

Sir, I am asking you to note that term "mail order credit" because I am going to refer to it in a few moments. Again I quote:

> And that obligation makes it impossible for us just to forget the small bill you have owed us over these last few months, for each account on our books is closely investigated by the credit auditors.
> Somehow I can't help feeling that our not receiving your cheque or money order for so small a sum must have been a mistake. For it almost never happens that the kind of person who would be interested in Life consciously defaults his bill . . .
>
> If your failure to send your payment was just an oversight, will you please let me have your cheque in the enclosed envelope, marked for my personal attention, by return mail?

And "by return mail" is underlined. The letter is signed by Charles A. Palmer of Toronto.

Mr. Chairman, I have had a remarkable experience since I adjourned the debate when the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod knocked on the door when I was speaking. Since then a number of members of parliament have come to me and said that they have had letters of a similar nature. I asked them, "What have you done with them?" They were not all from the same company. They all have told these people where they could go and, as I did, just how they could get there. But, sir, we are members of parliament. Perhaps we know something about the law. But if letters of this kind are being sent to members of parliament demanding payment and casting aspersions on our characters, I wonder how many thousands of people in Canada—who perhaps do not know the law as we do and who perhaps can be intimidated as we cannot be —are getting letters of the same kind, demanding payment on something they have never ordered, and being sent through Her Majesty's mail.

The Chairman: Order. I have hesitated to interrupt the hon. member but I have been waiting with some interest to see how he would connect his remarks with the estimates of the Post Office Department. He has related at some length letters which he has received through the mails, but so far I do not see that he has shown in what way the Post Office Department would enter into this matter or how his remarks are related to the estimates of the department. I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks to resolution No. 334, administration of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I thought I had made that very clear when I began my remarks this afternoon. First of all I had to give the background of the picture and show what was happening. I pointed out that demands for payment, which I called and still call indirect blackmail, were being sent through Her Majesty's mails. The letter I have just read came through Her Majesty's mails. When I began my remarks this afternoon I asked if the Acting Postmaster General or the parliamentary assistant could inform the house whether it was permissible for Her Majesty's mails to be used along the lines I have been outlining. I have related the matter completely to the estimates now before us.

There is one other phase of the use of the mails for this purpose which can be very serious and detrimental to anybody who receives through the mails this kind of letter demanding payment and enclosing a bill for something never ordered or subscribed for. Information that payment is refused goes to a credit association, and there are such associations in every province of Canada. Such information about failure to make payment can hurt the credit of anyone in this dominion. Therefore I think this is an important matter. As I said only a few moments ago, I have discovered I am not the only one who has had this experience. A number of members have encountered the same thing. I have been told by three members of parliament that Time magazine is doing the same thing as Life magazine. Therefore I ask the question now, and I think it is important in the interests of the people of Canada, whether or not the postal law and regulations can prevent the Canadian mails being used for this kind of thing. If not, will the Acting Postmaster General take under advisement the amendment of the law or regulations to stop this practice on the part largely of United States companies operating through agencies in Canada, and which is now prevalent in this country.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I was attending the external affairs committee and I am not aware of what course the debate has followed. However, I want to bring to the attention of the acting minister and his assistant a couple of matters I was asked to raise, and as usual I will be quite brief. Our letter carriers perform a very essential and necessary service and the amount of labour involved in it is not appreciated by many people. They walk miles every day going up and down steps from house to house. In my constituency their difficulties are rather above average. We have advantages and disadvantages on account of living in Kootenay West.

In the cities of Nelson and Trail the letter carriers have to climb hundreds of steps daily going from one street to another and therefore the performance of their duties is somewhat more arduous than is the general case throughout Canada. I know that their organization has made representations urging an increase in their rates of pay and improvement of their working conditions. I am simply going to ask that sympathetic consideration be given to these representations and that every consideration be taken of the burdensome nature of their employment compared with many other jobs in the civil service.

The other matter I want to raise has to do with what I think is a quite unnecessary burden placed upon the letter carriers by many companies. Letter carriers and postmasters tell me there is an increasing number of heavy catalogues, booklets of various kinds and other reading material going through the mails. Quite recently it was brought to my attention that Reader's Digest produced a special booklet and sent thousands of copies into my constituency. Each booklet weighed one pound, eight ounces, and the local letter carriers had to lug them around and make trip after trip to dispose of them. The whole staff was completely exhausted when that day's work was completed.

I suggest the Post Office Department should make some better arrangements and find some way of having this heavier material delivered without causing this completely unnecessary burden on letter carriers. I understand that formerly this only occurred at infrequent intervals, but now the carriers are repeatedly being burdened with heavy catalogues, booklets and things of that sort. I do not know what to suggest. Possibly a card could be mailed from the post office to the person who is to receive the publication or some arrangement could be made for their distribution by freight or express. I was asked to bring these two matters to the attention of the acting minister, and I trust he will give them his usual serious consideration.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Kootenay West, I was also busy this afternoon with committee work. I too do not know just what trend the discussion has taken. I want to say at the outset I have had the very finest co-operation from the officials of the department in all matters I have brought to their attention. But there is one matter I believe must go to the ministerial level for attention, the question of the differential in rates of pay between various classes of post offices. There are perhaps four post offices in Kootenay East that are grade 9 offices. The rates of pay for clerks in those offices begin at $2,010 a year and reach a maximum of $2,760 while postal clerks in the larger offices begin at $2,400 and reach a maximum of $3,360. I believe that the clerks in the smaller offices take the same civil service examination and are required to know as much about post office business and the distribution of mail to various countries as clerks in the larger offices. In the cities where the larger offices are, the cost of living is much lower in most cases. In East Kootenay, for instance, the men on prevailing rates are paid on the basis of rates in the mining and lumbering industry. Local conditions require a higher rate of pay for the employees to maintain equality with the local residents. Of course, the cost of groceries is very much higher than in the larger centres. It is for that reason I feel the clerks in the smaller grade 9 post offices should at least receive a rate comparable to that received by the clerks in the larger centres. I hope the minister will take that into consideration.

Mr. Ellis: There are one or two observations I should like to make on this first item. Last year a great deal was said about the introduction of the 40-hour week and the government used that as one of the reasons for introducing an increase in postal rates. This year the parliamentary assistant referred to the 40-hour week and gave us some figures of the additional cost to the post office as well as the number of new employees resulting from the introduction of the 40-hour week. Last year there was some doubt in the minds of many of us as to just what the 40-hour week was going to be, particularly in view of the fact the Postmaster General seemed to feel that it meant a normal working period of 40 hours, followed by an overtime period paid for at regular rates of pay.

This matter was brought up last year, but we did not get any clear-cut satisfactory answers. I am not satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that there has been any improvement in this regard during the past year. I am sure hon. members received a letter dated February 9 from the federated association of letter carriers, branch No. 3, Hamilton, Ontario, dealing with the situation in one of our large postal areas in Canada. From the information contained in this letter over the signature of Fred Bimson, secretary treasurer, the postal officials asked the employees of the Montreal post office to vote on a plebiscite to determine whether or not they were in favour of working a six-day week, and for the hours worked in excess of the five-day week they were to be paid at an hourly rate equal to their salaries.

Now, when that plebiscite was held the letter carriers revealed quite clearly by their vote that they did not favour the proposed changes in their working conditions. However, in spite of the fact the letter carriers voted down the proposition put forward by the postal officials the department nevertheless went ahead with their plans. They ignored entirely the wishes of the employees in this regard. According to the information that we received in February last, the secretary of the federated association of letter carriers protested to departmental officials. He was informed—

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): May I say that the particular plebiscite to which the hon. member was referring was purely a local plebiscite. It was held in Montreal at the request of the employees and had no particular official sanction and no action was taken. We carried on as we had in the past.

Mr. Ellis: I want to thank the parliamentary assistant for that bit of information. I had no way of knowing whether the plebiscite had been taken at the instigation of the Post Office Department or the employees. Nevertheless, the fact of the matter is a plebiscite was held, irrespective of the fact the initiative was taken by the employees, and apparently departmental officials were prepared to sound out the employees in that postal area. Those employees made it quite clear that they were not in favour of departing from the five-day 40-hour week. Notwithstanding the evident desire of the employees, the Post Office Department went ahead with the proposal. I am not suggesting it was made mandatory or compulsory, but the employees would be asked to work a sixth day and if they agreed to work a sixth day they would be paid only regular rates of pay.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): May I make this clear? The employees requested that this plebiscite be taken, and it was taken. In some areas a majority wanted the change and in other areas a majority did not want the change. The five-day 40-hour week was in effect before the plebiscite was taken and it was in effect afterwards. The vast majority of the employees throughout the city did not want any change. They wanted the five-day 40-hour week, and they still have it.

Mr. Ellis: The thing I am concerned about is this. If it is the policy of the department to institute a 40-hour week in certain localities in Canada, then that is departmental policy. I gathered from the remarks made by the Postmaster General at the last session that he did not see anything wrong in the idea of asking postal employees to work extra hours at regular rates of pay. I recall asking the Postmaster General at that time whether he was not aware of the fact that under normal practice when an employee works in excess of the 40 hours then that employee should receive overtime pay at overtime rates of pay. The ordinary practice is to pay time and a half for overtime. That is the thing about which I am concerned. I am glad the parliamentary assistant has given more information about this matter.

I am still concerned about the status of the 40-hour week in the post office in those areas in Canada where the department has presumably adopted the 40-hour week. I feel that if the 40-hour week means anything, it means that the normal work week is 40 hours. Every employee who is required to work a single hour in excess of 40 hours is working overtime and should be paid for that at overtime rates of pay. If you do not pay time and a half for overtime, then it is not a proper 40-hour week. That is the thing about which I am concerned. I believe that when the Post Office Department or any other department of government institutes a 40-hour week, they ought to be prepared to pay employees who are asked to work overtime at overtime rates of pay. I hope when the parliamentary assistant speaks later he will deal with this point and inform the members of the committee whether or not the practice is to pay overtime rates of pay. Otherwise this boast of the 40-hour week is not entirely accurate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I may be permitted to interrupt the hon. member. I am informed that the regulations with respect to the 40-hour week in the post office are precisely the same as they are in all other branches of the civil service where the 40-hour week is in force. Any change that might be made would apply to the civil service generally and would be made by the civil service commission. It would not be within the power of the Post Office Department to make any change, and therefore it would hardly seem to be an appropriate subject to deal with on these estimates and should be dealt with on the estimates of the civil service commission.

Mr. Ellis: It seems to me that this afternoon the Acting Postmaster General has been on his feet three or four times stating points of order in which he has sought to circumscribe debate—

Mr. Pickersgill: To the Post Office Department.

Mr. Ellis: —by suggesting that we should bring this matter up or bring that matter up under the estimates of some other department. I suggest I would be out of order if I began to discuss the civil service as a whole. I am now dealing with post office employees because the estimates of the Post Office Department are now before the committee. What I am saying about postal employees certainly has an application in a wider field. But in an effort to be strictly in order I am confining my remarks to employees of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I might interject once more, I would say that I have not the slightest desire to circumscribe the hon. member or any other hon. member. But there is a rule which says that the minister who is responsible for and can do something about a certain thing is the minister who ought to answer in that particular field.

I understand these regulations with respect to hours of work apply uniformly to all branches of the civil service. They could not be changed by the Postmaster General, nor could they be changed for the Post Office Department as a separate entity. Unless there were a general change of policy, whatever can be done would have to be done at the instigation of the responsible minister. I do not wish to circumscribe the hon. member, or anybody else, but it is certain that there is a large area over which the Postmaster General has responsibility, and that is the responsibility for which he is expected to answer in committee—and not with respect to things not within his jurisdiction.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the Acting Postmaster General must certainly be concerned about the esprit de corps among post office employees. I am certain he is concerned about working conditions because, after all, the efficiency of his department depends upon good relationship between employers on the one hand and employees on the other. I suggest that if the Acting Postmaster General or the parliamentary assistant is anxious to bring about better conditions within the Post Office Department he might use his influence with the appropriate minister to bring about changes, not only in the Post Office Department, but in other departments of government as well.

There is one other aspect of working conditions among post office employees I wish to mention. I am referring to the matter of holidays. It will be recalled that at the last session holidays were used as an instrument of policy on the part of the post office to bring about certain desired effects so far as staff was concerned. It will be recalled that as a result of a change in policy at that time, which I understand has been modified since, certain employees who took certain jobs were given priority in the matter of holidays. As I say, it is my understanding that this policy has been modified to meet the wishes of the employees.

However, I think it is indicative of the type of thing we must always watch for in this department, when we find that this year the Post Office Department—and once again I am speaking of that department, but it has its broader application—is determined to use the annual holidays as a weapon to achieve certain results in the administration of the department.

Mention was made this afternoon of the rather humiliating proposal that civil servants who are late a certain number of hours shall have their holidays docked. I suggest to the acting minister that that is not the way to deal with the question of habitual lateness. If it is found that there are employees who are causing trouble and who, without reasonable excuse, are late habitually, then I think the proper method is to deal with each individual employee. But to pass a blanket regulation to cover all civil servants is an insult to them and a humiliation of the worst kind. The government is treating civil servants as parents might treat children. The threat is made that if employees are late so many times then, as a matter of policy, so much of their holiday time will be taken away. To my way of thinking that is a very shortsighted and foolish policy indeed.

As a matter of fact one civil servant who spoke to me about the matter said that he had not been late for work in the last seven years, but that he was greatly upset about this ruling. He was not concerned about himself, but rather with the principle involved. It is such a childish procedure for the government to say to civil servants en masse, "If you are late a certain number of hours you will lose that time from your holidays". I suggest that holidays are the right of employees, irrespective of the jobs they are doing; and that to use a man's or woman's holidays as a means of bringing about certain results in the day-to-day administration of the department is, to say the least, a mistake.

It seems to me there are a number of improvements that could be made in the Post Office Department, so far as working conditions are concerned. Hon. members may have noted the recommendations made by employees of this department a week or so ago, as publicized in the press. It would appear to me that those requests are quite reasonable and that the government should be giving favourable consideration to them. There are some matters I shall not deal with this evening, because I wish to be brief. There is, for example, the matter of longevity pay, as well as other proposals that are reasonable and which should commend themselves to the Acting Postmaster General. I hope those suggestions will be given consideration.

I wish to close on this note. Last year I suggested that we are always going to have little annoyances from time to time, so long as the government treats its employees in the present fashion. The answer of necessity must be that employees of the government, working through their organizations, must be free to bargain collectively with the government as the employer. I am certain all hon. members have come to accept the idea of collective bargaining, under which employees, through their organizations, meet with employers around the bargaining table and reach agreements mutually satisfactory. I think that is the only proper way to carry on negotiations and day-to-day discussions between employee and employer. I suggest the government ought to be giving serious consideration to keeping away from the idea that federal civil servants must simply beg for improvements in working conditions dealing with matters such as overtime, wage increases and the like. The only proper way is to say to the employees, "You have your organizations which are free to bargain on your behalf. We will meet around the table as equal partners, and we will arrive at a contract dealing with wages and with working conditions generally." I believe that is the only answer to improved relations between the government as an employer and its employees. It is something that we have to accept as normal and desirable in this country. Rather than always following the lead of other employers, the government should be setting the example. We have had arguments raised about the question of the 40-hour week in the post office. The 40-hour week should be made much wider in its scope; but the government takes the attitude, well, we are not going to institute the 40-hour week unless it is the normal practice in the area. In other words, the government as an employer is not going to set the example; it is going to adopt the 40-hour week in the areas where local conditions pretty much force it into that position.

I suggest that the government ought to be setting a high standard for other employers. One way in which they could do this is by revising their methods in dealing with employer-employee relationships. They should get the employees around the table and come to an agreement which would be applicable to both sides and mutually acceptable.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with the matter which was brought up this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East. The hon. gentleman discussed a matter this afternoon and tonight which is giving some concern to many people. We are well aware in this country that some United States publishers are trying very hard to increase the circulation of their magazines and reviews. To arrive at their aim they are trying to get subscriptions to their publications in an indirect way. First of all, I must say I have no objection at all to the publication of those reviews, but I do object to their method of getting subscriptions.

There has been a decision in the courts, in the province of Quebec, to the effect that a contract cannot be a unilateral proposition. Therefore, if someone is receiving reviews, magazines or newspapers without having subscribed to them there is a way out. It is to refuse the publication, and send it back. In the province of Quebec no publisher can collect money from an individual who does not sign an agreement to receive a publication for a year, a month or two years. Of course, from another point of view I recognize that publishers are abusing their rights and are trying by all means to increase, if not their circulation, the amount of subscriptions. I am against that method of getting magazines into this country. I am against all kinds of pressure. I am not going to blame the department of the Postmaster General. The department has nothing to do with this problem. It is not the duty of the department to open the letters of publishers to see what is in them.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member has just said that the Post Office Department has nothing to do with the problem he is discussing.

Mr. Knowles: He had better withdraw that.

The Chairman: I think I should advise the hon. member that I brought a similar point to the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver East, who then related his remarks to the Post Office Department. I would ask the hon. member who has the floor to bring his remarks within the discussion of the administration of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Boisvert: I was coming to that. I was saying that the department has no responsibility for that method of carrying on business. If the department could find a way to overcome the difficulty that now confronts the people of Canada with respect to these magazines I would ask it to do so. I think they could overcome the present situation by getting in touch with the department of the postmaster general in the United States and making representations to this effect. We must be free to subscribe to publications of any kind, provided that the morality of the same is safeguarded. I have nothing to say against them. The only departments which can help the people of Canada resist the pressure campaigns of publishers of all sorts of magazines in this country are the departments of the Postmaster General of Canada and of the United States.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I suppose that no department of government enters into the daily life of every Canadian citizen as much as does the postal department. When I say that, I should like to pay my tribute to the parliamentary assistant, who is so ably carrying on the duties of the Postmaster General, who is ill.

The remarks I have to make tonight will be brief. There are two or three matters that are of particular interest to Canadians. The first is this. In a world that has been speeded up in the last 25 years the post office has not kept pace with the speedy developments. I see the parliamentary assistant looking at me and probably thinking of airmail. Twenty-five years ago a letter posted in London before five or six o'clock in the afternoon would be delivered in Toronto the next morning. Two months ago a friend of mine posted a letter in London and two days later it was delivered in Toronto. At the same place at the same time he posted a special delivery letter, and it was delivered three days later in Toronto. It was addressed by the same man to the same persons and posted on the same day at the same post office.

When the all-up airmail was introduced, most Canadians thought they were going to get speedy mail delivery, but such is not the case. Thousands and thousands of Canadians who are paying a 25 per cent increase in first class mail rates, which is what the increase amounted to a year ago, are not getting any advantage from all-up airmail because of the fact that they do not live in areas where airmail is available. Much of the airmail within the province never gets to a plane at all. It is only when large distances are to be traversed that the all-up mail really comes into effect. An editorial in the St. Thomas Times-Journal of March 17, 1954, had this to say:

> People in the big cities may benefit from the all-air mail service, but the vast majority of Canadians who live in rural districts or in centres remote from airports used by T.C.A. will suffer grave inconvenience. There is real merit in the suggestion that a special stamp be issued that would serve as an ironclad guarantee that mail when desired shall move only by rail.

That indicates the thinking of some people in the country. I have here a news item which appeared in the London Free Press protesting the slash in the rail service in western Canada. It states:

> Changes in the Stratford-Sarnia route become effective next Monday.
> It was also announced that a truck will take over from the train in carrying mail between Sarnia and Stratford.

It goes on to point out that a passenger unit will leave Sarnia Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday morning at 8.30 beginning March 14. The train will make the return trip from Stratford Monday, Wednesday and Friday. I might mention this news item was written a year ago. If they have to depend on a schedule like that the people in that area are going to have a much poorer mail service than they have now. There is no provision in these trucks for sorting mail en route, which means that in many cases mail will have to be rerouted over the same route a couple of days later.

The establishment of the 40-hour week has made the people employed in the railway mail services begin to think that they are the forgotten people. Because of particular routes and train schedules they are penalized.

The United States has introduced a diesel motor truck which is equipped in the same way as the railway mail car. In many cases this service has proved to be more efficient and cheaper than the rail service. We are facing a problem as far as railroad revenues are concerned, especially in the case of the Canadian National Railways, and therefore I submit that motor truck routes should be set up only in those cases where the railways do not give a service.

There are four or five such routes that could be established in the vicinity of London, and I would just mention Clinton, Wingham, Kincardine, Wiarton and the Stratford-Sarnia service to which I referred a moment ago. I think western Ontario would provide a good area for an experiment of this nature because of the density of population, the conditions of the highways and the fact that there is a central administration point at London which is equidistant between Windsor and Toronto and serving the northern area of Huron and Bruce.

For the information of the minister I will send over this copy of the National Geographic magazine of July, 1954, which describes the development of this motor truck service where the sorting is done en route. In the truck service provided in Ontario no sorting is done en route. By adopting this other method the sorting could be done en route and mail delivery made much sooner than it is now.

Mr. Jones: I should like to endorse what the previous speaker has said, that while an excellent airmail service is provided for the larger towns some of the smaller towns are not getting the type of service they deserve, and I refer particularly to the interior of British Columbia. I suggest that the minister start to make greater use of the small air lines operating between Calgary and Penticton, and Vancouver and Penticton. This would speed up the service in that area.

What I rose particularly to do was to pass on several complaints I have received from British Columbia with reference to the period between the calling of tenders and the expiry date for filing applications for the conveyance of mail between stations and post offices and so on. I submit that an extra week's time should be given before the final date of acceptance, this to apply west of Winnipeg and definitely throughout British Columbia.

The nature of the complaints varies. One complaint I have is that the notice appeared in the post office for just one day before it was taken down. The person complaining did not know who had taken it down. Another complaint is that the notice was taken down the same day it was put up. Presumably someone interested in the contract did not want any competition.

I suggest that there be a penalty for anyone removing such a poster from a post office before the time has expired for the receiving of tenders. I can give the minister the particulars of these complaints if he wishes to have them, but I understand that they are fairly general. Members of parliament receive copies of these notices but in many cases there is no possible chance of sending them along to someone in British Columbia who might be interested in tendering but could not get a tender in on time owing to the short period allowed for that purpose.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver East referred to the mails being used for the disposal of merchandise. I wish to warn the Postmaster General that when door to door service in place of a box service is introduced he might be on the lookout for people who send out little metal mail boxes. You wonder where it comes from, but after a while you get a letter saying it is worth $2.75. When you write back and say that you do not want the thing they ask you to pay the return postage. I suggest to the Acting Postmaster General that he note this, because it will happen again.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, last year when the Postmaster General introduced a bill to change the postal rates we had the benefit of a report which had been issued on March 1, 1953. This year we did not have the benefit of the report of the department for some reason or another. I am not criticizing them for that fact. The report is dated October 1, 1954, and for the report that I have here I am indebted to the parliamentary assistant who allowed me to have it so that I could make some kind of comparison between last year's report and this year's report.

When they introduced the increased postal rates last year they anticipated a deficit in the department of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $13,500,000. I just thought that I would check over those figures with the report this year, and I find that they just do not seem to stand up. That brings back the contention that we made last year that there was not any justification for increasing the rates until such time as the suggested changes that were to be made in the department were put into effect, as recommended by J. D. Woods and Gordon and that then we would see what the outcome would be. But the department maintained that nevertheless the increased rate had to go into operation if the department was even going to carry itself for the next year.

Here is what they estimated. I will quote from last year's Hansard of January 14, 1954, at page 1124 when I quoted the Postmaster General's contention:

> . . . as I followed the reasons for the increase in the postal rates advanced by the Postmaster General, they are the five-day week or the forty-hour week at a cost of $5 million; the increase in wages that is involved in the amount of $7 million, and for the rural mail $1,500,000, amounting to approximately $13,500,000.

Then on top of that they estimated a deficit in the department, for the withdrawal of the excise revenue tax, of another $7 million or $7,500,000. It was a very extensive figure that ran into anywhere from $13 million to $20 million.

Our position in the opposition was this. We did not find out, until it was mentioned on the bottom of the page in the introduction, that they had received valuable assistance from the firm of J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited, management consultants. We wanted to know what that was all about. It was not for some considerable time afterwards that we were given the opportunity to look at the report and its contents were very revealing. The suggestions, recommendations or observations in it, if they had been followed out, would have made considerable economies in that department. In view of the report itself that had been tendered last year, the Postmaster General's report and the J. D. Woods and Gordon report, it would have been only fair to the people of this country if the government had introduced these changes before imposing the additional rates. That is what I should like to cover tonight.

There has been some improvement in the operation of the department. It is all very well when we criticize them for what we think is not competent or efficient operation. But when there has been improvement in the department they are at least entitled to some commendation, and there has been considerable improvement.

But I should just like to take their own figures. I quoted last year that over a period of 20 years there has been an increase every year in the revenue of some $4 million and that there has likewise been an increase in the expenditures, but on the sum total there has been a surplus or a profit each year; and I pointed out what had been done in the past by the postmaster general, the one outstanding postmaster general since confederation, Sir William Mulock. When he had charge of the department it was more or less his ambition and his goal to make it work and to make it pay. He surprised everybody in that day by what he did. Instead of increasing rates, as soon as postal volume increased he would reduce rates. Then there would be a deficit for a year or so. Then following that, revenue would pick up in the course of three or four years and he would again have a surplus. He kept on doing this and he was criticized for it.

But the picture has changed. Now we have the postmasters general increasing rates and they have increased the rates. Inside of 10 years they have increased them by 100 per cent. Now they have increased revenue, but in this report it is not shown that there is increased revenue because the rates did not go into effect last year until April 1, 1954. The figures we have in the 1954 report of this department are based on the old rates of last year, with the one exception, namely the withdrawal of the excise revenue from cheques.

If you examine the figures closely and with the increase in wages that has taken place, you will find that the figures work out nearly to a balance or even-Stephen. He estimated the deficit on the excise revenue from cheques at about $5 million. It turned out to be some $7,500,000. He estimated the increase in wages at about $5 million for rural mail carriers, and other carriers at about $1,500,000. It did not work out to that because on their own figures of expenditures, in this report for 1954, on page 14—when you get the report you can look it up—there is shown an increase for salaries and allowances paid to revenue post offices, some staff post offices and sub-post offices. It amounts to a total of, in 1952-53, $15,417,000. For the year 1953-54 it is $16,636,000 or an increase of approximately $1,120,000. There is a vast difference between what the minister suggested was going to take place in the department because they are working exactly as they were last year, on the same set-up, with the exception, as I pointed out, of the withdrawal of the revenue from the excise stamps on cheques. But I pointed this out last year to them when we were discussing it, after we had the benefit of the J. D. Woods and Gordon report. Last year the Postmaster General, when he was supplementing his remarks, said:

> Perhaps I may complete my views on that subject. We had a surplus last year of $6½ million and this year we are going to have a deficit of $1 million. This deficit will result through the loss of $7½ million by the cancellation of the excise tax.

He says there will be a $5 million deficit due to the adoption of the 40-hour week, and $7 million due to the increase in wages of the general post office staff, $1,500,000 due to the increase to rural mail carriers and approximately $1 million covers the increase to the railway company, all this dealing in the realm of conjecture. I go on further to point out that the addition to the post office revenue that the minister was asking from the excise stamps on cheques was unwarranted, for this tax had its proper place in the consolidated revenue fund. To suggest the inclusion of receipts from this tax in the Post Office Department service or deficit was entirely wrong. In the first place the only conclusion that can be drawn is that it was an indirect way of supplying funds that were necessary for subsidies and subventions within the department.

It is now apparent that these concealed subsidies will have to be paid from the consolidated revenue fund and not from postal revenues. That is about what will take place. With the withdrawal of the $7 million benefit from their operations it just about brings the department out even. Next year when the increased rates will be in effect there will be a surplus of something like $14 million on the estimate of the Postmaster General, and I think the people of the country will feel that they have been taken in.

I mentioned last year that there were some illustrations of stamps in the report of the department. There was one very beautiful stamp. I guess you would call it a picture of a blue goose. At that time I think I described it as the goose that laid the golden egg for the government and said that if they were not very careful and if they pressed their luck too far they would kill the goose that laid the golden egg. This year in their report they have a new series of stamps which are also very good. One appears to be a polar bear, I presume, with the aurora borealis behind it. Then there is one of a mountain goat. There is also one of a reindeer or elk. I think it would be worth while if they had one with a fish, a clammy looking big sucker, to portray exactly what the government is doing to the people of Canada. They are just playing them for suckers with the increased postage rates and it would be very appropriate if they would introduce such a stamp to let the people know what is happening to them.

I have been checking over the changes in the department in the light of the recommendations in the Woods and Gordon report from the point of view of the economies that could be effected. Certain changes in the staff were recommended. I think I put on record last year a number of the changes and recommendations contained in the report which if followed out would bring about economies in the operation of the department. They have carried out some of them. I have been comparing the organization of the Post Office Department this year with last year. They have been introducing changes, and I think it is all for the best that they are doing so.

Last year there were some 30 personnel divisions; they have made a rearrangement. There are some six branches this year and 38 personnel divisions, an increase of one branch and eight personnel divisions to operate the department in line with the recommendations of the Woods and Gordon report. We will not be able to get a real picture of the situation until next year because we do not know what is the full effect on the revenues with the increased postage rates. That is not apparent in the report for the year ended April, 1954 compared with the one ended April, 1953, and the rates have not been in effect for a full year. I have not had sufficient time to compare the 1954 report but offhand I would say that the revenues do not bear out the contention made by the Postmaster General that there would be a deficit. On their own figures they wiped out a surplus of $6 million odd last year, and for this year I think the amount is around $2,474,000, but they have not had a chance to get the benefit of the increased revenues for a full year. If you compare the financial results for the past 20 years, the result still comes out the same as it did last year. There were only three years in those 20 years in which there was a deficit. In all those years the surplus averaged about $100,000.

In face of that I suggest the department should consider reducing the postage rates again because, even on the figures they gave us, their contention has not been upheld. When they have the benefit of the increased rates for a full year they are going to have a surplus, and I do not know what their story is going to be then. It was contended that with the introduction of the 40-hour week for postal employees and the increased wages for postal employees and the rural mail carriers there would be a deficit of somewhere around $12 million, but all that shows up in this year's report is $1,250,000.

The estimating of the department is very much out, and if that is the kind of estimating they are capable of the house should not have very much faith in their estimates for the future on the basis of this performance. Mention is made of improvement of the postal service and the question of public relations from the point of view of educating people to address their mail properly with the right name and address so as to help the postal carrier. I suppose one cannot be too critical of that, but there is some cause for humour in it. In the old days when someone had moved or there had been some changes or there were misdirections or wrong numbers on letters you could always rely on the postman on the beat. He would see that letters got to the right place without too much difficulty. He would say that so and so had moved up the street or over to the next street and he would make the correction himself.

I have had mail sent back to me when there was only a difference in the address of six or seven houses from the place where the person had moved. These letters have come back with the notation, "Not known, not at this address." Yet the individual was living on the same street only five or six doors removed from his old address. One might say that there was a new man on the beat but still that does not warrant it because the people living at the old address will tell the postman that the former resident has only moved three or four doors away. But the postal carriers now must have instructions from the department to return the letter to the post office if the people are not at the address, and letters are returned irrespective of the expense involved.

I do not say this by way of criticism of the heads of the department, but I do say it is a change from the good old days when you could rely on the postman to see that the mail got to the right place. I would ask that next year we receive the report of the department in time for us to make comparisons. Then we would be in a better position to offer constructive criticism of the operations of the department. At the present time we are more or less just taking a guess at what has happened. I was fortunate, as I said, in that the parliamentary assistant let me have his copy of the report so I could make a hasty summary of it. If my remarks do not jibe entirely with the report it is because I have summarized it in haste, and when I have a chance to go over it more thoroughly I will probably have something further to say.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I am not at all sure that the little bouquet I had for the minister may not have one or two skunk cabbage leaves in it too as in the case of the member who has just spoken. He remarked that he had noticed some improvements in the Post Office Department in the last year, and I was rather hesitant about rising right after him because I was afraid that the shock of two opposition members making remarks of that nature one after the other might be too great for the minister to stand. However, I shall say at once my remarks are going to be somewhat more brief than perhaps they were on this item a year ago. At that time I had occasion to remind the Postmaster General of a statement which had been made that when the new postal rates went into effect all first class mail would be carried by air wherever such carriage would speed its delivery. I said at that time I hoped to discover the Postmaster General would realize that Canada did not stop at Vancouver. I am very glad to be able to state this year that so far as I am concerned some recognition has been given to that fact, and there has been some improvement made in the matter of the carriage of mail by air to some of the more remote places in British Columbia.

I hope that having said that the minister and his officials will not simply sit back and bask in those remarks. I hope they will recognize that in a good many respects there is still some room for improvement in that situation. I could, of course, go on to tell them of the fact that there are at least two places where we badly need new post office buildings and other places where better facilities are needed. However, I shall not take the time to go into all the details of that tonight.

I was interested in some remarks which were made this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant. I was not quite able to follow all of them, but they concerned the possibility of improved conditions, and in some cases improved income, for the postmasters in revenue post offices. I hope that the result of his remarks is that there will be a further improvement in that particular direction. I do know that in many cases in communities where, on a straight revenue basis, the post office may not appear to be very important, nevertheless the duties which are being performed year in and year out by these postmasters are certainly far beyond the scale of remuneration they have been receiving. I believe there is an area of the public service which, in a great many cases, could very well receive better financial recognition than has been the case.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), who spoke this afternoon on the estimates of the Post Office Department, I want to offer to the minister, who has been away from the house for quite some time owing to ill health, my best wishes for a quick and complete recovery. I am sure that all hon. members have regretted his absence and missed his smile and good humour.

The sympathetic Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) has been compelled for several years to work hard under unfavourable conditions, not to say unbearable.

We often find that in certain branches of the department, the minister only plays a secondary part and that he is, as it were, a front that must be saved. The Postmaster General is one of those ministers whose authority exists in name only and who is not permitted to play the part assigned to him.

Mr. Boisvert: That is not as good as the first part.

Mr. Dufresne: Wait until the end.

He must nevertheless face our bitter criticisms on the administration of the department and cover as best he can those who have given orders one way or the other and who are the real masters and authorities in the department.

We are particularly concerned with this today. No one can deny that the great master of the situation, the one who makes and cancels decisions, the one who rules the roost within the department, in the presence or in the absence of the minister, is none other than the all-powerful deputy minister, Mr. Walter Turnbull.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Listen!

Mr. Dufresne: Far be it from me to think that the minister—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I am wondering if, in the absence of the Postmaster General who is not here to defend himself, it is a proper thing for the hon. member to cast these reflections on him as a member of this house.

Mr. Dufresne: I think the minister is not aware of what I am saying.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman, I listened to every word the hon. gentleman said and I comprehended their meaning thoroughly.

Mr. Dufresne: On the point of order, I began to say I regretted that I could not give my speech in English as I had intended, but I thought I would be speaking tomorrow afternoon. For the benefit of most members of the house, my intention was to speak in English. I should say on this point of order, Mr. Chairman, that I have the greatest sympathy for the minister. I was just saying in French that I regretted the fact that the authority in the Postmaster General's department did not lie with the minister but rather with the deputy minister, Mr. Walter Turnbull. That is exactly what I was saying. I was not saying anything against the minister, for whom I have the greatest sympathy.

Mr. Boisvert: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dufresne: I am speaking to the point of order, and I do not intend to be interrupted by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. If he wishes to ask a question, he may do so now.

Mr. Boisvert: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Certainly; go ahead.

Mr. Boisvert: Does the hon. member believe that it is fair to say what he has already said against the deputy of the Postmaster General, when the minister is not in this house?

Mr. Dufresne: The Acting Postmaster General is here and the parliamentary assistant is here. A few minutes ago, Mr. Chairman, I said I regretted the fact that I did not have any opportunity to translate my speech into English.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the Acting Postmaster General having raised this matter as a point of order, I suppose it is my responsibility to settle it to the extent that it can be settled. I would say that criticism of the Postmaster General, even in his absence, in his capacity as Postmaster General is undoubtedly in order. The administration of the department is before the committee at this stage and it is the only stage in our proceedings during which the administration of the department can be criticized. Criticism of the administration of the department is the privilege of the members of the house.

I do not believe it is the duty or the responsibility of the chairman of the committee to try to guide members in what is or is not ethical or in good taste. I should like to express my personal opinion that the conduct of the department is a fair subject for criticism even though, through unfortunate circumstances, the minister is absent. I might perhaps be permitted to go this much farther and to suggest to members that criticism of a nature which could only be answered personally by the minister himself and which, under the force of circumstances, could not be answered either by the acting minister or the parliamentary assistant, might safely be left unsaid at this time. I do not think I have the power or the right to go farther than that.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, thus far I have not criticized at all the Postmaster General, and it is not my intention to do so. A few moments ago I was speaking in French, and I shall continue to do so.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, far be it from me to think that the minister is not qualified to conduct the affairs of his department were he given the opportunity to do it, but in the case of the present minister as well as in the case of those who preceded him in this position since the end of the last war, history repeats itself.

In this connection, I wish to quote from an editorial by Mr. Pierre Chaloult which appeared in the Ottawa paper Le Droit on April 19, 1955, under the heading:

The Battle Against Shadows

We hear about the impending resignation of one of the youngest and most active members of the federal cabinet, Mr. Alcide Cote, who, as the rumour goes, would no longer be able to work twelve hours a day, the time needed to supervise the administrative mafia entrenched in the Post Office Department for some years.

In other words, the report has it that they finally wore down this incumbent as they did his immediate predecessors.

For it is obvious that the Post Office Department, formerly a realm of peace and quiet, can only be thought of now in terms of insoluble problems, while the ministers, one after the other, not only come to their wits' end but lose face, however strong they may be physically and politically.

When, indeed, Mr. Ernest Bertrand, on August 29, 1945, left the Department of Fisheries to become Postmaster General, he found, when he assumed his duties, a new deputy minister, Mr. Walter James Turnbull.

The latter knew the department inside out. He had spent his career there before becoming private secretary to the then prime minister who had just made him a deputy minister, no doubt as a reward for services rendered.

Now, it so happens that from that time on, exactly, the history of that department has ceased to be that of the minister in charge of that portfolio to become that of the deputy minister whose hand has never ceased to appear in every intrigue, every plot, every difficulty which has beset the representatives of the department in the federal cabinet.

After three and a half years of undistinguished rule, Mr. Bertrand abandoned politics as well as his portfolio which he passed on to one of the most brilliant and dynamic representatives of the rising generation, Mr. Edouard Rinfret who, following a short though hectic stay in that position, was obliged, in turn, to bow to Mr. Turnbull, until such time as Mr. Alcide Cote will be compelled to do likewise.

Such an opposition, hidden but unmistakable, between the deputy minister and the minister was in no manner helpful to the latter and, both under the administration of Mr. Rinfret and that of Mr. Cote, there were debates during which the postmaster general, hedged in all around, had to fight off not only the three opposition parties, which is normal, but also his own administration (which is less normal) and even some of his colleagues who under the pretence of help threw banana peels under his feet. In other words, blows came not only from the front and from below but also from behind.

Such tactics were evidently not of the kind to help the minister consolidate his position, and the deputy minister, back in the shadows, could gloat with pleasure and lick his chops, which he evidently did.

What would Mr. Turnbull be hoping for besides his present position? Why is he so bold as to risk everything, including a false step which might bring about his downfall?

What purpose was he following in all these intrigues? Could it be that, as former secretary to Mr. Mackenzie King, as was, from 1924 to 1926, Mr. Ralph Campney (now Minister of National Defence), as was from 1937 to 1952 Mr. John Pickersgill (now Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, as well as acting Postmaster General), as was Mr. Lester Pearson, former deputy minister of the former prime minister himself (now Secretary of State, that is, minister, for External Affairs), just as his former colleagues who lived within the orbit of the former master, Mr. Turnbull was hoping to see himself some day appointed Postmaster General?

Mr. Pickersgill: What poppycock!

Mr. Dufresne:

Maybe the relations between the minister and his deputy minister would then become less intricate?

Who knows!

This article, in my opinion, gives the perfect picture of the situation that had obtained for a long time within the Post Office Department, a situation for which, as you will note, the present deputy minister, Mr. Turnbull, is solely responsible. This situation being generally known, it is, doubtless, one of the main reasons for which we sympathize so much with the Postmaster General.

There is confusion in the post office administration, a confusion that was evidenced last year by my hon. friend from Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) and admitted by the hon. minister, because the authority responsible for the department is not respected. It has been replaced by that of the deputy minister, who is in no way answerable to either the people or parliament.

Most of the time unaware of what is going on, the minister is caught in an unqualifiable position, facing a cross-fire of protests from all sides. Unfortunately, his job ends there, except for a few speeches now and then, at the opening of a new post office, or when he has to represent the Prime Minister at some place when the latter is unable to attend because of his numerous engagements. Now is the time more than ever to have the ministers administer their own departments and not inferiors who get their bureaucratic authority from I do not know where. If the deputy minister, as in the case of Mr. Turnbull, takes over certain powers which belong only to the minister, who is solely responsible to the people and to parliament, a superior authority, in this instance the Prime Minister, should put an end to this unseemly monopolizing which is a serious obstacle to a good administration.

Having set forth this extremely important principle, I will now come to another problem which deserves the full attention of the department, of the house and the whole population.

On February 24 last, the hon. Minister of Labour told the house that an employment agency which claimed to find jobs within the organization which is to build the St. Lawrence seaway had been precluded from using the mail. And the minister added that other similar companies were being investigated.

I was one of the first to endorse these steps to protect our working public against some exploiters. The agency was ordered to explain its action within 10 days before a hearing committee of the department. We have never been told what was the outcome of the inquiry, but we know that the mail service was suspended at that time for this agency until it would prove that it was not guilty of the charge laid against it of having used Her Majesty's mail to make false representations. Such procedure meant that the local office no longer delivered mail to the agency and that letters were returned to senders.

All honest people were glad of that decision and the Post Office Department was congratulated for the energetic stand it had taken.

That wonderful picture is marred, however, Mr. Chairman, by circumstances which bring forth the conflicting attitudes of the Post Office Department and of the federal government.

At the very moment when an agency fraudulently obtaining money from the people is prevented from using the postal services, which is excellent, the propagandists of that infamous ideology known as communism are still allowed to distribute their pernicious literature in all Canadian homes. This infernal propaganda, however, does not merely aim at subtracting a few hard-earned dollars from the taxpayers, but its self-imposed devilish mission is first to poison and then to kill the soul and heart of all those candidly trustful people, who yield to this indoctrination. The hon. members of this house are not spared by this communist literature and are snowed under by letters and publications arriving by mail at their offices, even without postage on them.

As a citizen of the province of Quebec more particularly I cannot let the sickle and the hammer become the symbol of honour.

I would like to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to a certain bureaucracy, not to say gestapo, which is now prevailing in his department in the city of Quebec. I believe that the minister has realized what is happening, because I am told two officials from the department in Ottawa, Messrs. Craig and Charlebois, are now in Quebec to investigate the matter and find out what is going on.

The employees are said to be complaining of the harsh treatment. In fact those who could be doing their work sitting down are no longer allowed to use a seat. An iron rule prevails there. The government has undoubtedly become aware of it because I am told two investigators are now making a thorough investigation into the dictatorial doings of certain officials.

If, in the course of this investigation, present employees are interviewed, I would suggest to the department that all those who, within the last year for example, have either been dismissed or have resigned for the simple reason that, in their judgment, they were working in an unbearable atmosphere, be also consulted so that we may know the real reasons behind either their resignations or their dismissal.

I will also bring to the attention of the acting minister a refusal which cannot be justified and that I had to put up with some time ago when I asked for some information which should be available to any member of parliament, as it did not call for the production of any confidential documents.

I wanted to know, once, in order to compile some statistics on employment, what was the amount of unemployment insurance stamps which had been bought at the post office and distributed in the district. I was flatly denied this information, on the grounds that an order from the minister was necessary to divulge this information.

Some departmental officials are usurping privileges which should normally be denied them. I believe that elected representatives of the people are entitled to this information, particularly in view of the fact that it becomes public knowledge overnight.

I protest against this state of affairs and I hope that the minister will see to it that this does not happen again.

I now have another suggestion to offer the Post Office Department. For a number of years, the Quebec Power Company, of Quebec city, had a contract with the department allowing mail carriers and certain other classes of postal employees to travel free on Quebec city buses—or street cars at the time. Numerous representations have been made on behalf of the mail carriers since the day the company decided against renewing this contract. However, the department would only consent to allow its mail carriers two street car tickets per day. This, to my mind, is unfair, considering the privileges they previously enjoyed. There have been talks between the departmental officials and the Quebec Power Company, but, so far, to no avail.

I am not trying to blame the department for that failure, since I am told that it was the company that refused to grant that privilege to the postal employees. The new agreement between the company and the city of Quebec withdraws that privilege from policemen and firemen as well as from letter carriers.

I know for a fact however that the Post Office Department has offered to pay the Quebec Power Company $113.33 a year per letter carrier for their transportation, and that the company refused the offer. These poor employees are now receiving only two tickets a day and must pay out of their own pocket the additional tickets they need to reach their place of work, get their mail and deliver it.

Let me point out that the offer of the department to the Quebec Power Company is fair and that every letter carrier is entitled to that amount.

Raising the mail carrier's wages by $113.33, which is the amount offered to the Quebec Power, would give all concerned a square deal. If the employee spends only from $50 to $60 a year, the difference would be his to keep. If, on the contrary, he travels by bus often enough to spend more than $113.33, let him pay it out of his own pocket. I feel that would be an act of elementary justice for those devoted public servants who never miss an opportunity to serve the people.

I already had an opportunity, some time ago, to convey to this house a suggestion made to me by the various credit unions throughout Canada which now have a membership of 1,500,000, of whom 1 million are in the province of Quebec.

Requests reached me from all the credit unions in the city and district of Quebec, asking me to speak on their behalf to the minister in order that, during 1955, the birth of their founder, a man who did so much good for the people, especially in the homes of working people, be commemorated by the issue of a postage stamp bearing the effigy of that great Canadian. The request is as follows:

Whereas the Post Office Department issues from time to time postage stamps bearing the effigy of prominent people who have been illustrious in Canadian life;

Whereas Commander Alphonse Desjardins was the founder of the credit unions;

Whereas his work has now spread to all parts of Canada and in the two Americas, and renders immeasurable services;

Whereas the year 1955 marks the centenary of the birth of Mr. Desjardins;

Whereas the founder of credit unions is recognized as a Canadian benefactor;

Be it resolved:

That the board of directors of the credit union, representing a certain number of members . . .

I am not going to mention any particular group, because there are a great many of them.

. . . express the wish that a stamp be issued in honour of Commander Desjardins, and that a copy of this resolution be addressed to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, the Hon. Alcide Cote, the Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt, the Hon. Chas. G. Power, and Mr. Wilfrid Dufresne, M.P.

All his life, that great Canadian dedicated himself by teaching thrift, and I think the Postmaster General should seize the occasion of the centenary of Commander Desjardins' birth to pay him a tribute by issuing, in 1955, a stamp bearing his effigy.

Mr. Chairman, we are told that a new post office will shortly be built in Quebec city on a block of land registered until lately by the city of Quebec, but the registration of which was recently cancelled to enable the federal government to purchase the land.

A letter was sent a short time ago to all store owners and to all people who have homes within that block, ordering them to leave the premises on May 31, if they did not want to become liable to the penalties provided by law. The said letter was sent on May 6 last, which means that those merchants who have been in business at that same place for the past 50 years, were given only three weeks to get out.

In the name of all those people who would be only too glad to move elsewhere, provided they be given sufficient time, I urge the Post Office Department authorities to speak on their behalf to the Department of Public Works so that this post office may not be erected right now and so that they be given time to find new locations. In Quebec, as elsewhere, there is a housing problem; people living in those houses should be given time to find another home.

Mr. Boisvert: And what about unemployment of which the hon. member speaks so much?

Mr. Dufresne: I was expecting that question from the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert). He wants to speak about unemployment? A post office is to be erected. I did not object to the construction of that building but I believe that it should be built in a more suitable place.

To begin with, I do not know whether the Quebec municipal council has been stampeded into this, but this registration must have been sanctioned yesterday in the superior court. And yet it had provided for the demolition, at a given time, of all the buildings in this block in order to improve traffic conditions in Quebec city.

The distinguished French town planner, Jacques Gréber, was among those who had submitted recommendations to the town planning committee. I cannot understand how it is that the Post Office Department can so summarily dismiss the views expressed by Mr. Gréber and make such short shrift of a plan prepared by competent authorities. Why does it have to erect, in the very heart of the city, where traffic moves only very slowly as it is, a building far exceeding in area the block of which I spoke, in such a way as to prevent any easing in cross-town traffic conditions.

May I be permitted to tell the minister that at that spot, traffic congestion is frequent and that about 133,000 vehicles pass that point between eight o'clock in the morning and eight o'clock at night. The streets of Quebec city are already narrow enough and I do not see why the federal government would wish to add to the traffic problem and would want to build a post office—

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Dufresne: May I have just a few minutes?

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member for Quebec West unanimous consent to continue after ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nicholson: There is not unanimous consent tonight.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: May I express my personal regret that it was not possible to go on tonight to complete some business so that we might have a more expeditious disposal of the post office estimates tomorrow. I quite understand that hon. members have had a long day. If they would be good enough to consider that normally we do not take more than a day and a portion of another day on a department of this size, we would continue tomorrow with post office, hope to complete it in the early afternoon, and then go on with agriculture.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 27, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Finance when he expects to be in a position to make an announcement concerning the proposed appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the economy of Canada?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I am not in a position to make an announcement at the moment, nor is it probable that I will be for some time; but if hon. members are thinking in terms of discussing the matter, there will be an item in the supplementary estimates for consideration.

Mr. Fleming: It was not with a view to discussing it. It was with a view to eliciting from the minister whether we may expect an early announcement by the government about the appointment of the royal commission and its personnel.

Mr. Harris: Not for the time being, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rowe: A change of policy?

Mr. Drew: That is a very informative answer.

CRIMINAL CODE

DECISION OF ONTARIO COURT OF APPEAL—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF CODE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister noticed the finding of the Ontario court of appeal in a perjury case, as reported in the Toronto Star of May 14? If so, is he planning to introduce any amendment to the Canadian Criminal Code to take care of the point successfully raised by the defence lawyers?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The charge to which my hon. friend has referred, which was in effect dismissed by the Ontario court of appeal, was a charge of fabricating evidence laid under section 177 of the old code. Subsection 2 of section 171 of the old code, which contained a reference to proceedings before parliamentary committees, related only to proceedings for perjury under section 170 of the old code, and therefore was held to have no application in the case which came before the court of appeal. The fault which I have just referred to was rectified when the new Criminal Code was enacted.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Has the minister or his department given consideration to the implications of the findings in the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal, to the effect that parliament is not a court, with a view to introducing legislation or taking whatever action may be necessary to make it clear that parliament is a court?

Mr. Garson: I indicated that in the reply, Mr. Speaker, which I gave a moment ago to the question of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I said that in the drafting of the new code we had examined those sections of the old code in question and had endeavoured, I think successfully, to correct the point which was dealt with by the Ontario court of appeal in this case, in which the charge was laid under the old code.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Arising out of the minister's answer concerning whether or not parliament is a court of record, the minister mentioned an amendment that has come into effect. In the new code it is simply provided that it is an offence when perjury is committed before committees of the house or Senate; but the larger question as to whether or not parliament is indeed a court of record will be left in a very doubtful position unless an appeal is taken from the decision of the court of appeal of Ontario. After all, we have always accepted that parliament is a court of record.

Would the minister consider either appealing that case on that point or bringing in an amendment?

Mr. Garson: The question that was asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam dealt with a legal point which had arisen in this Ontario case. We have been trying to get a copy of the reasons for judgment of the court of appeal of Ontario in that case, and failing that we have been in communication with the deputy attorney general of Ontario seeking confirmation of our own impression that the point involved in that case had already been taken care of by the provisions of the new Criminal Code. Now, not having seen the reasons for judgment of the Ontario court of appeal, I am not in a position to say whether they are capable of the more extensive implications the hon. member for Prince Albert is now imputing to them.

I am, however, rather inclined to think the Ontario court of appeal judges were dealing only with the interpretation of the relevant section of the old code in reaching the conclusion they reached in that case. The question was whether the accused, upon the facts, was guilty of an offence under section 177 of the old code. This question, again, turned upon whether those proceedings before a parliamentary committee were court proceedings within the meaning of this section 177 of the old Criminal Code; and not I think upon whether they were court proceedings in the larger sense in which my friend from Prince Albert now refers to them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister will look into it, anyway.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AUTHENTICITY OF "NIKE" DISPLAYED ON PARLIAMENT HILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In his reply to a question yesterday he referred to the guided missile displayed on parliament hill yesterday as a "Nike". Was that a real "Nike" or was it just a wooden mock-up?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did not attempt to dismantle the "Nike", and I do not know whether it was real or partly real. I do know it was purported to be a "Nike" without the booster, which would have made it about twice the length it was. However, I do not make a practice of examining all the shells we have on display or which we use.

Mr. Pearkes: I hope all our weapons are not as phony as that.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What progress is being made toward completing prairie farm assistance payments? Will the balance of the payments be made at an early date, in view of the disastrous financial position of many farmers?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I presume the hon. member is interested in the Manitoba payments.

Mr. Bryce: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: The total number of townships paid in Manitoba is 696; the total number of farmers who have been paid is 21,892, and the total amount of money paid is $3,909,025.50. There may be some cases that are still under inspection or reinspection where payment has not been made, but a very large percentage have already been paid.

Mr. Bryce: You do not know how many more remain to be paid?

Mr. Gardiner: No. That will not be known until all the checks have been made on the requests for reinspection.

SASKATCHEWAN—PAYMENTS TO COMPENSATE FOR FLOODING

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Is it government policy to make payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as recorded in the Leader-Post of May 17, wherein Mr. W. R. Bird, director of prairie farm assistance, is quoted as having said:

> If flooding makes a township eligible, then payments will be made.

I was wondering if the minister would care to comment on when payments under this act will be made in Saskatchewan.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Bird, the director of prairie farm assistance, could have gone even further than he has gone in this statement. I read the statement in the press where he is reported to have said:

> If flooding makes a township eligible, then payments will be made.

He might have said:

Where flooding has made townships eligible payments already have been made.

Payments are very considerable in the province of Saskatchewan. I gave the figures a few moments ago for Manitoba. Payments in Saskatchewan have been made to 2,628 townships and 85,156 farmers, and the total payment has been $20,756,025.25. I understand this represents payments to 75 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan. I think it will be recognized by every hon. member that fairly reasonable progress has been made, and that includes all the persons who would be eligible under the statement made by Mr. Bird.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Will the minister permit a supplementary question in order to clarify the position? There is some confusion regarding this statement. I understand that payments are not made on land which is flooded unless the land has been seeded; that land which is not seeded is not eligible for prairie farm assistance. Is that right?

Mr. Gardiner: That is not exactly correct. In the first place there has to be an area which has no crop or has a low crop for some reason, below 8 bushels to the acre. That may be a township, or it may be 6 sections or more in a township, depending on the situation which the hon. member understands. In addition to that, the land has to be "cultivated land" but not necessarily seeded land. Cultivated land is defined in the act as seeded land or summerfallow land or land that is in grass that has been seeded down. Payments are made in accordance with these provisions in all the areas that have been flooded, and have been made up until now. I think that is a full explanation of how the payments are made.

Mr. Coldwell: To get it quite clear, in estimating the kind of land that is eligible is it fair to say that non-seeded land is not included?

Mr. Gardiner: No; non-cultivated land is not calculated.

