That commission made its report and so well satisfied was the government with that experiment that President Eisenhower appointed the second Hoover commission in 1953. That commission has been reporting since then and already many reports have been received from the task forces that have been dealing with different subjects.

In regard to the report of the first Hoover commission, the New York Times, which I think most people will regard as one of the very responsible newspapers in the United States, said that 72 per cent of the proposals of the first commission appointed in 1947 had been either wholly or partially put into effect. Then also there was a very interesting organization set up in the United States, known as the citizens committee for the Hoover report. That voluntary committee sought to emphasize the need for efficiency and economy. That citizens' committee, made up of highly qualified people seeking efficiency in government, calculated that, of the 273 specific proposals put forward for more efficient and more economic administration of the government, 116 had been completely accomplished, 35 mostly accomplished, and 45 partly accomplished. The committee found also that, when the full effect of the proposals adopted had been felt, this would result in a monetary saving of at least $5 billion annually. I recall that figure because we have emphasized our belief that there can be large savings by an ordinary business-like examination of the administrative figures of government and the general organization of government. Dealing with the organization of government, they found that $5 billion annually could be saved merely as a result of the carrying out of the recommendations of the reports of the first Hoover commission.

Then we come to the second commission, which was given very wide powers to examine various branches of government, and we find that the many reports which they have made suggest further substantial increases of a very striking nature. Again, to look at a very responsible newspaper in the United States, I find that the Wall Street Journal for May 20 of this year—and it is a very reputable financial publication—comments on the second Hoover commission under the heading "Hoover Says Commission to Make Suggestions for $13 Billion Saving". These are savings effected in a structure which expanded under forces and stresses very similar to those which caused the expansion here. The Wall Street Journal says that the taxpayers can be saved a total of $6 billion in regard to ordinary operating expenses and in addition that the treasury can gain a further $7 billion in moneys that are now being spent in connection with activities which could be better carried out, according to the Hoover report, by private enterprise in the United States.

Whether the figures are exactly comparable, at least let us remember that the first Hoover report resulted in proposals that actually called for savings and have resulted in large savings which, fully implemented, will reduce expenditures in this field by $5 billion a year, and that the second Hoover commission has made recommendations which would result in further annual savings of $6 billion a year. It is true that we cannot give the exact figures but, remembering that the United States is just a little over ten times as large as Canada, surely it is perfectly obvious that we could expect and would have reason to expect savings of the order of hundreds of millions of dollars if we carried out an appropriate examination of the general business of government in this country. That does not suggest for one moment that there is any dishonesty, that there is any misappropriation of funds or anything of that kind. When business experts go into any ordinary big private business and, as they often do, save hundreds of thousands or perhaps millions for the shareholders of those companies, they do that, not because there has been any misappropriation but because they have found that the business organization grew without effective integration of its activities and that, as a result of a more appropriate set-up, the avoidance of duplication and the better employment of the people actually engaged, they have obtained these results.

[Mr. Drew.]

Now, let us remember that in this country, in addition to departments of government, we have many enterprises that will bear examination. Let us just look at the crown corporations which would bear examination. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation needs examination. I am talking about it from the business point of view on the basis of the reports of the Auditor General. The findings of the Auditor General make it perfectly clear that there should be an examination of the business structure, and its very unusual set-up would also suggest that. Then we have the Canadian farm loan board, the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, Canadian National Steamships Limited, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Eldorado Aviation Limited, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, Export Credits Insurance Corporation, Northern Transportation Company Limited, Northwest Territories Power Commission, Polymer Corporation Limited, Trans-Canada Air Lines. These are only some of the great corporations operated by the government, in regard to which every hon. member here is entitled to information. We know we are not able to get full information in regard to the Polymer Corporation. We know we are not able to get full information in regard to Canadian National Railways. We know we are not able to get full information in regard to Trans-Canada Air Lines. We know perfectly well we cannot get full information in regard to many of these because we are told that to disclose these facts would be placing those organizations in an unfair competitive position. If we accept that—and I certainly do not accept it—then the only hope we have is to have one of these objective examinations such as have been carried out in the United States.

I should also point out that another thing which the Hoover report dealt with in a very interesting way was the paper war that is carried on within their departments. It pointed out that there was an unbelievable waste of paper, to say nothing of the human effort involved. In the New York Times of February 21 of this year there was the following heading: "Hoover Unit Bids U. S. cut Red Tape to Save Millions". Of course, it is true we have had the statement, "What's a million?" But this is not a single million; this is millions. This is one of the things that are symptomatic of a general condition. The Hoover report already filed suggests better management of the paper work of government; and how forcefully it deals with some of these slick publications issued by government departments to extol the hidden virtues of some of those associated with the various activities of those departments! Those reports make interesting reading, when we see the figures of transportation dealt with by the Hoover report. They indicate the wanderlust that gets into people once they find that there is nobody restraining their movements. There is nothing irregular, nothing unnatural, but if nobody is looking into the matter it is strange how distant fields not only look green but beckon so strongly that the farthest point to which a ticket can take one is the point that seems to be the most natural. Because of that the Hoover commission recommended that there be a director of transportation just to see if the trip really is necessary, and just to see also if there could not be certain savings. It also suggested certain directors to look into telephone calls, telegrams and communications of that kind. All of it has an astonishing similarity to what we see here in this country.

I do not propose to deal any longer with the Hoover reports because I know hon. members have read them, but there are so many things that suggest similarities. For instance, one of the task forces of the Hoover commission dealt with the fact there were so many architects in scattered offices here and there. Some of them did not know that other architects were doing exactly the same thing. It has already been commented on during the present session that there are 89 architects throughout the government services responsible to their respective departments but without any co-ordination of their activities under one central guiding body.

Then, what about the various activities of different departments which are precisely the same? What, for instance, about the national film board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Let me refer to them as an example that could be extended over hundreds of examples, and I say hundreds, right across the board. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is now using a great many news films for its telecasts. We also have the national film board and private agencies taking news films. In many cases these people are taking the same news films on the same occasions. Surely if the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is going to be taking news and other films of that nature they could be the government agency to take that kind of film and supply them to the national film board or, if the national film board with its longer experience is the one to do it, then let them have the handling of them on the directive of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I cannot tell and no member of the government can tell at this time how much could be saved, but one thing is certain, that a great deal could be saved just by that one simple procedure. Other examples of that kind could be multiplied throughout the whole of the system.

There is another reason why I think there should be an examination. I think the time is overdue now for an examination of some of these agencies of government just to see where they fit into our private enterprise system. Let us really recognize that our economic system is a private enterprise system and that it is based upon the belief that the genius of individual effort and individual initiative provides the generative force which has given us the prosperity and growth that we have in this country. We should be very careful that, in a perfectly normal desire to meet emergencies, we do not create agencies which restrict that great human driving power which proved so successful during the last world war. If ever there was a real test of private enterprise it was the initiative of human beings brought up in a private enterprise economy who were able to adjust themselves suddenly to the dreadful demands of war and to improvise with all the initiative and ingenuity that arose under those conditions.

Then let us remember that these great public enterprises pay no taxes and little or no interest on their enterprises except for the special provisions which have recently been made. In the ordinary course of events they do not pay taxes such as are paid by private enterprises. I recognize there are exceptions, but the general principle is a limitation of taxes on publicly owned property.

Then there is very real evidence of a desire not to include depreciation in government accounting. That has been manifest in many of the accounts we have examined. However, without going into detail we do know that many of these organizations were built up under great pressure, and there should be an objective examination by an independent inquiry into the general set-up. We should be told whether these are in the best interests of Canada, and in the case of those that we know will and must continue to operate, like the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, both of which, I might say, were brought into existence by Conservative governments, we should have a re-examination and the whole system should be properly analysed to see where the impact on private enterprise is or is not appropriate, recognizing that we are a private enterprise country.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that just as in the case of private business we should examine them on a businesslike basis or we will encourage inflation. In fact, the government will get a vested interest in inflation unless it tackles this problem, because unless it does so the only way it will be able to meet some of the continuing obligations will be to encourage still further inflation by deliberately inflationary methods. Do not let anybody suggest that cannot be done because it has been done in country after country where they did not examine government business in the very manner that is being suggested here. Just think of all the countries of Europe which, a comparatively few years ago, thought their economies were as sound as a rock and whose currencies are debased today to a point where all the life savings of millions of people have been completely wiped out or, in the best of cases, substantially reduced in many of the countries.

We still have a chance but the time of grace is not too long. We still have a chance to examine our own affairs and to reverse the trend, to place the business of government on a sound basis. As I conclude these remarks I repeat my earlier suggestion which I placed before the government. If there should be a free vote, as we have had on different occasions, I would hope that hon. members, seeing what has been accomplished elsewhere to improve the general efficiency of government and the agencies of government, would support the motion I am going to place before the house. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that consideration should be given to the appointment of a commission of inquiry under part II of the Inquiries Act with powers to examine into and report upon the organization of the various departments of the Canadian government with a view to ascertaining and making recommendations respecting:

(a) economies and improved services which could be effected by reorganization and elimination of duplication;

(b) the status and function of crown corporations and other government agencies and their effect on our free enterprise economic system."

Mr. Coldwell: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being—

Mr. Coldwell: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to adjourn the debate?

Mr. Coldwell: I will adjourn the debate.

Mr. Speaker: I think he wants me to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: I did call it six o'clock.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Coldwell: I called it six o'clock twice.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I did not hear the hon. member because I was thinking of the amendment and some of the precedents that I was reading, while at the same time listening to the Leader of the Opposition. I may as well say now that it occurs to me this amendment deals with efficiency in government services. I should like hon. members to consider that during the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the acting leader of the opposition moved an amendment which appears on page 31 of Hansard for January 10, 1955. It reads in part as follows:

We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary measures:

(d) to eliminate waste and extravagance in government and improve its efficiency.

Then on the budget the hon. member for Greenwood moved, at page 2954 of Hansard for April 19, 1955, the following amendment:

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house regrets that in its budget proposals the government has failed:

(c) to curb its own extravagance and inefficiency.

The house will recall that, as recorded on page 3425 of Hansard for May 3, 1955, I issued a warning that questions that had already been decided by the house should not be offered for decision again in the same session. I referred hon. members to some rulings that had been given by my predecessors, namely Mr. Speaker Black and Mr. Speaker Macdonald, and also to two authorities on the point, Bourinot and Beauchesne. During the debate on the budget the mover of the amendment, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) did speak about the reduction of expenditures as recorded at page 2945. I see that in the same debate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who was the seconder of the amendment, spoke about what he called the fifth problem the budget ignored, the problem of waste and inefficiency. His words are to be found on pages 3396 and 3397 of Hansard for May 3, 1955. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) dealt with the point as well, and his words appear on page 3613 of Hansard for May 10, 1955.

I think I have said enough at the moment.

Mr. Drew: Since you have raised the matter now, and doubtless will be considering it, may I make a brief observation which I would not wish to suggest concluded my remarks on the point. Each motion to which Your Honour has referred was a motion which expressed regret that certain things had not been done or sought a declaration that there was waste and inefficiency. Now, unless the defeat of those motions is to be taken as a declaration that this is the best of all governments and that they are flawless, I do not know how it would be possible to suggest to the house practical ways in which improvement in the business of this house should be carried out. We would be denied that opportunity.

After all, we are merely saying we want a committee set up to examine the business organization, to consider ways in which efficiency could be increased and savings effected, and the general aspects of our crown organizations in relation to private enterprise submitted to examination. I do submit that if resolutions suggesting waste and extravagance, and regretting that certain things have not been done, are voted down by a majority which finds it convenient to support the government, if that is going to wrap around the government such a veil of sanctity that we cannot even make practical suggestions for improvement, we really would have paralysed the business of this house.

Naturally, I leave that suggestion with you until this matter is under consideration again.

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the Leader of the Opposition that when the acting leader of the opposition moved the amendment to the address in reply, I indicated to him at the time that each point mentioned in the amendment would be just that many blocking motions in the future. I felt the amendment was rather long. Now, later, when the amendment on the budget came along and we had another recital of various points which were a repetition of many of the points recited in the amendment on the address, I contented myself with issuing a caveat. In the first amendment on the address in reply we have words to the effect that the house regrets the government failed to eliminate extravagance and inefficiency. In the amendment on the budget the words were to the effect that the house regretted the government had failed to curb its own extravagance and inefficiency. Now, we have an amendment to the effect that consideration be given to the appointment of a commission to try to eliminate extravagance and inefficiency.

Now, the hon. the Leader of the Opposition has overlooked this point that the amendment to the address in reply, the amendment to the motion to go into committee of ways and means on the budget and this amendment on a motion to go into supply, are three want of confidence motions. When I issued the caveat a few days ago I was dealing with the amendment on the budget, and I referred hon. members to the Journals for Tuesday, November 22, 1932, page 113, a ruling by Mr. Speaker Black. It is not an isolated one but is one that fits the situation with which we are faced now perfectly.

Mr. Speaker Black had to give a decision on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means. To this an amendment was moved by Mr. Heaps as follows:

"In the opinion of this house it is desirable that a committee or commission be appointed to consider the economic situation in the dominion with special reference to unemployment and to report back during the present session of parliament."

A point of order has been raised that the amendment is out of order on the ground that it again introduces a matter that was debated and disposed of when the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition moved as part of an amendment to the address:

"The house regrets that, except the dole, the government has no policy with respect to the relief of unemployment."

Mr. Speaker Black continues:

I have carefully considered the arguments presented on the question of order, examined the authorities and precedents of both the British and Canadian houses of parliament. In the debate on the amendment of the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition to the address I find that he suggested that a committee or commission be appointed and given charge of the whole question of unemployment relief which shows that the subject matter of the proposed amendment was then open to discussion and actually debated. If this amendment is allowed it inevitably follows that there will be a repetition of the debate on unemployment.

The ordinary rules of debate are applicable on this occasion, for instance, a matter already decided by the house cannot be discussed. Bourinot 420.

This amendment is offered on the motion to go into committee of ways and means and not being accepted by the government is a motion of want of confidence and the fact that it provides for the appointment of a commission or committee with special reference to unemployment is in effect a condemnation of the government's policy on that question.

The house has refused to condemn the government's policy on unemployment by rejecting the amendment moved to the address by the Leader of the Opposition.

In view of that decision by the house I cannot find that this amendment being a motion of want of confidence dealing also with unemployment is in order.

Now, the only flaw in this line of argument would be for the government to not consider this motion as one of want of confidence. Pending the time we hear from the government on that score, I shall reserve any further judgment. As it is six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Harris: If I may expedite the business of the house, I would point out to Your Honour that under no circumstances would the government entertain a motion by way of amending the supply motion as other than one of want of confidence.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances I must very regretfully declare the amendment out of order, for the reasons I have already given.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: It is past six o'clock; but does the Leader of the Opposition wish to speak?

Mr. Drew: I had not thought that you had concluded the argument. However, it is quite obvious that you have made up your mind, so I shall not extend the discussion at the moment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the house a grievance having to do with agricultural matters.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to continue the subject discussed this afternoon. I understand I may do so. Am I seen?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may continue until stopped.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, Your Honour, I think I know the reasoning behind the desire of the hon. member for Greenwood to continue certain remarks. May I point out to you that there is a possibility that we—and when I say "we" perhaps I mean Your Honour—are confusing two things. On the motion to go into supply there are two kinds of speeches that may be made, namely, one, discussing public business and the other discussing grievances. We have followed the practice in this house, as I recall it, of Your Honour encouraging persons to continue the discussion of a grievance until it is exhausted, before proceeding to another.

As I apprehend the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, the matter under discussion could not be described as a grievance; it could be described as a matter of general public business. That being so, it does not follow, I suggest, that we have to continue with the same subject. If it were a grievance, I suggest we should.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on that point might I remind Your Honour that a ruling has been made based upon the fact that it is related to what had been expressed in the form of a grievance or a complaint on an earlier occasion relating to a similar subject. To the extent that we have been able to establish that this was a form of public business unrelated to earlier complaints in regard to extravagance and waste, then, under the ruling that Your Honour made, and which it is not my intention to question at this point, we most certainly would have been in a different position from what we are now.

The rule, as I understand it, is that grievances may be raised. This was a grievance in the way in which the term is used to the extent that we placed before the house certain things that we thought should be done. It is quite proper to point out that we have placed the same thoughts before the house on other occasions in a different form, but, Mr. Speaker, I very strongly urge that the broad term of raising grievances covers the very point, and the only limitation is not that there be one class which is described as a grievance and another class which is described as a positive raising of public business, but rather that in raising grievances there may be only one motion. We have raised that motion. Your Honour has ruled it out of order. But I submit that it certainly comes within the broad term of grievance as used in relation to the rule that we are discussing, while we may ourselves have put it forward in a positive form.

Might I say, Your Honour, before you make a ruling, that of course there is also the fact that the leader of the house has divested himself of the opportunity to raise the argument that he now raises by saying that under no conceivable circumstances would he agree to a motion which was an amendment to the motion to go into supply. Consequently, he himself has established that this is a grievance.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it, wide latitude is given to hon. members to air grievances on the motion to go into supply. The limitations are set out in citation 467 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which says, in part:

> . . . shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

In connection with the first part of the citation that I read, which is to the effect that a grievance shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, hon. members know that sometimes grievances are put forward without any amendment being submitted. That is citation 468. An amendment has been submitted which had the effect of directing the house to make a decision upon the amendment. I ruled the amendment out of order because in the main it dealt with a matter which had already been put in the form of an amendment on earlier occasions and decided upon by the house.

We are now in the same position, the amendment having been ruled out of order, as if no amendment had been moved at all. Until the Leader of the Opposition had moved his amendment, he had covered a wide field of government administration with respect to pointing out inquiries that should be made in order to strengthen the administration and also crown corporations that are agencies of the government. I am inclined to think that the discussion can go on on that particular subject matter, and any violations that I can foresee will probably have to be dealt with under standing order 40, subsection 2, which deals with repetition of arguments already used in previous debates which have been concluded, either by the hon. member who is about to speak or by other hon. members. But, as hon. members know, wide latitude is given with respect to grievances on the motion to go into supply, and I would hesitate very much at this moment to limit the discussion. I would rather see it go on, if that is the wish of hon. members, in the hope that there would be no repetition of the arguments that have already been used with respect to some of the points that may be brought forward at this time on the subject introduced by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Macdonnell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope that what I say will at least satisfy you that I am continuing on the line which you have approved.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, when I realize that what is happening is that we are suggesting to the government that they might improve their administration by getting the assistance of some experts to look at what they have been doing, I find it hard to believe that their answer is in the negative, or would have been in the negative, had it come to a vote. To me it seems so obvious that this would be a desirable course. Let us have a look at it. What is the situation of this nation's business? What kind of business is it that we are engaged in? After all, we are engaged in the biggest business that goes on in Canada by far. Well, of course, the first thing that strikes one about it is that it has grown enormously in the last 15 years. It has mounted by some 10 times or more. The second thing that strikes one about it—and this is a very unusual but a very important thing—is that it is a business where those who are carrying it on can fix the income of the business. The income of the business is what they determine it is to be, and of course that in itself is a great hazard; that in itself is a great temptation to be easy-going with money, because, after all, if you do not have enough it does not mean you go broke; it just means that you get more money, as we are going to do this year because we are budgeting for a deficit.

I feel that when you consider the figures given this afternoon—I am not going to review them; I have heard them before; they were not new to me, and yet they struck me all over again—you have the feeling of what would happen if it was a private business. Well, of course, the answer is it could not happen; it would have been checked long ago. And so I repeat that all these things seem to me to indicate that an inquiry, assuming it is carried out by competent people, for people who are conscious of the need of help, who want help, could not be anything but a good thing. Of course, in private business it is the most natural thing in the world.

Let us have a look at these men in private business. Most of them have been in it all their lives. They have been trained up to the job. It has been a matter of economic life or death to them. They naturally had to give everything they had in order to be a success; and yet they are only too ready to go outside and check up on what they have done. It does not mean that they abdicate their own judgment. I do not mean that they put themselves in the hands of some outside company because, as was pointed out to me by a shrewd observer this afternoon, sometimes the ideas of outside experts may be grandiose. Sometimes they may have extravagant ideas. Nevertheless, to have a check-up by an independent mind is good.

These heads of corporations are not weaklings; they are not men who have no self-confidence; they are not men who are rushing off every day fearful of their own judgment and trying to substitute someone else's for it. They are men of self-confidence; but nevertheless they feel that from time to time it is wise to check themselves up from the outside, to get competent people to come in and look over what they are doing.

These efficiency companies do not just rise out of the air; they do not rise up without there being some field of want. People do not pay their high fees just for the fun of it, they pay their fees because they feel it is worth while to do so. They do so because they believe in having fresh and independent views. They want the truth, and there is nothing to prevent them getting the truth. Sometimes we in this house are a little handicapped by the fact that we know that we represent the views of other people, we know that we have to make our views palatable to other people and sometimes we may be a little handicapped in following an argument just where it leads. That makes it all the more important in my opinion that those who are engaged in the business of government should be ready and willing and anxious to get assistance from the outside.

What is the situation with regard to administration when we look at the cabinet? I have proper respect for the cabinet and I think it worthy of some of the esteem in which its members hold themselves. Nothing that I say is intended to be derogatory. But I think it is also fair to say, and I think it is obvious to say that few ministers come into the departments with wide experience in administration. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was an exception.

What are the essentials of administration? I suggest that a good administrator is a man who understands the advantages of delegation. That seems to be the key of the whole business. Delegation, I suggest further, means that he can pick good men, and that he will give them their heads, that he will give them plenty of responsibility and back them up. That is an awfully easy thing to say but it is extremely difficult to do.

I want to say another thing which most certainly can be said without any offence. We have a great many lawyers in the cabinet. I tried to be a lawyer once so that anything I say now cannot be regarded as derogatory to lawyers. But I say deliberately that it is only by an act of God that a lawyer is a good administrator, because after all—

Mr. Lennard: You can say that again.

Mr. Macdonnell: I believe that an act of God has been defined as an act that no reasonable man would take. As I said a moment ago, the essence of an administrator is that he knows how to delegate. But the essence of the whole life of a lawyer in practice is that of a man who does not delegate, it is that of a man whose personal services are wanted by his clients. I say with all respect and deference and regard for the profession that it is only an act of God if a lawyer is a good administrator.

I am not overlooking the civil servants who are there standing behind the ministers. There is no one that has more respect for them than I. They are trained men who have come up gradually, but on the other nand to some extent their life has been a secluded life. They have not had wide contacts with the world, they have not entered into tne rough and tumble that people in business encounter. Furthermore I would be willing to hazard a small sum that if one could get a really freely expressed comment of the civil servant in the higher echelon as to whether he would like, however competent he may be in his own work, to have a check made by someone else looking at his work, he would get this reply, "Why wouldn't I?"

If he did not make such a reply then I would say that he is not as good a man as I thought he was. I would feel that he was conscious of some weakness, that he was not fully confident of his own work, that he was afraid or at any rate hesitant to allow an independent view to be brought in. Therefore I repeat that I think the highest type of civil servant would be all for an independent view. That adds strength to my feeling that it is desirable.

I come now to what I think is a most important point. I ask whether there have been any experiments, whether anything along this line has been done by the government. Of course the answer is that it has. I have here a report made several years ago in relation to the national film board, and hon. members will remember the reference that was made to the Woods-Gordon report in connection with the post office. In those two cases, for reasons which obviously I am not familiar with, there was a reference to an outside source. I want to refer to those because to me they offer the strongest possible argument in favour of what I am now arguing for.

If we had found in the case of these two reports that the investigators had no comment or criticism of any kind to make, then I think it might be said that that was prima facie evidence that my suggestion was unsound. It could then be said that when the government did do what I wanted them to do, when they did go outside to get allegedly expert people to make a report, they got a clean sheet. It is for that reason that I want to put on the record a brief reference to what was said about the national film board and also about the post office.

I suggest that if we find, as I shall suggest we do find, that these reports are critical, that they indicate all was not well; if we find, as I think we shall find, that these reports were the occasion of substantial and even drastic changes in the administration of these departments, then I shall feel that that is a strong argument for the argument I am making. I might just interject here, lest I forget, that it seems to me that what was said this afternoon by my leader about the Hoover report is in itself a very cogent argument.

We are extraordinarily like the Americans in many ways. When we find that they have spent the large sums of money which they did on those reports, when we realize the tremendous effort that has been put into the work implied by these reports, it seems to me that that is the strongest argument—putting it at the very lowest point—that we could find that that would be a useful course for us to follow.

I should like to refer briefly to some of the comments made with reference to the film board. The criticism was not strong, but nevertheless I think it warrants the time that anyone might spend in reflecting on it. This is a report by J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited, made by a man who I think has the respect of this house regardless of party. I submit that the suggestions made here are indications in connection with this small and rather tiny department which might be of tremendous importance in connection with the larger ones. Before I go on to the film board, I digress here to speak for a moment further about the huge department, the largest of all, the defence department. We have tried very hard here in this house to suggest to the predecessor of the present minister, who is a friend of us all, that he had a terrific job on his hands—he had over 30,000 civilian employees apart from the huge military staff—that it had grown like a mushroom and that it needed the most expert assistance that could be brought in. We did not get very far with the minister. The minister was capable of prodigies of individual work himself; he worked with almost feverish energy. I sometimes wondered if he did not think that if he worked as hard as he could, twice as hard as most of us, somehow or other that would do the job. At any rate when I pressed him and asked him how he was undertaking this huge addition to the work of the department, the answer I got was to the effect that there always has been a defence department, it has grown a bit certainly, but we are doing our job. I took that as said in good faith. If working, as I say, with feverish energy would have done the job, then I am sure it would have been done, but it left me with the feeling that there was no recognition of an obvious fact crying out for recognition, that here was a terrific job that needed special effort and special assistance.

Having said that about the Department of National Defence, I want to come back and read a short extract from this report on the film board because this is the kind of thing which if applied to the huge departments, should pay off with terrific results. This is the report made in 1950. I quote:

> The administrative controls and procedures of the board have improved considerably in recent years but there is still room for substantial further improvement. Present shortcomings are mainly due to three causes: The business management section has lacked sufficient authority to control the expenditure of funds; the board has been obliged to work within the framework of government accounting practices which were not designed for a productive organization and are not suited to its needs.

I think that is a very important point. Here is a department of government which has gone into business and does not have the proper tools. I read further from page 24 of the report:

> In the past, difficulties have arisen because commitments have been made without regard to the availability of funds; for example, in some cases: (a) Budgets have not been prepared until after the production of a film has commenced; budgets have been prepared to cover part of the work only;

I skip the rest and go down to (d):

> Prints of films have been ordered by the distribution department without reference to the business management section as to the availability of funds.

I am not going to weary the house with further quotations. I submit that that proves exactly the point I am trying to make, that it could be of the greatest assistance to a department if some competent, reliable person of good sense were brought in and asked to give advice.

Now I wish to refer a little more at length to the Post Office Department, because, as we remember, a good deal more by way of criticism was said in regard to that. I am reading now from Hansard of January 15, 1954, page 1173:

> With regard to the operations branch the report says: "The work of the operations branch has over the years increased to the point where the staff at all levels are overloaded with a multitude of routine problems and correspondence. No one has had the time to develop policies which can be applied on an over-all basis."

Later on page 1173:

> Here is one of the things the report has to say regarding controls:
> "The branch is operating under a severe handicap as there are no standards established to measure the relative efficiency of a given method of operation. The lack of such standards is particularly felt when requests are received for additions to staff or accommodation."

One further quotation:

> The cost information available to the department discloses that the special delivery service is operated at a considerable loss. In some centres the postal rate for a special delivery letter is less than the contractor is paid to deliver the letter. The user of the special delivery service is interested in a rapid and assured delivery. It is believed that the majority of users would be prepared to pay considerably more for this service if their requirements were met.

Here is a statement of a condition which apparently was not known to the department. I repeat it:

In some centres the postal rate for a special delivery letter is less than the contractor is paid to deliver the letter.

That is apart from all the work and overhead in the Post Office Department itself.

Now, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that to me the arguments in favour of this seem convincing, and I have still to hear any argument against it. I cannot remember any real argument at all having been made against it. I would not undertake to say that no argument has been made, but certainly none that seems to me worthy of consideration. I would have thought that all the arguments were on the one side. The expense would be trivial and the possibilities of recovery enormous. As I say, it almost seems as if we on this side were not to be allowed to have any good ideas of any kind. The mere fact that we put something forward apparently is enough.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend knows we have often accepted good suggestions from the opposition.

Mr. Macdonnell: I may have a poor memory, but I do not remember many.

Mr. Harris: Maybe there were not many.

Mr. Macdonnell: It is open to the minister to say that they would have accepted them if they had been good; that is always open to him. But I will repeat that I hope very seriously that if this is going to be turned down we shall be given the reason. There may be good reasons, but I do not know them.

I remember a remark made in the New Statesman and Nation about Lord Beaverbrook. They did not think much of him, but they did say this, and I think it is applicable to the present situation. In the early days of the war they said that they would like to see Lord Beaverbrook put into every department of government for just two months. They meant that he would clear out all the cobwebs, that he would throw out all the preconceived ideas and make everyone re-think what they were doing.

It also reminds me of a story about Churchill when he became first lord of the admiralty as a young man—I think he was 37 at the time. He went all through the departments and asked all the people to tell him what they were doing. After they told him, he asked a question that they had never been asked before. He asked "Why?" That apparently was quite a shock to them. I suggest that something like that should happen here. I do not wish to derogate from the members of the cabinet, and I do not wish to derogate from the civil servants, for whom I have a great respect. I am talking about what I believe is an inescapable situation where things are allowed to run on from decade to decade. In some departments we would probably find that they were doing things because they did them in the time of Sir John Macdonald. I do not doubt that the things that were done in Sir John's time were wise, but that does not say that they are going to be wise 60 years later.

It seems manifest good sense to do this. I should like to point out that this comes, not from a man without experience in administration. I should like to recall in passing that my leader was prime minister of Ontario for five years and, speaking for myself, I have never yet heard anyone of any party in Ontario say he was not a good prime minister. The suggestion comes from him and the rest of us support it and are enthusiastic about it. I hope it will not suffer the fate it had before, for I say, subject to being corrected, that I do not recall an argument being made against it. I say that to me this is manifest good sense. At the worst we will have spent a little money. Perhaps we will feel afterwards we did not get value received, but I do not fear that. There would be value received anyway because if no criticism were made the government could have the feeling that everything was all right and they could make use of it in the next election. I would take a chance on that myself. I would risk the government getting a clean sheet. Therefore I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener):

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that consideration should be given to the appointment of a commission of inquiry under part II of the Inquiries Act with powers to examine into and report upon the organization of the various departments of the Canadian government."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I really had not anticipated entering this debate but since it has continued on the basis of the subject matter introduced in support of the amendment you declared out of order before the dinner recess, and since another amendment of a rather different kind has now been moved, I wish to say something about the subject matter surrounding the amendment. First of all I want to say that the members of the parliament of Canada are elected to do a certain job and when we are elected we assume certain responsibilities. One of those responsibilities as far as the opposition is concerned and, indeed, private members on the government side too, is that we shall scrutinize very carefully expenditures of the government and proposals of the government for expenditures. It seems to me that is a fundamental duty of members of the House of Commons. I do not believe that at any time, unless the circumstances are very exceptional, we should abdicate those rights and powers that are properly the function of parliament.

It has been said of course that a somewhat similar commission was set up in the United States by congress under former President Hoover. But let me point out that the parliament of Canada and, indeed, the parliaments of the commonwealth of nations, are not comparable in many respects to the congress of the United States. In the House of Commons we have sitting before us every day of the week that we sit ministers of the crown who are responsible directly to the elected members who sit in this house. The advisers of the president of the United States, that is, the cabinet of the United States, are not members of congress. They are the personal choice of the president, are not responsible directly to the members of congress and do not occupy seats either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives.

Consequently the situation in the United States regarding the examination of accounts, the questioning of ministers and the inquiry into public matters of that description is essentially different in method from those that we adopt in the parliaments of the commonwealth, of which the parliament of Canada is one. One of the major responsibilities of the members of the House of Commons is that of inquiring into the expenditures of the government and satisfying themselves that those expenditures are being properly, efficiently and economically made. So I say that there is a fundamental difference in the approach to this problem between the United States and Canada.

Let it not be said that in saying this I am condoning in any way the extravagances which I believe can be found in government administration. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) quite properly placed before the house a substantial list of very startling expenditures that, I suppose, had been prepared for him very carefully by persons in his office or elsewhere, and which indicated there were very large expenditures in certain fields that I do not think can be justified at any time.

For the last several years I have looked at the expenditures of the first department he mentioned today, the Department of National Defence. It is a very difficult thing for a member of the opposition or, indeed, any private member of the house, to rise and suggest that the estimates of the Department of National Defence should be cut by $100 million, $200 million, $300 million, $400 million or $500 million because, unfortunately, the Department of National Defence is surrounded by a veil of secrecy. If one endeavours to curtail the estimates of that department one is accused immediately of being opposed to adequate defence of our country. I think there is no individual, no person in this house, who would cripple our country in defending itself against the threat of aggression or actual aggressive action on the part of any country in the world.

Yet I say I am convinced in my own mind that the figures produced this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition confirm in part the opinion I have held for a long time that we could save $100 million, $200 million, $300 million or more if we could examine the expenditures of that department. Let us take travelling expenses. Personnel travel unnecessarily I think from one end of the country to the other by air or by train with all the facilities that the railways offer to travellers by train these days available to them. I am not complaining about that because when we send our young men across the country for training in the army, navy or air force I think they are entitled to as comfortable a trip as we ourselves like to have when we move from one end of the country to the other. But I am convinced that if the house could go into the expenditures of this and some other departments we could effect very considerable savings and economies.

Consequently let it not be said that in criticizing the proposal made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) or the proposal ruled out of order this afternoon I am in any way condoning any of the extravagances I am convinced could be discovered if this house constituted itself in a manner that would enable it to inquire into these expenditures very carefully indeed. We of the opposition, of course, have to take some blame ourselves. We have not endeavoured to have one of the standing committees of the house meet and function as it was intended to function. I refer to the public accounts committee. I do not think there has been a meeting of that committee this session. In my view that is rather scandalous, but I am not blaming the government alone for that. I think we of the opposition are equally to blame with the government if the public accounts committee does not sit and does not function properly. This afternoon and again this evening mention was made of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the necessity of inquiring into the expenditures of that organization. We get that opportunity almost every session. Almost every session a committee is set up. One was set up this session. What are the terms of reference? The terms of reference are that the report of the broadcasting corporation shall be referred to this committee for examination. The report of the broadcasting corporation, which includes a financial report, is sent to that committee.

What has that committee become? It has become an avenue of propaganda for the private broadcasting stations in this country. Almost the whole time of that committee is occupied in listening to criticism of the C.B.C. from the point of view of the private broadcasting companies or listening to propagandists for the Canadian association of broadcasters, the private organizations. That has been true over the years. If we on this side of the house are going to complain about alleged extravagances within the C.B.C., then let us indulge in a little self-examination to ascertain whether or not we have accepted the opportunities presented to us for an examination of the expenditures of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The same is true, of course, of many other organizations, organizations which, as the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, were established by Conservatives. If there has been any lack of investigation into some of the financial operations of the government, then, as I said before, we of the opposition parties share a responsibility because we have not pressed adequately for the functioning of the public accounts committee. We share responsibility because, when the reports of the broadcasting corporation or some other corporation have been referred to a special committee, instead of going into the financial affairs of the organization most of the time has been spent in propaganda discussions as to whether or not the corporation should lose some of its powers and whether private interests should obtain greater privileges in that connection.

I am not going to criticize government expenditures except on the ground on which I have already criticized them, namely that I think there are extravagances and that sufficient economies are not effected by the government. I do not go along with the idea that government expenditures, because they are government expenditures, are inflationary. As a matter of fact, I would take the opposite position. I would say that if the government taxes the people of the country then they deny to the people of the country demands that might lead to scarcities and inflated prices. We in this country are being very heavily taxed now. Secondly, if the government borrows from the savings of the people, and does not go to the Bank of Canada as in effect we did during wartime when such expenditures were inflationary, then that is actually deflationary because we are taking from the people by way of a loan the savings that they might otherwise spend in seeking consumable goods. If that money were spent in that form, it might conceivably lead to competition for commodities which would increase prices and bring about inflationary conditions. I am not, therefore, criticizing from that point of view. I take the opposite point of view in this respect.

I want to reiterate what I said at the beginning. I am convinced in my own mind that if this house functioned as it should, if the committees functioned as they should, and if we were permitted to look into some of the departments of government where expenditures are mainly confidential and where many of the activities are classified or secret, we could effect considerable economies in those departments. As I said at the beginning, I have particularly in mind the one department which we cannot investigate fully, the Department of National Defence. I quite agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that accounts for telegrams and telephone calls and so forth are out of all proportion. As a matter of fact today I can mail a letter from this House of Commons at noon, and it will reach my own constituency nearly 2,000 miles away the next day.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the post office.

Mr. Coldwell: The Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Pickersgill) takes a bow. I do not believe he has anything to bow about. If he were on his job he would canvass the government departments to see that they spent more money on air mail and less on telephones and telegrams. I do not believe my hon. friend has anything to bow about in that regard. It always amazes me that something this parliament does—and it was this parliament which authorized the all-up carriage of first class mail, this parliament did it and not the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) or the Acting Postmaster General or the government—

Mr. Sinclair: On the recommendation of the government.

Mr. Coldwell: It was this parliament that authorized the doing of this particular thing. The government recommended it but that does not say—

Mr. Pickersgill: And the hon. gentleman opposed it.

Mr. Sinclair: The Liberal majority put it through.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not oppose it. I am one of the "hon. gentlemen opposite", and I did not oppose it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did you not oppose the Postmaster General's bill last year?

Mr. Coldwell: That was concerned with something else, and not the carriage of air mail. Sometimes it seems that hon. members will take a vote or a speech by a member on this side of the house and twist it around to suit their own convenience. I think that is what the Acting Postmaster General is trying to do now.

Mr. Drew: Let us get our history straight.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not going into the history of anything of that nature because I might make a mistake in the date. I do not want to have to rise tomorrow afternoon and correct an error of that description in Hansard because I, too, taught history for quite a long time.

I do not agree with the idea of setting up a commission which in effect would be an abdication by this parliament of its responsibilities and rights. I cannot support that point of view. The time may come when this parliament may become so ineffective that we may have to do something of that sort. But in spite of the fact that, as I fear, and have felt for some time, this parliament has not been functioning as it should function, and moreover that it does not command the respect of the people of Canada that it should command, I do not agree with the idea of setting up a commission. I feel the fact that parliament does not command the respect of the people is not the fault of parliament itself. I feel it is the fault of the electors. If, over the last few years, the electors had sent here a house which was more evenly divided—no matter how divided—

Mr. Dufresne: Had sent a Conservative government.

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact, the best parliament for dealing with problems of this description and other problems in which I ever sat was the parliament from 1945 to 1949, when the government had a relatively small majority. Both the opposition and the government kept on their toes during those four years. That was the best parliament in which I had sat; and this is my fifth parliament. And I say it is not altogether the fault of members of the house, but rather the fault of the people who have made it impossible, because of the smallness of the opposition, for the opposition to function perhaps as it should function.

I think of the manner in which committees are set up. Just look at this house tonight, and it becomes clear that several members are not here. And that is because committees are sitting tonight. One of those committees has been sitting all day—morning, afternoon and evening. Sometimes as many as three or four committees are sitting at the one time.

I would like to see more committees of the house; but that would necessitate a larger representation on the opposition side of the house. Because, while the government has plenty of supporters to fill those committees—and they make sure that they do fill them, in the literal sense—the opposition is in a very different position.

So I say, then, that I am not in favour of abdicating the functions of parliament by setting up a commission. I think what the opposition should be doing—and I am talking about all members in the opposition, not just the official opposition—is to demand that the public accounts committee should sit and that it should sit early in the session. I say that there should be sittings of the committees examining reports involving large expenditures, reports like that of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and that such committees should devote more attention to the balance sheets and less to the propaganda involved. And may I say I am very glad to hear someone sitting near me say that they spent more time on the balance sheets this year. I am glad to hear that.

But there are other committees that could be doing the same sort of thing. Let me say in conclusion that I wish to see every extravagance ended. As a matter of fact, if I may pay a compliment, I am thinking of one of the facilities that comes under the direction of Mr. Speaker himself. I have in mind the reading rooms of the Senate and the House of Commons and the great quantities of journals that come to those libraries and to the various departments of government. After careful study these have been cut down, more or less on the recommendation of Mr. Speaker himself, although I know that our committee did approve the recommendation.

True, that is a small saving; but there are major savings many times as great that could be undertaken if a thorough review were made by the house of the expenditures of the various departments. I would like to see this parliament function as a parliament should function, and one of the first duties of parliament is to examine carefully expenditures of government.

Up to the present time how many estimates have we had before the House of Commons? There have been very few indeed. We have not had, for example, the estimates of the Department of National Revenue, nor have we had the estimates of the Department of National Defence. We are at the present time considering in the standing committee the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, but we have not begun to examine defence expenditures.

Beginning next Monday we are to have morning sittings, which means that the government hopes that within four or five weeks we may prorogue. Yet up to this time we have only begun one of the major functions of parliament, namely the careful examination of past expenditures and those for the current fiscal year.

And so, while I am not in favour of adopting the American plan, because American plans do not suit parliamentary institutions of the commonwealth, I am very much in favour of doing everything the house can do to curtail expenditures when they are extravagant. Because an expenditure which is not extravagant, an expenditure efficiently made, is often worth while.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Coldwell: I said that an expenditure that is not extravagant is worth while.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Coldwell: Well, I would want to examine it. I am not even saying that I would know it was worth while. I have simply stated the fact that a worth-while expenditure is not an extravagance. In making that statement I am not judging as to what is or is not worth while. I am stating what, in Euclid, we called a self-evident truth.

Mr. Drew: Res ipsa loquitur.

Mr. Coldwell: And so, Mr. Speaker, I leave the matter with the house. I, personally, shall not support the amendment because I believe we cannot abdicate the responsibility the people of Canada have imposed upon us as members of parliament.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only a moment or two in this debate. There are one or two things I would like to say in support of the amendment, because I feel it is both sensible and sound. I do not think the proposal is suitable only to Americans just because the government of the United States has adopted it. Certainly there are many large businesses in Canada, which have, at one stage or another, called in efficiency experts to see whether a job is being done well.

The Hoover commission in the United States did an exceptionally good job for the Eisenhower government. They showed where literally millions of dollars could be saved. I see no reason whatever why, if a similar commission were set up in Canada, it also could not recommend many savings the government could make.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has suggested that the scrutinizing of expenditures is a duty of members of parliament, and particularly of opposition members. Of course it is; but government has grown so tremendously in recent years that it is physically impossible for opposition members to scrutinize these expenditures with the necessary care.

This year we have been sitting since early in January. I wish to point out that the estimates of only three departments, totalling $189 million, have been passed. This means that we still have $4·3 billion to pass within the next three or four weeks. I say that rushing through the estimates at the last moment is not good enough. But I do not think it is necessarily the fault of opposition members. I give the government credit this year for having set up the estimates committee, to which three departments were referred. I think that committee did excellent work, but I believe it is only a beginning. The government should go much farther. Perhaps it would not be presumptuous on my part to suggest that next year every department of government should be referred to one standing committee or another.

For instance, finance, national revenue and trade and commerce could go to the standing committee on banking and commerce. Perhaps agriculture and immigration could go to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization. Perhaps defence, defence production and veterans affairs could go to a special defence committee. Then, labour estimates could go to the committee on industrial relations, those of the Department of Transport to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. The estimates of the Department of Fisheries could go to the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and so on.

In other words, in my opinion, the estimates for every department of government should go to one standing committee or another for scrutiny before they are brought to the house. Moreover, I believe that every crown corporation owned by the government of Canada, should come before one standing committee or another. At the moment I am thinking of organizations such as the Bank of Canada, the Polymer Corporation, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, Canadian Arsenals, the Canadian farm loan board, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the printing bureau, Canadian government elevators, and so on.

Most of those organizations have not been before any parliamentary committee in the ten years I have been here. I do not think that is an efficient way for the government to run the people's business. If the estimates were referred early next session, as soon as the debate in reply is concluded, they could be given a much more thorough scrutiny.

Another point which I desire to make is that the opposition, which is so divided and weak at the moment, should be given experts to help them look over these various accounts. I do not think it would cost the taxpayers of Canada very much money to hire eight or ten economic experts to help us on the various committees to expertly scrutinize the estimates. I am sure such an expenditure would be returned many times over.

But even if the government adopted these proposals, I imagine there is still room for a commission such as the Hoover commission. Members simply have not the time, they have not the facilities, they have not the technical experience required to go over estimates thoroughly. I say that they would be helped in their duty by the kind of commission which is suggested in this particular amendment.

I wonder if there is an hon. member who thinks that in the expenditure of $4,500,000,000 there are not places where there is waste and extravagance. I know that there are some members of the government who have done their bit in the last year to cut extravagance. I would give the first credit to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). There are 22 vacancies in the Senate. He has not filled them. It is a good saving. I suppose it amounts to about $220,000 a year. Including office help, it may amount to $300,000. If further vacancies occur and are not filled, perhaps we can save additional money. I give the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) credit for saving fairly substantial sums. He cut down on the C.B.C. foreign service by about $500,000; he reduced the grain subsidy $1,500,000; the gold subsidy, $4,800,000. He cut down on the maple sugar subsidy, $400,000. He is taking steps in the right direction though I still do not think he has gone far enough. There are a good many other places where we can save money.

Mr. Speaker has done much in effecting savings in these parliament buildings. I have always maintained that here in the nerve centre of government, in these buildings, the taxpayers should be able to expect reasonable economies. Unfortunately there are still a good many departments which are duplicated. I give the Speaker great credit for having amalgamated the post offices of the Senate and the House of Commons. I hope he is going to continue along the same lines with other duplications. There are still about 25 other departments in these very buildings which are duplicates, such as the police forces, the reading rooms, the barber shops, the stenographic pools, the journals offices, the debates offices, and so on. I hope, sir, that you will keep on with the good work you have done, and carry out your job to its logical conclusion. Let me express the hope that the members of the other place will give you every co-operation.

There is one place in particular where I think a committee of the nature suggested by the hon. member who moved this amendment could do very useful work. Over the years our estimate books have contained a great many subsidies. I am quite prepared to admit that once a subsidy is commenced, usually because of an emergency, it is very hard to get rid of it, even if the emergency has ended. There are literally dozens of subsidies in the estimates book. During the supper hour I looked through the various departments, and would like to mention a few. For cold storage warehouses there is a subsidy of $500,000; there is a grain subsidy of $15,500,000; there is a maple sugar subsidy for pails to the amount of $100,000; there is a C.B.C. subsidy to the amount of $18,000,000; there is a coal subsidy of $10,000,00; there is a gold subsidy of $11,000,000; there is a subsidy on government annuities of $1,300,000; there is a butter subsidy of about $1,225,000; there is a subsidy to McGill University for a coal gas turbine of $100,000. Many of these may be useful; many of them are probably desirable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thatcher: But I do think that once these subsidies have been put on the books, from time to time somebody should review them, and make certain that the original need continues. An outside body, not having to worry about the political results, could go over these subsidies and make recommendations to parliament as to whether or not any could be discontinued, or whether there was room for reduction in some particular item.

Of course, it is too late this session for such a committee to be set up, but I for one wish to join with the mover of this amendment, in hoping that the government will take such action at the next session. It would be sound business practice.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, one cannot help but recognize the continuation of that good sense which the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has been showing recently—

Mr. Herridge: In getting fluorescent lighting in his office.

Mr. Michener: —in the remarks which he has just finished, and what I have to say to some extent will parallel what he has already said. The problem before the house is the essential problem of the house in committee of supply, namely, that of seeing that value is received for the dollars that are spent. It has been said that everybody's property is nobody's property. No doubt public property, which is everybody's property, is the responsibility of this House of Commons, and no one wishes to detract from that responsibility. It is clearly recognized. The control of parliament with respect to the purse is clear under our constitutional history, and the control of the purse has been the control of the executive. There is no question of abdication; there is no question of parliament shirking its responsibilities. The question before the house is how that responsibility can best be exercised.

It is true that the ultimate decision and choice rests with parliament; but there are many ways that it performs this function with respect to the purse. What we are considering tonight is an aid to parliament. Parliament has aids which we all know of and use. The Auditor General makes a constant scrutiny of the expenditures of the departments to make sure that they comply with the authority given by parliament for those expenditures in the various votes, and his report is a report to parliament on what he finds.

Then, of course, the house attempts to discharge that responsibility of seeing what value it is getting for the expenditure of the money. As has been pointed out, it is a task that is somewhat beyond the time and capacity of the house as a committee of the whole. Perhaps we have four weeks to go, and the amount that is still to be voted is a large proportion of a very large budget of between $4 billion and $5 billion.

I should like to refer to the assistance that was given to parliament by means of the special estimates committee this year. As I sat on that committee, I think I can properly say that to my mind at least it had the opportunity to inquire in greater detail about the work of the departments which came before the committee, the expenditure of the money which had been voted for those departments, and of the activities and results which arose out of that expenditure. But, as has been said here, the possibilities of that kind of inquiry are limited. One of the greatest limitations is that of party solidarity. In that special estimates committee the opposition are naturally the most critical of the government's expenditures of money, and why should they not be? The government itself is not anxious to bring out of the closet those skeletons that may be there, and therefore they are very careful to keep the door as tightly closed as possible, both in the House of Commons and in these committees.

As I said, the solidarity of the support which the government gets from its own followers is such that the opposition minority in the house or on a committee, while it is ready to work and seek information, is not always successful in getting it. As a matter of fact it is quite the contrary. While the special committee on estimates was a useful inquiry into routine departmental administration, I suggest that it did not fulfil the purpose which is envisaged by this motion.

That purpose is to have an objective inquiry by a non-partisan commission outside of the house, not composed of members of either the government or the opposition but of disinterested experts who would have the right to inquire and to receive information of all kinds which is necessary to come to conclusions and make the recommendations which should be made.

It has been suggested that this is in fact a proposal that parliament abdicate its responsibility. I think what I have said so far indicates my viewpoint on that, that parliament is in no sense abdicating. It retains its ultimate control, but it has need of the various aids and assistance which have been suggested. More particularly it needs the aid of the objective outside inquiry which has been proposed in this motion.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) says that we are copying United States precedents which have no application here, which are not needed and which in fact would indicate an abdication by parliament even if in the United States the Hoover commission has been able to perform a useful function. As everyone knows, congress is a good deal more independent of the executive than is parliament. Everyone knows that committees, both of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, exercise very wide powers. Those committees can seek and obtain information. In spite of that framework for inquiry we find that the Hoover commission was able to recommend substantial economies which none of these committees had discovered.

I suggest that the government itself has recognized the virtue of this proposal. It has proposed an inquiry by a commission outside of parliament into the economy of the country. That is no different in kind from what is suggested with respect to the administrative machinery of the government. Further, the government has recognized the virtue of this proposal in part by the inquiries which it has commissioned by private investigators into various departments of government.

Hon. members will recall some of those inquiries. There was the inquiry which was discussed last year into the Post Office Department by a firm of business experts or engineers. There have been a good many inquiries commissioned by the government to assist those public servants who are charged with the administration of departments. Those inquiries have been able to make suggestions for improvement in the methods of administration and for economy.

This is what one would expect would come out of a private inquiry reaching into all departments of government and having a view of the administration of the federal government as a whole. I said that there were some very good reasons why a private view is necessary. In the course of the examination of certain departments this year there were some very notable instances of the overlapping of the functions of civil servants in one department with those of civil servants in another. There is ample scope for the co-ordination of the activities of many departments which cross each other's paths. Therefore it seems to me that an over-all view, which would be an extension to some extent of what the government has been doing already in connection with individual branches or offices or departments, would pay large dividends to the people of Canada in economies and in efficient administration.

Another reason why the suggestion is timely is to be found in the course taken by public finance in this country in the last five years. The predecessor of the present Minister of Finance followed a policy which produced undeclared or unpredicted surpluses, or at least surpluses of undeclared proportions and unpredicted size in each of several years. That method of budgeting was not a deliberate production of surpluses for the purpose of reducing the public debt; at least it was not the avowed production of surpluses to reduce the public debt. If it had been, one could have understood and approved of it as an example of cyclical budgeting on the theory of surpluses in good times with the possibility of deficits in less good times. But that was not the declaration or the admission of the Department of Finance.

So we had in effect large surpluses produced which were not expected and which I think were to some extent embarrassing because they had not been predicted. Of course in circumstances where there is money lying around there is always someone ready to devise a method of spending it or to make use of it for one scheme or another which may be his particular hobby. Civil servants are no different from other people in that respect.

I suggest that the fiscal policy of this country during the last five years, producing as it did unexpectedly large surpluses which were not appropriated for the purpose of debt reduction but which just had to be expended as an unexpected surplus, which had to be spent, meant a debauching of the public service of the country by leaving around too much money for them to expend.

Every man in a job likes to do as well as he can. That often involves the expansion of staff and the increase of functions. The thing snowballs until we have departments which today are spending twenty times what they were spending ten years ago. Many departments have been through an experience of that kind. Many of them not only have had an experience of that kind but they have had the experience of the opportunities that came with war. In the case of those who administered the Department of National Defence, all one had to do was to ask and he would receive. No one questioned expenditures directed to the winning of the war. But that kind of attitude toward public funds which can develop in wartime must be checked eventually. I suggest that the government has never faced that issue and we still have a Department of National Defence which feels that all it has to do is to ask and it will receive.

With that immediate background to public administration in this country, it seems to me that this is a most opportune time to ask for the sort of inquiry which has been suggested. Ordinary expenditures of government have risen from $500 million in 1939 to $2,500 million today, five times what they were a bare sixteen years ago. Taking into account the expansion of the country, the inflation of the dollar and a number of other things, there is still a great deal of inflation in the expenditures of the departments themselves, which deserves inquiry to satisfy the house that it is getting value for its dollar. It is the responsibility of the house to be satisfied. This is a method by which it can be satisfied. It is a means by which the house can more effectively discharge its responsibilities.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house calls for the appointment of a commission—I quote from the motion itself—"with powers to examine into and report upon the organization of the various departments of the Canadian government". If that is all that the motion seeks to accomplish, it certainly does not bear out the intention of those who have spoken so far in respect to government expenditures or extravagances, because it does not refer to extravagance and it does not even refer to expenditures. It has to do with the organization of the various departments of the Canadian government. All that that commission would be in effect is an advisory committee to the Prime Minister, because the Prime Minister is the one who is responsible for the organization of the various departments. He is responsible for the appointment of the various ministers who head those departments, and of course the ministers in turn take the responsibility for the internal organization of the departments over which they are head. So all this motion would accomplish if it passed would be to set up an advisory committee to the Prime Minister giving him advice as to how the various departments should be set up. On that basis, of course, it falls far short of any inquiry in the real sense of the word into extravagance or expenditure and for that reason, I believe, is quite inadequate to the situation which is being discussed.

However, I realize that behind the motion is the intention, as expressed by various members so far, of trying to find out and correct any extravagances which may be found in government. But it should be clearly understood that there is a differentiation between extravagance or waste or inefficiency on the one hand and expenditures as such on the other. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher), who spoke a few moments ago, did not seem to understand the distinction or did not see fit to state so, because in trying to justify his criticism of inefficiency and extravagance he used examples which had nothing to do with inefficiency and extravagance at all. They had to do with government policy, or rather with policy passed by this parliament. He referred to subsidies, for example, the feed grain subsidy and that on butter. That has nothing whatsoever to do with inefficiency and extravagance; it is the carrying out of a policy laid down by this parliament. The government is doing something which parliament has authorized it to do. It is doing that efficiently. If it is paying out these subsidies in an efficient manner, then there is no extravagance or inefficiency involved at all in the matter. If there is inefficiency in the administration of those subsidies, then to the extent that there is inefficiency there is waste.

But the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre was not complaining about any inefficiency; as a matter of fact he was complaining about too much efficiency in the paying out of subsidies, because he wanted the subsidies cut down and he wanted less subsidies paid out. This is rather a strange position to take, because he could have gone on to cite the greatest example of a subsidy in this country, which would eclipse altogether all the little ones he has mentioned. He could have mentioned the Canadian tariff structure, the biggest subsidy in the history of Canada, a subsidy which makes all the other subsidies look like peanuts. It is a subsidy which is the umbrella under which manufacturers have been operating, the chief among the beneficiaries, of course, being the hardware business. If we are going to talk about subsidies as such, we would have to begin with the tariff structure and work our way down to these other things, rather than begin with the little things.

Mr. Thatcher: I would like to see that tariff abolished too.

Mr. Zaplitny: I may have a convert.

An hon. Member: He will be back with you, the first thing you know.

Mr. Zaplitny: Seriously, to come back to the motion itself, it is necessary to differentiate clearly in our minds and in our presentation here between the expenditure as such authorized by parliament on the one hand and waste and extravagance on the other. If we do not do that, we shall leave a false impression in the minds of the public. Statements have been made that parliament is not always looked upon very kindly by the public. Quite often it is parliament that is to blame, not because of the way it carries out its duties but because of what members say about themselves. If we leave the impression that every time we pay a subsidy or make an authorization of expenditure which runs into hundreds of millions, for example, national defence, which runs into billions, we are wasting money and being extravagant, we deserve to be criticized, but we are leaving a false impression. Every expenditure is passed by parliament, and if that expenditure is made efficiently then there is no extravagance involved; it is a simple business operation. But there are legitimate cases of extravagance and waste, and that is what we have to go after.