Mr. Coldwell: If the land is cultivated—

Mr. Gardiner: In figuring the actual seeded acreage and the yield, which is less than 8 bushels to the acre or higher than 8, that of course is based on the seeded acreage.

Mr. Coldwell: Then land flooded but not seeded—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to get this clear, because there is confusion.

Mr. Speaker: Could we not wait until another occasion arises to elucidate further how these payments are arrived at, because there may be other questions to be asked on other subjects?

FISHERIES

REPORTED LARGE NUMBERS OF DEAD HERRING IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is the minister aware of reports that large quantities of dead herring—I mean dead herring, not red herring—have been found in the fishing grounds in the gulf of St. Lawrence and the bay of Chaleur, and are causing great concern and alarm amongst the fishermen of the area? If so, are any steps being taken by the fisheries research board to determine the cause of the appearance of such large quantities of dead fish on the sea bottom?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Earlier in the week the skippers of several draggers operating along the north shore of New Brunswick and in the bay of Chaleur sent several specimens of dead herring to the department, which they found while dragging for cod and haddock. We are sending two scientists from St. Andrews to that area to conduct an investigation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF SUPPLY MOTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as house leader. When is it intended to call the next supply motion?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I have tried to set a pattern in the last few weeks of devoting Thursdays and Fridays to supply, and Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays to legislation and supply motions when necessary. I had in mind that on Monday we would begin with some legislation that we would like to get out of the way, and then go on with a supply motion. If it happens to be reached on Monday it will be dealt with; but on Tuesday if not on Monday.

Mr. Drew: I think this is a matter in which the house has a special interest. The position of supply motions in regard to proceedings in the house is well recognized, and I submit that they should be heard first on any day they are to be called. I would ask the house leader to agree that if it is to come up on Monday, the supply motion will be called first and not left in suspense to depend upon any uncertain debate that might follow the prior introduction of other measures.

Could we have an assurance from the minister in that regard? After all, we have reached a point in the session when it is not only proper but desirable that members know when debates arising on matters of that kind are going to come forward.

Mr. Harris: I have just said that upon the conclusion of certain legislation the supply motion would be reached. I do not suppose I can make it more definite than that. I should have announced the legislation last night, as has been my custom, but I have abandoned that custom a little since we got into supply. But I can give my hon. friend a list of those items I would like to have discussed first, and then take the supply motion.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that the minister is abandoning the long-established practice with regard to supply motions; and I submit that unless he is prepared to admit he is trying to juggle the business of the house in an unsatisfactory way, he should change his opinion.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, do you not think that language is rather unparliamentary, under the circumstances? Juggling is something it is not our custom to do.

Mr. Drew: You have been juggling the business of the house all session.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) say that, presumably I, had been juggling the business of parliament all session. Mr. Speaker, I assure you I can call plenty of witnesses in this house to show that I have accommodated the opposition more this session than they have ever been accommodated before.

Mr. Drew: What?

FLOODS

KIPLING DISTRICT, SASK.—REQUESTS FOR DRAINAGE OR DREDGING ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received any requests for drainage or dredging assistance or other representations in respect to flood damage to farm land in Kipling district, resulting from the Canadian National Railways line preventing normal drainage? If so, what has been the nature of those requests, and what action does the government intend to take in assuming responsibility?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Moose Mountain I should say that the minister has received no requests for drainage or dredging assistance, or other representations in respect of flood damage in the Kipling district. Not having received any such representations, I am unable to state the nature of the requests that may be made or the action that will be taken when they are received.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the question to the Minister of Agriculture, to whom I sent notice. Has his department received any requests in connection with the matter that I just referred to the Minister of Transport?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me a copy of his question. In reply I would state that we would naturally not receive any requests in connection with drainage. All requests in connection with drainage in the provinces go to the provincial governments, and they are referred to the provincial government in Saskatchewan just as they are in any other province. The responsibility for drainage is with the provinces.

The provincial government representatives who were here called our attention to the fact that there are flood conditions in the Kipling area. They are included in the representations that were made to this government; but that is in accordance with the fact that it is a provincial responsibility.

AIR TRANSPORT

EDMONTON—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister give any information to the house respecting the airplane tragedy which occurred at the municipal airport in Edmonton yesterday?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The only information I can give is that an inquiry has been instituted in order to determine what were the causes of the accident.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PORT MANN, B.C.—STATEMENT AS TO LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) asked a question regarding the Port Mann shops, and at an earlier date the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) asked similar questions in connection with the same matter. I regret the delay in answering both of them.

The management of Canadian National Railways now advises as follows. Reduction in the personnel employed by the railway for repair and servicing of rolling stock is explained by the dieselization of motive power, the cumulative effect of improvement in design and construction, increased capacity of freight cars, improvement in repair methods and practices, and the acquisition of much new equipment. As a point for repair and servicing of locomotives and cars Port Mann has been affected by the efforts of the management to maintain a proper balance between rolling stock and repair expenses and the volume of traffic. In effecting this reduction in personnel the legitimate interest of each employee affected has been properly protected in accordance with the governing wage agreement, and discussions have been held with the representatives of the appropriate labour organizations.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING STUDY OF REDISTRIBUTION BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam), in his capacity as chairman of the committee on privileges and elections. When is it intended to have the committee meet to deal with that part of its terms of reference which has to do with the studying of redistribution?

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I expect the committee will meet within a few days, after the steering committee is called together to decide on a date.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

334. Departmental administration, $1,546,388.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned last evening, I was dealing with the Post Office Department's plan to build a new post office building in the city of Quebec, at a place which I held to be unsuitable, for the very good reason that it was by no means in line with the recommendations of the town planning committee which had already set out a plan calling for the elimination of the block of buildings where the Post Office Department now intends to build. This plan would have had the effect of easing cross-town traffic conditions in Quebec city.

Mr. Chairman, there is no lack of suitable property for the construction of this building in Quebec city. In fact, does not the federal government own the property situate right by the one which has just been purchased and which, to my mind, would be a far more practical and adequate location for this new post office? Moreover, location on this site would not oppose the plans made by the town planning committee to improve traffic conditions in the lower part of Quebec city.

I would not like to be misunderstood in what I was saying yesterday. I was asking that the owners of these buildings, and more particularly those who live in any of these houses, be given sufficient time to move away.

This does not mean that I am opposed to the building of a new post office in Quebec city. On the contrary, I hope it will be built as soon as possible, and that it will serve to give some little work to the jobless, though it cannot be said, of course, that such a project is in itself sufficient to solve the very serious unemployment problem in Quebec city.

I do feel, however, that in all fairness the department should give sufficient notice to the present occupants of this property. This would only be in accordance with the law. Although I am not a lawyer, I have looked into the matter and I am told that whenever an eviction notice is served upon a tenant, at least 30 days' notice is required. In this case, barely three weeks' notice was given, probably in contravention of the law. As a matter of fact if these people are not out of their homes by Tuesday next, that is by May 31, they will be subject to prosecution.

I am therefore asking the government to reconsider this notice of eviction, and to give these owners of commercial premises, as well as those who occupy dwellings on this property, enough time to find new quarters.

(Text):

Can the Acting Postmaster General or the parliamentary assistant give us the assurance that this project of a new post office in Quebec city will be given more consideration as far as a site is concerned, so the recommendations of the town planning committee will be implemented? Can the Acting Postmaster General or the parliamentary assistant give us this assurance that more consideration will be given as far as the site is concerned? As I said a few minutes ago in French, the government owns another lot which is very near the one on which—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for the hon. gentleman to repeat to me in English what he has already said in French. I was listening to him.

Mr. Dufresne: I thought it would be useful.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can give no such assurance. It would be quite improper for me to do so. If on the estimates of the Minister of Public Works the hon. gentleman wishes to put his question to the minister who would select a site if such a building were to be built, I have no doubt he will receive an answer. But as I explained to the committee yesterday on two or three occasions, it is not within the purview of the Post Office Department to select these sites. We express certain views about them but we do not select them. That is the business of another department of government.

Mr. Dufresne: I believe the acting minister can also recommend. If he cannot give me that assurance, or if he cannot give me a definite answer, maybe if he asks the deputy minister he might be able to give this assurance right now. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman—

(Translation):

Those were the few remarks I intended to make during the present debate and notwithstanding the various impertinent qualificatives which were attached to the speech I made last night and which I heard, I am perfectly at peace with myself since I am fully convinced that I fulfilled faithfully my duty in that respect. I was not elected to shower flattery upon the Liberal government when it acts contrary to the proper administration of a department and thus work against the interests of the country at large and in particular against those of the constituents which it is my privilege to represent.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say about two sentences immediately about the first part of the speech delivered last evening by the hon. member for Quebec West. I think every other member of this house will regret the reflections made by the hon. member upon the competence and sense of responsibility of the Postmaster General, and made in his absence. We on this side of the house—and particularly those of us who are on the treasury benches—know perfectly well how conscientiously and how devotedly the Postmaster General attended to all the duties of his department.

Mr. Dufresne: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a totally unwarranted suggestion that the Postmaster General does not—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: —carry on his duties and exercise his ministerial functions himself. That is an unwarranted suggestion by any member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege may I say that I do not think the minister has a right to attribute to me words that I have not used. He claims to say to this committee and to the Canadian people that the hon. member for Quebec West has chosen a time when the Postmaster General is not in the chamber in order to attack him. I want to ask the Acting Postmaster General to have a good look—and I only hope he can read—at what I said yesterday. If he does so he will find that I only said I had the greatest sympathy for the Postmaster General, who is obliged to work under such circumstances. I just said, Mr. Chairman, that I was sorry to see that the Postmaster General did not have the authority he was supposed to have in his own department, and that he only had to go by what the deputy minister was saying.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman's words speak for themselves.

Mr. Dufresne: They certainly do.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no intention of misrepresenting them or of interpreting them.

While I am on my feet I should like to say something about what was said yesterday by my hon. friend from Kootenay East and several other hon. members, because this is the only point raised so far that I intend to deal with. The others will be dealt with by the parliamentary assistant.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, my hon. friend the Secretary of State and I received a delegation this morning from the postal workers' brotherhood of Canada, who made representations on the subject on which the hon. member for Kootenay East and several other hon. members spoke yesterday. We undertook to give those representations the most sympathetic consideration. At the same time we had a brief discussion about this question that was raised by two or three hon. members yesterday, regarding supervisory letter carriers. I understand that this delegation or certain members of it intend to have a discussion with the officials of the department with a view to ironing out any misunderstandings or difficulties that may exist in connection with the matter. We hope it will be worked out satisfactorily.

Mr. Dufresne: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say this so there will be no misunderstanding in this chamber, especially by the Acting Postmaster General who listened to my speech in French last night. I should like to read a few sentences of what I said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dufresne: —so he will be aware of it.

The Chairman: Order. I have already heard the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Quebec West, and I think it has been adequately disposed of. I do not think I can hear further elaboration of the same question.

Mr. Regier: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. Did I understand the minister to say that we are unworthy members of parliament if we find fault with the actions of the deputy minister?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I said nothing of the kind.

(Translation):

Mr. Power (Quebec South): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two on the subject of the future post office in order to set in their true light the facts stated last night by my friend, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne).

For about two or three years, with other members from my district, I have been doing my best to get the Post Office Department and the customs division to erect in Quebec buildings befitting that city and suitable for the work performed.

Looking around the main railway station in Quebec city, we can see the site mentioned by my friend, where a block of houses burned down two or three years ago. To visitors arriving in Quebec city at the main station, it presents a scene of destruction reminiscent of bomb-gutted cities of Europe.

About that time the city of Quebec homologated the buildings concerned, i.e., the owners were advised that sooner or later they would have to go and that any improvements they might make in the meantime to the buildings, etc., would not be taken into account in the assessment of the property, because the city of Quebec already had some plans with regard to that site. Because of this homologation, the Canadian government approached the authorities of the city of Quebec in order to ascertain if they were ready to allow the federal government to put up the building.

Negotiations were lengthy and finally, last summer, after I had obtained the Prime Minister's authorization and after the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) had received confirmation from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), we met with the authorities of the city of Quebec, including His Worship Wilfrid Hamel, the city engineer and other officials, and we agreed that the government would release certain lots for the broadening of St. Paul street, and would, for its part—

Mr. Dufresne: Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question? Where are the certain lots he is talking about?

Mr. Power (Quebec South): On St. Paul street.

Mr. Dufresne: On St. Paul street, in Quebec city?

Mr. Power (Quebec South): Precisely, and that the city, for its part, would close off Marquette street, so that adjoining properties which belong to the federal government, as they are C.N.R. property, would also be included in the expropriated land or in the land which will be taken over by the federal government. The negotiations were friendly, and an agreement was finally reached but, for some reasons—

Mr. Dufresne: May I ask another question? When those discussions were held between the representatives of the federal government and of the city of Quebec, were the members of the town planning committee, which already had a project on hand, invited too?

Mr. Power (Quebec South): My answer will be quite short. The federal government does not have to do business with local committees, not with the town planning committee any more than with the garbage collection committee or the roads committee. Constitutionally speaking, we have to deal with the authorities representing the voters of Quebec city, that is the mayor of Quebec, Mr. Hamel, and the aldermen.

We came to an agreement with the mayor and his engineer. Negotiations were discontinued, probably because of the obstacles set in the way of the agreement by people who support the opinion of my hon. friend. Finally, in January 1955, the Minister of Public Works received the following letter, a copy of which I shall now read:

(Text):

Honourable Robert H. Winters,
Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Honourable Sir:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 18 concerning the land required by the federal government as the site for the extension of the new post office at Quebec city.

After perusal of your letter I am glad that all the persons concerned have now reached an understanding and will maintain the agreement concluded in my office when Mr. Maurice Bourget, member for Levis, the Hon. C. G. Power and Messrs. Drolet and Gardner—

They are officers of the department.

—discussed this matter with me as explained in my letter of December 28, 1954.

(Translation):

Therefore, as far as the federal government is concerned, he had the approval of—

(Text):

Mr. Dufresne: The letter is signed by whom?

Mr. Power (Quebec South): Wilfrid Hamel, mayor of Quebec City. In so far as the federal government are concerned, they did business with the constituted authorities of the city of Quebec, not with any committees set up either by the council or anybody else. The city council apparently has approved of the action of the mayor; therefore the federal government has proceeded with the expropriation of the property.

I come to another subject raised by my hon. friend, and rightly, namely the brevity of time given in the notice to evacuate.

(Translation):

In that connection, I received a letter from my electors telling me that they were shocked that such a short notice should have been served. On that score, my hon. friend may be right. However, I would point out to this committee that for the last two or three years these people were subject to be notified at any time to vacate the premises. I then got in touch with government authorities here, that is with the minister, his parliamentary assistant and the chief architect, after which I sent this answer to the people who had written me:

Brousseau & Frères Ltée,
320-324 St. Paul street,
Quebec, Que.

Gentlemen:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 9 in which you had enclosed a petition signed by the landlords and tenants of the premises expropriated by the Department of Public Works, for the building of a post office, on Henderson, St. Paul and Ramsay streets.

I must tell you that I am urging the Department of Public Works to proceed with the projected works as soon as possible. After conferring with the department officials I find that if the conclusions of your investigations were taken into favourable consideration, . . .

May I say here, by the way, that those gentlemen had been asking to be allowed six months before moving out.

. . . the work on the post office requested by the workers of the city of Quebec, as well as by their representatives, would be delayed for at least a year.

I am informed that the preliminary steps to be taken, such as the transfer of the vacated properties to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, the calling of tenders for pulling down those buildings by that corporation, preliminary soundings, etc., that are needed before laying the foundations, the calling for tenders for the erection of the building, required under the federal statutes, may very well take several months. Under those circumstances, it is essential that the premises be vacated as soon as possible.

I am nevertheless asking the department to extend the time-limits mentioned in the notice to vacate received by you for a period of time which, frankly, is bound to be short, and always so as not to delay the carrying out of the project.

Following this letter and my representations to the hon. Minister of Public Works, the latter agreed yesterday to extend the time-limit until the end of June. If the work is to start in October or November in Quebec, it is essential that the lots be vacated by June 30 at the latest.

That is the position. At least, that is how I understand it, and I am explaining it to my hon. friend.

(Text):

Mr. Michener: I have a more or less minor matter to raise, Mr. Chairman, and I do so with some temerity for fear anything one says might be taken as criticism of the minister responsible for this department or of the government, recalling the asperity with which the acting minister rose a few minutes ago. However, I shall risk that and refer to the problem of the speedy and correct delivery of letters.

Before doing that, I have a word of commendation which I should like to express to the Postmaster General's department for considering the problem of delivering mail on a business delivery basis on Avenue road north. There has been a change here from a residential to a business district. I believe delivery changes have been promised which will supply the business houses there with mail at a reasonably early hour in the morning instead of at two o'clock in the afternoon, which is perhaps sufficient for residential people but which does not permit the proper handling of correspondence in a business establishment.

One appreciates that there will be mistakes and delays in the delivery of mail at all times. There are a great many instances which come to the attention of members, and perhaps it is appropriate at this time to draw attention to one mistake which appears to have been avoidable. I do so just by way of keeping the minister and his associates on the job to see that deliveries are made as quickly, as well and with as few mistakes as possible.

The instance I have in mind is of a letter which was sent by trans-Atlantic air mail, addressed to 1525 Closse street, apartment 1, Montreal, P.Q., Canada. This letter was returned to the sender in London stamped, "Undelivered for the reason stated; returned to sender". Then there is an indistinct stamp saying "Place of destination required". I always thought Montreal was a place of destination. I would have thought any postal clerk would have regarded Montreal as a place of destination. In any event the letter was returned to the sender, put in an air mail envelope, addressed in the same way and delivered promptly to the party for whom it was intended. That is perhaps an extreme case, but that is an instance where there was no excuse for failure, which anyone recognizes must occur from time to time.

I should like to draw to the attention of the acting minister one or two things I can perhaps state at this time and which he can answer at his leisure, because I appreciate they may involve some research. The questions are as follows: What firm has the contract at present for the printing of Canadian postage stamps? How long has that firm enjoyed the contract? When were tenders last called for the letting of such contracts? Finally, what other Canadian firms are there capable of performing this service?

Mr. Pouliot: I have just a word to say, Mr. Chairman, about the speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Quebec West. If he puts the deputy postmaster general in the same category as all the great Canadians whom he has attacked with such acrimony, he pays him a signal tribute.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I wonder if it might not make the debate more orderly if I were to take a few moments now to answer some of the queries put forward last night. Perhaps it would save some hon. member from asking the same questions. First may I, on behalf of the Postmaster General, extend thanks to hon. members for their sympathetic and courteous comments regarding his health. May I say also that I, too, look forward most eagerly to his early return.

Many suggestions were made by the various speakers, all of which will be given serious consideration; and where it is found that action can reasonably be taken in the interests of the public service, this will be done. May I take just a few moments to refer briefly to a few of the matters on which I am able to comment at the moment.

The hon. member for Three Rivers referred to the service to suburban areas around the large cities. I am advised it is not always practical to give letter carrier service immediately because many of the necessary conditions may not have been met. In many cases the department has taken care of this problem in the suburban areas by the installation of group boxes, which will provide for the postal needs of these areas until such time as the various requirements for letter carrier delivery have been met.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam suggested that something should be done about the rather rapid turnover of employees in the Post Office Department. Not long after he spoke someone brought to my attention an article appearing in the May issue of the magazine Personnel. This article states that the average turnover for shop trades is 13·8 per cent; for non-professional clerical and administrative staff, 14·4 per cent; and in what is termed as sub-professional staff, 32 per cent. In the Post Office Department, other than retirement, we have an annual turnover of only 4·3 per cent for permanent employees and 15 per cent for temporary employees. Thus I do not feel that the Post Office Department has a very large turnover in comparison with industry and business generally.

The hon. member also made representations on behalf of the postmaster at Port Moody, in connection with the disappearance of $500 of post office funds. All I can say here is that the department must take disciplinary action where a postal official fails to protect public funds.

The hon. member for New Westminster dealt with the question of mail couriers. In his particular riding the situation is rather difficult because of the heavy population. The services are, however, advertised and tenders are submitted. Payment is made in accordance with the contract. If any particular contractor has had an unusual development in his area the department of course is always willing to renegotiate. My hon. friend referred to some rural mail couriers who work as much as 16 hours daily. If he will be kind enough to submit the particular case or cases where a man or men are working 16 hours per day I can assure him we shall be only too glad to make inquiries. This would seem to indicate that these particular routes should be divided.

He referred also to letter carriers doing work for which they received no pay, that is doing work as he called it in extra or spare time. In computing the time of the letter carrier the department not only takes into account the time he takes in serving his route, but also the time taken to prepare and handle his mail in the office.

My hon. friend also refers to the handling of certain items by the carriers in New Westminster. In this connection I would point out that carriers are not required to handle any parcel or book which weighs two pounds or more and that, further, their bundles are taken out for them and delivered at points on their route. As a matter of fact there is an average of over four relay boxes per letter carrier route in New Westminster, a rate that is higher than in most other cities in Canada. If any carrier considers that his walk is overly heavy or onerous, or he is unable properly to perform his duty within 40 hours a week, he may always make representations to his postmaster and the matter will be studied.

My hon. friend also referred to the periodical checks of letter carrier routes and indicated that these checks take place in July. I am informed that these checks take place twice yearly, one in the month of March and one in the month of August, so as to get an equitable picture. Again, if any letter carrier feels that his route is too onerous he may appeal to his postmaster and have the case investigated.

There was one reference I could not understand, and that was to letter carriers being "docked" $20 per month for clothing. I am sure my hon. friend would want me to correct him on that point. Uniforms are supplied to the letter carriers, without any cost to them. As a matter of fact, in addition to the uniforms they are given a cash allowance each year to enable them to provide suitable boots.

[Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare).]

As I understood the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, there were two points at issue; (1) the receipt of magazines which he did not order, and (2) requests from the agents of the publishers for the payment of an amount relating to these magazines.

In regard to the first point, all my hon. friend, or any person who finds himself in a similar position, has to do is to mark the newspaper or magazine "refused" and hand it back to the post office. The post office will then return it to the publisher; and if after the first notification additional copies are received, these will also be returned and postage collected from the publisher in each individual case.

As regards the correspondence between my hon. friend and the publishers, this is a personal matter. The Post Office Department does not censor any mail and therefore does not know the contents of letters travelling between the senders and the addressees. Of course that being so, it is obvious that no action can be taken by the department unless a complaint is made and the supporting information given. At this time may I thank the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska for his comments concerning the decision in the Quebec courts, to the effect that a contract cannot be a unilateral proposition.

In regard to my hon. friend from Kootenay West, the point he raises has been dealt with in my remarks to the hon. member for New Westminster.

In reply to the representations made by my hon. friend from Kootenay East, I would point out that there are two classes of postal clerks, grade 1 and grade 2. Some of the positions in the smaller offices are classified as grade 1, on the ground that the postal knowledge required in these centres is not as involved and complex as in the larger cities. I understand that following a recent convention the employees' association is making representations in this connection, and the matter will be given due consideration when these representations are studied, after having been received.

Then the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace made reference to the estimate of additional revenue in connection with the 5-cent postage. We estimated at the time that we should break even for the fiscal year 1954-55. I stated yesterday that we have what I called an apparent surplus of approximately $5 million, accounted for mainly by the following:

1. There has been an increase in volume which was not anticipated a year ago.

2. Certain accounts for items supplied in 1954-55 will not be paid until the fiscal year 1955-56, and

3. As he intimated, by efficient operation and careful arrangement of the service, the department has been able to effect financial savings.

In regard to the question of annual leave for letter carriers, I would say that the Acting Postmaster General made reference to that matter a few moments ago.

Then reference was made to the savings which could be effected by the discontinuance of the post office savings bank. While the annual cost to the department is estimated at $377,000, this amount could not all be saved if the savings bank was discontinued, because in this amount is a proportion of the salaries of operating employees and a proportion of the cost of buildings and equipment. The actual headquarters cost is in the neighbourhood of $150,000. I think in considering this matter one should give consideration to the following points:

1. There are many Canadian citizens who prefer the post office savings bank to the chartered banks.

2. That by having a post office savings bank we are able to give banking facilities to military camps and certain remote areas.

3. That the savings bank provides the government of Canada with approximately $40 million at a low rate of interest.

With regard to my hon. friend's suggestion in regard to twice-a-day delivery for only five days a week, there are two points which came to my mind. One, it is not possible to give ten deliveries for the same cost as six. Appreciable additional expenditure would therefore be involved. Secondly, I doubt very much whether the public would welcome their mail being held from Friday afternoon until Monday morning and even Tuesday morning, when Monday happens to be a statutory holiday. There is also the possibility, may I say the probability, of congestion in the post office, as well as the inordinate amount of mail which the letter carriers would consequently have to handle on Monday mornings.

My hon. friend referred to his question being changed to an order for a return, and also to the time it has taken to give the information for which he asked. Had his question simply related to the date, the place and the amount of the loss it would have been a very simple question to answer, but he also asked whether court action had been instituted against specific individuals, and what was the result of such action, if any, in each case. This obviously necessitated a check of each file and in some cases the obtaining of information from the district offices as to the action which had taken place. The information has been obtained and, as hon. members know, the return was tabled this afternoon.

If my hon. friend is interested in the activities of the department from the standpoint of offences, prosecutions and results, may I refer him to page 5 of the Postmaster General's report for the year ended March 31, 1954, which was tabled early in January of this year.

The hon. member for Selkirk brought up the matter of mail delivery. We appreciate the difficult situation in which the people in the Norway House area find themselves from the standpoint of mail service, particularly during the break-up and freeze-up periods. The matter is being reviewed, and I can assure my hon. friend that it will have careful consideration.

He also made reference to 1½ cent stamps. There is no such thing as a 1½ cent stamp, but there is a bulk rate of 1½ cents per item in connection with "householder" mail. The postage of these items is paid in bulk on the total number of items. This rate is given when the items are not individually addressed and which are therefore delivered much cheaper than is the case when an individual item must be delivered to a specific individual address. This service is available to all patrons who wish to have it.

The hon. member for Middlesex East showed his interest in the department by referring to the transportation of mail by means of highway post offices. This method of transportation has been adopted in many instances in the United States. It is more suitable to their method of operating, on account of the heavy volume of mails carried. However, the department has been watching this development with interest for some time. As a matter of fact some of our inspectors have travelled on the highway post offices in the United States, and I can assure my hon. friend that when the time arrives that this type of equipment can be used with advantage to the service, and from the standpoint of economy, further consideration will be given to the utilization of this and similar equipment.

May I thank the hon. member for Danforth for his complimentary remarks in regard to the postal service, and at the same time would mention that most of the figures he was quoting related to the fiscal year 1953-54, whereas in my opening comments yesterday I related my figures to the fiscal year 1954-55. I should also like to point out to him that the report for the fiscal year 1953-54 was tabled in January of this year.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I have covered in a general way the comments and suggestions made by the various hon. members who have taken part in this discussion.

Any individual cases which I have been unable to touch upon will be given the benefit of detailed study. With regard to the questions of the hon. member for St. Paul's, I wonder whether he would be good enough to send us the two covers to which he referred. I cannot give him full details regarding his question about the contract for postage stamps, but I can tell him that they are printed by the Canadian Bank Note Company; that the Minister of Finance calls for tenders, and that I think the contract is generally for a term of four years. The last tenders were called for some three years ago.

Mr. Bryce: May I ask the parliamentary assistant one question. Is the Post Office Department making representations or recommendations to the Department of Public Works to provide a new post office in Selkirk?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): This is one of these specific questions with respect to which in the time between ten o'clock last night and a quarter to four this afternoon I have not yet had an opportunity to study the file.

Mr. Bryce: I do not blame the parliamentary assistant in any way, but the department has been asked for it for four years.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I say I have not had a chance to look at the file. If the hon. member will give me until next week, after I return from Manitoba, I shall certainly have a look at it.

Mr. Hahn: With respect to the question I raised relative to the hours of labour that are put in by some of these mail couriers, if the parliamentary assistant will turn to page 4134 of Hansard of yesterday he will see that I was referring to the holiday season only, not to the full year. This is the time these men require additional help in the sortation of mail.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Thank you.

Mr. Henry: Mr. Chairman, at this time I should like to make a few remarks about the postal service in Toronto-Rosedale. I think it is important to demonstrate at the outset that the representations have come to me and have been made in a community service and non-partisan spirit. The area concerned is the Yonge-Bay-Bloor district of Toronto, and the representations are those of the businessmen's association of the area.

It so happened that during the Christmas season of 1954 they held one of their regular luncheon meetings, and I was pleased to be a guest. The subject under discussion at this meeting was "Christmas as applied to every day of the year". The very eminent speaker was Rev. Dr. Cecil Swanson, rector of St. Paul's church, which is within the district. The guests at the head table were diversified and representative of the community. In this atmosphere the men of the community raised their postal problems. I am not asking the Acting Postmaster General to approach their problems as Santa Claus would, but rather in accordance with the spirit of the talk, in which we were asked to apply patience and prudence. The aim is that all concerned may receive satisfaction, which I know can be forthcoming.

The basic problem of the postal service in Rosedale has been one which the businessmen have approached with great patience in the past. For many years, at the intersection of St. Clair and Yonge streets, owing to the depressed conditions of the 1930's and the labour and material shortages of the wartime period, there was a shortage of space and appropriate facilities. However in due time—I must say, without any particular representations from me as the elected member—notably in the year 1949, a great improvement was made. Then during the period of the last parliament a $3 million office building was erected in that district, which provides expanded and improved postal facilities.

I emphasize that this was done by the department in its good judgment on the basis of need, after patience and restraint on the part of the community. Postal service in the immediate vicinity of that part of Yonge street is much better, and I thank the Postmaster General and particularly the deputy postmaster general for what has been done there, because it is indeed much appreciated.

I must also report that in the Yonge-Bay-Bloor area we have postal station F, which is capable of handling perhaps the largest volume of mail in the Toronto region so far as branch stations are concerned.

This is what has been going on in the last number of years. But, Mr. Chairman, this section has now become something quite different from what it was before the war. It is now the uptown crossroads of metropolitan Toronto. It is also the uptown hub of the financial offices in so far as many large corporations are concerned. In addition, as the result of much public pressure it has become a redevelopment area for mid-town apartment dwellers. Here we have a condition of expansion in mid-century, within the twentieth century; and the postal service, like everything else, has had growing pains.

Previous to the beginning of the year, let us say, merchants in great numbers were picking up their own mail, and delivery was slower than necessary. There was also a shortage of staff and space because of the great expansion that has occurred. I do believe the deputy postmaster general has dealt with the matter on a short-time basis in a very sympathetic and satisfactory way, for the present. He was very quick to see, in the light of the report on the Toronto problem, that more staff and space were necessary. These were forthcoming, and in time I believe they will produce a great improvement there in so far as postal service is concerned. We believe that given time, with the new rental space, much will be provided that will be good for all concerned. In addition there will be more letter carriers on the walks to provide better service to merchants receiving their mail.

However, I would say this; that the split premises, one permanent and the other rental premises newly acquired, are not now large enough. These split premises cannot make for the best possible service in this important shopping and business area. I do think we have to look for something better. While the businessmen concerned are restrained in their representations, I know they feel the time has come when the department should think about one consolidated building for all postal services in this area.

We all realize that it is the function of the Department of Public Works to make this consolidation and on these estimates I do not want to go into detail as to that matter. However, I would point out that Rosedale was neglected with respect to its public facilities during the 1930's because of depressed conditions. In the 1940's it was restricted because of wartime conditions and the aftermath thereof. We now think that progress toward a new building is most important in this all-important area.

I ask the Acting Postmaster General to exercise his qualities of action which have been so apparent in the past in this department. We do not forget that when he took over as Acting Postmaster General in the fall of last year, action was taken to provide this department with more revenue, and with this extra revenue has come the means of helping to stabilize labour conditions within the department, as well as other matters of importance to the public. Before he ceases to function as Acting Postmaster General he might consider with the worthy deputy making a recommendation about the situation of which I am speaking, in terms of public works. I have always found the Minister of Public Works co-operative.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I interrupted several hon. gentlemen on the other side when they were discussing the estimates of the Department of Public Works, and I do not think my hon. friend from Rosedale will feel that I am being unfair when I suggest that perhaps he too is going a little far.

Mr. Henry: Mr. Chairman, I have tried to keep myself within the framework of the Post Office Department with regard to the recommendations the minister can make. I shall just accept "in a kindly way" the suggestion that I go no further with those remarks, but if the minister has trouble in convincing his colleague I would be willing to take a hand. In the past I have found him very helpful.

Just as we have solved the postal problems at St. Clair and Yonge streets, I hope ultimately we will have a better solution for the area of postal station F.

In conclusion I wish to pay a tribute to the businessmen particularly for their spirit of co-operation. Above all I wish to pay a tribute to the officials of the department, and in particular to the Postmaster General. It is my good fortune to have known them all for many years, and I have listened to some criticisms in this debate with disgust. I pay tribute to them as worthy public servants who have discharged their duties with all possible responsibility in the circumstances. With this I conclude my remarks.

Mr. Green: Before the item carries I should like to ask the acting minister or the parliamentary assistant to explain to the members under what authority the Post Office Department is cutting down the holidays of postmen because they are late for work. As the minister knows, this question has come to a head in Vancouver within the last week, because there has been a meeting there of the executive of the Canadian postal employees' association. According to press dispatches the executive of that association took the position unanimously that the department had no authority whatever to impose penalties of this kind.

I understand that under the provision if a postman is more than three hours late over the whole of the year he loses one day of his vacation. For being late a total of three to five hours during the whole year he loses one and a half days, and he loses another half day for each additional two hours.

I have never heard of penalties of this kind being imposed by any other department of the government. The officials of this association claim that the penalties are much too severe. For example, one report states:

> CPEA officers here feel the lateness penalties are too drastic and "there's no reason" why milder penalties, such as fines or pay deductions, can't be imposed.

It seems to me to be going rather far for the Post Office Department to set up a rule of this kind. Surely it is not necessary to take drastic steps of that nature. These men are engaged in work which is very hard, and the men who deliver the mail are out in all kinds of weather. Cutting down their holidays in this manner is a good deal like the treatment that might be handed out to a child. It does not fit in with the conduct of government business. These officers claim that the civil service commission sets the holidays and that the postal department has no right to interfere with them. I would appreciate very much having an explanation from either the acting minister or the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I do not have it in front of me, but I believe there is a section of the Civil Service Act which permits departments to impose disciplinary penalties when necessary. I understand that some departments impose fines and others impose penalties of loss of vacation, to use the hon. member's term. As far as the department is concerned we have received a great many complimentary comments from our own employees, most of whom are punctual. They have felt that over a period of years they were being penalized because those who were late were, as we say, getting away with it. With that idea in mind a schedule was drawn up. I do not have the schedule in front of me, but I do believe the details as given in the newspaper are quite accurate. There is a three-hour leeway. We allow lateness up to three hours for which there is no penalty. After that—

Mr. Green: Three hours in the year?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Yes. But, of course, at the same time consideration is given to whether a person is held up because of an unexpected storm, or the breaking down of a bus, or something of that kind. Every possible reason for lateness is taken into consideration. These penalties apply to the people who persist in being late. We feel that in fairness to the other employees some disciplinary measure should be taken, and in fairness to the public whom we are trying to serve we feel our employees must be on time.

Mr. Green: Under what section of the Civil Service Act is this power given to reduce holiday time?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): As I mentioned, I have not the Civil Service Act in front of me, but I shall find the particular section and send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Green: What other departments of government impose penalties of this nature?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps that is a question that is a little unfair to put to the parliamentary assistant. I believe every department of government has some sort of regulations; certainly mine has. As far as I know they have never come up in the house, but I have had occasion to inquire about their details. One has to recognize that in running any big organization where punctuality is essential to the service of the public the great majority of the employees who are punctual would be unfairly discriminated against if there were not some penalty against that very small minority who are slack. As the parliamentary assistant has said, allowance is always made for legitimate reasons, and in addition there is a three-hour leeway.

Mr. Rowe: For the year?

Mr. Pickersgill: For the year. It may be that the exact regulations of this department are not quite what they should be, I do not know, but we shall certainly look into that. The principle of the thing is that there must be some form of discipline, and I am sure the hon. gentleman who represents Esquimalt-Saanich would not disagree with the view that there must be some disciplinary regulations that will keep the employees up to scratch when they are serving the people.

Mr. Green: I am not questioning the propriety of having penalties. What I am questioning is penalties in the nature of cutting down a man's holidays. I should like to know what other departments of government impose penalties of that kind.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be glad to make inquiries.

Mr. Green: Are there any other departments which do?

Mr. Pickersgill: I could not answer offhand.

Mr. Green: Could the minister let us have that information before the estimates are finished?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid it would probably take me several days to get it. I should be glad to undertake to give it to the hon. gentleman and put it on the record, if he should wish that to be done.

Mr. Green: Is this subject being given any further consideration by the department at the present time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I want to express my personal regret that the Postmaster General is in ill health and unable to be here in the House of Commons. I think everyone who got to know him last year will agree with me when I say that he accommodated the house and was in every way a gentleman in this chamber. I regret that any hon. member, in any remarks he has made, has seen fit to indicate any reflection on him.

However, I do not think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration needs to come to his rescue. I might just say that I think it might well be that the Postmaster General's ill health is partly due to the fact that he had an extremely difficult initiation as Postmaster General. I believe it seemed unfortunate to the house last year that right after the election, when we had the promise of cuts in taxation, the first thing the new Postmaster General had to face was a program by the Post Office Department to increase postage rates in Canada. Of course the result was that when he tried to pilot his estimates through the committee of supply there was a barrage of criticism from those who were opposed to such an increase in the taxation of our people. I think that situation to some extent could have some bearing on the health of our genial friend the Postmaster General.

There are some matters I wish to bring to the attention of the committee. First, I am happy to note that according to the statement of the parliamentary assistant yesterday our post office revenue is again showing a surplus to the extent of 17 per cent, having increased in the past fiscal year to approximately $151 million as compared with $129 million in the previous year. I might state that according to the report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1954, there were only three occasions in the last 20 years when our Post Office Department showed a deficit. Those years were 1939, again in 1951 and in 1954, when there was a deficit of $2,474,000.

I think the parliamentary assistant has stated that the revenue return last year has resulted in a surplus to the extent of approximately $7½ million. I am glad to hear this. I hope not only will there be economies in the department, but also that the services we have had in the past will be kept up to a high level.

In this regard I want to extend my congratulations to the people in the Post Office Department far and wide. I come from a rural area where we have rural mail couriers. I know of no people who give finer service to the public and who show greater fidelity to their responsibilities. I think the old saying that the King's mail—now the Queen's mail—must go through is taken to heart by our rural mail couriers throughout the service. Perhaps that is a policy carried out by all those in the employ of the Post Office Department. In saying that I do not mean for one moment to say that everything in this far-flung public department is as good as it should be. I think the department should at all times try to give better service, and at the same time should try to cut any unnecessary expenditures.

There are one or two things I should like to point out. First, I am wondering whether some of the $7½ million of surplus is perhaps the result of economies which mean curtailment of the service to our people. I have here the report of the Postmaster General dated March 31, 1954. I might say it is regrettable that while this report was tabled in the house on January 10, 1955, it was only today that I was able to get a copy of it. I was told the reason was that more copies were not in print, and I had to get one from the sessional papers office. That situation is rather regrettable, in view of the fact that it is for the year 1954. I think the fact that copies have not been distributed to the members of the house is an unfortunate circumstance.

This report states that in the last year—that is in 1954—there was a decrease of 57 in the number of post offices in Canada. I should like to know the reason for the closing of those post offices. Was it simply because the revenue return was so low, or was it because they were in neighbourhoods where they were no longer giving service to the people?

I do not agree with the statement by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace yesterday, when he was asking the government to discontinue the service or operations of the post office savings bank. Too often, I think, we have coming from that corner of the chamber certain suggestions with regard to economies without any indication of how they may reflect on the service to our people.

Taking the figures from the report of the Postmaster General for 1954, I see that there has been an increase in the use of this facility of the Post Office Department. As an example, for the fiscal year 1945 the balance on deposit, in round figures, was $28 million, but by 1954 it had increased to $39 million.

Again, we find that in 1945 the number of accounts was 222,250, whereas by 1954 the number had increased to 291,602. I think that fact shows that the people of Canada are making use of this service. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that he do not take too seriously the criticism of the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, but that he see that this service to our people is continued.

I want to bring another matter to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. It has to do with the names of certain post offices. In my own constituency of Moose Mountain, as listed in the report of the Postmaster General for 1952, there is listed the name Fairlight Station and again Kipling Station. Kipling used to be in my constituency. It is now in Qu'Appelle. I think those stations must have been named away back in the days of the early growth of the province. They are now fairly large villages, and since none of the mail going to these post offices is indicated as being for Fairlight Station or Kipling Station I suggest that the next post office directory merely list them as Fairlight and Kipling.

While I am talking about post offices I want to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant the need for post office accommodation to carry out the work of the department in Kipling. Last year I brought to the attention of the department and also the Minister of Public Works the fact that the people of Kipling have needed a post office for a long time, and have been promised one ever since 1952, prior to the election. I want to read a few words from page 3968 of Hansard of April 9, 1954. At that time I was inquiring of the Minister of Public Works whether or not something was going to be done about the construction of a post office at Kipling, and he answered me by saying, "You are going to get it."

I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that he talk to the Minister of Public Works and do something about that matter this year. I notice that in the estimates there is again an item of $25,000. I suggest that the parliamentary assistant do his level best to have restored the appropriation of $75,000 which was in the 1952 estimates, and that construction be commenced immediately on that post office.

There is one other matter I wish to raise having to do with post office facilities at Estevan, a growing town right in the centre of my constituency which may well be the hub of a great industrial area. Oil and natural gas are being discovered, and there are the coal fields and many other activities. The customs office is also in the present building, and of course it has become completely inadequate for the work that has to be carried on. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to see if he can get a vote in the near future so we can have a building which will be a credit to the department and will accommodate not only the customs department but also the Post Office Department.

I have nothing else to say, other than that I am very happy to have the opportunity to express my appreciation of the work of the employees of the Post Office Department. Wherever I have had occasion to deal with them they have been courteous. They have carried out their work with great fidelity to duty, and I think we can be proud of them.

(Translation):

Mr. Brisson: Mr. Chairman, during this session I have had occasion to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General (Mr. Kirk) whether his department was planning to improve the summer and winter mail service east of Baie Comeau.

A month later, answering a question I had put to him, the parliamentary assistant gave me the welcome news that the Post Office Department, with the co-operation of the Clarke Steamship Company, had organized a more frequent service for the district stretching from Baie Comeau to Havre St. Pierre.

In this way, for the past month, the Seven Islands area has been enjoying mail delivery service six days per week. I thank the department for this improvement and feel confident that I am expressing the wish of every one of my constituents in expressing my most sincere thanks to the authorities for granting my request.

The second part of my request had to do with improved winter service. This will hardly be news to anyone, since the chamber of commerce of Seven Islands has made it known to everyone in Canada, especially in the province of Quebec, that the Seven Islands area and the eastern part of my riding was limited, in the case of third and fourth class matter, to a fortnightly delivery by the North Gaspe of the Clarke Steamship Company.

I would therefore draw the hon. Postmaster General's attention to this anomaly which should be corrected without delay on account of the importance that the Saguenay constituency has acquired in our country. In fact, the population of the town of Seven Islands, which numbered only 1,200 people in 1950, now has 5,000 inhabitants, not including the floating population. Moreover, the department must not forget the importance of the titanium mines at Havre St. Pierre, and Natashquan, where the extraction of ironsand is to start this summer. To point out the development of this part of my county more accurately, I need only add that several companies are engaged in lumbering operations and that its total population amounts to about 25,000 residents.

Now, I think it is normal for the Post Office Department to allow that section of my county an adequate mail delivery, because this is perhaps its only means of communication with the civilized areas, as there are neither roads nor railways there.

I would therefore ask the minister to do his utmost to grant that population air transport of all classes of mail, as from next winter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have a vivid fellow feeling for the hon. member. His county is near Newfoundland, where similar conditions prevail. The department will consider this request without delay.

(Text):

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the first item of the estimates of the Post Office Department in order to bring to the attention of the responsible authorities a matter to which I have referred both in this and the last session of parliament. I wish to be fair. I think all hon. members will agree that the Post Office Department is a remarkable organization. I wish it were possible for me to be a little more complimentary, but unfortunately I cannot be so at this moment. However, I assure the postal authorities that I look forward to the time when I may be able to rise and throw a bouquet in their direction for having responded to the needs of the people of the town of Beverly, Alberta.

We in parliament receive the demands and requests of the people of Canada. It is our responsibility to give careful consideration to them, and on the basis of their merit and propriety we take action in order to meet those demands. In the case of the town of Beverly it seems to me that the requests of the people for consideration in the matter of expanded postal facilities have not been met. The story is long, but briefly it involves a fast growing community of some 4,500 people who at the present time have a little shack for a post office which has some 160 square feet of lobby space.

It is quite obvious that this is inadequate for a community with the rapid growth of Beverly, Alberta. The people there are very displeased and in some quarters quite angry. I brought up this matter during the speech from the throne debate last year and nothing happened. I brought it up again on the estimates of the Post Office Department at the last session of parliament, and again nothing happened. To be quite accurate, I did receive a letter from the Postmaster General informing me that the matter would be investigated. It does seem to take some time. In the meanwhile the people of Beverly, Alberta, are waiting patiently.

As I mentioned before, the people of that constituency are displeased. I am sure if one of the responsible officials of the department paid a visit to that community he would determine that my representations have been very mild. As a matter of fact if one of the officials went there I would suggest he go incognito. Perhaps he could wear a pair of those sunglasses that have a guarantee to the effect that even your best friend will not recognize you. I am sure whoever went would come back and make a firm recommendation to the public works department that something be done to alleviate that situation.

I mention in passing that comment has been made, I suppose by unscrupulous people, that the reason the community has not received these necessary facilities is that they voted the way they did. Of course I do not believe there is anything in that. The people insist that they voted right, and they would like to have that post office or extended facilities without having to pay the price of voting wrongly. I feel it is only proper that an investigation be made of the situation and steps taken to correct it. As I mentioned before, the people are patient and so am I, and I trust our patience will be rewarded shortly.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Before we conclude discussion of the first item of the estimates, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two further observations, in part adding to what I said yesterday and in part motivated by what seem to me the very unsatisfactory answers given by the Acting Postmaster General and the parliamentary assistant this afternoon.

When I was a youngster I dimly remember playing a game called post office, which seemed to be a happy occasion for those of us who were at a party. Listening to the hon. members who represent the post office here, I rather felt as if I were back in those more and more distant days of my youth, listening to people playing post office. Certain it is that they are people not sure just what they are doing, and who do not have all the facts at their fingertips. It is to be regretted that such persons are toying with the largest government department outside of the Department of National Defence.

I would say that yesterday I was quite perturbed to hear a number of hon. members take issue with the post office on the question of second class mail, the delivery of magazines and things of that sort. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, for example, said that the deliveries of a magazine called True Love had suddenly grown in the city of New Westminster from one bag to 12 bags. In the first place, I believe it is the responsibility of the people in that area to decide whether they want True Love or any other magazine.

Mr. Nicholson: They should not ask the rest of the people to subsidize it, though.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can you subsidize true love?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am very glad of the interruption by my socialist friend, because I can tell him that while this particular publication may not be sympathetic to his way of thinking, a great many if not all of these publications serve a very useful and valuable function in our economy and our culture. I am not necessarily suggesting True Love falls into that category, but a number of the others which were mentioned yesterday certainly do. I feel that for us to suggest that the information brought to the people of Canada by such magazines as Time, Life, Reader's Digest, and many others should be made more expensive to obtain through a change in the postal rates, for instance, is open to question.

I turn now to certain of the answers given to us. There is one thing apparent, that if you ask for something nicely the ministers do not give it to you very quickly, but if you lay on the whip in the house once in a while you sometimes get some response. I do want to thank the Acting Postmaster General and his parliamentary assistant for having this afternoon tabled the return for which I had asked some time previously, concerning thefts from the post office. I am interested in seeing that it reached the office of the Postmaster General on May 12. Presumably since that time the report has been under preparation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman must surely be mistaken. These returns go to the Secretary of State from the Acting Postmaster General.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I quote the heading, Mr. Chairman: "Secretary of State", and underneath it says, "Referred to the hon. Postmaster General for report; C. Stein, under-secretary of state." This particular statement is dated May 12.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): It was referred to the department on that date.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Yes. That was my statement, that it had been referred to the department on May 12 and it has taken from that time until now to be tabled. I would not expect the Acting Postmaster General, who is the full-time Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, to know anything about the Department of the Secretary of State, because he only held that position for a year and a half. It is hardly logical to expect he would find out anything about the department in that time, the type of forms he was signing or which were being signed for him by his officials. However, let us not be led down any garden paths by interruptions of that sort. Let us keep our eye on this particular situation.

In the course of his remarks this afternoon the parliamentary assistant said the return could have been made available almost immediately had it not been for the fact that I asked about court action in connection with these cases, so it was necessary to look into the matter to find out what action had been taken and what results had been obtained. If there is one damning piece of evidence that has come out in this house in respect to the operation of the Post Office Department it is that statement of the parliamentary assistant this afternoon, which shows the way they are handling their business.

Let us look for a moment at the information contained in this return. I knew in a general sort of way, by means of quick addition and certain information in the newspapers, that sizeable thefts were occurring in the post office. I had no idea, however, of the immensity of the thefts or their great numbers or the lack of follow through and the lack of investigation that is made evident by this report. Let me put the figures on the record.

Before I do so, may I say this is a summary that I made very quickly from the report. I hold this return in my hand and note that there are five and a half closely typed sheets, one line to a theft, covering thefts from the department since January, 1953. It was simply astonishing to me when I was given this information this afternoon, or perhaps rather than "astonished" I should say I was horrified. In order to make it as simple as possible for hon. members I have tried to summarize. Here is what I find: In 1953 there were 98 thefts from the post office; in 1954 the number almost doubled to a total of 172, and in the first four months of 1955 there have been 58 thefts. In other words it is carrying on at a rate just slightly in excess of the 1954 average. There is a steady uptrend in thefts from the post office, with a tremendous increase between 1953 and 1954.

There is also a very definite increase in the large amounts being stolen from the post office. In 1953, while there were 17 thefts of $1,000 or over, there were no thefts of $10,000 or over. In 1954 there were 42 thefts of $1,000 or over and three over $10,000. In the first four months of 1955 there were 20 thefts over $1,000, and already there have been two of over $10,000.

Might I insert here, in parentheses, that the department also hides behind certain omissions from these figures. For example I would refer to one theft on December 16 from Britannia Beach, British Columbia, to which reference has already been made in the house. Opposite that, we find in the list of the amount of losses, the notation "bank money packet" but we know from the press that the amount was $44,500.

Mr. Pickersgill: How do you know the press is right?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As I remember it, at that point the press were quoting official sources. If my recollection is correct they were quoting post office sources.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am told the information was never made public by the Post Office Department.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I shall attempt to verify that before my speech in concluded. But I would say this, that I remember rather clearly the Postmaster General, who was then in the house, giving me that information himself in answer to a question. It is rather difficult to look something up in Hansard and make a speech at the same time.

I do point out that, in addition to the particular amounts which are listed and which, in the last four months, if my addition is correct, total, $108,000, we see a rather frightening situation so far as the people of Canada are concerned in the matter of the care being taken of all the material they entrust to Her Majesty's mail.

It might not be too bad if proper action were being taken by post office authorities to deal with this situation. After all I cannot hold the post office responsible, in the final analysis, for the actions of a man who chooses to hold up a branch of the post office or to break in and steal things from it. But I do say that in many of these cases such action could probably be warded off if adequate precaution were taken by the department. I do say that probably many of these thefts take place as a result of inefficiency in the department. I would not wish to stand here and say however that my case was based alone on the high number of thefts and robberies from the post office. I turn therefore to the record of the post office in dealing with these situations—because, after all, it is one thing to have a man steal from me but it is an entirely different thing if he steals from me and I do not do anything about it. Definitely, beyond question, if that situation exists time and again the responsibility lies on my shoulders.

As I have said, in 1953, there were 98 thefts from the post office, but only 18 of those—less than one-fifth—have been dealt with by court action. In only that small number has any attempt been made in that field to deal with the situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member does not wish to be unfair. I am informed the Post Office Department in every one of these cases lays an information with the proper authorities. If there is a known suspect to prosecute, then prosecution is instituted. I am sure the hon. member knows that, once the Post Office Department has laid the information and has asked to have a prosecution carried out, it does not carry out the prosecution. The Post Office Department does not carry on police action; that is done by local, municipal or provincial police, or by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in those provinces in which they act as provincial or local police.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, the Acting Postmaster General would be better off as Minister of Fisheries, in view of the red herrings he is trying to throw into the debate. There is one thing certain, and it is this: if money disappears and if the post office reports it as a theft or a robbery, then that money did not walk out under its own steam. Someone has been responsible for it. And for the Acting Postmaster General to stand up in the house and say, "In every one of these cases we lay informations", gives the impression that the department is dealing with the situation efficiently and doing something about it. But the thing that worries me is the actual statistical information, figures which I am putting on the record and which show conclusively that the department is not doing anything about it.

I do not wonder that he brings in his red herrings. Let me return to what I was saying. In 1953 there were 98 thefts and, as I remember it, 18 —

Mr. Pickersgill: Eighteen convictions.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): And now we have another red herring interjected by the Acting Postmaster General. Let me put on record right now what I asked for, because I could foresee all this shilly-shallying and all these attempts to introduce devious side issues. And I understand that some people in this house are expert in the introduction of devious side issues.

My question was, first: Have any thefts of money, postage stamps or anything of value occurred in the Canadian post office since January 1, 1953? 2. If so, for each such theft (a) where did it take place, (b) what was the amount involved, (c) what was the date of the theft, (d) has court action been instituted against specific individuals, (e) what was the result of such action, if any.

Now, I have been trying to get through this debate reasonably quickly, but this information has to be introduced to show the unfortunate way in which the Acting Postmaster General, by way of interjections, is attempting to make my exceptionally strong case appear as a weak one. He says that the only things listed here are convictions. My question specifically asks for, and the information filed specifically indicates that shown here is every case where court action has been instituted against specific individuals.

I now make a third try to put this information on the record, starting again with 1953, when there were 98 thefts and only 18 court actions, then turning to 1954 when there were 172 thefts and only 34 court actions—again something less than one-fifth—and in the four months of 1955 when there were 58 thefts and only 8 court actions. I might say in respect to 1955 that I realize there will probably be a few more court actions to come.

I cannot expect the Postmaster General to have money stolen from him one day and institute action against a specific individual the next day.

I do say most strongly that the situation is not comparable in any way with banking institutions which handle far greater quantities of money than the post office. The record of theft in the banking institutions of Canada is not in any way comparable with the bad record of the post office.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, this record shows, first, that adequate care and attention is not being taken of Her Majesty's mail, particularly the valuable section; and, second, that the post office is derelict in following through, once a theft has occurred, in an attempt to find out the circumstances and prosecute those responsible for it.

In this connection, I come once again to the answer given in the house this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant that it would have been easy enough to tell us how much money had been stolen from them, but that they really do not know, without a great deal of work, what was being done about those thefts, who was being prosecuted and who was not, what action was being instituted, and so forth. If that is the situation, it is small wonder, Mr. Chairman, that we have reached the point where 4 out of 5 people who steal money, stamps or valuables from the post office can get away with it scot-free. Perhaps that is not the nicest thing to say. It is an unforunate thing, because it almost makes it look as though it is a good thing to go into the business of stealing from the post office. You have 4 chances out of 5 of getting away without being apprehended.