I can give one example of extravagance of which I would like to hear an explanation by the Minister of Finance or some other person authorized to give it. For example, recently I received a return in which it is shown that three cabinet ministers have permanent passes on the T.C.A. which permit them to use the facilities of the T.C.A. at any time anywhere. To my way of thinking, in the first place that is quite unnecessary, and in the second place quite unfair. There is no justification for it. If the government can justify that kind of thing, then I should like to hear the explanation. Some may say that after all we are not throwing money away but we are just giving free rides to these ministers, but at the same time it costs money to transport people. There are three cabinet ministers, all of whom, I assume, have expense accounts, and on every legitimate trip they make on government business they are legally permitted to put that down on the expense account and that is paid for. What purpose can be served by giving those three ministers permanent passes which permit them to fly to any part of the world where T.C.A. flies, whether it is on government business or for a fishing trip or any other purpose? It might even be for the purpose of speaking at an election campaign somewhere.

An hon. Member: They would not do anything like that.

Mr. Zaplitny: No, they would not. To my mind that is one type of expenditure which is an extravagance and a waste, for which the taxpayer is paying, and which is absolutely unnecessary and unjustified. There should be an explanation for it. I could give other examples, but our greatest disability lies in what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), my leader, expressed as the veil of secrecy. It is a serious matter. It is a matter about which a great many taxpayers today are beginning to ask questions, and they are quite justified in asking those questions. For example, when we say we are spending approximately $2 billion a year for national defence they want to know just what we are getting for the $2 billion. They are not saying it is too much or too little. They are in no position to say that any more, if I may be permitted to say so, than we are because we are not able to get the information they want. They want to know, when we authorize an expenditure of $2 billion, how many planes, how many tanks and other types of equipment we are getting for the money, the cost of each unit, where the money is being spent, how it is being spent, and to what extent it is necessary for the defence of Canada.

When we try to get that information we are told that a great deal of it is not available because it is of a secret nature and to reveal it might result in giving information to the enemy. I for one certainly would not advocate anything which would result in any potential enemy of Canada obtaining information it could not get otherwise. But I am afraid that at times we "kid" ourselves if we think that the kind of information we need in order to justify that kind of expenditure is the kind of information that the potential enemy either does not have or cannot get.

When it is a question of the cost of the equipment, the way in which government contracts are granted, the margin of profit on such contracts and so on, these are not matters of a military nature. However, if the government feels some danger is involved in informing members of the House of Commons of the details of national defence I suggest—I for one would be prepared to do this although others may not—the setting up of a committee of the house whose meetings would be held in camera. It could be made perfectly clear that the information would only be revealed in confidence and if the government insisted I would be prepared to take an oath of secrecy with respect to such information as, in the opinion of the government or in my opinion, would be of value to the enemy.

But I am quite satisfied in my own mind that the things we would like to know about expenditures on national defence are not the kind of things that would be of any value to anyone except as information to the Canadian taxpayers. That is one way in which a great deal more of detailed information could be given. Then we as members of the house would be in a position to judge and would be able to inform the taxpayers of Canada whether their money was being efficiently handled.

Another department with respect to which we are under the same disability, and this matter has been mentioned recently on a number of occasions, is the Department of National Revenue. Under the terms of the Financial Administration Act that department is authorized to make refunds or remissions of taxes. I was going to say "kickbacks" but that might be the wrong word. Only recently certain remissions were made to private corporations amounting to approximately $2 million, a considerable amount of money at any time. We have sought to obtain an explanation of the reasoning leading to the making of these remissions which, after all, involved the giving back to private concerns of money already in the public treasury. But when we get down to the hub of the question we are told that the secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act do not permit the minister to disclose the information.

Mr. Harris: May I ask a question? I recall the debate on that particular point, and I thought it ended by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) saying he would discuss the question on his estimates. I do not recall that he refused the information on the subject of the particular remissions to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. Zaplitny: The question was raised in the house more than two months ago and was raised again later. The Minister of National Revenue has had plenty of opportunity to give the information requested to the house but so far he has not done so.

Mr. Harris: He said he would do so on his estimates.

Mr. Zaplitny: The information already asked for has been refused by virtue of the secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is partly right when he states that the Minister of National Revenue promised to give an explanation of the particular case to which I referred during the discussion of his estimates, but the minister will recall that previously I asked by way of a return for the correspondence dealing with the dispute between the department and the companies concerned in that case, which is actually the information needed to enable us to pass upon the case and decide whether the money was remitted to these companies in a proper manner. That information was refused by the Minister of National Revenue on the basis of the secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act—again the veil of secrecy.

These are the kind of things that make it difficult for us to obtain the necessary information in order for us to be able to judge these matters. May I say here that I am not criticizing anyone in particular because I am sure all members of the house, whether on the opposition benches or sitting behind the government, want to have factual information about every dollar that is spent because, after all, it is the taxpayers' money that is being spent. We represent the taxpayers so that we have an inherent right to that information, but we cannot obtain it.

Before leaving this matter there is one thing more I should like to point out. Quite often we talk about inefficiency and extravagance when we speak of government expenditures, and it is quite legitimate to do so. After all, this is the forum of the country. But I would not want to leave the impression that the only place where there is inefficiency or extravagance in the handling of money is in connection with government expenditures because to do so would be to leave a wrong impression in the public mind. I am quite convinced, and I am sure those who are familiar with private business will agree with me, that in the huge privately owned financial and industrial corporations of this country there is a great deal of extravagance and inefficiency, but because it is not something in which the public are directly interested it is never brought to light. It is also said it is no concern of ours.

For example, if the Ford Motor Company or General Motors wasted $500 million we would say they were wasting their own money so why should we care, but if the government wastes $100 we want to know why. That is perfectly true so far as our direct responsibilities are concerned, but let us not forget we have an indirect responsibility so far as private business is concerned. If a huge corporation, through inefficiency, extravagance or for some other reason, wastes a few million dollars that amount of money must be charged to the consumer who buys their product. This is an indirect form of taxation which every consumer must pay, and therefore I should like to see an inquiry into price spreads which would help to bring to light waste, extravagance and inefficiency in private administration as well as in public administration.

I say that in passing—of course it cannot be done under the terms of this motion—in order to make it clear that when we speak of waste, extravagance and inefficiency in the administration of government we should be careful not to leave the impression that all government administration is wasteful, extravagant or inefficient, because that is not the case. Any government, particularly a government that has been in power too long and has perhaps become a little bit slow at the switch, is in danger of allowing inefficiency and extravagance to creep into its administration.

If members of the house had the opportunity to obtain the kind of information which they want, I think they could pass judgment on government expenditures without the necessity of having any kind of commission. As I said at the beginning, I am not particularly opposed to a commission if it can perform a useful function. But the motion calls for an examination and report upon the organization of the various departments of the Canadian government. In my opinion, that does not begin to touch the question of waste or extravagance. It could, as is suggested here, add a little to the cost of government because after all the government would have to pay for the commission. In my opinion, that does not fill the bill.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to approach this problem in a more practical way from the standpoint of the government expenditures that have been referred to in the course of this debate. This afternoon my leader referred at considerable length to the amount of money that has been spent by various departments. Tonight we have had a differentiation made between those types of expenditures which take the form of subsidies and those which might be involved in connection with direct payments to maintain government departments.

I think the last speaker, to a great extent, used the same terms as were used by the Financial Times in its issue of about a week ago in discussing an address by Mr. Harvey Perry of the Canadian Tax Foundation. The article reads:

> The conclusion to be drawn from Mr. Perry's review of the tax situation is that we are today merely paying the piper. The people wanted family allowances; and they got them. They wanted old age pensions; and they got them. They may not particularly want defence expenditures; but it is incumbent upon the government to undertake them in the interests of the people.

Now, this type of expenditure is the type that ordinarily we can expect will continue. When we talk about a commission to inquire into the expenditure of government funds, then I think the last speaker made no differentiation between those items in which we may expect economy and those in which we may expect continuing payments, perhaps even on a larger scale. As a matter of fact, it seems that there should be no reason why we cannot approach the business of government in the same manner as any businessman approaches the problems in his own business. I believe that if we referred to the problems which arise in connection with production methods and controls, we could find a very good example to follow in connection with expenditures by government departments.

The practical situation is this. When someone is setting up a production line for a particular product he expects that, with continuing production, he may cut down his over-all cost of production. The larger his production runs the more economies he may expect. Apparently this is not true in connection with government departments because we have seen increasing expenditures far out of proportion to the increase in our population or even in proportion to the decrease, if I might use that term, in the value of our dollar. In looking at some of the figures I might refer to a publication entitled "The National Finances" published by the Canadian Tax Foundation for the year 1954-55. We might take a good look at this to see what is happening in connection with government administration. I shall probably follow the figures through a little more closely than my leader did this afternoon.

In 1939, professional and special services cost this country $4·1 million. Now, I think we could say that since that time our population has increased approximately one-third or even 50 per cent. We might say that professional and special services should now amount to $8·2 million. Then, economists will tell you that your dollar is only worth 50 cents today, so that $16 million might be a reasonable figure to spend on professional and special services under today's conditions in relation to the amount that was spent in 1939. However, we find that this government estimates it will spend $31 million in that category in 1955.

Travelling and removal expenses, if we applied the same principle of allowing for the additional people who must be looked after and doubling the amount to cover the decrease in the value of our dollar, would probably result in an expenditure of approximately $8 million on the basis of the 1939 figure. However, we find that the estimate for 1955 is $15 million. This trend continues right through the list. Telephones, telegrams and other communication services amounted to $700,000 in 1939. It might rise to $2 million under the formula which would relate it to the 1939 figure. Instead, we find it rises to $6·7 million for 1955. Advertising amounted to $1·8 million in 1939. Using the same formula we probably should arrive at a figure of perhaps $3 million. We find that the estimate for 1955 is $8·1 million.

This is a fairly large sum to spend on advertising. As a matter of fact, we have set ourselves up in government at a pretty high price. I have here a list of the amounts spent on advertising by the leading firms in this country. The authority is the Toronto Star records department. I find the largest amount spent by any corporation in Canada last year was $688,031. However, we apparently use advertising services in this government to the tune of approximately $8·1 million, perhaps 10 to 12 times as much as the largest corporation in Canada spends on advertising today.

If we apply the production type technique and if we, as an illustration, look at such items as the handling of family allowance cheques we may get some information. It is true that over a period of time we are going to find the number of cheques that will be handled will perhaps be doubled. I am sure that if the ordinary production line system were used it would not mean that we have to double the number of machines or the number of people who handle those machines. Perhaps 10 machines have been ordered with a certain capital expenditure. If ordinary production line methods are used I think the purchase of an additional two machines and perhaps an increase of 25 per cent in the labour force would produce twice the results. This is the lesson that can be learned from watching industry in action, and it is a lesson that there seems to be no reason to believe could not be applied to government.

Sometimes we ask ourselves, how do these terrific costs arise? In connection with the expenditure of our money on the armed forces, I find that for the current fiscal year approximately 43·9 per cent of the defence dollar is going to be spent on the air force. It is a very worthy branch of the service on which to spend it. We are talking about a lot of money because during the year we will spend on the armed services altogether approximately $1,863 million.

I would refer to the article concerning the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) appearing in the latest issue of Canadian Business. Approximately 43 per cent of this money will be spent on the air force. Someone may say, "I wonder how they can waste any money there." Well, the Globe and Mail of May 2 contained an article dealing with the answer to a question tabled in the house. It was shown that there were 5,570 air crew applicants for the air force during the year, and that 4,000 of them were rejected. Obviously if this type of recruiting program, whatever it may be, continues, then it can be expected that to recruit 1,570 men it is going to cost many times the amount that should be set aside for that purpose.

These are the things we should look into if we are going to save money—publication costs, and items of that kind. As I said before, I wish to stay clear of other items to which reference has been made from time to time—and I am referring to the payments of various grants through the welfare branches of government.

I could give another illustration, because I have in my hand another of these divorce bills from the other place, the only difference being that this time it would seem that they are going to put them on nice, sugar-coated stock. It is much nicer, and fills more paper. I am sure it does not perform any better service, and that it continues to find its way into the wastepaper baskets of all members.

[Mr. Hamilton (York West).]

These are places where we should look for economy. We could expect economies if an independent commission were set up to take a real look at the situation. I listened to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) speak about the duties in the house, and the committees to which various items might be referred. Surely after the performance we have had at this session, a performance which at every turn has refused us the information we require, we cannot expect to get economies or to get at the basis for economies in the various government departments through the utilization of that method. As a matter of fact, if that is the type of scrutiny that is to be allowed, then all I can say is that most of us will rot in our places before we will get the information we need.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pouliot: We are anxious to hear you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pouliot: I want to hear him at once.

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have four minutes before ten o'clock. If you wish me to, and if hon. members wish, I shall proceed for those four minutes. I shall be very glad to do that, and then I shall adjourn the debate at ten o'clock.

I am very flattered that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) just cannot go to bed without hearing my golden words. I will deal him a small hand.

Mr. Pouliot: This is the nicest part of your speech.

Mr. Hees: And may I say I have never heard the hon. member for Temiscouata more eloquent. He is his usual charming and delightful self.

I should like to deal in the time available to me with something said by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) about expenditures to which he objected, involving ministers having passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines. I disagree with him on this. I think ministers of the crown should be allowed to travel on Trans-Canada Air Lines at any time, just as ordinary members of parliament are allowed to travel at any time on the trains. On that subject I have said several times in the house that I object very much to the fact that members coming from distances more than 500 miles away from Ottawa are not given unlimited passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines. In my case, coming from Toronto, it is very easy for me to get on the train at 11 o'clock on Friday night, to be in Toronto for breakfast in the morning, to leave on Sunday night—

Mr. Sinclair: Whom are you kidding?

Mr. Hees: To leave on Sunday night and—

Mr. Sinclair: Monday night.

Mr. Hees:—to be in here at nine o'clock Monday morning, bright and shining, to grapple with the tasks of parliament. But I really do think that members who come from distances 400 or 500 miles from Ottawa should be given unlimited passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines so that they could travel back and forth as we do. This would make for better parliamentary government. Members would be more readily available to their constituents, and could visit with their families. My wife can go to Toronto and back again at any time, as can the wives living in Quebec or Montreal. But I think it is an unnecessary hardship placed on members who come from great distances—

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hees: If you wish to call it ten o'clock, all right.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not think it would be in the interests of economy if the children, as well as the wives of members, had passes?

Mr. Hees: I did not say that I thought the families of members of parliament should have unlimited passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines. I said members of parliament should, if they live more than 400 miles away from Ottawa. I was not referring to the children. It is important that members should be able to travel back and forth to their constituencies, so that they can visit the people they represent, and learn their views. They should be permitted to see their families far more frequently than otherwise is possible.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hees: May I call it ten o'clock?

On motion of Mr. Hees the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 1, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—ELEVENTH AND TWELFTH REPORTS—CONCURRENCE IN TWELFTH REPORT

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou) presented the eleventh and twelfth reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the twelfth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Fifth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Croll.

QUESTIONS

CIVIL DEFENCE—COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES

Mr. Balcom:

Would a civil defence worker, or any other person participating in a civil defence scheme or trial be compensated if injured in the course of his or her duties?

Mr. Robertson: Under agreements entered into by the federal government and the governments of Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, a civil defence worker in those provinces, that is, any person duly enrolled and registered with the provincial director of civil defence for and while actually engaged in civil defence work, would be compensated for injury in the course of his or her civil defence duties. Persons not so registered would not receive compensation.

Negotiations directed toward execution of federal-provincial compensation agreements are at present under way with the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—ADDITIONAL EXPENDITURE

Mr. Macdonnell:

How much additional expenditure will the St. Lawrence seaway involve, (a) between lake Ontario and lake Erie; (b) between lake Erie and lake St. Clair; (c) between lake St. Clair and lake Huron; (d) between lake Huron and lake Superior, and who is responsible for the expenditure in each case?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

By the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act adopted in 1951, the St. Lawrence seaway authority was incorporated for the purpose of constructing, operating and maintaining all such works as may be necessary to provide and maintain a deep waterway between the port of Montreal and lake Erie. Under present plans the authority expects to expend $2,000,000 between lake Ontario and lake Erie for further dredging in the Welland ship canal.

Though the channels between lake Erie and lake St. Clair, between lake St. Clair and lake Huron, and between lake Huron and lake Superior at present have controlling depths downbound of 25 feet and upbound of 21 feet the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act does not extend to those channels in which the dredging has in the past been done generally by the government of the United States. There is legislation pending before the congress of the United States to provide for deepening these channels to a depth of 27 feet.

RHEUMATIC AND ARTHRITIC RESEARCH

Mr. Goode:

What federal moneys were allocated for research on rheumatic and arthritic diseases in Canada (a) 1954; (b) 1955?

Mr. Robertson:

NATIONAL GALLERY—PAINTINGS PURCHASED

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. How many paintings have been purchased by or for the national art gallery of Canada in the last 20 years?
2. Who were the artists, what were the names of the pictures and the price paid for same?
3. How many of these paintings have not been shown to the public for a period longer than a few months since their purchase?
4. What were the names of the artists, the names of the paintings and the price paid for these paintings?
5. If paintings were stored in the vault and not shown to the public, what was the reason?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1, 2, 3 and 4.

Because of the present state of the records of the national gallery it would be impossible to give a detailed answer to these questions, without additional clerical assistance, probably for several weeks. It is intended, as and when time permits, with the limited clerical staff of the gallery, to put the records in shape to answer questions similar to these.

Questions

5. The reason many of the paintings are in storage rather than on display is that the space available for the display of paintings is totally inadequate, and that is one reason why the government is taking urgent steps to provide a new building for the national gallery.

COUNTY HEALTH UNITS, ONTARIO

Mr. Henry:

1. Does the federal government assist in the cost of the operation of county health units in the province of Ontario?

2. If so, what units have been assisted and in what amounts since the inauguration of the grants program?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—ESKIMO RELIGIOUS LIFE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Did the national film board recently produce a film dealing with the religious life of the Eskimo?

2. If so, what was the name of the film, and what was the total cost thereof?

3. What use has been made of the said film since it was produced?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY

Mr. Fulton:

1. Has the Guaranty Trust Company acted as agent for any government department or crown corporation in connection with transactions affecting real estate in the last three years to date?

2. If so, (a) in how many cases and for what department or corporations; (b) what was the value of the property in each case; (c) what was the commission paid in each case?

3. Was the Hon. J. J. McCann a director of this trust company during this period?

Mr. Pinard: May I answer this question orally?

Mr. Fulton: Which question?

Mr. Pinard: Question No. 30 on today's order paper in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops. The information asked for in parts 1 and 2 has just been given in a return I tabled to an order moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). The answer to the third part is in the affirmative.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

SALK VACCINE—SUPPLY OF MONKEYS

Mr. Goode:

Will the minister indicate to the house what steps the government is taking to ensure an adequate supply of monkeys for the production and testing of the Salk vaccine?

Mr. Robertson:

The federal government has taken steps to assure a continuing supply of monkeys required in the production and testing of the Salk polio vaccine. Discussions have been held between officers of the departments of national health and welfare, trade and commerce, external affairs, and agriculture, and of the crown company, the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Arrangements have now been worked out under which the Canadian Commercial Corporation will act as the purchasing agent for the government of Canada in obtaining monkeys under the terms of an export licence granted by the government of India. Monkeys required for the vaccine production programs at the Connaught laboratories in Toronto and the institute of microbiology at Montreal, and for the safety testing of the vaccine at the federal laboratory of hygiene in Ottawa, will be bought in this way. The monkeys will, in turn, be purchased through the Canadian Commercial Corporation by the three laboratories concerned, with the cost per monkey pro-rated according to the total cost of the shipment.

This federal government action has been taken to ensure a continuing supply and to meet India's preference for dealing with one agency only. The government of India has been most co-operative in this whole matter.

Full precautions have been taken to safeguard the health of the animals while in transit and to ensure their humane treatment on arrival in Canada. All shipments will be met by veterinary inspectors. Monkeys procured under this arrangement will be used for no other purpose than in the production and testing of the Salk vaccine.

The first shipment of approximately 1,000 monkeys, purchased under the procedure described above, arrived at Malton airport on Monday, May 30.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PORT COLLECTIONS, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Purdy:

What was the amount collected for the year ending March 31, 1955, at each port in Nova Scotia, apart from Halifax, by way of (a) side and top wharfage; (b) harbour dues?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Return tabled.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—MOTELS, ETC.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. Has the federal government any regulations in effect respecting the construction and operation on the trans-Canada highway of (a) motels; (b) canteens; (c) billboards?

2. If so, what regulations apply to each of the above?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

POST OFFICE BUILDING, TILLSONBURG, ONT.

Mr. Nesbitt:

For a copy of all correspondence, and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any department thereof, and any person or persons, relating to the purchase or acquisition of land and the construction of the post office at Tillsonburg, Ontario.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

H.M.C.S. "ALGONQUIN"—INQUIRY AS TO REPAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I have not been able to give him; perhaps he will take this as notice. Has the minister received protests concerning the transfer of H.M.C.S. Algonquin from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to Lauzon, Quebec, for repairs and refitting? Does this represent a change in government practice whereby repairs and refittings which heretofore have been effected in the maritimes, to compensate in some degree for the amount of new construction at other points of ships for use in the maritime provinces, will now be awarded elsewhere? Why did the government divert to privately-owned shipyards work which could be and has been done in publicly-owned shipyards?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Obviously I shall have to take this question as notice.

POLIOMYELITIS

INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT OF VACCINE AVAILABLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the recent shipment of monkeys to Canada, can the minister state whether or not there will be sufficient vaccine for all Canadians this year?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think I have answered that question three or four times this session. There will not be enough vaccine this year to immunize all the people of Canada.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES—SUGGESTED NEED FOR ECONOMIES

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, speaking in the debate yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said he could not support our amendment because he felt that if an independent commission were allowed to survey the operations of government and make recommendations for savings, it would in fact be an abdication by members of parliament of the responsibilities imposed upon us by those who sent us here. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said he felt this should be done by more thorough use of the committees of this house.

There is no doubt that a more thorough use could be made of house committees, and that expenditures proposed by the government should be thoroughly scrutinized by members of parliament. That is our primary responsibility; but I submit that unless an independent commission or an outside firm of recognized efficiency engineers is allowed to come in to survey the operations of this government and make recommendations for savings, then the operations of this government will not be streamlined and waste and extravagance will not be reduced.

I say that because of the way committees of this house operate. As we all know, every committee has a majority of government members. Take for example a committee examining the expenditures of a department, and they come to the item dealing with telephones and telegraphs. Quite naturally the members of the opposition object strongly to the outlandish expenditure on this account. The minister and the officials of the department defend their position; they say those expenditures are justified. The opposition asks more questions. The minister and the officials give answers of one kind or another. The opposition press their point that these expenditures are unwarranted. The minister and the departmental officials continue to defend their position. Then a motion to reduce the item is brought forward by the opposition; it is voted down by the government majority, the item is passed, and we go on to another item.

So every expenditure is passed by the government majority on the committee, not only for that department, but for every department of this government. I have been here for five years and I have known of only one reduction made in a vote in that time, and that was made only because the government admitted that there had been a bad calculation and agreed to change the vote on that account only.

The amount of taxes which the people of this country are paying unnecessarily every year on account of the inefficient operation of this government is very important indeed. I have risen on the second day of this debate to speak about it, because I feel very keenly about this matter. What we need is either an independent commission or a recognized firm of efficiency engineers to make a survey of the operations of this government and bring in recommendations for savings.

I should like to outline to the house how these efficiency engineers work. They come into a department and spend several weeks or several months, depending on the job to be tackled. They observe the operations of that department, and then discuss those operations with the personnel concerned. They find out why certain things are being done, and how they are being done, and with their experience based on the training they have had in efficiency work, what they have seen of other industries and other similar operations, they do whatever they possibly can to figure out a better and cheaper method of carrying out the operation under scrutiny. At the end of the survey, they make recommendations on how they believe the operations of that department can be streamlined, and they outline specifically what savings could be effected.

Most successful businesses have periodic checks made on their operations by outside firms of efficiency engineers, because they know perfectly well that you cannot count on a department head to make a satisfactory efficiency check on his own department. It just is not human nature to expect a man to criticize his own department, because in effect he is then criticizing himself for allowing outworn systems to operate, and having inefficient personnel working for him.

These surveys usually produce very surprising results for the people who have them undertaken. Those engineers who come into a firm from the outside look on the operations of each department from a clear and unbiased point of view. They are often shocked by operations which appear to those who have worked in a department for a long time to be perfectly commonplace. In these surveys, savings of 10 per cent and more on operating expenses are the order of the day.

Now, let us realize that government is simply the biggest business in the country, and what applies to business with regard to improving efficiency of operation certainly applies to government. From what I have seen of the operations of this government, savings far in excess of 10 per cent of operating expenses could be effected. After all, this government has been operating for 20 years with unchecked inefficiency. Mr. Speaker, if this government had to operate as a business does, it would go bankrupt within six months. There is no doubt about that at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, if an independent commission or a recognized firm of industrial engineers is permitted by this government to come in and to make a thorough survey of all its operations, savings of many millions of dollars a year can be effected. I say this government owes it to the people of Canada to allow such a survey to be made because in that way, and in that way only, the taxpayers of this country can be relieved of many millions of dollars of unnecessary taxes which they are paying every year because of the inefficiency of this government, and the waste and extravagance that has been permitted to continue for the last 20 years.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, last night in the house this motion was moved:

this house is of the opinion that consideration should be given to the appointment of a commission of inquiry under part II of the Inquiries Act with powers to examine into and report upon the organization of the various departments of the Canadian government.

At the time my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), took issue with the scope of the suggested inquiry, and I agree with him. Despite all this talk about efficiency engineers I still think members of parliament would be abdicating their duties were they to hand over the task of examination to an outside group who, of course, would then be in receipt of information which up to the present time has been denied to members of parliament.

While I disagree with the contention of the whole resolution, I nevertheless believe it would be highly advisable to have such a commission of inquiry into one department of government, and the department of government I have in mind is the Department of National Revenue. That being so I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson):

That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "organization" and substituting therefor the following words "and conduct of the Department of National Revenue".

It is most unfortunate that the servants of that branch of government who are capable, conscientious and efficient should today be lingering under a sort of stigma caused entirely by the political instincts of the minister in charge of that department. I refer, of course, to what is known in some—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has moved, seconded by an hon. member whose name I did not catch—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Speaker: He has moved, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie:

That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "organization" and substituting therefor the following words "and conduct of the Department of National Revenue".

As he was pursuing his subject I heard the hon. member mention the political instincts of the minister. I should like to indicate to the hon. member at this moment that he may not, by way of amendment or in the course of this debate, attack the minister personally by referring to his political instincts or otherwise. For his guidance I merely read citation 225 in Beauchesne, third edition, which is as follows:

Certain matters cannot be debated save upon a substantive motion which can be dealt with by amendment or by distinct vote of the house, such as the conduct of the Governor General, the Speaker or Deputy Speaker, members of either house of parliament or judges. These questions cannot therefore be discussed by way of amendment nor upon a motion for adjournment by way of standing order 31. For the same reason, no charges of personal character can be raised save upon a distinct and substantive motion to that effect.

Now that the hon. member has the requirements of our rules in mind I shall be very pleased to listen to him.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to make any charges against the minister, because I simply do not know what the facts are. Such being the case I am not going to make charges, but I am concerned about the integrity of parliament. I am concerned when something happens that perhaps casts a reflection upon all members of the house, especially in view of the fact that the whole situation could be cleared up very easily.

As far as this one department is concerned, the situation is that there has been some lamentable confusion. We have had the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) acting as a director of the Guaranty Trust Company, and possibly finding himself at times in a most invidious position. As a director of the trust company it was obviously his duty to protect the interests of the clients of that company. As a director of the company it was his duty to see that those clients paid their legitimate and fair share of estate duties to the government, that and no more; and according to the annual statement of the corporation it was his duty to give advice to clients whenever necessary.

On the other hand the minister found himself in the unfortunate position that, as Minister of National Revenue, he was responsible to the people of Canada and to this house to see that in all cases—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again, but in discussing the dual personality, so to speak, of the present Minister of National Revenue, namely that which concerns whatever positions he may have held in a private capacity and that which concerns his position as Minister of National Revenue, I think the hon. member is dealing with matters of a personal character.

That is precisely the point I was trying to indicate to the hon. member a moment ago. If he wishes to deal with that particular phase of the matter he will have to do so not by way of an amendment to the amendment we now have before us, nor even by way of an amendment to a supply motion, but will have to do it by way of a substantive motion. A substantive motion is one made independently of any other and which is capable of being amended. It is a distinct motion after notice.

Therefore I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to matters relevant to the organization of the various departments. As far as he is concerned it would be the Department of National Revenue. But if the hon. member were to go beyond that and deal with the position of the Minister of National Revenue and the fact that he may have other positions, the minister would certainly get the attention of the Chair if he were to rise on a question of privilege. If his integrity or personal conduct are to be questioned he is entitled to have these matters debated by way of a distinct substantive motion, and not in this manner by way of an amendment to a supply motion.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, what I was going to say today was pinpointed at one certain department, and it is quite obvious that if I continue along the line which I have set out to follow I shall be out of order. I am not quarrelling with your decision, but in deference to your wishes I shall now resume my seat.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of delaying the business of the house, but I would like to support the amendment moved last night, which truly expresses the wishes of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

In my humble opinion, it is very important that the said royal commission of inquiry be set up, in order to give satisfaction to the Canadian people, who are getting more and more concerned over the present government's exaggerated, not to say extravagant, expenditures.

To those who contend that a royal commission of this type would deprive parliament of its rights and responsibilities, I say that their argument seems to me quite candid, to say the least. It would undoubtedly be to the advantage of the government in power to agree to set up a committee made up of members of this house; but such a committee would be inefficient, since it would have a majority of government members. Information would be restricted and the door closed on many items which the government has no interest to reveal, as they might be incriminating for the future of the party.

This royal inquiry we are requesting has become not only necessary but indispensable. For the last twenty years, the same political party has managed the affairs of Canada and, owing to the size of its majority, no opposition has been strong enough to call it to account.

When elected by the people, a government is not given a blank cheque which it may use as it likes to the prejudice of the people by whom it was elected.

Some people like to talk about democracy and set great store by its definition. The motion before the house merely aims at forcing the government to act in a truly democratic way.

On the other side of the house, where the same political party has been sitting for twenty years, members have become so familiar with power that—and in this they are definitely wrong—they seem to identify parliament with their party and the taxpayers' money with their own.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): You are thinking of Quebec!

Mr. Dufresne: The people from Gaspe are of the same opinion.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): You cannot frighten me with your threats.

Mr. Dufresne: The hon. member should watch his step.

This false conception of power must be done away with in favour of an administration based upon the fact that the people are not mere voting machines, but that they are also entitled to an accounting of the money paid in taxes. They want to know whether this hard-earned money which they pay over into the treasury will be spent wisely or extravagantly.

Abuses have been pointed out in several departments and I have no intention of repeating what has already been said.

Let me merely call the government's attention to certain scandals which are daily being brought to my attention in certain arsenals, notably those at Valcartier and Quebec city.

Not that I want to generalize. I believe in the integrity of our people and of those who work for the arsenals. However, I have here revealing documents which provide evidence of a situation that is at best disturbing and which imply that some people take advantage of the influence they enjoy. Goods of all kinds are disappearing from the arsenals and are being converted to the personal use of a few people in key positions.

For some time now, hundreds of workers have been laid off at the arsenals for lack of contracts. Several of them came to see me and wrote to me saying that certain officials are taking advantage of their position. They also made statements which lead me to believe in the dishonesty of some people and in the existence of a well organized network to divert goods belonging to the people of Canada.

Last year, I requested that a royal inquiry be held following a plot which, in fact, led to some convictions. I repeat that request today. That inquiry into the arsenals should be conducted not by people who are interested in shielding a political party or in covering up for certain big shots, but by men with a sense of honour and concern for the interests of the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: As in the inquiry on the Three Rivers bridge.

Mr. Dufresne: In inquiries of that type held so far, it is the small employee who, in most cases, has been caught and convicted, while quite often, once the inquiry is over, the parties really responsible go on with their dirty work.

Mr. Speaker, not long ago, in the vicinity of the arsenals a tragedy took place which was even mentioned in this house. I think it was a result of a notorious bad example. Indeed everybody in and around Quebec city knows, from having seen it with his own eyes, that a number of goods are taken out of the arsenals and that the really guilty parties have not yet been found.

I would like also to draw to the attention of this house other expenses which appear to me utterly out of hand.

At times the government has to inaugurate a new public building, erected here or there in Canada. For that purpose, they muster one of the cabinet ministers and several party members who take this opportunity to deliver full-fledged political speeches—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): You certainly have in mind the provincial government, I say!

Mr. Dufresne: If my hon. friend wants to be patient, he will see that it happened in the federal field.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Do you imagine that people will read your speeches?

Mr. Dufresne: Very recently, Mr. Speaker, a train was heading for—

Mr. Richard (St. Maurice-Lafleche): What time was it? Were you there?

Mr. Dufresne: A train was heading for the Saguenay.

Mr. Villeneuve: Sorry, for Lake St. John.

Mr. Dufresne: There was a special car attached to it, carrying a minister and several members of parliament, who were to attend the opening of a public building.

An hon. Member: There is nothing odd in this. It's perfectly in order.

Mr. Dufresne: Now wait, and you will see that the order soon changed to disorder.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The disorder was your election in Quebec West.

Mr. Dufresne: As I was saying, they were going to attend the opening of a public building put up by the Canadian government. Now, it appears that the brakes of this private car used by the minister suddenly failed, as often happens among our friends opposite.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): And as it is happening in your case right now.

Mr. Dufresne: I know it hurts, but this time I am not repeating it to praise my friends opposite.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): We can do without your praise.

Mr. Villeneuve: Or fulsome flattery.

Mr. Dufresne: Then the brakes of the car in which the minister was travelling failed and crashed into a big locomotive standing in its way, the result being that the private car of the minister, rolling down at high speed, damaged the locomotive to such an extent that it had to be scrapped.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Or else it was sabotage!

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): As in the case of the Duplessis bridge.

Mr. Dufresne: And then the car in which the minister and the other members were travelling was also damaged.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Sabotage!

Mr. Habel: In what shape was your own car after the accident?

Mr. Dufresne: The other day, I used a little word which was afterwards ruled to be parliamentary, the word "niaiseux" (ninny). That word was precisely meant to apply to the hon. member for Sudbury who just—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Are you an expert at handing out such certificates?

Mr. Dufresne: He has never spoken anything but nonsense.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I knew very well that the hon. member for Quebec West did not know his own country. He has just said he had been directing his remarks to the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Mitchell). I would remind the hon. member for Quebec West that, instead of boring us with his platitudes, he should be studying—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): His geography.

Mr. Habel: —the names of the constituencies which hon. members represent in this house.

Mr. Villeneuve: He does not know his geography.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He has gone dotty.

Mr. Dufresne: I knew I had said Sudbury when I wanted to say Cochrane. The two are situated in the same mining district. However, it hardly appears to be a matter of great moment. In fact if the hon. member spoke oftener, we would know where he comes from.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): As for you, you do too much talking.

Mr. Dufresne: This amounts to saying, Mr. Speaker, that extravagances are taking place in various departments, of which the people should be made aware, since they are the ones who have to foot the bill. Besides, it seems to me that, whatever our political convictions, it is important that we support the motion now before the house so that, once and for all, the people will be informed of what is being done with their money.

I repeat what I said: let there be an end to considering the Canadian people as a voting machine and let them be given an accounting of the billions which they contribute every year to the treasury.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, just a few words to set aright certain facts which have been stated in a rather fancy way by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne).

Mr. Dufresne: Did it concern the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage)?

Mr. Lesage: It did concern the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources who, last April, owing to the illness of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) represented him at the opening of the new federal building at Roberval, and he did so at the invitation of the chamber of commerce, the mayor and councillors of Roberval.

As has been the practice in the past under similar circumstances—as far as one can remember—the minister used one of the private cars placed at the disposal of members of the cabinet, to travel to Roberval. And, as the parliamentary assistants to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Bourget) and to the Postmaster General (Mr. Kirk) had been invited to Roberval, they accompanied the minister.

I went, together with these gentlemen, to Roberval where a public building was inaugurated. Contrary to certain customs quite prevalent in the province of Quebec, customs which are observed by members of another political party for which the hon. member for Quebec West shows much sympathy—

Mr. Dufresne: It is the best part of his speech.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is surprising that you should realize it.

Mr. Lesage: —I did not make a partisan political speech. Those who were with me did not make any such speech either because the occasion was not suitable. The parish priest of Roberval was there and the respect I have for the representatives of religious authority always prevents me—contrary to some other people—from talking politics in their presence.

In the evening, we came back by motor car from Roberval to Chambord. Immediately upon our arrival at Chambord, we learned that the private car, from which an engine had been uncoupled a few moments earlier, started moving down the sloping siding and was later struck by the train coming from Dolbeau. Obviously, the engine and the private car were damaged.

Mr. Speaker, I rose to set the record straight so that nobody might believe that "order had changed to disorder", as stated by the hon. member for Quebec West.

On the other hand, no wonder that the hon. member for Quebec West resorted to such language, because as soon as he has the opportunity to make insinuations calculated to smear members of the cabinet—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lesage:—and the members on this side of the house, he does so.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Lesage: This is a practice scarcely to be tolerated in silence.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources suggested just now that I made some insinuations with the intent to smear members of this house. As I never had such intentions, and never used any expression that could smear anyone, I would ask the hon. minister to have the courage to withdraw the unparliamentary expressions he just used.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): How irresponsible!

Mr. Dufresne: The hon. member for Portneuf just saw himself in a looking-glass.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Quebec West made a speech a moment ago in which he made certain charges. The hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources replied to that speech and said that certain remarks made by the hon. member were insinuations—

Mr. Habel: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker:—adding, according to the member for Quebec West, that they were being made "for the purpose of smearing"; however, I did not hear him accuse the hon. member of making insinuations "for the purpose of smearing". I heard the minister say that the hon. member for Quebec West had made insinuations the effect of which was to smear. Now I do not mean this as quibbling. Perhaps I should have referred the member for Quebec West to rule 41 of the standing orders, when he was making his speech. I did not. Nor am I now asking the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, under the same rule, to make a withdrawal. When an hon. member makes a provocative speech, he must necessarily expect a provocative reply. I believe that, all told, the words spoken are about even and that the incident should be considered closed.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Put on the hat.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Does the hat fit you?

(Text):

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the subamendment which is before the house at the present time I should like to emphasize that the Department of National Revenue is one of the most important departments of government. With this department not being operated in a proper manner other departments of government, especially those concerned with spending, would find their source of revenue dried up. I think on the whole the Department of National Revenue has a good record, but there have been times in Canadian history, and I think the present is such a time, when the people have been annoyed with the veil of secrecy drawn around this department. For more than a month hon. members of this house have been denied legitimate information which they should have as the elected representatives of the people.

It should be noted that a great many individuals and firms perform services for the government in the collecting and remitting to Ottawa of income and corporation taxes, without any compensation for such work. This places a real burden on Canadian business organizations and individuals. If we are to have the continued co-operation of all those performing collection services for the government then the government of Canada, particularly the Minister of National Revenue, must come clean and give a full and frank accounting of the operations of the department.

It is over 20 years since this department was in the public eye to the extent that it is at the moment. On February 5, 1926, the House of Commons adopted unanimously a resolution that a special committee of the house consisting of nine members be appointed forthwith to investigate the administration of the department of customs and excise, as it was then known, and the alleged serious losses to the public treasury because of inefficiency and corruption on the part of officers of the department and others. Later that year, on June 29, 1926, the special committee reported as follows:

> Since the inquiry indicates that the smuggling evils are so extensive and their ramifications so far-reaching that only a portion of the illegal practices have been brought to light, your committee recommends the appointment of a judicial commission with full power to continue and complete investigating the administration of the department of customs and excise and to prosecute all offenders, and that such judicial commission should consist of a judge to be named by the two judges of the Exchequer Court of Canada, said judge acting as a commission, to have all the powers conferred upon such commission under the Public Inquiries Act. The said commission to have powers to make findings and recommendations and to report the same to parliament at the opening of the next session together with the evidence taken before the said commission.

Government Services

In answering a question of mine the Minister of National Revenue pointed out on Monday that the members of that commission were well known citizens. They were Hon. James Thomas Brown of Saskatchewan, who was the chairman; Hon. William Henry Wright, and Hon. Ernest Roy. Counsel were Hon. N. W. Rowell; Mr. R. L. Calder; Mr. R. B. Law and Mr. Gordon Lindsay. The cost of the commission was $375,716.65, but I think most Canadians will agree that the money was very well spent.

The commission reported certain information which certainly was disturbing, to say the least. At that time, as now, the government was insisting that there was nothing to worry about, that the department was above reproach. I find that there was a good deal of information regarding operations in my own part of the country. Apparently quite an extensive illegal liquor industry flourished. Reference was made to the Prairie Drug Company and Regina Wine and Spirit, Limited, which apparently did quite a sizeable business. They bottled, labelled and sold liquors on a wholesale scale without a licence, contrary to sections 187 and 196 of the Excise Act and in violation of the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act. They applied false trade marks and false descriptions to such goods. Those two companies apparently had receipts from sales from July, 1920, to December, 1921, of over $2 million.

Then reference was made to another group of companies. I am not going to mention any names, as I do not know how many of these people are still living. I am sure their names would be familiar to many people in western Canada. They operated Canada Drugs Limited, Yorkton Distributors, Dominion Distributors, Gainsborough Liquors Limited, Gainsborough Liquor Company, Atlas Shipping Company and Atlantic Import Company Limited. I might mention that I am reading from interim reports Nos. 1 to 10, royal commission on customs and excise. This document is marked confidential, but since it is found in the library of parliament and was produced as a result of the expenditure of over $375,000 I hope I am not running any risk in referring to it.

Canada Drugs Limited did a really worthwhile business. They imported from the United States about 300,000 gallons of alcohol, brought it to Yorkton, had it compounded and bottled and labelled the compound as Scotch whisky with labels not approved by the department according to the Excise Act, thus giving a false description of the contents therein.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Gainsborough Liquors Limited and Gainsborough Liquor Company also did quite a business. Both these companies were located in the constituency of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) but he would not be aware that 20 years ago two such influential companies operated in this small town of Gainsborough, near the United States border. The report states that it was alleged by Inspector Knowles—not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—that on more than one occasion he had been offered a bribe to disregard his duties and desist from further interference with the operations of the firms or syndicates. This is to be found on page 54 of this report.

Then we have reference to Consolidated Distilleries Limited of Montreal and Wiser's Distillery Limited. The report states as follows:

> The evidence shows that practically all of said goods were entered for export at customs and ostensibly shipped to points in Mexico and Central and South America but that the names of the consignees entered at customs were fictitious; that the liquors were not landed at the points designated in the export entries but, on the contrary, were largely disposed of off the coast of the United States to be smuggled into the United States and to some extent were apparently delivered off the coast of Canada and smuggled back into Canada.
> The evidence also shows that false and fraudulent landing certificates were procured with reference to such goods and that such certificates were presented to customs and that on the strength of such certificates, the bonds of the respective distilleries were delivered up and cancelled.

I might mention that one of these two companies, Consolidated Distilleries Limited, owed $973,677.23, and Wiser's Distillery Limited owed $86,078.04.

I am sure that as a result of this royal commission the treasury of Canada benefited very substantially. I have no evidence whatever to indicate that these irregularities are being continued at the present time, but I submit that for the good of democracy and for the sake of the rights of this parliament the Prime Minister should ask for a free vote on this amendment which is before the house.

There are some things in connection with the operation of this department that certainly are not going to be produced to parliament but which would be produced to a commission such as we had in 1926. The questions asked by members on this side of the house since the 24th, 25th or 26th of April regarding the operations of this department of government, without having discussion, concern a matter which members of this house cannot accept without challenge.

I have a few clippings from newspapers. I am not going to mention them, but newspapers from coast to coast are disturbed because the Prime Minister of Canada has refused to discuss the details which members of the opposition have insisted should be made public. The Minister of National Revenue remained silent when a few days ago the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked for photostatic copies of documents in the possession of the Department of National Revenue concerning advances or payments made or given by John T. Drohan, since deceased, to James Dempsey some time during the year 1951, which photostatic copies were shown by the Minister of National Revenue to the premier of Ontario on or about April 26 or 27 last.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no good reason why a department of government cannot comply with such a reasonable request. In one of the two morning newspapers which reach us in time for breakfast I find that Arthur Blakely, commenting in "Ottawa Day by Day" says, "Reports current on parliament hill—"

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is reflecting upon a vote that was taken in this house. A motion was moved for the production of papers and, as was of course the right of the minister, the motion was opposed and the house decided by a vote that the motion should be defeated. Now the hon. member should not comment upon a vote of the house which has already been taken.

Mr. Nicholson: I apologize for referring to it, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps I might mention that in this morning's Globe and Mail Harvey Hickey has a dispatch referring to the questions being asked by the hon. member for Kamloops. These questions are on the order paper. He wants certain information which I believe could be given without violating any of the laws of the country.

Mr. Harris: It has not been refused, has it?

Mr. Nicholson: It has not been refused, but for all—

Mr. McCann: As a matter of privilege, that question was answered today.

Mr. Speaker: Besides the fact the minister has just mentioned, that the question was answered today, I believe by the Secretary of State, I should like to point out to the hon. member that we are dealing with an amendment that has to do not with the methods which may be employed by members to obtain information from the government, which are threefold, as he knows—that is, either by question, notice of motion for production of papers or a committee—but with an amendment to which he has seconded a subamendment having to do with an inquiry under part II of the Inquiries Act. The investigation which by the amendment is proposed be conducted is that the commissioners shall have the authority to report upon the management and business or any part of the business of such department, either on the inside or outside services thereof, and the conduct of any person in such services in so far as it relates to his official duties. That is the character of the investigation contemplated in the amendment. I should like the hon. member to make his remarks relevant to that type of investigation.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was in the process of concluding very shortly. It seems to me that it is not going to be possible for members of parliament to get the information regarding the operations of the Department of National Revenue that we believe we should have. I might refer to the question of income taxes. Those of us who come from Saskatchewan know that our people in Saskatchewan have been paying income taxes on a very generous scale. The last time I had occasion to refer—

Mr. Speaker: I do not know how I can make myself clearer than I have. If I have not made myself clear, I am sorry; but did the hon. member understand what I said a moment ago, that he should deal with the type of investigation which is contemplated by the amendment, into the state and management of the business of a department which is mentioned in the subamendment?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I was discussing, the operation of this department in connection with the practice of collecting income tax in different parts of Canada, so that people in all sections of the country would be treated in exactly the same manner. I submit that the practice that has been followed by this department in collecting income tax from farmers is one of the fields that should be investigated. If I am not in order in discussing that I shall refrain from speaking further.

Mr. Speaker: The method of collection is by virtue of an act of parliament. As I understand it, the investigation which is contemplated is not so much to change the methods which are being employed by the department under the act or the regulations under the act, but rather to see how savings could be made with respect to the administration of the department.

The hon. member, as he said, was just about to resume his seat; therefore I shall not press the point but will let him conclude. What I had in mind was that he should not go into the question as to whether or not it is fair for the department to collect in the way they are doing now, but whether they could save any amount of money by doing it differently.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the amendment now before the house, which would amend the amendment of yesterday, would read as follows. I should like to quote it in order not to stray away from it, if at all possible.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, I think my hon. friend has already spoken in this debate.

Mr. Nicholson: Not on this amendment. It is a new amendment.

Mr. Zaplitny: I spoke on the original amendment, not on the subamendment. I quote:

> This house is of the opinion that consideration should be given to the appointment of a commission of inquiry under part II of the Inquiries Act with powers to examine into and report upon the organization and conduct of the Department of National Revenue.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house the fact that one of the reasons we have to resort to an amendment of this nature and a discussion of this kind is precisely because we have failed to obtain the information we have been seeking through various channels in the past few months. As recently as the 25th of May, in speaking to a motion for the production of papers, the Minister of National Revenue gave an explanation of why he would have to oppose the motion. These were the reasons given, and I quote from page 4093 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I understand what the hon. member's purpose is, or what he has in mind. I fully sympathize with the hon. members who have moved the subamendment and those who have spoken to it. I sympathize with them because they have in mind a certain objective which perhaps they cannot reach by discussing this amendment.

The hon. member for Dauphin has just read the amendment and the subamendment. What he has read has indicated that the amendment has to do with an investigation under part II of the Inquiries Act, and that they do not want to investigate all the departments but want to inquire into the Department of National Revenue. When they say that, they want to discuss—no matter what kind of veil they cover it with—the matter of the Drohan-Dempsey affair, which has been the subject matter of several questions and notices of motions for the production of papers in the past few weeks.

I tell the hon. gentleman that he cannot entertain these matters under the present amendment. He may say the amendment was moved for that purpose. It may have been done for that purpose, but I am sorry to say that he cannot do it. He will have to do it at some other time.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, if it is not in order to discuss the conduct of the Department of National Revenue with respect to the particular case you have just mentioned, then of course it is not possible to carry out the purpose of this motion. I do not wish to disagree with the Chair at any time, but I fail to see how it would be out of order to discuss something which has to do with the administration of the Department of National Revenue under a motion which calls for an investigation of the operations of that department.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may do that, but at the time I interrupted him he was about to read the reasons given by the minister for refusing to produce a document which was asked for in a notice of motion for the production of papers. At that moment he was not dealing with the motion before the house. He was dealing with one of the three methods that are employed by parliament to get information. That is a different matter.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That point is quite clear to me now. Without referring to the actual words used, I think I must refer to the fact that we have been seeking information. I think that is the basis of the present discussion. That information has been denied. We are now trying to place before the house a method by which not only the information about which we have been speaking but all other relevant information may be obtained.

One of the things this house has been trying to be informed upon is what did actually take place in relation to this now famous Dempsey case. Since there is no other method of obtaining the answers we want to get, this motion if carried would provide an opportunity not only for the members of this house and for the Canadian public to get the information but would also provide an opportunity for the Department of National Revenue to place before the public and the house all the facts.

Mr. McCann: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry, just as you are, that I am denied the right to discuss this matter because of the provisions of secrecy which obtain in the Income Tax Act and the Dominion Succession Duty Act. If I had the right I could unfold to you a story that would raise the hair on your head. But instead of that I am obliged to sit here and be pilloried by people like the hon. member for Dauphin and the hon. member for Moose Mountain, who take the mean advantage of putting on the record newspaper stories which say they are "informed" or "we have been told" and in which I told you upon my word of honour there was not a word of truth. In 20 years in this house I have never heard of anything more despicable than the method which you and your seatmate there took to put this matter on Hansard.

Mr. Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the expression just used by the minister in qualifying the method used by the hon. member is too strong.

Mr. McCann: I gladly withdraw that word.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister has withdrawn that expression, because it certainly was uncalled for. I want to make it quite clear that at no time did I ever pillory the Minister of National Revenue. On the occasion to which he refers, when I placed before the house a quotation from a newspaper and the minister denied it, I accepted his denial immediately. I see no reason why he should use the rather intemperate language he has just used, when all we are trying to do is carry out our duties as members of this house.

While I am on that matter, may I say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made a remark which I did not hear. In case it did not get on the record I would ask him to repeat it.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like you to read into the record the newspaper story of what happened in your office in Manitoba.

Mr. Zaplitny: I shall be glad to do that any time it is in order to do so.

Mr. Gardiner: You are reading into the record now something that is not in order.

Mr. Zaplitny: I invite the Minister of Agriculture, any time he wishes to do so, to come to my office and examine the records and get all the information. I am not going to hide anything behind any veil of secrecy.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to say to the hon. member that I have not been in the habit of bringing here and reading into the record newspaper stories about anybody. But when my hon. friend gets to his feet to read them about other people, I just say that he ought to read them about his own office.

Mr. Zaplitny: I do not know just what the minister is trying to get at; but if he has any accusations to make he should get to his feet and make them.

Mr. Gardiner: There may not be anything in them at all. I do not know whether there is or not. And you do not know whether there is anything at all in half of what you are reading.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Why can we not get an answer? That is all we are asking.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have already said that as to anything I have said in the house with regard to the Minister of National Revenue, when it has been denied in this house I have accepted the denial.

Mr. Gardiner: And you go right on making another one.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have made no accusations whatever. I see no reason why the Minister of Agriculture is getting so touchy about this matter.

An hon. Member: Because he has something to hide.

Mr. Gardiner: I have nothing to hide, and I shall perhaps prove that to the satisfaction of my hon. friend who made the remark before the session is over.

Mr. Zaplitny: If the Minister of Agriculture is through making his speech, perhaps I can carry on with mine. We are simply asking for information that would clear up the confusion which has been created by newspaper stories.

Mr. McCann: By newspaper stories! I challenge you to make one accusation now.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): We do not want to.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member to reflect upon what he is asking at the moment. Does he believe that if there were an investigation under part II of the Inquiries Act he would get the information that he complains about not being able to obtain? He could not get it because the kind of information he is trying to get is information which he must get in one of three ways, namely by asking questions, and I think that has been done; or by moving notices of motions for the production of papers, and I think that has been done; or by the establishment of committees to investigate certain matters.

The provisions of standing order 51 have been used. There it is provided that motions thus moved are moved without debate, and it is the privilege of cabinet ministers to refuse the production of documents which are considered to be privileged, confidential, reserved or not in the public interest. What the hon. member is doing at the moment is complaining that, by the three methods traditionally afforded by parliament to obtain information from the executive, he has not been able to obtain that information. But if an inquiry were established as provided by the amendment he could not get any more information than he is getting now. Therefore I would ask him again to deal with the subject matter of the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. Zaplitny: It seems very strange that if somebody breaks the law it is not possible to find who did it through any channels in this parliament. The Minister of National Revenue denies that he has contravened the law, and I accept his statement. Then in another statement he tells the house that he informed the premier of Ontario, subject to an agreement. That was according to his own statement in the house.

Mr. McCann: According to what has been tabled. Why do you put words in my mouth? It is not according to my statement. The agreement has been tabled, and if the hon. member has not looked at it that is his fault.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I said.

Mr. McCann: It is not what you said.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Zaplitny: If the minister would read his own words be would have no reason to be popping up like that. On the 25th of May the minister stated to the house that under the agreement which has been tabled he gave certain information to the premier of Ontario, who also happens to be the treasurer of that province. That is exactly what I said. I see no reason for the minister to complain.

Mr. McCann: What you say now is correct. What you said before was not.

Mr. Speaker: May I intervene again. I do not have Hansard before me, but the hon. member is referring now to the reply made by the minister to the motion for the production of papers which was voted down not very long ago. That matter came before the house. The minister opposed the motion, gave his reasons, as was his right, and the house decided the question. The matter has already been decided. It is clear that the hon. member, by criticizing that vote at the moment, is violating standing order 41 which is to the effect that a member should not reflect upon a vote of the house. The standing order reads in part as follows:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

The hon. member cannot do that at the moment, as he is speaking on a subamendment to the motion to go into supply. I know what the hon. members have in mind, but it is through no fault of ours that they cannot do it. There is a motion to go into supply. There is an amendment requiring an investigation to be made under part II of the Inquiries Act. The hon. member is making a speech that is tantamount to criticizing the provisions in our rules for the obtaining of information by the house. It is a different proposition altogether. It is just as if the hon. member was talking about black when he should be talking about white. He is just that far away from the subject.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, in order to accommodate the house and the Chair I shall not go into the matter any further, because it appears that we simply cannot discuss the subamendment in the way we had intended. I will simply say that if an investigation is made, either as the result of this amendment or of some future motion, I hope it will be made clear at that time who was responsible for the information getting into the newspapers, to which the Minister of National Revenue objects, and which he states was given confidentially to the premier of Ontario as treasurer of that province. If the premier of Ontario was not authorized by law to make that information public, then he was the person who contravened the secrecy provisions of the act. That is something which should be cleared up.

Without going any further into the matter now we shall have to let our amendment stand on its own feet, and I hope the house will see its way clear to carry it.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of referring to the subamendment, which reads as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "organization" and substituting therefor the following words:
> "and conduct of the Department of National Revenue".

The amendment would then read:

> This house is of the opinion that consideration should be given to the appointment of a commission of inquiry under part II of the Inquiries Act with powers to examine into and report upon the organization and conduct of the Department of National Revenue.

I find it difficult to understand the reasoning of my hon. friends in moving the amendment to the amendment, for yesterday the stand they took was that the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition, asking for an investigation of all departments of government and their organization, would constitute an infringement of the rights and prerogatives of parliament. Now my hon. friends turn around and move a subamendment, fatuous in its terms, designed to give reason and responsibility to an investigation in a smaller sense which they say would be contrary to parliamentary procedure if it were extended to the larger field.

I for one do not intend to participate in the controversy that has taken place between the Minister of National Revenue and the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. The great "whodunit" of parliament will remain a mystery, it appears, as to where these photostatic copies came from.

Having said that, I want to deal with the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition. I thought in his speech yesterday he covered a field that demands and requires the fullest consideration on the part of the government. I should very much like to hear from the Minister of Finance what possible objection the government can have to setting up an investigation, as asked for by the Leader of the Opposition, whose only purpose will be to recommend economies consistent with government policy and in effect do that which the war expenditures committee did during the days of the war, when it investigated the various departments connected with defence and, having investigated them, arrived at recommendations as to savings that could thereby be effected.