Let us look at some of the thefts of money that have taken place. There was a theft of $7,600 from the Killaloe station in Ontario on April 19. Please understand that I have no intention of reading this list of hundreds of thefts into the record. There was a theft of $29,453 in Toronto on January 31 of this year, a theft of $20,249 in Toronto on February 23 of this year, a theft of $30,710 in Toronto on November 28, 1954. It is unfortunate that I took 3 Toronto cases because similar thefts are occurring right across the country.

I should like to see the Acting Postmaster General rise in his place and give us a little more adequate explanation of the situation regarding the security of Her Majesty's mail than the wishy-washy answer which he gave us this afternoon, when he said, well, it was the responsibility of the local postmaster to look after this, and if he did not do right he was disciplined.

There was absolutely no answer given this afternoon—and I can well understand why—to my observations yesterday regarding the government T-4 return. I state directly, Mr. Chairman, that the question should be answered. There should be a complete answer to it. I realize it is embarrassing, but I think it is about time that the people who occupy the treasury benches face up to the mistakes that they make once in a while, or more often than once in a while, and when we ask a question in the house, give us a reasonable and honest answer without completely disregarding the question.

In the course of his remarks this afternoon the parliamentary assistant, in giving the reasons for the surplus this year, said that certain 1954-55 expenses which would normally be charged to the current fiscal year would be charged to next year. I hope that before we leave the item he will give us some indication of the volume of those expenses that would be largely concerned in a surplus of $5 million. If government accounting has reached the point where large items amounting to millions of dollars can be transferred willy-nilly from one year to another, then it is rapidly becoming suspect. If the minister should rise in his place and say that they were only little items—I just mention that in passing—then the government answers in this house are becoming suspect.

Yesterday, points were brought out in connection with annual leave for letter carriers and whether they should be in the order of seniority, including supervisory letter carriers, or excluding them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman was not in his seat when I gave an answer about that at the beginning of the afternoon.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I was either in my seat or immediately behind the curtain. I think I heard everything that was said this afternoon. I was just going to say that if I heard the answer right it did not seem to go into the details of the problem as they were set out yesterday. If my memory serves me rightly the acting minister said that he had certain representations made to him, and the matter was under study.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, that is not correct. What I said was that the delegation received by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, my colleague, the Secretary of State, and myself, discussed this briefly this morning and that a meeting had been arranged between some of the people who were there who represented some of these organizations and some of the officials of the department, and that they had hopes of ironing this whole thing out very quickly. Therefore, it is under very active discussion between the department and these representatives of the employees organizations.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If my memory serves me rightly—and I shall be glad to yield the floor for a moment to the Acting Postmaster General—the action was in respect to vacation time and the restrictions applying thereto.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a question of priority of leave for supervisory letter carriers.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am delighted to hear that. I only hope that when the decision is made the information will be given to the house and that the government will not follow the all too frequent practice of releasing it to the press first and to the house afterwards.

May I just say one further word in connection with that? If equity is to be shown there is only one way that this situation can be dealt with, and that is to give equal treatment to all groups of letter carriers across Canada. That is the first point. The second point is to give no priority to the supervisory letter carrier, because his status, his responsibility and his position are exactly similar to that of the letter carrier himself. It is amazing, Mr. Chairman, that a matter such as this, which has been boiling for months, which has been the subject of representations to the Post Office Department headquarters at Ottawa on several occasions—I do not single out any one individual—on which I personally have worked for the past month and a half, should suddenly, by a coincidence, come to a head this morning, the day after it was brought up in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, of course, this meeting was arranged over a month ago. It just happened by accident to coincide with these estimates being before the house.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I rather hoped I would get an answer like that from the minister. One would think it would be at least a mark of courtesy, when the department knows that a member is deeply interested in a matter, that he has been discussing that particular matter with the minister and with the minister's officials, that some member of his department would get in touch with the member and tell him what they were doing.

Mr. Weir: I do not know why.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There are two hon. members over there who for one month have been sitting on top of this meeting—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Weir: That is ridiculous.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member does not seem to understand what really happened. An organization of postal workers was asked by the Prime Minister to meet the appropriate ministers. A meeting was arranged at the earliest date that suited those organizations and suited the three ministers whom it was appropriate to have there. It just so happened that these estimates came up the day before. It was the purest coincidence—a fluke, if you will. Certainly I do not see how it could be suggested that there is anything wrong or irregular in this, or anything disrespectful even to so senior and distinguished a member as the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I take the compliment in exactly the manner in which it was meant, and I assure the minister that anything I say about him that is complimentary is meant in exactly the same way. I do want to say, Mr. Chairman, that despite all the verbiage hung around this by the Acting Postmaster General it still seems to me that it is discourteous to a member who has been pressing the department in connection with a particular matter that that member should not be advised for over a month of even the fact that a meeting is going to be held or that discussions are going to take place on the matter. I am not going to labour the point much more, but I accept the apology of the minister, and I can only say that perhaps after this experience he will keep us better informed in the future.

Some reference was made in the reply this afternoon to the post office savings bank. I wish to say first to the hon. member for Moose Mountain that there never was any suggestion on my part that the post office savings bank and its facilities should be discontinued. I did suggest ways and means of more efficiently and more cheaply accomplishing that particular function of the post office to the parliamentary assistant, who gave a reply in that connection.

It is unfortunate that the government, having spent some hundred thousand dollars for a management report and having reorganized their department very largely on the basis of that report, subsequently finds it necessary to come to this house and argue against the conclusions of that report. The report specifically said that the saving if the post office savings bank were discontinued would be $377,000. This afternoon the department comes into the house and says, "Yes, but it is only $150,000 that the savings bank is costing us". When we pay for a report and organize a department on the basis of that report we should be prepared to stand on that report if it is a good report; and if it is not, we should not be reorganizing on the basis of it.

Finally there is the question of the two-a-day mail. I have never heard a weaker explanation or set of figures—or rather, lack of figures—given than this afternoon in that connection. The parliamentary assistant came in and said, "If we follow through with the member's suggested plan we will have a lot of additional expenditure". Then he stopped —a dead stop—and went on to refer to the fact that he—presumably his department—considered the public would not approve of this measure.

Mr. Chairman, when we come into this house and sit here month in and month out doing our sincere best to do a job for the people of Canada and when we come forward with an idea which in our estimation is a sound and sensible idea, when we suggest that it is an idea which would not result in major increases in expenditure, it disturbs us, to say the least, that the minister should feel that he can come in as the Delphic oracle and announce without giving any reasons whatsoever just that it will incur additional expenditure. I ask the parliamentary assistant if he will stand up later and give this house some definite information, at least a few figures, as to where the additional expenditure would arise in this suggested course of having two deliveries a day for five days a week instead of the present course of having one delivery a day of mail six days a week. I pay no attention whatsoever to his statement that the public would not like the new system. Those of us on this side of the house individually are certainly capable of coming to some conclusions as to what the people want; that is what the minister has done. I feel that our views on that subject are at least as good as his.

Finally, as we approach five o'clock, before I resume my seat, I would ask the minister on this first item to tell us why his travelling expenses have had to go up from $35,300 to $100,400. Even with all the effort put forward by this government in finding new and fanciful ways of spending public money, that is an accomplishment of which he may well be proud.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before you leave the chair—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Five o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think we should leave that innuendo on the record. Those are not the minister's travelling expenses; they are the departmental travelling expenses.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The committee will have to adjourn. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

STANMOUNT PIPE LINE COMPANY

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 406, to incorporate Stanmount Pipe Line Company.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Green: Will the sponsor give an explanation of the bill?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes; perhaps I should make a brief statement with regard to this bill.

It is proposed that the Stanmount Pipe Line Company be organized for the purpose of transporting petroleum from the United States and Canada through Canada back into the United States markets. The route of the proposed pipe line will be from Beaverlodge field, North Dakota through the Tioga field, North Dakota through southeastern Saskatchewan to Cromer, Manitoba.

The length of the proposed line will be approximately 140 miles and will tie in with the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company system at Cromer, Manitoba. The size of the proposed line will be $10\frac{3}{4}$ inches, outside diameter, and will have an ultimate capacity of approximately 40,000 barrels per day. The estimated cost of the proposed line is approximately $6 million, about half of which will be expended in Canada.

The Interprovincial Pipe Line Company have indicated they now have enough spare capacity to accommodate the through-put of oil of the proposed line and have also indicated their willingness to transport this crude in bond via their Canadian and United States —Lakehead Pipe Line—lines to the United States markets.

A thorough investigation of the oil production available from the above mentioned fields, and markets which the proposed pipe line system will serve in the United States, has been completed. These fields are located in the Williston basin which has estimated reserves of 600 million barrels of crude oil and the area will develop rapidly when additional outlets are provided. Therefore, it is expected the available markets of 30,000 barrels per day along the Interprovincial Pipe Line route in the United States will ultimately be transported through the Stanmount-Interprovincial-Lakehead system. These markets of 30,000 barrels per day in the United States are for 40 degrees to 42 degrees API crude which is presently being transported by railroad tank car and truck, a much more expensive method of transportation than by pipe line. It is to be noted that no other pipe line services this area to eastern markets. In addition, any crude developed in southeastern Saskatchewan which meets the above specifications will be afforded an immediate market.

A Delaware corporation known as the Stanmount Pipe Line Company, Inc., has been incorporated and it is proposed that it will be a wholly-owned subsidiary of Stanmount Pipe Line Company. It is further proposed that this United States corporation will build and operate the section of the proposed line in the United States.

It is intended that the direction of pumping be reversible in the proposed pipe line and, in the interests of national emergency, the existence of this pipe line system will make readily available to both the Canadian and United States governments the enormous crude oil reserves of the Williston basin. By the same token, Canadian crude can be made available to the United States.

The proven and semi-proven reserves of crude oil in the producing areas to be served by the proposed pipe line and the refineries to be served by this system make available desirable markets in the United States. In the opinion of competent engineers, these known factors justify the financing of this project. Expert evidence by highly competent pipe line engineers will be available when this bill is before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

GILLESPIE MORTGAGE CORPORATION

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard) moved the second reading of Bill No. 409, to incorporate Gillespie Mortgage Corporation.

Mr. Weir: I think we should have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. MacDougall: Don't worry, you will have it.

Mr. Weir: Very short, though.

Mr. MacDougall: I think it would be wise if I were to explain the bill, which is a very simple one, under three headings, sponsors, incorporators and reasons for incorporation.

Sponsors: The bill to incorporate the company under the Loan Companies Act is sponsored by R. Kerr Houlgate and Summerfield, Limited. The latter company has conducted a mortgage, management, commercial leasing and insurance business in Vancouver since 1905. Its business is specialized and it does not act as a real estate broker.

Incorporators: The incorporators are Harry Arthur Gillespie, for eight years a director of R. Kerr Houlgate and Summerfield, Limited and actively concerned with its mortgage business; Ian Hunter Bell, the Vancouver resident partner of P. S. Ross and Sons, chartered accountants; Allan Stuart Gregory, a partner in the firm of Ladner, Downs, Ladner, Gregory and Lenox, solicitors for the applicant; Claude Frederick Dunfee, Vancouver branch manager of a life insurance company and a past president of the Canadian Life Insurance Officers Association; Dean Stewart Mansell, vice-president and director of Macaulay, Nicolls, Maitland and Company, Limited, a prominent Vancouver real estate and insurance firm.

The reasons for incorporation are as follows: Since July 1, 1953, R. Kerr Houlgate and Summerfield, Limited has acted as mortgage loan correspondent for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company at Vancouver. It does not act simply as an agent in placing mortgages for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company but rather places mortgages in its own name and then sells them to Metropolitan. This is an established mortgage practice in the United States, although less common in Canada. It is Metropolitan's method of doing business.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has ruled that R. Kerr Houlgate and Summerfield, Limited cannot qualify as an approved lender under the National Housing Act and hence is ineligible to make National Housing Act loans. It continues to place a heavy volume of conventional non-national housing mortgages. The purpose of the incorporation is to qualify the new company as an approved National Housing Act lender.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE COST OF LOANS

The house resumed, from Friday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. 304, to amend the Small Loans Act.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise to continue the debate on the proposed amendment to the Small Loans Act which was introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on May 6. The debate is reported in Hansard at pages 3535 to 3542. From the point of view of the Department of Finance it is not my purpose to defend in every particular the Small Loans Act as it exists at the present time. I did, however, indicate to the house that the Small Loans Act was created upon the recommendations of the banking and commerce committees of 1937 and 1938, and received over the years a great deal of attention from former members of the house. The present act did make some very substantial improvements at that time. It did provide for the first time some form of government regulation. It has substantially, one might probably say to all intents and purposes, eliminated the unscrupulous loan sharks who were being investigated by our committees at that time, and I think it is safe to say that since its inception it has resulted in the availability of an adequate amount of legitimate capital for the small borrower who is not able to provide the normal type of security that is traditionally required by most of our chartered banks.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that after 15 years it would be appropriate for the house to review the advantages and merits of the present statute. I would agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia that doubtless our chief interest and attention would be directed to the desirability and merit of the existing maximum rate of charge or interest. I would agree also that the house, if it were to make a review of the act, would probably also like to concentrate on the advisability of continuing the present ceiling of $500. Only loans up to $500 come within the regulations of the act.

Hon. members will recall that as recently as last year this house, in revising the Bank Act, took a very important step that has a bearing on the small loan field. I refer to the authorization given by virtue of the Bank Act revision to the chartered banks enabling them for the first time to lend money on the security of chattel mortgages. In his speech on May 6 the hon. member for Assiniboia commended the Bank of Commerce which, notwithstanding the lack of opportunity of taking chattel mortgage security, pioneered in what might be called the small personal loan field; in other words, the making of loans where the normal type of security that is usually requested by a bank is not available. I am thinking of non-business loans where a bank normally expects that the borrower will be able to present security such as bonds, shares, insurance equities and the like. This is a field in which the small loan companies are so active.

It is a little too soon to know to what extent the chartered banks are going to increase their interest in this type of lending because the act was only amended a year ago and reports in connection with this new type of business are not yet available. However, I think it will be obvious to members of the house that if the chartered banks do take a bigger share of the lending in this field it will doubtless be the fact that they will be taking the better share, and we will still have before us concern about who is going to serve the poorer risks.

It is the view of the Department of Finance that it would be unwise on the part of this house to accept the bill now offered by the hon. member for Assiniboia without a very extensive review by the banking and commerce committee. I think it would be reasonable to take evidence from the chartered banks as to the extent to which they have taken a more active part in this field.

I believe that we would be required to give good notice to those who are in this field, and there are many not only as licensees but as companies. It is our feeling that this could not be handled in an efficient way this session, being introduced as it has been at this late time.

In addition to that, I should like to point out to the house that in our view there are some features of the proposed amendments which obviously would not be acceptable to most members of the house. Indeed, I question whether, when considered by the sponsor, they would be very satisfactory to him. It is not clear in the proposed bill what the hon. member for Assiniboia has in mind with reference to the licensing provision, since no amendment is suggested in his amending bill with respect to the proviso in subsection 1 of section 5. This proviso states that a licence is not required by a money lender where the cost of the loan does not exceed 12 per cent per annum, which is equivalent to ·95 of 1 per cent per month. If the maximum permissible rate under the act were reduced to 1 per cent per month, the effect would be that only those lenders charging between ·95 of 1 per cent and 1 per cent would be licensed.

Furthermore, under subsection 1 of section 6 as it now stands, the maximum rate of interest after the expiry of the termination of the loan is to be 12 per cent per annum. Again, as I say, that is ·95 of 1 per cent per month. Clause 2 of the bill of the hon. member for Assiniboia would permit a slightly larger rate, namely 1 per cent per month. For these reasons alone, I think it would be unfortunate if this bill were proceeded with at this time.

Hon. members are probably aware that the Small Loans Act is administered by the department of insurance which reports to the Minister of Finance. This department has a very strict policy, not only for licensing but for scrutinizing the charges of these companies and the annual statements that they present. I think it is fair to those in charge of this administration to say that they have probably been carrying out the supervision in this field in a cleaner and better way than probably any other country of which we know. The department itself is most anxious to ensure that the maximum allowable rate is set as low as possible, but it has to be consistent with the availability of funds for those people who require the loans. It is true in recent years that the expense of doing business has risen considerably. At the same time it is known by the annual report that the volume of business of this type has also increased very importantly, and volume is an important factor in their cost ratios.

These features just tend to aggravate one of the problems that seem to be inherent in this business, and that is that a rate that may be too low for a company with a small volume of loans may be too high for a company with a big volume of loans. I believe that is borne out when one looks at the last report submitted to this house under the Small Loans Act. I refer to pages 12 and 13 of the 1953 report under the Small Loans Act, where it is shown that one company dominates the field in small loans to the extent of having something over $50 million of the $71 million of loans for 1953 governed by this act. This particular company made 530,000 loans in 1953 and the average loan was $226.

Now, I just want to indicate to the house what would happen to that business if this particular bill were accepted. I find that this company, which has the advantage of volume which is admittedly a necessity for profitable operation in this field, had total charges, that is charges or interest, amounting to $12·6 million. Their expenses were $6·6 million, leaving a gross profit of $5·9 million. They paid income tax of $2·9 million, leaving a net profit of roughly $3 million. If the interest were cut in half as proposed—this is by no means considered to be all interest but involves the work of drawing the security documents and so on, so that charges are a very important factor—this would be the effect on the balance sheet of this company. The income would be $6·3 million, the expenses were $6·6 million so there would be a loss of $300,000.

Now, of course, the sponsor says that companies of this type can cut their costs. This attitude is typical of the members of that party who believe they are able to run everyone else's business a little better than the proprietor. He gives a few illustrations. He said that for one thing they should be able to cut the cost of borrowed money, I do not know these people personally, but I cannot imagine these businessmen paying any more in interest than they needed to pay. The hon. member makes a comparison with the Bank of Commerce and says there is a spread there between the cost of money in the small loans department of the Bank of Commerce as compared with the cost of borrowed money in the personal loan company field.

I hope all members of the house will realize that would undoubtedly be the case. The Bank of Commerce or any other chartered bank gets its money from depositors who are paid a very low rate of interest. The small loan company lender must go to the banks or other sources and borrow at the normal rates. He referred to advertising costs. It is not my purpose to say that advertising costs of these small loan companies are justified, but I will remind the hon. member for Assiniboia that when he read the brief the Canadian Bank of Commerce presented to the banking and commerce committee of 1954 he should have read what the general manager of that bank told the committee respecting advertising. He said that advertising was a very important thing in this kind of business. As reported at page 822 of the banking and commerce committee report, he said.:

> The present basis is not sufficient to permit the necessary publicity and development in rendering service of greatest breadth.

He was saying that the rate they were obliged to charge was so low he felt they could not afford the advertising which would bring in the volume to increase the service.

In the same report on small loan companies I find that the only other company which has a large proportion of its money out in small loans rather than loans that are not covered by the act would be in this position if this particular amendment were adopted. It reported in 1953 an income of $669,000. Its expenses were $599,000. Its gross profit was $69,000 and the profit after tax was $37,000. If you cut this income in half there would be a loss of approximately $300,000, which is just about 50 per cent of its total income.

And every other licensee, every other company reporting under the Small Loans Act, has a smaller percentage of its business under the act than outside the act. I know the hon. member for Assiniboia suggested in his speech that we should have something in the nature of a government guarantee on loans to people who have not security, in a manner such as is now followed by the government in respect of home owners and owners of farms. I am not going to argue the merits of that proposal at this stage, but it would be obvious to him, too, that an undertaking of that kind would not be entered into until a great deal more study had been made of it than has been made to date.

And so what I am pointing out now is that in asking the elimination of the source of funds for these necessitous persons who want small loans, before any other alternative is available, he is making the proposal that the source of these funds obviously would completely disappear.

I, too, have read the brief to which the hon. member for Assiniboia referred, namely that of the Bank of Commerce before the banking and commerce committee last year. While the hon. member made some quotations from the brief, I feel that his quotations were extremely convenient from his point of view. While I am not particularly taking sides, I do think that for the purpose of information of hon. members it is very desirable that some of the other side of the coin be placed on the record. The general manager of the Bank of Commerce is reported at page 809 of the proceedings of the committee on banking and commerce as having said, with respect to these personal loans:

> The charge is only to a small extent to recover interest cost: by far the greater cost is in direct operating expense quite apart from the cost of funds in use.

The hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out that the average yield, since the inception of the Bank of Commerce plan, was 10·46 per cent. But he did not say that in the same brief the general manager of the bank pointed out that after paying taxes and averaging the business done since 1936 the net profit to the bank was only ·77 of 1 per cent. And I think it would be obvious to most members that not a great deal of capital would be available to borrowers if the net profit was to amount to only ·77 of 1 per cent.

I would also remind hon. members that while this one small loan company which, as I said, is dominant in the small loans field under the act, had all its loans and all its business within the act, the Bank of Commerce in its personal loans department did only 30 per cent of its business on loans under $500. Everyone realizes of course that it is much more expensive to deal with a great many small loans, where the number of interviews, collection work and so on is just as great, than it is to deal with a fewer number of larger loans.

Then again the hon. member for Assiniboia picked out of the report of the committee on banking and commerce the reference to the loss ratio reported by the Bank of Commerce —the reference to bad debts. He used the figure in the brief which was that of one-tenth of 1 per cent. But he did not inform the house that the general manager of the bank, in presenting the same brief, said:

> The payment record however has been achieved during a period of very high employment. Under such conditions it would have been less than prudent not to build up an adequate reserve for the future.

He said, at the time of presenting the brief:

> Our reserve is now one-quarter per cent of funds employed. Losses currently appear to be running at about this rate.

The hon. member for Assiniboia also referred to an operating profit in 1952 by the Bank of Commerce in this department of 2·48 per cent. However, he did not point out to the house that after paying taxes the profit of the Bank of Commerce in this particular personal loans department in 1952 was only 1·24 per cent. And he, further, had available to him the 1953 results which showed that the net profit by the Bank of Commerce, after income tax, in the small loans department was 1·11 per cent.

I think most members realize that this is not a particularly attractive business profit. To some extent I believe it indicates why other chartered banks, which the hon. member for Assiniboia was scolding for not entering the field, have been rather sceptical about it, particularly prior to the time the house authorized them to take security under chattel mortgages.

I reiterate that in my view the bill itself would not even carry out completely the desires of its sponsor, particularly in connection with the clauses overlooked that have reference to regulations. I do feel that while the house may very profitably look into a matter of this kind at the next session, through one of its committees, the remaining period of this session is not such that we could do an adequate and efficient job of getting the proper amount of evidence before a bill of this kind could be accepted.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to do a bit of thinking out loud in connection with this bill. I am not sure one can throw much more light on the principle we are discussing, but I would like to say at the beginning that even though the bill has deficiencies—and I admit there are deficiencies in it—it is still worthy of discussion; and I believe that out of this discussion there is likely to come some crystallization of views with respect to this whole business of small loans. For this reason I congratulate the hon. member for Assiniboia upon his enterprise in introducing the bill. If it does nothing more than point up the need for some institution to make small loans to people whose credit has not yet been established, or who are not considered creditworthy, it will have served a useful purpose.

After the bill was introduced I took the trouble to look back over the record in Hansard of the discussion that took place when the Small Loans Act was passed. I recall particularly the content of the speeches of Mr. Ilsley and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who spoke at some length at that time. I took note of the difficulties which it was thought they faced in that day in attempting to set a ceiling limit on interest rates under circumstances that might possibly dry up the source of funds and drive people into the clutches of the small loan sharks.

I think perhaps many of the fears expressed at that time were well founded. Evidently it was the experience of people in other countries that at any time they did attempt to set ceilings that were too low on these small loans, it did have the effect of drying up the source. There is no question about that. But even so, it does seem shocking in this day and age of comparatively easy money that people should have to pay 26 per cent and upwards a year for their borrowings. The present act does provide a ceiling limit of 26 per cent. It is supposed to be 2 per cent a month, but, as the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) said when he spoke on the original bill, it does amount to something over 26 per cent yearly. As I say, it does seem shocking. That to me is usurious, if it is not usury. I do not know where the line is to be drawn between an ordinary rate of interest that is legitimate and usury; but certainly a rate of 26 per cent a year is usurious and indicates not only characteristics of leeches but I would go further and say bloodsuckers. I am afraid there are too many bloodsuckers who are anxious to live on the avails of destitution. That is exactly what it is. These people are prepared to take advantage of the fact that other people are often forced to come to them for accommodation, for small loans, that they simply cannot do without. To take advantage of them, it seems to me, is certainly invoking the wrath of the ancient prophets who said that these people grinding down the faces of the poor are the worst leeches known to society.

Well, as I say, it is still unfortunate and shocking that in this day such a thing should be. But I will say this. My reading and my experience have both proven that as soon as the Small Loans Act was passed it eliminated to a very large degree the leech or the bloodsucker. We are not plagued with such, as they are in some other countries. While I was in British East Africa last summer, it was drawn to my attention that the rates of interest charged not only on small loans but on medium loans of medium length and on long-term loans were shockingly high, in some cases 50 per cent to 60 per cent, and that the rate on the ordinary commercial loan was something that we would not countenance in this country. They told me that the loan sharks thrived over there with no regulation whatsoever. Therefore, I do say that the Small Loans Act has done a pretty good job.

I am afraid I must agree with the parliamentary assistant to the minister who said that we have to be careful not to put a limitation on the rate of interest that would drive the funds out of the field and make it impossible for people to get accommodation. I am inclined to believe that this bill is putting the cart before the horse. I do agree with the parliamentary assistant that as soon as it is convenient this whole matter should be studied by a committee. It should be given the broadest and the deepest possible study, with a view to finding some solution to the whole problem.

I said that to pass this bill now might be putting the cart before the horse. The reason I say that is this. We should direct our efforts towards finding sources of funds that may be lent at smaller rates of interest than 2 per cent a month. Before we set a limit to the small loans that are now being made—that is, a limit smaller than the present one—we should investigate every possible means of extending and strengthening the credit union system. In my judgment, that is one of the finest measures for eliminating the sort of usurious charges that we have known in the past and about which we are now complaining.

Some of the provinces in the dominion are doing a good job in encouraging the development of the credit union organizations plan. It is an excellent thing. In this house we should give consideration to ways by which the dominion parliament and government can assist in extending and strengthening the credit union set-up. The second thing we should be considering is ways and means of extending the kind of thing which the Bank of Commerce has been doing for some years, and rather successfully. What they have done has shown what other banks could do efficiently and well.

I congratulate the Canadian Bank of Commerce on their personal loans division. While I am doing so, I should like to correct one thing which the parliamentary assistant said, perhaps inadvertently, in comparing the cost of the funds which are available for loan by the Canadian Bank of Commerce small loans division on the one hand, and the small loans companies on the other hand. I think the parliamentary assistant did say that the cost of the funds obtained from the depositors of the Canadian Bank of Commerce would be much smaller than that borne by the small loans corporations. Well, the fact is, of course, that the Canadian Bank of Commerce does not lend the depositors' money through its small loans division. What it does is to create the loans at the moment they are made. All it needs to have is the cash reserve required now at a percentage of approximately 8 per cent, as required by the Bank of Canada. Naturally, their costs are much lower. I can understand what the hon. member has said, and the force of his argument. As a matter of fact, what I have just now brought before the house does strengthen the argument.

The cost of the funds of the Canadian Bank of Commerce small loans section is very much less than the cost of the funds that are lent by the small loans companies. My own feeling is that other banks could enter this field and by so doing could give a real public service. It might be possible to induce them to get into the field. If so, it would help to solve the problem to some extent, although there would be a group of needy individuals who yet would not be served. They will have to be the responsibility of some other institution or organization. My own judgment is that we may have to set up some institution in our land, maybe provincially or nationally, backed by the government, but not necessarily a government institution. I do not think it would be wise for a government institution to attempt it, but some institution backed by the government, an institution designed perhaps to consolidate the small debts of the people who have met with adversity and are really in need of credit, but whose needs are yet so small that they would not be an attraction to the ordinary lending institutions to bother with them. Perhaps I should include people who have not proved themselves to be creditworthy.

I am satisfied that such an institution would require government backing. I am also satisfied that in the long run it would lose money. But, Mr. Speaker, I point out that it would be cheaper in the long run to assist people through an institution of that kind than it would be to pick up the dregs after they have been forced into doing things because they cannot get a bit of credit.

There are thousands of people in our country who need a little money and who oftentimes need it quickly because of tragedy that has struck their families. Perhaps they have no place to go for it except to their friends. If they are not living with their friends who have the wherewithal, what are they going to do? I am sure they would do everything they are capable of doing to manage their affairs successfully, but some people are just not built so that they can manage. Such people are managed and their affairs are managed for them by institutions. It looks to me as though it would be worth while thinking about some institution, government-backed, to help these people when they are in need with a small loan that may not be worth bothering about by some of these other institutions.

If we could get those three things working, it seems to me we might perhaps be able to put a limit of 1 per cent a month on these small loans without causing distress among people who have to go to the small loans companies to get their credit. I would agree with the parliamentary assistant to the minister that we should give this matter a most thorough and earnest study and bring it before a committee perhaps at the next session to see if it would be possible to work out provisions for meeting the needs of those people who have no credit standing but who are nevertheless human beings and ought to be taken care of, and not neglected. Otherwise it does not seem as if we are doing our duty to human beings. I congratulate the mover of this motion on the bill. I think his bill will serve a very useful purpose, although in its present form I am not sure it will do the job it is designed to do.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise in my place to support the bill that is now before us. I was one of the lucky ones who in my high school days attended a separate school and had to make a rather thorough study of church history. While studying church history I was informed that for hundreds of years—as a matter of fact, for more years than was not the case —the teachings of the Christian church were that the charging of interest was something to be considered unethical. For many long centuries Christians were not allowed to charge any interest whatsoever.

I only regret that because of the members on the government side who were on last year's banking and commerce committee the introduction of a bill of this sort is at all necessary. I understand that the banks of Canada at that time expressed their willingness to enter the personal loans field if they would be permitted to charge, not 6 per cent as they are now permitted, but 12 per cent per annum on personal loans. However, some of those so-called monetary reformers who were on the committee raised their hands in holy horror at the idea of allowing the chartered banks to raise interest rates from 6 per cent to 12 per cent, and they were not allowed to do so. I regret that this happened because I feel that, if our chartered banks had been given authority to enter the personal loans field and to charge 1 per cent per month on loans which were secured by means of chattel mortgages, all major Canadian finance companies today would have disappeared and we would not have had to consider a bill of this sort.

The next matter I should like to raise is the question of whose money is being used by the finance companies of Canada. There was something to be said for a man when he decided to risk his own money and also being able to decide how much compensation he ought to have before he would decide to take the risk. However, that argument can no longer be applied to the finance companies in their operations at the present time. From all the information I have, finance companies obtain the vast bulk of their money from the life insurance companies and from the chartered banks of Canada. They pay in the neighbourhood of 4½ per cent for this money. They use this money and charge 24 per cent for the use of it. According to my calculations that represents a charge for the cost of handling of 19½ per cent. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has placed enough evidence on the record to indicate that these finance companies, if they wished, would be able to operate at a much lower rate. If they were not able to operate, I do not think we who are supposed to represent the interests of the Canadian people at large should be unduly worried. I was the one who interrupted the parliamentary assistant, and I said we would like to see the finance companies out of business. We would be doing a real service to the people of Canada if legislation were so framed that they would be unable to continue operations, at least on the basis of charging 2 per cent per month.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Nowlan: Before the resolution carries there are one or two comments I should like to make on perhaps a different plane from that on which we were dealing with matters at five o'clock. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace was more or less in the sordid realm of criminal procedure as it affected the department. I should like to take the minds of the committee for a moment away from that mundane subject to the more aesthetic and artistic one of the administration of the department in so far as its choice of stamps is concerned. I am sure it will be a welcome relief to the Acting Postmaster General to get translated to that realm even for a moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was a stamp collector at a very early age.

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad to hear that because some of the things I have to say will be things which have been told to me by stamp collectors. The Acting Postmaster General perhaps can tell me as a philatelist; I am not quite sure about the pronunciation but as long as we both agree that neither one of us is quite sure I shall not be called to order for mispronouncing it.

Mr. Knowles: It is spelled the same way in Hansard.

Mr. Nowlan: Seriously, I think there is something that should be said to this committee with respect to this matter. We have had various series of stamps during the last few years. We have the fur-bearing series which has had animals depicted on the stamps of this country. On one of them I noticed an Indian or trapper of some kind nailing a beaver hide, I think it was, to a log cabin, but that beaver skin was much larger than the trapper himself. Then we have another one, which possibly might have some significance to the married men of this country, where I noticed an Indian warrior or an Indian buck squatting back of his tepee while the squaw is doing the work of nailing a deer skin to the front of the tepee. I am sure that is something which we all would hope to emulate but I am not so sure how practical it would be.

Mr. Knowles: And how!

Mr. Nowlan: "And how" is right. Now we have the wildlife series on which I am not going to make any extensive comments. I just wonder why we have these various series of stamps in view of the omissions I think have been made by this department. I have some of the wildlife series in front of me. I am not going to elaborate on them for the moment or to elaborate on them at all. But certainly if anyone looks at the 4-cent stamp he will see what I mean. I hope that some time during the evening the Acting Postmaster General or his parliamentary assistant will satisfactorily define for the committee just what is depicted on that 4-cent stamp. I thought it was a muskox. Certainly it has that lonely and rather sinister and ferocious glare that you would associate with the muskox.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister of northern affairs could tell you that.

Mr. Nowlan: I looked at the report of the Postmaster General this afternoon and I saw that in 1954 what was depicted on the 4-cent stamp was a mountain goat. But when I look at the stamp and the one reproduced in the report I cannot tell except that I think the mountain goat looks possibly more intelligent than the muskox. Then I had a note later on in the afternoon from a friend of ours in the press gallery who suggested that someone should comment on the fact that this 4-cent stamp had depicted on it a judge of the supreme court with a wig on. I think that is perhaps a reflection on the judges of the court, but nevertheless it suggests the difficulty in deciding just what is depicted on these stamps. When you cannot tell the difference between a muskox, a mountain goat and a judge of the supreme court, I would suggest that there is something slightly wrong or something askew with the engraving which is being carried on by the department at the moment. I noticed the reply of the acting minister this afternoon to the hon. member for St. Paul's, I think it was, wherein he said that the contract has been let for three years to the Canadian Bank Note Company Limited and will come up for renewal next year. I hope one suggestion made will be that the lithography should be improved there.

I may say that I have an editorial here. I know that one should not quote from editorials and I will not purport to quote from any editorials published in the newspapers of this country. But this is one which I know the parliamentary assistant knows quite well. It is a little paper whose publisher boasts of the fact that he spells his name with both a small "l" and a large "L". I refer to the Berwick Register. He is commenting on this 4-cent stamp and he says something to the effect that it becomes an adventure in speculation to see the reason for picturing the muskox on Canada's 4-cent stamps. Then he goes on to say that the muskox is a lonely creature, that he lives away up in the north and wants to be left alone; and why anyone should ever depict his countenance on this stamp and depict it in the way in which it is caricatured is something no one could understand. I do not want to go into prenatal influences or anything of that kind, but I will say this, that if any one of the mothers of this country had to lick many of these stamps, I hate to think what the effect might be upon unborn generations with this ferocious glare which one sees in these stamps.

A year ago we were criticizing the department for the stamps as far as Her Majesty was concerned. I can understand how difficult it was properly to portray her. I think it would be impossible for anyone to catch the radiant beauty, the charm, the character and the quality of Her Majesty and portray those qualities on a postage stamp. That would be an impossibility. I do not criticize the department particularly with regard to that matter but, in all seriousness, I say with regard to this series of stamps on which these animals are now being portrayed, I wonder in the first place why we find this being done. I suggest both to the parliamentary assistant and to the acting minister, both of whom were teachers before they entered the political realm, that the atlases and the nature books of this country can portray more artistically, more effectively and more beautifully the natural life of Canada than it can ever be portrayed on a postage stamp. You have a beaver which is so large that, when you look at it, you are not quite sure whether it is a mountain lion or a beaver. You have an Eskimo paddling a canoe which looks like a toothpick, and the whole situation of trying to depict the natural life of this country on postage stamps is, I suggest, something which is ineffective. I should like to know just what the explanation is. The minister may say, "We wanted to give publicity to the wildlife of this country". The minister of northern affairs issued a booklet not too long ago in which there were beautiful reproductions of the wildlife of this country. They are much more effective than any which can be put on a postage stamp. When Canadian editorial writers refer to this stamp as one which is discreditable to Canada and offensive to the artistic sense of Canadians, I suggest that the department should reconsider this whole matter of trying to depict the wildlife or the natural life of this country on postage stamps.

There is a particular reason why I raise this matter at this time. One can be sarcastic and one can poke fun at these stamps, and I think one should do so because there is a justifiable criticism. I am told by philatelists that the value of Canadian stamps has depreciated tremendously during the past two or three years because of the quality of reproduction we have had. There was a time not so many years ago—and the parliamentary assistant certainly remembers it and will be proud of it—when one of our Canadian stamps depicted the schooner Bluenose, a name which was remembered the other day in another connection. That was recognized throughout the philatelic world as one of the most beautiful reproductions that had ever been made. I am suggesting that in the quality of the work that is done today we are a long way removed from the quality of work which was done by the department at that time. This is a reflection on the artistic sense and the artistry and the professional skill of the engraver and the lithographer which I am sure is available to the department if they would make the proper inquiries concerning it.

I want to move from that to the matter which really motivates me in making this criticism. I am not interested in making criticism simply for the sake of criticizing, but I do wish to suggest that the department has been remiss in centring its activities on features such as that and missing the boat on other matters which should have been dealt with by the department. A year ago I raised this matter with the Postmaster General, and may I say here, as others have said, how sorry I am he is not with us and how much I hope that before too long he will be fully restored to health and back in this chamber. I discussed this matter with him at that time and we had rather extensive correspondence afterwards.

The Postmaster General was good enough to write me and to say that I had roused his interest in the historical life of the country to such an extent that he was authorizing the issue of a series of historical postage stamps which will come out some time in the future. I suggest to the Acting Postmaster General that more consideration should have been given to the matter of history prior to this. I can think of three particular events that in my opinion should have been recognized by the Post Office Department this year. It would have been much better to recognize them than to try to reproduce an Indian squaw nailing a deer hide to a frame while her husband sits smoking a pipe watching her do it. That may have some interest for tourists but I doubt it.

In Canada this year we are celebrating the 350th anniversary of the first settlement of white men north of the gulf of Mexico. It happened not in the United States but here in Canada, and happened in my own province and constituency. As a matter of fact the Postmaster General promised me he would issue a stamp commemorating that event but he said that after all they had these others in process and it would be two years before we could have the stamp I suggested available for distribution. We are celebrating the 350th anniversary in 1955 and although it will be a welcome tribute, shall we say, to see this stamp in 1957 it would certainly have been a lot better to have it in 1955. If you are going to continue the frankly and crudely cheap quality of the reproductions we see in our stamps today I still think it would not be too difficult to have a stamp issued between now and the end of 1955 to commemorate that event.

We are also celebrating the 200th anniversary of the return of the Acadians to the maritime provinces and the commemoration of their expulsion which occurred in 1755. Then there is another event which I would have thought would be of particular interest to the Post Office Department. I know it was brought to their attention by the Nova Scotia historical society. This is the 200th anniversary of the establishment of the first post office in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: The 100th of the first one in western Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Well, 100 years from now we will celebrate the one in western Canada. But I would have thought the Post Office Department would have commemorated properly the 200th anniversary of the establishment of its own department, shall we say, because I have here extracts which appeared in the Boston Evening Post of April 28, 1755, announcing the fact that there was a post office in Halifax and that mails could be exchanged and circulated between Halifax and Boston. Many years ago the historic sites and monuments board, which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, erected a plaque in Halifax commemorating the fact that the first post office was established in that city in 1755. As a matter of fact, the notice says, and it is of historic interest, that you will find the post office in "the first house without the south gate". You have to go out the gate and there is the house.

There are three events which I suggest, without any captious emphasis, should have been commemorated this year by a series of historical stamps. Although the Postmaster General is not here now—and we hope he will be back soon—he has said he is interested in this matter and I know there are others listening to me who are active in the administration of the department. I should like to say to them in all kindness that I think we in this country are perhaps overlooking these matters of spiritual and cultural value and have been putting the emphasis on such things as the fur trade or wildlife, which may have a dollar and cents value. It may be a part of this materialistic concept on which I think we sometimes put too much emphasis. Perhaps it is because I come from an area where our roots are established—

An hon. Member: In wildlife.

Mr. Nowlan: We have our share of wildlife, too. Perhaps it is because I come from there and appreciate the value of history that I resent the way in which this country apparently is deliberately overlooking these matters which I think should be conserved and built up if a tradition of Canada and Canadianism is to be established as all members of parliament want to see it established. I will not labour the matter further, but I do urge upon the Acting Postmaster General that he review this matter and see if something cannot be done this year to commemorate these events to which I have referred. I also urge upon the administration of the department that in the future more attention be paid to our history. We have the historic sites and monuments board which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has reorganized and incorporated and which we hope will be a more effective force in the country than ever before. I believe it should be, and I think there should be the closest co-operation between the Post Office Department and the board so that national events such as the three I have enumerated, all of which, I suggest, are of national significance, will be properly remembered by the department in the issuing of commemorative stamps.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I have to assert my rights over the parliamentary assistant in this case for a reason that will appear in a moment. First of all, perhaps I should tell the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings that I am advised that the animal he mistook for a muskox was really the Acting Postmaster General listening to the speech of the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. I must say that the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has touched me in a very sentimental spot. The only profession I have is as a historian, and I am very much interested in the commemoration of these historic events. I think one of the best ways to do so is with postage stamps which everybody can see. I am not quite sure what little influence I may have in the Post Office Department from time to time, but whatever influence I have there, if I ever have another chance to have any such influence, and whatever little influence I may have in the government will always be directed in that direction.

In my proper ministerial capacity I was also very pleased to be told by the new director of the national gallery only this week that for the first time, so far as he knew, the national gallery was now being consulted by the Post Office Department about the designs for their stamps. I think that is a move in the right direction.

Mr. Nowlan: It is.

Mr. Pickersgill: I also think the hon. member's suggestion about close consultation with the historic sites and monuments board is an excellent idea. But the reason I rose instead of letting the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare rise was that I felt it was essential to disagree with the perversion of history that we had from Nova Scotia. Of course I know Nova Scotians will go on claiming that the first white settlement in North America north of the gulf of Mexico was at Port Royal, but we who are connected with Newfoundland know that when Humphrey Gilbert came there in 1583 there was already a settlement there and there has been one ever since.

Mr. Nowlan: I should have said a permanent settlement.

Mr. Coldwell: When is the stamp to be issued celebrating the golden jubilee of the two western provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan? Have arrangements been made, and when may we expect to see the stamps?

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand arrangements have been made in that connection—

Mr. Nowlan: Probably in the historic series.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I believe it will be about the time of the anniversary.

Mr. Garland: I am not as concerned with what is on the stamp as with the opportunity to use the stamp. I wonder if the Acting Postmaster General could say a word concerning the status of postal accommodation at air force bases. I want to apologize for delaying the committee by raising a matter of concern in my own riding, but I am sure similar situations must exist in many centres across the country.

Let me briefly outline the problem. The Department of National Defence has developed a very excellent air station at North Bay involving a capital cost of several millions of dollars. Everything has been provided there in a splendid fashion. There are churches, a school, a recreational hall, theatre, grocery store and all of the services that are normally required. When they were providing these things they also made provision for excellent postal accommodation. This is a real community that has developed at that base. It is on behalf of the people living in married quarters there that I should like to say a word.

This excellent accommodation has been provided, but that is as far as it has gone. The Department of National Defence requested the Post Office Department to appoint a postmaster there. The Post Office Department refused, at least that is my information, to make such an appointment unless the facilities would be made available to the general public. The Department of National Defence naturally, and quite properly, resist making their facilities available to the general public. I believe this problem, arising between two departments of government, should be worked out.

In the meantime, the people living in the married quarters, and the single quarters as well, of course, are without the usual postal services such as being able to buy money orders, stamps, the facilities of the savings bank, registered mail, etc. These people must travel three or four miles into North Bay or Gateway post office, to get these services that all of us have a right to expect these days. I am aware of the role of the armed forces postal service, but it seems to me this matter should be reviewed by both the post office and national defence departments with a view to establishing regular civilian postal facilities for the people of this important, and I might say completely modern, establishment.

Mr. Dinsdale: The matter I have to raise tonight is a relatively minor, parochial matter compared to some of the issues the Post Office Department has been confronted with during these two days of discussion. I am genuinely sorry the minister is not able to be with us because I have been pursuing this subject with him now for two years. I believe he has been giving some serious attention to the problem, at least that was the impression I received during the discussion a year ago when we were considering these estimates.

The matter relates to the tendency for rural route deliveries in the prairie regions to decline. It affects my own constituency because from time to time a decision has to be made by the department to discontinue some of the rural routes that have been established over a considerable number of years. In each case, the explanation given is that in this day of the universal use of the automobile farm patrons tend to go to the local post office to pick up their own mail rather than depend upon the traditional rural route delivery service. I fully appreciate that situation. The other main difficulty seems to arise from the impassable nature of certain rural roads in the western rural section.

I would point out again, Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out when we were considering this problem before, the roads in the western rural areas have always been of a somewhat indifferent nature so that problem is not one that has arisen in the recent past. There are still a large number of farm patrons living in isolated areas who do not have an automobile and are not able to handle the delivery of their own mail. I raise the issue I suppose because I still receive complaints from my constituency about the matter. In one area in particular, the town of Reston, three rural routes have been discontinued. I have received a communication that indicates that during the past winter some of the farm patrons have had to wait up to three weeks for mail delivery. The answer given by the minister last year, as recorded at page 4763 of Hansard for May 14, 1954, followed my question as to what was done in regard to the discontinuance of these rural routes and the possible solutions the department may have in mind to facilitate the delivery of mail to these relatively isolated locations. At that time the minister replied:

> I am sorry but I have not that information available at the moment because some of these routes have been readjusted. But I will be glad to look into this matter and if I have not the time to tell him before the end of the discussion on the estimates I will give him this information personally.

Unfortunately, I did not receive that information so I am repeating the question again this year. Just what are the trends in so far as the discontinuation of these rural routes in the prairie regions is concerned? Has the trend continued during the past year and what solution, if any, is there for providing better mail deliveries to these isolated areas? Admittedly conditions in these districts are comparatively difficult. This is one of the reasons for the continuing exodus of the farmer from rural districts to the urban communities. This trend is particularly marked amongst the younger farm generation. If we are forced to discontinue postal services, that will only aggravate the problem of the de-population of our rural areas.

Closely related to this is another problem about which I should like to seek some information. This problem applies to the house to house delivery in the rapidly growing suburban areas. It is a matter that comes to my attention from time to time, and invariably there seems to be some considerable delay before it is possible to provide house to house delivery in these rapidly growing areas around some of our expanding western communities. Then again we have certain areas in the west, particularly in the oil centres, where boom conditions prevail and where we have had a 100 per cent increase in population within the comparatively short time of three years. In one question that has come to my attention it has been pointed out that it is difficult to get the department to act by way of providing increased staff. If I mention the instance I have in mind I am sure the department will be aware of the problem, because it was a live issue around Christmastime last year. I refer of course to the town of Virden, Manitoba, which is the oil centre of our province. There was quite a furore over the lack of adequate staffing in that post office, which had resulted from the growth of population in the community in a short time to the extent of two or three thousand people. It may be, of course, that this was just a tempest in a teapot. However, I would ask just how quickly the department acts in meeting the difficulties presented to the postal service because of rapidly growing populations.

One final question. In the city of Brandon we have been waiting since 1951 for an extension to our post office. The matter has been under consideration for the past three or four years. I understand a promise was given, and I am wondering just how close to realization is the possibility of having very badly needed extended facilities in the Brandon post office.

Those are the only questions I have in mind. As I have said, perhaps they are parochial, but I would appreciate some information on these points.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Chairman, before replying to the last two speakers may I say a word in reply to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. In particular, he referred to a question he asked on March 25 about T-4 forms. I remember the question being asked, and I also remember having the answer prepared. Then, I remember his sending me a note across the floor of the house and, as I recall it, it was my understanding that he was going to ask his question again. He did not do this and, of course, the answer was not given. However, I was under the impression I had given the answer to him. Apparently I did not, and for that I apologize.

I now have the answer before me. However, I do not know whether all these details should be read into Hansard. I am happy to send them to the hon. member now.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Let me say at once that the parliamentary assistant did in the corridor show me a paper with information on it, and then asked for it back. My request in this instance is that the explanation for this set of circumstances be placed before the house.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Anyway, the matter is somewhat clearer now than it was before. I must say that I thought I had given the information. However, these details are sometimes missed because when one is answering hundreds of questions one can forget minor things. My recollection is that the hon. member asked for information concerning income tax forms in relation to employees in the Montreal and Ottawa post offices. Then, in one of his notes he mentioned Montreal and Toronto. My information is as follows:

In Toronto the forms were duly processed in the Toronto post office after receipt from the treasury office and were all released on March 8.

In Montreal, according to information received from the postmaster, the forms were released as follows:

T-4 forms for regular salaries for full-time staff, March 18;

T-4 forms for the night differential for the full-time staff, March 18;

T-4 forms for the salaries of the part-time staff, March 18;

T-4 forms for the Christmas help, March 21;

TP-4 forms for the regular salaries for the full-time staff, March 18;

TP-4 forms for night differential for the full-time staff, March 23;

TP-4 forms for salaries of the part-time staff and Christmas help, March 23.

In Ottawa, all forms were released between March 1 and March 4.

Prior to this year of course these TP-4 forms which are required for employees in Quebec were not necessary. Prior to this year the night differential was liquidated in time, that is, by hours off rather than in dollars and cents.

Then, one other point; there is a month's delay in figuring out the actual overtime and the amount that has to be paid to an individual for overtime. All this meant additional forms to be made and to be filled out. Apparently it was not possible to do this with the same size of staff as quickly as it was done in the previous years.

The answer is quite obvious: Either the regulation has to be changed or additional staff must be added to get them out that much earlier. I hope I have given the hon. member all the information he requires.

In reply to the hon. member for Nipissing, may I say I understand there is an agreement between the Department of National Defence and the Post Office Department whereby in those cases where the camps are what are generally known as closed camps the Department of National Defence supplies the staff; and in those camps known as "open" camps, the Post Office Department supplies the staff. However, may I suggest that in this particular case I shall be glad to look into the matter and try to give the full details next week.

In reply to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, I would say there is a trend over a period of years for the number of rural routes to increase, for the mileage based on the daily service to increase, and for the number of rural mail boxes to increase. However, in changing times, with more people having motor cars, with more people moving off farms, with some roads not being kept up as well as they were, while others are being kept up better, there will, of course, be rearrangements in routes. Each case has to be studied on its own merits.

With regard to his question about suburban areas, I think the hon. member will find that his question was answered this afternoon.

I am sorry I cannot give any definite information regarding the problem at Virden, or the particular problem in Brandon. I think he knows however that I shall be very happy to look into both of them. I hope he will not expect me to give the information to him next week, because I am going to visit the province, of which he is so proud, and the week will be a short one so far as my stay in Ottawa is concerned.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is it possible to say whether there will be any rural routes discontinued this year?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I think the only answer I can give is that no doubt some will be discontinued, and that there will be many new ones. Again it will depend on the individual situation, but if the hon. member has a specific case in mind I would be glad to look into it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Nothing but rumours. On the specific Brandon point, I was referring to the matter of additional post office facilities in the form of a new buiding. Has the post office no information on that development?

[Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare).]

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): The only information I have at the moment is that plans are under study. More can be obtained as soon as I have a chance to look at the file.

Mr. Weir: In line with the exchange of discussion a while ago with respect to stamps, may I ask the parliamentary assistant if the department has prepared a stamp bearing the picture of the whooping crane, a migratory bird, which has become almost extinct. Might I say in that connection that sportsmen in the game and fisheries association of Manitoba have taken a good deal of interest in this. In fact one of them sent in a drawing of what he thought would be a suitable design for a stamp to commemorate the whooping crane, a procedure which was looked upon as a very patriotic effort on his part, and one which might help to preserve this bird from extinction. Can the parliamentary assistant say whether anything of that kind has been accomplished?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I understand that a stamp depicting the whooping crane has been issued, and no doubt it was done as a result of the representations made by people who are as interested in the subject as the hon. member who has spoken.

Mr. Purdy: Mr. Chairman, in the old days when we went to a burlesque show we would hear the song, I Wonder What's The Matter With the Mail; It Never Was So Late Before. I do not suggest that this is a burlesque show. I do not wish to say that this is the general song which is being sung by my constituents in this day and age. Nevertheless, it is a song that some of them must sing, and on their behalf I should like to say a word tonight. One group is rather recent, and I drew it to the attention of the department yesterday. The other group, however, consists chiefly of the residents in and around the suburbs of the hub of Nova Scotia, namely Truro. They have been singing this song for more than a year. In fact, they have been singing it ever since the new regulations went into effect a year ago last April. A few years ago these people received two mails a day. Then they got one mail delivery a day, which was not too bad. Then they were asked to pay another cent for postage, and instead of getting an improved mail service or a service which was at least as good as they were receiving before, they are getting their mail much later in the day.

I should like to say right here that the fault does not lie with the local postal authorities. We know they have gone as far as they can, and they have done everything possible having regard to the regulations under which they must work. The problem rests right here in Ottawa, and with the Acting Postmaster General, his assistant and his departmental officials. To give our people as good a mail service as they had, to which they are entitled, the department must give them a little larger staff. On behalf of my constituents I make that plea.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There are two or three questions which remain to be cleared up. I would say in answer to the parliamentary assistant's observations tonight that all these forms to which I had reference should be filed by February 28; if not, the government assesses a penalty on the business firms not doing so. I can only hope that one department of the government is not collecting any penalty from another department in this particular case. I also hope that the same excuse which he gave to the committee, namely, that they did not have the opportunity to make it ready, will be acceptable to the Department of National Revenue with respect to all the other business firms across Canada if they choose to file between the middle and end of March.

Having said that, I should like to take the questions which I have asked to which answers have not been forthcoming and deal with them one at a time. I hope the Acting Postmaster General will not get mental indigestion by my so doing, which seems to trouble him at times. First of all, will he give us an explanation of the increase in travelling expenses in his department which have approximately tripled? They have risen from $35,000 to $100,000.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): With respect to this item of $100,000 for travelling expenses, provision is made for travelling and living expenses of the Postmaster General, the parliamentary assistant, the deputy postmaster general and their staffs; the directors of administration and personnel and their staffs, who are required to travel on post office business, and includes those on training courses.

I might mention the training courses, which should explain the reason for the increases to which the hon. member has referred. A new management training plan has been put into effect, which calls for 16 new positions. Training courses are being put on at the Peterborough post office. There is also the travelling and living expenses for the investigation staff of two senior and three field investigators. These are changes, Mr. Chairman, that were recommended by the Woods-Gordon report.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I understood the parliamentary assistant to say that the primary reason for the increase in travelling expenses is those management training courses.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is rather interesting. The parliamentary assistant told me that 16 people are taking the courses. There are 16 management trainees, and the increase in the expenses amounts to $70,000, which is roughly $4,000 per management trainee for travelling expenses alone, according to the answer just placed on the record.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I wonder whether I might correct that? I think there is a misunderstanding. With respect to these 16 training positions, we bring in 16 men and train them for a period. Someone else must replace them while they are in Ottawa. Then we bring another 16 to Ottawa or Peterborough, and another 16, and so on.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The details in the estimates mention 16 management trainees. They are listed as new positions. That jibes exactly with what the parliamentary assistant told us the first time. I put the question, and he said yes. As soon as he sees where it leads him he says no. Is he going to give us a further explanation? Surely, it is not $4,000 a year for travelling expenses per man. That is rather steep.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Sixteen people are brought in, and when you bring them in for training someone else must replace them. That requires 16 new positions. The trainees are changed 3 or 4 times a year.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The answer is unsatisfactory, but I shall not pursue it any farther.