Strangely enough, however, the attitude of the government seems to be that all is well. They seem to regard millions as trifles, to use the expression of Carlyle Allison of the Winnipeg Tribune. Certainly today parliament cannot discharge the responsibility of examining into the expenditures made by the various departments of government. I believe that a careful examination of expenditures would provide a fertile field for savings. As far as the house is concerned it has neither the time nor the facilities necessary to make the kind of meticulous examination that is required to bring about the savings that could apparently be made on every hand.

While in no way departing from the terms of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood, may I say I have often thought that the services of members of the house could be used to a greater degree than they are used today. In my opinion if a committee of the House of Commons were set up, representative of the businessmen in the house, and they sat down and examined one department each year, the savings that could be thereby effected could run into the tens of millions of dollars.

You ask what kind of committee do I have in mind, what members. I think of hon. members who are not members of the cabinet. I think of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), a man of great business experience. I think of the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor), the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher), the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider), and so on. They are men of business knowledge and capacity who have the ability to make recommendations that would be consistent with government policy, while at the same time assuring a reduction in this vast load of expenditure that today continues to multiply and breed almost with the facility of rabbits. On and on this expenditure goes. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), after months of endeavour, has made but simple and few reductions in the colossal load of expenditures.

Mr. Harris: $150 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes, $150 million—by cutting down defence and by cutting down defence production, because of the eased situation. But for the other departments of government the reduction of expenditures has been, to use a colloquialism, peanuts. It is meaningless. The expenditures of the defence department and the Department of Defence Production have been considerably reduced because of the changing situation in the world today. But, so far as other departments of government are concerned, almost in every case, and certainly in the majority of cases, there is an increase in expenditures this year, as revealed by the estimates placed before parliament.

Mr. Harris: And a net decrease.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, $4 million, I think it is.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, $4 million out of $2 billion of non-defence expenditures. What a saving! No examination consistent with the magnitude of the problem has been made.

The Hoover commission in the United States—and I am going to refer to it, not by traversing the ground covered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), but in a general way—achieved savings which resulted from a meticulous examination. A few weeks ago the Minister of Finance said, "Well, in the last few days of the session there is a rush; but it is not really serious. We voted $800 million in the last week of the last session."

Mr. Speaker, that type of examination is meaningless. I have before me the record of what happened at the last four sessions. It shows that on the last day of the 1954 session $60 million was passed.

Mr. Harris: Why did you not take longer, if you wanted to?

Mr. Diefenbaker: He says, "Why did you not take longer?" That, of course, is the usual answer.

Mr. Harris: And a good answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you not bring it on earlier? You had the Governor General waiting outside—one does not usually in debate make reference to the Governor General, but you had him waiting outside—ready to prorogue parliament. That is why we did not take longer.

Mr. Harris: Nonsense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But this year we intend to cover these estimates as thoroughly as we can, realizing at the same time the deficiency in examination which results from two things. The first of these is failure on the part of the government to answer. There was an example this afternoon of a question asked and unanswered, and which I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks. That is the kind of attitude we see on the part of the government—a refusal to answer ordinary and simple questions. The question I asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) was this: Where did you get the photostatic copy? No answer has been given. It is not an answer requiring any knowledge of law.

Then, I ask other questions of various ministers, and invariably a similar type of answer is received, when it suits the minister in question to give that kind of answer.

In 1953, on the last day of the session, $150 million was voted. In 1952, we see, $100 million was voted on the last day, and in 1951 the amount of $200 million. The minister says, "Why do you not stay longer?" I say to him that I hope there will be a reorganization by the government of the manner in which it presents these estimates to parliament, so as to enable a fuller and more complete examination.

What did the Hoover commission do? Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition referred to some of its activities and some of the results of its work. We read in the New York Times of May 21 that Clarence Francis, chairman of the citizens' committee for the Hoover report, a committee to which I intend to refer in a moment—> —predicted yesterday that if all its recommendations were promptly adopted the federal budget could be balanced overnight. He said also that its proposed elimination of waste and confusion in government could eventually reduce the national tax burden by 15 to 20 per cent.

Then he went on to deal with the first Hoover report of five years ago, and said:

> The first Hoover report five years ago cost the government $2 million and has produced savings of at least $1,200 million a year in governmental economies.

That is not an estimate by some fly-by-night individual. That is the estimate of a man who is the chairman of this citizens' committee for the Hoover report. He sets out in detail the manner in which those savings had been effected.

Do not hon. members feel that an inquiry of the kind asked for here would have a good field in which to work, if it were to look into the printing bureau, this golden elephant that has been so many years in construction and, so far, has cost $12 million? Is that not a field for investigation, to determine the whys and the wherefors, the reasons why construction has taken so long, what work is being done, how much is being spent for machinery, and what the total cost will be, before the final completion? That is an example. Then there was another example in that massive building built by the mortgage corporation, the building with all the modern conveniences. Certainly the places that are to house institutions of parliament should be in keeping with the general surroundings. But luxuries such as that are unnecessary and unjustifiable at this time.

As the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday, the Hoover commission's aim was to promote economies, efficiency and improvement in the prosecution of the public business, and it recruited the task force to which the Leader of the Opposition referred, and which I shall not repeat at this time.

What did it find? It found in every department it examined that there were savings, great or small, that could be made. It found that there was waste, and that the waste was in the nature of Lilliputian threads that finally bound Gulliver, that destroyed efficiency in government. It found that there was red tape which undermined and overlapped departments, and that there was duplication which resulted in needless expense. All of this took place in the matter of a very few years.

So successful was this commission that was started during the time of the presidency of President Truman, a Democratic president, that it was continued under President Eisenhower, and a second commission was set up.

Let me read some of the reports—and let me say I have read every one of them. There are a thousand pages of reports, and they are worth studying. It took a great deal of time to read them. In some instances, for one not trained in finance, they are difficult to understand. However, they do deal with subjects such as foreign affairs, national security organizations, labour, agriculture, finance, commerce, social security, public welfare, Indian affairs, the post office, independent regulatory commissions, transportation, and government in business. They point out the trend in the United States, one that is taking place here in Canada. They point out the ramifications of public enterprise to an extent that could never have been possible had it not been for two wars in one generation. They speak of it as creeping socialism. Having regard to the extent to which there has been an expansion in this country of public enterprise, in some cases in competition with private enterprise, we have achieved in this country galloping socialism, and within the last few years, through the establishment of government boards and public corporations.

The second commission which was set up in 1954 has given reports so far in 1955 on surplus property, food and clothing, lending agencies, federal medical services, personnel and civil service, legal procedure, business enterprises of government and natural resources. My hon. friends say that this would contradict the principles of parliamentary government. At the same time they say they intend to set up a commission that is to investigate Canada's economy 25 or 30 years from now. Let us have an inquiry such as is asked for by the hon. member for Greenwood in order to bring about savings. If they are even partially commensurate with those achieved by the Hoover commission in the United States they will run into hundreds of millions of dollars in the course of a year from now. But something more is needed than a Hoover commission, as they found in the United States. They set up the Hoover commission and it went to work on its task forces. Then, throughout the length and breadth of the United States, outstanding leaders in finance, in business, in agriculture, in the labour unions and in the fields of national research formed themselves into a non-profit organization in order to assist in the implementation of the Hoover report. In other words, what they said they wanted to do without regard to party or political considerations of any kind was to do away with the pork barrel pressure groups and substitute the cracker barrel pressure groups of thrift in every part of the nation.

These people joined together and met regularly, and in the various states in which they lived they did their part to help the federal government resist the inroads of those who forever are demanding extra expenditures, thereby piling up an ever-increasing load of expenditures in the land. The citizens' committee for the Hoover report really put the United States back to school to study citizenship. I do not know how many of my hon. friends have read these reports, but from time to time they issue a book entitled "Status of the Hoover Report". It is published by the citizens' committee for the Hoover report, an organization of public-spirited Americans, who, in many communities in which they live, set up organizations to recommend to the government reductions in expenditures. Three hundred of these organizations have been set up in the United States. Through books, pamphlets, speeches, meetings and television, they have aroused the people in the United States to the need of a great effort in a great crusade to reduce unnecessary government expenditures. They were thanked by Mr. Hoover. Their motto is to make citizenship effective. In March, 1952, when he met them, Mr. Hoover said this:

> You have given the nation about the widest education in civil government that it has had since the constitution was under debate.

All over the United States there are groups of individuals who are constantly on the alert vigilantly recommending savings to be effected. Their slogan is: "Better government at a better price." I can think of no better slogan for Canadians today in a similar organization. Better government at a better price by bringing into effect within this country, under the leadership of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), and of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), similar organizations everywhere, which would bring about a state of mind on the part of the public against waste and extravagance, which would assure reductions of unnecessary expenditures and consequent reductions in taxation as well.

When the organization started in the United States, people said: "Oh, you cannot do that. After all, how are you going to mobilize the heart of the citizenry in the United States in behalf of something positive like that?" But they did. The recommendations —and I have a list of them here which are pages in length—have been carried into effect throughout the nation. When they started in they found the same attitude of cynicism. After all, people say, you cannot do this kind of thing, but that committee, after operating for two years, was able to say: We have helped to reverse the trend of cynicism, frustration and indifference with which far too many people were coming to regard the unbridled growth of big government. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) used the expression "big government" yesterday. This group of citizens in the United States, backed by the will of the government in power that was prepared to take assistance in the setting up of the non-partisan commission under former president Hoover, achieved what was believed to be impossible.

They are able to say today: In the first five years we have saved at the rate of $1,200 million a year; and those savings will be increased in the days ahead, because they believe that every dollar that is wasted is a gift to the enemies of freedom. They believe that a crusade such as they are carrying out will in the end do away with extravagance and waste. The experience of the Hoover commission can be pointed to as an example of what can be done elsewhere.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned paper work. Well, we sometimes talk about red tape and governments having quadrupled work. Beyond that, I do not know what it is; it becomes governmental. But the fact remains that those investigators in the United States found that business was even worse in the keeping of unnecessary copies and the multiplication of duplications and triplications. As a result of the recommendations made in this one particular they found in 1954 that in the disposal of unnecessary documents the photostating of documents of government departments was sent to a central photostatic organization set up for the purpose. In 1954, $34,175,000 was saved on that one matter alone. I only hope that the experience of recent days indicates that this course is going to be followed by the government of Canada.

As far as letter writing is concerned, they found that it has multiplied per civil servant 9 times over what it was 43 years ago. They found that they could streamline correspondence. They found an effective saving in one office in Baltimore alone in that direction of $157,000 a year. They consolidated forms; they effected simplication. They did away with unnecessary records, and they say that when they are through with the organization they will in that one field save $250 million a year out of a total expenditure of some $4 billion.

Now, I suggest that on the basis of the experience in the United States this country is entitled to something more than a cavalier brush-aside of the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Greenwood.

Travelling expenses were mentioned. Well, we often talk about the money that we make on the Trans-Canada Air Lines. A year ago they had a surplus of $600,000. How many people realize that two years ago those who travelled from the armed forces on the T.C.A. had a larger expenditure than the surplus during the year? That is just one way of taking from one and handing to another. Certainly travelling expenses in the United States came down when travelling by those in authority in the armed forces, in the civil service, yes, in the government, found that that luxury was going to be examined and that unnecessary travelling, however interesting to the individual, was to be curtailed.

Then a word about paper work, and I am not going into the particulars in this connection. It was found that every filing cabinet of old documents that was retained cost $29 a year in office space. They were able to effect very large savings proportionately to the total expenditures by the means I mentioned a moment ago.

I do not intend to say more at this time. I rose to support the amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood and to ask the government whether it is not time to act and act effectively on a matter so necessary to the economic life of this nation. For as our taxes go up our industrial production finds itself unable to compete in the markets of the world. On that basis alone, aside from any other demands for economy, I ask the government to give consideration to the request that action be taken.

My hon. friend mentioned the publicity department. What should be done in the case of these publicity departments is to take an axe and just cut out most of what is being done. Instead of the torrents of adulation put out by publicity departments, it would save Canada millions if these bodies would simply say of the government: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in the space of a few minutes I want to say a few words on behalf of this group in connection with the request that has been made for an inquiry into the operation of one of the branches of this government. We do not believe that this is a proper approach to the question of the high cost of government. We do not feel that a single department should be made the target in an inquiry of this type.

On the other hand we believe that there is room for doubt as to whether or not the business of this country is being handled efficiently. I think we all agree that the government of Canada is big business and in the operation of big business I submit that it is sound common sense and good business practice to examine periodically the conduct of such business for possible inefficiency.

We are not laying any charges against this government, but we do believe there is room for economy. We believe that this government is well aware of the fact that there is a growing feeling of alarm among the taxpayers of Canada that the costs of government are mounting so steadily. We would suggest that it would allay these fears if the conduct of the business of the government of Canada were investigated by a commission of experts. We believe that it would be a smart move on the part of this government to announce the appointment of such a commission and to lay before it the problem of bringing in a report on the conduct of the business of government and of crown companies and to make recommendations for economies that might be effected in government under good business practices.

If the government has nothing to hide it should welcome such an inquiry and if mispractices are found by the commission they should be brought out in the open in the interests of Canadians.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise only because of something that appears in the press today which I think supports with still greater force the request that has been made for the setting up of a task force of the kind appointed in the United States and known as the Hoover commission. As the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has pointed out already, the absurdity of the subamendment is indicated by the position which is taken by the group bringing it forward that it is contrary to the principles of responsible government to inquire into departments by means of a commission of this kind and yet they find it quite acceptable to have the same kind of inquiry made into a single department.

Certainly we are not going to vote for the limitation of the inquiry. By their subamendment the members of the C.C.F. have indicated that the suggested inquiry is a perfectly proper course. There is another reason why we will vote against this subamendment. It is quite obvious that the intention is not to conduct a positive inquiry of the nature we have been proposing but rather to direct the attention of the house to something that can be dealt with more satisfactorily when the estimates of the Department of National Revenue are before this house.

We have indicated that it is our intention to deal with matters which have been raised at that time, and we shall certainly do so. That can be done much more effectively when the minister is called upon to answer than can be done in the manner now proposed.

I would point out also that the subamendment would delay the very thing that hon. members to my left are suggesting they want done. We say that we want this done when the estimates come forward, but if this subamendment were carried we would be denied the opportunity when the estimates came forward to deal with this very subject. Therefore we shall oppose the subamendment.

Something has arisen which brings into even sharper focus the need for an objective examination of the way in which great agencies of government are operated. When the Canadian National Railways were being examined before the railway committee of the house that committee was informed that the Hilton corporation would only manage, not own or control, the Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal when it was completed. The impression was left that the Queen Elizabeth hotel, built with the money of Canadian taxpayers, was simply going to be managed by some representative of the Hilton group. Here once again we have a lack of frankness which indicates the need for an examination of all the facts. Today the Canadian Good Roads Association—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) leaves me in some difficulty in that he has referred to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) which limits the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I feel that the remarks which the Leader of the Opposition has been making and which he evidently wishes to make at this time would be in order under the amendment but I am in some difficulty in that the subamendment uses these words "and the conduct of the Department of National Revenue".

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking to show that it would be unsatisfactory to have that limitation and therefore to dispose of the subamendment which would produce the wider result. What has happened is that the Canadian Good Roads Association have today made public the procedure that they found it necessary to follow in obtaining reservations for accommodation in the Queen Elizabeth hotel in October 1958. They explained that on January 18 of this year H. J. Nevin, the general manager of the Canadian National Railways hotels, tourist and convention department, wrote to say that the Queen Elizabeth would be very much in business for the 1958 date. Then on February 2 the good roads association, in replying to Mr. Nevin's suggestion that they should have their convention at the Queen Elizabeth hotel, asked that convention accommodation for 1,200 delegates be reserved for October 1, 2 and 3, 1958. On February 4 Mr. Nevin replied, and I am quoting from a report in this afternoon's Journal of the correspondence which was made public by the Canadian Good Roads Association today:

> I am forwarding your request to the Hilton Hotels International, who, as you no doubt know, will be running the Queen Elizabeth. And as soon as I have been advised of their decision I will get in touch with you.

Then on February 10 Mr. Nevin relayed the reply from New York. Mr. Nevin wrote:

> I am pleased to inform you that the accommodation has been set aside for your convention.

Mr. Speaker, is this not a humiliating position in which we find ourselves? An agency of government is constructing this big hotel with taxpayers' money, or rather with money raised by the agency with the backing and support of the government, and that hotel is then in the first place put under the management of the Hilton group. In effect we are told that we do not have any hotel managers in Canada good enough to run it, although United States hotels constantly come to Canada to get their managers from this country. When we tried to find out what the facts were, the veil of secrecy was thrown over us. Now the veil is moved slightly back, not by the government, not as the result of any opportunity that we are afforded here to obtain information, not because the government has decided that the opposition should have information of this nature, but because the Canadian Good Roads Association has made public correspondence in regard to this matter, and Canadians seeking accommodation in a Canadian hotel have to be told from New York whether we can hold conventions here in this country.

If there were no other single argument than this to demonstrate the need for an objective inquiry as to what is behind this veil of secrecy, this humiliating information that appears in the press today would suffice. We have handed over the control of our largest hotel, without any reason that holds water being given, to a United States organization, which may be a very good organization in its own country but which certainly has nothing to do with Canadian standards or Canadian traditions or our desire to run Canadian hotels in a particular Canadian way. They are the people who not only provide the management but sit in judgment in New York on whether or not we can have accommodations. Of course, one cannot tell. Assume that the National Liberal Federation wanted to hold a convention in the Queen Elizabeth hotel. I wonder how they would like having to ask officials in New York whether the representatives of a party that they still regard as a great party could meet to carry on the ordinary functions of democracy in this country.

This is the kind of thing that will be brought out into the open and examined properly only when we have a task force of highly trained independent men and women who can perform in Canada the same kind of job that has been done so effectively in the United States. Exact figures cannot be given. We are told by such a responsible authority as the New York Times that savings to the extent of over $11 billion a year will be made as a result of the combined recommendations of the two Hoover commissions. I am not suggesting for one moment that on a proportionate basis we could effect a saving of over $1 billion a year, but I do say that, on the evidence and on all that we see, there is every reason to believe that the proposal we made for a saving of at least $500 million was indeed a very conservative estimate of what could be done. But there is more than the money saving involved. There is also the question of how these agencies carry on their business. There is also the question of how that fits into our private enterprise economy. There is also the question of whether we are going to sell out the Canadian agencies of government to those whose real interest is in another country, no matter how friendly that country may be.

I have placed this before the house to show why this inquiry should not be limited and why we will vote against the subamendment and why, when that subamendment is out of the way, I certainly hope that the amendment will be supported. If the government should take the rigid attitude that this should be dealt with only as a want of confidence motion, then may I express the hope that, dealing with this on a technical ground as a want of confidence motion, they will not close their ears, and above all their brains, to the compelling evidence we have before us of the need for an efficient task force to examine the cost of government in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Gillis: I wish to announce I was paired with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the question should be put and determined without the attention of the house and country being drawn to this further demonstration of the attitude of complete indifference on the part of the government to its responsibility toward parliament. I draw to your attention the fact that so far in this debate, which is now in its second day, not one spokesman for the government, not one government minister, has advanced any reason to the house or to his own colleagues, or indicated in any manner whatsoever, why the motion should not be accepted.

All we have had is a further indication of the attitude of the government that—"It is not necessary for us to say anything. All we have to do is to lay on the whip, and give no explanation to parliament. By the exercise of the whip, and by the dragooning of our party majority, we will defeat the motion, whatever its merits may be".

I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that, apart from one or two irrelevant and trivial interruptions made by private members, mostly on the government side—there have been only one or two interruptions made by ministers—there has been no statement by any member of the government, with the exception of that which is found at page 4295 of yesterday's Hansard where the Minister of Finance said:

> If I may expedite the business of the house, I would point out to Your Honour that under no circumstances would the government entertain a motion by way of amending the supply motion as other than one of want of confidence.

He was there stating explicitly and clearly to the house and country that the government does not regard it as necessary to give any reasons for rejecting any motion made by the opposition or by anyone else in the house. He is simply saying, "We regard it as a vote of want of confidence. We therefore have to vote against it, whether there is merit in the motion or not". It is an example of an arrogant, autocratic and irresponsible government. It is another example of the way in which the government denies the very principles of responsible government.

This government, whether it realizes it or not, is responsible to the House of Commons. Here is a serious suggestion placed before the house by the official opposition, moved by the financial critic of the official opposition, a motion which most certainly demands from the government some explanation. Because, whether the minister realizes it or not, the people of this country are concerned over the steady increase in expenditures which has been the pattern during the term of office of this government. The people are concerned with the year-by-year increase of expenditures. The people are concerned to see that, as expenditures increase, by the same measure the sense of responsibility of the government appears to decrease.

I do not intend to detain the house very long, because it is not necessary to say much to demonstrate the complete irresponsibility and arrogance of the government. But what does concern me is the ready acquiescence of private members opposite, and their ready submission to the party whip, without a word of explanation from the ministers.

We have in this instance the Minister of Finance. Does the Minister of Finance really believe that the people of this country are—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George wish to ask a question?

Mr. Richardson: I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Fulton: I shall accept the question, but I would be much happier if the government itself showed the same sense of interest in parliament as the hon. member has shown.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Richardson: I was about to ask only a simple question, because the hon. member has referred to private members. I believe his reference entitles me to ask the question. Is it not possible that, after all, we voted the way we did because hon. members on the other side had not made a very good case?

Mr. Fulton: I was prepared to hear that sort of thing from government ministers. However, I would point out that the hon. member has not yet voted on the amendment offered by the official opposition. It appears that he has made up his mind how he is going to vote, without even listening carefully to the arguments. But of course that is typical of what we find; that is typical of the attitude of mind of hon. members supporting the government.

My concern is mainly with members of the government. If it believes in the principle of responsible government and if it believes that it owes a duty to parliament to justify its measures and to justify its attitude in connection with important questions which are raised here, then I submit that it should demonstrate that sense of responsibility by giving some reasons as to why this amendment should be rejected.

I was saying a moment ago that the Minister of Finance, on whose motion this amendment is moved, is asking the House of Commons to go into committee of supply to authorize expenditures for this year. Are we to take it, from the silence of the Minister of Finance, that he believes the people of Canada are willing to vote him this money without any explanation from the government as to the efforts they will make or are making to reduce these expenditures and to keep them to a minimum?

The Minister of Finance has said nothing in the course of this debate; he has merely applied the party whip; he has said, we are not going to give you any explanation or any answer to your criticism or any justification or reason as to why your suggestion should be rejected. The Prime Minister is here. The Prime Minister, as leader of the government, exercises in his person the collective responsibility of his cabinet. I submit in all seriousness that he is under an obligation, either through himself or through one of his cabinet colleagues, to give some reason to the house, not just to the opposition, but to parliament itself, as to why this method of approach, why this commission of inquiry, which has been found to work to such good advantage elsewhere, should not be accepted in Canada.

I do not want to go into too much detail on the merit of the amendment. That has been adequately set out by my colleagues who have already spoken; but I do point out that the government is not averse to the principle of royal commissions. Notwithstanding the fact that we have in Canada, in the government departments, a civil service of which we can be justly proud which has made and is making a constant study of the economic situation in this country, the government has not felt that it is a denial of the rights of parliament or of responsible government to move to set up a royal commission to survey the economic field in Canada and presumably to bring in recommendations upon which the government will be prepared to act. Because the suggestion comes from themselves, they regard that kind of commission as a proper, a constitutional move to make. Because this suggestion comes from the opposition for this type of commission of inquiry, then, judging by their attitude and by some of the things that were said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) last night, which drew applause from the government benches, it is somehow irresponsible and not worthy of consideration.

I suggest through you, sir, to the Prime Minister, and to the Minister of Finance, the people of Canada are not satisfied with the efforts being made by this government, because they see expenditures constantly increasing. If the government is itself unable to do anything to keep expenditures from increasing, then the people would, in my judgment, welcome a commission such as has been suggested, or would at least like to be told through their representatives in parliament why the government feels that such a commission would not produce beneficial results.

The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Revenue are here. One can understand why the last mentioned hon. gentleman might be somewhat reluctant to advance any views at the present time, but nevertheless he is there exercising his share of responsibility. It is most unusual for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration not to expound his views to the house as to why this suggestion should not be entertained. I can assure the minister that at this time we would be willing to hear from him if he entertains with respect to parliament that sense of responsibility which on other occasions elsewhere he has been so free to indicate he has.

Then, there is the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). Has he nothing to say in regard to this matter? Certainly, the organization for which he answers to parliament, namely, the Canadian National Railways, spends a lot of the people's money. There is the Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard). They are all here, Mr. Speaker. There is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the great efficiency expert. Has he nothing to say as to why this amendment should not be accepted? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has just come back.

Mr. Gardiner: Has the hon. member not read the budget speech?

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Agriculture is not usually reluctant to give the house his views, nor is the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). If the Minister of Finance, whose responsibility it is, is so reluctant, will none of those other ministers help him out of the difficult situation? I can understand the reluctance of the Minister of Finance, because, of course, he has no adequate reason. When the Minister of Finance speaks he likes to speak sensibly. He knows that he could not oppose this motion and still be sensible.

Mr. Sinclair: How can you judge?

Mr. Fulton: I do not like to believe that the government has completely abandoned all sense of responsibility to parliament. Therefore, I can only conclude, and I submit that the house and the country, exercising their judgment, can only come to the conclusion that the reason for the governmental silence on this occasion is that they know there is no real substantial answer to the suggestion that has been made. If there is an answer, I challenge the government to give it now and to show some signs of responsibility to parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sinclair: Rhodes scholar after Rhodes scholar.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member if he has not already spoken to this amendment, since he moved it?

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall have to wait for the main motion.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 18, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Pinard—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Elections Act including provision for an increase in the salary of the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be appropriate at this point to raise a question in regard to a change that has been made in the act, about which I am sure there is a very real difference of opinion. That is the introduction into the act of a provision that nomination day would be three weeks ahead of election day. There are many very obvious reasons why two weeks is adequate. I would hope that the government would indicate that it would support the change to two weeks instead of three, because that has been our practice for some time.

Mr. St. Laurent: The bill was introduced in the form in which it was reported from the committee, but we have ascertained that there was little consideration to that problem in the committee, and we did not want to bring in a bill that differed from that recommended by the committee. If it is the desire of the house—I know it is the desire of a large number on this side of the house—that the delay remain at two weeks as it has been heretofore, the government will leave it to the free vote of all members of the house if the suggestion is made that the former delay of two weeks be continued in the amended bill.

Mr. Drew: Then I would take it that the government would give favourable consideration to an amendment.

Mr. St. Laurent: Many members of the government will vote in favour of retaining the 14-day rule, but would not wish to impose a decision contrary to the recommendation of the committee unless it is the free expression of a majority in the house.

Mr. Low: I am very glad to hear the Prime Minister say what he has said, though I was prepared to speak in favour of the retention of the 14-day period as it was in the old act. I do not like section 8 in this amendment of the bill and I certainly give my support to the 14-day period rather than the 21-day period as it is in section 8 of the bill.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is unfortunately not here; he is in Winnipeg in connection with some celebration. The last time this matter was before the house he had some interesting comments to make regarding the filing of election expenses required by law after the election is over. I wonder if the minister could make some comment at this stage, keeping in mind the suggestions made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, indicating whether or not he will be prepared to include in the new act some amendments to the current legislation so that all the candidates in all constituencies of Canada would file returns and that these returns would be made available here, so that some department of government would be responsible for enforcing the law. I notice that among those who failed to report their expenses were several former members of parliament who should not have any excuse for not knowing the law. There were some barristers at law who should not have the excuse that they did not have the necessary education to complete these forms, which are not too complicated.

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is referring to some remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in the course of which he expressed the view that the act should deal more specifically with the personal expenses of candidates during elections. At that time he also mentioned the fact that there were a number of candidates who had not filed any return of their election expenses. At the time, I believe, he gave the names of a few of such candidates who have made no returns. I do not want to deal with the problem at length, except possibly to mention this. When reading his remarks afterwards, I find that he mentioned a few Liberal candidates who were defeated and also a few Conservative candidates. In so far as the number of candidates who filed no returns is concerned, I believe he gave the figure of 133, which is correct. And there were also 36 candidates of the C.C.F. party who made no returns after the elections.

An hon. Member: Lack of education, no doubt.

Mr. Pinard: In so far as the suggestion made by my hon. friend is concerned, I would think that this matter should have been submitted to the committee itself, when the question of expenses of candidates came up for discussion. The only change suggested to the act was in section 17 of the act, to increase from $1,000 to $2,000 the amount of expenses allowed to a candidate to be spent by him. It would have been possible at the appropriate time to discuss also the problem to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave his attention the other day. In so far as the other suggestion is concerned, as to finding ways and means of forcing candidates, either defeated or elected, to file their returns, I should have thought that this matter also could have been studied better before a committee which is charged with revising the whole act. I do not think that it would be appropriate for the minister—who in this case is simply the spokesman of the chief electoral officer, and is not to direct his actions—to make a suggestion that the act be amended according to the views expressed. I would much prefer to see such a question fully discussed in committee and that suggestions be made by my hon. friend and by all those who, like him and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, hold strong views in that respect. A study by a committee of that question would possibly allow of a better way of putting into effect this suggestion to force candidates to file their election returns, and, if they did not do so, be subject to a penalty.

On the whole I would simply say this. I think it is not an appropriate function of the government to express strong views on matters that affect the conduct of elections. This is a matter that belongs not to a department of government but to every member of this house; and in my opinion it is more appropriate that questions of that nature be studied in committee so that representatives of all parties may express their views and, in doing so, may have the assistance of the chief electoral officer so as to allow the act to be amended in such a way as to serve the interests of all Canadians.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Pinard thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 415, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I know we have not announced any other business for the remainder of the time at our disposal this afternoon. If the house would not have any objection to our doing so, we could call third reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, continue with that item and then adjourn even if it goes through almost immediately.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether or not any of our members wish to speak on that third reading. I understood that the minister was going to bring before us resolutions concerning the Canadian National Railways. We are prepared to go on with those if he desires to do so.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, perhaps there has been a slight misunderstanding. I thought we would be ready to take them but I did not think it would be this afternoon. I thought it would be the first order of business next week, among other things. I think we have a somewhat involved statement about the two Canadian National Railways resolutions. If the house does not wish to go on with the third reading of the bill with respect to P.F.R.A., I move that we adjourn.

Mr. Drew: I think that procedure would be more appropriate because I happen to know that there are some hon. members who wish to speak on this bill and who had no expectation that it was coming before the house this afternoon.

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, I shall ask leave of the house, on motions, to present four resolutions with respect to the Customs Tariff Act. I shall do that, I hope by leave, and make a short statement explaining the nature of the resolutions. I understand the practice in the past has been to do it in this manner. The resolutions are then printed in the same manner as are the resolutions on the night of the budget address and of course would not be called for discussion for some time until hon. members have an opportunity to look at them.

The first order of business will be in committee of ways and means, taking first the resolution with respect to income tax and the resolution following that with respect to excise.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 2, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GUARANTEED ANNUAL WAGE—PASSING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) asked me a question to which I replied at the time. I should like to refer to the question and to my reply. The question was:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I was not able to give him notice. He may wish to take it as notice. My question is, have any orders in council relating to the payment of the guaranteed annual wage been passed? If so, what is the nature of such orders in council?

The reply I gave was:

> The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

In giving that answer, Mr. Speaker, I understood from the question that my hon. friend was referring to orders in council that may have been passed during the last year or so since the guaranteed annual wage has been very much discussed. In view of the fact that my answer needs amendment, and in view of the discussions on this topic outside the chamber during the last few days, I would ask permission to make a brief statement.

The question of guaranteed annual wage plans is a matter for negotiation between labour and management, and the application of unemployment insurance benefits under any specific contract would have to be judged on the merits of the individual case.

In the newspaper story appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of June 1 reference is made to an order in council passed by the government which, in the words of the article referred to, "has only now come to light", the implication perhaps being that the regulation was suppressed in some way. It would appear that Mr. Swanson, who is widely known in this house as a newspaperman of the highest integrity, has received incomplete or inaccurate information on this matter.

Briefly the facts are these. The regulation in question was passed by order in council not in December of last year but on August 14, 1952. Second, there was no secrecy whatever about the order in council, since it was published in the Canada Gazette of August 27, 1952 and has since been contained in every edition of the consolidated regulations of the unemployment insurance commission. In addition mention is made of this regulation directly or indirectly in both the employee's handbook and the employer's handbook published by the unemployment insurance commission.

The purpose of the regulation was to enumerate certain types of moneys paid by an employer which would render an employee ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits, such as holiday pay and so on. The reference to the guaranteed annual wage envisaged a situation in which the employer paid full wages to an employee during a period in which he was not actually working. It would obviously be absurd to pay unemployment insurance over and above full pay during a period of idleness.

I might say that this view was fully concurred in by the unemployment insurance advisory committee on July 21, 1952, which was attended by Mr. Percy Bengough representing the Trades and Labour Congress, Mr. S. Wolstein substituting for Mr. George Burt as the representative of the Canadian Congress of Labour, and Mr. Jean Marchand representing the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour.

It should be made clear that all proposed changes in unemployment insurance regulations are discussed fully with representatives of both organized labour and management, and that it is the policy of the government to make no recommendations that will prejudice labour-management negotiations on questions such as the guaranteed annual wage, or on any other matter.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

TABLING OF ADDITIONAL RESOLUTIONS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I table the resolutions to which I referred last evening, and make a short statement about them. These resolutions call for amendments to the Customs Tariff in addition to those amendments proposed in the resolutions which I tabled on the night of the budget. These are not changes in those resolutions but rather further amendments to the Customs Tariff.

The first resolution proposes that the Customs Tariff be amended as of tomorrow to provide for the application of a special additional duty on imports of goods which have been state-subsidized. It is proposed that when goods of a class or kind made or produced in Canada are being subsidized by a government or government agency abroad an additional duty may be levied on imports of such goods equal to the amount of the subsidy.

Many governments are resorting to subsidies of one sort or another to solve certain domestic economic problems, and such subsidized products are entering international trade at an increasing rate. Such subsidized goods, if imported into Canada, might cause or threaten material injury to established Canadian producers. When our legislation was examined it was apparent that there was no clear authority to levy additional duties as a safeguard against the various forms of subsidy and state trading operations with which we might be confronted. The proposed amendment will give authority to levy an additional duty equal to the estimated amount of subsidy.

As hon. members are aware, we and other contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade have undertaken to limit the use of anti-subsidy duties. I can assure the house that the government intends to apply these duties in conformity with our international obligations.

The second resolution proposes further amendments to schedule A to the Customs Tariff. Members will recall that in my budget speech I stated that it might be necessary to introduce certain tariff changes later if it was decided to renegotiate certain tariff provisions which had been bound under GATT. The resolution proposes certain tariff changes as a result of renegotiation at Geneva. The main commodities involved are canned fruit and ethylene glycol.

It is proposed that canned fruit mixtures containing peaches, pears or apricots be dutiable at the same rates of duty as would be applicable to those fruits if canned separately. This has the effect of raising the duty on the product commonly known as fruit cocktail from 1 cent per pound under the most-favoured-nation tariff to 2 cents per pound. The most-favoured-nation rate on canned peaches is being reduced from 2½ cents per pound to 2 cents per pound. There will also be a reduction in the rate of duty on the melons covered by tariff item 95a, from 2 cents each to free.

We also recommend that we implement the report of the tariff board on ethylene glycol, which I tabled the night of the budget address. It is proposed to establish a rate of 10 per cent on ethylene glycol and mixtures of ethylene glycol used in antifreeze. Some of these glycol mixtures have been dutiable at 20 per cent and some have been duty free. Along with this adjustment of the rates on ethylene glycol to be used in antifreeze, there will be a reduction of the most-favoured-nation duty from 20 to 15 per cent on the finished antifreeze itself. Ethylene glycol used in explosives will remain duty free.

Our delegation at Geneva negotiated these tariff changes with the delegation of the United States. The rates on canned fruit and ethylene glycol were bound to that country under GATT. Before introducing these tariff changes it was necessary, therefore, to negotiate with the United States. The reduction of the duty on melons, on peaches and on antifreeze are amongst the compensations for the tariff changes on ethylene glycol and canned mixed fruit which we offered to the United States and which they have accepted.

The third of these resolutions proposes that the changes in rates of duty which I have just mentioned should come into force tomorrow.

The fourth resolution proposes that item 1019, which provides for drawback of the duty on bituminous coal for converting into coke for smelting, which was struck out in the budget of 1954, be re-established as of April 7, 1954. This will have the effect of validating coal subventions paid under the Canadian Coal Equality Act of 1930, which, by the terms of that act, depend for their validity upon the existence of item 1019. No change in effective rates of duty on coal is involved, for such coal has been duty free under tariff item 588(d) since the budget of 1952.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is it clear that the duty on ethylene glycol, as in the case of those previously mentioned, is the result of negotiations at Geneva, and comes with that sanction?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

QUESTIONS

SOURIS, P.E.I.—PROPERTY PURCHASED BY R.C.M.P.

Mr. MacLean:

1. Has a property in the town of Souris, Prince Edward Island, been purchased for use by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?
2. If so, from whom was the property bought and what was the amount paid?

Mr. Garson:

1. Property measuring 85 feet by 200 feet has been purchased in the town of Souris,

Prince Edward Island, for use by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

2. Purchased from Mrs. Edna St. John at a total cost of $2,265.

CANADA—UNITED STATES TRADE

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. (a) What manufactured products are admitted to Canada from the United States of America duty free; (b) what manufactured products are admitted to the United States of America from Canada duty free?

2. (a) What natural farm products are admitted to Canada from the United States of America duty free; (b) what natural farm products are admitted to the United States of America from Canada duty free?

3. (a) What processed farm products are admitted to Canada from the United States of America duty free; (b) what processed farm products are admitted to the United States of America from Canada duty free?

4. (a) What primary products other than food products are admitted to Canada from the United States of America duty free; (b) what primary products other than food products are admitted to the United States of America from Canada duty free?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, if I might speak to this, we can of course provide the hon. member with a consolidation of the Canadian Customs Tariff, which contains several hundred items not classified in the manner he has indicated in his question.

We could, of course, also provide him—by the courtesy of the United States embassy—with a copy of the United States tariff which contains several thousand items not classified in the manner indicated in his question. I regret that I am not able to answer any better than that.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER THURSDAY, JUNE 9

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, June 6, 1955, until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11.00 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6.00 o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from 1.00 to 2.30 o'clock p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly our wish to facilitate the business of the house in every way this can be done with due regard for the efficient dispatch of public business. I would point out, however, that a number of committees are still sitting, and that they will be sitting in the mornings next week. If this motion is adopted, it will be a practical impossibility for the members of this house to perform their duties both in the house and on committees in the manner in which public business demands.

This is a situation which should not be accepted by those hon. members who have due regard to the importance of committees. There are certain hon. members who have been suggesting—even within these past few days—that there should be greater vigilance and greater effort on the part of the members of the opposition who sit on the committees. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there has been as much vigilance as is possible under the restrictions which have been imposed; and most certainly, in some of the committees where it has been possible to examine the facts, excellent work has been done.

I also think it appropriate that I should point out at this time that there has been permitted to be conveyed to the public an impression which is not entirely in keeping with the facts. Comments are made about absenteeism in this house without due regard to the number of committees which have been meeting every day. If it were possible to have a roll call of all members sitting in the house and in committees, at the same time, it would be found that the percentage of members attending to the daily business in this house is much higher than the percentage ordinarily attending to similar business at Westminster at any time.

I mention that fact because I have as high a regard as has any hon. member here for the traditions of the mother of parliaments, the sense of duty displayed there and the dispatch with which public business is transacted. I would remind hon. members here that frequently in a house of some 650 members at Westminster there will be not more than 50 members present dealing with the ordinary debates. That is a much smaller percentage than is ever sitting in this house, because we would not have a quorum if we had as small a percentage as that. I do not say that by way of criticism of Westminster. I say it by way of appropriate explanation of a situation which undoubtedly has been permitted to leave in the minds of many people in Canada an impression which is not consistent with the actual facts of the case.

I think the members of the committees—and I include members on both sides of the house—have been doing their duty in attending those committees. I am not going to introduce in this debate certain comments I might make on other occasions about the way I believe these committees could be operated to better advantage for the dispatch of public business, but I certainly want to emphasize the fact that those who attend the committees and see what is done there will realize that great effort and preparation are involved.

If we proceed with morning sittings next week while a number of very important committees are still sitting there will then be on the one hand a strain imposed upon members which I do not think is consistent with the good dispatch of business either in the house or in the committees, and on the other hand there will be an impression conveyed by the sparse attendance in the house which will not be consistent with the actual effort being made by the members. There is also the fact that some of the most important business of the year, involving the responsibility of parliament to vote supply in the form of departmental estimates, will not be given the examination it properly should have.

I hope, therefore, the government will consider the points I have put forward and will not seek to commence morning sittings next week, but will postpone them for another week. We are quite ready to take part in morning sittings the moment the major committees have disposed of their business. I do not think it is in the interests of parliament to convey to the public the idea that we are prepared to accept hours which will deny appropriate attention to public business merely in an effort to get out of here by the end of June. If the public business demands that we stay longer, let us stay longer. Let us make sure, however, that we follow a course that is within both the physical and mental capacity of hon. members, having regard to the immense amount of work still before us. Let us also be sure that we do not disregard the impression that would be conveyed by a very sparse attendance while billions of dollars of public funds are being voted.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillis: —hon. members are having some fun, and I appreciate it as much as they do. The members of this group have discussed this matter. As far as we are concerned we are prepared to sit here as long as is necessary to complete the business of the house.

I cannot agree with the Leader of the Opposition that because committees are sitting we should delay morning sittings one more week. The fact of the matter is that you will find as many committees have been meeting in the afternoon during the past month as will be meeting in the morning during the next week. I do not believe it would make any difference so far as attendance in the house is concerned.

I should like to join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in the observation he made concerning the wrong impression that is created outside because there is not a 100 per cent attendance in this house. From time to time you see some sections of the press carrying headlines about absenteeism in the House of Commons. Many times visitors in the gallery have asked me, as well as other members, why all the members were not in the house. The impression, of course, is created that members are not here.

It should be recalled that during the session some 25 committees are set up in which we can bring together members regardless of party and take hold of the legislation that comes before us, making a pretty well non-partisan examination of it. Some of the most important work of the house is done through these committees. If you can get a good look at the estimates in these committees you can get an understanding of them.

I am glad the Leader of the Opposition raised the point, because if it were raised by this group it would be said that we were defending absenteeism in industry. Coming from the Leader of the Opposition it is an important observation. We are very glad to join him in trying to clarify that point, at least for the benefit of some sections of the press.

We are quite prepared to support this motion, and if it is necessary to stay here until August the Prime Minister can be assured that we will stay with him. At the same time, we are quite ready to facilitate the work of the house, in conformity with the best examination we can make of the legislation.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Speaking for the group in this corner of the house, Mr. Speaker, I would say that we are ready to stay here and apply ourselves to the business of the country just as long as it is necessary to stay. We would not like to have anyone feel we are unduly rushing government business. But if the government feels it is essential and in the interests of good government, and only good government, to have us sit in the mornings, we are prepared to do that.

I feel, however, that the Leader of the Opposition has brought up a very important point. There are still quite a number of committees meeting in the morning, and certainly attendance in the house in the morning will not be very good if those committees should continue to sit and do their work. On the other hand, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has so well said, there will be just as much absenteeism in the afternoon if the committee meetings are held then. Consequently I believe we should leave it with the government to decide what they want to do, and we will support them.

There is one comment I should like to make; that is, if the changes in the rules that have been contemplated for some time could have been brought in earlier, I feel satisfied we would not need to start morning sittings next week. However, we are prepared to go along with the government if they feel, in their wisdom, that we should start morning sittings next week.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I want to say a word on this motion. I feel the time has come when we should devote extra time to the business of the house. Whether this can best be done by sitting in the morning or extending the sitting in the evening is a matter of opinion. But I believe, sir, you will recall that a year ago we began morning sittings this week and did not conclude the business until June 26.

I recognize that all the Leader of the Opposition has said is correct, and that special care would have to be taken to see that the committee work and the house business were arranged in such a manner that the opposition would be accommodated and able to have their case placed before the public, either in committee or in the house, by those persons they chose for the particular business in hand. I would think we could do that for the one week he has in mind. If, however, hon. members feel that we can lengthen the sessions in the evenings so we can get in extra time next week, the government would of course consider it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the observations I have made do not require addition as far as the point of view I have expressed is concerned. I would have hoped that we could continue next week on the same basis, in view of the committees that are sitting and the necessity of those committees preparing reports. I say that if it is a choice between morning sittings and extending the time in the evenings, I would certainly favour the addition of another hour in the evenings.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: I gather, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps I am more accustomed to late hours than some of the hon. members who have interjected. For my own part, and speaking without consultation, I would have thought that an extension for the one week might be better than trying to work out morning sittings and have committees at the same time, because of the fact that they will not only be holding meetings but will be preparing reports, which in itself is an arduous and responsible task.

Mr. Harris: Well, sir, if we might have permission to make a compromise I would suggest that we might amend the motion to begin morning sittings on Thursday, and try to clear up as much of the committee work as we can in the meantime.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I wish the minister would not proceed with this compromise. Many of us who come from western Canada have not been home since Easter. We are getting a little tired. We would like to spend longer hours each day finishing our work and then return to our constituencies. As far as I am concerned, we should be sitting Wednesday nights and Saturdays as well.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I interject this. I am sick and tired of listening to men from the west insinuate that they are slaves of parliament. Unfortunately, on many occasions members from the east, particularly those from Ontario and Quebec, must go to their constituencies at the request of their constituents. The trip has to be made every week or every second week, back and forth. It takes me 18 hours to go home and 18 hours to come to Ottawa from my constituency. I often envy those gentlemen from the west who sit and loaf over the week ends in Ottawa.

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, after a bit of hilarity may I ask a very solemn question. I suppose this kind of question could only come from a very simple, unsophisticated freshman like myself. I ask it with great deference of the leader of the house. Would it not be possible to have our committee work begin, not at eleven o'clock or 10.30 in the morning, but at nine o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: As amended?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Rowe: As amended.

Mr. Fulton: I understand the leader of the house suggested an amendment.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: May I tell the hon. gentleman that I heard the suggestion made by the Minister of Finance, but I have not received any amendment. I presume that since he did not send it to me he has decided not to put his suggestion in the form of a written amendment.

Mr. Rowe: We did not understand that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, we have the right to know what is intended to result from the motion. I certainly understood, and I feel sure most hon. members understood, that it was the proposal of the Minister of Finance to defer morning sittings until Thursday of next week.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: That is what he said.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, what I said was "I am sure by way of a compromise suggestion", and I think I used those words. Apparently it did not receive very much support in the house; therefore I was not going to insist on it. If my hon. friend wants to move an amendment, that will be all right.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker. While I feel we could do a very much better job, we have not yet the responsibility of government, and I have no intention of attempting to provide an appropriate peg on which to hang an excuse for any member of the government not doing what he is supposed to do. In this particular case it was quite clearly my understanding that the Minister of Finance suggested that morning sittings be deferred until next Thursday.

Mr. Rowe: And agreed.

Mr. Drew: There was an indication of agreement with that. In view of what I have said I certainly feel that it would not be appropriate to support the motion; and while I need not be reminded that in view of that unanimity which seems commonplace on the other side our opinion probably would not prevail, we definitely would oppose the motion to start morning sittings next week.

Mr. Harris: We do not want any misunderstanding. The government wishes to arrange the business to the satisfaction of all hon. members so we can expedite it and deal with it properly, and at the same time get out of here at about the time all of us would like to leave. The suggestion I made was a sincere one for the purpose of trying to meet the wishes of those who were not too certain of the attitude they ought to take on this motion. If anyone feels that he would prefer to begin morning sittings on Thursday and will say so, I shall make the motion so hon. members may have a vote as between Thursday morning and Monday morning.

Mr. Drew: I have no hesitation in saying, in view of what I have said, that I would prefer to see morning sittings begin on Thursday. Therefore the minister may take it that we would not oppose an amendment to the motion which would start the sittings on Thursday morning.

Mr. Speaker: The motion would then be amended so it would read:

That on and after Thursday, June 9, 1955, until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11.00 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6.00 o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from 1.00 to 2.30 o'clock p.m.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As the mover of the original motion I must say that I am glad to accept the suggested amendment, because I do not think this is a matter upon which the house should divide. There are various views as to what would be the best thing to do in the circumstances, and it is not possible to harmonize the divergent views; but it should be possible to arrive at a compromise that would partly meet the views that have been expressed.

If we could arrive at a solution that would not require any division of the house we would be apt to feel better disposed to co-operate with each other to dispose of the business of the house with all due consideration. We would take as much time as was required to deal with it properly, but I think we would be disposed to leave aside anything that it might not be necessary to have stated at too great length for the proper consideration of the matters we will have before us.

I would think hon. members might want to accept this halfway compromise and have our morning sessions commence on Thursday, to continue to the end of the session. We would count upon each other's good will and desire to be co-operative to bring about in a proper way the disposal of the business of the house perhaps as soon as if we started morning sittings on Monday, after a division of the house that left with any the impression that there was not a genuine desire to go along in a co-operative fashion.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE—INQUIRY AS TO SUGGESTED SUPREME COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence based upon a report in the Montreal Gazette of today, in which it is stated that the chief of the air staff in a statement made yesterday in Montreal said that the establishment of one supreme command for the defence of North America is inevitable. May I ask if that is a statement of declared government policy?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, that is not a declaration of government policy. I interviewed the chief of the air staff this morning, and I understand that the article in the Gazette to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred is a synopsis of certain extemporaneous remarks the chief of the air staff made while conducting a group of Canadian and United States aviation writers through some of the installations at air defence command headquarters in Montreal. I understand that he was explaining the co-operation and integration which had taken place as between the air services of the two countries.

He assured me that he was careful to point out in his remarks, which as I say were not printed in full, that he was not making a prediction, that he was simply stating a trend in military thinking and that he recognized that it is not government policy to seek the appointment of a supreme commander. In fact his remarks as printed in the Gazette recognized that such a problem is purely a political one.

I may say in relation to this matter that there has been no pressure by our neighbours for such an appointment, and that our relations continue as they were when Secretary of Defence Wilson made a statement, I think it was in January, that we were working closely and harmoniously together and there was no need for any change.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEEN ELIZABETH HOTEL—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY RE MANAGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he will take steps to repatriate the management of the publicly-owned Queen Elizabeth hotel to Canada from New York; and further if the minister will say whether he proposes to end a humiliating situation which is an insult to the highly qualified men and women who have been trained in Canada for the management of Canadian hotels?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not see any urgency in this matter, as I think it is one which could be dealt with when the estimates of the Department of Transport are before the house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before you leave that as a final ruling I would point out that there might well be more urgency in this than in connection with a number of other matters which are dealt with before the orders of the day. We now know that people applying for reservations at the Queen Elizabeth hotel must have them passed upon in New York, and must deal with New York to find out whether they are going to have an opportunity to hold their meetings in a publicly-owned hotel in Canada. I do not think any time should be wasted in having an assurance that this disgraceful situation will be brought to an end.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF CABINET MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the discussion during the last several days as to ministerial responsibility. Constitutionally is a minister in Her Majesty's privy council, or to use the ordinary expression the cabinet, a person employed in the service of Her Majesty?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think the ministers, both under our statutes and under the traditions of the constitution, are servants of the sovereign.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought they were advisers.

Mr. St. Laurent: When we were invited as a special privilege to attend a cabinet meeting at 10 Downing street at the time of the coronation, we received a parchment informing us that the servants of Her Majesty would assemble at 10 Downing street at such and such an hour to deal with Her Majesty's business. I take it that was merely an expression of the constitutional tradition that the public business of the kingdom was the business of the sovereign, which was dealt with by the sovereign's servants whom we refer to as members of the privy council or members of the cabinet.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Would the Prime Minister perhaps give further consideration to the matter on this basis. He states that constitutionally the position is that they are servants of the crown rather than advisers, as I would have thought them to be. I am not asking for an immediate decision, but I should like the Prime Minister to consider the relationship between that position and the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act regarding offices of emolument under the crown. It seems to me that this is a most important point which should not be decided quickly.

Mr. St. Laurent: Until there was a statutory provision to the contrary, ministers upon accepting offices of emolument under the crown vacated their seats in parliament and had to go back to their constituencies for re-election. That was necessary in recognition of the fact that they were accepting positions of emolument under the crown.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years each of the graduated rates of tax at present applicable to individuals be reduced by two percentage points, and that for the 1955 taxation year each of the graduated rates of tax at present applicable to individuals be reduced by one percentage point.

2. That with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1955, the 47 per cent rate of tax on income in excess of $20,000 be reduced to 45 per cent.

3. That for the 1954 taxation year an individual may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him the amount of tax on income paid to the government of any province in which he resided, was employed or carried on business, not exceeding 10 per cent of the tax otherwise payable by him.

4. That for the 1955 and 1956 taxation years an individual who resided, was employed or carried on business in a province in which a tax on income was payable to the government of the province may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him to Canada that proportion of 10 per cent of his tax otherwise payable that his income for the period during which he resided in the province or his income earned in the province is of his whole income.

5. That for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years rental income from real property shall not be included in income to which the additional 4 per cent tax on investment income applies.

6. That the right of an investment company at present to elect as regards its taxable status be repealed and that for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years an investment company be subject to a tax of 20 per cent on its taxable income.

7. That expenses incurred in the 1955 and subsequent taxation years by a taxpayer in the course of issuing or selling shares of its capital stock or in the course of borrowing money used in the taxpayer's business (other than amounts in respect of commissions, bonus payments or discounts) be allowed as a deduction in computing the income of the taxpayer.

8. That for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years proceeds of a sale or realization of inventory or accounts receivable of a taxpayer upon or after selling or ceasing to carry on a business be included in computing income, but that the taxpayer be given the option of paying tax in respect thereof at his average rate of tax for the three taxation years immediately preceding the year in which he sold or ceased to carry on the business.

[Mr. Fulton.]

9. That a corporation resident in Canada that pays a dividend out of its designated surplus to a non-resident corporation or a person exempt from tax, by whom the payer corporation was controlled, be subject to a tax of 15 per cent computed by reference to the amount of the dividend, where control of the payer corporation was acquired after December 31, 1954.

10. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years a corporation more than 10 per cent of whose gross revenue was derived from rents, be disqualified from being treated for tax purposes as a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

11. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years a corporation any part of whose income was derived from leasing or operating ships or aircraft be disqualified from being treated for tax purposes as a foreign business corporation.

12. That payments made after April 5, 1955, to a non-resident, computed by reference to the amount of timber cut or taken from a timber limit in Canada be subject to the 15 per cent tax on income from Canada of non-residents.

13. That the exemption of income from metalliferous or industrial mineral mines for the first three years of production be extended to mines coming into production at any time hereafter.

14. That the special deduction from income allowed for expenses of exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada and the special deduction from income allowed for expenses of searching for minerals in Canada be allowed for expenses incurred at any time hereafter.

15. That a deduction from income be allowed to a corporation whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum, petroleum products or natural gas or exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas, and to a corporation whose principal business is mining or exploring for minerals, for expenses incurred in the 1954 and subsequent calendar years in exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada or searching for minerals in Canada, if such expenditures were incurred otherwise than on its own account, in consideration for shares or an option or right to purchase shares of a corporation on whose account they were incurred.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks about income tax in general, but first I should like to reiterate to the Minister of Finance the request which has been made year after year for several years, namely that the items in this resolution, of which I think there are fifteen, might be considered separately. We have in these last several years been regarding the whole resolution as one and indivisible, and I am suggesting now that this question might be considered by the minister.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I have looked over some of the past experiences in this connection, and I am quite prepared to study the problem that has been raised at various times on this very point; but I have not been sufficiently convinced that there ought to be a change in the practice to ask that it be done at this time. Therefore I think we ought to continue considering the resolutions as a whole, and I promise that between now and next year I will have a further look at it to see if the business of the house could be dealt with more expeditiously by taking them separately.

Mr. Macdonnell: It could so easily happen—and indeed it has happened—that there might be an item in the resolution which many members wish to vote against, though they would not vote against the whole income tax resolution. That is the reason we ask that these items be dealt with separately. I am not going to press the point further at the moment, but our original request was that we should consider and vote on each item, so that if there was an item on which there was a feeling of opposition, that opposition could be declared in respect of that item and it would not be, so to speak, carried along on the backs of other items which we did not wish to vote against.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the point the hon. member has made, but the same problem confronts him with every resolution that is brought forward in this house. It usually has more than one feature, and he has to accept it as a whole. His point can be met by opposing a particular section of the bill which carries out the resolution to which he is opposed at the moment.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not going to press the matter further, but it seems to me that the budget resolutions are quite distinct from the other resolutions—as the minister mentions; here you have definite topics and I should have thought it quite in accordance with the most ordinary method of doing business that we might deal with each one separately and individually. I cannot see that it delays or hampers the carrying on of business. However, I shall not go into it further at the moment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some brief general observations about income tax. I am even going to suggest that there may be such a thing as a spirit of the income tax, though I understand that a learned judge in England said there was no such thing. It is hard to realize how short a time ago it was that the income tax was regarded as practically an intrusion on private life.