An hon. Member: You do not understand English.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I wish the Postmaster General and his assistant understood English as well as I do.

Let me take the next point, Mr. Chairman. During the afternoon we were led to believe that the $5 million surplus in the post office this year was largely owing to the fact, or certainly partially owing to the fact, that the expenses incurred in one year were to be paid in another year. May we have an explanation of that, because it is hardly sound accounting practice.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): While we are looking for the particular paper which contains the various items, may

I say this. In previous years the items carried over did not approximate $700,000.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): While the minister and his assistant are looking for the paper, perhaps I could receive more detail on the point which was raised this afternoon regarding thefts from the post office. It would be helpful to the committee if the parliamentary assistant could point out what effort is being made to improve this situation so that four out of five people who steal from the post office will not get away free.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can answer this question. This return shows every theft that has been made from the post office so far as they have been discovered. As every hon. member who has any experience in these matters knows, sometimes, especially where the thefts are committed by an employee of any organization, these thefts may go on for quite some time before they are discovered. Sometimes they are not discovered at all. Sometimes people who are responsible for these thefts are never discovered, especially when the thieves are people who break in and steal. I know this from personal knowledge because when I was a small boy my father was a postmaster and almost the last day before his resignation was accepted so that he could go to the first war the post office was robbed of quite a considerable amount of money, every cent of which he had to make up.

An hon. Member: Did they catch the thief?

Mr. Pickersgill: Never; no trace was ever discovered of him. This happens quite frequently in thefts from the post office, as in other thefts in the country. The Post Office Department does exactly the same sort of thing as any other prudent organization does. It takes the best precautions it can to prevent such thefts. When any thefts are discovered, the police are informed at once and given any information that will assist them in finding the thieves. Whenever the thieves or suspects are found who can be charged, where there is enough evidence to warrant a prosecution, the department of government which has the responsibility is asked to prosecute. Of course, prosecutions for theft are carried on by the appropriate authorities which have the responsibility. I can assure the hon. member that the Post Office Department does not want to have money stolen from the post offices, that we do not encourage this practice and that we do everything we reasonably know how to discourage it. As far as the prosecutions are concerned, the Postmaster General's report for the year ending March 31, 1954, at page 5, gives the statistics that there were 305 prosecutions that year, 229 convictions, 7 acquittals, and 69 cases still in court. It sometimes happens that it is a long time before the thief is discovered. These things do happen, but I can assure the committee, as I am sure most hon. members believe, that every possible effort is made to remove the temptation to theft in the first place, to remove the possibilities of it within practical means, and if there is any possible way of finding out who the thief is, to prosecute him.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the minister a question, arising out of his reference to the report for 1954. I may have been negligent in not getting that report, but I have not received a copy of the report. When I was preparing for these estimates and considering them I looked among the reports and found that the last one was March 31, 1953. I should like to ask when was the report tabled and when was it printed, and has it been distributed?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was tabled in January. Though I was the minister for the printing bureau, I do not know whether you would call it mimeographed, but it is not printed. There were only a few copies available at that time. I regret to say that between the Post Office Department and the printing bureau it has not yet been printed in quantity and distributed, and I am very sorry for that. I think perhaps there has been a little negligence in the matter.

Mr. Michener: I am glad to share that opinion.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I wish to refer to another point. I hope that the minister and his associates are still looking for the information in respect to the $5 million. I do not want them to forget that. This afternoon we asked for further details as to why it should be more costly to have two deliveries of mail a day for five days a week than one a day for six days a week. I wonder if we could have some more information on that.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): With regard to the first question, the amount of the accounts payable that did not come in time to be paid at the close of the fiscal year are in round figures; printing, $200,000; mail bags and sorting cases, $350,000; uniforms, $50,000; electronic projects, $30,000; facing up tables, $20,000; miscellaneous bills, $50,000. As regards the second question, I do not know what I can add to what I said this afternoon to show that, if you make ten trips a week, it cannot be done as cheaply as when you make six trips a week.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I should like to put on record the very startling discrepancy between the annual report of the Postmaster General which shows 305 prosecutions and the return filed in this house which shows 23 prosecutions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the answer is that these were prosecutions for all sorts of reasons. I am not sure they are for the same year.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The figures for 23 prosecutions were for the same period as quoted by the report. Your parliamentary return shows 23 prosecutions, and you show in the annual report 305 prosecutions. It is quite apparent that the discrepancy is largely due to the fact that you are prosecuting for such things as forgeries, defacing, used stamps and miscellaneous. I felt that we should put it in the record. I do not want anybody to be in a position to weasel out of the statement I made here that four out of five thefts and robberies in the post office at the present time are going unprosecuted. In that connection the minister has told us that they lay an information with civil authorities in the case of such a theft. Have they no investigating body of their own? They have not followed through when something is stolen. When something is stolen from you, you do your best to discover what happened?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, investigations are carried on all the time.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would the minister not say he has been markedly unsuccessful in the operation of this particular department when he is only catching the thieves in one case out of five?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not be able to say whether it is markedly unsuccessful or not. It is obviously very difficult to prosecute someone whose identity you cannot establish. It is sometimes considered by the law officers quite useless to attempt to prosecute someone, even though you may have a very strong suspicion that he is the thief, when the evidence is so slender that the prospect of getting a conviction is very slight. Sometimes that is done, even in those cases when the department or the crown attorney, as the case may be, feels strongly that the person is the guilty person and it is felt that we ought to try to establish the guilt. In many of these cases there may be a suspect, but the evidence is very slight. Many of these thefts are of very small amounts in very remote places where the obtaining of evidence is not very easy. In a great many of these cases, as in the case I instanced out of my personal knowledge, there is no suspect at all.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, is there not another side to this? I have heard of cases where someone, perhaps an employee of the Post Office Department, committed an indiscretion and perhaps was found to have stolen some of the post office funds under circumstances which could not be accepted at all, but maybe there was some circumstance in his family and, having regard to the amount and the circumstance in which the theft took place, I am sure there are instances where the community has interceded on behalf of that person to avoid a prosecution and to ask the department not to prosecute. Maybe that is not right but it seems to me that I have heard of more than one case where a veteran, as an illustration, has been involved and where they lost their jobs but made complete restitution. In those cases, judging from the circumstances, I believe the department was justified in not continuing with the prosecution. That would explain some of the discrepancies my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Just in case that impression should be left with the committee of a great humanitarian government which is not prosecuting because they are sorry for people, let me tell you of some of the prosecutions they have made. In Insinger, Saskatchewan, $3.29; one person was prosecuted and got 2 years and 4 months. In Windsor, province of Quebec, $7.05; 2 people were prosecuted and they sent 2 juveniles to the detention home. Copper River, British Columbia, $13; 3 people were prosecuted and each got a 2-year suspended sentence.

Mr. Lesage: In this case was there any housebreaking?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): These were thefts from the post office.

Mr. Lesage: With housebreaking?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should be delighted to file another request for a return in order to get this information but I think perhaps the minister might be able to obtain it for himself. I am quoting from information filed with the house at my request. If the minister is not satisfied with the information or thinks that it is insufficient, I leave it with him to get more. I have enough for my purposes.

Here is another one in Gwynne, Alberta, where for $2.38 they prosecuted and the man got two years. Then in Oakbine, New Brunswick for $7.67 they prosecuted 2 people. One man got a 1-year suspended sentence and the other was sent to a training school. I could go on down the list but I will not do so. However, I felt that the previous speech indicating humanitarian consideration should be knocked on the head immediately because it just is not so in these cases. If you analyse these thefts you will find that what is happening is that the great majority of prosecutions are in respect of amounts less than $100 and that few prosecutions are in respect of major amounts. I would not suggest that a man should consider stealing $2, $3, $4 or $5 from the post office, because he is likely to be prosecuted. If he really wants to stand a fair chance of getting away free, let him steal $20,000 or, as my friend suggests, $44,500, and then he stands a good chance of getting away free.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I really must protest. Is the hon. gentleman suggesting that there is any deliberate intent on the part of anyone connected with the Post Office Department to connive at these thefts or any failure by anyone to do his duty in prosecuting? If that is the innuendo, let him state it openly because there is not a jot or tittle of truth in it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I may just say that my previous observation was made because the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa—and I am glad his words are on the record—had definitely indicated that the department might be conniving and might be doing these things because of a particular situation in a particular instance. I felt that we should show that the department was prosecuting in the few cases where their investigatory work had managed to show up something. My criticism among others is the extremely weak investigatory work on the part of the department. The minister says that he cannot prosecute anybody unless they find the man. I suggest that they are spending a good deal of money apparently on investigatory staff. They are supposed to be doing this job and they are just not finding the people who commit these crimes. But let me not be blamed for the words of the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa.

Mrs. Fairclough: While we are on this subject, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Acting Postmaster General would enlighten the committee as to the situation with regard to losses in the Post Office Department and responsibility therefor. A few minutes ago he made some reference to losses which had been made up in some years past, I take it, by a member of his own family. Perhaps he would tell us under what circumstances postmasters are now required to make restitution for losses by reason of theft or robbery.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I understand that there are certain rules and regulations which the postmasters are supposed to follow with regard to the protection of the funds in their charge. If the losses take place because they did not follow those rules or in other words if they did not give the funds the protection they are supposed to give, then it is their own personal responsibility.

Mrs. Fairclough: From what knowledge I have of industrial and commercial procedure, I am led to make the observation that most employees in industry and commerce today are protected by bond or are protected by insurance against robbery or theft and that if circumstances occur that are seemingly beyond the control of the individuals or even if there is some slight element of carelessness on their part, a thorough investigation is undertaken by the company which has them insured. I presume that in the Post Office Department run by the government they follow the policy of what is generally known as carrying their own insurance.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): That is right.

Mrs. Fairclough: But it would appear as though, under their own insurance, they did not pursue an investigation to the point of exonerating a postmaster from blame.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, from my own experience as Acting Postmaster General I can say that every week I sign three or four recommendations to the treasury board to reimburse postmasters because of various things that have happened such as fires, thefts or things of that sort, where an investigation has been made and the postmaster has carried out the precautions that are laid down in the regulations. In those circumstances the department accepts the loss but where there is carelessness or disregard of the regulations which all postmasters, of course, are supposed to be familiar with, then the blame is theirs. That is the law as it now is. Although I do not think any of us would have them right here under our hands, I should be glad to get for the hon. lady from Hamilton West the regulations setting out the circumstances in which the department takes responsibility and the circumstances in which the postmaster is held responsible.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would be much more interested in a comparison of those regulations with those which are in force in some reputable bonding or insurance company.

Mr. Pickersgill: We might try to make such a comparison.

Mr. Knowles: I have in my hand a photostat that I should like to show to the Acting Postmaster General.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no!

Mrs. Fairclough: Have you any copies?

Mr. Knowles: I heard the Acting Postmaster General say, "Oh, no" in a very pained tone of voice. I hasten to assure him that there is no secret as to where I got this photostat. It was sent to me by an official of the Manitoba Historical Society in Winnipeg. I want to send this photostat across so the acting minister, the parliamentary assistant and the officials may look at it because of a question the Acting Postmaster General asked of me on February 28. It has taken me almost as long to provide the answer to the question as it takes the government to answer some of the questions we put on the order paper. On February 28, in reply to a question I had asked on the orders of the day about the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the opening of the first post office in western Canada, the minister said this:

> . . . I would like to know what kind of postage stamps they used, and if the hon. member could supply me with some, because I could make good use of them.

I may tell the minister that I can only let him see this. There is a stamp collector in my home as well so that is where it must go after he has seen it. This happens to be a photostatic copy of a cover, as they say in the post office, which went from Red River, B.N.A., in 1855, to Mr. James Ross at Knox's College, Toronto, Canada West.

Mr. Martin: It is not Knox's college; it is Knox college.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of National Health and Welfare seems to delight in interrupting me, and he delights to do it particularly when he is wrong. I would be glad if he would look at this photostat, too. In fact, the season is open for showing photostats to all ministers of the crown. It so happens that the person who addressed this letter to Mr. James Ross addressed it to him at Knox's college—K-n-o-x-'-s. This was before the minister's day.

Mr. Martin: Your pronunciation was bad. I knew there was something wrong.

Mr. Knowles: This was in 1855. We have had the minister around for a long time but not that long. "Red River" was of course the name of the settlement where we now have the thriving city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Bryce: Selkirk. Keep the record straight.

Mr. Knowles: I am afraid the point in the Red River settlement from which this letter was mailed was at the foot of what is now Market street in the city of Winnipeg. My friend from Selkirk and I can, of course, carry this on later. "B.N.A." refers to British North America, the province of Manitoba not having yet been organized at that time. As for the specific question—

Mr. McIlraith: Let us get on with the public business.

Mr. Knowles: —that the minister asked me, namely, what kind of stamps they used, the reply is that they did not use any stamps. In place of affixing stamps this envelope was stamped twice with a rubber stamp. First there are the words "Paid 10", which the Manitoba historical society has determined means that 10 cents in United States money had been paid to cover the cost of delivering this letter all the way from Red River to Toronto. The route taken was down through Pembina and then to St. Paul, Detroit, Windsor and Toronto. There is also stamped on the envelope "6d" or six pence in a circle surrounded by the words "United States". Research seems to have ascertained that this was the way the United States postal authorities had of telling the Canadian postal authorities between Windsor and Toronto that the postage which had been paid included the Canadian postage which at that time was in sterling. As a matter of fact, I have on my desk some documents in which the minister may be interested giving still further history of what went on in those days.

I am happy to send this over to the minister in response to his question of February 28 so that he and those associated with him can have a look at it. I am still sorry that the department did not find it possible to commemorate this event by the issue of a special stamp. However, some of us are doing our best to commemorate it in another way by attending certain events which will take place in Winnipeg on Tuesday of next week.

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, in his speech yesterday the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General said, speaking about the building program of the department, that there are 181 projects for which plans are being prepared and studied further, both by the public works and post office departments. I should like to know if the Chicoutimi project is included in that figure.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): In public works?

Mr. Gagnon: The parliamentary assistant said yesterday that there are 181 projects for which plans are being prepared and studied further, both by the public works and by the post office departments. I should like to know if the Chicoutimi project is included.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): The hon. member for Brandon-Souris asked me a question about a building in his area, and unfortunately I did not have the details then. I promised to find out for him the first chance I have next week, and all I can say to the hon. member for Chicoutimi is that I will be very happy to do the same for him.

Item agreed to.

335. Operations—including salaries and other expenses of staff post offices, district offices, railway mail service staffs, and supplies, equipment and other items for revenue post offices, also including administration, $82,103,422.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I should like some information under this item. What plan is followed in connection with placing telephones in smaller post offices such as are found in towns of 2,000 to 4,000 people?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I am informed that telephones are placed in all staff offices.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Can you explain what you mean by staff offices?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): It is based on the revenue of the office. Speaking very generally, you might say that if the revenue is $10,000 or over you will find the offices have telephones.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I take it there is probably a table or schedule that could be followed.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): If the hon. gentleman will let me know the particular office he has in mind I will be happy to find out for him.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Thank you very much.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to deal very briefly with a matter that has become somewhat of a hardy perennial as far as some of my constituents are concerned. But I must raise it again as they are concerned about it and are suffering great inconvenience because my repeated representations have not received favourable consideration to date. For over 50 years the Post Office Department carried on a very satisfactory mail service on the Arrow lakes, but a few years ago the officials saw fit to discontinue it. For the greater part of the region they made other very satisfactory arrangements through bus transportation, to Edgewood, and steamer service or other water transportation to serve the lower lake. However, the discontinuance of the former service has meant a great deal of inconvenience to some of the residents of the city of Revelstoke and in the district between Revelstoke and Edgewood. Because of this situation there have been representations made to me by boards of trade, farmers' institutes, fruit unions, lumber companies and many individuals, including some of the relatives of the parliamentary assistant who also support me wholeheartedly in my representations on this matter. I hope the parliamentary assistant will answer me satisfactorily because I am going to send Hansard to my constituents on Monday morning.

At any rate, this matter is of great concern to a number of my constituents who consider they are unnecessarily inconvenienced. The provincial government taxation and other offices are situated in the city of Revelstoke, and there is considerable correspondence between points on the lake, particularly from Edgewood north, to Revelstoke on the part of business people, lumber concerns, farmers and the residents generally. Under present conditions a letter posted in Nakusp has to go to Nelson by truck, from Nelson to Calgary by Canadian Pacific Air Lines and then from Calgary along the main line of the C.P.R. to Revelstoke, and this takes at least three or four days. As a matter of fact, it often takes up to ten days to get a reply to a letter sent from the Upper Arrow lakes to Revelstoke or vice versa.

This is a great inconvenience when it comes to paying taxes and dealing with the various branches of the provincial government at Revelstoke. I have been asked to urge the minister and his officials again to give consideration to making arrangements for a mail bag to go between Revelstoke and Nakusp twice weekly. For a short time, because of the discontinuance of the former C.P.R. steamer service, there was no service on the Arrow lakes, but now we have a service running three days a week between Arrowhead and Nakusp in the summer and in the winter months twice weekly. I urge the minister that consideration be given to providing for the carrying of a mail bag from Revelstoke to Nakusp, and return. When the mail reaches Nakusp it can then go on to Edgewood and lower points the following day by bus, and from Edgewood back to Revelstoke the same way. This will be a great improvement in mail service. I cannot understand why it would involve a large expenditure. In that connection I want to point out to the minister's officials that in the area I have mentioned there was produced several million dollars' worth of forest products last year. I do think that the representations of the organizations in the district, and the many individuals, including the relatives of the parliamentary assistant, should receive favourable consideration.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): May I say that the hon. member who has just spoken is always so kind and courteous that one feels one should immediately carry out his particular request. In this case I wonder if I might take a moment to tell him that I knew he was very fortunate, and I think the whole house should realize by now how fortunate he is, that a relative of mine should be a neighbour of his.

Mr. Herridge: They have been good neighbours for nearly 50 years.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I would certainly expect them to be good neighbours, just as I know they have good neighbours. We have recently appointed a transportation officer whose particular duty it is to look into situations such as this. In view of the representations, and in view of those particular circumstances the hon. member has mentioned, we might go so far, without being unfair to anyone else, as to ask him to look into that case as quickly as possible.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is a curious situation shown in the details on pages 444 and 445, which I should like to have explained. It rather looks as though there is an increase in the post office staff of approximately 1,000 persons. There are some 170 less railway mail clerks than formerly, resulting in a net addition to the staff of some 800 persons. Despite this fact, when we come down to the payment for unemployment insurance contributions we find the appropriation is precisely the same as it was last year. Is there any explanation for that?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I believe the only brief answer I can give to that is that unemployment insurance is only paid in connection with temporary employees.

Mrs. Fairclough: You expect those to be in the same numbers as they were in former years, I take it? Then, the net increase of 800 persons shown is in permanent employees, is that correct?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Yes, I think that is correct.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have another question. I find the appropriation for uniforms and letter carriers' satchels is double what it was last year. Does that mean this is the year when they get uniforms, and if so, has any consideration been given by the department to my suggestion of last year that this time they should make the uniforms fit?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a good idea.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): The answer is in the affirmative to both questions.

Mrs. Fairclough: We shall see.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In the details on page 445, there is an item I want to mention. I have been somewhat critical of some aspects of the post office operations, but I should like to say that in one case, that is mail bags, there has been a reduction of some $200,000. I feel that is a credit to the department. I know how it came about. It came about through the use, as I remember, of nylon in place of the old cotton material. I believe the Canadian postal department was ahead of other places in this development. It displays good forward-looking thinking.

Now, there are one or two other items about which I should like to ask. On page 445 of the details there is shown an expenditure of $4,302,000 for casuals and others. What does that represent? Perhaps I could make the question a little plainer by asking: What type of person is that being paid to? Is it a part-time employee or a regular employee?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): This amount covers casual and other employees, and refers chiefly to the additional staff we have to put on during the Christmas rush.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is what I thought it was. Let me say that I am the first person to admit that at Christmastime, certainly in my area, many people come to me and say they would like to have a letter of introduction to the post office to get a special job. I give them a letter which gives their name and address, and pass them on to the Post Office Department. None of the people covered by this item are regular civil servants. I believe it should be mentioned that this is the type of thing that we have to watch very carefully because it represents an opportunity for patronage. We have here an amount of $4,302,000, which, by selecting carefully the people who were paid, could amount to quite a contribution to the government's friends if they so wished.

Now, would the parliamentary assistant like to explain the item of $1,400,000 for night differential payments for operating services? It is a new item this year. Since it is only a small amount it might have escaped the minister's attention.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I mentioned earlier that the night differential is now paid in money rather than in time off. It is a new item because of that.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There is another item farther down, professional and special services, $132,825 in 1954-55 and $481,000 in 1955-56. This represents an increase of about three and a half times. I think it would be helpful if we could have an explanation of this increase.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): The main item in this amount is for studies and research on the electronic project which is being accelerated. It has now been advanced far enough to justify the installation of a prototype electronic sorter in the Ottawa post office. This item also allows for the construction of the automatic facing-up installation to which I referred earlier today.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Along the lines of my earlier question regarding the employment of casuals, could the parliamentary assistant inform the house as to what part of his departmental payroll is in respect of people employed through regular civil service channels and what part for people who are employed through other than civil service channels? We have already located some $4,300,000 in one item. What other payments in respect of staff does his department make which are not in respect of people employed through the civil service?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): It covers, as I mentioned earlier, Christmas help and it also covers people who are taken on to allow a postmaster in some of the smaller offices to take holidays.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Could the parliamentary assistant tell us how many people are permanent and how many are temporary who are covered by this item? I know he has just said it covers Christmas help, and obviously they are temporary. I suggest a certain number of those people are permanent.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): All casuals are temporary.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There are two questions I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant. I notice in this report that the estimated total expenditure for this year is $133 million. What would be the gross estimated income? I intended to ask concerning the possibility of introducing the highway motor trucks similar to the railway carriages, by way of experiment. Have any investigations been carried on by the Post Office Department along these lines, and when and where will they be tried out?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): This afternoon I thanked the hon. member—it must have been in his absence—for his interest in this new type of motor vehicle, and explained that our inspectors had looked them over in the United States and had travelled in them. I said that we have been watching developments with some interest, and that if and when the time should come when we could put such vehicles into service economically we would be only too happy to do so. I would not like to commit myself as to the last part of his question, and I am sure he does not expect me to do so at the moment. In reply to his other question may I say that the estimated revenue, in round figures is $155 million.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): At page 441 of the details there is an amount of $192,000 for films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity. What types of publicity does this include, and what is the necessity for it?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): The hon. member is referring to films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity. This item covers postal exhibits, displays and floats, photography, meals of employees while on duty at these postal exhibits, promotional signs, and householder leaflets which we circulate in large cities with regard to Christmas mailing. Our whole object is to enlist public support and request partial sortings at points of mailing. The benefits are twofold, the first being that of speeding up delivery, and the second that of reducing costs.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): The purpose is to educate the public around Christmastime. Is it to try to speed up early mailing during that season of the year? Does it require $192,000 to do that?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): It covers all the films, displays, advertising and informational publicity across Canada. One of the most important points is trying to teach the people to address mail properly, to mail early, and to have large organizations arrange their mail in such a way that it can be handled more quickly. It also includes putting up signs in post offices, and the like.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Did I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that the estimated income of the department was $155 million?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): That is right.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am very much surprised by this statement. I remember that last year when we were discussing in the house the increase in postal rates the Postmaster General, with the assistance of two other members of the cabinet, tried to convince the house that the post office would operate this year at a loss. If my recollection is correct, without having before me the figures placed on record at that time, there were estimates varying all the way from $6 million to $14 million. Now we find that in the actual appropriation for the department for the current year the estimates are merely some $3,500,000 more than had been appropriated for the year before. If the minister's estimate of revenue for this year is anything approaching correct he is going to have a surplus of $17 million. Yet on this basis the government insisted it was necessary to raise the postal rates last year.

This comes as a surprise to me, but it bears out the validity of the arguments we made last year against raising postal rates. I could not let this opportunity pass without placing these remarks on record. I think what was said last year must now be given its proper value in the minds of Canadians. The position is an absurd one, based on poor budgeting, to say the least.

Item agreed to.

Loans, investments and advances—

543. To extend the operation of the revolving fund established pursuant to vote 541, Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1954, for the purpose of acquiring and managing materials and fittings to be used in the manufacture of mail bags, the total amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed $695,000; additional amount required, $270,000.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Before the departmental estimates are completed, I should like to make one observation which harks back to an earlier item. I refer to the interesting discovery that $100,000 by way of travelling expenses—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The item to which the hon. member is now referring has already been passed. I would be prepared to have the discussion continue under item 543; but if the hon. member wishes to discuss items that have been carried, the consent of the committee would have to be obtained. The administration item was signed half an hour ago.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): My impression may be wrong, but I understood that when we had gone through the department we could make some further observations.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have tried to be patient with the hon. member, and I think we must insist upon observance of the rules.

Mr. Drew: Oh dear, dear!

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration (including advisory committee on agricultural services), $496,998.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: I think that is the proper way to address the group gathered here this evening—

Mr. Nowlan: How about calling it ten o'clock?

Mr. Gardiner: —because I have been listening for two days to a discussion which I think was intended to be heard outside the house, under the circumstances prevailing.

Mr. Drew: Do I take it the minister is not speaking for the benefit of people outside the house?

Mr. Gardiner: Both inside and outside.

Discussions during the session have covered quite a number of questions having to do with agriculture. I am afraid if I were to try to follow them through, and refer back to the many things that have been said, I would be called to order immediately. So I am not going to attempt to answer what has been said throughout the session, in spite of the fact that I have had no previous opportunity of doing so. But I hope during the time the estimates are under discussion on the individual items, by questioning and otherwise these matters can be covered.

However, it has been customary on the first item of the estimates to have a general discussion, and I presume that is desired at this time. Members of the house throughout this session have been suggesting that the Department of Agriculture should increase production to take care of an underfed world and at the same time maintain producers' returns at a high level. Attention must be and is being given to both suggestions, but I am sure it will be agreed that what is done in one direction will influence what can be done in the other. However, the last appeals which have been made by farm organizations, particularly the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, are different from the appeals which have been made in this house, as I hope to point out.

It is the task of the Department of Agriculture to promote the production of food and clothing. We do so by calling together, as every hon. member knows, in the first week of December, in Ottawa each and every year representatives of the 10 provincial departments, the federation of agriculture, the farmers' union, the representatives of the countries with which we trade, and the press of Canada. At this meeting full information is given as to production of and markets for all farm products. This has been going on now for 16 years, and the results, if I may say so, have been rather marvellous.

The provinces co-operate with the federal officials in making available the latest information. The federal officials pass it on to the farm organizations. The effects of it are discussed fully by all; that is, all those who are present at the conference, before the press. The press and farm organizations co-operate in passing the information on to the farmers who become as well informed as to what can be marketed as any farmers anywhere in the world.

The result has been that the farmers for many years now have kept their production of perishable products, including meats, at levels which can be marketed and have stored their surplus in the form of grain, principally wheat, which is the nearest approach to non-perishable food which exists.

When we have been threatened by disease, either of our livestock or of other products, the Department of Agriculture has grappled with the disease. Two outstanding examples are our battle against foot-and-mouth disease and rust. Every expert in every country in the world agrees that we accomplished the most complete and most expeditious eradication of foot-and-mouth disease in 1952 ever brought about in any country. This saved the livestock producers millions of dollars and price control during the period permitted production and marketing to go on at a profit.

We had 18 years without rust, but a few years ago it became known that a new race of rust to which our wheat is not resistant was on its way north. The department at once entered upon the breeding of new wheat. We did not have sufficient wheat last year which was resistant to 15B rust, but we did have Selkirk developed and distributed over the entire area. It proved itself resistant to 15B over the entire area. We have retained the 3 million bushels produced in 1954 in this country to be seeded in 1955, and if we have a reasonably good crop we should have sufficient to seed the spring wheat area in 1956.

By these and other methods we have assisted farmers to produce the greatest quantities of the staple foods, meat, dairy and cereal products ever produced in this country. The farmers produced 7 million tons more food per year for the last three years for which we have complete figures than for each of the last three years of war which was our greatest production up to that time.

Some years ago it was realized that the piling up of surpluses resulted in reduced prices and often in reduced earnings to farmers. This was particularly true if the quality was not high. Grading systems were established in co-operation with the provinces to maintain a high standard. Even though great care has been taken to maintain high standards in the home market, it was realized that this department should co-operate with the Department of Trade and Commerce to maintain as high standards on products shipped abroad. Legislation to improve these efforts is before the house now. This is only a part of our effort to improve our markets.

We realize that for all our products excepting wheat the home market is our best market. Immigration and an increasing birth rate have increased our population. Family allowances, old age pensions and increased employment and wages have increased purchasing power. Both have improved our home markets. Price support put on by this government has stabilized and maintained returns to farmers. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture made a submission to the government regarding these matters on March 3, 1955.

It is suggested in the submission that the world has changed from being a place of scarcity of food to being a place of surpluses, most of which are held in North America.

The farmers of Canada, therefore, have very wisely managed, with the help of the December conference, to have practically all of their surpluses in the form of hard spring high protein content wheat.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture statement points out that prices of farm products have fallen further in North America than in other countries of the world. This is quite true, but prices in general after the drop are higher in North America than in other countries of the world, all of which indicates that since the war farmers in North America have had the highest prices in the world.

After making these introductory comments, the brief calls attention to two matters which are of outstanding interest to the farmers. The first is the condition of the dairy industry and the second, support prices.

The brief states that the introduction of butter substitutes, the importation of butter into Canada, the importation of cheese from New Zealand, the shrinking of world export markets for dairy foods, and other influences, have resulted in dairy producers across Canada suffering substantial economic loss.

I am inclined to agree that the importation of butter and cheese into Canada would tend to lower the returns to the producer and the net farm income is lower in the last 3 years than in 1951, but I would point out it is higher than any year from 1947 back. The shrinkage of foreign markets, however, came about partly because there has been a higher price level here than elsewhere. To have been compelled to sell in foreign markets could, therefore, have resulted in lower income. Nevertheless, the dairy industry does require support during these unsettled times.

Four recommendations are made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. The first is that there be no further importations of cheddar cheese into Canada. We have already told New Zealand, as has already been stated in this house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that there is little if any room for outside cheddar cheese in Canada. We think, however, that the highest price which can be obtained anywhere for Canadian cheddar cheese can be obtained on the Canadian market if production remains at the level of the past three years. Experience shows that all the cheese which is presently being made in Canada could be sold in Canada at Canadian prices.

The second proposal by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is that the present butter support price of 58 cents per pound be continued. That has been done. The plan followed by the prices board for the past six years of stabilizing the price on a basis of 58 cents to the producer relieves others of any risk. It makes possible a reasonable return to those who have the facilities with which to produce, and relieves the trade of any risks if they do not wish to carry butter themselves, from the summer to winter, and stabilizes the price to the consumer in winter.

The 58-cent support price on butter is the basis of the means by which the government undertakes to stabilize the dairy industry. The guarantee of the initial payment on cheese and the purchase of processed milk products on two occasions have helped. It is, therefore, somewhat disconcerting when critics greet the continuation of the support with the inference that the taxpayer is paying for this help to the farmer. It has cost the taxpayer as such less than one-fifth of a cent per pound over the past six years to stabilize the price and practically all of that was because we cut the support down to 53 cents one year out of six. The 58 cents is paid by the consumer and he in turn has his wholesale and retail price stabilized throughout the winter.

The third proposal made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is that small surpluses be exported. We have made one small sale of butter and are investigating the possibilities of others.

The fourth proposal by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is increased protection through increased tariffs. We have not increased the tariff on imports of dairy products.

Butter is only one of the farm products upon which there is support. The federation says there should be continuous support on wheat, oats, barley, corn, hogs, eggs, cheese, butter and concentrated milk products. There is support on all but corn and concentrated milk products, and even on concentrated milk there has been assistance, in that we have on two occasions purchased concentrated milk products in order to remove surpluses from the market for the time being.

The grain supports are put on by the wheat board and freight assistance on feed grain by the Department of Agriculture. The cheese guarantee is put on under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act. The egg, hog and butter supports are provided under the terms of the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

The federation specialized on price support in their discussions at Edmonton last winter and in the submission on March 3. We thank them for their expressions of appreciation to us for what has been accomplished to date and have followed carefully their efforts to simplify the plan of price support by a formula. I have some doubt as to whether an algebraic formula is simple to the average farmer. I believe the simple words contained in our act:

> In prescribing prices . . . the board . . . shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations, —which are accepted by the federation as expressing, as they say, "exactly the objective of organized agriculture in Canada today", are more easily understood than an algebraic formula.

The algebraic formula which was presented to us is based on the years 1925-29. Ours is based on the years 1943-45, and the general opinion of experts is that our years are more favourable to the farmer. But I am pleased to note that their formula proves our board to have arrived at about the same support price as the proposed formula would have produced, except that one would not be able to prove at which point between 65 per cent and 85 per cent of parity one should stop. The federation disagrees with the hon. member for Assiniboia when he advocates 100 per cent of parity. They say there should not be an incentive price. We agree. They ask that the support price be between 65 per cent and 85 per cent of parity.

No matter what formula one follows, living as we do alongside a great populous country whose products could flood our country if our prices were higher than theirs, one's last act must be to check their prices and bring ours into proper relationship with theirs.

The formula would produce 23·7 cents as half way between 65 and 85 per cent of parity for hogs. Our support is 23 cents. So we are only a decimal of one cent out from what their algebraic formula would produce.

The formula would produce 59·7 cents as 85 per cent of parity for butter. That is what they would set as the top level. There is a 12-cent duty on butter. Our support price is 58 cents. The U.S.A. support is lower and American butter does not come in because of the duty.

The formula would produce 25 cents as 70 per cent of parity for cheese. Our guarantee has been 24 cents and our support plus the Ontario government's support works out at 80 per cent of parity.

The plan we follow on eggs does not lend itself to the same check but the average price received for eggs since the plan was established five years ago is within the 65 to 85 per cent of parity range.

It is not suggested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that we should cover beef or cattle with a support price but the table shows 85 per cent of parity to be $19.60 a hundred for good steers at Toronto. That is the price we are getting and seems to support our practice of allowing the United States market to provide the support for cattle. That is the reason, of course, that the federation does not ask for a support price on cattle.

We are more than pleased to find, now that the federation has worked out a formula, it verifies the supports we have as being reasonable and meeting as nearly as can be the wishes of the organized farmer.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture represents farm organizations in all the provinces of Canada. I am quoting from them rather than from the farmers' union, because the farmers' union has not yet established itself right across Canada. Their organization is strong in the three prairie provinces and is attempting to work its way into other provinces, but the federation is organized right across Canada. Their annual convention and submission to the government is most helpful in keeping us in touch with the point of view of the farmer. Even when we are not able to put into effect all the suggestions they make, a discussion brings out ideas which are certain to find their way into administrative activities.

No sound conclusion can be reached by comparing anything related to production or returns from farming, by comparing one year with the one before it or the one immediately after it. Take last year, for example, and compare the wheat production or the final returns with the year before, and the only sound conclusion you can arrive at is that there was a wheat crop failure on account of rust over a considerable area. But if one takes the average over three or four years and compares it with the average over any other three or four years, one can conclude whether prices, income or production are constantly on the upgrade.

I have before me a table which shows that, taking the average price on farm products for the four years before we came into office as the beginning, there has been an increase every four years since, until now the price on all cereals is from 2½ to 3 times as high from 1951 to 1954 as in 1931 to 1934. The price on hogs is over three times as high, and the price on cattle over four times as high. The price on butter is 2½ times as high, the price on cheese three times as high and the price on eggs almost twice as high.

An hon. Member: May I ask the minister how long he is going to be? It is after ten o'clock.

Mr. Gardiner: I have about two more pages.

An hon. Member: Finish it.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister going to put that table on the record?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall put the whole thing on the record. I can put the table on.

Mr. Coldwell: It might be interesting to have the table on the record.

Mr. Gardiner: I shall put it on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister unanimous consent to have the table put on the record?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[1] Prices are Winnipeg cash closing prices basis in store Fort William. Prices are on a crop year basis; for example, 1931 price applies to the crop year 1931-32, etc.

[2] Average price for the period Aug. 1–Dec. 31, 1954.

Even if the dollar were only worth half as much, the returns would be greatly increased.

It is not remarkable that prices went up during the war, but it is remarkable that they have gone up a great deal more since the war than either before or during the war. Cereals have been 75 per cent higher; hogs, steers and butter have brought almost twice as much; and cheese and eggs 50 per cent more during the past four years than during the last four years of the war. This is remarkable as it is eight years since the end of the war. I doubt if there ever was an eight-year period after any previous war when prices for farm products continued higher than during the war. It is partly due to the fact that we have been spending ten times as much promoting production and marketing in agriculture for many years as was ever spent for that purpose before this government came into office.

But our critics say the cash returns are up but what about the net income. If you average the last four years of net income with any other similar length of period, the results are higher net income in the last four years. The last four years for which I have the net farm income are 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954. The average net return per year in that period is $1,726 million. The average net return per year for the previous four years is $1,484 million, which is higher than any previous four years. Of course, it is down for 1954 because of our wheat crop failure and filled elevators, but even the net income for 1954 averaged with the preceding three years is higher than the average of any preceding four-year period. What has kept it that way?

We passed the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act in 1939. It makes it possible for any group of farmers to organize a pool to sell their product. The federal government guarantees them at the bank so that they can secure sufficient credit to be able to make an advance payment, sell the product, and make a final payment. One hundred and twenty co-operatives have been set up under this legislation which assists in stabilizing returns and returning the highest possible prices to the farmer. The last to be so organized is the cheese board in Ontario.

We put through legislation in 1943 which set up the wheat board in its present form. The wheat board has marketed our wheat in a very satisfactory manner since, with the result that for the first time in our experience surpluses have not driven the price down to the extent that profits could not be made.

We put through the Agricultural Prices Support Act in 1944 and it has operated since 1946. The board set up under it sets up agencies which offer to take delivery of surpluses at floor prices and put them back on the market in times of shortage. The board has a revolving fund of $200 million with which to operate which is kept at that level by amounts from the treasury. They have used $300 million over the nine years, and, with the exception of $70 million spent fighting foot-and-mouth disease, there has been very little which has not been returned to the fund.

Mr. Nicholson: Has the minister the exact amount which has not been returned?

Mr. Gardiner: The exact amount is the difference between that amount and the $70 million taken off and about another $12 million on top of that $70 million. That is what has not been returned.

Activities under these acts for the past ten years have maintained and stabilized prices on wheat, livestock, potatoes, apples, beans, honey, dry skimmed milk, cheddar cheese, creamery butter and shell eggs at higher levels than ever before. It is the fact that these prices being kept in reasonable relationship to the prices of what farmers buy has resulted in the average net income of farmers being higher in the last four years than in any previous four-year period.

Mr. Chairman, it being ten o'clock—

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. White (Middlesex East): May I move the adjournment of the debate?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall take third reading of Bill No. 352 with respect to meat and meat products; second reading of Bill No. 411 with respect to national standards for agricultural products; second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; and second reading of Bill No. 410, to amend the Customs Act. On conclusion of that business we shall move to go into supply. If we achieve that end we shall continue with Department of Agriculture estimates for the rest of the day.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would point out that during the current session a committee has been discussing the revision of the rules. It is well known to everyone that in discussing this matter the committee has recognized a long-established practice that the motion to go into supply shall be the first order called on a designated day; and the proposed rules contemplate fixed days for a certain number of motions for going into supply. This is merely expressing a long-established tradition with regard to a practice of long standing, that the motion to go into supply at this stage of the proceedings affords the opportunity for certain stated motions.

One of the things that, it seems to me, should be recognized in this house is the desirability of dates being fixed so that members may make their own arrangements accordingly. Ministers and members find it necessary to be out of the house on various occasions and it should be possible for them to make those arrangements with recognition of important matters coming before the house. One of those important matters is a motion going into supply. I submit that it is simply a breach of a long-established practice to adopt a course like this. It is a practice which means that the motion going into supply is left hanging in suspense. No one knows when it will come up. I repeat the term I used earlier, namely that to adopt this practice is juggling with the traditions of this house and that at a time when an effort is being made to introduce rules which will be satisfactory to everyone.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, those of us who are serving on the rules committee are, of course, obliged not to discuss the matter until a report is made to the house. I take it that that obligation does not devolve upon any hon. members who are not members of the committee.

Mr. Drew: You told the press what was going on.

Mr. Harris: Under these circumstances I would not comment on what has been said except to say this. I too for a number of years have been trying to get an orderly system of dealing with the business of the house. In the course of the past two years, having had something to do with it, I have done what I could by arrangement with other parties to see if we could not have, as far as possible, an understanding as to the sequence of business so that it would meet the very point the Leader of the Opposition has made. I do not recall at any time it having been said that if the committee were to make the report that the Leader of the Opposition suggests it may be making, it is as a consequence of recognizing a tradition of the house. I do not recall that ever having been said at all in the committee or in the house. While I would be willing to meet any reasonable request, and I have done so over the past two years, I feel that for Monday at least we shall have to go on with the business I have indicated. It may well happen, if the legislation is out of the way, that the motion to go into supply will be the first order of business on Tuesday. I would hope it would be that way.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, I would point out that it is perfectly proper to discuss something that has already been fully discussed in the press and mainly on information given to the press by the minister himself.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I think it is a usual thing for the house to have an informal discussion of the business for the ensuing day, and sometimes the ensuing week, at this period of the session. So far as the Chair is concerned, I think we are bound by standing order 17(2), which reads:

> Whenever government business has precedence, government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit.

Mr. Sinclair: You are not the government and never will be.

Mr. Drew: An arrogant government can do anything.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. The Leader of the Opposition having raised a question of privilege, which I think he was entitled to raise, dealing with the proceedings of the house, he has made his point and it has been answered by the Minister of Finance as leader of the house. I have no hesitation in saying that both hon. gentlemen would be out of order if they discussed the supposed report of the committee of the house which is considering procedure.

It being fourteen minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 30, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 414, respecting Westcoast Transmission Company Limited.—Mr. Fairey.

QUESTIONS

GRAIN ELEVATORS—PERCENTAGE OF ORDERS

Mr. Castleden:

1. What was the percentage of grain shipping orders allocated to various grain elevator companies by the wheat board during crop year 1953-54?
2. On what basis were the various percentages allocated to each company?
3. When was the present percentage basis first put into operation?

Mr. Robertson:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to disclose details of the competitive position of various elevator companies in their capacity as agents of the board.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. See answer to No. 1.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CUSTOMS AND EXCISE, 1926

Mr. Nicholson:

1. Who were the members of the royal commission which investigated customs and excise during 1926 and 1927?
2. Who were engaged as counsel?
3. What was the total cost in connection with the inquiry?

Mr. McCann:

1. The Hon. Sir Francois Xavier Lemieux; the Hon. James Thomas Brown; the Hon. William Henry Wright; the Hon. Ernest Roy.

2. Hon. N. W. Rowell, K.C. and Mr. R. L. Calder, K.C., as seniors, and Messrs. R. B. Law and Gordon Lindsay, as juniors.

3. $375,716.65.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—ADDITIONAL EXPENDITURE

Mr. Macdonnell:

How much additional expenditure will the St. Lawrence seaway involve, (a) between lake Ontario and lake Erie; (b) between lake Erie and lake St. Clair; (c) between lake St. Clair and lake Huron; (d) between lake Huron and lake Superior, and who is responsible for the expenditure in each case?

Mr. Marler: Stand.

Mr. Macdonnell: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that my question could easily be answered. It seems to me a simple one. May I ask the minister if he will look into the matter himself?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that any inquiries relating to questions that are not answered as promptly as hon. members would like should be dealt with on orders of the day.

Question stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL BUILDING, LINDSAY, ONT.

Mr. Hodgson:

1. What was the contract price for the construction of the Canadian National building at Lindsay, Ontario?
2. What was the total cost?
3. What is the name of the contracting firm?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1, 2 and 3. A contract for construction of the Canadian National Railways building at Lindsay, Ontario, has been awarded to L. T. Braunton Company Limited of Lindsay, the low bidder. It is not the practice of the management to disclose details of contracts with private parties.

MINK FOOD, NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Barnett:

1. Are plans being made in the province of Newfoundland for an extended exploitation of the pot-head whale as mink food?
2. If so, have appropriate measures been taken by the federal government to ensure that conservation of this species is not being endangered?
3. Has consideration been given to the feasibility of utilizing, for mink food purposes, the five-million pounds of seal carcasses reported as being abandoned annually offshore from the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. Greater use has been made of the pot-head whale in Newfoundland in recent years. The provincial legislature has this year approved a bill to regulate the processing of pot-head and mink whales, and the sale of meat, oil and by-products.

2. The fisheries research board and the Department of Fisheries have the resource under continued observation. The present rate of killing is not regarded as being excessive but if increased use of the resource should endanger conservation, appropriate regulations will be enforced.

3. Difficulties in transportation make it impractical to utilize the seal carcasses left by the sealers. An increase in mink farming might make it economic to use the seal carcasses from offshore operations.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

D.E.W. RADAR LINE—CONTACT WITH ESKIMOS

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), because I do not know to what other minister I can direct it.

In view of the report in some United States newspapers—and I am referring particularly to the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, May 29—to the effect that one of the conditions in connection with the arrangement for the construction of the distant early warning radar line was that—and I am quoting this —"all contact with Eskimos is to be avoided except in cases of emergency", may I ask the Prime Minister if he can inform us from what department of government and under what circumstances this order, apparently without precedent, was given, and also something of the general effect of the order and the reasons for this unusual course.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the arrangements regarding contacts with the Eskimos in the building and operation of the D.E.W. line were made by officers of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, dealing with the officers of the Department of External Affairs. Every precaution has been taken so the normal life of the Eskimos shall not be disrupted but that so far as possible and whenever possible work would be given to them.

If it is more satisfactory to the Leader of the Opposition I would be prepared to take his question as notice and give a full explanation. I might say immediately, however, that I do not agree with the quotation.

Mr. Drew: With what?

Mr. Lesage: With the substance of the quote.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Speaker, while accepting the fact that the minister wishes to take this as notice and prepare a more detailed statement, may I ask if it is not so that an order has in fact been made which has the effect of declaring that there shall be no fraternization between Eskimos—who after all are citizens with the right to vote—and others, which has the effect of denying to American G.I.'s the rights that would be accorded to anyone else visiting those areas?

Mr. Lesage: We believe, and I think with justification, that according to our past experience it would be a very bad thing if those who are now working on the D.E.W. line were allowed to visit Eskimo villages frequently. The experience of the past, particularly so far as the health of the Eskimos is concerned, has been very bad indeed when people have been allowed to visit the Eskimo settlements. I am speaking about health at the moment, but there are other problems, too.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I share with the minister the desire that the life of the Eskimos shall be protected within the natural limitations of the rights of Canadian citizens. But in preparing the statement I would ask the minister to keep in mind that a good deal of publicity has been given to this in the United States. In preparing his reply I hope that it may be one which will explain what does appear to many writers in the United States to be a rather unusual restriction upon the ordinary friendly contacts of members of the United States forces who are in Canada.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ADDITIONAL EXPENDITURES AT VARIOUS POINTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I now make to the Minister of Transport the request which I made improperly a few moments ago. In doing so may I be allowed to refresh his memory by reading the question, which is as follows:

How much additional expenditure will the St. Lawrence seaway involve, (a) between lake Ontario and lake Erie; (b) between lake Erie and lake St. Clair; (c) between lake St. Clair and lake Huron; (d) between lake Huron and lake Superior, and who is responsible for the expenditure in each case?

Unless the minister has to go out and make new agreements involving these expenditures, surely they must be available; surely they could have been given before now if he was, shall I say, properly keen on complying with my request.

Meat Inspection

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): All I will say is that it is much easier to put the question than it is to answer it. I can assure my hon. friend that I shall try to give him an answer at an early date.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF CANADA COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house when we might expect the Canada Council to come into operation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to advise the house as to when the Canada Council will come into operation. It will first of all have to be set up through parliamentary legislation, and that has not yet been provided for.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GUARANTEED ANNUAL WAGE—PASSING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I was not able to give him notice. He may wish to take it as notice. My question is, have any orders in council relating to the payment of the guaranteed annual wage been passed? If so, what is the nature of such orders in council?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO DECLARING OF EMERGENCY AND ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Did he receive a communication from the directors of the Saskatchewan wheat pool on Friday asking for an immediate decision on the question of an emergency being declared in the flooded areas of Saskatchewan, and also requesting that some emergent assistance be given to the farmers in those areas? If so, what is the present position?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to take the hon. gentleman's question as a notice. I would not want to deny that any request has been received, and if one has been received, I would not want to attempt to describe it without having looked at it carefully. I shall take the hon. gentleman's question as notice.

MEAT

INSPECTION OF PRODUCTS ENTERING INTERNATIONAL AND INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 352, respecting the inspection of meat and meat products entering into international and interprovincial trade.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make any extended remarks on this bill at this time, other than to say that the object of the minister in bringing in this legislation will not be attained. Perhaps the reason for bringing in this bill was to have legislation which would provide for the whole meat industry such regulations and conditions as would be in the interests of all concerned. Other people than consumers are involved in the quality and distribution of meat in this country. The interests of all these people should be taken into consideration.

The bill says the intention is to inspect meat and meat products entering into interprovincial and international trade. The explanatory note states that where the bill conflicts with the Meat and Canned Foods Act, those sections of the Meat and Canned Foods Act will be revoked. It seems to me that here again we have legislation that is cluttered up with the provisions of another act, and therefore it will not bring satisfactory results to the meat industry. The Meat and Canned Foods Act provides for the inspection of canned meats under sanitary conditions. It appears to me that all the new legislation does is perhaps delete some sections of the Meat and Canned Foods Act and set up a force to carry out the intentions of the new act.

I would ask the minister to give us assurance that there is not going to be a duplication of personnel and services. It seems to me that under the Meat and Canned Foods Act we can have adequate inspection without bringing in this new legislation. It would appear to me that so far as a product entering into international or interprovincial trade is concerned, as long as it is covered by careful inspection from the time it leaves the farmer until it enters the processing field that should be guarantee enough.

In my opinion this new legislation will not deal with some of the problems confronting our meat industry, both from the producer and consumer standpoints. I shall confine my remarks at this time to what I have said, and will have more extended remarks to make when we are dealing with Bill No. 411, to establish national standards for agricultural products and to regulate international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL STANDARDS AND REGULATE TRADE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 411, to establish national standards for agricultural products and to regulate international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say very much about this bill at this time, but I do want to protest about another matter. Bill No. 5 was called for last Monday, after having been on the order paper since January 11. Last Monday was also the first day the agriculture committee met. This morning I received a notice in my box indicating that there would be two meetings of the agriculture committee today. Now we are told that three of the bills dealing with agricultural matters will be considered today in the house, to be followed by the agriculture estimates. There are also to be two meetings of the agriculture committee tomorrow.

I realize that the officials of the wheat board were here and it was important that they get back to their jobs, but surely the business of this house can be so arranged that the agriculture committee does not have to meet at the same time that important bills having to do with agriculture are before this House of Commons. Surely there can be better planning on the part of the house leader. I do not know whether the chairman of the agriculture committee sits down and talks these things over with the house leader, but surely there can be better arrangements.

As far as this particular bill is concerned, we are going to leave our discussion of it until the committee stage. We agree with the principle of having the five bills consolidated; we think it is a good idea, but will defer our main discussion until the committee stage.

Mr. Gardiner: In moving the second reading of this bill, and having heard—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the minister rising on a point of order or is he rising to reply to the comment or complaint of the hon. gentleman? If he speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken at all so far. My friend got up and asked some questions. I was only going to speak on the motion for second reading.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. minister says he has not spoken. In moving second reading he has spoken. All he is entitled to now is his right to reply, once the debate is terminated, unless by consent the house cares to let the minister answer the questions asked by the hon. member.

An hon. Member: In committee. Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker: In committee? Has the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand completed his speech?

Mr. Charlton: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: When the minister replies, he may deal with the points that have been raised.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is to establish national standards for agricultural products, and to regulate international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products. As I stated a moment ago when we were on third reading of Bill No. 352, I intend to make some extended remarks in connection with the bill now before us.

The problem confronting the livestock industry in Canada deserves careful scrutiny by this government. While we have before us this bill to establish national standards for agricultural products and to provide grading and other provisions, I want to say that for a long time the national livestock industry in Canada has deserved better attention from this government than it has had. For many years this group in the house has advocated that if we are to get down to the basic problem of the producer, and indeed give an assurance that our consumers will receive these products in the best condition and at the most reasonable prices, then we are going to have to do something more than has been done in the past by this government.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house a portion of the report and recommendations of the royal commission on price spreads of 1934. One of the important recommendations of that commission is contained on pages 172 and 173, as follows:

As a step toward the solution of some at least of the problems which we have outlined, we recommend the establishment of a livestock board, under the appropriate jurisdiction. The duties of the board should include, among others, the following:

(a) The prompt dissemination of information to producers and the trade generally, in respect to production, marketing, stocks, and prices, both export and domestic;

(b) Administrative jurisdiction in matters connected with all phases of livestock marketing and in connection with disputes between producers, processors, etc.;

(c) Licensing and supervision of truckers, dealers and export packers; where necessary in co-operation with provincial authorities;

(d) Adequate inspection of all marketing stages and action to correct abuses;

(e) Co-operation with producers, processors and the trade generally to ensure as far as possible a balance between production and available markets;

(f) To encourage the organization of producers of livestock for regular and orderly marketing;

(g) Improvement of quality of all livestock;

(h) The formation of a uniform policy on external marketing, with a view not only to promoting new, but also retaining and developing, existing markets;

(i) The stabilization of supplies, and the regulation of quality to each particular market;

(j) The utilization of all available means to secure fair returns to the primary producers of good stock.

In the past speeches have been made in this house by various hon. members to draw attention to the fact that, as far as the producer of livestock is concerned, he is at the mercy of the packers.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, might I ask a question? What was the date of the report?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): This was the report of 1934. Here we have a recommendation that a commission be set up to investigate the livestock trade in Canada, but the Liberal government has done nothing about it to date. I think the time is long overdue when some consideration should be given to such commission reports and that, as asked for in this report, a livestock board should be set up.

If such a board were set up with adequate producer, and government consumer representation, I think we could have in Canada a regulatory body by means of which the livestock trade in this country could be handled in the interests of all the people concerned, namely the producers, the people in the processing trades, and also the consumers. The livestock producers do not want anything unfair. They have never asked for high prices out of line with their cost of production. When we have a situation where the livestock producer is at the mercy of the packers I think it is time for the spokesmen for those people in the house to bring these matters to the attention of the government.

I might say that under the present marketing set-up for our livestock products, the farmer is obliged to send his cattle to the livestock yards at Winnipeg or Toronto, and there he is faced with at least 12 different grades in respect of cattle. We have choice, good, medium, common, cutters and many other grades—12 of them in all—in which his cattle can be placed. With respect to his hogs there is a similar number of grades including, bacon, butcher, light, heavy, light sows and heavy sows.

The producer would feel content, or at least better satisfied, if these grades were carried through to the consumer, but that is not the case. The packers can get together and set the price practically any Monday morning or any day of the week, and also set the quality. There are no government grades. The buyers come in there and compete for the cattle. Perhaps the quotations on one specific day may give a certain price for choice animals, another price for good, another price for medium, and so on down the line. When those cattle come in, if there happens to be a heavy run on the market the buyers can get together and by co-operation force down the price the farmer gets for his livestock. Choice, good and medium cattle may all be listed that day at a certain price, but through the downgrading of those cattle the farmer takes a beating.

The same thing is true with respect to hogs. It is true that hogs are rail graded and government inspected, but there again there is no assurance that while the farmer gets a return on a heavy type hog, the consumer does not pay the same as for a bacon hog. Hence the situation is completely unsatisfactory.

The bill proposed by the minister to set up these national standards for agricultural products does not, in my opinion, solve the problem which confronts us. I am suggesting to the minister and to the government that they seriously consider setting up a national livestock marketing board with producer, consumer and government representation whereby this whole thing may be investigated. We should have competent people on the board in order that for the first time we may have a marketing and processing system in Canada which will be fair to livestock producers.

I might just quote from an article in order to show that at the present time there is dishonest grading with respect to livestock in this country. This is an excerpt from the Globe and Mail of June 8, 1950. It is fairly old, but the same conditions prevail today. The article reads as follows:

> Quelph, June 7—Eastern Canadian housewives are ignorant of beef quality and as a result they are handed whatever their vendor likes to give them, Professor E. Stillwell of Ontario Agricultural College told a gathering of 500 Shorthorn breeders and their families at a demonstration of beef grading at the college here today.
>
> Producing 12 cuts of beef, he told his audience that they were purchased in various parts of Ontario as choice prime cuts, at prices ranging from 65 to 79 cents per pound, in the past few days. Not one cut could be called choice prime beef.
> In no instance was any of the team of purchasers, sent out under the auspices of Professor Knox, head of O.A.C. animal husbandry department, and the Ontario Shorthorn association directors, able to purchase red or blue ribbon beef, first and second grades respectively. All the beef purchased was of commercial quality, some of it very poor.

Hence you can see that under the present system of grading and assembling meat, in the retail end of it our consumers too are getting fleeced, one might say. I therefore strongly urge that this house and the government consider setting up a national livestock marketing board on which we shall have, as I say, producer representation, consumer representation and also government officials, who will co-operate in order to give all the people concerned the best kind of marketing set-up with respect to livestock products.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make just a few brief comments on this bill, which to me appears a sensible piece of legislation, as far as it goes, in consolidating, as it does, five other acts. It provides for what appears to be strict enforcement of national standards for farm products. I am quite sure that farmers welcome national standards. I am quite sure the great majority of farmers want to produce commodities of high standard and up to certain grades. However, I think the farmer also is entitled to see that national standards are applied to many of the things he purchases.

Before dealing with that matter for a moment or two, I want to mention the fact that we have fairly strict grading laws with regard to vegetables, meats, dairy products, poultry and fruit. The hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) has mentioned something in connection with meat. I would not be as competent as some of the members of this group or other members of the house to judge a prime cut. However, I know something about fruit because I have packed a good many thousand boxes of apples in my lifetime. Over a period of two or three years I packed apples for 10 cents a box, net return, and nearly starved to death.

I want to bring to the attention of the minister the argument that while it is quite all right to enforce national standards on the farmer, under which he must produce apples to a certain standard and grade, poultry to a standard and grade and eggs to a standard and grade, in fairness that requirement must be carried through and the government must see that wholesalers and retailers market these products according to the grades marked by the producer. I have visited stores in Calgary, in Winnipeg and in Ottawa, and repeatedly I have found apples in retailers' windows raised above the grade which the farmer received when he sold them to the packing house in question or to the farm organization. I think there must be stricter enforcement of the act, not only so far as the farmer is concerned—for on the whole he produces the material according to the standard required—but in the distribution of the farmer's product grades are often changed.

I mentioned that I think the farmers are entitled to more protection with respect to commodities they buy from other producers and manufacturers. What protection has the farmer in this country when he is buying fencing wire? I think it is only as the result of some excellent work on the part of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that there has been some improvement in the tensile strength of fencing wire in recent years. What protection has he when he buys roofing? You can get five or six different prices for certain types of roofing, and I have heard from people in the national research council, who understand these things, that you are paying different prices for much the same thing. What about paints? Paints are one of the biggest rackets we have in this country, and the price range is very great. You are not certain when you pay the higher price that you are getting a quality that much better.

I believe these are things that need investigation. The government should apply the same standards, the same enforcement, to the things the farmers buy. I particularly want to mention mill feeds. I was at a farmers' meeting just prior to coming to Ottawa and was shown some samples from a sack of mill feed, crushed oats as a matter of fact, from some milling company on the prairie. It was a positive disgrace. The sample was full of wild oats and other weeds, and was far below standard. I believe there is a great deal more that has to be done in this regard, and action should not be taken merely with respect to those commodities the farmers produce.

As I said before, I believe the bill is necessary, and it tidies up the legislation. When the minister replies I should like him to inform the house whether the farmers' organizations were consulted about this legislation. Have they been asked for any suggestions or recommendations? This is a very important piece of legislation so far as the marketing of farm products is concerned. I feel the major agricultural organizations should have been informed of the government's intention and asked for any suggestions or advice they wished to offer.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I again say that the legislation seems to be sound and necessary, but I do hope the government enforces similar national standards on the products the farmers and other consumers have to buy.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Probably I should make a few remarks in reply to what has been said by different hon. members. There was some discussion on third reading of the meat products bill which really relates to this bill, and probably I should make a remark or two with regard to that.

The meat inspection bill, which had its third reading a little while ago, does not provide for the employment of any immediate additional staff to those we have now and no change from the present act as to the future. The staff provided for in present legislation will take care of our activities in connection with both these measures. Then there was a suggestion the other evening which left the impression that the meat inspection act might have been dealing with some of the matters with which the bill now before us deals. The meat inspection act does not cover grading. The meat inspection act deals only with health inspection and sanitation, and therefore does not provide for grading in the sense this bill does. I just wanted to make those remarks as they may have some bearing on the discussion that may take place in committee.

The purpose of the new bill is to provide acceptable uniform authorities for establishing grade standards, and to perform the grading and inspection of all agricultural products previously covered by five separate acts administered by the Department of Agriculture. The new general bill is patterned after the Canada Dairy Products Act, enacted in 1951, which has proven satisfactory for dairy products. It provides authority for establishing substantially the same regulations as now exist, but is considered to have the purposes and intentions more clearly defined and restricted to the established and accepted field of federal jurisdiction specifically related to the grading and quality standards of our agricultural products.

In dealing with the other bill the other day I believe I said some question has been raised in the courts as to whether some of these measures are intra vires. That was one of the reasons it was thought wise to introduce this bill now. The bill will provide, as in the past, for the actual grading of certain products by federal graders, and for others the application of established grades and standards by the trade with subsequent checking of the applied standards by federal inspectors, and detention until they are made to comply with the official standards. The provisions of the bill will apply where the products enter into interprovincial or export trade, or where as the result of legislation on the part of the provinces or action on the part of the individual the product bears a grade name established pursuant to this act.

The grading of a product moving intraprovincially will, therefore, depend upon action by the provinces. In addition to defining standards and carrying out grade inspection operations the bill provides, as in the past, for a regulatory service with respect to such matters of packaging, marking and shipping products and the operation of grading establishments dealing in products exported from or imported into a province.

These remarks are related to what was said a few moments ago by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough), who was suggesting that certain things might be done which were proposed back in 1934. As a matter of fact the marketing act which was drafted as a result of the committee's report in 1934 went to the courts and was declared ultra vires. No effort has been made since then to pass similar legislation.

The reason for that is that the provinces deal with these matters. The questions which were raised a few moments ago concerning the price of meat in Toronto and the price of meat in Winnipeg, as between retailer and consumer, are matters which should be dealt with provincially. If we attempted to put in this particular legislation anything relating to that matter it would be declared ultra vires, just as the other legislation was. In other words only a small percentage of the meat products produced in a province are consumed outside of that province. Most of the meat products that are produced in a province are consumed in that province.

This is largely true of the older and more industrialized provinces, such as Ontario and Quebec. They consume more of practically all these farm products than they produce, but that does not mean there is no trade as between the provinces in these products.

Perhaps the greatest exporters of surplus meat products are the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. They do produce large quantities of meat, some of which goes to Ontario and some to British Columbia. Much of the Alberta meat goes to British Columbia, and some of it goes down along the western coast. On the other hand, much of what is produced in Saskatchewan finds its way to Winnipeg, and some of it finds its way to Toronto and Montreal. In so far as these products are concerned, of course, we have something to say about them. In so far as practically all the meat products produced in Ontario are concerned, which are not shipped to the United States or not shipped to Montreal to be consumed there, they are consumed within Ontario.

I should like to say a word in reply to the hon. member for Moose Mountain by stating that there are only two provinces in Canada that have paid very much attention to the matter of marketing boards. One of them is British Columbia, where they have a very complete system of control over the marketing of their fruit and other products. Then in Ontario there are 18 different boards handling 18 different farm products, one of which is hogs. But so far as I know we have no boards in the province from which my hon. friend comes, and they keep suggesting that we ought to have a federal department do their work.

Well, the experience has been that it is difficult to have a federal board to do the work which it has been suggested should be done. Any attempts that have been made to do it have resulted in difficulty for those passing the legislation. But amendments are being asked by Ontario, which has set up many of these boards, and legislation is being asked by some who are active in British Columbia. Also legislation is being asked by some of the other provinces which we propose to bring down, and which will amend the legislation which does have some control over the relationship between the selling of the product within the province and the selling of it under similar terms outside the province.

Just to answer the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), it is our intention to bring some legislation before the house along the lines of the representations which have been made. Representations have been made by farm organizations and also by representatives of the governments I have mentioned. They have come here asking for legislation, and legislation is under consideration to make it possible for the legislation they have in the province to be more effective than it could be without the amendments. I have suggested on a number of occasions to those in my own province and to those in other provinces similarly situated, that the method being followed in Ontario and British Columbia, and to a limited extent in some of the other provinces, could be used more extensively in the provinces where very little use has been made of it.

That is the question which has been investigated by a committee set up in Saskatchewan and, in a little different form, by a committee set up recently in Manitoba to examine into the possibility of operating boards controlled by the farmers themselves in order to market these products. But when we come to deal with a product produced in Ontario and placed on the market in Toronto, where it is sold to someone living in that city; when we are asked to do something about it here—well, I am afraid the experience and judgment of the past have indicated that this can be done only by the people of Ontario through their own legislature. They have very effective ways of dealing with it and, I must say, in some directions have done more in an effort to grapple with the problem than has been done in some other provinces. This bill is intended only to deal with exports either from one province to another or from this country to some other country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Charlton: I note that in the interpretation clause "agricultural product" is interpreted as—

—livestock (including fur-bearing animals raised in captivity)—

My understanding is that this deals with the grading of the agricultural products discussed on another bill which, as the minister said, had to do with health. This refers to the grading of all meat and other products, does it? I understand it refers to all agricultural products?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, all agricultural products.

Mr. Charlton: And live fur-bearing animals; is that true?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, live fur-bearing animals.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, on clause 1, the Minister of Agriculture said most of the livestock products produced in the various provinces were consumed in those provinces. Would he put on record the livestock products produced and consumed in each province? I cannot agree with what he has said so far as its application to Saskatchewan is concerned. Over the years we export great numbers of our hogs and beef cattle. I suggest the minister should assist the committee by putting on record the amount of livestock that has been exported from and not consumed in each province in the last five or ten years.

I might say that in Saskatchewan our position is somewhat different from that of the other provinces. It is true that most of the livestock products produced in Ontario are consumed here. Saskatchewan, however, is not in that position, because some of our agricultural products go into interprovincial and export trade. The amount is not so great now because we are not producing so many hogs. However, if my memory is correct in 1944 we produced 6 million pounds for the export trade.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I shall have all these figures when my estimates are before the committee. Naturally I do not have them with me at the moment, but I can say that before coming into the house this afternoon I was looking at some of the figures, in preparation for my estimates, and I believe the total for right across Canada indicates that about 10 per cent of our production enters into export trade, while the remainder is consumed in Canada.

However, that does not answer the question the hon. member has raised as to what is consumed in the province of Saskatchewan and what is exported to some other province or country.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): It does not answer my question, or answer—

Mr. Gardiner: I was not attempting to answer the question. I had asked permission to answer it when my estimates for the livestock branch are before the committee.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): It is possible that in Saskatchewan we could look after the marketing of our livestock products if they were all utilized within the province. However, when we enter into interprovincial and international trade it is a different problem. I do not believe the approach to the problem of the assembling and marketing of our livestock products can be accomplished purely under provincial law. I think the federal government has to take some responsibility, just as it is taking responsibility in the matter of food grading standards. The livestock producers are entitled to a national set-up of this kind, as was advocated by the royal commission in 1934. This would be a national livestock board, which would facilitate the assembling and grading and control, the whole process of marketing of our livestock products.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister say a word at this stage regarding arrangements now in existence between the dominion and the province where the province does have grading regulations? I am thinking, for instance, of British Columbia. What arrangements are in existence there to ensure that when a livestock product is brought into the province —and it must be realized that the provincial government has no control over its being brought in; they cannot keep it out—whatever grades or standards are laid down shall comply with the provincial grades or standards?

The other question relating to that matter is this. My understanding is that a conference was recently held in Vancouver between provincial and dominion livestock grading and inspection authorities. I have not been able to find any report of the outcome of that conference. Will the minister confirm that I am correct in understanding that there was such a conference, and tell us what was the result?

Mr. Gardiner: I presume what my hon. friend has reference to in the way of a conference is the discussion that took place there earlier in the year with regard to some misunderstandings that existed in connection with the marketing of some products; but I do not know that there was any definite report made in regard to it other than the report that went out in the press at the time the meeting was held.

With respect to the matter of grading standards established under this act, the grading of course is done in the plants and elsewhere at the time the product is being prepared for shipment. If it goes into export, of course, the grading must be done by inspectors whom we have appointed. It will not be accepted elsewhere unless it has a certificate indicating that it is of a certain grade and quality. This all carries through, as I understand it, until it gets to its destination. Saskatchewan, for instance, sells hogs of a certain grade, or they sell other products on grade, believing that the grade is established under this inspection. When they arrive at their destination they are paid for on that basis, but I am not sure that we have very much control after that. The product then becomes the property of someone who lives in that province, and it is sold from there on under the laws of the province, as I understand it.

Mr. Fulton: That was the basis upon which I asked my first question. When it gets into that province to be sold there, does it conform to the provincial grading standards, if any are laid down? There are such standards in my own province and, as the minister pointed out, in Ontario also. It was with that background, and with the information I had that there was a discussion between the dominion and provincial authorities in British Columbia within the last six months or year, that I asked what information and what results have followed from that conference, because it is obviously important that meat or livestock products brought into British Columbia from outside be required to comply with the dominion grading regulations before they are exported from Saskatchewan.

It is important that these grading standards should conform closely to the grading standards and regulations of the province of British Columbia where the product is to be sold; otherwise the whole situation would become extremely confused. If a dealer in British Columbia bought a certain federal grade in Saskatchewan, and when the product arrived that grade became meaningless because the grading regulations of the province of British Columbia required some other standards, then it is obvious that there would necessarily be a conflict. I understand that the conference or meeting to which I referred was called to discuss ways and means of ensuring that the two sets of grading regulations and the enforcement of those regulations would always be in conformity. I am wondering whether the minister can tell us if there was any positive step taken as a result of that conference.

Mr. Gardiner: That of course has been a matter of discussion for many years. It was under discussion long before I came here, and it has been under discussion now for 20 years since I have been here. The solution was found before I had anything to do with it, or before many of the members of this house had much to do with it. The statements I was making a few moments ago were based upon my knowledge of the legal position, and my knowledge may not be as good as that of the hon. member who has just spoken in regard to that side of it. But in order to get the results which he and others desire, the arrangement was made a long time ago that if there is to be a standard at all across Canada, it must be a standard set up by the federal government.

For many years there was some dispute as to whether the standards set up for dairy products were to apply everywhere. My memory of it is that the last province which came under the arrangement was Manitoba. They were consuming practically all of their butter in Winnipeg and other places of that kind, and they did not wish to conform to the federal standard. Eventually they did so, and when that happened they did just what others had been doing in a broad sense all across Canada for some years. They accepted the standards which had been set up here as the proper standards.

We appointed inspectors to establish those grades for butter, as we had for all other products that were going to be traded interprovincially or internationally. Then the provincial inspectors inspected the product that was to be sold within the province itself. But to just leave it that way you would have to know all the time what product was to go into interprovincial trade and what was to be sold within the province. In order to overcome the impossibility of knowing that, when an inspector is inspecting a product that eventually goes out of the province, he is a federal inspector. Whenever one of our inspectors inspects a product which is sold within the province, he is acting as a provincial inspector.

That arrangement, which was entered into years ago, has been carried out consistently over the years, in order to make it legally possible to have all the products so inspected that are to be sold either internally or shipped out and sold outside. The legal position, though, is that which I stated a few moments ago.

Mr. Fulton: That was the arrangement with respect to dairy products. Does it also apply to meat products?

Mr. Gardiner: It applies to everything.

Mr. Fulton: In effect, it is the standard or grade laid down in Ottawa by the regulations under this act, and it becomes the grade for the whole of Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: They are established within a province so long as the province agrees to it. The grade is established and is the same all across Canada. I think practically all the provinces have agreed to it with most products. There may be individual cases where they have not.

Mr. Fulton: We passed a statute here called the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, for instance, under which the dominion government delegated to any province setting up a competent authority, and wishing to exercise what would otherwise be a federal jurisdiction, control over the marketing of the agricultural products concerned. What I want to know is whether any discussions have been held with the provinces with respect to a similar situation regarding the control of grading, so that eventually we might have a really legally enforceable and ironclad system of grading across the whole country on the same basis as meat inspection.

Mr. Gardiner: Did the hon. member say grain?

Mr. Fulton: Grading.

Mr. Gardiner: Grading of grain?

Mr. Fulton: No, grading of meats or other agricultural products.

Mr. Gardiner: There is of course the system I have just mentioned. What we have are nationally established standards for all these products. The intention of this bill is that where some things were being attempted which were not within our authority, those things are removed from the bill. Where there is any necessity of doing something further in order to make certain that there are standards right across the country, that is done. We are always keeping in mind the fact that we have certain authority, while the provinces have other authority.

Mr. Castleden: I have another question along the same lines. I was just going to remark to the minister that one of the things the producer finds it difficult to understand is that when he sells a C grade hog he gets a price considerably below that for an A grade hog, but when he goes into a butcher shop to buy pork he finds that there is no grading. Will this legislation make it possible for the consumer to go into a butcher shop—or into a grocery shop when he is buying cheese or fruit—and know the grade of the animal from which a particular cut is obtained?

When an animal is being processed in the slaughterhouse the government grader marks it A, B or C, as the case may be. Will this legislation make it possible for the consumer to identify the grade on which the farmer has been paid for the animal, or will there be no change in the present set-up? At the present time it is impossible for a consumer to know this except perhaps in the case of high-grade beef, where you will find it marked red brand or blue brand.

Mr. Gardiner: While my hon. friend was speaking I was watching the expression on the face of probably the one man in the house who knows the answers. He sits across the floor, and has spoken already on two occasions when these matters were up for discussion. He has indicated that in most butcher shops or most places where meat is sold what my friend is suggesting is done in a very big way is not so done. As a matter of fact most housewives know just about as much about meat as the individual who is selling it.

Mr. Castleden: Oh, no.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend says, "Oh, no". Apparently his wife is not like mine. These women can go into these shops and pick up a cut of meat, and they know whether it is top quality, even if the grade is not marked on it. I remember going through the Smithfield market over in Britain with a gentleman who was showing me just how good the meat was. He would take a poke at it with his thumb as he went by and say, "Look at that." He could tell by the action of the meat whether it was good.

I am simply suggesting that people who are going in and buying meat every day are not necessarily being taken in. I do not think that happens in so many cases as is suggested. I believe one can usually find out what he is buying. I sometimes buy meat, and when I tell the butcher what I want, if he has not the particular grade I ask for he will tell me. You can get the best meat if you know what it is when you are buying it.

As a matter of fact I was up in London just two weeks ago and bought a cut of meat marked with the grade. There was some question in my mind as to whether it was as good as it looked, but when we took it home and cooked it, it was just as good as the butcher said. I do not know of anything either the federal or provincial government could do that would safeguard everyone who walks into a butcher shop and buys just what he sees. In any event, much of that would require to be dealt with provincially.

Mr. Castleden: I am sure we have all enjoyed the minister's trips to butcher shops around the world, but I still submit that it is not possible to tell when you are purchasing pork or some kinds of beef whether you are getting A or B grade.

Mr. Gardiner: It is possible for me to tell whether it is good; speak for yourself.

Mr. Castleden: I am speaking for a large number of people who find when they go into a butcher shop to buy meat that they cannot tell whether it is A or B grade. There is nothing to indicate that. Of course the top grades of beef are marked red brand and blue brand, but I maintain that there is a wide discrepancy between the grades as they are established and the meat that is finally sold to the consumer. I submit that is the sort of thing that could be prevented by effective legislation.

We all know that years ago certain countries marked their beef and pork grades, their hams and so on, and I am asking the minister whether under this legislation it will be possible to government grade products of this type so the consumer will know what he is buying. These grades would be known across the country as indicating top grades of meat. They would be known to the producer and to the consumer. The producer would know that when he got into a particular grade he would be paid for it, and the consumer would know what he was buying when he bought a particular grade.

Mr. Gardiner: That is done now.

Mr. Castleden: Is it done with all meats?

Mr. Gardiner: You have red brand and blue brand beef, and the top grades of pork are marked. You can find the marks if you look for them.

Mr. Castleden: How about the other grades right down the line? I support this legislation because I believe it is a good thing. I believe it will help the provincial legislation by setting up standards known right across Canada. But what we are anxious about is that these grades be understood, that the consumer should know what he is getting, and that the price he is paying is reflected in the price paid to the farmer.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the discussion but I do have a great deal of sympathy for what the hon. member for Yorkton has said. Like the minister, I also buy meat and I know the difference between the various cuts and grades. But there is one meat which I think is being palmed off on the public as something which it is not, and I refer to lamb. Lamb is not marked as lamb. I know I have gone into a butcher shop and asked for a light leg of lamb and been told that all they had was a half leg of lamb. I could tell from its colour that it was not lamb, that it was light mutton.

I think what the hon. member for Yorkton has said is quite true, that many people buying meat cannot tell the difference between one grade and another, or whether it is lamb or mutton. If lamb is passed by the inspector at the abattoir it should be stamped as being lamb, because that is one meat which is sold extensively in this country as lamb when many times it is not.

I think that is one reason many people say they do not like lamb, which in my opinion is one of the best meats. I am personally very fond of it, and I do know that people often buy what they think is lamb but when they get home it is actually mutton. As the minister knows, it is quite a different colour from lamb. The marking of lamb is the point I wished to raise.

Mr. Yuill: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything today on this bill, but there seems to be a great deal of confusion here. I believe I happen to be qualified to offer a comment or two.

With regard to hogs, there was a question in the mind of my hon. friend as to why the producer did not get the same retail value out of a C hog as out of a select hog. The loin of pork is the basic ingredient in a hog. The reason that hog is a C hog in the first place is the excessive fat. By the time I buy it, as a retail butcher, the packing plant has trimmed that loin down and taken off that excessive fat. Consequently when it gets into my shop there is no man in this house or in this city who can tell the grade that hog had been when it went into the packing plant.

An hon. Member: The minister can tell.

Mr. Gardiner: Just to explain that further; as my hon. friend said, I emphasize the point that the only reason it was graded C was the excessive fat, but the excessive fat was trimmed off.

Mr. Yuill: The quality is identical. There are many other things that enter into this question. There seems to be a general opinion that if you market a red brand you get paid for a commercial. I do not think that is true. Some of these producers must learn that if you market an inferior quality, you get a comparable grade. If they would place more emphasis on the production of high quality animals then their troubles would disappear.

I have handled a good many tons of meat, and I have seen grades in all provinces. I keep my weather eye open. The blue beef is the same in Ontario as in any other province. The same applies to the red brand. In many cases, from the point of view of eating quality, commercial is just as good as blue or red. It has not been properly finished and you do not get quite so much fat, but if you get a commercial or a blue or red, with the exception of the excess fat I doubt if you could notice any difference in the eating quality.

An hon. Member: But the farmer would get a different price.

Mr. Yuill: You get a price according to what you sell. If you sell a commercial grade you get paid accordingly. You cannot market a commercial grade and be paid a red brand price. I quarrel with the discrepancies that sometimes prevail between what the packers pay for meat and what we as dealers pay for it. There is room for argument there, but not in this case. Once beef is graded, whether it be red, blue or commercial, I'll bet my bottom dollar that grade will stand the test across the board in every province in the Dominion of Canada. Those are things we have to be fair enough to realize. For instance, if you come into my store and I try to sell you a commercial grade by telling you it is red brand; I am just deliberately lying. There is no retail merchant who does not know the difference. If they resort to skulduggery and try to flim-flam the public, one dose of that should be enough for anybody. I do not believe they do that as a general practice. I have seen in many big stores and in my own store, people who want the red brand because they enjoy the excess fat, but I have seen other people who do not want that. If I offer them red brand they complain because of the excess fat. So I have to have in my own shop two grades in order to satisfy the wishes of the customers.

I will agree that this is a common practice. I have seen it here in Ottawa, and I have seen it out in the west, so I suppose it is common across the board to find a certain amount of misrepresentation over the counter so far as the true grade of the beef is concerned. But I think that is beside the point. That is something that could be dealt with apart from grading. It does not necessarily mean that the grade has been tampered with. If the animal is bought as a commercial and cut up and sold as a red brand over the counter, it is not the fault of the initial grading. I believe the grades are honest, and I believe they are uniform.

I would ask those who can do something about it to have a look at these practices whereby commercial is offered under the guise of blue or red brand. I have seen that happen so far as pork is concerned. I have seen it happen with heavy loins that came from No. 1 sows and heavy hogs. Of course we as retailers have to pay the same price. But that is getting into a different grade again. True enough these indiscretions do occur, but you differentiate between a C and a select hog to ensure that you get a square deal over the counter. As I said, the excess fat is trimmed off and that brings it down to the same basis of quality, whether it is a C or a select hog.

As far as lamb is concerned, you have the same grades there. You have lambs and yearling lambs, as they are sometimes called, and you have mutton. If you go into a butcher shop and they try to sell you a half leg of mutton at the level of lamb, that is not the fault of the grades. The grade in the first place was honest. If somebody tries to introduce a little skulduggery over the counter, that is not the fault of the initial grading. People who are getting an unfair deal should look around for a dependable butcher. Government grading has nothing to do with it. Government grading is not the culprit at all in this case. If they get commercial beef and wrap it up and put it on the counter under the guise of red beef, it is not the fault of the original grader; it is the fault of the man who is selling it to you over the counter.

The sooner we realize what is involved there the better, instead of jumping to conclusions and feeling sorry for ourselves if we market commercial and expect to get red beef grade. The producer must realize that he must first of all get a higher standard of animal, and then see to it that he finishes it properly before he puts it on the market. Then he will have no worries.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I believe these matters under discussion are dealt with in sections 12 and 13. If we can get on and pass a few sections we will reach a point where we can talk about them. The general discussion was on second reading. We have allowed considerable leeway in discussing this section, and I think we ought to get along.

Mr. Charlton: As the discussion has gone so far, perhaps some of it should be answered. The minister says he can tell any grade of meat he buys when he goes into a store.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member for Jasper-Edson told you that by the time the fat was trimmed off they were both the same.

Mr. Charlton: I greatly regret that statement being made in the house, that a C grade hog is just as good as an A grade hog. It is not. I do not care whether the hon. member for Jasper-Edson says that is so. Because the fat is trimmed off, and it looks as good, it does not make a C grade hog into an A grade hog. The minister will certainly admit that. Certainly our grading regulations are wrong if that is so.

Mr. Gardiner: Let us discuss that point. One of the reasons you have a C hog today is that there is fat on it, and the fat is cheap. That is the main reason. There have been times since I have been here when lard was expensive and when, if you left too much fat on the cut, it made it more expensive, not less so. But at the present time fat is cheap. Lard is cheap. If you put too much fat on a cut of meat, then of course you cheapen it. Then when someone buys it and cuts some of the fat off, it is not as cheap as it was before. In spite of what my hon. friend says, some people think you cannot have good meat unless you have quite a bit of fat on it. They like it that way.

Mr. Charlton: That is perfectly true. I have seen many steers marketed that had too much fat on them to draw the top price.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: Because there is too much fat. As the hon. member for Jasper-Edson says, for commercial purposes it may be just as good in some circumstances, but that is what we are arguing. The producer is docked on a low grade, while in many cases the consumer pays the same price for that low grade as he does for the top grade. That is what we are arguing about.

Mr. Gardiner: With the fat trimmed off he will not.

Mr. Charlton: We should like to see these grades follow all the way through to the consumer so that the consumer can get the advantage in proportion to the money the producer is paid. When the minister says he can tell all the different grades of meat in the store, I would suggest that in a chain store he cannot go around poking his fingers into it like the man did in England. Quite often there is no one in a chain store to ask. You must go by appearance, because there is no one to answer your questions. You pick up a package of meat there, put it in your basket and pay for it. Is the meat all marked whether it is red or blue brand? Of course it is not.

Mr. Gardiner: It would either be marked or it would be good when I took it home, or I would not go back to the store. Not many of the chain stores are doing that kind of thing.

Mr. Charlton: That is perfectly true. But all the consumers are probably not as smart as is the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they are.

Mr. Charlton: Evidently they are not, because the minister says he can tell all the good meat from the bad. I admit quite freely that I have been fooled many times on the quality of meat. I should like to see the minister tell the difference between a ridgling pig, for instance, and one that has been treated properly.

Mr. Gardiner: I can tell when he is alive.

Mr. Charlton: I doubt that very much. You might not even be able to tell after he is killed. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned, what about the difference between lamb and mutton, or a light sow and a grade C? Could you tell the difference? No, of course not, in many cases. I should like to ask the minister this question. Are all agricultural products brought under this bill? According to the definition we find this:

(a) "agricultural product" means livestock (including fur-bearing animals raised in captivity), eggs, poultry, milk, vegetables, fruit, honey and maple syrup, and products thereof;

The Chairman: Order. That brings up the point of order which was previously raised by the Minister of Agriculture. As hon. members know, on clause 1 we usually allow a general discussion. Do I take it that clause 1 is carried and that we are now discussing the particular sections? The hon. member is now referring to clause 2.

Mr. Charlton: I asked a question on clause 2 before.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, but I could not answer it.

Mr. Yuill: I want to tell the hon. gentleman this. If he is a farmer—and I presume he is—he knows that if you market a C hog or an A hog, they are the same age and they are the same weight, generally speaking.

Mr. Charlton: They might be.

Mr. Yuill: The reason one is C and the other is A is that one has excessive fat. When that fat is trimmed off and the meat is put on the market, just let him tell me how he or anybody else can tell the difference.

Mr. Charlton: I did not say I could tell the difference.

Mr. Yuill: Nobody can tell the difference. I have put in more years in the meat business than I care to think about. I have cut tons and hundreds of tons of meat. I know what I am talking about. There are things that are wrong about our marketing practices. I know that. But there is one thing I know is true, and you know it too; or if you do not know it, you should. There are good and sufficient reasons for grades. If the animal measures up to A grade, you get A grade. If it is a C grade, in the case of hogs it is because of excessive fat, not because of age or because of size. It must come under a certain weight before it qualifies even for that. If it gets beyond that, it is a heavy. But you need have no worry in the world if you buy C grade pork loins that are trimmed in the orthodox way. I will bet my bottom dollar that you will never be able to tell the difference. I could put it in there and you could not tell the difference.

In this business Social Credit might be able to tell you a few things that would be good for you. We believe in justice and truth and in telling what is what. We do not try to misrepresent anything. There has been a good deal of skulduggery here in trying to misrepresent things, and in trying to read into matters mentioned here things that do not belong. I do not think that is our function at all. We are here to deal honestly with these things. That is what I am trying to do. I can give you, if you want to accept it, the value of my years of experience. I know the grades. If I have the privilege of operating on a carcass of beef here I could give you a bit of a lesson. If I had a hog here I could show you a few things, and give you a little sense of perspective.

An hon. Member: Maybe you had better bring one in.

Mr. Yuill: I think basically we cannot beat political drums on this thing. We are here to deal honestly with the situation. If you have a grade, it is established across the board. These other things that enter into the picture off the record have no point whatsoever with regard to condemnation of the grades as they exist today.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Bryce: I do not know whether or not I should get into this discussion. On one side of me I have a butcher with 40 years' experience. Across from me is a man who has been the Minister of Agriculture for 20 years or more, and to my right there is a veterinarian. If they do not know good beef I do not know whether a dirt farmer should get into this argument.

However, I am going to tell you one thing. Nobody talks about B grade. That is where the producer gets trimmed. I know my hon. friend will tell me there is no difference between an A grade and B-1 grade. He knows the only difference is a pound of pork and you cannot see where it is, whether it is for the producer or against the producer. That is something the minister could straighten out.

As for the man who produces a B hog according to the grades that have been set up, he can be trimmed to the extent of about $3.50 on that one pound of pork. I have explained the matter to the minister. The minister knows it himself. There is no use of arguing any more about it. He knows it is a grievance the farmer has. It is something that should be made right. It is too much to take $3.50 off a man for one pound of pork, because his pig is a pound too heavy.

When I was saying something about turkeys the other day I was ruled out of order, but the minister said the matter would be included in this bill. I shall talk about my own province. I understand that it would be only the turkeys that would leave Manitoba and go to Ontario that would be subject to grading and that the turkeys—the 80 or 90 per cent of them—that we consume in Manitoba would not be subject to grading or if they were subject to grading it would not be necessary for them to be sold according to grade. That is the way I read it. Then the fur-bearing animals are mentioned. Does this mean that now the people who raise mink will have the furs graded before they are sent to the New York market?

Mr. Gardiner: Mention is made of fur-bearing animals raised in captivity, but you are now going on to clause 2.

Mr. Bryce: I might as well finish it while I am on my feet. What fur-bearing animals does the government mean to grade now? They grade them already in Winnipeg.

Mr. Gardiner: This act does not change what we have been doing. It just provides a little different means of continuing to do it. This is a consolidation of five measures into one.

Mr. Bryce: You are only stating the grade. The hon. member to my right says you do not grade them now. I understand the pelts were graded before they went to the New York market, but do I understand there will be no government graders?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, there will be government graders.

Mr. Trainor: With regard to the fur-bearing animals, I should like the minister to tell the committee how he proposes to carry out this grading. Does he propose to grade them according to the fur quality, or does he propose to take into consideration such things as breeding and blood lines, which are far more important to the producer than the individual fur quality? So far as the grading of pelts is concerned, I never knew there was such a thing as government grading. At the fur auctions the pelts are graded, but of course they are graded by the fur auctioneers themselves without any government intervention. If I am wrong I wish the minister would put me right on that. I have had some experience in this connection, and happen to know something about it.

The Chairman: Surely that is a particular question which must be answered under clause 2 of the bill. May I take it now that the general discussion is ended and we are ready to carry clause 1?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): No, Mr. Chairman; I do not intend to allow the first clause to be carried without challenging something that was said by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. I was most amazed at what he had to say. This is not the first occasion when he has mentioned in the house his long experience in the retail trade, and I do not quarrel with him about it. I think perhaps he is an expert in that business. However, he did use some-phrases such as "off the record" and "skul-duggery" and other words in connection with the retail trade.

I, for one, want to ask him how he can argue that the grades are satisfactory—he seems to start with the idea that they are satisfactory—and at the same time admit quite frankly that when a grade C and a grade A hog are trimmed there is no way of determining which is which. From the farmers' point of view, if the hog is one pound over weight it represents a $3 or $3.50 loss to the farmer.

Mr. Gardiner: It depends on where you start to count the pounds.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): What we in this group are trying to do is have the government assure us that the grade for which the farmer is paid by the livestock trade, or the packer to whom he delivers the animal, will be continued right through to the consumer. We are not satisfied that this bill is going to do that. The minister tells us he has been over in Britain and has seen the health inspector poke his finger into different cuts of beef to determine whether or not it is choice beef. If that is done by the health people, he might as well call in one of the other inspectors to determine whether or not the meat is fit for human consumption.

I want to say this. There are thousands of young couples getting married who do not know the difference between choice beef and commercial grades. There are thousands of men who go to the market to buy beef for their families who are not experts at identifying the different grades. If we are going to have producers forced to follow some type of national grading, then those producers have a right to the assurance that the grade for which they are paid by the packer will be carried through to the consumer.

Again in answer to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, I might say that now there is no assurance to the producer that the cattle he sends to the livestock yard and that are graded commercial will not be sold as red brand beef. There should be no reflection on us for trying to get confirmation from the minister that these grades will be carried right through to the consumer. I want to say to the hon. member that the farmers are concerned. They are willing to take the price for the grade they send to the market, and it may be commercial grade, but at the same time they want to be sure that grade is carried through to the consumer.

Mr. Yuill: I did not intend to stir up a hornets' nest like this. I still think I am right. I contend that misrepresentation in any particular butcher shop has no relationship to the established grade of that particular commodity. So far as the penalty for an overweight hog is concerned, I regret it just as much as anyone. However, of necessity there must be a deadline or a target weight established for any particular class. It may be too light, but if you raise it five pounds you will have the same problem. Someone will have a hog that is six pounds over the former weight limit. No matter what you do you run into that type of problem. I do not know who is to blame for it, but I imagine it is the producer. If I were a producer of hogs and I got caught with a loss of $3.50 per head because the hogs were one pound heavy, I believe I would smarten up and market them a little bit lighter. That is the way I would do it.

I may be wrong, but I do not believe the hon. member was fair in his comparison between the grade C and first grade hog. When the excess fat is removed the eating quality of the two animals is the same. There is, however, a shrinkage value of the hog, depending upon the price of hogs. I know that, and he should know it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): But the farmer gets $3 less for a hog when there is only one pound overweight.

Mr. Yuill: That is true, and I am just as unhappy over that as you are. These hogs must be below a certain weight in order to qualify for the premium. You have to draw the line somewhere. It may be too low, but I would hazard a guess that if you raised the weight five pounds, inside of a week you would have the same condition prevailing. The farmers would produce hogs six pounds beyond the former weight limit, and they would be unhappy about it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The retailer can get that $3.50 when he retails the hogs.

Mr. Yuill: No, you are absolutely wrong. If I buy that as a dressed hog and have to trim off the excess fat, render it down and sell it as lard for 15 cents a pound when a loin of pork is selling at 50 or 60 cents a pound, who absorbs the loss? Is it the farmer? You have to be sensible, that is all. These things have no relationship, as I said before. There is no relationship between the true grade and what it is represented to you as over the counter. If you go into the city of Edmonton, for instance—I do not know what conditions prevail in Saskatchewan—you can go into the large stores like Eaton's or Hudson's Bay. You will find commercial beef there at a price considerably below that of the blue or red beef. The grades are put in their proper places, and they are priced properly. If one is looking for red beef he will find it at one counter and he will pay a certain price for it, but if he is looking for a bargain he will get the commercial beef at a considerably reduced price.

What is wrong with that? There is nothing wrong with it. That is the way you find it in my business. But, in common with others, perhaps because of an indifference concerning trade practices, I find that retail merchants will sell the commercial beef and charge for the red, if one is gullible enough to take it. But that has nothing to do with the grading in the first instance. That is just the human element coming into it, and it has no relationship to proper grading.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to ask the minister one question in an effort to clear up one of the greater mysteries confronting the housewives of Canada. It would seem that about 95 per cent of all Canadian sheep die before they become mutton. Could the minister tell the committee when a lamb graduates to the mutton class? When does the lamb become a sheep? At what age does this take place?

Mr. Gardiner: I am afraid I cannot tell you.

Mr. Herridge: It is fair to say that 95 per cent of the sheep in Canada are sold as lamb. I would like to be able to inform the women who have asked me when a lamb becomes a sheep.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Charlton: I note that clause 2 (a) refers to "agricultural product", defining it in this way——livestock (including fur-bearing animals raised in captivity), eggs, poultry, milk, vegetables, fruit, honey and maple syrup, and products thereof;

My understanding is that this would mean any product that contained any part of any of these commodities; for instance, any product that contained a portion of meat or that contained any fruit, or that contained any vegetable. Is that what it means? Then it says, "and products thereof". I was thinking of margarine; would it come under this provision? It is partly a livestock product, partly a vegetable product or partly a grain product.

Mr. Gardiner: Margarine is not mentioned here.

[Mr. Yuill.]

Mr. Charlton: I know it is not.

Mr. Gardiner: Not every product that goes on the market comes under this bill; it is only those products that are graded, and properly graded. As the hon. member reads the bill he will find in it penalties for attempting to sell something with a marking not legally placed thereon. There is far more meat, and everything else mentioned in the bill, that never gets near a grader than is actually graded. For example, one hon. member who has been doing some talking has, in common with myself, bought beef from the same butcher shop for six years. There was very little meat handled in that butcher shop that ever got past a grader. They bought it from the farms around the area, slaughtered it and sold it.

This happens all across Canada. None of that meat comes under this bill, nor do other products in a similar position. It is what goes into a plant or an establishment as defined in the bill. The inspector is there and does the grading. It is marked and it goes out. If anyone attempts to dispose of it under some other marking he gets into trouble.

Mr. Charlton: Then would those commodities entering into interprovincial and export trade come under this bill, or would they come under the Food and Drugs Act?

Mr. Gardiner: Matters having to do with health would come under that act.

Mr. Charlton: There are products which contain portions of the commodities mentioned in clause 2 (a); do they come under the measure? Then it says "and products thereof".

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member can find that out in court some morning when he is there as a witness. I am not going to give an opinion on it.

Mr. Charlton: I am not going to court. I think the minister should be able to answer the question. For instance, would margarine manufactured in Ontario and sent to Manitoba come under this measure or under the Food and Drugs Act? I note that one can be convicted for misrepresentation. If one were to describe margarine as pasture sweet would that be considered a misrepresentation? Does it come under this measure or under the Food and Drugs Act?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has just read the clause, and the English is as clear to him as it is to me. It says that "agricultural products" shall mean—

—livestock (including fur-bearing animals raised in captivity)—

It does not include those running around the bush, not in captivity. Then it says:

—eggs, poultry, milk, vegetables, fruit, honey and maple syrup, and products thereof;

Any decision as to whether the products my hon. friend has mentioned would come under this measure would depend entirely upon their composition. But I am not going to decide that question here. As I say it will be decided on evidence presented from time to time.

Mr. Trainor: Would the minister answer my question with regard to live fur-bearing animals.

Mr. Gardiner: The same applies there. It is the fur on the live fur-bearing animals that is graded. Some of them may be graded by federal inspectors.

Mr. Trainor: How does the minister intend to grade them? On what basis are they to be graded?

Mr. Gardiner: If they are graded they come under the act. Even where some things are not done as set out in the act, if an individual agrees to the product being dealt with under the act, then it is dealt with in that way. Outside of that, however, it is in certain defined plants.

Mr. Trainor: I cannot understand how the minister proposes to grade these animals.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not intend to grade them. Clause 3 states how it shall be done. It says:

The governor in council may make regulations establishing grades with appropriate grade names for any class of agricultural products and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing may, by such regulations—

—do all these things.

Mr. Trainor: The minister is out of order.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Regulations.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Clause 3 (1) (c) says the governor in council may make regulations to——prescribe fees that may be charged for the grading or inspection of agricultural products;

What does this refer to, and who would pay the fees?

Mr. Gardiner: I presume if a fee is set under the regulations the corporation, individual or plant asking for the inspection would pay whatever fees were set.

Mr. Castleden: Could this be interpreted as including livestock in any case? My understanding is that there are going to be government grades for choice animals, grades A and B, cutters, canners and so on, and that there are to be inspectors.

Mr. Gardiner: I have here a copy of the regulations respecting hogs. This document is six pages long, and I would not want to start to outline what it says. The same applies to other products.

Mr. Castleden: Will this establish government grades for live animals?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Castleden: Live cattle and live hogs will be known and can be sold under government graded names.

Mr. Gardiner: They could be.

Mr. Castleden: I understand there are government standards for those animals. Does this provide for that?

Mr. Gardiner: Clause 2 (a) provides that livestock may come under the bill.

Mr. Castleden: Yes, it does. An agricultural product means livestock; it means an animal on the hoof.

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly. If they decide to grade that way. But action has to be taken under the act first.

Mr. Castleden: I am asking whether the government is going to do it.

Mr. Gardiner: I would not answer that.

Mr. Castleden: The minister is not prepared to say that the government is going to establish grades for the live animal, for the animal on the hoof.

Mr. Trainor: Is the minister prepared to tell us on what basis he intends to grade live fur-bearing animals?

Mr. Gardiner: I told my hon. friend twice that I did not intend to grade them at all. Under this legislation and under the regulations that may be set up under it, they can be graded. But I am not attempting at the moment to outline what these regulations may be.

Mr. Trainor: In other words, the minister is saying that the grading is not compulsory. Nobody will be obliged to have his animals graded.

Mr. Gardiner: That has always been the case. If I go across the road to my neighbour and buy an animal that I am going to kill there is no regulation under this legislation that compels me to go and get it graded, or compels him to have it graded before he sells it to me. If we attempted to do anything of that kind in this house, as I explained before, it would be ultra vires. We could not do it. The same thing is true in regard to buying the pelt of a fox, a mink or any other animal. They do not have to be graded. If you want to make sure that you are dealt with in accordance with the regulations which are supposed to protect you and that you want to be brought under, you can carry on.

Mr. Trainor: The minister is talking now about pelts, which are an entirely different thing from a live fur-bearing animal, and can be graded on the animal.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a part of a live fur-bearing animal and can be graded on the animal.

Mr. Trainor: There is nothing in the regulations now which says that you can demand a government certificate when you buy a pelt.

Mr. Gardiner: It could be put there, you know.

Mr. Trainor: I do not see the purpose of the legislation in that regard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister one question with respect to clause 3. From the reading of this clause it would almost appear that the federal authority does not have the power to do what is provided for in this clause, namely, to pass regulations to establish grades with appropriate grade names, and so forth. I raise the question simply for the purpose of asking whether it has been submitted to the law officers of the crown, and whether they, after consideration, determined the federal authority under part II? Did the law officers of the crown say that the federal authority have the power under the British North America Act to pass such regulations?

Mr. Gardiner: Of course, the provision is that no person shall:

> sell, offer for sale, or have in possession for sale an agricultural product under a grade name established under subsection (1) or under a grade name—

And that is, of course, a grade name established under the authority of this act. The paragraph continues:

> —or other designation so closely resembling a grade name so established as to be likely to be mistaken therefor.

This simply says, as I read it, that no one can misrepresent it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I just asked the minister, has it been submitted to the law officers, because I cannot understand how the federal authority can have power to do that which the minister said a moment ago it would have under this clause, namely, to pass regulations grading livestock. In clause 2 (a) livestock is referred to, as I recall the clause to which the minister referred a moment ago. I am asking under what authority the federal parliament is empowered to grade livestock. At the moment I am not dealing with meat, beef products and the like. I am asking, under what authority does this parliament have the right to pass legislation empowering the governor in council to grade livestock?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the only answer that I can give at the moment is that I hold in my hand the authority to grade hogs alive, and we have had gradings of hogs alive over a long period of time. We also have it in connection with other livestock, but that does not mean that it is compulsory. If we attempted to make it compulsory, there might be something in what my hon. friend says. We simply say: here is the grade. If somebody attempts to sell under that grading and it has not been graded properly under that grading, he commits an offence.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I just want to ask a follow-up question to that of the hon. member for Yorkton. Under this legislation does the government intend to establish rail grading for cattle? Does the minister contemplate any changes in the grading of hogs?

Mr. Gardiner: At the present time we do not contemplate any change in the gradings of hogs. Hogs are graded now on the rail and that provision seems to be pretty satisfactory. We get complaints from two sections of the country but not in anything like the same volume that we had a few years ago. With respect to cattle, so far as I know at the moment they have rail grading in British Columbia and under certain circumstances they have rail grading in the maritimes, but we have no intention of bringing it in.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Would that not be established under a provincial statute?

Mr. Gardiner: It would be done under a provincial act if it is done provincially.

Mr. Charlton: Would the minister care to comment on whether it is going to have any effect on feeders bringing cattle from the west to Ontario? Will live cattle have to be graded before they are sold in Ontario as feeder cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: They will come in the same way as they do now. There will be no change.

Mr. Charlton: You could, under this legislation.

Mr. Gardiner: We could, under the act as it is.

Mr. Charlton: Yes, I realize that.

Mr. Gardiner: We are not changing the situation. It is as it was.

Mr. Charlton: If nothing of that kind is contemplated, it would be the same as the question the hon. member for Winnipeg South was asking with respect to fur-bearing animals. It will apply in the same way across provincial boundaries.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether under the regulations at the present time there are any standards for grades of live cattle? Under existing legislation, are there any federal standards or are there any standards that are likely to be established under the legislation now before us dealing with live cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: The people who are buying cattle do buy them believing that they will produce red beef or blue beef. A good judge of cattle can tell that when they are alive, and they are paid for on that basis, and a higher price is paid for them.

Mr. Argue: Do I take it from the minister's answer that there are no government grade standards for live cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I said at the beginning that there is no possibility legally of this government establishing a standard grade that must apply to the sale of all of anything that is produced in the different provinces. They can make provision that if it goes into export trade, or is traded from one province to another, then it has to be so and so; but that is the grade, that is the standard. To start to try to enforce it in all the provinces with regard to something that an individual is selling direct from the farm into a butcher shop and then is sold to a consumer in the same province, well, that is something that we have nothing to do with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the point I raised a moment ago. It just cannot be done, and yet under part I the minister is asking for that authority. I can understand regulations being under part I, and if the regulations were under II, which deals with international and interprovincial trade, then I could understand those regulations having the authority of law. But part I deals with standards and under part I as it now stands regulations could be passed by the governor in council providing for the establishment of grades and proper grading in connection with agricultural products, including livestock, fur-bearing animals raised in captivity, poultry and other products which are named.

I ask the minister what was the reason for placing these powers under part I instead of under part II where they would be effective. Under part II there is no question whatever. As the minister clearly stated, the law would deny any grades being set up on cattle, livestock, poultry or agricultural products of any kind for sale within any one province. The federal authority enters into the matter only when the producer endeavours to ship out of the province in which the production took place.

I ask the minister: why part I at all? Why is not section 3 also placed in a similar position, or under section 5 which says that:

> The governor in council may make regulations for prohibiting the importation, exportation, or sending or conveyance from one province to another of an agricultural product contrary to a regulation made under this section.

I can understand the power under section 5 but for the life of me I do not understand how the governor in council has the power to do the things provided for in section 3 (1). Was section 3 (1) submitted to the law officers of the crown?

Mr. Gardiner: It was drafted by them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They often draft things which have not been submitted to them for a legal opinion.

Mr. Charlton: Section 3 (2) provides that no person shall offer for sale or have in his possession for sale, and so on. That is what the hon. member for Prince Albert has reference to particularly. There is no mention of importation, exportation or anything else; there is just the bald statement "sell, offer for sale, or have in his possession for sale an agricultural product under a grade established under subsection (1)".

Mr. Gardiner: That is the only part that means anything.

Mr. Charlton: That is true, unless the agricultural product meets the requirements prescribed for the grade.

Mr. Gardiner: We are simply saying that if we set up a grade by marking and some person attempts to sell something which has not been legally marked—this is what was discussed here for an hour this afternoon—they can be prosecuted for misrepresentation. I may not be using the proper terms from a legal point of view but perhaps you understand what I mean.

Mr. Charlton: Part I does not mention anything about interprovincial trade, exports, imports or anything else; it refers only to standards. You say, "No person shall". That might lead one to believe that if a person in Ottawa sold an article here which was not graded he would be violating the regulations.

Mr. Gardiner: If a product is graded, say in Manitoba, and is sent into Ontario and then someone takes another product and puts it on his shelves claiming by marking it is the product graded in Manitoba, then he has committed an offence. It is not the fact that it is shipped from one place to another, it is the fact that he is trying to sell something under a description which does not exist. He is selling a product which has never been legally graded as marked.

Mr. Charlton: It reads:

No person shall
(a) sell, offer for sale, or have in possession for sale an agricultural product under a grade name established under subsection (1) or under a grade name or other designation so closely resembling a grade name so established as to be likely to be mistaken therefor,—

And then dropping down.

—unless the agricultural product meets the requirements prescribed for the grade, has been graded and inspected as required by the regulations, and is packed and marked in prescribed manner.

That does not mean that it has to come in from another province.

Mr. Gardiner: It does not matter whether it had. It has to meet the marking set up under this act, whether it is intraprovincial or interprovincial. You cannot take a marking or grade which has been set up under this act and use it to sell a product which has never been graded under the act.

Mr. Argue: Is this provision similar to any provision in the present acts, or is it something really new?

Mr. Gardiner: I have not read all the acts carefully enough to be absolutely certain, but I am told by those who have and by those who drafted it that there is nothing new in any of these matters.

Mr. Argue: Then as to the legal question raised, can the minister state whether anyone has been prosecuted for having sold a product as being of a certain standard set up by the federal government when in fact it was not? In other words, can the legal point which has been raised be substantiated by reference to successful prosecution in the past?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not sure that I can recite a case at the moment, but there were two or three cases brought before this house during this session dealing with substitutes for butter.

Mr. Charlton: In that case the provincial regulations would have to be substantially the same as the dominion regulations. In many cases the provincial governments make their regulations and grades in conformity with the federal regulations and grades. Is that not true?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 9—Powers of inspector.

Mr. Charlton: This states that an inspector may at any time enter any place and may require any person to produce for inspection, and so on. Is this carried over from the old act?

Mr. Gardiner: It is just the same.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 10 and 11 agreed to.

On clause 12—Damage and careless handling of products during shipment.

Mr. Charlton: Under this section, if a trucker or railroad company accepted goods of this character for shipment they would be liable, even though they did not know those conditions were in existence. Therefore the trucker or railroad would have to make sure before accepting any agricultural product that it had been graded under these regulations. Am I right in that?

Mr. Gardiner: I would not think so. It reads:

(1) No person shall, during the course of shipment of an agricultural product that has been packed, marked or graded under this act,
(a) wilfully or carelessly damage the agricultural product, or
(b) handle the product in such a manner
(i) that it is likely to deteriorate in quality, or
(ii) that it is likely to fail to meet the requirements prescribed under this act for the grade applied thereto.
(2) For the purposes of this section, the expression "during the course of shipment" includes loading and unloading and any acts preparatory to loading, shipping or unloading.

The wording of it indicates that it has to be a wilful act or something for which he is responsible.

Mr. Charlton: That is damage through handling, but first he has to have a permit actually to transport it.

Mr. Gardiner: He may have to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

INCREASE IN AMOUNT THAT MAY BE EXPENDED ON MINISTERIAL AUTHORITY

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this amendment and to deal with the subject matter in particular. In effect it is that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be amended so as to provide that no single project or scheme under this act involving an expenditure in excess of $15,000 shall be undertaken without the consent of the governor in council, thereby adding to the power of the minister to award contracts under this act, increasing the present limitation of $10,000 to $15,000, and also providing for the repeal of section 11, with which I do not intend to deal until the bill finds itself in committee.