It was only a few decades ago that a certain board of trade—I might say, not in the city in which I reside—passed a resolution approving of the principle of the income tax, and aroused a good deal of irritation among the members of the board by so doing. One of my friends, in commenting to me on the resolution, said, "That was a bright idea you had; why didn't you pass a resolution that the telephone was a useful instrument?" But other people were definitely irritated and annoyed. I should like to recall that until a recent date the Income Tax Act used to be called the Income War Tax Act. I forget the date it was changed, but it was quite recent.

If the chairman would allow me to digress from income tax for a moment, I should like to speak on succession duties, and to mention an incident which happened in the city of Toronto, in the days when it certainly was regarded as an intrusion into private life. The following conversation took place when a certain well to do man in Toronto went to see his lawyer and complained about the enormity of the act. He said, "Think of it; when I die, 25 per cent of my estate is going to be torn away from my descendants and given to the university which I hate." In the early days of the succession duty act in Ontario the proceeds from the act went to the University of Toronto. I hope this will not be regarded as a remark made by a jealous graduate of another university. When he asked his lawyer, "What shall I do about it?", the answer was, "Don't die, Smith". That is advice, of course, which we would all like to take.

I should like to refer for a moment to the background of the Income Tax Act. I find it interesting to note that it goes back originally to the French revolution, to 1793, when they had something approximating it. Pitt introduced it in England in 1798 but it was repealed in 1816. Its use in its present form dates from the 1840's, and it was finally settled in England in 1874.

As I say, we have come to regard it as normal here. Anyone who suggested that the income tax was not a normal way of raising revenue would be regarded as mental. I should like to draw attention to the origin of the tax. In 1917 it was introduced by Sir Thomas White. He felt even then, in wartime, that it was necessary to soften up the opposition, which he feared, by commending it as a fair thing that people who had substantial income should be called on to bear a special levy because of the fact other people were risking their lives. He said:

> Apart from this necessity, from a financial standpoint, there has arisen, . . . both in this house and in the country, a very natural and, in my view a very just, sentiment that those who are in the enjoyment of substantial incomes should substantially and directly contribute to the growing war expenditures of the dominion.

Then he goes on to say that "the adoption of such a measure is a distinct innovation in federal fiscal legislation". As we all know, the tax was accepted. It has become part of our normal way of carrying on business, and indeed the principle that taxation should be on the basis of capacity to pay is very firm in our minds at the present time. It is taken for granted.

Yet I should like to say a word of caution with regard to the income tax. I deprecate the feeling that exists in certain quarters that the accumulation of wealth is really a bad thing, and that if you can soak the rich people enough, particularly the large corporations, other people will get off very lightly; the idea that in itself it is almost a righteous act, the kind of thing every just man should be prepared to do, to soak these large organizations, to soak anyone who has a large amount of wealth.

Let me say at the outset that I do not think there is anyone in this house more prepared than I am to see the wealthy taxed in just proportion, but I might suggest that there is another aspect of this question which we should not overlook. After all, here is one of our great sources of income, and we should not regard people who are, either in their own right or as heads of corporations, custodians of large volumes of wealth, as people who invite punishment. We should regard them as people whose welfare is of the greatest importance to ourselves.

After all, what does the ordinary man want? The ordinary man wants a job. He wants somebody else to take the risk. He needs someone else who has the initiative. He relies on the energy of somebody else. He is ready and willing to take a job. I have to confess that is true of myself. I would feel a better man if I had organized and sponsored a business of my own. I feel that we tremendously need those men. Indeed, that is what we depend on. I am going to consider in a moment the alternative solution, which of course is the socialist solution, and I am going to dispose of it to my own satisfaction entirely. But at this moment I want to stress the fact—and it is an obvious fact—that most of us want somebody to provide us with a job.

I think the people who do that have every right to be regarded, not as philanthropists, not as benefactors except indirectly, but as people who are performing a most valuable and indeed irreplaceable service to the state. After all, they are the people who take the risks. They are the people who launch out. They are the people who have the energy. They are the people who create the wealth. The rest of us may just as well admit that, for the most part, we are not neck or nothing people. We are people who want security.

I am often disturbed in these days to find how widespread is that feeling, especially among young men who 10 or 15 years ago were taking the most incredible risks every day of their lives. But now, on coming back to civilian life, they have this desire for security. Whether they feel they have had enough risks to last them for the whole of their lives, I do not know; but it is sometimes disturbing to find how large that desire for security bulks and, conversely, how often we seem to find little of the spirit of enterprise.

I wish here to deal for a moment with the contribution of those who are organized in corporations. There is often a feeling that they get an extremely undue return. I have regretted to hear in this house gross earnings brought forward and used as if that were the return which went to the shareholders of the company. I wish to put on record a few simple figures. These are from a brochure put out by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I feel quite sure, however, that they have been careful about their figures because it would be a gross error of judgment on their part not to be careful of them. I should like to read a few percentages of the income dollar. These cover some $7 billion of earnings in 1954. The percentages of this income dollar are these: wages and salaries, 22·1 per cent; materials, 46·6 per cent. Then I come down to these figures: depreciation, 3·3 per cent; taxes on income, 4·1 per cent; dividends, 2·4 per cent and retained in the business, 2·8 per cent.

I want to add the figures of "retained in the business" and "depreciation", making altogether 6·1 per cent. There you see the enormous importance to the rest of us of the success of these businesses, because that amount of money, which is more than twice as much as is paid out in dividends, is retained in the business. That means it goes to sustain and increase, we will hope, employment. Second, I stress the 4·1 per cent figure of taxes on income, which itself is well above the dividends figure. I mention that fact, Mr. Chairman, because when we are dealing with the taxes on these institutions I think it is desirable to remember the great part they play. It is a good thing the taxes have been reduced by the small extent to which that has been done. They are still very heavy, but it has been a step in the right direction.

A moment ago I said I was going to consider the alternative. We must consider the alternative. What is the alternative? The one alternative which I have been describing, and which I submit is what carries us along at the moment, is this. We rely on the energy, initiative and courage of a group in the community who go out and exercise those qualities and make a profit in so doing. I am not going to suggest that they do not want to make a profit, but I am going to suggest that, in my experience, most of those people are not primarily interested in money. They are primarily interested in success. What does success mean to them? It means creating things. It means making two blades of grass grow where one blade grew before. It means creating better and better articles. It means extending their markets.

I am not going to pretend that these men do not want to make money. Money is, in a way, an imprimatur of success. If they do not make money they will go broke. But my experience is that those people are in there because in this way they find the fullest development of their creative instincts, their energy, their instincts, if you will, of service to the community. I do not want to be sentimental and make any preachment about the matter. To me the most hard-boiled man—the man, if you will, who thinks more about money than he thinks about anything else—nevertheless involuntarily in his success is making the greatest possible contribution to the building up of the country.

Why do I say this? Not because I do not believe these people should pay high taxes. Of course they must pay high taxes. I say it because I think it is important that all of us should try to have a just view of this matter, the government particularly. We have had years of boom during which these high taxes have been levied and paid, and when there have been good profits. I am admitting all that. But on the other hand, as we all know, there is a possible alternative when times are not so good and when taxes automatically become much heavier relatively, even though they remain actually the same.

I want to say a word on the alternative—the only alternative I see—which is that the means of production is not to be owned by individuals but is to be owned by the state. We have seen that system tried. We have seen it tried by people whom we respect, people like ourselves. I am thinking of Britain.

I want to read one or two comments which come from people who, I think, are entitled to be seriously considered. I want to remind the committee of what happened at the labour conference at Margate just a year ago last September, I think it was. I referred to it in this house somewhat more than a year ago. At that conference huge votes were recorded—not one, but several; vote after vote—against further nationalization. I was struck with that fact. There had been every opportunity for nationalization to show what it could do but the votes, I think without exception, at that conference were against nationalization.

I want to read one or two extracts which I have read before and which come from competent and, I hope, detached people commenting on the progress of socialism in Britain. One is from C. E. M. Joad. I am reading from page 405 of a book with an extremely interesting title. It is called "The Conservative Mind". I recommend it to you for study. It is by one Professor Kirk. At page 405 he quotes Joad as saying this:

> "Socialism is no longer a creed to conjure with. It is like a hat which has lost its shape because so many wear it; rightly or wrongly, few of us now look to it to revivify our early hopes."

Then Kirk himself goes on to use serious words which I think are worthy of consideration:

> Finding that the majority of men seem to lack motive for performing their duties in society, now that the ordinary rewards for ordinary integrity have been abolished or diminished, the socialists are dismayed; they begin to wonder whether their theory of human nature can be at fault.

I read that just for this reason. I believe that in this world in which we live—and I am not speaking of what it will be in 500 years—the number of people who will work without having a personal incentive is not a high proportion of society. I think that is what they have been finding in Britain, and I believe that is the reason the enthusiasm has waned.

I should like to read one other extract which I think it is fair to read, because it comes from a leading socialist and because I think it makes very clear the alternative we face if we pursue the socialist line. My objection to socialism has been twofold, first of all the economic objection, because I never thought it could work, and second and far more serious, I have never believed it could work with freedom.

It is for that reason I wish to read this statement by Mr. Gordon-Walker, former secretary of state for commonwealth relations in the Labour government. He uses very frank, straightforward language which rather shocks me, because it seems to indicate very clearly what a leading socialist regards as the way to progress. Incidentally, I do not believe it is the way of our socialist colleagues in this house. I do not think they would accept this view. My charge against them is that I think they do not face up to the implications of their own theories.

Perhaps there is no harm in interjecting here a little personal story. I do not see how there can be any objection to it. It refers to two men who used to be members of the house. It was told me by the late

W. H. Moore, who was a leading Liberal. When he was a member of the house he belonged to a dining club of which J. S. Woodsworth was a member. I wish to say again that I had the greatest respect for Mr. Woodsworth as, indeed, I had for Mr. Moore. Mr. Moore made this remark on one occasion to Mr. Woodsworth. He said, "You have been a very useful member of the house because, although you have not had power, you have had influence, and things have been done in this house that would not have been done if you had not been here". Then he added, "But of course if your party ever came into power you could not be the leader of it any longer". Mr. Woodsworth said, "Why not?" Mr. Moore replied, "If your party came into power it would be a dictatorship, and you are not tough enough to be the leader of a dictatorship. You could not do the kind of things that dictators do".

I only mention that. I am sure it is not derogatory to Mr. Woodsworth and it is not intended to be. It came from a man who I think was a real liberal. There are real liberals in the Liberal party; I am not ashamed to confess that. Sometimes I think they are a rather small percentage, but in my view Mr. Moore undoubtedly was a real liberal who by some strange coincidence found himself still in the official Liberal party. Mr. Moore's remarks seemed significant to me, and I am sure they were made in good faith. With this digression, I wish to read now what Gordon-Walker said.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member read a little more loudly?

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall try to. These are the words of Mr. Gordon-Walker, late secretary of state for commonwealth relations:

> The new state will also directly augment authority and social pressure by new powers of punishment and compulsion. So far from withering away, as in theory, both the individualist and the total state should, the new state, if it is to bring into being and serve the better society, must create new offences and punish them.

Another writer whose name is not familiar to me, Mr. E. H. Carr, speaks rather along the same line. He is very candid indeed. He says:

> The donkey needs to see the stick as well as the carrot . . . I confess that I am less horror-struck than some people at the prospect, which seems to me unavoidable, of an ultimate power of what is called direction of labour resting in some arm of society, whether in an organ of state or of trade unions.

When I read these things, Mr. Chairman, I find myself more than ever obsessed—perhaps it is an obsession—at any rate, more than ever confirmed in my view that whether or not they intend it the socialist way is the way of dictation and authority, that it cannot be otherwise.

I merely wish to add a word or two. I want to make very clear the reason for these remarks. It is not that I want to weep tears for those who pay income tax. We get a very large percentage of our revenue from it now and it is a fair tax, provided it does not become too heavy. But I do want to answer the view, which I think is held in certain quarters, that there really is almost no limit to what you can take by way of income tax. I want to put in a plea that we look at this thing in a fair way. I believe most businessmen are not working for the money. After all, they cannot eat any more than we do or wear any more clothes than we do, and a great many of them live with great simplicity. But they must have the incentive of being able to make their business a success, and it is with that in mind and in that spirit that I think we should approach this legislation.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wish to confine my remarks at this time to that portion of the income tax resolutions providing for a reduction in the income tax paid by taxpayers in a province that does not sign a federal-provincial tax agreement. I refer to resolution No. 4, which reads as follows:

> That for the 1955 and 1956 taxation years an individual who resided, was employed or carried on business in a province in which a tax on income was payable to the government of the province may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him to Canada that proportion of 10 per cent of his tax otherwise payable that his income for the period during which he resided in the province or his income earned in the province is of his whole income.

I am afraid this resolution indicates very clearly indeed that the government has turned its back on the original principles it followed at the time of the federal-provincial conferences some ten years ago. The principles announced at that time included full employment, and the principle that in so far as it was possible within the federal jurisdiction, corporation tax and income tax should be the same in all parts of Canada. The proposal to reduce the income tax of taxpayers in a non-agreeing province not only means that the federal government is making a patchwork of its own taxes, but is an open invitation to the wealthier provinces now within the agreement to abandon it.

I have seen figures prepared by tax experts indicating that if the province of Ontario had a 15 per cent income tax on married persons with incomes above $3,000 and on single persons with incomes above $1,500, the province would in fact gain some $3 million by pulling out of the federal tax agreements. If for no other reason than that this proposal weakens the whole concept of action by the federal government to maintain full employment through fiscal policies I would oppose it, but there are other reasons and other grounds why it should be opposed.

It is rather startling to me that I did not hear any reference by the hon. member for Greenwood, the official financial critic of the Conservative party, to this very important question before us this afternoon. I do not think this proposal squares with what, over the years, we have known to be the rights of the provinces in the field of taxation.

On behalf of the C.C.F. group I want to say that we support resolution No. 3, which provides that in 1954, in a non-tax agreeing province, namely in Quebec, income taxpayers will be allowed to deduct 10 per cent from the amount otherwise paid to the federal government. I believe there is a fundamental and clear difference between allowing a certain percentage of the tax to be deductible and providing, as in resolution No. 4, that taxpayers in certain provinces will pay an income tax rate different than taxpayers in another province.

We in this group support the fundamental right of a province to occupy the field of direct taxation. We know the people of Quebec value that right very highly indeed, just as they value their other rights of language and culture which the C.C.F. party has always supported to the fullest extent. When this problem was being faced by Canadians generally, the Quebec section of the C.C.F. gave a great deal of thought and consideration to it. It is public information that the proposals advanced by the Quebec section of our movement have been adopted by our national movement. Even though the C.C.F. have very little support in Quebec, and on the basis of results in recent elections we have no hope of winning many electoral victories in the near future, we nevertheless adopted a proposition that was eminently fair to all citizens of Canada, and a policy that we believe preserves all of the fundamental rights of Quebec. I suggest those rights are not preserved by resolution No. 4.

This resolution No. 4, I suggest, will provide a personal income tax structure that cannot help but contribute to national disunity. I believe it is inherently wrong; it is inherently unjustifiable for the federal government to set up an income tax structure that will be different in one part of Canada as compared with another part of Canada. I wish at this time to refer to the official position taken by the movement of which I have the honour to be a member at our national council meeting on January 17 of this year. It reads in part as follows:

> At a time when farm prices are declining and unemployment increasing, it is essential that a solution to the tax rental dispute be found.

I might say that this was adopted and released before the position of the federal government was made known. It was not, therefore, something that was influenced by any stand taken by the government.

> Provided federal responsibility for fiscal policy is maintained, and the financial advantages to the provinces are not reduced, there is no reason why adjustments cannot be made in the present agreements to satisfy Quebec's deep concern over her constitutional rights.
> The C.C.F. national council has given careful study to the various alternatives that present themselves and has heard suggestions for improvements in the agreements from several provinces. It believes that a proper solution can be found based on the following principles:
> (a) Every province to have the option of imposing its own income tax with deductibility, up to but not exceeding, the amount it would receive from the federal government under the tax rental agreements.

This proposal, if fully adopted, would not cost the federal treasury any more than it is offering to the provinces that might sign tax rental agreements.

> (b) Should the provincial tax exceed or fall short of this amount in any year the difference should be adjusted, any deficiency to be made up by a federal grant and any excess to be returned to the federal treasury.

In other words, by following such a policy the federal government could implement all the essential fiscal policies necessary to deal with the problem of unemployment, and it would be making it possible for taxpayers in all provinces in Canada to pay the same income taxes. I feel that such a proposal is not only right because it would tend to bring about equality of income tax, but also because it would make it possible for a province to exercise a fundamental right namely to occupy the income tax field and obtain the same amount by imposing its own tax as it would obtain from the federal government under a tax agreement. Such a proposal would not impose any heavier tax burden on the people of that province. The proposal by the Liberal government that we are discussing today, while it appears in a monetary sense to help the taxpayers of Quebec, in fact is an insult to the people of Quebec who value their fundamental rights so highly. It is this proposal to which we are completely and unalterably opposed.

I do not believe this proposal can be justified on any grounds whatever. Would the government consider for one minute, I ask, imposing an excise tax on some particular article at a higher rate in one province or group of provinces than would apply on the article purchased by taxpayers in another province or group of provinces? Would the federal government consider for one moment placing a higher tax on automobiles sold in Ontario than on automobiles sold in Manitoba? It is such a ridiculous proposition. We all know that good Canadians who value national unity would not stand for such a difference in taxation. Yet in the income tax field that is precisely the proposition we have before us, and that is precisely the result that will flow from the adoption of resolution No. 4.

Would the government set a different sales tax, I ask, or any other tax, on electric refrigerators or electric stoves, so that the housewife in Newfoundland would have to pay more because of a higher federal tax on those articles than a housewife in British Columbia? I am sure again this illustration is so ridiculous that no member in this house would publicly support it. Yet—

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member a question? If that is his view, why has he never opposed having different federal rates in different provinces in relation to the corporation income tax? It has been in effect for 5 or 6 years. Why is it right for corporation taxes and wrong for personal taxes?

Mr. Argue: The answer to that question is pretty obvious. It is obviously wrong to impose a different tax on persons, and may or may not be wrong on an inanimate object such as a corporation. That question by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration suggests that he is quite happy that the income taxpayers in one province will be paying a tax different from that paid by taxpayers in other provinces. I suggest that is a proposition no member in this house should support.

What value can there possibly be in this resolution? Had the Prime Minister brought in a proposition which gave more to the province of Quebec and to the income taxpayers of that province by allowing full deductibility of the provincial tax up to the maximum amount the province would receive under a dominion-provincial tax agreement, the C.C.F. party would have supported it completely. But this looks like a rather ill-conceived attempt to maintain the political fortunes of the Liberal party in one province. I do not think the people of Quebec, being good, honest Canadians, believing as they do in their fundamental rights, will appreciate this move and support it, any more than will the taxpayers in any other province of Canada. As I have said, I believe this proposition is wrong in every respect.

The Quebec federation of industrial unions has given a great deal of study to this matter, and has found that the proposal by the government is wrong for four reasons. The first reason they list is that it is unilateral; that it is applied to one province and one province only because, of course, that is the only province that is not under any tax agreement at the present time.

The second reason they give is that it does not square with the cyclical ideas of fiscal agreements; that if this were carried on in a time of deflation, with provinces outside the agreements, a reduction in federal personal income tax could be met by a provincial government occupying the same field, and therefore the increased purchasing power in the hands of the public that the government might hope to provide by such a taxation policy—and that is the government's whole theory, as we have been told so often, of cyclical financing—would be abrogated.

The third reason they suggest as to why this proposal is wrong is that it is an injustice to the province of Quebec. I shall not further elaborate on why it is an injustice; as I think I have already very fully covered that point.

The fourth reason they give for opposing this measure is that it is a hindrance to national unity. When the bill is introduced which provides for the 10 per cent deductibility of income tax as provided in resolution No. 3, the C.C.F. party will give it its full support, but we shall oppose the proposition that the federal government should reduce taxes in any province below the level of income tax in any other provinces.

I hope with all my heart that the coming federal-provincial conference will be successful in every way, that there will be full agreement by all the provinces. I would hope that agreement will be so widespread that a year from now the government will, by action at that time, remove the inequalities and injustices that flow from the implementation of its present proposal. If that should not happen I hope the Prime Minister himself, who I know has given this problem a great deal of attention and consideration, will finally see that it is fundamentally wrong to have different rates of taxation applied by the federal government to taxpayers in different provinces. I hope during the present session he will yet withdraw this proposal and bring in a proposal of deductibility which will do more for the people of Quebec, and at the same time be a contribution to national unity in our country.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, the speech just made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is somewhat surprising, after the statements made both by his leader and the socialist premier of the province of Saskatchewan.

I have here before me some notes on this matter. However, before going any further, I should like to mention that while the present cabinet has given evidence of good intentions with regard to our province, we feel some misgivings about the day when the leaders in Ottawa, filled with ideas and feelings identical with those of the members of the C.C.F. party, will say, in answer to the requests of French Canadians, what the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) stated on January 22 last:

(Text):

We have no minority except those who made themselves a minority.

(Translation):

We do not want to be the victims of the ignorance and the fanaticism on which feed, for instance, certain religious organizations in British Columbia, and which, if carried over into the federal field, would be disastrous to our beliefs and our school system.

The Montreal Gazette of October 27 last, in a dispatch dated from Victoria, brought us a new sample of the narrow-mindedness of certain Protestant people on the Pacific coast. I quote:

(Text):

B.C. Urged not to Assist R.C. Schools

A brief was presented to the British Columbia cabinet today asking that no financial aid be given Roman Catholic schools.

It was placed before the cabinet by a three-man delegation of Protestants. One, Rev. W. M. Robertson of Vancouver Metropolitan Tabernacle, said:

"The teaching in Roman Catholic schools is against tolerance for any other Christian religion or church."

The Roman Catholic church operates separate schools in B.C. attended by 10,000 pupils. Full cost of operating the schools is borne by Roman Catholic families.

In June, a delegation of Roman Catholic bishops sought aid from the cabinet.

They asked: That school taxes go direct to the separate schools instead of helping pay for public schools, or, that financial aid be given by the government in grants for teachers' salaries on a per capita student basis, and leasing separate school buildings for a nominal fee to relieve the church of paying taxes.

The Protestants' brief demands that no aid be given the separate schools because the system in Ontario and other provinces has led to "the teaching of intolerance and national disunity."

(Translation):

Fortunately, that is not the way of thinking of all the people in that province. For instance, I am happy to mention here the statement of a British Columbia educator, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of November 4, 1954:

(Text):

B.C. Expert Backs Quebec

Dean Henry F. Angus of the University of British Columbia has supported Quebec's stand in refusing to enter into tax agreements with the federal government.

Dean Angus is head of the university's department of economics, political science and sociology.

Writing in the campus newspaper, The Ubyssey, the dean said:

"Taxpayers in Quebec have contributed to the federal revenue out of which subsidies have been paid to other provinces. They feel they are unjustly treated."

"Quebec has refused to sell its constitutional birthright," he said, and has done "nothing illegal or unconstitutional" in refusing to allow the federal government to "buy control" of the province's right to levy income taxes.

(Translation):

We also fear the fanatical Orangemen who would make of Canada a one-way nation, and I say it is a shame that there should be in Canada, in 1955, hundreds of people to listen, without raising any protest, to statements such as this one:

(Text):

And from the Globe and Mail of May 19, 1955:

Orange Leader Would Abolish Separate Schools

Gordon Keyes of Toronto, grand master of the grand Orange lodge of Ontario, today called on the provincial government to abolish separate schools.

In an opening address to more than 600 delegates at the lodge's 96th annual meeting, Mr. Keyes asked the government to "break down the wall of separatism" and encourage children of all citizens to learn together.

He said there is no place where citizenship is more closely cemented than within the public schools.

(Translation):

Utterances such as these are not conducive to national unity. The hon. member for Assiniboia just said that he deplored the fate of citizens of the province of Quebec. And yet his leader said over the radio, as reported editorially in Montreal-Matin on January 25, 1955:

. . . that he saw national unity in peril and went so far as to speak of a "bonus" to the people of Quebec, when that province has not as yet secured its right of not being deprived of the taxation fields granted under the constitution to our province as well as to the others.

Mr. Coldwell covers himself with ridicule when he speaks of Premier Duplessis' "one-sided decision" to levy an income tax. Is Mr. Duplessis under obligation to consult the premier of British Columbia or of Alberta, or of some other province, before exercising his rights and duties as leader of his government, when he has the support of the representatives of the people?

Does the government of British Columbia consult Mr. Duplessis before persecuting the school children of Maillardville and elsewhere?

A one-sided decision? But how could there be a two-sided decision of a provincial government in various fields which concern that government exclusively? And why should it be two-sided? Two-sided with regard to whom? To some other province? To the federal government? But these are things that do not concern them.

It is true that, for Mr. Coldwell, confederation is something too antiquated to be considered. He can disregard it if he chooses; that's his business. But the province of Quebec will never forget, because it knows that respect for confederation is essential to the survival of one of the two great races of this country.

When Mr. Coldwell said that, he was stressing what had already been done, in this house or elsewhere.

I have here statements by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) as follows:

(Text):

Mr. Harold Winch, M.L.A., C.C.F. leader in the B.C. legislature, speaking at Calgary, as reported in the Calgary Herald of November 10, 1943, said:

We're going to scrap the B.N.A. Act.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) said in a speech at Forester's Hall, Vancouver, as reported in the Vancouver Province of February 19, 1954:

I did not say one thing in Calgary that I and other C.C.F. people have not been saying for eleven years.

(Translation):

I also want to quote another statement by the hon. member.

(Text):

Mr. G. W. Weaver, delegate to the 10th annual convention in British Columbia, as reported in the Vancouver Sun of April 17, 1943, said:

We ought to remember that the constitution was not made to bind the C.C.F. We are not concerned with capitalistic constitutions as soon as we can wreck them.

(Translation):

The following is the statement made last February, by the prime minister of Saskatchewan. I am quoting from an editorial in the Montreal Gazette, dated February 3, 1955, and entitled:

(Text):

Oddly enough, on February 1, the very day on which Mr. David Lewis issued his statement to Quebec on behalf of the national council, Hon. T. C. Douglas, the C.C.F. premier of Saskatchewan, was speaking also. He termed Mr. St. Laurent's restricted concessions to Quebec as being "the most abject surrender in Canadian history".

He went one better. It was also a "pathetic appeasement" that amounted to "favoritism". Nor was this all. It has also turned "the clock back a quarter of a century".

Perhaps Premier Douglas was also speaking for himself alone. But after all, he is scarcely a party nobody. He is the only leader of a C.C.F. government in Canada.

"Miserable comforters are ye all!" exclaimed Job. Perhaps those who came to soothe the Quebec C.C.F. in its discontents may yet be regarded as worthy successors to Job's comforters.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

I said, Mr. Chairman, that it is not within the jurisdiction of Ottawa to subsidize our universities and even less to raise taxes for that purpose. That is the exclusive privilege of the provinces.

When the central government exceeds its rights, it does an injustice to the Quebec taxpayers who are forced to pay a large share of these grants which go more often than not to institutions who refuse to acknowledge the rights of my compatriots in the other provinces.

Some people wonder why Quebec refuses thus each year the millions offered by the federal government.

The reason is a simple one: we value more our rights than money.

No more than the rest of the citizens of Canada do we enjoy paying taxes. We know however that our survival, as an ethnic entity, is assured as long as we retain control over our educational system.

We are proud of our origin, of our French culture, of our history, of our customs and age-old traditions.

I take pleasure here in quoting an article written by Mr. Murray Ballantyne which has been published in pamphlet form by the Institut Social Populaire of Montreal. Here is what this English-speaking Canadian says about French Canadians:

(Text):

Have you ever wondered what it feels like to be a French-speaking Canadian? First of all they are in their own country. They are the senior Canadians. Long ago they reached that level of national, North American consciousness to which many of us are but now attaining.

In a great arc from the mouth of the St. Lawrence to the mouth of the Mississippi, the French were the first to explore, the first to trade, and the first to evangelize. Kingston, Toronto, Winnipeg, Detroit, Pittsburgh, St. Louis and New Orleans—all stand on sites discovered by French daring and occupied by French genius. It was the French tongue that was first heard here by the Indians, it was the blood of French missionaries that first rendered this soil sacred to French memory.

(Translation):

Further on, this distinguished professor stated, with regard to the situation imposed on our fellow citizens in the other provinces of the dominion, with regard to schools:

(Text):

The B.N.A. Act declares that the Protestants in Quebec shall have in education all the "powers, privileges, and duties" enjoyed by the Catholics in Ontario.

How has this compromise, this gentleman's agreement, been honoured? What do we find today? In Quebec the Protestants have the fullest possible enjoyment of their school rights. Nothing that they could ask has been denied them. But in Ontario, which was to have been the paragon.

Catholic schools can be carried beyond the primary level only at the cost of double taxation. And even at the primary level it is almost impossible for Catholics to enjoy their fair share of corporate taxes. As for the French tongue in that province, it is more than 40 years since regulation 17 forbade that language except as a subject of instruction. The English in Quebec are perfectly free to teach in their own tongue. The French in Ontario are not.