Mr. Gardiner: It takes away some of the authority.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, it takes away some, and I am not in any way dealing with this at the present time. I am going to deal specifically with the earlier portion, namely the increase in power that will result from this amendment. It will be noted that this bill has been on the order paper since early in January, and therefore the request for added power on the part of the minister—

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, just as a matter of privilege, the minister has made no request for added power. The bill simply brings this measure into agreement with all other similar measures in all other departments of government. The minister had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister may deal with it later in replying. As far as I am concerned, reading this in its ordinary language, it means an increase in the power of the minister under P.F.R.A. Whether it is to equal the rights of other departments has nothing whatever to do with the argument that I intend to advance. I was pointing out, when the right hon. gentleman interrupted me, that this bill had been on the order paper since January, and therefore the request for an increase in power has no reference whatever to, nor has it any connection with, the work that is now required to be done by the officials of P.F.R.A. resulting from the flood conditions which now prevail in the province of Saskatchewan and to a lesser degree in Manitoba.

As far as the act in general is concerned, it has been in effect now since 1935 and represents one of the most effective acts ever placed on the statute books of our country with reference to the restoration of lands and the preservation of moisture. However, today we find ourselves in a position where getting moisture on to the lands is no more important, having regard to the cycle through which we are passing, than getting it off. This act in its present form, with few amendments, has been in effect since 1935. It represents a monument to the vision of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and the Hon. Robert Weir who conceived it and brought it into being. Through their concept tremendous improvements have taken place in our economic position in the western provinces.

Having said that, I wish to say immediately that latterly, particularly, there has been a tendency on the part of those in charge of the administration to place in the employment of P.F.R.A. some individuals whose qualifications are, even to an unsuspicious eye, peculiarly political. As far as the ordinary run of employees in P.F.R.A. are concerned, they have given good service and I do not refer to them in any way when I suggest that some of the appointments have a peculiarly political slant.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have just been reading the bill, which refers to adding certain powers and detracting certain powers of the minister. It seems to me, as hon. members well know, that when we are on a bill amending an enactment it is the principle of the amending bill which we are required to discuss, not the principle of the enactment itself. I therefore would ask the hon. member for Prince Albert in his discussion to deal with the principle of this bill which is, as he can plainly see, rather limited in its scope.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I know of no way in which I can deal with the principle except by showing that the principle in the past has been departed from and because of that departure we in the official opposition intend to oppose any increase in power to the minister. In support of my argument I intend to refer to what is taking place and the degree to which the powers have been used to date, and then to point out that, having regard to the present limitation of $10,000, the situation can conceivably be that much worse when the amount that may be expended without control on the part of the governor in council is increased to $15,000, and the melon becomes thereby so much larger. It was on that basis, sir, that I was dealing with the situation in

P.F.R.A. and in the control exercised by the minister over P.F.R.A. In support of the contention—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course that is absolutely correct. If he deals with a project and the raising of the limit from $10,000 to $15,000, I would be the last one to interrupt him. However, as I understood him, the hon. member was proceeding to deal with employees; and I cannot see how he has related that matter to the principle of the bill before us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. After all, I must refer to the nature of some of the employees in order to indicate the power possessed by the minister, which is a power to make appointments outside of the civil service commission, and to have that power exercised by himself, and to point out the danger of the extension of that power in the manner asked for by the minister in the bill in question.

Mr. Gardiner: On the question of order that has been raised, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am in agreement with what you have already stated. I would point out that there is no authority in this bill to make appointments. The authority simply has to do with the size of the contract that the minister can decide upon with the consent of council. It has nothing to do with appointments. If we were going to shut the hon. member out from discussing the question, I would be the last one to suggest that that position should be taken. I know the questions that the hon. member is going to discuss can be answered and dealt with, but the proper place to deal with it is on my estimates which are still to come before the house. I have no objection to the question being discussed, but are we going to discuss it twice? Every other hon. member of the House of Commons has the right to discuss it on my estimates, and no doubt others will discuss it if they feel inclined to do so. However, I do not think we should have two discussions, one here where it does not belong and one where it does belong.

Mr. Drew: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that what has been suggested here is much in order and for reasons which have already been borne out by proceedings within this house within the past few years. The principle involved in this measure, in the provision under discussion, is the extension of wider discretionary powers to the minister without the ordinary protection that is afforded by submission to order in council. There may be those who would question even what protection that affords, but nevertheless it does afford some protection. This is a case where even that measure of examination and protection is removed.

If hon. members are to be in a position to say whether or not that type of discretion should be extended, surely it is appropriate to consider how the powers already conferred upon the minister have been exercised with regard to similar matters. We had another case of a not dissimilar nature when there was a proposal that the right to engage in and to enter into contracts under the Department of Public Works should be extended by raising the amount that would be permissible without tender. In the arguments that were used against the extension of that power, examples were cited of the way in which the discretionary powers already possessed had been exercised. As a result of the arguments which were made, the provision was withdrawn and in that particular case the arguments were sustained by the will of the members themselves. It was perfectly obvious that the government had become convinced that there was sufficient support on the other side of the house for the arguments to persuade them to withdraw that particular measure. I do not know of any way in which the members of this house could be persuaded that the discretion should not be extended unless an hon. member were permitted to place before the house examples of the way in which the discretionary powers already possessed had been exercised by the minister on other occasions.

Mr. Coldwell: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I just say this. It strikes me that Your Honour is trying to limit debate in a manner in which it should not be limited. As a matter of fact, how can you have a project or scheme without having employees engaged either in inspecting the scheme or in approving of it before it is undertaken? It seems to me that you cannot deal with any project or scheme of this description without involving some of the employees of the department. Since there may be some disposition to question the ability of the individuals who may be inspecting, recommending and approving of the scheme, I think that the question as to those who are employed in this organization could properly come before the house in relation to this particular bill. I am rising to support the contention of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in that regard.

Mr. Gardiner: I know I am out of order, Mr. Speaker, and if you desire to call me out of order in this connection that will be all right. The hon. member rose before I had an opportunity of saying what this bill is for. We passed in this house the Financial Administration Act. It provides that in every department of government the minister can decide up to $15,000. I take it that anybody who is opposed to this provision says that what every other department may do, the Department of Agriculture cannot. That is all this bill does. It just brings us under that legislation which every other department is under.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, no. I was not talking about that.

Mr. Drew: Speaking again to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. It is perfectly obvious that the provision to which the minister refers has no application whatever. The fact is that if it had any application, there would be no occasion for this section to be here. If in fact the provision to which he has referred had any application, we would not be discussing this measure now. The fact is that it is something entirely different. It is an extension of discretion. When it is suggested that the officials who are engaged under the minister in that department are to be permitted this wider discretion, surely there should be opportunity to know who will exercise that discretion and the manner in which that discretion has been exercised under less restricted circumstances.

Mr. Gardiner: I rise because of the statement just made that this is an extension of discretion. It is not. The measure limits the discretion which is already available. There is far more discretion in the two sections that are being done away with than there ever was in this one. This bill does not extend discretion. It limits it.

Mr. Argue: What is the point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure hon. members would wish me to apply our rules, which are designed with care, I should say, to see not only that every opportunity is given for discussion of public questions but to ensure that there are appropriate opportunities for such discussions at certain times. The reason I raised the point in the first place was that it seemed to me that the principle of this bill dealt with increasing the discretion of the minister, on what is mentioned as a "project" or "scheme", from $10,000 to $15,000. I do not think hon. members would disagree with me when I say that is the principle of this amending bill. The further problem arises as to how far a discussion of employees can be allowed in discussing that principle. It seemed to me that the hon. member for Prince Albert, when I interrupted him, was launching on what might well turn into an extended discussion of the employees of P.F.R.A., a matter which, in my opinion, did not relate to the principle of the bill in question. It was for that reason that I interrupted him. I listened with care to hon. members who have risen on the point of order. If the discussion is merely by way of example to bolster an argument on the principle, of course I cannot say it is out of order. But I am going to ask members to adhere strictly to the principle of this bill. As hon. members undoubtedly know, there is a very good opportunity to discuss collateral questions when the minister's estimates are before the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I bow with deference to your ruling, and will simply place before the house just a segment of the record to date to indicate the danger of extending the authority of the minister in the administration of this act. To support the argument that it is dangerous and that to extend his authority will be dangerous or could conceivably be detrimental to the public administration, I shall refer to one or two examples of what I have in mind as the type of administration that is taking place. In this way my opposition to the increase requested will be supported.

The minister says no increase is requested. This measure is simply to place this act in a position where the minister's powers will be similar to those under the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that no increase was requested. I said there was an increase from $10,000 to $15,000 requested but two other sections are taken away that give more authority than that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We all know that when the Minister of Agriculture allows any of his powers to be removed from him, especially in a bill introduced by himself, there is an Ethiopian somewhere in the deal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Be careful about racial discrimination.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I bow with the greatest deference to my hon. friend the minister who is the unchallengeable authority in this house on that subject.

Returning once more to my argument, it is this. What has experience been in very recent times as to the manner in which the minister has administered the authority parliament gave him? So far as the rank and file of the employees are concerned, they themselves resent what has recently taken place. No one can suggest but that a few months ago a body blow was struck at the administration of P.F.R.A. when the director of that organization, L. B. Thomson, placed his resignation before the government. It was allowed to remain in abeyance until after the Liberal convention in Saskatoon. Then the gentleman in question was retained in the public service in charge of the administration of P.F.R.A.

However estimable his qualifications may be, those qualifications do not include the right on the part of any official to make a qualified resignation from a high and responsible position, then, not having succeeded in his quest, to be received back into the organization. The government did not even acknowledge his letter of resignation. He wrote a letter and said he wanted to resign, but nothing was done about his resignation. Finally he was back in the fold after the convention was over. As my hon. friend says, he remained in a state of suspended animation. First, he was in charge of P.F.R.A., and then again he was not. He resigned in a qualified resignation, and there was not even an acknowledgment by the minister.

Mr. Gardiner: It was not addressed to him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or by any minister of the government—

Mr. Gardiner: The resignation was not addressed to any minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, it was just thrown up in the air, and that is why no minister replied to it. I asked what happened to the resignation and the various correspondence, and the answer was that there was no correspondence other than the resignation. Well, the gentleman resigned and then, not having attained the political mecca he had in mind, he was restored to his former position or at least he continued in his former position regardless of what had happened during the interval. This was a body blow at the integrity of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration.

This is not the only example. Some weeks ago I asked a question as to how many ex-M.P.'s and ex-M.L.A.'s represented the P.F.R.A. We have not got an answer to that question yet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the hon. member rose after I dealt with the point of order, he indicated that he bowed to my ruling and indicated to us that he intended to use these matters as examples in his discussion of the principle of the bill. I have listened for the past few minutes, but it seems to me he is dealing with an entirely separate subject. I cannot see that he is pursuing his remarks as examples of the principle. It is, after all, a very simple, direct one, concerning the advisability or inadvisability of raising the authority of the minister from $10,000 to $15,000. I do not want to insist too much. It may be the hon. member intends to use his remarks as examples, but in order to avoid doubling up on debates I must say that from what the hon. member has said up to the moment, I feel some of those remarks could have been made more appropriately on the minister's estimates than on the second reading of this bill which has such a narrow principle. I must, therefore, ask the hon. member for co-operation in that regard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does Your Honour rule that I may not, as an example of some of the reasons that I am opposed to this bill, and this extension asked for in the bill, refer to some of the proclivities and political activities of those who will be charged with the responsibility of carrying out the increased power? That is all I am trying to do. Who are these men who will carry out the additional power? Will they do it in accordance with recognized principles or will they do it in a manner that ought not to be permitted to characterize any administration of the government? I base my whole argument on the fact that in order to test the efficacy of the course suggested for the minister in this bill, one should review something of the recent events in the administration of the P.F.R.A. which give to that administration the suspicion that political purposes are in the minds of many of those occupying administrative positions. I have heard it said that, so far as many of the high officials are concerned, P.F.R.A. could be defined as patronage for retired, rejected or resigned politicians.

Mr. Benidickson: Surely it is not like the Ontario hydro.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going into that, because that is a provincial matter. And of course the interruption was meaningless in a discussion of this subject.

Mr. Drew: And as senseless as one might expect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not disagree with that observation.

Here are some of the gentlemen: Mr. Austin Dewar, public relations officer of P.F.R.A. with a salary last year of $3,308 and with expenses of $3,119. Will anyone tell me that the fact that he is appointed to a position of that kind, that of public relations official, does not immediately arouse at least a degree of anxiety at a time when the government is asking for an extension of the money that may be spent without control by order in council?

An hon. Member: Suspicious mind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And then we come to Mr. G. M. Ferrie, a most estimable gentleman. There are a number of names here. These things indicate that P.F.R.A.—

Mr. Gardiner: What is Mr. Ferrie?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —is becoming a political melon.

Mr. Gardiner: What is Mr. Ferrie?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Ferrie received a salary of $2,475 with expenses of $1,081. So far as Mr. Ferrie is concerned, I must say he was somewhat different from the rest of them who, according to their expense accounts, travelled awfully fast and awfully far between June and August 10, 1953.

Mr. Gardiner: What do they call him?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The manner in which trades take place between officials in P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A., and the Liberal organization in Saskatchewan is worthy of note. One has only to look at the record of Mr. Glen Bruce and of Bill Bird, this merry-go-round of P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A., and then back to the Liberal association as secretary. These things are wrong; these things are unjustifiable. P.F.R.A. is entitled not to have this kind of political administration on the part of certain of its officials.

The minister says: What has this to do with the question of whether or not his powers should be increased. Well, to raise the melon from $10,000 to $15,000—

Mr. Gardiner: No relationship at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says there is no relationship.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no relationship between those two things.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He keeps coming back to the point that under the Financial Administration Act other ministers have that authority, but that it does not exist under P.F.R.A. The minister endeavours to get this added power to have these people on the march all over the province under the guise of saying, "Look at my retreat. Look what I have given up. Look at the powers under section 11."

Mr. Speaker, if the minister accepts this bill with diminished powers, no one will have objection to it. But my objection, and that of the opposition, is to the added powers, and as a result of the activities of L. B. Thomson and the manner in which he shuffled in and shuffled out and shuffled back again, which cannot be justified. It leaves a suggestion that all is not well and that additional powers such as are asked for cannot be justified. The minister indicated a minute ago that there was nothing particularly wrong with the administration. I mentioned Mr. Bird and Mr. Bruce.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Bird had nothing to do with P.F.R.A., and never has had.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I read from Mr. Peter McLintock in the Winnipeg Free Press. He was referring to the dispute over who was to be secretary of the provincial Liberal association, and said:

> In the past the secretary has also been the provincial organizer. Mr. Bill Bird, Mr. Gardiner's campaign manager—

Mr. Gardiner: Again I say that Mr. Bird has had no association whatever with P.F.R.A. at any time. He is in P.F.A.A., not P.F.R.A.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am just mentioning the shuffle and the double shuffle.

Mr. Gardiner: How do you relate it to this?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister will just let me conclude this article:

> In the past the secretary has also been the provincial organizer. Mr. Bill Bird, Mr. Gardiner's campaign manager, held this post for a number of years after the second world war. Not long ago Mr. Bird was named director of the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration — another government branch for which Mr. Gardiner is responsible.
>
> To replace Mr. Bird as Liberal secretary, the association appointed Mr. Glen Bruce.

Then it goes on to mention that Mr. Bruce had been connected with P.F.A.A.

In other words, Thomson, Bruce and Bird; P.F.A.A. and P.F.R.A.; shuffle, double shuffle, triple shuffle. Those are the things that leave one with a degree of bewilderment as to the measures these people have to carry out and the use of the authority by Dr. Thomson, now that once again he is restored to the position of head of this organization.

For these reasons—and I think they are singularly powerful reasons—no additional melon should be given to the minister which would permit him to carve a $15,000 cut without having over him the need of going before the governor in council for authority.

The powers the minister needs have been shown by the experience of the past. This organization has got along very well under the old restrictions. Nothing has been advanced, that I know of, that indicates any need for an increase in the amount the minister may spend without the authority of the governor in council. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I have no other alternative than to vote against this measure; because parliament has the right to protest when positions in a body such as P.F.R.A.—and they are highly paid positions, many of them—

Mr. Gardiner: None of them at $15,000.

Mr. Drew: They soon will be, if this goes on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are highly paid positions. I say I have no other alternative than to vote against the measure when positions are filled outside the civil service commission and where apparently the appointments are the personal perquisites of the Minister of Agriculture. This being so, with the appointees responsible directly to him for their positions—and I am referring to the executive officers rather than those holding minor posts—parliament has the right to stop any additional powers being placed in the hands of the minister until he gives it the assurance that the double and triple shuffles of recent days in high executive positions are a thing of the past.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to say a word on this because, to a large extent, I am in agreement with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his criticism of this particular bill. I may say immediately I do not share the view that because a man has been a member of this house he is unfitted to take a position after he leaves this House of Commons, provided that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not inherent in what I said.

Mr. Coldwell: No. Provided that he is suitable for the position and provided that he has a reputation which recommends him to this house and to the country.

When I look over some of the appointments that have been made under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act I just wonder what the people of Canada think when a member of parliament leaves this chamber under a cloud which has never been removed or cleared up, and then he is appointed to a position under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. It is because of matters of that kind that I am going to oppose the granting of this additional power to the Minister of Agriculture. After all, when the minister says this is bringing the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration in line with other parts of government administration, let me say this. In 1952 the act made the concession, if I may put it that way, that projects under $10,000 might be undertaken without the approval of the governor in council. If that was done in 1952, I can see no reason why in 1955 we should increase it by 50 per cent. When we look at the statistical reports of recent days this is what we find. For example, I hold in my hand the Canadian Statistical Review of April, 1955. I find that neither retail nor wholesale prices have increased by 50 per cent. In fact, in relation to wholesale prices, we find that they are down a little and retail prices are up only slightly. For the life of me I cannot see any reason why we should grant this additional power to the minister.

There is a general feeling among many people in western Canada and in the prairie provinces that there are too many political appointments under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, although it does have many good people in it. It is becoming more and more a political machine directed by the Minister of Agriculture.

When I look at the long list of over 1,400 employees in this report, which was asked for by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and some 500 under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, I find, as has already been stated, certain appointments made that do not command the respect of this parliament or, I believe, of the country generally.

In asking for this power the minister is asking something from the house that the house should not grant in the circumstances under which this act has been administered. I want to say immediately that since the act was placed on the statute books of this country in 1934 much good has come of it. As a matter of fact, I believe we have had no act as beneficial to the prairie provinces as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; and indeed, as far as it goes, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act placed on the statute books subsequently has also been of substantial benefit to our western agricultural population.

I am joining in the protest against granting this additional power to the minister, not because I wish to deny to him and to the administration the same rights as we have granted to some of the other administrative bodies under the government. I am doing it, as the hon. member for Prince Albert did it, because I feel that somehow or other we have to make as effective a protest as we can against the manner in which a few of the employees of this organization have been appointed, and against the manner in which they are carrying out their activities in the prairie provinces. That is the reason for the opposition which I am voicing to the increase of power given to the minister at this time.

I want the house to understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is not because we wish in any way to hamper the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Indeed, I should like to see it extended and more work undertaken under it. We are asking today that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act shall have some additional money and power to assist in the grave situation which has resulted from flooding in the prairie provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Therefore, let it not be said that in opposing this particular bill we are in any way endeavouring to hamper the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. What we are doing is endeavouring to make the only effective protest we can make in this house. The only effective protest we can ever make is to refuse to grant money to the government or to a government department. Because of the political activities of some of the persons employed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, because of some of the appointments which I think not only were unwarranted but were a reflection on this parliament of Canada, I intend to vote against this particular bill.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): We have heard many comments regarding the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in Saskatchewan; but in that province politics and agriculture seem to have the habit of getting badly mixed up.

Mr. Coldwell: They certainly do.

Mr. Quelch: However, in Alberta we have not found that what has happened in Saskatchewan has in any way affected the efficient operation of the act in our province. As a matter of fact, in the constituency that I represent magnificent work is being done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. It is largely owing to the fact that out there we have an excellent man as director. It so happens that he was a former Liberal federal candidate. He was defeated some 10 years ago, but he had been active in rehabilitation and irrigation work long before that. He had been recognized as an authority, and since his defeat he has been acting as director of Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act work in that district, and he has done excellent work. All the expenditures that have been made in that area have been wisely made. We feel that the people have received full value for the money expended. Therefore, I am not prepared to oppose this bill. The increase from $10,000 to $15,000 does seem reasonable and in line with the general increase in costs throughout the country.

Marvellous work has been done in that area in making it possible to carry large numbers of cattle on pasture lands that were without water until the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act provided dugouts and also provided assistance in establishing small irrigation projects by damming up dry creeks and by providing water for the various towns by establishing reservoirs. I should not like to see anything done that will in any way hamper the work of that organization. I realize that the situation in Saskatchewan may be different. I do not believe that what has happened in Saskatchewan has in any way interfered with the efficient operation of the act in Alberta.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the point of view expressed by my leader (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Hon. members in all sections of the house, I know, appreciate the outstanding work accomplished under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act since it was passed 20 years ago, but I submit that the minister is showing very poor judgment when he places in responsible positions people who have been so active politically and who appear to be still active politically after having been taken on under P.F.R.A.

Mention has been made of the trips made by Mr. Ferrie, former member for Mackenzie. According to the return which has been brought down, the amounts paid to Mr. Ferrie have been quite modest, but he has not been employed by the department very long. It is not easy to justify to the taxpayers the expenditure of funds to enable Mr. Ferrie to continue his political activity in an area where he is so well known. If the minister had wanted to employ Mr. Ferrie in Alberta or Manitoba there might have been some justification, but not to employ him in a place where he is so well known.

For example, I find that late in December he made a trip to Norquay on December 6 in connection with the Swan river project. Then he went to Newburn to inspect the dam. Then he went to Fosston to inspect a dugout and drainage. I do not know how you would inspect a dugout and drainage on December 18. Then there was a trip to Watson and one to Buchanan. Then on December 21 there was another dugout inspection and on December 22 he was out to inspect a flowing dugout. I do not know what sort of a dugout that is and I do not know how one could inspect it on December 22. Up in our country everything is frozen up early in November. Then there was another trip on December 30 to inspect a ditch.

The total mileage was only 1,417, which at nine cents a mile amounts to $127.53. I admit that that is not a large amount when compared with amounts spent in other government departments, but it is very difficult to justify to the taxpayers in that area that it is necessary to have Mr. Ferrie riding around the country allegedly inspecting flowing dugouts and drainage and dam projects in the middle of December when the ground is covered with snow and the lakes and rivers are covered with two or three feet of ice.

I have no personal axe to grind as far as Mr. Ferrie is concerned, but I do not think the minister should be given wider powers to spend money without referring the matter to his colleagues. As a protest against the use of public funds to send so many political workers throughout Saskatchewan, I propose to vote against this measure.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to oppose this bill for the reasons already outlined, namely, that it gives the minister the power to spend larger amounts of money without having to obtain the approval of the governor in council. In view of the information which has been placed on the record this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), I think hon. members would be justified in voting against an approval to spend money without the approval of the governor in council.

I wish to direct my remarks particularly to clause 2 of the bill which repeals sections 10 and 11 of the act. Section 10 of the act reads:

> The minister may, for the purposes of this act, and with the approval of the governor in council, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, or sell, lease or otherwise dispose of, any lands or premises that may be required for or included in any project or scheme, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem desirable.

With that section removed from the act there will no longer be vested in the minister power, in this instance with the approval of the governor in council, to purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, or sell, lease or otherwise dispose of, any lands or premises that may be required for or included in any project. The whole life of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in the past depended upon the ability of the minister to acquire, with the approval of the governor in council in this instance, or lease lands for the purposes of the act. At the present time there is under lease in connection with prairie farm rehabilitation over 1,600,000 acres of pasture land. With this section deleted from the act I am wondering what will be left for prairie farm rehabilitation to undertake. Does it mean that there will be an end to further acquisition of land for pasture purposes? Does it mean that if the governor in council should decide to undertake the South Saskatchewan dam they will not have power under this act to lease property and therefore no power to acquire control of the site on which the dam would be erected?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I am not a lawyer and therefore I am not professing to give an answer to the question I am raising. If power exists for this specific purpose under some other act, then why should this provision have been in the act since 1939? Unless the minister can point out to me a provision in the Financial Administration Act, which would be a substitute for section 10, I cannot see how he is going to be able to carry on the very important functions of prairie farm rehabilitation which depend upon the leasing of land.

Section 11 of the act, which is also to be deleted, reads:

> (1) The minister may, for the purposes of this act, purchase or rent whatever machinery or equipment may be required in connection with the development, construction or operation of any project or scheme, but the purchase of any single unit of machinery or equipment of a value greater than five thousand dollars requires the approval of the governor in council.
> (2) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other act or law, the minister may sell any single unit of such machinery or equipment upon such terms as he may deem advisable and the proceeds thereof shall be paid to the receiver general, but the sale of any such unit, if its initial cost exceeded five hundred dollars, requires the approval of the governor in council.

I direct the attention of the house more particularly to subsection 1 of section 11 of the act which gives the minister the power to acquire machinery worth more than five thousand with the approval of the governor in council. If we are to delete section 10 and section 11, my question is this: Where does the power remain for the government to undertake the very functions of prairie farm rehabilitation which we all think are so important? In other words, if these sections are removed, does that spell the end of pasture leases in the future? Does that spell the end of the acquiring of machinery by the department? Does that mean that for all practical purposes prairie farm rehabilitation has been brought to an end and that the public of Canada in the future will not be able to expect the government to lease land or to purchase equipment? As I say, I hope my fears are groundless. I would certainly like an answer to the question I have proposed, because unless there are very definitely in the Financial Administration Act or some other act all of the necessary powers to replace sections 10 and 11, then this act, which has been a very good act, will for all practical purposes have been destroyed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the right hon. minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, and members of the house, I have listened with some interest to the discussion which has taken place and in the light of what was said I can quite understand the attitude of some members. For example, the statement was made, in the midst of a presentation which I think had no place whatsoever in the discussion, that a past member of this house who it was suggested left the house under a cloud had been made a public relations officer—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the description of the Regina Leader-Post.

Mr. Gardiner: You do not go to the Regina Leader-Post for descriptions of things that you do. Why go there for descriptions of things I have done? As a matter of fact, Mr. Dewar is in the same position as seven or eight others. He is not a man who is directing the personnel of P.F.R.A. He is a field supervisor holding exactly the same position as the ex-candidate in Alberta who was spoken of so highly a few moments ago. He has exactly the same kind of position in a limited territory. He has nothing to do with personnel in connection with the employees of the P.F.R.A. branch. That was why I asked the hon. member when he was speaking the title of the position which was held by another ex-member of this house. Their titles are exactly the same. Mr. Dewar and Mr. Ferrie hold positions as field supervisors covering a certain part of the province, just as does the gentleman who was spoken of by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch).

Having said that, I come back to what the bill is really about, because it has no relationship whatsoever to this kind of discussion. This bill did not have in it these provisions when it was drawn up in 1936, or when it was amended. It did not have the provisions relating to the purchase of machinery, the purchase of lands and the purchase of this, that and the other thing, all of which have been referred to in the discussion. Yet we have been doing all the things we are doing now. As a matter of fact the legislation was amended as we went along to give certain authorities under certain conditions. One of those authorities was the one read a few moments ago by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), section 10, which reads as follows:

> The minister may, for the purposes of this act, and with the approval of the governor in council, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, or sell, lease or otherwise dispose of, any lands or premises that may be required for or included in any project or scheme, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem desirable.

It goes on to explain:

> The repeal of this section will mean that all P.F.R.A. land transactions will be dealt with in the same manner as are the land transactions involving government departments under existing legislation.

In other words, in answer to the hon. member for Assiniboia, the legal authorities who drafted the act say that there is provision in other legislation. I am not going to take the time of the house in going into all the terms of the different kinds of legislation we have to deal with, but the same authority which others have to purchase land for government purposes will be exercised by P.F.R.A., just as it is exercised by other authorities under the government and as it has always been. This was a special power given to the minister under special circumstances to deal with certain things. It has been thought that those special authorities are no longer required, and that is being removed.

Section 11 reads as follows—

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I have one or two things I wanted to say first. Before six o'clock some suggestions were made that I think ought to be answered before there is a division on the question. It was suggested that the taking out of this section in the bill might create a situation which would be rather difficult. I must say that that would not be the case. I have in my hand the original bill, or at least the bill as it was passed back in 1937 and 1939. The suggestion made was that if we did away with sections 10 and 11, we would not now have any authority to do some of the things which we are doing. Section 11 provides for the purchase and sale of certain machinery and equipment. The act which now makes it possible for surplus property owned by the government to be sold makes it compulsory that any department which has property of that kind, such as machinery, must sell it under that act. Hence taking this section out at this time does not make any difference to the position as it has been ever since that act was passed following the end of the war.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question there? It is an extremely interesting point. If you will look at the Financial Administration Act, you will find that it covers the Department of Agriculture but it does not refer specifically to P.F.R.A. I wonder whether the minister had noticed that fact.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, I am looking for the bill itself which that is in, but I do not appear to have it. No, I have not looked at that at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was wondering whether it was included.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that this bill is to be changed with regard to the particular section which is under discussion. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia, he was wondering whether the removal of section 10 would result in our not being able to do those things which we have been doing. If you, Mr. Speaker, will note the date on which that change was made, you will find it is 1939. In other words, we had been functioning under this bill for four years before that was put in. The real reason for the putting of it in at that time was the fact that we were setting up a great many pastures and doing other things not related to larger projects, because larger projects do not come under this act at all. They are under a special vote of the house. Hence in so far as the South Saskatchewan river dam would be concerned, it does not come under this particular act; it comes under a vote of some $7 million or $8 million which is in the estimates from year to year to take care of large projects.

But our difficulty in the early stages was this. When we were setting up, as we did, some 60 pastures to 70 pastures, we were getting small areas of land and when every one of those had to be taken to the treasury board to be passed and when treasury board did not meet sometimes for two or three weeks—and, as hon. members know from experience it is sometimes longer than that—it delayed the securing of these lands to a time when, with the short summers we have in the west, we could not get on with this work as rapidly as we had hoped to get on with it. We therefore brought in this section in order to take care of that difficulty.

As to the other matters which were referred to by the hon. member for Assiniboia, the position is provided for in section 4 and section 9. Section 4 of the act states:

> The advisory committee shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted to secure the rehabilitation of the drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and to develop and promote within these areas systems of farm practice, tree culture, water supply, land utilization and land settlement that will afford greater economic security, and to make such representations thereon to the minister as the advisory committee may deem expedient.

I think that is as broad as anyone would desire it to be. In relation to what was stated with regard to the same matter by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he opened up just before the dinner hour, may I say this. He made the suggestion that this bill was the result of the great foresight of some of those who went before this particular government. I am not adverse to giving credit where credit is due in connection with these matters. It is true that an act was placed upon the statute books of Canada in 1935 by the Bennett government, but that bill provided for the expenditure of $4¾ million and no more. When we begin to discuss at the present time the building of, say, the South Saskatchewan river dam that is going to cost $60 million, it is obvious there never was a possibility under the act as it was passed at that time of building such projects. In addition to that, there was no provision in the original bill for the setting up of pastures. There was no provision for the greater part of what is looked upon today as those projects which make the act really worth while. It was simply an act to indicate to the province the means by which the province could proceed to take care of this problem.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask a question just for the purpose of clarification? Is the minister suggesting that the government contemplates the construction of this dam under P.F.R.A.?

Mr. Gardiner: I just said that we are not.

Mr. Drew: I suggest it.

Mr. Gardiner: I was pointing out that my hon. friend asked questions with regard to the South Saskatchewan dam this afternoon. The hon. member for Assiniboia asked questions with regard to the South Saskatchewan river dam as though it came under this act. But it does not come under this act. But neither did the setting up of the pastures come under the original act which was brought into this house in 1935. It was only after this government was set up that the act was broadened out with no restrictions upon the amount of money that was going to be spent beyond what we could persuade the house to vote from year to year, and no restrictions upon the time during which that money was to be spent. The original act restricted it to five years, three-quarters of a million dollars the first year and $1 million each year for four years thereafter. Then it was to come to an end; and the provinces were to take the matter up from there and go on and spend money in the way they had been taught by the government of Canada that it should be spent in order to rehabilitate that area. When we came in we decided that was not a big enough way, that there was not sufficient vision in the minds of those who set up that legislation to take care of the problem. The question I was asked across the floor of the house by the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, was the question as to how long we thought it would take to deal with this question. I said it would take at least 20 years and that it would require all the money that we could get from parliament during that 20 years time. The 20 years are now up. I can understand the question coming from the hon. member for Assiniboia as to whether that is the intention in what is being done now. There was no such intention when this amendment was made to this act. It had nothing of that kind in mind whatsoever. In order to indicate that the power is still in the act I would read section 9 as it is in the act:

9. (1) The minister may, (a) subject to section 4,—

That is after having submitted the matter to a committee which is set up under the act and getting their views as to how it should be proceeded with.

—undertake the development, construction, promotion, operation and maintenance of any project or scheme under or by virtue of this act, or enter into agreements with any province, municipality or person with respect thereto;

And then (b):

(b) pay all necessary administrative expenses incurred under the act and all necessary travelling and living expenses incurred by officials or employees in performance of their duty.

If we had been amending that part of the section perhaps my hon. friend would have been quite right to have said something about the officials that were being appointed. But we are not amending that section. Then as to power:

(2) no single project or scheme under this section involving an expenditure in excess of ten thousand dollars in any fiscal year shall be undertaken without the consent of the governor in council.

Now, the reason the words "governor in council" were put in at that time was the reason I gave a few moments ago. There are times when you can get to council more readily than you can wait for the matter to pass through the treasury board. So, at that time we did say that this could be done by simply taking it to council. All we are saying in this bill is that the amount of $10,000 is to be increased to $15,000 to conform to the Financial Administration Act which was passed in 1952, I believe, and which made it $15,000 instead of $10,000. Then, we are suggesting again that it go, as every other vote of the kind does, to the treasury board before it goes to council; that is the amendment which is made.

This amendment does not increase the powers of the minister or the powers of the minister plus council, because it was simply a matter of taking it to council in the days when it was decided we wanted to have this thing done rather than have to take the regular course through the treasury board. Now, this amendment sends it back through treasury board as is the procedure in connection with all other departmental affairs and it takes the same course as similar votes do. I submit again this is not giving extra powers to the Minister of Agriculture.

I should like to call to the attention of members the fact that all the arguments that were used this afternoon with regard to the danger of putting this authority under the Minister of Agriculture were used in 1936-37 when the act was being amended to make it read as it now reads. Everyone who spoke from the opposition side of the house objected to the Minister of Agriculture having these powers and said they would be misused or used for political purposes. All these arguments were used here this afternoon. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said he had no criticism to make of what had been done in the past; that this act had been one of the best measures for Saskatchewan that had ever been put through this house. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) said the same thing.

I must admit that the hon. member for Assiniboia did me the honour of not using some of the arguments used by some other hon. members. Perhaps he had them in his mind. What I want to impress upon this house is that all these things were said in 1936-37. They were all said again when this section, to which objection is now being taken, was put in; the same accusations were made. It was said authority was being given to the Minister of Agriculture which he should not have because he would misuse it. Members come along now and say those powers have not been misused; none of the authority the minister had before has been misused, either the general amount that was left to the minister to take care of or the $10,000 that was put into this act. When it was $5,000 elsewhere, it was $10,000 here, but that was left behind when it was made $15,000 for the other departments and for the other branches of the agriculture department. Now, it is being said that in so far as the

P.F.R.A. branch is concerned we are putting too much authority into the hands of the Minister of Agriculture and hon. members are afraid of what he is going to do in the future. I am prepared to say that, so long as I am Minister of Agriculture, I will be doing the same kind of things in the future as I have been doing in the past. The same kind of things as I have been doing in the past seem to have been very good except for a few appointments.

The act has developed and it has been doing things that have been more helpful to western Canada than anything that has been done under any other act. It may be pointed out that the position to which a past member of this house was appointed is not nearly as important as the title given to it by the hon. member for Prince Albert would suggest. This man is simply a field inspector. This fancy title, public relations officer, was taken out of a newspaper somewhere and submitted to the house this afternoon, and it makes it appear as though there were some special appointment to some special person. It is the same kind of appointment as I mentioned this afternoon which seven or eight other men in different parts of Saskatchewan have; two or three in Manitoba and two or three in Alberta have the same appointment. They are field inspectors. As the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said, in so far as the man in his area was concerned, in spite of the fact he had been the hon. member's political opponent, he was doing a good job and the hon. member had no objection to him.

The speech of the hon. member for Prince Albert makes me feel that probably I should regret the fact I have been in this house for 20 years and regret the fact that I was in the Saskatchewan legislature for 21 years before I came here. It seems to me, listening to that harangue, to be a disgrace for anyone to have ever been in this house or the Saskatchewan legislature and then get a job from anybody, particularly the government. If that is the attitude we are going to take towards men who have served their country as members of a legislature or members of the House of Commons, then I rather resent it. I can understand when my friend asks questions about Dr. Thomson, who had submitted a resignation which was not accepted. He carried on, and I can understand a question about that. At the same time I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that question has been discussed two or three times in this house already and I am quite sure it is going to be discussed when my estimates are before the committee. Since it is going to be discussed on another occasion, I am not going to break the rules by discussing it tonight. The question is one which can be dealt with at the proper time and in the proper manner.

I should like to emphasize the fact that this act has been on the statute books now since 1936-37. It has been utilized for all the different purposes for which it was set up. No one either on this side of the house or on the other side of the house or in the Saskatchewan legislature has ever suggested that one dollar of money has been misspent in the operation of this act or that there is likely to be a dollar misspent with the present set-up of personnel. Such a suggestion has never been made in any campaign that has been fought in the intervening years. I should like to say that, while it is not my suggestion that this bill be brought before the house, I have no objection to it. It would not have been my suggestion that we take away the discretion I now have to buy a piece of land in a hurry which we are going to flood with water, when we did not want to wait for a month or two to do the flooding in order to be sure we owned the land and not have to pay damages. It has been thought wise to have this kind of legislation with regard to other departments, and I have no objection to its being applied to this department and particularly P.F.R.A.

We have got along to the point where we can deal with these situations much more effectively than we were able to deal with them 15 or 16 years ago. We have had sufficient experience to make it possible for us to deal with them without this legislation. There is nothing in it which prevents us from going on with the general activities of P.F.R.A., and that is the question which concerned the hon. member for Assiniboia. We can go on just as we have. If we had any intention of cutting out the work which was being done we would not only have dealt with this one section and taken away two other sections which are not necessary to the carrying out of the act, but we would have taken away the effective sections which I just read. I would suggest we have the second reading of the bill, and go on to pass it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Limitation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps the minister can tell the committee how many projects were undertaken during last year in which the amount spent was over $10,000.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not in a position to be able to tell the hon. member exactly the number put through in the last year which cost that amount. I hold in my hand the report for the year 1953-54 which of course is available to all hon. members. It has the total amount in it. I could look through it and give the information if it is necessary.

Mr. Charlton: I understood the minister to say he did not have the information to answer the question.

Mr. Gardiner: I have it in the report, but I understand the rules of the house prevent the asking of questions of that kind when the answers are in print, and it is not usual to read them off here.

Mr. Charlton: I do not believe they are in the report. I have looked through the blue book of government expenditures and I do not know whether they are segregated or not. It is very difficult to get the information one wants. As I understand it, the amount of expenditures in the estimates this year is nearly $4 million. The minister said that when the bill was brought forward by the Bennett government in 1935 they allotted $4 million as a maximum. I point out to the minister that in those days $4 million was probably worth more than $8 million is today, so that probably they were more farsighted then than the minister gives them credit for when they were willing to spend $4 million a year and we are spending only $4 million a year at this time.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to ask the minister a question on this clause. In recent weeks demands have been made upon the services of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in connection with flooding on the prairies. I am wondering whether, under this clause, which authorizes the minister to contract for sums upwards of $15,000, the services demanded by the flooding conditions can be met? Specifically, has the P.F.R.A. been assuming responsibility for the diking or has the expenditure reverted to the provincial and municipal governments?

Mr. Gardiner: In so far as the engineering work is concerned, up until last year or the year before, it had been done at no cost to either the municipalities or the provinces in connection with any activities that were properly associated with P.F.R.A. But we insisted that in order to place the responsibility on whatever authority was undertaking the work being done, they should make application for the engineering work and, where application was made, it was definitely understood that we assumed no responsibility for doing the work. Under that arrangement we did make provision for engineering being done. But about a year and a half ago, or sometime during the year preceding last year, we had some difficulties owing to the fact they had greatly extended the irrigation activities in Alberta. When the St. Mary dam was constructed and water was made available from it, the province was then in a position to spend money in building up the area, putting in the ditches and canals for the spreading of that water over the area south and west of Medicine Hat. It was then decided that some of these engineering works would have to be paid for by the province concerned. Just how that decision will apply in connection with other works that are being spoken of now I am not in a position to say at the moment. They will be decided on their merits as we go along.

Mr. Dinsdale: I take it from that that in the case of emergency conditions resulting from flooding the services of P.F.R.A. engineers will be available and the matter of payment will be settled at a later date. Is that correct?

Mr. Gardiner: That is approximately correct. Of course there are certain works that we have had our P.F.R.A. engineers go over throughout the years. As a matter of fact there are not very many of the projects that are being talked about in connection with the recent flooding that we have not very definite information on and have had for a long time.

Mr. Trainor: I wonder if the minister would take advantage of this occasion to answer a question which I put to him a few days ago. In a report several years ago the P.F.R.A. authorities made a definite recommendation as to flood control on the Assiniboine river in Manitoba. Can the minister state whether or not the government intends to implement that report? As the minister no doubt knows, flood conditions this year have been particularly bad on the Assiniboine river. While they have occurred almost perennially for a number of years past they were particularly bad this year. Would the minister be good enough to reply as to the implementation of this report, because Manitoba would be glad to have his answer.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, at this point I should like to question whether or not I am supposed to discuss all expenditures made under P.F.R.A. on this amendment. They would be properly discussed when my estimates are before the committee and those estimates will be coming up as soon as this bill is passed and we are allowed to go into committee of supply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have there been any diking or drainage projects under P.F.R.A. undertaken in 1953 or 1954, and have such projects in the past come within the ambit of this limitation of $10,000, now being increased to $15,000? Have there been any contracts in respect to which the increase is now asked?

Mr. Gardiner: No, there has been no case of drainage under P.F.R.A. as far as I can recall. We are not responsible for drainage which is carried on by the provinces. There has been no drainage work that I can recall at the moment. There might have been occasional places where a certain amount of drainage had to be done in establishing dams to hold supplies of water, but there has been no drainage done as such.

The nearest approach to drainage which has been done, and which I think most people have in mind when they bring drainage up, is that in the Dauphin area. That was not done under this act; it was done under the special vote put through for this purpose and largely because the claim was made that the water came out of a national park, being supplied with water from snow piled up there in the wintertime. That water was alleged to have flooded farms in the spring and the work was done under a special vote.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is clear that at no time has there been any project for drainage or diking under the P.F.R.A.?

Mr. Gardiner: I probably should not go so far as to say that there has been no diking done because when you are putting in an irrigation work some diking may be required, such as at Eastend where there was an overflow of water.

Mr. Charlton: In connection with the minister not wanting to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, may I say that I think we would be perfectly within our rights to ask for an explanation of any contract not costing over $10,000. This particular clause reads:

> No single project or scheme under this section involving an expenditure in excess of fifteen thousand dollars in any fiscal year shall be undertaken without the consent of the treasury board.

I submit that we should have a list of all those contracts. If the minister cannot give them to us now—

Mr. Gardiner: I can send this one over to my hon. friend and then I can have another one sent in in a few minutes to every member of the committee.

Mr. Charlton: I am afraid that that would be rather delaying things if we were to do that at the moment. However, I think the minister should prepare a list of all contracts of less than $10,000. The minister is now asking that he be given the privilege of making contracts up to $15,000 instead of $10,000. How many contracts would there be? How important is it that the minister should have this right to spend another $5,000 on every contract. For instance, say a contract was for $60,000: the minister could split it up into four contracts of $15,000 rather than one for $60,000.

Mr. Gardiner: How far back does the hon. member want me to go?

Mr. Charlton: Probably five years. We should have all contracts under $10,000 which the minister has had the privilege of giving out under the P.F.R.A. I want to make the statement that I am not criticizing the actual workings of the P.F.R.A. but I am criticizing the minister's right to give contracts up to $15,000. That is why we voted against the second reading. I do not think it is necessary or desirable. It will only be placing the minister in an embarrassing position inasmuch as he may be criticized for giving out these contracts on his own.

This afternoon the minister said he was losing a lot of privileges by the deletion of sections 10 and 11 of the act, but I do not think he is losing anything in comparison with what is being given to him by way of an increase in this contract limit. All he has to do is get the Department of Transport to purchase the land. As far as section No. 11 is concerned, with contracts up to $15,000 I do not think he will need to worry about renting machinery because he can get plenty of it at that rate. Will the minister give us a list or at least some examples of the contracts.

Mr. Gardiner: I think I would be breaking the rule. If the chairman is going to permit me to give them, I suppose I had better do so. I do not think it is within the rules nor do I think the committee should expect to have them read to it. I think asking me to do so is an effort to kill time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charlton: Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gardiner: That is very obvious. There is something else coming up which the opposition thinks should not come up.

Mr. Charlton: On a question of privilege, the minister has accused us of wasting time. I want to say again what I said this afternoon—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the Minister of Agriculture has just imputed improper motives in connection with the discussion which is taking place and I ask for the immediate withdrawal.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member had risen on a matter of personal privilege, and I think we should hear him.

Mr. Charlton: It was on a matter of personal privilege. The minister has accused us of trying to delay the house and wasting time. Mr. Chairman, the matter I brought up today was—

Mr. Gardiner: He knows what to say. The Leader of the Opposition does not need to tell him.

Mr. Charlton:—with regard to the matter of bringing up the agriculture estimates and these three agriculture bills before the house at the same time as the agriculture committee is meeting. The minister says we are wasting time. I think we can counter with the fact that the house leader, and probably the Minister of Agriculture, has been juggling the debates in order—

The Deputy Chairman: I made a point of making it possible for the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand to complete his point of personal privilege, because I thought he was entitled to do so under the circumstances. He will permit me to say that he should state his personal privilege and not raise another point. I am of the opinion that any accusation of deliberately killing time or wasting the time of the house is unparliamentary and should not be allowed to remain on the record. I find myself in a slight difficulty because what I understood the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand to say was that the minister had said this was a waste of time. I believe that all sides of the house have said that a good many things are a waste of time. Anything that we do not approve of may be from our point of view a waste of time, and I would not like to leave the impression that it is unparliamentary to say that something is a waste of time. But if the Minister of Agriculture was making the statement that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand was making a speech solely for the purpose of wasting time, then I am afraid it does not come within citation 257 of Beauchesne's famous third edition, which states:

> It is not out of order to say that a member has obstructed the business of the house, or that a speech is an abuse of the rules of the house.

But if he were deliberately making a speech for the purpose of obstructing, not that his speech itself was in some person's opinion a waste of time but that it was done for the deliberate purpose of wasting time, then of course the right hon. Minister of Agriculture will have to remove that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege, and I wish to state the privilege quite clearly. The right hon. minister said that these speeches were being made for the purpose of delaying because something was coming up with which we did not wish to deal tonight. Mr. Chairman, the next thing to come up is the Customs Act, and we are ready to proceed with that, and I hope there will be no delay in proceeding with that. So no speech is being made on our side that has any purpose of delaying the proceedings of this house, because there is no reluctance on our part to deal with the next business. In fact we are most anxious to proceed with the Customs Act just as soon as possible.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, what I actually did say was that my hon. friend was asking me to read a list of expenditures on contracts for $10,000 or under, and that in asking me to do that he was asking me to waste the time of the house, and I did not intend to do that unless I am ordered to do it by the Chair. If I am ordered to do it, I shall read them.

Mr. Fleming: Pretty smooth.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair is willing to hear the right hon. Minister of Agriculture. The house knows that the Chair cannot order any member to answer any questions or to make a speech on any subject. Since the question has been raised, I would express the opinion quite definitely that where a section of the act is for the purpose of raising certain requirements from contracts in excess of $10,000 to contracts in excess of $15,000, information as to such contracts let in recent years is in my opinion certainly pertinent to the question. But I am not ordering any member of the house to make any statement in the house.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I am not asking the minister to read all the contracts under $10,000 for the last five years. But I do say he should give us some good examples and give some justification for raising this from $10,000 to $15,000.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no reason to be found in any examples anywhere as to why this is being asked for. In the first place it was asked for by the government as a whole because a provision had been put through under the Financial Administration Act. It is all stated here. No one needs to ask any questions about it. A bill was put through known as the Financial Administration Act, put through by this house, that amounts up to $15,000 could be put through in that manner. All this bill does is make it possible to do the same thing under the P.F.R.A. The hon. member for Prince Albert has pointed out, since we came back after the recess, that the bill does makes provision for the Department of Agriculture—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The act.

Mr. Gardiner: The act makes provision for the Department of Agriculture but it does not make provision for P.F.R.A. This bill provides for P.F.R.A., so that everything that applies to other departments will apply to P.F.R.A. The only change from what it was before, when it said $10,000, is that it now says $15,000, and that before as minister I had to refer it to council. Now, in accordance with what is done in other departments, I must refer it to treasury board. The only reason why it previously went to council was that under certain circumstances it could be put through in a shorter time, when it came direct to council rather than going through treasury board. There were delays with treasury board for a few weeks in summertime when many members of the government were away from here, and then that could be taken to a council of four or more members and passed upon. As it is now, I shall not be able to do that. That is the only restriction that there is in it. It does not enlarge the authority I have; it reduces it. Under the two sections that are being taken out, I had authorities which I no longer have.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, the minister does not have to go to council or treasury board for anything under $15,000—

Mr. Gardiner: Everything that goes to treasury board has to go to the council.

Mr. Charlton: Before you said that you had to go to council, that everything had to go to council. Now under this bill you do not have to go to either for any amount under $15,000.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, anything over $15,000.

Mr. Charlton: That is what I just said, and the minister contradicted me.

Mr. Gardiner: I said that going to the treasury board takes longer and restricts me more in my actions than going to council direct, no matter what the amount is.

Mr. Charlton: I still submit that the minister does not have to go to either the governor in council or treasury board now with a contract less than $15,000, while previously he had to go to the governor in council for any contract over $5,000.

An hon. Member: Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. Charlton: No, over $5,000 in some cases, and to the treasury board for a contract over $10,000. Now he does not go to either for anything less than $15,000. It is certainly not restricting in any way.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, apparently somebody is trying to curtail the minister's power, or at least slow him up a little. The minister says he has to go to the treasury board, and he used to go to the governor in council. Would the minister tell us how many contracts during the last year were required to be placed by him before the governor in council? That would simplify it. He would not have to read a large list but just tell us how many were over $10,000.

Mr. Gardiner: There is nothing on record here that would indicate that, or on any record you would find anywhere. I would have to go back and check on every council meeting that had been held and find out that I took a particular amount to council. That would make a delay of some time, but I could get that by the time my estimates are here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has been saying it is in the report but it is not.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the minister has not submitted a single reason of any kind for this increase. He can do that only by giving us examples of what has been taking place of the sort of thing that would require an extension of this power.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. gentleman assumes that the Minister of Agriculture has been doing something that the government does not agree with—

Mr. Drew: I said no such thing.

Mr. Gardiner: —and has brought in a bill to remove the powers he has. No such thing has happened at all. There could not be any other reason for what he has just stated but that. That is the only one there could be. In other words, he is trying to find out what it was that the minister took to cabinet and asked cabinet to pass that made them bring in this bill to cut down his authority.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I would hope that at least the minister would deal with what I said. I cannot expect him for five minutes to keep to any relation to accuracy but I would have hoped that when he rose immediately after I spoke, he would at least deal with what I said. What I said was this, and I repeat it. I said that the minister had not given evidence of any kind to show any reason why there should be this extension. Before this extension is granted I would have hoped that even those on his own side would have suggested the advisability of examples being given of the kind of thing that calls for this extension. Not a single thing has been given. I do not expect to get any information about what took place in the cabinet. After all, I am not accustomed to that kind of thing. I am not accustomed to the kind of situation or the kind of course the minister follows where he talks in Saskatchewan about what the government is going to do and then we find out from the rest of the government that they have never decided any such thing. I was not talking about the cabinet. I was talking about what this minister can place before us as evidence to support the claim for an extension of his powers.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, by what the hon. gentleman has now said I am convinced that he has a great deal more experience in that kind of thing than I have ever had. I have read a great deal about it in the past years but I am not going to recite it here on this occasion.

Mr. Drew: Just stick with what you are asked.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member has had given to him three or four times the only reason for it. The reason is given on the sheet. Take it and read it. The sheet says:

> The purpose of the change is to make the act consistent with the existing ministerial authority to enter into contracts for sums up to $15,000, as contained in the Financial Administration Act and regulations.

That is the only reason it is in there. There is no other reason that can be given; and I am not going to manufacture one for the pleasure of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: I was not suggesting that the minister manufacture one. Perhaps he could tell us whether Mr. Dewar needs an extension of his power to deal with this matter.

Mr. Gardiner: I might tell the Leader of the Opposition that his seatmate just across the aisle, at the time that Mr. Dewar left this house, said to him that he was the most courageous man he had ever known in his lifetime to take action such as that which he took. I can prove that statement if it is necessary to do so. Then the hon. member rises on the floor of this house this afternoon and makes a long sing-song about this man getting a job. If he is the most courageous man that he had ever met, I am a little bit surprised that he did not give him a job himself. As to this matter of dragging in names of members who have sat in this house, I may say that there is a member sitting directly behind you who was not at all easy at the time that discussion regarding Dewar was going on in this house.

Mr. Drew: If we have not had anything else, Mr. Chairman, we have had a masterpiece of evasion because not one word that the minister has said has had any relationship at all to the matter before us. Will the minister not give as an example some single case that has arisen which calls for the extension of this power with regard to a department which is not operated on an exactly similar basis to the other departments? We are dealing now with P.F.R.A., not with a department of the government.

Mr. Gardiner: I have not a single reason to ask for it.

Mr. Drew: Then do not ask for it.

Mr. Gardiner: The time for my hon. friend to have been making the speech that he is now making was when the Financial Administration Act went through this house. I do not know whether or not he did so. I do not know whether or not I was here. But I do not recall any such speeches being made at that time. This bill says that I must do this. If the bill says that, or at least if the act says that, then of course this bill must come in. It was not a matter of whether I liked it or whether I did not like it. This Surplus Crown Assets Act says that any surplus crown property must be sold under the terms of this act and if any of the equipment of P.F.R.A. was sold in the interval since that act was passed under the authority given in this section, then it was sold illegally because that act says that notwithstanding anything that is in any other act, that is the way it must be sold. Then there is no reason for having this section in any longer and it is being taken out. The other one which is part of it and which is not in the same position just simply puts this department in the same position where it has to get land in the same way as any other department gets land. There is nothing unnatural about that. It is the ordinary thing that is done. Again I say there is only one reason for the bill being here and that is to bring us in conformity with the terms of the Financial Administration Act and regulations.

Mr. Drew: Then, Mr. Chairman, the situation can be summed up in this way. In the words of the minister, he has not a single reason why he wants this and now he wants us to pass it.

Mr. Gardiner: You cannot take that from what I said. It is as a result of a bill which makes me say I have got to have it.

Mr. Fleming: That is utterly fantastic.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Drew: No. I submit that the minister must at least say he needs this section before the house passes the section as it is before us. He either needs it or he does not need it. He has just told us there is not a single reason why he wants it.

Mr. Gardiner: Just as the hon. member pointed out a few minutes ago, when I am out in Saskatchewan I have no right or no reason to disagree with anything that this government does. I cannot do so as long as I stay in it. The government wants this act in order to conform with all the other acts under which we spend money, whether I have any reasons or not. It is not a big enough question even to be taking as much time as we are taking here tonight to talk about it, no matter how long we talk, even if we go to ten o'clock, so that my hon. friend does not have to do some of the things he does not want to do tonight.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I demand that the minister withdraw that remark. The remark implies that there is an improper motive in the discussion that is taking place. I have already pointed out that this is contrary to the rules and also contrary to the facts because we are ready to proceed with the Customs Act which has been announced as coming after this legislation. But we also have a right to discuss this particular act. I ask that the minister withdraw the suggestion that discussion of this act is for the improper purpose of delaying other proceedings.

The Deputy Chairman: In the remarks which I have just heard the Minister of Agriculture make I cannot agree with the Leader of the Opposition that there was any assumption or insinuation which could be ruled as unparliamentary. Perhaps I might be permitted to say that in the warmth of debate on both sides of the house nobody is being deliberately complimentary to his opponents. But I cannot rule that the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture come in the class of unparliamentary remarks.

Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VALUATIONS, DRAWBACK APPEALS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 410, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. Fleming: I presume the minister is going to make a statement.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, in order to meet the convenience of the house at this time I shall proceed with the second reading of this Bill 410, to amend the Customs Act. I am sorry that there has been a misunderstanding and perhaps I am somewhat to blame for that. It was not brought to my attention until this morning that we intended to proceed with this bill. During the years I have been in this house it has been customary to have the top officials of the department here, and especially when we go into the committee stage. I quite understand that at this point discussion should deal with the principle of the bill.

This is a simple bill and the essential purpose of it is to clarify and bring up to date certain sections of the Customs Act. Under the present law vehicles are required to report to customs when conveying dutiable goods. As the house is aware, the Department of National Revenue customs and excise division is now charged with the administration of other regulations, such as those involving the health of animals, insect infestations, diseases of plants, and so on. In addition, the departments of immigration and health are also concerned that everyone crossing the border should report. I believe that is normal procedure.

The only difference under this amendment is that, whereas only a person crossing the border with dutiable goods had to report, now all persons who cross the border have to report to the nearest customs official. He may report there for matters having to do with immigration because immigration officials at border points are usually in the same offices as the customs officials. It may be that such persons would be bringing animals across the border, and under certain regulations which we administer those animals have to be examined and passed. The same situation holds true in connection with certain health regulations.

Under another section of the bill we propose also to amend the valuation sections in order to clarify and confirm our present principles of valuation. It is proposed to limit the period for appeals against the original appraisal.

A third section has to do with the powers of the tariff board. The tariff board will be empowered to hear appeals from departmental rulings affecting export as well as domestic drawbacks. This particular provision has been introduced in order to give the appellant what might be called a fairer chance with reference to matters which he might want to bring to the attention of the board, over and above the customs officials. At the present time, if goods are diverted from the use for which entry was gained at a lesser rate of duty, we can only make a demand for the proper duty from the person found in possession of the goods. It seems desirable to hold the original importer responsible in cases of this kind. Very often we have found that an importer will bring into the country goods on which duty has been paid and then it appears that the valuation of the goods has been changed. In the meantime, he has disposed of the goods to some person and we can only hold that second or third person responsible for the duty. We feel it would be better administration to hold the original importer responsible.

At the present time a lien holder has only 30 days from the date of seizure to apply for a judicial order declaring his interest in the goods or vehicle so seized. It is proposed to extend this time to 60 days. We believe that is a right which should be given to the lien holder, so the period for this declaration will be extended from 30 days to 60 days.

I do not know that there are many other principles involved in the bill that we are considering. What has struck me about the explanations my officials have given with reference to the valuation for duty purposes is that they are based mostly on the value in the country of export under comparable conditions. Very often present trade practices make it impossible to find comparable conditions in the country of export. For instance, let me give you an example without mentioning any names at all. A company doing business in Canada may have their manufacturing plant in the United States, and may take the full output of that particular factory. The factory does not sell to other people in the United States. In that instance, there are not comparable conditions of sale. We feel that the departmental appraisers should have the authority to appraise those goods and apply the rates of duty that are applicable. That is just one of the instances.

I feel that the most important section in the bill is section 35 which has to do with the valuation for duty purposes. Hon. members will recall that a year or two ago we made an amendment to the Customs Act when the matter of dumping duty was brought up. Since that time we have had about 20 appraisers appointed in the different countries. By reason of having these appraisers, we have been able to get better valuations of the goods exported to this country. We have one appraiser in Japan, one in Poland and one in Czechoslovakia. Recently Czechoslovakia was anxious to export goods to Canada. We thought we could not accept their valuation unless an official of our department had access to their cost sheets and to their invoices which they sent out. They have agreed to that and we now have an appraiser in Czechoslovakia. I believe there are about 15 such appraisers in the United States.

Mr. Macdonnell: And none in the United Kingdom?

Mr. McCann: Oh yes, we have had them there. These appraisers I mentioned are in addition to the ones we had a year or two ago when the Customs Act was amended. We have them, of course, in the countries with whom we are trading all the time. We have officials in the United Kingdom, in France and these different countries with whom we have agreements, countries that are extensive exporters to Canada.

As a result of having appraisers in the United States we have been able to establish certain duties. Hon. members will recall that in the debate that took place when the act was amended it was held by some that there was a lot of dumping into this country and there was what was called depressed and end-of-the-line selling. In order to cure that, we had our appraisers take valuations. The manufacturers concerned have given them the freest access to the information. We have had them take valuation of the lines of goods that were coming into this country about which complaints were received, principally textiles. I think perhaps the complaints were the result of the depression of the textile business in Canada, which I might point out was world-wide and obtained in many other places. It was because of these complaints that our efforts were put forth in connection with textiles, frigidaires and certain electrical goods. As a result of that, where there was what was called depressed selling and end-of-the-line selling we went back over these invoices and took the prices at which the majority of the goods were sold. We had the right to go back over the average prices for a period of six or nine months, or a year—I am not sure of the exact time at the moment.

Mr. Fleming: Six months.

Mr. McCann: Yes, I believe that is right—six months. Had I the data here I could show thousands upon thousands of invoices, the information from which enabled us—and we did—to put on a price on what might be called end-of-the-line of fire sale or distress goods. We found that the prices at which those goods were entered into Canada were equal to or above the prices charged in the country of export in the days of their earlier and larger sales.

Mr. Fleming: Is the government satisfied that the present bill conforms with the provisions of GATT?

Mr. McCann: I am told by my officials that it does. When we come to that section hon. members will see a number of alternative methods by which we get at the valuation. However, we will discuss them in more detail when we get to them.

If we keep in mind the fact that these are values for duty purposes, then we will have a clearer understanding of why you cannot lay down in one rule or one paragraph what shall be the value for duty. Because there are circumstances affecting the situation that do not apply to all types of goods. My opinion, after studying the matter as carefully as I can, is that you cannot have one yardstick which will meet all conditions. And if the first yardstick is not right you have to use another one, and perhaps another one, until you get what you think is a fair market value in the country of export.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in a bill of this kind which lumps together a number of amendments to an existing statute, many of which amendments are not related to one another, it is not altogether easy to discern or isolate the principle of the bill. In a bill of this kind there are about as many principles as there are clauses.

However, after hearing the statement made by the minister I suppose the first question arising in the minds of hon. members would be this: Why, in view of the indicated importance of the matters the bill contains, has it been delayed to this date? We have reached the late stages, we understand, of this session, and we are dealing with a bill which concerns matters all of which have been in existence for some considerable time. There was no mention of the bill in the speech from the throne. Its timing, to say the least, strikes one as being interesting.

There have been those of us in the house who have throughout this session been drawing to the attention of the government, as we did in preceding sessions, the fact that Canadian workmen have been losing their jobs as a result of the dumping in this country of goods that were being grossly undervalued for duty purposes, thereby creating a situation in which Canadian workmen were being called upon to compete against the prices of imported goods on an altogether unfair and unrealistic basis.

Now, no new situation has suddenly arisen in recent days to account for the introduction of this bill at the present time. It is a very important matter, Mr. Speaker. The only conclusion one can reach from the timing of the bill is that the government has been compelled at last to move, even at a limited pace, in the direction of meeting an existing threat.

It is not my purpose to attempt a detailed review of what the bill purports to do. There will be opportunity of course to do that in greater detail at the committee stage of the bill. But, sir, the minister has reviewed sections and has singled out one in particular. I am sure there will be no quarrel in any part of the house with those provisions of the bill which enlarge the right given to persons under the bill to seek relief from seizure or to seek to assert their right in regard to appraisals that are made. So far as the enlargement of the time or the clarification of the rights of appeal are concerned, of course the legislation will be approved.

But, sir, the minister had singled out as the most important provision in the bill the one relating to the amendment of section 85 of the act, pertaining to valuation for duty purposes. This provision will recall to the minds of members the rather stirring debates held in this chamber in December of 1953, at which time subsection 6 was added to section 35 of the Customs Act. That is the provision to which the minister has referred, which gave rise to a new power on the part of the minister to set a special value for customs purposes of goods that were to be brought in on an end-of-line or end-of-season basis.

Hon. members will not need to be reminded that in the course of the debate on that measure, the famous Bill No. 29, we in this part of the house said that the measure was inadequate for the purposes the government had stated. The result of some days' discussion was to make it abundantly clear it is almost impossible to discuss a subject pertaining to trade or the strengthening of anti-dumping provisions of our existing legislation, even when the bill is introduced by the government, without many hon. members in other parts of the house attempting to bring in some old shibboleths and some old and very base and unwarranted accusations in regard to the position of parties on the subject of trade restrictions.

Sir, let me remind the house that it was the government that then asked the house to strengthen its hands and give it new powers to set special arbitrary valuations on goods imported into Canada. That power was sought by the government for the purpose of dealing with an existing dumping threat. Let us look back to the words of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that he used in introducing the bill on December 7, 1953, when, as reported at page 673 of Hansard, he said, referring to section 35:

> It has been found in practice that the section as it is now worded has not been fully adequate to deal with certain practices which in fact constitute a special kind of dumping.

And later, at page 674, he said:

> The importation of such goods into Canada at abnormally low prices may cause injury to Canadian industry which is not in any real sense related to its relative efficiency or productivity. The government believes that this situation needs to be corrected, and to this end is proposing an amendment to the Customs Act.

That amendment, Mr. Speaker, added this new provision, to which I have made reference, to section 35 of the Customs Act. But let it be clearly remembered, sir, that the purpose of this addition to section 35 of the Customs Act was to give the government additional powers to grapple with the problems of dumping of foreign goods in Canada, and particularly United States goods, as we were told at an early stage of the discussion, under conditions that Canadian workmen could not fairly be called upon to meet.

We said that the measure was not adequate for the purpose that the government stated it had in mind. We have waited, sir, for a year and a half for our vindication, and we see our vindication here in this chamber tonight, because the government is back asking the house to replace section 35 with a very different kind of section, a provision that is intended again to strengthen the hands of the government to deal with the problem of dumping as well as the problem of setting valuations on goods that do not come strictly within the scope of the dumping definition, but are required to have special values set upon them for duty purposes. Yes, the government is coming back to eke out what was left lacking in December, 1953.

Just as we told them at that time, their provisions were inadequate for the purpose that they stated was necessary and to meet the need that was clearly known to the house at that time, and now they come back and ask the house to strengthen their hands to meet these problems. These are the threats to Canadian workmen; these are the threats to employment in Canada. We have seen what these threats have done in the field of textiles, in the field of electric goods and in others, and now the government is back. A year and a half have gone. Many a job no doubt has been lost in the meantime. Now the government, after prodding from the opposition, has asked to add what was left lacking in the face of our warnings in December, 1953.

Well, sir, there will be fuller opportunity to discuss the type of amendment that is now put before the house in this bill when we come to the detailed review in committee stage. But, sir, I hope that hon. members in this house who sought in December, 1953, to picture Her Majesty's loyal opposition as raising the old tariff cry will find in this measure tonight directed at them a rebuke coming from the government, because the government is saying to the house now and saying to its own supporters in this house that it needs more powers to grapple with dumping in Canada and to meet what is lacking today in the government's powers to establish special and arbitrary values for duty purposes.

Now, sir, one would like to know just why the government has waited so long, why the government had to be prodded and pushed into taking measures of this kind. Sir, the minister talks about the difficulties in relation to comparable conditions and a definition of what are comparable conditions. Sir, all these difficulties have existed for years. These are not new expressions in our legislation, and they certainly are not new expressions within the last year and a half. These are expressions that have been embedded in this section for years. Why then does the government suddenly discover now that there are difficulties in determining and defining comparable conditions?

Sir, I think the house will have some questions for which it will need an answer at the hands of the government. Here are some that occur to me. Is there dumping in Canada today? Sir, if there is no dumping in Canada today, or if the provisions of our customs legislation are adequate today in the matter of empowering the government to establish special values for duty purposes, then why is this legislation introduced? No; there can be only one conclusion, sir, namely, that the legislation is inadequate and it has been inadequate to prevent dumping, and that dumping is going on today, as we have told this house this long time past.

Then, sir, is that dumping going on today? By whom is it being done? From what countries are the goods being dumped into Canada? How long has this dumping been going on? How long have Canadian workmen been left at the mercy of inadequate legislation in respect of dumping, inadequate legislation in respect of the empowering of the government to establish special values for duty purposes? In what commodities is this dumping going on? How many Canadian workmen have lost their jobs as the result of this dumping, and why, sir, has the government delayed this long to ask the house to give it strengthened powers to grapple with the threats to the livelihood of Canadian workmen?

I asked the minister a question: is this legislation in keeping with the provisions of GATT? The minister answered in the affirmative. It is evident that the opinion of the Department of Justice is that the house is competent to pass this legislation within the provisions of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Sir, that recalls the changes made in this legislation in 1948. It will be remembered that in the legislation as it had existed up to that time there was provision in subsection 3 of section 35 that where neither the fair market value nor the equivalent of such value could be ascertained, the value for duty purposes should be determined to be not less than the actual cost of production of similar goods at the date of the shipment to Canada, plus a reasonable addition for administration, selling cost and profit. The Department of Justice was called upon to give an opinion, after the provisions of GATT came into effect, and they said that that provision in the Customs Act would have to give way in the face of article VI of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Article VI provided in part as follows:

> No anti-dumping shall be levied on any product of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party in excess of an amount equal to the margin of dumping under which such product is being imported. For the purpose of this article, the margin of dumping shall be understood to mean the amount by which the price of the product exported from one country to another

(a) is less than the comparable price, in the ordinary course of trade, for the like product when destined for consumption in the exporting country; or

(b) in the absence of such domestic price, is less than either

(i) the highest comparable price for the like product for export to any third country in the ordinary course of trade, or

(ii) the cost of production of the product in the country of origin plus a reasonable addition for selling cost and profit.

Apparently, it was the view of the law officers of the crown that section 35, as it then read, offended those provisions of article VI of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Then in 1948 the government asked the house to amend section 35 so that it might conform with the provisions of GATT. The house did write that amendment into section 35, and from that point on there was provision that only if:

neither the fair market value nor the equivalent of such value can be ascertained, the value for duty shall be the actual cost of production of similar goods at date of shipment to Canada, plus a reasonable addition for administration, selling cost and profit.

In the administration that has been given to that provision since, it has been taken as fundamental that the provisions cannot be applied in any case whatever unless it is impossible to determine the fair market value or the equivalent of such value in the country from which the goods are shipped.

We are now told that the new provisions embodied in Bill No. 410 conform with the provisions of GATT. I should like to know why we have had to wait seven long years since GATT came into effect before this step is taken to strengthen the amended provisions of section 35. The weakening of section 35 was carried out in 1948 and we have waited now for seven years before the government moves to put back a little of the strength into that section that was abstracted from it in 1948.

There is one final matter which I put in the form of a question. As I have suggested, we indicated our view in 1953 that the legislation now embodied in subsection 6 of section 35 would not be adequate for the purpose. Here is abundant proof, after another year and a half of delay, that our contention was correct and that it has been fully justified. Why does not the government admit frankly the error of a year and a half ago? I ask the minister to say, now that it has been found that the legislation was unsatisfactory in its form and effect and in the powers it gave to the government, why it has taken them so long to find that their legislation was unsatisfactory for this purpose.

We are dealing with something of considerable importance. I wish to emphasize again that no one has suggested that the house should follow a course not in keeping with the general agreement on tariffs and trade. It should not be necessary to make that statement, but in view of the way in which the house was invited to distort things that were said by members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in the debate in December, 1953, it apparently is necessary to make that statement.

We are now being asked to move in the direction of strengthening and clarifying the provisions of the Customs Act. Why have we waited so long? How much harm has been done in the meantime by permitting to continue on the statute books of this country legislation which was weaker than it ever needed to be even while still conforming not only with the letter but with the spirit of the general agreement on tariffs and trade?

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to talk on this bill tonight, but as the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) proceeded I began to wonder whether we were dealing with Bill No. 29 of last session. The question of tariffs is a most important and difficult one to handle, particularly in this country with our vast areas. We are a country small in numbers, but because of our great size, because of the large proportion of our export trade, trade is vital to us, and it is far more vital to western Canada than it is to eastern Canada.

At the present time this government is fighting a magnificent rearguard action in the field of international trade against the forces of trade restriction that the hon. member for Eglinton tonight is upholding as being—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I stated in my remarks that I hoped it would not be necessary and it should not be necessary to make the particular statement which I did at that time. I made it abundantly clear that there was no question here of tariffs or raising tariffs and that nobody was advocating that. I made it abundantly clear that everything that was being proposed, that everything that was being urged on our part, as it was in 1953, was in keeping with the letter and the spirit of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. I hope that there will be no distortion on the part of hon. members of this house, such as we have just noted by the hon. member. There is no justification, there is no warrant whatever for the kind of statement the hon. member has just made, and I hope he will be good enough to withdraw it.

Mr. Sinclair: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming: It is a question of the misrepresentation of something a member has said.

Mr. Weaver: Perhaps I could be excused for misunderstanding what the hon. member said, but it seemed to me that I heard him say that the government was being prodded and pushed into introducing legislation which—perhaps this is my confusion—was in a direction different from what we would like to see in western Canada. I say that the government is fighting a rearguard action against anything that would tend to restrict our trade. I am sorry if I said anything that would conflict with what the hon. member felt he had said. I was not thinking entirely in terms of what he was saying. I was viewing this from the larger horizon of a world that would like to throw aside restrictions and trade freely, but cannot because of misunderstanding, because of international difficulties which the great trading nation to our south is trying to overcome; and it is confusing to hear debate such as we heard on Bill No. 29. It is also pretty hard to tell sometimes whether the hon. members who are speaking are in favour of or against trade.

The administration of the great nation to our south are going a long way toward trying to remove restriction and we can see from this distance the difficulty they are having. We wish them well in that fight, and the reason we do that is that it is most important to us that they win that particular fight. We have to gain time and avoid the effects of restrictions, which almost approach insanity at times, which would take us back into something like what we had in the thirties. We have to keep away from restrictions, and if we can hold the line, as the government has been doing, we will eventually win through. It will not be by criticizing them for doing the job they are doing in keeping away from going back on the tariff road that has been travelled so often in the past.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a word which perhaps I might not have added if it were not for the statement, to me utterly amazing and astounding, made by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver), whom I have always regarded as one of the fairest men in the house until I heard what he said tonight. That shocked me more than I can easily say, because if anything has ever been made clear it was made clear by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that the last thing we were seeking was to restrict trade. All that this measure is doing, as has been pointed out on both sides of the house, is to try to make effective laws which are already on the statute books. But for the hon. member for Churchill to describe the government action as fighting a rearguard action against anything that would tend to restrict trade, that to me was a fantastic statement. As the hon. member for Eglinton has said, the government has come in here seeking to strengthen legislation which it brought in a year ago last December and which at that time we suggested had certain defects—I have the book open before me.

The hon. member for Eglinton was careful to ask the question as to whether what is now proposed was in accordance with GATT, which is seeking to keep the trade lanes open, so important to us in Canada, as we all agree. It is for this reason that I rise to object most strenuously to what the member has said. I do so because there are people of the baser sort up and down this country who will seek to represent what we are doing in that very way, but I never thought to hear it from the hon. member for Churchill. I hope that he will be frank enough to admit that he was wrong and to make it perfectly clear that he now understands the situation and that it is not the fantastic one he put before us a moment or two ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Duty to report.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt, I take it, that section 18 of the Customs Act does call for some amendment. It has been in effect in its present form for some time and undoubtedly there have been changes in conditions that may lend some colour to the apparent view of the government that every person arriving in Canada, whether on foot or otherwise, should go to the nearest custom-house. I wonder, however, if on examination it will not strike hon. members that, having regard to conditions in some parts of this country, these provisions that we are now invited to approve are much too severe and extreme. Behold, if you will, what we are asked to legislate. We are asked to say that every person arriving in Canada shall come to the nearest custom-house and, if he has, as presumably he has, a vehicle or luggage, he must before unloading or in any manner disposing thereof make a report in writing to the collector or proper officer at such custom-house or station of all goods in his charge or custody or in the vehicle and of the fittings, furnishings and appurtenances of the vehicle and any animals drawing it and their harness and tackle, and of the quantities and values of such goods, fittings, furnishings, appurtenances, and harness and tackle. Then, in the third place, he must then and there truly answer any questions put to him.

It may not mean any difference in the practice at the major ports of entry. This obviously is what is done at major ports of entry such as Fort Erie and Windsor. But take our far-flung border with the United States. For instance, take the residents of western Canada who do not enter by roads that bring them alongside customs offices or custom-houses, whose road of entry into Canada may leave them 25 miles from the next custom-house. Are we to be asked to legislate to make it a duty for those persons before they unload their vehicle, unharness the horses or stop the motor car, to proceed to that nearest custom-house, perhaps 25 miles away, and at that custom-house give the inventory of the goods in their charge or custody or in the vehicle, and the fittings, furnishings and appurtenances of the vehicle and the animals drawing it and their harness and tackle? That is the kind of extreme legislation we are invited to put into effect here.

I have enough respect for the saving common sense of members of this house to believe that they do not wish to legislate in extreme terms such as that. Legislation of this kind may be simple enough of application in places where the person entering Canada is entering at a major port of entry, where there are customs officers waiting for him and there is a custom-house he must pass before he enters. But surely that is a far cry from conditions along the borders of the maritimes, long distances along the borders in Quebec, and very long distances in the northern part of Ontario and all across the west of Canada. Is it sensible to say that a man entering Canada under those conditions, even if the custom-house is 25 miles away, may not stop? Even if his home may be within a mile of the border, he must go the full 25 miles before he can unharness the horse or before he can stop his car and must make a complete inventory and then go back the 25 miles.

Mr. Boisvert: It is a good piece of legislation.

Mr. Fleming: I am shocked to hear my hon. friend from Nicolet-Yamaska say that legislation in such a severe form as that is good. Let us understand what that means. My hon. friend says that in a case where the farmer is crossing the border and his farm is, let us say, within a mile or so of the border, he must drive 25 miles, whether in a horse and buggy or a motor car, to the custom-house before he stops, and he must there declare the full inventory of the vehicle and everything he has in it before he can then turn around and go back home, having done a round trip of 50 miles. Sir, between now and the next time this matter comes up, I suggest that it is worthy of further reflection and that some saving provision should be introduced to mitigate its rigours and curb its excesses, such as I have mentioned, which are bound to create severe hardship.

Mr. Macdonnell: We ask that some common sense be used.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member for Eglinton, as usual, puts everything in its worst light. There are hundreds of points of entry along the Canadian border, and that is what this refers to. Previous to this amendment, it was only required that persons should report at the nearest point of entry if they had dutiable goods. Now under the system which we have at the border points, there are many other acts which are administered there, for instance, the acts and regulations relating to immigration and health, health of animals, insect infestation and diseases of plants. I am sure that the hon. gentleman does not seriously suggest that anybody can enter this country at any place along the border and not report to somebody that he is coming into Canada.

It is in order to clarify it that this section has been put into the act. The present law requires vehicles to report only when conveying dutiable goods or when the vehicle itself is dutiable. I would suggest that modern methods of transportation are the principal reasons or one of the principal reasons why we put this into effect. If the hon. gentleman had to deal, as I do and as my administrative officers do, with all the running there is across the line with automobiles at points on back roads and bringing in smuggled goods and the like of that, he would be the first to suggest that this legislation should be changed whereby it would be an offence if these people did not report to the nearest customs point.

Mr. Fleming: The minister says "these people". Look at the way he puts it. The minister talks about this smuggling and he says it would be a mistake not to require these people to report. Everybody wants to catch smugglers.

Mr. McCann: No; any person.

Mr. Fleming: I put a case on the basis of the extreme provisions of this act.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has not dealt with that case. The amendment he is introducing requires that any person coming into Canada must report to the nearest custom-house or station.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: He must do that before he can stop.

Mr. McCann: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Fleming: Somebody says ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: As soon as we finish this debate in the committee of the whole we shall proceed with the supply motion.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

D.E.W. RADAR LINE—CONTACT WITH ESKIMOS

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I raised a subject that had been discussed in certain newspapers in the United States concerning the directive given in connection with fraternization between Eskimos and others from either Canada or the United States who may be working on the D.E.W. line. When I read the quotation from the New York Herald Tribune the minister indicated that he would take notice of the question I had raised. Then he closed his remarks in the first instance with these words:

> I might say immediately, however, that I do not agree with the quotation.

Mr. Speaker, I now learn that the quotation is from the agreement between Canada and the United States of America to govern the establishment of a distant early warning system in Canadian territory, which was effected by an exchange of notes with Washington on May 5 of this year, 1955. There were certain additional words not included in the—

Mr. Lesage: That is it.

Mr. Drew: In the quotation in the Tribune.

Mr. Lesage: That is why I did not agree.

Mr. Drew: The way the sentence actually read was as follows:

> All contact with Eskimos other than those whose employment on any aspect of the project is approved is to be avoided, except in cases of emergency.

The words used by the Tribune came out of the agreement itself, or the appendix to the agreement, and I submit they do raise a question of discrimination within our own country as between citizens who have the full rights of voters; and that should be a matter of concern to members of this house.

Mr. Lesage: I intend to make a statement on the matter when the orders of the day are called.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition raised a question concerning restrictions that have been placed upon contacts with the Eskimos by men engaged in the construction and operation of the distant early warning line. He referred particularly to a report in the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, May 29, attributed to Mr. Gerald Waring of the press gallery, which he quoted as saying that all contact with the Eskimos is to be avoided except in cases of emergency. I said yesterday I did not think I could agree with the quotation because according to my memory there was more to it than that. The Leader of the Opposition at the opening of the sitting agreed with me that the quotation was not complete.

Yesterday I dealt briefly with some of the considerations in this matter, and I undertook to take the question as notice and prepare a more detailed statement for today. With regard to my answer to this question the Leader of the Opposition said, as reported on page 4219 of Hansard of May 30:

> In preparing his reply I hope that it may be one which will explain what does appear to many writers in the United States to be a rather unusual restriction upon the ordinary friendly contacts of members of the United States forces who are in Canada.

Again this afternoon the Leader of the Opposition referred to this aspect of the question.

I wish to say first of all that the regulations in question are not directed at the United States forces only. They are directed at any and all people having to do with the D.E.W. line. Everybody knows that the eastern portion of that line is being built by a Canadian contractor, the Foundation Company of Canada, Limited. The western part is being built by Northern Construction Company Limited, which is also a Canadian contractor.

However, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that the restrictions which have been placed upon contacts may not be fully understood by many people in the United States. Might I draw his attention to the article to which he referred, in which we find a number of reasons why this agreement has been entered into. May I quote just two short extracts:

> "The Eskimos are in a primitive state of social development", the Canadian government said in its note to the state department. "It is important that these people be not subjected unduly to disruption of their hunting economy, exposure to diseases against which their immunity is often low, or other effects of the presence of white men which might be injurious to them.

D.E.W. Radar Line

As a matter of fact that is practically what I said yesterday. Another quotation:

> The government, which has a large scale program under way to broaden the base of the Eskimo economy and combat disease, is faced with medical evidence that the natives have little natural resistance to even relatively innocuous diseases of civilization.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered that in the area from Coppermine eastward the Eskimos have had very little contact with our way of life. They are not used to our ways or customs. They do not understand what money is or what wage employment is.

As to the character of the restrictions, I might point out that they do not go so far as the New York Herald Tribune suggested, that is to exclude "all contact...except in cases of emergency." The provision is that employment should be under terms and arrangements concurred in by the department of northern affairs, and that other contact is to be avoided except in cases of emergency.

Might I just add that by coincidence this matter was under discussion yesterday by a standing committee on Eskimo affairs at the very moment the Leader of the Opposition inquired concerning it. This is an advisory committee consisting of the deputy minister and officials of the department of northern affairs; the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; Bishop Marsh, the Anglican bishop of the Arctic; Bishop Trocellier, who is in charge of the Roman Catholic diocese of Mackenzie and who was yesterday represented by Father Laviolette of the Catholic Indian educational services; Mr. Chesshire, general manager of the fur department of the Hudson's Bay Company, and officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The committee, I am told, spent more than three hours on Eskimo problems arising out of the distant early warning line. They considered particularly the provisions with regard to employment and contact, and the representatives of both churches, of the Hudson's Bay Company and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the other government officials were in complete agreement as to the necessity for the restrictions and with their character and application.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that my question yesterday was directed to the articles I had seen, and I mentioned particularly one which quoted directly from the Canada-United States agreement. I would point out that the opening part of the section of the agreement which deals with Canadian Eskimos has this to say:

> It is important that these people be not subjected unduly to disruption of their hunting economy, exposure to diseases against which their immunity is often low, or other effects of the presence of white men which might be injurious to them.

If we have reached the point, Mr. Speaker, when we have to put an iron curtain around our own white men in our own country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —then there is indeed a problem with which we are called upon to deal. We have been proceeding for these past few years and, in fact, for generations, in the belief that the contact of the white man with primitive races in different parts of the world was to the advantage of those peoples. If in fact these requirements are necessary, then there is something to be done with regard to the white people just as much as with regard to the Eskimos.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can allow that statement to go without reply. I believe the policy of the government and the department is sound. It has been approved by people who have had a great deal of experience with the Eskimo population. If the Leader of the Opposition wishes to substitute his own judgment for that of all the advisers whom I have consulted, and is satisfied to do that, that is up to him.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —on a question of privilege, there was no introduction of my judgment into this matter. I was simply raising the point that these regulations impose restrictions regarding the association of white men with people who are described as a primitive race; and if this is to be the attitude of the government it is a strange attitude indeed, having regard to the extent to which we are trying to advance the interests of primitive races in every part of the world by contact with white men.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, as between the Eskimos and some white men, I would choose the Eskimos.

Mr. Drew: I agree with you.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PRICES FOR CROP YEAR BEGINNING AUGUST 1, 1955

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the government has approved initial prices paid by the Canadian wheat board on wheat, oats and barley for the crop year beginning August 1, 1955 at the same levels as during the present crop year.

The initial prices are as follows:

Wheat: $1.40 per bushel basis No. 1 Manitoba northern in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver.

Oats: 65 cents per bushel basis No. 2 Canada western in store Fort William or Port Arthur.

Barley: 96 cents per bushel basis No. 3 Canada western six-row in store Fort William or Port Arthur.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING OF GRADE SPREADS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of his most welcome announcement that the initial prices for grain will be maintained in the coming year. Can the minister say when grade spreads will be established, and whether they can be established in time to enable the elevator companies to issue cash tickets for grain at the beginning of the crop year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The spreads are established after the quality of the grain is known. I have never known spreads being established in time so the first deliveries to country elevators can be graded. The first shipments are graded approximately and an amount is held back to permit adjustment. I will ask that the greatest possible expedition be used to establish the spreads this year.

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—STATEMENT ON DECLARING OF EMERGENCY AND ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me the following question:

> I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Did he receive a communication from the directors of the Saskatchewan wheat pool on Friday asking for an immediate decision on the question of an emergency being declared in the flooded areas of Saskatchewan, and also requesting that some emergent assistance be given to the farmers in those areas? If so, what is the present position?

A telegram was received from the secretary of the Saskatchewan wheat pool dated May 24—not Friday but Tuesday—suggesting that in instances where seeding in Saskatchewan had been prevented this year because of flooding there is urgent need for some form of compensation on a scale which would require participation by the government of Canada. With the approval of the house I should like to table a copy of the telegram and of the acknowledgment that was made to these representations.

The present position is that on two occasions members of the federal government have met members of the Saskatchewan government who have provided information on the damage caused by the floods in that province, and the question of federal participation is now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table the documents referred to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I thank the Prime Minister, and I should like to ask him one question in that regard. In view of the serious emergency conditions under which 8,000 farmers on a million and a half acres will not be able to produce any crop this year, according to the estimate, is it possible for the Prime Minister to say whether or not early action will be taken?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, Mr. Speaker, all the data that have been placed before us are being considered, and we are having tabulations prepared. It is the intention of the government that the people of Saskatchewan be treated according to the same principles that were applied in former cases where there were disastrous results from events over which no one could have any control.

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO RECEIPT OF REPRESENTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Has the Prime Minister received representations with regard to flooding in Manitoba similar to the Saskatchewan representations and, if so, have any negotiations been carried on with officials of the Manitoba government?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, there is nothing I can add to the statement I made the other day. There was a request from the attorney general for assistance by the armed forces, which was complied with in the usual form, and there have been no other representations made to the government since that time.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO CONSUMERS BENEFITING BY REDUCED PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, or in his absence to the parliamentary assistant. Is the benefit of the reduced price on government butter now being supplied to the retail trade in Canada being passed on to the consumers?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been passed on to the consumers in the price they have to pay in Ontario, at any rate.

FOREST FIRES

NOVA SCOTIA—STATEMENT ON DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister report briefly to the house on his visit last week to the fire-ravaged areas of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Halifax for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question.

Severe forest fires swept through several areas of Nova Scotia a week ago and centred particularly in the Mount Uniacke, Timberlea, St. Margarets Bay, Bridgewater and Liverpool areas. At that time the damage to buildings was reported to be particularly heavy in the latter two regions. Some of the fires raged uncontrolled for several days. During this period we were in constant touch with the premier of Nova Scotia, local municipal officials and others, and learned that in addition to considerable woodland, about 80 buildings and some livestock were destroyed in Lunenburg and Queens counties. Fortunately no lives were lost.

On Friday last, thanks to my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney), I flew over the devastated areas in a Royal Canadian Navy helicopter and subsequently visited on the ground. I took the opportunity of extending to those who sustained losses the sympathy of the government and of the people of Canada generally. Some of the people to whom I spoke had lost the results of a lifetime of hard work. I also met with the relief committees.

What struck me most forcibly, in addition to the losses, were the heroic efforts of fire fighters who, through extraordinarily hard work, were able to keep the property loss from being vastly greater than it was, and the magnificent manner in which the people of the stricken areas have rallied to the support of those who have suffered. The Salvation Army, the Red Cross and radio station CKBW in particular have done outstandingly good work. Officials of the departments of fisheries and public works were in the fishing centres to render what assistance they could.

Campaigns are now under way to raise funds to re-establish those who have suffered losses, and particularly to provide fishermen and farmers with the tools of production so they can soon again produce and earn. The relief committees are working diligently at collecting funds and assisting where necessary in caring for those who have lost their homes. The response has been good, but more money is needed and the appeal is continuing.

ARCTIC REGIONS

REFERENCE TO REPORTED RUSSIAN ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Defence or to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister taken note of a reported statement by Captain O. C. S. Robertson of the Arctic exploration ship Labrador that the Soviet union is far wiser in the ways of the strategic Arctic than we are in the west, and that Soviet Arctic specialists are miles ahead of us?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I am not aware of the statement to which my hon. friend has referred, but I shall be glad to look at it.

Mr. Michener: It is in the Gazette of this morning.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REFERENCE TO CONDITION OF LOOKOUT SHELTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister and his department give consideration to having the remains of what used to be a covered shelter, standing in a most prominent place on parliament hill overlooking the river, either painted so it will look respectable, or replaced by something more suitable?

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: A national emergency.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I shall be glad to look into the matter.

CANALS

CHIGNECTO—REPORTED CONSTRUCTION BY ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. Am I correctly informed that the St. Lawrence seaway authority are giving active consideration to a proposal to construct the Chignecto canal?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the St. Lawrence seaway authority are contemplating such construction at this time.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VALUATIONS, DRAWBACK APPEALS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 410, to amend the Customs Act—Mr. McCann—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On section 1—Duty to report.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, last night I suggested that while section 18 of the Customs Act, having stood on the statute books for a long time, may now be in need of revision, in my opinion the legislation now before us has taken a very extreme form. I should like to ask the minister if, on further reflection, he has concluded that the legislation should take a less extreme form, and that it is not fair to place upon every person arriving in Canada, on foot or otherwise, the statutory duty to proceed to the nearest customs house regardless of whether it is near or far?

Does the minister think it proper that before a person travelling in a vehicle terminates his journey he should have to proceed to that customs house and there give to the officer in charge an inventory of all goods in his charge or custody? I am sure all members of the house want to see all the teeth put in this legislation that are reasonably required, but it is going a long way to put a statutory duty on everyone who enters Canada at any place—a place, for instance, which might be 25 miles from the nearest customs house—to proceed to that customs house before he may stop or go home or do anything else.

Customs Act

Mr. Houck: Before the minister answers the question, may I say something apropos of what the hon. member for Eglinton has said. Representing a border riding, naturally I am very anxious, as are other people along the border, about this clause in the bill. We are wondering, and I think it has come about through erroneous reports, whether or not everyone crossing the bridges will be forced to enter the customs yard and subject themselves to a thorough investigation by the customs officers.

Last year at the port of Niagara Falls alone we had 1,100,000 cars of both the permit and non-permit class, and at the Fort Erie port there were some 1,400,000 cars in these two classes. Many of these people have asked me, especially people from Buffalo who own summer places along the lake shore, if they would be required to go into the customs yard every time they crossed the border. I should like to point out to the minister that I am not a lawyer, for which I am very thankful, but a reading of the section would lead one to believe that every commuter or non-commuter will be obliged to enter the customs yard and subject himself to a thorough examination by the customs officer every time he crosses the border.

Up until a few years ago there was a shortage of officers on the United States side of the Peace bridge to examine the cars desiring to enter the United States. I have seen cars lined up for two miles because of the shortage of officers. If this bill means what I think it must, and what I hope it does not, it would cause not only a traffic hazard but a great deal of inconvenience to the commuters. I would be greatly relieved, and I believe the customs officers would be as well, if the minister would make a statement verifying the fact that there will be no change in procedure. Certainly the customs officers are the ambassadors of friendship, and are the first people our tourists meet. In view of the millions of dollars the tourists leave annually in Canada I believe we should do everything we can to ease their way into this great dominion. I hope the minister will give me some clarification of this bill so I can explain to the people what it actually means.

Mr. McCann: To set the minds of the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Niagara Falls at rest, I will say that there is no change, and no change is contemplated, in the procedure which has been followed for the last 40 or 50 years. I have crossed a lot of borders myself in Europe, and I know of no country where one would not have to report upon entering the country. There has been no change whatever in that. We are putting it into the law here, but the commuters will not suffer any inconvenience whatever.

As a rule what happens is that the first time one enters the country, say from Buffalo over to Fort Erie, he is given a sticker to put on his car. This sticker identifies him as he comes along and the customs and immigration officials at that point know the person and see that he is not held up for one minute.

We felt that at this time we should put it into law, and the purpose of the amendment is to require all vehicles arriving in Canada to report to customs in order to ensure the proper administration not only of the Customs Act but of all other acts which are enforced by customs officials. This includes, as I said yesterday, acts and regulations relating to immigration, health, the health of animals and so on. I do not believe this ought to call for much controversy. It is a practice of many years' standing that is being regularized now by law.

Mr. Macdonnell: I find the minister very difficult to follow. The hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Niagara Falls have pointed out the practical considerations. The hon. member for Eglinton pointed out that if we read this literally it seems to involve people, for instance, in the western country where there are many rural roads, in almost impossible inconvenience. When the minister says nothing is going to be altered, does he mean that in the situation so clearly described last night by the hon. member for Eglinton the people are just going to disregard the law?

After all, when the minister says there is going to be no change that means either one of two things. Either we are not reading this correctly, and I think that is not the case, or it is not going to be followed through. Let the minister take the case described by the hon. member for Eglinton last night and describe what happens and how this may be within the four corners of this section. I cannot see how it could be. Last night the hon. member for Eglinton described the case of a man coming across the border perhaps 20 miles from the nearest officer or reporting station, and outlined the possibility, if this section means what it seems to mean, of this man having a duty to take that journey of 20 miles there and 20 miles back before he has discharged his duty to the customs authorities. Now the minister says this is not going to change anything. If it is not going to change anything then this seems to me to mean nothing.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): This section under discussion reads as follows:

> Every person in charge of a vehicle arriving in Canada, other than a railway carriage, and every person arriving in Canada on foot or otherwise, shall
> (b) before unloading or in any manner disposing thereof, make a report in writing to the collector or proper officer at such custom-house—

I believe this has been the practice at every customs port in Canada as far back as I can remember. I fail to see any change there. I have some knowledge of water transportation and transportation by vehicle, and within my memory there has never been a time when the practice outlined in paragraph (b) has not been applied.

Mr. Macdonnell: Read paragraph (a).

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have read it, and I cannot see anything in (a) that would change the customs procedure in this country from what it has been for as far back as I can remember.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member for Charlotte is quite right. I want to read section 20 (1) in the Immigration Act:

> Every person, including Canadian citizens and persons with Canadian domicile, seeking to come into Canada shall first appear before an immigration officer at a port of entry or at such other place as may be designated by an immigration officer in charge, for examination as to whether he is or is not admissible to Canada or is a person who may come into Canada as of right.

We believe the same principle ought to apply with reference to customs ports. I doubt very much if there are any places, in any event not many places, where one would be so inconvenienced that he would have to travel 40 miles, as the hon. member for Eglinton suggests, to report to an office. The offices at which a person could report are much closer together than that. A man coming into Canada, no matter in what kind of vehicle, knows he has to report so does not go the long way around. He does not go along two sides of the triangle when he could go by a direct route that would bring him to a port where he could declare any goods he may have and at the same time declare to the immigration officers that he is entering Canada.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's earlier remarks were intended to be reassuring, but unfortunately his remarks seem to be at variance with the explanatory note in the bill. The explanatory note, after quoting the provisions of the present section 18, goes on to say:

> The purpose of the amendment is to require all persons to report.

I daresay if, as the minister says, there is to be no change in the method of enforcement, no change in procedure at the border, if it were accepted, that would allay some of the apprehension of hon. members in the face of the very extreme language of the new section. However, we then have the explanatory note which seems to be in keeping with the plain provisions of the new section, that the purpose of the amendment is to require all persons to report.

It is one thing to say there is no change contemplated in the procedure at the border. The hon. member for Niagara Falls, who lives closely with this problem, will want very definite assurance that it is not a matter left simply to the whim of the local customs officer. Here we are not dealing with language which says that any person entering Canada shall report if called upon to do so by a customs officer. This new section purports to lay upon him a duty to report, and it is not one that is enforceable simply at the whim of the officers.

I am still greatly troubled by the case I have put, where a man enters Canada by a route that is not close to one of the border points in common use, and which is not close to a customs house. If the minister is going to put a statutory duty on that man then there are going to be a great many unwitting law-breakers in this country, in the face of language that seems to me to be very extreme.

Mr. McCann: It is a legal requirement. I am afraid the hon. member thinks that if a man comes over the border into Canada he must immediately go to the customs office and declare. If it happens in the middle of the night and the nearest port is closed, we accept that man's entry at the earliest possible convenience for him, which would be the next day. So there is no inconvenience there. It is a legal requirement, and I think the hon. member for Niagara Falls will testify to the fact that this has worked out well both at Niagara Falls and at Fort Erie, two of the largest customs centres from the point of view of the number of people entering Canada.

We have had practically no complaint with reference to this requirement. As I say, it has been going on for years and years, and the change is that now it is put in the law. It was the law that if they had dutiable goods they must go and declare them. If this measure passes it will be the law that, whether or not they have dutiable goods, as early as is practicable and possible they will have to go to the nearest customs office and declare whether or not they have anything that is dutiable. They must do that anyway for immigration purposes. Therefore no extra inconvenience is thrown on them.

Mr. Fleming: If the position were as the minister has stated it we would not need to spend much time discussing it, because that would be reasonable. But unfortunately what the minister has said is not what is said by the language of the section. The minister has said that certain things can be done "as early as is practicable". He cites the case of the customs house being closed in the middle of the night. If it said "as early as practicable" that would be the saving provision; it would be the sensible thing and would take some of the sting out of the clause as I find it.

Unfortunately, however, the minister's interpretation of what the clause means is not what the clause says. Let us look at section 18 (b), which says:

> Every person in charge of a vehicle arriving in Canada, other than a railway carriage, and every person arriving in Canada on foot or otherwise, shall . . .
> (b) before unloading or in any manner disposing thereof, make a report in writing to the collector or proper officer at such custom-house or station of all goods in his charge or custody or in the vehicle and of the fittings, furnishings, and appurtenances of the vehicle—

And so on. There is no language there that says he is to do it as soon as is practicable. And there is nothing in paragraph (a) that says that when a customs house is closed it will be sufficient if he comes back and makes his report as soon as possible. On the contrary, the language of (a), the language of (b) and of (c) are all mandatory and unqualified. Let us look at 18 (a) which says, in effect, that if a person arrives in Canada he shall go to the customs house nearest to the point at which he arrived in Canada.

It is all very well when he is going to a customs house at a border point, where such customs house is located right at the point where he enters Canada. But there are many places where people enter Canada today where there are no customs houses located near the point where they are setting foot on Canadian soil.

I suggest the minister should look at the language and trim it down until it meets what he has said is the purpose of the legislation. He has pointed out that the person is to do what is practicable in the circumstances, and if that language were inserted it would meet the objections, the fears and the apprehensions in the minds of hon. members about the section as it stands. But it will take something more reasonable than the language now appearing in the clause to allay the fears and apprehensions in the minds of hon. members. Let the minister introduce words such as he mentioned in his explanation, words such as "as soon as practicable", and that will meet the objection raised.

Mr. McCann: Perhaps I should have said "reasonably convenient". I am thinking of a case where a man crosses the border at twelve o'clock at night. He has a tongue in his mouth and can ask, "Where is the nearest customs station?" "Well, there is one ten miles to the east", or it may be ten miles to the west. "I have to report there; is that place open?" "No, it will not be open until nine o'clock tomorrow morning." If he wishes, he can stay at an inn for that night and go in the morning to the customs house.

Can the hon. member suggest to me any other way in which we can keep track of people coming into this country and whether or not they are carrying dutiable goods, unless they are registered in some way? If they are coming in as immigrants they have to register. If they are coming in with dutiable goods or with a vehicle they must declare the fittings, furnishings and appurtenances of such vehicle. That refers of course to any extra tires and that sort of thing. We keep the closest touch we can with these people, and believe it would be in the best interests of the country to have them register at the nearest customs house.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister would introduce the words he used in his explanation it would meet the requirements of the situation. He used the words "as soon as practicable" and later the words "as soon as reasonable". Either of those expressions would meet the situation. But if we do not add words like that, then the legislation places upon every person a statutory duty that is unqualified, requiring him to go to the nearest customs point and report there before going anywhere else.

That is not reasonable. It may be simple where people are entering at important border points during the day, but it is quite unreasonable to lay an unqualified statutory duty upon people, as it is set out in the language of this section. Therefore I am asking the minister to make the section conform with the purpose he has described by introducing at line 9 the words "as soon as practicable", to meet the needs of the situation.

Mr. McCann: This is a statutory duty under the Immigration Act. I do not know how anything could be a greater invitation to people who wish to smuggle than to have the law provide that they would not have to report.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: It is not a question of having to report. It is a question of the circumstances under which they report. We are not talking about immigration; we are talking about the Customs Act. As I see it there is no difficulty in connection with persons who are entering as immigrants, because those people are entering at well established points and there are a number of other requirements they must fulfil. But you have many people entering this country in vehicles, crossing the border to and fro. Surely you are not going to put upon them a statutory duty in the language of this clause. If the minister will make the language of the clause conform with his statement of purpose, in which he was very careful to use the words "as soon as possible", he will meet the needs of the situation, but not otherwise.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, mention has been made of isolated places along the border. I believe it will be found that at these small border crossing points immigration inspectors are also customs inspectors. It is illegal for people to go from one country to another without getting in touch with an immigration inspector, and when you get in touch with him you are usually in touch with both, so far as the small crossing points are concerned.

Let me say in all sincerity that a great deal of discretion is used by customs officers, as is well known by the minister and his deputy. I should like to give one example in the locality from which I come. In that area there are a great many who are employed in boating and freighting across the border into the United States. They come back, and the department has always been more than helpful in every way in suggesting to the boatman that when it is convenient he should come to the customs office, but not to lose freight on account of doing so. That has applied as far back as I can remember and for long before that. When it is convenient for them to come to the customs office they do so. It is done at the discretion of the officers who know the local conditions. They are carrying out their work in a most efficient manner, and with satisfaction to all concerned.

So far as this regulation dealing with border crossings is concerned, I have every faith in the personnel at the border, and I hope they carry on exactly as they have in the past. I assure you that no Canadian coming back into Canada and no citizen of the United States going into that country can complain that at any border crossing point they have not been treated kindly. As I said before, I believe this bill confirms exactly what is taking place and what has taken place over a period of many years.

With respect to the change suggested by the hon. member for Eglinton, I still have a great deal more faith in the discretion of the officers, than I would have in any change in the wording of this act.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the situation is very clear, and the hon. member for Charlotte has made it very clear. We have got on extremely well because the officers at the border have been allowed to exercise their own discretion and ignore the law. Now, that does not—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a question of privilege, I did not say anything of the kind. I have never suggested that anyone should ignore the law. I said these things were done with the knowledge of the department. The particular practice I cited has gone on for 50 years or longer. The department is well aware of the fact, and it will go on for the next 50 years. I have every reason to believe that the officers in these particular localities, knowing local conditions, are in a much better position to take care of this situation than we are here, by making a change in the regulation.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sorry if the hon. member for Charlotte thought I was not fair in repeating what he said. I thought what he said was very sensible. I took down part of what he said. He described the attitude of the official in dealing with this matter. He said, "When it is convenient for you to come, come". That is good sense. That is obviously what has been happening, but it is not in accordance with this section. I submit, as my colleague the hon. member for Eglinton has submitted, that it would be very easy to make a change in the wording which would make what is now being done, and done, I think, with common sense, within the law.

I would imagine that some of these cases, particularly in the west and no doubt in New Brunswick, are in this position. You hardly know there is an international line. People are going back and forth constantly doing their business. In the community where you have an official present, that is one thing; but where you have, as the hon. member for Eglinton described it, wide open country where you may be many miles from an official of any kind, there you have a situation which is more difficult. The point is, do we want to leave a statute in such a condition that it just cannot be carried out? I suggest that is what we have now. I submit this ought to be changed.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask a question? Does the hon. member suggest that at these isolated places he has mentioned we should put the same regulations in effect in connection with immigration; that any person can come over the border, regardless of who he may be, and report to the immigration official under conditions such as have been outlined?

Mr. Macdonnell: Immigration is an entirely different thing.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Excuse me. At these isolated points the immigration officer and the customs officer are one and the same man.

Mr. Macdonnell: That to me is quite irrelevant. When an immigrant comes in it is an entirely different thing. It is an event of importance to him, a turning point in his life, you might say, and it is quite important to us. There must not be any too great easement there. As a matter of fact, if he is to be put to any inconvenience I would say to him, "All right; you are getting a great privilege for it". But here you have a situation where a man, in the ordinary course of his business, may be going back and forth every day. Incidentally, I should like to point out that the one notable change in the legislation, as far as wording is concerned, is that it applies to people coming on foot.

Mr. McCann: It always did.

Mr. Macdonnell: It did not say so previously. Foot passengers have been mentioned. That is not vital either. All I am suggesting is, as has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Eglinton, that you could make a simple change here which would get away from what I am quite sure is a fact now, that many people are unintentionally, if you like, breaking the law. I say we should leave it like that.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I am quite interested in this bill because I come from a western constituency which, of course, borders on North Dakota. In the past we have had very friendly relations with that state. Not only do tourists cross back and forth, but also many farmers cross that wide stretch of the international border. I join with the hon. member for Niagara Falls, the hon. member for Eglinton and others who have shown concern for what may happen under this legislation with respect to people who previously were not obliged to report to customs. Last evening the minister stated the purpose of the bill pretty well. At page 4257 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> The only difference under this amendment is that, whereas only a person crossing the border with dutiable goods had to report, now all persons who cross the border have to report to the nearest customs official.

Today he has told us that perhaps the officials would be quite satisfied if people crossing the border reported when it was practicable to do so. If the customs office was closed, then they could report when it was fairly convenient.

The hon. member for Charlotte said he was quite sure the customs officials would use discretion in dealing with people crossing the border and perhaps not reporting at that time. I am sure that people crossing the border, and all of us, want the act to spell out exactly what the conditions are and what the responsibilities are. I am concerned. Unless the minister can assure us that in the past there have been breaches of the act which his department has not been successful in coping with, conditions which he expects to rectify by this new legislation which will make it mandatory for people to report, the change should not be made.

I feel sure that many people, particularly farming people, who cross the border do so for no other purpose than to carry on their farming operations. They will be inconvenienced. I also believe it will cause inconvenience to many people who go across on short trips. I know in the west there are people who do not bring in dutiable goods. If it is necessary to amend the Customs Act to give the minister additional power, then he should say so. If it is going to make no difference to the people going back and forth, as he has stated, then this is an amendment which we should look at with a great deal of displeasure. Unless there have been abuses we should leave things as they are.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I just wish to say one more word. I find that paragraph (a) of clause 1 reads:

. . . come to the custom-house nearest to the point at which he arrived in Canada,—

This is the dutiable part:

(b) before unloading or in any manner disposing thereof—

And so on.

Surely no one in this chamber will suggest that anyone should be allowed to come into Canada from another country and unload goods or commodities before he reports at the customs office. If you read paragraph (b) carefully you will see that there is nothing very harmful in this provision in connection with anyone coming into Canada from another country who brings nothing with him. This is to prohibit the unloading of goods that may be brought in from another country before reporting to the customs office.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

It is spelled out as plainly as can be. It states that every person in charge of a vehicle arriving in Canada must come to the customs house nearest to the point at which he arrived in Canada or to the station of the officer nearest to such point before unloading or in any manner disposing of such goods as he may be bringing in. Surely no one is going to suggest that the customs department should allow a person to come in from a foreign country and bring in and unload commodities before going to the customs office. If he does not bring anything in he has nothing to worry about.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I intend to restrict my remarks to the matter of the additional language which has been suggested. I am quite sure that the inclusion of such language as "as soon as practicable" or "as soon as convenient" would mean that this section could not be interpreted properly. If we consider the records of the tested court cases we will find that the supreme court of Ontario ruled seven or eight years ago that the word "reasonable" or other words of that type are almost impossible to interpret. I do believe we should be most careful about adding language of that kind to the statute.

Mr. Macdonnell: I observe that the words "on foot" were in the previous section, and for the life of me I find great difficulty in seeing what is being changed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Valuation for duty.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I have not had an opportunity to look up the latest agreement between the contracting parties on tariffs and trade, but it seems to me that in this clause there is a violation of the Geneva agreement. This reads:

Wherever duty ad valorem is imposed on goods imported into Canada, the value for duty shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of this section.

Then it spells out the various methods of appraising articles for duty purposes. Then subsection 6 reads:

When the value for duty cannot be determined under the preceding subsections for the reason that
(a) like or similar goods are not sold for use or consumption in the country of export, or
(b) there is no established market in the country of export for like or similar goods, the value for duty of the goods shall be such value as the minister determines.

My understanding of the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade is that we agreed that no valuation would be made on an arbitrary or fictitious basis. If that is so, then it seems to me this provision proposed by the minister conflicts directly with that agreement to which we, in common with the other contracting parties who are signatories, agreed. My contention is that this provision should be rejected by the committee or withdrawn by the minister because it gives the minister the right to establish a fictitious value, an arbitrary value, which is not permitted under the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

It seems to me that those of us who are interested in a tariff policy which does not allow arbitrary valuations which may lead a country into the establishment of prohibitive tariffs on certain types of goods entering the country cannot accept this provision. With its avowed philosophy of freer trade, fairer trade and lower tariffs I believe that if the government look at this provision they will agree that it should not be in the bill. It is quite incompatible with what the government profess in regard to tariffs and so on.

There are countries where goods are produced for export which are not used in the country of manufacture. We can think of a country where the climate is not sufficiently severe to encourage people to wear mitts or gloves, but those articles may be manufactured in that country for export to Canada. Under this provision the fair market value in the country of origin would not be the determining factor, nor would the value of like goods if you could find goods there of that description. The minister is to have the arbitrary power to fix the value for duty purposes without regard to the internal or domestic prices of the country of origin.

I suggest to the minister that he should not press this clause this afternoon, but that he take another good look at it and also at the general agreement on tariffs and trade. I have not had an opportunity to look up the particular clause to which I have referred, but I think my memory is correct that the Geneva agreement absolutely prohibits a contracting country establishing arbitrary values on goods that may be imported into such country. I ask the minister to take another look at this clause before he presses for its passage.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I am informed by my officers that this is absolutely in accordance with GATT. That opinion has been given not only by our own legal officers but by the legal officers of the Department of Justice who prepared this bill. I am glad the hon. member has brought up this question, but I assure him that there is nothing in the section that is incompatible with GATT.

The section the hon. member has quoted applies to the very odd cases. For instance, shoe machinery is imported into this country. The large firms in the United States who make shoe repairing machinery do not sell it. You could not buy it for love nor money; you must lease it. It is the same with International business machines, which must be leased.

It is for cases of that type that this subsection is designed. An appraisal cannot be made because of the peculiar marketing methods in the country of export, or where goods are not sold with a transfer of property rights but are only leased with the right to use on a royalty basis, or where the goods are manufactured exclusively for export trade. If we keep in mind what we are trying to remedy, we are putting into law the valuation for duty purposes. If goods are shipped into this country and the importer does not have a legal right to them but has a lease, somebody has to make an appraisal on which the duty will be based for that concession, as it might be called, of sending the goods into this country on a lease basis.

An hon. Member: Would the minister say whether a tariff is charged against machinery that is brought into the country on lease?

Mr. McCann: Yes, there is a tariff even on machinery that comes in on lease, the same as if it were bought. It is the valuation that matters.

Mr. Drew: In connection with the point that has just been made, does the minister mean, for the sake of argument, that if a contracting company in the United States is moving machinery here to perform a contract in this country, a tariff is paid on that machinery in that case?

Mr. McCann: Yes, a tariff is paid on that.

Mr. Macdonnell: How is it arrived at?

Mr. McCann: On the value of the machinery. If it is used machinery, it is an appraised value. If it is new machinery, the tariff is paid for new machinery.

An hon. Member: What happens when that machinery returns to the United States?

Mr. McCann: Once it is used in Canada the duty belongs to the crown. There is no remission.

Mr. Lennard: I do not see how you could do otherwise. If you did not do that, every machine brought into this country would be bought on a lease basis.

Mr. Leboe: Is it not true that there is a provision whereby they may pay so much every month or every two months on used machinery coming in?

Mr. McCann: That application is where machinery would be brought into this country on an emergency basis. As an example, a few years ago certain machines were brought here to harvest grain in the west during the winter season. A special arrangement was made for these people, who came from Dakota, to bring up their machines, and a special rate or a remission was made to them because it was an emergency condition.

Mr. Macdonnell: Might I ask the minister a question with regard to clause 2? I suppose it is fair to say that this clause is being passed because it is not felt that the legislation of December, 1953, completely did the job, and we now have what may be called remedial or reinforcing legislation.

I should like to ask the minister one or two general questions. First of all, can he give us some figures as to dumping, showing just what is the extent of the evil with which it is sought to deal? Then I should like to ask him if he will go through this section. Several different situations are dealt with in subsections 2, 3, 4, and 5, and I should like to have the minister go through it point by point and explain to us just what is being done to render the law more effective. First of all I should like to have any figures that can be given as to the extent of the evil.

Mr. Harris: Before the minister answers, Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to move an amendment to the opening words of clause 2. There has been a misprint, and this is only to correct it. I move:

That subsection (1) of section 2 of Bill 410 be corrected to read: "Subsection (6) of section 35 of the said Act is renumbered as subsection (12)".

The purpose is to change the number of the subsection from 11 to 12.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Before the minister replies to the hon. member for Greenwood, I wonder whether in his reply he would also consider the words in subsection 2, "under comparable conditions of sale", and advise the house if any thought has been given under that wording to some type of equalization of value on the basis of comparable labour costs in the country of origin and in Canada. That might be both from the standpoint of manufacturing costs and in connection with conditions of sale, from the standpoint of retail sales costs in Canada.

It seems to me that the true benefit of these sections is being entirely lost owing to the great difference in costs of production of the articles which are being assessed. Notwithstanding the fact that we may go down through the subsections and be able to determine the cost in the country of origin and on this basis work out the tariff provisions, we are far from determining costs under comparable conditions of sale.

I would be very pleased if the minister would give us his feeling in connection with that question. In addition, of course, under subsection 6, which also was referred to previously, I believe, the minister has wide discretionary powers. I should like to know if at any time in administering those powers he has taken into consideration differences in production costs as between the country of origin and Canada.

The observation I have made might also be applicable to subsection 7, which is a catch-all at the end of all the other subsections in which it says "plus a reasonable addition for administration costs, selling costs and profit", and the minister might say whether in connection with that subsection any consideration was given to the point I have raised.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer a question of the hon. member for Greenwood with reference to dumping duty collected in the following calendar years. In 1950 it was $1,735,543; in 1951, in round figures, $1,547,000; in 1952, $1,373,000; in 1953, $1,102,000; and in 1954—this is preliminary, as the accurate figures are not available—$1,114,000.

It might perhaps serve the purpose if I deal with these different sections and give the explanation for them. Subsection 2 is the section which states the primary rule for establishing value for duty, and in no way changes the present provisions which provide for valuation for duty purposes of imported goods at home market prices in the country of export.

Subsection 3 is new. It is intended to provide a basis for value for certain classes of importations not covered by the general provisions of subsection 2. It also seeks to remove from the present law a very serious difficulty arising in such instances from the almost unworkable rule of determining the "nearest ascertainable equivalent" to what is in effect a non-existing home market value.

This kind of problem arises where a sale is made to Canadian importers under special conditions for which there is no comparable marketing situation in the country of export. Most typical of these cases would be where the special conditions of sale result from the Canadian importer dealing with a related foreign company in a trade relationship which does not exist between the exporter and any other parties in the country of export. That is a new condition of business that has arisen in this country within the past few years.

We come now to subsection 4. It merely carries forward a portion of the present subsection 1. It is applied where value cannot be established under the previous subsections and permits the appraisal of goods in such instances to be based on the home market value, at which goods similar to those imported are sold for home consumption to various classes of trade in the country of export comparable to the trade status of the importer in Canada and in quantities comparable to those imported.

We come now to subsection 5, which is a new provision. It provides for cases where the importation, not having been capable of valuation under the preceding sections, requires more specific provisions. This subsection covers cases where the goods exported to Canada are not identical with but are similar to goods sold in the country of export, and which are sold to Canada under special conditions which have no comparable counterpart in the home market structure. This subsection, as in subsection 3, provides for valuation at the home market value at which the similar goods are sold to the trade in the country of export.

Subsection 6 is also new, and is the one about which I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was inquiring. It again is applied only when the previous sections offer no basis for valuation. The kind of case for which this subsection is designed is where appraisal cannot be made because of peculiar marketing methods in the country of export such as, for instance, where goods are not sold with transfer of property rights but only leased. Shoe machinery and International business machines are instances of that.

Subsection 7 in essence brings forward the present subsection 3, which provides for cases where appraisal cannot be made under any of the valuation provisions based on home fair market values. It is somewhat similar to the preceding section and is invoked when the former does not apply; for instance, where semi-processed goods are imported for further processing in Canada—that relates to a great many parts for cars—but are never sold in that condition in the country of export. In the country of origin they are finished, but they are shipped to Canada perhaps as castings and then they are burnished here and further fitted. One has to make an appraisal for duty purposes of those.

Subsection 8 is a repetition of a provision now in the present section 1. There is no change in substance. The principle of value for duty in no case to be less than the selling price to the importer in Canada is continued. In common practice the value is never less than the selling price.

Subsection 9 makes it clear that internal taxes to be disregarded for valuation for duty shall be taxes imposed directly upon the goods in the country of export, and not assessments upon producers, or upon wages for social security of various kinds, income taxes, etc. This condition obtains with reference to goods manufactured in and exported from France. These duties are added to the value. The general provision for the disregarding of such taxes is at the present time contained in subsection 4, which has not been found to be sufficiently specific.

Subsection 10 is the same as the old subsection 5. As to subsection 11, this amendment will authorize a segregation of the value of goods from the value of services where the price of the imported article combines both charges. There are numerous examples, one being, for instance, the importation of unassembled educational kits, the cost of which includes the value of a course. Of course you could not put a value on the course, but when there is an educational kit accompanying it that is appraised and the duty is applied to it. Another example would be a person who might go from Fort Erie to Buffalo to consult a doctor. The doctor will charge a fee and probably will prescribe medicine or treatment of some kind. You do not pay duty on the doctor's knowledge. You pay it on the article brought into the country, whether it be medicine or an appliance. The same thing obtains with reference to architectural and engineering plans. They are often brought into the country. We do not assess duty on the value of the knowledge, experience and scientific equipment that went into their preparation. We put a value on the plans themselves for duty purposes.

I think that explains pretty well all the subsections of the new section 35. I do not know that there is anything more I can add, but I shall attempt to answer any further questions that may be asked with reference to it.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister seems perfectly satisfied that his officials and the law officers believe there is no conflict between the subsection to which I referred and the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade. If his officials are satisfied with it, of course I am not well enough informed to dispute their opinion. However, it seems to me this does permit the minister to make an arbitrary or, perchance, a fictitious valuation, though I am not accusing the minister of wanting to do the latter, and that would be in direct conflict with the agreement we have signed. However, the minister seems satisfied I am wrong, and I shall let the matter rest meantime.

Mr. McCann: We have made the most careful inquiry into that point. The law officials of the department have considered it, the Department of Justice has given an opinion upon it, and the expert who drew up the legislation considered it, and we are assured that there is no conflict whatever with GATT in this regard.

Mr. Macdonnell: As I understand the minister, looking at subsections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of clause 2 of the bill we have first of all subsections 2 and 3 dealing with like goods, and then subsections 4 and 5 dealing with similar goods. I am going to ask the minister to explain those two phrases. Then in the case of each of these two pairs we have one subsection which deals with situations where there are comparable conditions of sale, and another dealing with situations where there are not comparable conditions. We have four alternatives. Would the minister specify a little further as to the difference between "like" and "similar"?

Mr. McCann: When I was going over the legislation I inquired into that matter myself. I am told that "like" means identical and that "similar" means similar to but not identical. If one thinks that over one can see that there is a difference. Under comparable conditions of sale the duty shall be the fair market value. What are the conditions under which the goods are sold in another country as compared to the conditions under which they would be sold in this country? There may be some difference there.

My own interrogation and questioning on this matter brought out the point that there are firms in the United States having a business in Canada that takes the whole output of a factory. They do not sell to anybody else. What are you going to compare it with unless you compare it on the basis of the value we put on it when it comes into Canada? If you were doing it according to the general formula you would be comparing the sales of that factory with the sales to other customers in the same country. There are no such conditions. They are set up there and are supplying their customers in the United States as well as their affiliate customers in Canada. You do not have comparable conditions.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I wonder if the minister would refer back to the questions I asked concerning the powers he has and the interpretation under some of these sections. I asked whether at any time any thought had been given to using the comparable conditions clause and the discretionary powers as well set out in subsection 6 to have a realistic valuation placed on the goods being imported. I use that term because it is directly contrary to the term used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who suggested it was a fictitious value that would be set under subsection 6. I would be inclined to think the minister might use his discretionary power to set a realistic value instead of a fictitious value.

I am especially concerned, if I heard the minister correctly, about subsection 9, because under that subsection such things as some type of social welfare legislation tax in France, say, would not be included in the value of the goods for duty purposes. Surely here in Canada a manufacturer is faced with the fact that the cost of the article he is producing includes every type of tax, and would include any type of social welfare contribution which is made.

Mr. McCann: They would be included.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The type of tax which would correspond to some type of contribution made by a manufacturer here would be included?

Mr. McCann: Yes, that is included in the value for duty.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That is included. The other question I have to raise is, has the minister at any time exercised any discretion in attempting to equalize the cost of production in countries where similar conditions do not exist, such as we have here when establishing the value for duty purposes?

Mr. McCann: No, we have no such discretionary right in that instance.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would the exercise of such discretion contravene the Geneva agreement to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred?

Mr. McCann: Yes, it would contravene GATT.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Do we have any escape clause of any kind in the Geneva agreement which might enable the minister to use his discretion in that way?

Mr. McCann: Yes, there is an escape clause if there is injury or prejudice to a Canadian manufacturing firm by reason of that condition.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Has the minister at any time to date exercised his discretion as a result of the injury clause contained in that agreement entered into at Geneva?

Mr. McCann: The answer, Mr. Chairman, is no.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): A year ago we passed Bill No. 29, which gave wide discretionary powers to the minister in respect to placing a valuation for duty upon goods coming into this country. I feel that western farmers are quite interested in our whole tariff structure. I may say that I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I do not want to argue about whether or not these wide powers given the minister will make it possible to contravene the general agreement on tariffs and trade. I just want to say that it seems to me he is given very wide powers under this bill that enable him to establish an arbitrary price structure and make appraisals for duty.

I should like to draw to the committee's attention paragraph (b) of subsection 6, where it says:

. . . the value for duty of the goods shall be such value as the minister determines.

In following through the various sections of the bill that give the minister power to price goods coming into the country, it seems to me that the first six sections of the bill give the minister such wide powers that he can price these goods in any manner he sees fit. If he has not had such powers given to him in the first six sections, then he has them in sections 7 and 8. Subsection 2 of section 35 says that the value for duty shall be the fair market value. Does the fair market value mean the fair market value established in Canada in the retail trade, or does it refer to the fair market value in the country of origin?

Mr. McCann: Read the next line and you will get it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I am going to do so.

. . . at the time when and the place from which the goods were shipped to Canada, of like goods when sold in like quantities for home consumption in the ordinary course of trade under fully competitive conditions and under comparable conditions of sale.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there are ever comparable conditions of sale when the goods are sold for home consumption. For example, when we were discussing Bill No. 29 last year we were told that volume production in the United States made it possible for them to produce goods with which Canadian textile firms could not compete. Of course those goods would not be allowed to enter Canada at the same prices at which they could be readily sold in the United States. The conditions prevailing in the United States are the result of competition, but when the goods enter Canada, perhaps because we cannot produce in the same volume, those conditions do not exist. Then apparently the minister has a discretion to determine whether or not the conditions prevailing in Canada are fully competitive with those existing in the United States.

Then there is the provision concerning comparable conditions of sale. In view of this, I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he says the minister is given wide discretionary powers. Surely under the discretionary powers given the minister he could set what might be termed fictitious prices instead of, as one hon. member said, realistic prices. After all, these goods coming into Canada are being imported by importers who feel they are going to make money. We as western members, particularly interested in agriculture, feel it could well be that once again there will be a protective tariff wall put up against imports, and unless we can have a comparable situation for our primary producers it just means that we are up against a tariff wall which will raise the cost of production.

I think that is one factor that has caused the high-price economy under which we are trying to exist. If the wide powers which have been granted the minister under Bill No. 29 and under this bill are going to be used simply to keep out goods, then that is not going to serve the best interests of our economy.

Mr. McCann: If the hon. member would just read carefully what it says he would see that when the duty is imposed the value for duty shall be in accordance with the provisions of this section. You take subsection 2, and if you can make an appraisal under that subsection, well and good; you must do it. But if you cannot do it under 2, then you come to 3; there is no use reading it over again. If you cannot do it under 3 then you come to 4; and if you cannot do it under 4 you come to 5. And then you come to 6—

When the value for duty cannot be determined under the preceding subsections—

Then it gives the reasons why this cannot be done—

(a) like or similar goods are not sold for use or consumption in the country of export, or

(b) there is no established market in the country of export for like or similar goods,—

Then the value for duty shall be such as the minister determines. I do not agree with the hon. member that there is anything very arbitrary about this. After all, somebody has to take the responsibility. All these different selections are made under the first five subsections, and if it is not possible to determine the value for duty under them, then it says the goods shall be of value such as the minister determines.

I cannot see how anything could be fairer than that, or more logical. You go to the different subsections—2, 3, 4 and 5—and if you cannot bring it under them, then somebody has to declare the value for duty purposes, and it is left to the minister.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): How do you determine the value of Japanese textiles coming into Canada?

Mr. McCann: On information we get from our appraisers and investigators in the United States as to their value there, and the appraisal that is made by experienced people in the department, many of whom are experts in the textile business.

Mr. Hees: What procedure does the department use to determine the fair market value of end of line goods in the United States, such as we were talking about in 1953? What is the mechanism used to set a fair market value on those goods?

Mr. McCann: I remember that was discussed at great length, the question of end of line or end of season goods. The hon. member has referred to textiles, but it refers to other articles such as electrical goods and refrigerators. We have sent in our representatives and they have been very favourably received by the manufacturers, who give us all the information we want. We look back over a six-month period. We look at the prices at which they have been invoiced, and if they are invoiced lower, then they are brought up to a comparable price for duty purposes. The price is made comparable with that at which the goods sold formerly.

I believe this has worked satisfactorily. I made the statement that there are many invoices I could bring before the committee, if required. I have gone over them carefully. I may find that hundreds or thousands of yards have been sold, and I find how it averaged out over a six-month period. If the price is not pretty much the same, we bring it up for duty purposes.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I have before me the final act of the second session of the preparatory committee of the United Nations conference on trade and employment, and I find this in article VII:

2. (a) The value for customs purposes of imported merchandise should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

That is what I had in mind when I rose a little while ago. For the life of me I cannot see how we can get around that article. In this bill we are giving the minister power under certain conditions to determine the value of goods for duty purposes. I am sure the minister has expressed the view of his legal advisers. I am not a lawyer; but unless there is an interpretation which lawyers can place on this provision other than the one I would place upon it, because the words are in plain English, it seems to me they prohibit exactly what the minister is trying to do in this bill. For the life of me, in my own mind I cannot get around that fact. If we pass this measure are we not permitting the minister to establish arbitrarily a fictitious value? I am using that word because it appears in the article. How do we get around this?

Mr. McCann: I could not agree more with what the hon. member has said. It was only two or three minutes before he entered the chamber that I gave what I thought was a satisfactory explanation of the provisions in the bill. I said that we must take 2, 3, 4 and 5 seriatim, in that order, and if the goods cannot be classified in that way, then you come to subsection 6 which says:

When the value for duty cannot be determined under the preceding subsections for the reason that

(a) like or similar goods are not sold for use or consumption in the country of export, or

(b) there is no established market in the country of export for like or similar goods,—

The value for duty shall be such value as the minister determines. As I said before, somebody has to take that authority, and in this measure we are seeking it. The matter my hon. friend has reference to and which he thought might be in contravention of GATT deals only with that class of goods which is not sold but is leased. The point is as to the value of the lease for duty purposes. For instance, it refers to International business machines, to shoe machinery, and all the rest of it. I do not think I can explain it further.

I know it is hard to comprehend the whole thing. It took me a long time to acquire any knowledge in the matter, or at least sufficient to attempt to make a reasonable explanation. However, I am convinced, after looking into the matter, that this is good legislation and that it is the type we need for the purpose for which we seek it.

Mr. Hees: Have complaints about end of run goods coming into Canada greatly diminished since Bill No. 29 was passed, or has there been much change?

Mr. McCann: I would think the general opinion is that they have diminished. There is one thing we forget, and that is that there is a free entry of United States goods up to a value of $100 three times a year. I shall try to be fair about it in stating that, not only as a result of Bill No. 29, there has been a great deterrent effect upon importers of certain lines of goods into this country, because they did not know just what the value would be and what their bill would be for duty purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to refer to subsection 7. We have referred to 2, 3, 4, and 5 dealing with various differing conditions. Then we come to subsection 6 which says that when the value for duty cannot be determined under the preceding subsections, for the reason that like or similar goods are not sold for use or consumption in the country of export, then the minister may determine the value.

Then we come to subsection 7, and I wish to be sure that this subsection is accurately worded. It says:

> Where the value for duty cannot be determined under the preceding subsections, the value for duty shall be the actual cost of production—

And so on. At first I thought that should be worded, "When the value for duty cannot be determined under the preceding subsections 2, 3, 4 and 5", because under 6 you have the means of determining for duty. What I want to know is this. Is the answer there that 6 deals only with a limited class of goods, so that subsection 7 is correctly worded as it is? Is that the answer to my question?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I find that article VII, section 2 (a) of GATT reads as follows:

> The value for customs purposes of imported merchandise should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

Certainly, this clause provides for arbitrary and fictitious values. If this section of GATT prohibits it, then it would be an evasion; but is not the escape clause the use of the word "should"? It says "should not be based." It does not say "shall not be based." Is that not the explanation of why you can in effect make this change, which on the face of it appears to be arbitrary? Is that not the reason? Certainly if it is not the reason then it is obvious that what is being asked to be passed by parliament today is indeed a contravention of GATT. An ordinary reading of the section indicates that it contains no escape clause whatsoever. I thought I was helping the minister, but of course he says I am not helping him at all. If that is not the reason, then it is obvious that what we are doing here is passing an amendment to the customs laws which we have criticized the United States for doing over and over again. We have suggested that is one of the reasons GATT has in such measure been defeated in its original purposes.

Mr. McCann: We are entirely in agreement with the principle that we should not apply arbitrary measures; but I ask the hon. member for Prince Albert, where else can we go for advice except to good lawyers in our own department, and in the Department of Justice? If the hon. member for Prince Albert and those lawyers could get together they could argue over it for a week. I am taking the opinion they gave me, that there is nothing here that is a contravention of GATT, and on that premise we went ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what we criticized the United States for doing.

Mr. Macdonnell: Surely the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Prince Albert is one which cannot be lightly dealt with. Is there a written opinion? Those of us who are not expert lawyers are competent to read plain statements in English. This is so important that it should not be allowed to go without some satisfactory answer.

Mr. McCann: Well, I do not know whether there was a written opinion. I was present when the bill was discussed before the legislative committee of the cabinet. The man who drew the bill was there, and in my own hearing this was the opinion he gave. It stuck in my mind just as well as if it had been written. It applies only to a very limited type of goods, as I said. We do not want to be arbitrary about it, but I do not see any other way of doing it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that the minister remembers a thing just as well as if it were written, and that it sticks in his mind. I simply ask whether this has been brought to the attention of the law officers, and whether they say there is no contravention.

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say this to the minister. Apparently when he answered me he said this applied only to a limited group of articles.

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: Article VII of GATT reads as follows:

The contracting parties recognize the validity of the general principles of valuation set forth in the following paragraphs of this article, and they undertake to give effect to such principles, in respect of all products subject to duties or other charges or restrictions on importation and exportation based upon or regulated in any manner by value, at the earliest practicable date. Moreover, they shall, upon a request by another contracting party, review the operation of any of their laws or regulations relating to value for customs purposes in the light of these principles. The contracting parties may request from contracting parties reports on steps taken by them in pursuance of the provisions of this article.

The article goes on:

2. (a) The value for customs purposes of imported merchandise should be based on the actual value of the imported merchandise—

There is no limitation anywhere there. As I take it from the preamble, that applies to all merchandise and not merely to leased merchandise. I continue:

—on which duty is assessed, or of like merchandise, and should not be based on the value of merchandise of national origin or on arbitrary or fictitious values.

I cannot see where there is anything in that which limits this to leased articles such as shoe repair machines and so on. I am sorry, but I just cannot see it. I know the minister must be guided by his advisers and his officials, and I am just a layman without training in the law and understand only the English language. Consequently I suppose I have to accept what the minister says, though I do suggest that he should take another look at it. That is all I suggested in the first instance.

Mr. McCann: I have nothing further to say, Mr. Chairman, except that the government will take the responsibility that we are acting correctly.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar a question. If you cannot determine the fair market value under the act as it exists, what other method than the one suggested would you use to determine the fair market value? I am asking the question. That is the practical problem that customs is up against. What would you do?

Mr. Diefenbaker: You would not sign GATT to begin with, if you wanted to meet the situation.

The Deputy Chairman: Is clause 2 as amended carried?

Mr. Macdonnell: No. It is no answer, with all due respect to my colleague, to ask what would you do. This is what we would like to do, undoubtedly. If we get into difficulties and paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5 prove unavailing, certainly paragraph 6 is what we want. But on the other hand the question arises whether we have put it out of our power. I hope it is not so, but I think we have to be satisfied on it, and the mere recital by the minister here that someone in the Department of Justice said it was not so does not seem to me to be adequate.

I feel that this matter is of great importance, because we are devoutly hoping that the United States is going to behave better in respect to GATT than it has in the past. I do not think we want to be in a position where they can point a finger at us. We want to be in the opposite position. I am still hoping that the minister is right; of course I am. I am hoping that he will be able to get a reasoned answer which will satisfy everybody. I do not think it is adequate just to be told that the Department of Justice has said it is so. Even great lawyers sometimes find that if they could get all the facts they would give a different opinion from that which they had given.

Bill reported.

Mr. McCann moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as though the government is moving into a transfer of responsibility as it will now be in a position to close a port of entry and place the onus on an individual coming back across the border to find a port that is open. I submit it is the responsibility of the government to provide these services and not put the onus on an individual to find a port that is open.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES—SUGGESTED NEED FOR ECONOMIES

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I propose to avail myself of the privilege that this motion affords to place before the house a positive motion for the consideration of hon. members. There are occasions when members on the government side are inclined to ask in a rather complaining way why the opposition does not put forward positive and constructive proposals. I submit that the record will show that many positive and constructive proposals have been made.

Nevertheless it is the function of the opposition acting as it does in the capacity of auditor, in so far as that is permitted, to examine the business that is done and to criticize where criticism seems appropriate. A motion of this kind provides the mechanism for seeking the favourable consideration of something which seems to be to the advantage of the house as representatives of the people of Canada. What I propose to place before the house now I suggest is something calling for the earnest consideration of every member of this house and of everyone in Canada at this time.

Profound changes have taken place in the life of our people and in the Canadian economy within the past few years. We have seen industrial enterprises expand beyond recognition and individual activities extend to a much wider field. However, in no single activity within our country has there been a wider and more rapid expansion than in the field of government itself. Much of that was imposed by the dreadful demands of war; much of it was imposed by the necessity for improvising when sudden new requirements called for the setting up of organizations or agencies which had not previously existed. However, there is this great difference.

I do not believe that there is a single business of any size in this country which has expanded greatly within recent years which has not deemed it advisable to examine thoroughly its expanded structure and to seek outside independent advice as to how that greatly expanded structure can be guaranteed and brought into an efficient integrated entity to the best advantage of all those working with it and of all those who depend upon its success. Any business enterprises which have not done that already are doing it now and there is a very important reason therefor.

The post-war sellers' market is gone and new competitive conditions are arising everywhere throughout the world. Within our domestic markets as well as in foreign markets we are feeling the direct impact of the highly competitive atmosphere in which business is now being conducted. The adjustment required to meet those conditions is something that is going to spell success or failure, advancement or disaster within those years immediately ahead.

We are telling ourselves constantly that the nation's business is the largest business of all, and I submit that the time is long overdue for Canadians generally and for the representatives of all Canadians in particular who sit here in this house to examine the position and to take those steps that are appropriate to bring the largest business in Canada into a position of efficiency as every businessman would do if he were confronted with the same circumstances.

I am not suggesting for one moment that at this time, when we see so much evidence of the effects of this highly competitive world market upon our own export trade and upon our domestic business, the adjustments needed to meet this situation can be made by governments alone, but certainly if there is one place where an example can be given and where the action taken can be of advantage to everyone meeting a situation of this kind, it is in the case of the government itself. If the organization of government and all its agencies were to be examined in the same objective manner as any successful business has already been examined, then there would be, not only an enormous saving of public funds, but an encouragement to people generally to prepare themselves in the most effective way for the very competitive period through which we are going to pass. The action of the government in this respect could be decisive in determining the attitude of our people. It is not only because of the competitive market that this should be done; it should also be examined because of the impact of inflation upon hundreds of thousands of our people.

Do not let anybody repeat again in this house that we have avoided inflation in Canada. We have had very heavy inflation. Our dollar today is worth considerably less than half of the pre-war dollar in purchasing power. Those who are able to work with their hands and to combine the efforts of their hands with the skill of their brains in the great competitive activities, those who are engaged in the professions, those who are in business, have been able to adjust their position and actually in many cases to take some advantage of inflation itself. Let us examine, however, what this has meant to hundreds of thousands of people dependent upon the small income from their life savings, to all those thousands who are dependent upon railway pensions, upon military pensions, upon pensions from insurance companies or endowment policies of various kinds. Think of what this means for everyone on a small income. Think of what it means in cases you actually know of people who worked hard, performed great service and looked forward to declining years, not in comfort but with an adequate amount to give them that measure of happiness and security that they had a reason to expect when they looked at the number of dollars that would be coming in. There is no one in this house who does not know someone today, who does not know several people, who are finding it, not difficult, but impossible to make ends meet because of the effect of inflation.

In the midst of great plenty, in the midst of very evident prosperity, there is in fact great hardship in this country at this time. Now, the cruel results of inflation are something which we should consider, because there is no single influence which does as much to create inflation as excessive government expenditure. That is not only because excessive government expenditure adds to the tax burden of our people and in turn adds to the cost of the things everyone buys; it is also a fact that where there is excessive government expenditure the ordinary standards which establish the cost of many products and many services are upset by the loose methods of handling these affairs by government agencies. Unless there is the same test in regard to the value of services and the cost of things that are bought in the case of a government agency as would apply in the case of a private agency, then you are creating the most vigorous inflationary force which can operate in any country.

For that reason, the first and most effective place to tackle inflation—and in tackling inflation to increase our ability to meet the competitive period in which we now are—is within the realm of government itself, the nation's business. The lengthening shadow of government in this country now extends over 25 per cent of the expenditure of all moneys in Canada. A quarter of what is spent in this country is spent by all the governments, federal, provincial and municipal. Seventy-seven per cent of that is spent by the government of Canada. Therefore, the place where the most effective job can be done in creating greater efficiency and reducing the inflationary pressures at this time is right here within this House of Commons to which, I hope, the government of Canada is still answerable.

In tackling any problem of this kind the essential consideration is to obtain the facts. We have not the facts today. That is not because an effort has not been made to obtain them. The facts cannot be obtained. The facts are hidden behind the front of those doors which contain the records that are not open to the members of this house through any mechanism now available to us. Wherever any door has been opened—and I repeat this without any exception, wherever any door has been opened—it has been found that savings could be made by more efficient methods and by better bookkeeping and better organization. It is the duty of the members of this house to see that the facts are obtained. A thorough analysis of the administrative efficiency of government and of all the departments and agencies of government is long overdue. Careful and detailed analysis is required, because of the impact of all these activities upon all the business operations and the whole life of our people in this country.

Surely the figures that will impress this upon us most forcefully are the figures which indicate the tremendous increase in government expenditure within the short period of 15 years. For the year 1938-39, the last year before the war, the total amount spent by the government of Canada was $533,063,000. For the year 1954-55 the expenditure by this government was $4,255,387,000. This government is now spending eight times what the government was spending in the year before the war. No explanation related to increase in population, increase in national income, increase in productive capacity or any other explanation will give us the full story of those figures.

Eight times what the government spent in the last fiscal year before the war is now being spent. Yes, I realize that part of that figure is represented by money being turned over to the provincial governments, but that is only a fraction of this large figure. Surely any ordinary business seeing an expansion of eight times in its spending would say: Where can we do something about this? The government says: What would you suggest should be examined? Let us look at a few of the things that any ordinary business enterprise would examine very carefully. For instance, let us take the Department of National Defence, the Department of Defence Production, and civil defence, which can be bracketed together. Let us see what they spend.

I am not talking now about their expenditures for arms, for the men to perform the military duties, or expenditures to produce weapons and military requirements generally. Let us look at some of the figures that I know any business would examine if it were involved in spending such a huge amount of money. These figures only relate to those departments having to do with defence. May I ask hon. members to listen to them and remember that this is well within the time that a number of members now in the house have been sitting here.

First of all let us take travel and removal expenses. In the year before the war—and in every case where I use that expression it will refer to the fiscal year 1938-39—they amounted to $1,101,000. The amount in the estimates for this year is $46,084,300—$1,101,000 before the war and $46,084,000 fifteen years later.

Let us look next at the expenditures for telephones, telegrams and other communication services. There is not a businessman who does not know that in any business where anybody can grab a telephone and make long distance calls you can throw more money away within a short space of time than perhaps in any other single way. They have very careful ways of checking the propensity of the ordinary person to listen to a distant voice and to exchange ideas by telephone when it could be done just as well by a letter which would be carried there by airmail in 24 hours or 48 at the outside, with good service. Listen to these figures for telephones, telegrams and other communication services, and remember that they relate only to defence activities. In the last year before the war the amount was $57,000, not an insignificant figure. This year the estimate is $6,843,150. You know, you cannot help wondering whether something could not be done to encourage the use of letters with airmail delivery by way of substitution for some of these calls. In fact, every hon. member of the house knows perfectly well that unless there is an objective examination of figures of that kind by outside experts nobody here will begin to know the nature of the calls that have multiplied these expenditures so enormously.

Then, let us talk about publicity and the various things that go with it, again just for defence. In the year before the war the amount spent was $5,000. There must have been certain Scotch instincts operative at that time so far as publicity was concerned. The estimate for this year is $2,507,500. Then I come to office stationery, supplies, equipment and furnishings. In the year before the war the amount was $233,000. It will be recalled that there was a large reserve force at that time and also not comparable permanent forces but permanent forces with various headquarters staffs and so on. The amount then was $233,000 and the estimate for this year is $7,018,684. You can buy a lot of office furniture for $7,018,684.

Then we have another item not covered by publicity, namely, publication of departmental reports and other material. That is a nice euphonious name for some of the informative material that does not forget to give an apple to teacher at the same time. In the year before the war nothing was spent on that item, but the amount in the estimates for the current year is $2,311,650. I have brought the items relating to defence together so that we shall not have anyone saying: Oh well, defence has made us spend this money.

Let me deal with the non-defence departments, and I am not dealing here with any of those things that can be regarded as fixed or rigid expenditures. Let us get back to travel and removal expenses for the non-defence departments, in this case not people urgently called upon to carry out some very dramatic duty. In the year before the war travel and removal expenditures amounted to $3,504,000. The amount this year is $15,770,736. Is there no room for examination there, Mr. Speaker? Is there no room for that question we saw printed on signs in the railway stations of Great Britain during the war—Is your trip really necessary? I think there could be some examination of these expenditures.

Let us look at telephones, telegrams and other communication services. In the year before the war the amount was $689,000, quite a substantial figure. You can do a lot of telephoning and sending of telegrams for that amount of money even if you have airmail service which was not available in the same way at that time. But let us see what the amount is now, even though we have an airmail service that transports letters right across the country so quickly. Instead of $689,000 the amount for this year is $7,356,469.

Then there is publicity, and oh, how publicity-conscious this government is! In the last year before the war the amount was $1,794,000 for the non-defence departments, and this year the amount is $7,663,790. That of course does not include any of the host of people who have been attached to the various staffs to make sure that their own people are not forgotten.

Then we have the publication of departmental reports and other material. There again, strangely enough, before the war not a cent was spent on that, but this year $4,484,645 will be spent, quite a tidy sum to get out these reports on the habits of bees and birds, the mating activities of lobsters and things of that kind. I am not suggesting they all fall into that category but nevertheless we have seen some material which could only be described by a term that would be unparliamentary and which goes into the wastebaskets of most people who have any occupation for their time. It is certainly included in that figure of $4,484,645.

Mr. Benidickson: One hundred and one people in public relations in the Ontario Hydro.

Mr. Drew: I am so interested in the fact that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) is aware of the Ontario Hydro Electric system—

Mr. Benidickson: Your baby.

Mr. Drew: —because if there was a single agency of the government here that compared in efficiency with the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission an examination of this kind would not be nearly as necessary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: As a matter of fact—

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that we deal with private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

DOMINION OF CANADA GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved the second reading of Bill No. 380, respecting the Dominion of Canada General Insurance Company.

He said: The capital of the company since an earlier amending act in 1929, Mr. Speaker, has been $6·5 million, of which $5 million divided into 50,000 shares of $100 each is known as class A stock and has no voting rights. Approximately $1·5 million is divided into 15,000 ordinary shares of $100 each. No class A shares have ever been issued, and the total capital presently issued and outstanding consists of 10,103 ordinary shares having an aggregate par value of $1,010,300.

The company wishes to decrease its authorized capital to $2 million divided into 200,000 shares of $10 each. So far as the splitting of the shares is concerned, this could normally be done by a bylaw provided under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, but it was deemed desirable to reduce the authorized capital in any event, and further this private bill is necessary because of a provision in the original act of 1887 under which shareholders were given one vote for every $100 subscribed. This would not be practicable when the par value of the shares is reduced from $100 to $10.

Many years ago, in 1897, the company issued 1,243 shares of preference stock but these were later surrendered by the preference shareholders in exchange for ordinary shares. Some technical objection of a legal nature could be taken to the method employed in surrendering the preference shares, and accordingly it was thought desirable to include in the proposed new bill a clause confirming the present amount of stock issued and outstanding.

One further point arises in connection with the clause permitting the company to write all kinds of insurance other than participating life insurance. The company enjoys these privileges at the present time but some of them were acquired under the provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and it was thought advisable to have the authority stem from the company under a private act.

I may say, for the benefit of hon. members, that the form of the petition and also the draft of the proposed bill have received the approval of Mr. MacGregor, superintendent of insurance.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

TRANS-BORDER PIPELINE COMPANY LTD.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville) moved the second reading of Bill No. 408, to incorporate Trans-Border Pipeline Company Ltd.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. Decore: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to incorporate a pipeline company under the provisions of the Pipe Lines Act. As hon. members know, before any company can engage in the operation of a pipeline which crosses a provincial or international border, it must be incorporated by an act of parliament pursuant to the provisions of the Pipe Lines Act. Of course, the matter is subsequently referred to the board of transport commissioners.

This bill follows the usual pattern of pipeline bills which come before this house. Probably the important clause is clause 5, which I will read:

> The company shall have all the powers, privileges and immunities conferred by, and be subject to all the limitations, liabilities and provisions of the Pipe Lines Act, and any other general legislation relating to pipelines enacted by parliament with respect to the transportation of gas and oil and other liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons.

Now, the purpose of the incorporators, if this legislation is enacted, is to acquire through lease or purchase a pipeline which was constructed during wartime and was known as the Canol project. This pipeline is one in existence now between Skagway in Alaska and Whitehorse, Yukon Territory. As I say, this pipeline was constructed during wartime by the United States authorities with the consent of the Canadian government to receive petroleum products which were brought in by tanker to Skagway. At that point these products were discharged into storage facilities and then transported by pipeline for the use of the army and air forces.

I am informed that the United States authorities are now constructing or have constructed a new 8-inch line from Haines, Alaska, to a point on the Alaska highway. The old pipeline was a 4-inch line. It is likely that this 4-inch pipeline between Skagway, Alaska, and Whitehorse in the Yukon Territory will no longer be required by the United States authorities and will, therefore, be available for lease or purchase. The proposed company is prepared to acquire this pipeline.

It may be of interest to note that Yukon Pipelines Limited, the bill incorporating which was recently before this house, apparently has the same idea in mind and seeks to acquire the same line. I feel that a little competition is always beneficial. Should this bill be given second reading, Mr. Speaker, I intend to have it referred to the proper standing committee where more detailed information will be given.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): There is one feature of this bill that I should like to bring out, and that is that while the purpose of the applicants is to compete with the White Pass and Yukon railway the bill which the officials of that railway got through this house contains a proviso which has not been written into the bill now before the house. When the Yukon Pipelines Limited bill came up for second reading it was sponsored by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). At that time he explained that he proposed to ask in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines that there be a proviso written into the bill to the following effect:

> Provided that the main pipeline or main pipelines for the transmission of gas and gaseous hydrocarbons shall be located entirely within Canada.

Now, that amendment was passed by the standing committee, and it has since been passed by the house. The Yukon Pipelines Limited bill now contains that proviso, subject of course to approval by the Senate. I do suggest to the sponsor of this bill that his bill should be subject to the same proviso. As a matter of fact, that proviso has been written into all the pipeline bills that have come before the house at this session. It was even written into the charter of Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., when their bill was before the standing committee.

I have seen no reason why Trans-Border Pipeline Company Ltd. should have any advantage over the others. As a matter of fact the present applicants are proposing to try to get a pipeline which, I believe, is on the right of way of the White Pass and Yukon route. This pipeline was laid during the war by Americans, but now they are not using it. They are putting in a new line of their own which runs from Haines; and this pipeline along the right of way of the White Pass and Yukon route has to be taken over by someone.

The officers of the White Pass and Yukon came here and had a bill passed incorporating Yukon Pipelines Limited so that they could take over this pipeline. Now it would seem that these outsiders are asking for a charter so that they might have this same pipeline, which is actually on the right of way of the other people. This point need not be discussed at the moment, of course, but I would like to ask the sponsor whether the applicants for the present charter are willing to accept the same proviso in their bill, when it is being studied by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish simply to offer my support to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I hope that when the sponsor replies he will say that his company will be willing to do what other companies have done in this connection.

Mr. Speaker: When the hon. member speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have been authorized to say that when this bill is dealt with in committee the agent acting on behalf of the proposed company will have no objection to amending section 6 in the bill so that it will provide that the main pipeline for the transmission of gas and gaseous hydrocarbons shall be located entirely within Canada.

Incidentally I always admire the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) when he insists that these lines be built in Canada. I would only hope that some of his colleagues might follow his example.

Mr. Green: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

WESTCOAST TRANSMISSION COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill No. 414, respecting Westcoast Transmission Company Limited.

Westcoast Transmission Company Limited

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation?

Mr. Fairey: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house seeks permission for Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to change its capital structure. This company was first granted a charter of incorporation in 1949. This is the company which proposes to build a transmission pipeline from northern British Columbia and Alberta to supply natural gas from the Peace River bloc area to the lower mainland of British Columbia and, particularly, to the Greater Vancouver area. Arrangements to purchase this gas have already been made with the B.C. Electric Company, the distributors for this area, and the Inland Natural Gas Company, serving communities in the interior of British Columbia.

In addition, the Pacific Northwest pipeline system in the United States northwest have filed an application with the United States federal power commission allowing Pacific Northwest to import 300 million cubic feet daily, contracted for from Westcoast. This, together with 100 million cubic feet daily contracted for, for British Columbia's use, will require a line capable of carrying 400 million cubic feet daily.

Permission to export gas from this area has been obtained from the government of Alberta.

Because the proposed facilities now required to serve the market in British Columbia and the western states will require larger pipe of greater capacity than was contemplated at the time of incorporation of the company, and because of the continued increase in discovery of natural gas in the Peace river area, the company must be in a position to increase its facilities to take care of gas made available by exploration and the market demands for gas which will accrue from the growth of population in British Columbia and the adjoining states of the United States.

To finance these larger undertakings, the company is asking that the capital structure be changed from five million shares without nominal or par value to twenty-five million shares.

I might say that on incorporation of the company in 1949 the fee paid was based on five million shares of the maximum value of $10, having a total maximum value of $50 million. By establishing 25 million shares at a value of $2 per share, the total capitalization of the company for which the fee has been paid remains at $50 million.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

[Mr. Fairey.]

Mr. Speaker: The business under private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will revert to the subject matter under consideration at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES—SUGGESTED NEED FOR ECONOMIES

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the proceedings were suspended at five o'clock to consider private and public bills I was dealing with comparative expenditures as between the year before the war and the current year, and I shall continue to discuss that matter now.

I had mentioned the figures in regard to the publication of departmental reports and other material which, in the year before the war, had called for no expenditure, but which in the current year called for an expenditure of $4,484,645. Then there is the very interesting item dealing with professional and special services which, in the year before the war, amounted to $4,104,000 and for the current year $32,014,774. That item of course covers the employment of people outside the ordinary government services, which embrace so many highly qualified people. I notice that in referring to that item I omitted to mention a very interesting change in the item as applied to the departments related to defence. Perhaps I should call the attention of hon. members to this, because in the three departments dealing with defence matters the total expenditure in the year before the war for professional and special services was $198,000 while that for the current year is $20,855,750.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these figures would suggest to anyone who has any sense of business responsibility that there should be an examination to see what can be done to increase efficiency, to improve the services and to co-ordinate some of those activities which have sprung up so rapidly under the pressures of war and the immediate post-war period. There is one way that this can be done, and that is for the government to set up an appropriate board of inquiry under the public Inquiries Act, with full power to examine this subject and to report to the government in the usual way. Following the ordinary practice, parliament would then receive the report as well.

It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, before I sit down, to move for the setting up of such a board of inquiry. I would suggest that the government make this a free vote. I would earnestly request the government to consider the advisability of withdrawing any suggestion that a vote one way or another involves any test of confidence. I would hope that at this time it may be possible for the members on both sides of the house to indicate their belief that the nation's business shall be examined in the same way as any ordinary private business, and a general plan put before the government and parliament upon which we can act with knowledge of essential facts, knowledge that we do not possess at this time.

In making that proposal, Mr. Speaker—and I intend to deal with what has been done elsewhere—I was pleased that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River drew my attention to the Hydro Electric Power Commission. I recognize that he is not well acquainted with the facts in connection with that commission.

Mr. Benidickson: You are wrong there.

Mr. Drew: For that reason, I would therefore like to remind him that there is a particular reason why the Hydro Electric Power Commission should be recalled in that respect. At the time that I had some responsibility in connection with that organization, following years of maladministration by a Liberal government in Ontario, I—

Mr. Benidickson: Just look at the increased expenditures in recent years.

Mr. Drew:—I had occasion to deal with that very subject. I was confronted with problems of this kind, and at that time I carried out the very suggestion that I am now making here.

Mr. Benidickson: Twenty-two points that you have not delivered yet.

Mr. Drew: If the hon. member was really acquainted with the Hydro Electric Power Commission, he would know that at the time I was called upon to assume some responsibility in that respect we did appoint a similar committee of inquiry. The people we appointed were people who not only knew something about the Hydro Electric Power Commission, but were experts, and the most highly qualified experts in their own field. For instance, I was able to bring over to this country the chairman of the British Electric Grid, which had just carried out a tremendous reorganization of the whole electric system in Britain. I also was able to obtain the services of Mr. Walter Gordon, a man in whose qualifications this government has demonstrated confidence. I also obtained the services of Stone and Webster, a firm of engineers in the United States, who had been responsible for the construction of some of the largest hydroelectric enterprises in that country. In addition to that, I brought into that group the highly-qualified engineers and accountants of the Hydro Electric Power Commission. We set up a task force that examined the whole hydroelectric organization, and it needed that badly after the lack of attention and the interference which there had been for some years. But that was done. We received a report from men who really understood the businesslike operation of an organization of that kind. As a result of that, the Hydro Electric Power Commission stands today as an example of how public enterprises can be conducted under standards similar to private enterprise, following an inquiry of that nature.

Mr. Benidickson: The most improvident thing that happened in years.

Mr. Drew: I realize the hon. member does not know anything about this enterprise and is only repeating some of the campaign literature which probably has drifted into his possession during recent weeks.

I would not have mentioned this rather interesting example of a somewhat similar activity had it not been that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River displayed his lack of understanding of what is actually taking place in connection with that large public enterprise. I have dealt with it simply to show to other hon. members why I propose now that there be something in the nature of a committee of inquiry made up of real experts to examine the organization of government and government agencies. In the more limited field within which I once had responsibility I carried out, not only in that instance but in other instances, exactly the type of inquiry that I am now suggesting could be carried out to the great advantage of parliament and the people of Canada if the government would act on the suggestion that is being made.

Mr. Benidickson: You left a real lemon.

Mr. Drew: I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River does show some indication of needing a rest in the benign surroundings of the country in which he normally lives.

I do suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it should be possible to deal with this subject without the interjections which did make it necessary for me to deal with the comments which had been made. I would point out to hon. members that there have been many suggestions of the need for a thorough assessment and examination of our accounting methods and a general business set-up of the government agencies as well as the government. For instance, in the annual report of Mr. Watson Sellar there is a finding which is made in regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I quote from page 18, item 52, of the last report presented to us. This is merely one example of the things that suggest, and would suggest to any person operating an ordinary business, the need for an examination of this kind:

> Radio Canada building, Montreal, represents a capital investment of approximately $4,500,000. It is regarded as public property acquired for the international shortwave broadcasting service, but a substantial portion is occupied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for purposes associated with its national service. No formal lease exists but the corporation pays rent at $1.79 per square foot for the space used for the ordinary services of the C.B.C. It cost $192,824 ($1.64 per square foot) to operate the building last year. The rental rate therefore is insufficient (a) to provide for depreciation, (b) to give a reasonable return on the capital investment, and (c) to recoup the cost of specially installed facilities. Consequently, the broadcasting corporation is being indirectly subsidized. Information provided is to the effect that the rate is under review.

That is simply one of the findings, which indicates a reason for examining this whole general situation.

Then we have the letter of Mr. Watson Sellar, the Auditor General, to the Hon. James J. McCann, dated Ottawa, August 5, 1954. Surely that letter would suggest to any businessman dealing with a similar proposition reasons why he should engage outside assistance to examine in a detached and objective manner the general organization of government and its agencies. The letter reads as follows:

> Sir,
> Re: Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
> Having completed the audit of the accounts of the above-noted corporation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954, I now report to you, in compliance with the requirements of section 87 of the Financial Administration Act the results of the examination both of the accounts, and of the financial statement forwarded herewith.
>
> Allowance for depreciation and obsolescence. Still applicable is the comment in previous reports to the effect that the appropriateness of the accumulated allowance for depreciation and obsolescence is open to question for the reason that the rates used through the years have never been scientifically established or consistently applied.
>
> Weaknesses having been noted in the accounts, this office wrote to the chairman of the board of governors on October 23, 1952, with supporting details and concluding with the words: ". . . it is suggested that the system be carefully reviewed, and appropriately revised and co-ordinated so that there may be no need to qualify the audit certificate in this regard".
>
> Subsequent action by the corporation not having been of a nature to remedy the situation, the manner in which the accounts were kept during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954, was not found to be conducive to satisfactory audit.

[Mr. Drew.]

The letter then finishes with the statement that subject to the foregoing it is found that the general accounts represent the situation. Any businessman responsible for the administration of a large business who found that the head of one of his departments was continuing to refuse to make changes necessary for the efficient supervision of the business of that department would act, and act very positively and quickly. It must be remembered that this is the largest business in Canada. I suggest that what should be done in regard to other types of business certainly should be done in this particular case.

Other governments have not shown themselves to be unwilling to admit that there can be changes and that there can be improvements. The fact is that other governments have been able to carry out very important improvements. I am reminded of the fact that in Great Britain they have examined a number of their departments under inquiries similar to that which I am proposing.

But, after all, we have one government very close to us, it is true under a different constitutional system but actually dealing with similar problems and having the experience of an almost parallel expansion of activities. While the constitutional structure is different, the general business activities of Canada and the United States are so similar that when we see the tremendous expansion such as we have seen in both Canada and the United States during the same years we can well examine what is done in both countries.

Therefore we are interested in finding that in the United States the government did not suggest that everything was perfect. They decided that it would be wise to act like businessmen when dealing with the largest business that there is. I do hope that other hon. members are not being interrupted by the conversation of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). Probably he is still trying to convince the hon. member sitting next to him that he knows something about the Hydro Electric Power Commission, but I must confess that it is a little disturbing when two speeches are being made at the same time. I think I should tell the rest of the hon. members that one reason why the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River does not know about Hydro Electric is that they do not get their electricity in Kenora from the Hydro Electric, it is provided by the M. and O. Company.

Mr. Benidickson: Very wrong.

An hon. Member: You do not know.

Mr. Drew: I am not wrong at all; the M. and O. Company provides the power.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member was formerly the premier of Ontario and yet he does not know.

Mr. Drew: The M. and O. provides the power and the hydro take that power—

Mr. Speaker: May I humbly request that the Chair be addressed and a private conversation not carried on across the floor of the house.

Mr. Drew: I will just finish the sentence. The M. and O.—I want hon. members to know the facts—is a large pulp and paper company. It provides the power and some of that is taken by the Hydro Electric Power Commission in the areas around.

Mr. Benidickson: You have forgotten all about Ear falls.

Mr. Drew: That is not in the city of Kenora.

Mr. Benidickson: It is in my riding.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member seems to be suffering from some indescribable indisposition. The fact is that I know Ear falls very well. I opened the Ear falls plant, so I should know something about it. I know exactly what area it serves.

I am simply mentioning this to remind hon. members that there have been other inquiries which produced helpful results. I recall particularly the Hoover commission in the United States. The inquiries carried on by that commission were most successful and many changes that could be made were suggested.

In so far as the Hoover commission is concerned, I need not remind hon. members that that has been discussed before in this house. The United States government found that their first activities in this field were must successful so they then set up another commission with even wider powers. In doing so they have had the advantage of a team of experts who have been able to inquire into every aspect of government, including the production and distribution of power and things of that kind. They have obtained facts upon which a general discussion of this subject can take place.

As far as this particular activity is concerned, we might well recall that such an able administrator as General Eisenhower saw fit to renew the activities of the Hoover commission. The second Hoover commission was set up with what was described as a task force of 100 experts including widely experienced accountants, businessmen and others whose training would best qualify them to conduct an inquiry of this kind.

They have been inquiring into various aspects of government. One thing that they have been emphasizing is that under the tremendous impact of the improvised expansion which was necessary—I want to emphasize the words "was necessary"—during the war years a lack of integration in accounting methods and supervision resulted in methods that did not provide either the most efficient operation or the savings that could have been effected.

I think we have all been following some of the things that have been done. It will be recalled that the first Hoover commission was appointed in 1947. Perhaps it is also worth recalling that the first Hoover commission was given that name because its chairman was a former Republican president of the United States. He was appointed by a Democratic government in the United States. This indicates that there was certainly an impartial and objective inquiry.