Admittedly what has happened to separate schools in Ontario is at least partly the result of judicial decisions. And admittedly the parliament and courts of Quebec are officially bilingual while those of Ontario are not. Still the French feel that Quebec has kept the original agreement in letter and in spirit, and that Ontario has not.

Out west, Manitoba was established by federal act in 1870 as officially bilingual and with full educational equality for Catholics and Protestants. Today the French tongue has been deprived of all recognition in that province, and Catholics who want their own schools have to pay taxes to the public schools as well. Thus the French-Canadians are once again made familiar with the penalty of double taxation.

In Saskatchewan and Alberta it is much the same story. Catholic schools have not been crippled quite as cruelly in these provinces as in Manitoba, but the French language has been deprived of all status. Sir John A. Macdonald opposed the move to make English the only official language in those parts. Speaking of this proposed suppression in 1890 he said: "I believe that it would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible."

Nevertheless in 1892 the legislative assembly of the then North West Territories carried out this "wicked" act.

New Brunswick is another province in which the minority feels that it has been deprived of its rights.

As for British Columbia, the French cannot claim that earlier rights of language or education have been abolished because so far as I know they never had any rights there. They never had any rights, that is to say, in positive law. But have they not natural rights, and are these natural rights not infringed as they see their children trudge to schools built at their own double expense while other children are driven to public schools in public busses to which the Catholics have had to contribute their full share of the cost?

(Translation):

I wanted to quote this article, Mr. Chairman, to show the position of French Canadians in the other provinces and to show how right we are to keep our money in the province and to levy an income tax, in order to be able to pay to our universities, seminaries and colleges the very same grants, in so far as that is possible, that the federal government wants to foist upon us by unconstitutional methods. I would like the federal government not only to grant us 10 per cent, but a complete deduction of the tax raised by the provincial government.

(Text):

I therefore have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lapointe, that paragraph 3 of the Income Tax Act resolution be amended by leaving out all the words after the word "business". It would then read as follows:

That for the 1954 taxation year an individual may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him the amount of tax on income paid to the government of any province in which he resided, was employed or carried on business.

The Deputy Chairman: It has been moved by the hon. member for Chicoutimi, that paragraph 3 of the Income Tax Act resolution be amended by leaving out all the words after the word "business". The hon. member has read to the committee the resolution as it would then read.

In my opinion it would quite obviously affect the revenue which would be derived by the federal authority if his amendment were to be adopted. Therefore it is my opinion that the amendment is undoubtedly out of order. I have before me some—and I think the committee is familiar with many—decisions holding that it is not competent for a private member to introduce an amendment to a tax resolution which would have the result of—I believe this is the expression—affecting the balance of ways and means. Therefore I feel I have no alternative but to state that the hon. member's amendment is out of order.

Mr. Girard: Mr. Chairman, I was a little amazed to hear what the hon. member for Assiniboia said about the rights of Quebec. I should like to congratulate him because there has been a great change. Ever since the Prime Minister stated the government were going to permit a 10 per cent deduction he and all the members of his party have said the government were going back on what they had already done. I quote what the hon. member said in January, 1955, at page 345 of Hansard:

The statement by the Prime Minister of Canada in which he said that the Canadian income tax law would be amended to reduce the federal tax by 10 per cent in Quebec means, in my opinion, a complete surrender by the federal government of Canada to Premier Duplessis in Quebec.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, some of the arguments put forth a while ago by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who said that a double taxation would be levied because the government of the province of Quebec had set a fiscal basis different from that of the other provinces, deserve some consideration.

The hon. member forgets that even though in the province of Quebec some taxpayers will pay less than those of other provinces, it is not through any favour of the federal government, but rather because the province has not levied through its legislation as much as the federal government allows. He cannot credit the federal government with results arising from provincial legislation. It is truly the outcome of the provincial government's generosity. I do not think that he can censure or congratulate the federal government on that score or use this as a pretext to oppose the 10 per cent deduction or say that it is another step towards surrender.

However, that 10 per cent deduction cannot be satisfactory to the province of Quebec, especially since it is not the only aspect to be taken into consideration. We have never mentioned any amount when we have asked for a full deduction. It would be foolish to fight for less money than was offered by way of the fiscal agreements. The essence of the matter lies in a principle and not exclusively on finance. It is the principle of autonomy, the respect of our various forms of government, and that principle forms the basis of Quebec's demands. That is why, even if the 10 per cent deduction means a step towards compromise, it does nothing as far as our rights are concerned, from the point of view of autonomy, even though from the sole political standpoint it may seem that the Prime Minister is not the loser and that the premier of the province is also the winner.

The C.C.F. party, which hides its dictatorial program under a socialist label, sees in fiscal agreements an ideal way of making its dream of centralization come true. That is why it considers that any encroachment upon the fiscal agreements is an attack on our most precious assets. That is why the leader of the party (Mr. Coldwell) so strongly opposed any amendment to the fiscal agreements, in which he was admirably seconded by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and by several other of their supporters.

They want to safeguard the fiscal agreements, even if to that end they would have to destroy the constitution, as was so often done by spokesmen for the government who said at the time: "You must take it or leave it, even if you have rights, even if it should ignore the rights of the provinces".

People sometimes are concerned over the fact that the great majority of the people do not take any interest in politics, that people seem to have so little confidence in politicians. When the rights governed by the constitution are dealt with in such an illogical way, such a stand by the electors is not surprising.

How did the fiscal agreements come about? First of all, advantage was taken of the abnormal situation brought about by the war, to borrow the rights of the provinces. After the war, another pretext was needed and a very righteous one was found: it was necessary to ask rich provinces to help the poor provinces.

[Mr. Girard.]

That all-powerful argument could be assimilated to that of a judge who would say to the crown attorney in a trial for robbery: "Well, that belongs to the plaintiff; he is entitled to it, but it does not matter whether he needs it or not, we have decided to use it to help someone poorer than he is".

In the meantime, it was costing the province of Quebec more than $30 million a year to adhere to that principle. It was undoubtedly thought that the cost would be so heavy that she would not be able to stand it very long and that sooner or later she would have to give up.

Last year, availing herself of her rights, the province of Quebec decided to levy her own income tax. At first the federal government was surprised and somewhat concerned, but on second thought they became reassured and said: Mr. Duplessis fell into the trap; he levied a tax and the federal government will see to it that he bears the onus of double taxation, which is always unpopular. However their satisfaction did not last very long, when they found that all the people of Quebec supported the provincial government and laid upon the federal government, where it should rest, that onus of double taxation.

The federal government found itself in a spot and the argument relating to the poor provinces lost its weight.

Following ultra-nationalist ideas, as they were accused last year of doing, independent members dared to move an amendment during the debate on the budget last year, which asked for the full deduction of the Quebec income tax. The then minister of finance (Mr. Abbott) rejected those too daring claims when he said—and these are his very words: "The federal government keeps the door open and would be ready to co-operate", adding however that no deduction greater than 5 per cent could be granted without straining overly the resources of the treasury.

The argument was not favourably received in the province of Quebec. The Prime Minister also made in the Reform Club a statement which had an extraordinary effect in Quebec. Then they apparently got together and thought of an offer which might be a political face-saving but which would do nothing to safeguard the principle we wished to uphold. With a surplus of over $13 million in 1953-1954, if my memory serves me right, the federal government was not in a position to grant a deduction of over 5 per cent. This year though, with a deficit of $160 million, it can grant one of 10 per cent. That is just another instance of the inconsistencies which are indulged in so as to maintain these fiscal agreements which are contrary to the rights of the provinces.

I was listening a moment ago to the hon. member for Assiniboia who said that the deduction proposed was absolutely unjust for the other provinces, since it would mean double taxation for Quebec and that even the people of Quebec, if I heard him correctly, could not claim to be real citizens if they dared claim what other provinces did not have.

I do not wish to repeat the arguments already advanced by my colleague from Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) but if one thinks of the double taxation for separate school purposes in the other provinces, it is easy to realize how it can hurt. In short, Mr. Chairman, the government was faced with a budgetary problem, in this, that if it were to give more to the province of Quebec and if the province of Ontario requested the same treatment, the federal government would no longer be in a position to fulfil its obligations. However, this argument can no longer be offered today, as, at last, all agree to claim from the federal government, not 5 per cent, nor 10 per cent, but a full deduction, providing, however, that the amount that we claim does not exceed that which is offered under the fiscal agreements. It therefore means that the budget balance is maintained, that neither the treasury argument, nor the argument to the effect that the other provinces allegedly are being wronged, can be advanced.

That is why I support the claims of my colleague for Chicoutimi asking the federal government to reconsider the situation and to allow the province to administer and collect the taxes that it needs to fulfil its obligations as determined by the constitution, provided the amounts offered under the fiscal agreements be not exceeded.

(Text):

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, we seem to have ranged a long way from the budget resolutions on occasion in the last hour or so. I want to deal briefly with some remarks made by the hon. member for Chicoutimi because I think that a member from British Columbia must do so. I see the Minister of Finance holding up his hands in despair. I quite agree with him that if it is not out of order to do so, at least it is stretching a point of order somewhat; but as the matter has been raised, I think perhaps he will bear with me if I spend a moment or two on it.

We people in British Columbia may be peculiar—I suppose we are—as we are the only province in Canada apparently that maintains one school system. It is a school system that was established nearly 100 years ago, and it was established on certain principles. One of those principles was that it should not be a divisive influence in our community, that the schools should be secular schools, and that the question of religious instruction should be left entirely to the churches and to the homes. That decision has been maintained for nearly a century. I myself, when I went to school in British Columbia, went to school with a number of Roman Catholics. I was not aware of that fact at the time. It was not until I left school and met them afterwards that I became aware of the fact that those boys and girls with whom I had gone to school had been Roman Catholics.

We in British Columbia feel that one of the purposes of a system of education is to create in the minds of the children a sense of their unity with all other Canadians, not to drive home to them a sense of their difference from other Canadians. It is for that reason that the people of British Columbia have maintained this school system. I may say this. We are not too happy when we have stigmatized as injustice to minorities this decision that has been made and has been maintained by a democratic majority in British Columbia.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we started off this afternoon with, shall I say, an even greater breach of the letter of this discussion when the hon. member for Greenwood was speaking. I am not at all sure that the hon. member for Greenwood and I would be in order to discuss the finer points of the socialist and capitalist theories on the basis of the budget resolutions. I would, however, make this comment. I do wish that the critics of socialism would read books about socialism written by socialists rather than read the second-hand comments of people who obviously have no conception whatever of the fundamental socialist principles.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would it not be fair for me to answer that I did at least cull from this source, of which he does not think so very highly, statements by people who are in the ranks of the sanctified and who are authorized as such to speak the pure word of socialism?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Well, I was just going to say that I knew quite well the hon. member would throw the Hon. Patrick Gordon-Walker at me. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Greenwood—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Before I allow the hon. member for Nanaimo to complete the sentence which I am now interrupting I think I should point out to the committee that the committee is not dealing with the question of minority rights, language, or education. Partly through my own fault, statements were made in that connection and I permitted them to be answered. I propose now, in so far as that part of the discussion is concerned, to regard it as concluded. The hon. member for Nanaimo considers that he is justified in replying to some remarks made by the hon. member for Greenwood. I shall permit him to make that reply because I did not hear that part of the debate, and I believe it is the duty of the Chair to allow replies to be made.

May I, however, take a minute of the time of the committee to point out that we shall quite probably be debating these taxation resolutions for some time and that, if I may say so, whether we are under a socialist or any other form of government, we are faced at the moment with certain amendments to be made to the Income Tax Act. May I warn all hon. members that in so far as any of us introduce matters extraneous to the Income Tax Act we are going to provoke somebody else to reply, and the danger is we will be debating the merits and demerits of socialism or segregated schools instead of the merits or demerits of the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act which have been submitted by the Minister of Finance.

As I said, I will permit the hon. member for Nanaimo to complete his statement which I interrupted, and I trust he will be able to do so briefly. Then I trust that he and members who follow him will be able to relate their remarks to the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I will take only a moment or two. As I said, I knew quite well the hon. member for Greenwood would throw the Hon. Patrick Gordon-Walker at me. I would hesitate, however, to classify him as the hon. member for Greenwood classifies him. I do not wish to be disrespectful to a man who was a member of Her Majesty's government in Great Britain, but he is not very highly regarded as a socialist. As to the other gentleman, Professor Joad, before he went to his final reward he moved, shall we say, into the ranks of the unsanctified, to follow the definition of the hon. member for Greenwood, and renounced his socialist views at the same time that he embraced some rather fundamental religious views. I do not think they can be regarded as spokesmen for the socialist idea.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

I do not intend to go any further with that matter except for one point. The hon. member for Greenwood laid great stress on the necessity for personal incentive. I do wish that he and people like him would look at the Canada Year Book and discover the number of people in Canada who are in a position to benefit by personal incentives. If he would look at the make-up of the Canadian population he would find that nearly 80 per cent, as he himself suggested earlier, are working for someone else, and therefore any personal incentives that may be offered to them now, working for private enterprise, would still be there if they were working under any other industrial organization. I think the hon. member tends to confuse, as so many of his way of thinking do, the position of the very small, minute and rapidly decreasing minority—who are able in a modern industrial society to exercise free enterprise and operate businesses of their own—with the vast majority to whom this argument is simply not applicable at all.

Coming to the budget resolutions, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal for a few moments with some of the changes that are proposed. First of all I want to deal with the first proposal to reduce the income tax by 2 per cent right across the board. It seems to me this is a fair sample of the type of fiscal policy this government has been pursuing for some time. I have looked up the income brackets and the appropriate taxes for them and I find, for instance, that a married man with two children and with a gross income of $2,900 a year will save 36 cents under this new provision, but on the other hand if we go to the other end of the scale and take someone with a gross income of $42,800 and a taxable income of $40,000 we find that he will save $324.

I know, of course, that the argument in favour of such concessions is that they tend to encourage investment in Canadian enterprises and the development of our country, which is a very laudable purpose, but unfortunately the record shows that they do not have that effect. I have before me two documents prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I find that in 1952 there was invested by Canadian private enterprise in business enterprises $4,130 million. This figure dropped to $4,108 million in 1954, and it is estimated that for 1955 it will be down to $3,874 million. As a matter of fact, in 1954 it went down to $3,835 million, belying the optimistic estimate of the department the previous year.

That would seem to indicate that all these concessions to people with large incomes in the hope that they will reinvest the money in the further development of our country are quite fruitless. They are vain hopes, and it is not taking place. It is, of course, the decline in investment that has caused the unemployment troubles we have had in spite of the fact that public investment has increased to some extent, but evidently by the results not sufficiently.

This is not the only field, of course, in which the government is being quite tender. In one resolution there is a further provision for mining companies. I should like to deal for a few moments with the concessions that were already being made to mining companies, and the further concession being made in this resolution. There is of course a fairly plausible argument for granting depletion allowances because the owners of mines are working a diminishing asset. But I have never yet been able to see why depletion allowance should be permitted beyond the total of the investment made in the mine. I cannot, for instance, see why if I invest $100 in a mine and get my $100 back I have a right, at the expense of my fellow Canadians, to insist that from then on until the end of that mine I am still permitted to write off depletion allowance. That seems to me to be rather dubious justice. I suppose the argument is the same, to encourage these people to invest again in mining enterprises.

We have another provision which exempts them from income tax for the first three years of productive life. I would point this out, Mr. Chairman: If a mine is not making profits in the first three years of its productive life, and it is not likely to do so in many instances, there will be no corporate income tax to pay anyway; if, however, it is a profitable enterprise, for the life of me I cannot see why it should not pay its fair share of taxation as soon as it begins to make a profit. Again it is an attempt to provide funds, I suppose, for further investment by those who have that risk capital about which we hear so much.

As I pointed out, unfortunately Canadian capital does not seem to be very fond of taking risks. It cannot have been, otherwise we would not have had the $700 million of United States capital that was poured into this country causing some rather difficult financial and fiscal problems for us. Had Canadian capital been prepared to make these investments instead of seeking safe, sure existing investments, I doubt whether our United States friends would have found so much scope. But we go on hoping, of course, that if we leave plenty of money in the pockets of people who make plenty of money, they will invest it for us in the expansion of our industry.

In actual practice we find that what happens is that we have to rely on the people of the United States to do that. The only advancement we get is when the government does take the money off the people and invest it, in spite of the rather foolish way in which the government proceeds with some of its expenditures and investments. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that today the government should very carefully reconsider this whole basic proposition that the economy as a whole is going to benefit by leaving as much money as possible in the hands of those who will not need to spend it all, and assuming that they are going to make the sort of investments that have to be made in Canada. As I say, the record shows they do not make them.

We have, in the first place, no means of directing that investment to desirable ends, to the sort of place that it requires to be put. We have no means whatever of controlling the volume of the investment. We have no means of preventing that investment from being made outside Canada, as it all too often is when more alluring investment prospects show up abroad. I should like, therefore, to see the government seriously consider abandoning this whole taxing philosophy that is based on the assumption that these savings are going to be invested in a way desirable to the people of Canada. Many of the sections of this resolution appear to be based on that.

For instance, we have a special provision with regard to the cost of financial promotion. I suppose there are arguments to be made for that if you follow this basic governmental assumption. But I suggest the whole assumption has not been borne out by history. It has been proven to be fallacious. While the hon. member for Greenwood is optimistic that the system of investing funds which landed us in the soup once before, brought us quite close to the threshold again and is apparently getting us to the danger point now according to the figures on unemployment, is going to work this time, I would suggest the wiser thing to do would be to listen carefully to the voice of history and admit the unpleasant fact that this method of investing surplus wealth has not been able in the past to ensure the continuous expansion of our economy, and has not been able to ensure continuous employment for our people. Until we have some direction of investment in this country, we are always going to be liable to that disastrous decline in production and consumption which has accompanied private investment in the past years.

Mr. Monteith: Could the minister explain just why item No. 5 is included here? I am assuming it means that rental income, after all expenses, depreciation and so on, is to be classified as earned income instead of unearned income. Why is the change made?

Mr. Harris: I shall be glad to answer the question, but I wonder if, since we are going to have a question period at this time, we could dispose of the first four resolutions and then I could answer the fifth.

Resolutions 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On resolution No. 5:

Mr. Harris: The answer is just what the hon. member for Perth has in mind. We felt this would add some slight incentive, perhaps more than slight, to the person trying to retain or increase investment in rented real estate, by taking off the burden of the 4 per cent surtax. For that purpose, we are moving it into earned income.

Mr. Monteith: I think it might even work the other way, Mr. Chairman. I know of several instances where real estate is held, and after depreciation is deducted there is actually a net loss. The real estate loss is deductible from other investment income, so I do not think it always works out that way.

Mr. Harris: I think you might see the bill.

Resolution agreed to.

On resolution No. 6:

Mr. Monteith: What is the purpose of putting an investment company on a straight 20 per cent basis instead of allowing an election?

Mr. Harris: We have had a great many representations, Mr. Chairman, from investment companies that the present provision permitting election under certain terms is not wholly satisfactory because of the nature of their income, and claiming to be tax exempt in every respect. This is an effort to alter what has been unsatisfactory from the standpoint of the investment companies. So far as we are concerned we think that they have an argument in that respect. We have adopted a more understandable form of common taxation for all investment companies, placing them at the lowest taxation rate for corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the minister saying investment companies have asked for this change?

Mr. Harris: I did not mean to convey that. They had asked for an alteration in the present law, and this alteration has been the one which we have devised. Whether or not they are satisfied with it, I presume we will know after they have read the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister explain exactly what their taxation position is at the moment, that is before this new legislation comes into effect? My understanding is that in those cases where their income was largely from shares, they largely escaped taxation. But they did have a right of election. Can the minister explain to us what the situation has been? How many of those who did elect escaped taxation, and for what reason? What is their rough position going to be now that they are all to be subject to taxation?

Mr. Benidickson: This is one of the most complicated and technical of the resolutions. Perhaps the hon. member would, therefore, permit me to read an explanation. Companies can qualify as investment companies if they meet the requirements of section 69 of the act. When the dividend tax credit for individuals was introduced a few years ago, shareholders of investment companies found they could not obtain this tax credit for dividend allowance. They were, however, able to elect to pay a tax. Investment companies have been considered as really just a funnel through which the investors, if they qualify—

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the parliamentary assistant permit a question? If they elect—

Mr. Benidickson: Then the shareholders would have got the 20 per cent dividend allowance; but it was thought that it would be better to make them all pay and make them all entitled to the dividend credit.

Mr. Macdonnell: Take the case of a company that had income, let us say, 95 per cent of which came from shares and 5 per cent from bonds. If they elected to pay, am I correct in understanding that they elected to pay so that the shareholders then would be entitled to claim 20 per cent?

Mr. Benidickson: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell: As it stands now, they will pay, but of course pay only on their taxable income which would be their income from bonds, so that on the income that they get they would still be in a position to take the 20 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: On the shares.

Mr. Macdonnell: What is the final result of that? There is no longer any option. Am I correct in thinking the situation now is what it would have been before if everyone had elected to pay the tax?

Mr. Benidickson: It is very small, Mr. Chairman. The estimate is that the revenues would actually have a net loss of about $250,000 for the current year and in a full year about $400,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to go back to resolution No. 5 and resolution No. 10 together. In resolution No. 5 the minister sets out that:

> . . . rental income from real property shall not be included in income to which the additional 4 per cent tax on investment income applies.

In resolution No. 10 it says:

> . . . a corporation more than 10 per cent of whose gross revenue was derived from rents be disqualified from being treated for tax purposes as a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

Apparently the principle here is that of removing rental income from the investment category and placing it in the category of earned income. The minister, in presenting resolution No. 5, stated in part:

> In the case of rental incomes derived from the ownership and management of real estate, it has been found impossible to draw a consistent line defining the "carrying on of a business".

This conclusion has apparently been applied in resolution No. 10 in disqualifying the investment feature. My question is this. Section 68 (1) (b) and (c) describe a personal corporation as one who:

> . . . derives at least one-quarter of its income from . . . rents, . . . and did not carry on an active financial, commercial or industrial business.

Then the application of the principle involved in resolutions No. 5 and No. 10 would apparently remove from the classification of personal corporation a company more than 75 per cent of whose gross revenue was derived from rents, or sources other than those mentioned in subsection 1 (b). That is a complicated statement. I am wondering whether that is the intention?

Mr. Benidickson: I think it can be said that neither of these paragraphs, 5 and 10, interferes with or affects the present legal definition and status of a personal corporation. I would say that paragraphs 5 and 10 are each also quite distinct. Paragraph 5 refers to a Canadian taxpayer who has rental income, and the change is being made because it has been very difficult to draw a line between what would be income from carrying on a business and providing management and not subject to surtax or rental income that in some cases would be considered investment income and subject to the surtax.

Paragraph 10, of course, applies to a non-resident investment corporation, which has been exempt from regular corporation taxes if they meet certain conditions in the definition. An individual who is a non-resident and is receiving rents from Canadian sources has two things open to him. One, he may be charged the 15 per cent withholding tax on the gross rental that is paid to him as a non-resident, or he could file a business return statement and show his expenses and his income and pay the regular graduated personal tax on the net income. At present a non-resident-owned investment corporation can own real estate in Canada and pay tax at 15 per cent on only the net return from rentals after deducting expenses.

Mr. Macdonnell: Where does that leave the personal corporation? Let me read the definition of it from section 68 of the Income Tax Act:

> In this act, a "personal corporation" means a corporation that, during the whole of the taxation year in respect of which the expression is being applied,
> (a) was controlled, whether through holding a majority of the shares of the corporation or in any other manner whatsoever, by an individual resident in Canada, by such an individual and one or more members of his family who were resident in Canada or by any other person on his or their behalf;
> (b) derived at least one-quarter of its income from
> (i) ownership of or trading or dealing in bonds, shares, debentures, mortgages, hypothecs, bills, notes or other similar property or an interest therein,
> (ii) lending money with or without securities,
> (iii) rents, hire of chattels, charterparty fees or remunerations, annuities, royalties, interest or dividends, or
> (iv) estates or trusts; and
> (c) did not carry on an active financial, commercial or industrial business.

My question is: Section 68 describes a personal corporation which derives at least one-quarter of its income from rents; has section 10 therefore removed from the classification of personal corporation a company more than 75 per cent of whose gross revenues were derived from rents, or sources other than those mentioned in subsection 1 (b)?

Mr. Benidickson: Paragraph 10 does not in any way affect the definition of a personal corporation because a personal corporation is defined in 68, and we are not disturbing that. Section 10 relates to a non-resident-owned investment corporation, and that is defined in section 70. I cannot see any relationship. I certainly will take my hon. friend's question as notice, and if there is anything I have missed I shall certainly give him a full explanation when we come to the statute.

Mr. Macdonnell: While we are on resolution 10 may I ask a further question? Will the parliamentary assistant explain the reason for that change?

Mr. Benidickson: The reason is that this puts a non-resident-owned investment corporation in a fairer position with respect to a resident corporation. My hon. friend will also note that it is not suggested that the change will come into effect in this taxation year. The non-resident corporations are thus given notice of our intention and they will have the opportunity—I think it is to the end of this year—to divest themselves of some rental income if it is consequential and so that they will get their rental income down below the 10 per cent if they want the low tax rate.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am still not quite clear. Am I correct in understanding that this is designed to remove a situation which gives an unfair advantage to the non-resident-owned corporation?

Mr. Benidickson: No, the other way around.

Mr. Macdonnell: As distinct from the domestic corporation?

Mr. Benidickson: It will make fairer the position of the resident corporation who has rental income as against the non-resident investment corporation. The non-resident investment corporation has been able to escape regular rates of tax with respect to substantial rental income earned in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then it is competition with the Canadian resident that is being considered. The non-resident has had an unfair advantage as against the Canadian resident?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is what you are doing away with?

Mr. Benidickson: Right.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Could the parliamentary assistant give us some further explanation in connection with resolution 13, because I am a little puzzled to understand the wording. Presumably this provision is intended for mines in the process of development.

Mr. Benidickson: This is merely putting into regular statutory form what has been available for some time on a temporary basis and which was extended year by year. This makes the thing permanent until there is a change in the statute.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): This gives the mining companies exemption for the first three years of production?

Mr. Benidickson: Which they enjoy now.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is intended to permit a mine to get on its feet?

Mr. Benidickson: That is right.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Before it becomes a paying proposition. Why is this necessary?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

In the case of a mine in the process of development with no net income there would be no corporation tax payable, but on the other hand where you have a mine that gets into production during the first three years there would seem to be no justification for exempting their income from taxation.

Mr. Benidickson: The three-year rule is simply a common rule being applied to all. Some might make a profit early or in the first year and some might not. It simply means that we are not stepping in as soon as a profit is made. The three-year exemption applies to everybody.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It states that it is to be extended to mines coming into production at any time hereafter. That would mean that the period during which they can claim exemption is extended until they come into production.

Mr. Benidickson: Now it will apply whenever they come into production in the future. It has been on a temporary basis, if perhaps they did not come into production before 1957. There was no assurance of the future. We are removing that limitation; we are saying, whenever they come into production in the future they will have tax exemption for three years.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance was tied up with the provincial ministers of finance when I discussed income tax problems during my budget speech on April 28. I am sure the minister has been too busy since then to refer to those remarks, but I should like to have the parliamentary assistant make some comment on the few figures I gave then.

I might say that I was one of the very few members of parliament who did not cheer the night of the budget address when the minister announced a reduction in income tax. I feel that those in Canada who are fortunate enough to be able to pay income tax should not complain about the burden of taxation. In spite of all that has been said I do not think that the present Canadian income tax schedule can be classified as interfering with incentive.

On April 28 I referred to a table which had been prepared on the basis of information as to the distribution of non-farm income in Canada. According to this analysis 34·2 per cent of all families in Canada are in the position where they receive less than $2,500 per year. Then next we find that 63·8 per cent have incomes ranging from $2,500 to $9,999, while about 2 per cent have incomes of over $10,000.

I am sure that it must come as quite a surprise to hon. members in this chamber, many of whom have had the privilege of having taxable incomes, to realize that only 2 per cent of the families in Canada receive over $10,000. When one considers the schedule provided by the minister in his budget he will realize that when you get up to $50,000, $100,000 and $200,000 in the way of interest the percentage would be very small.

Taxation statistics for 1954 indicate that there are only 330 persons in Canada receiving incomes of over $100,000. It is true that they receive a very sizeable total of $48.1 million. Then in the group between $50,000 and $100,000 there are 1,510 persons. There are only 1,840 persons in Canada who receive incomes of over $50,000, and together those two groups receive $143 million. That very small group really should not complain about the taxes they have to pay. As has been stated so often, it is not how much you pay that really matters, it is how much you have left.

As I mentioned when I spoke before, a person getting $100,000 a year would have to pay a sizeable amount but after paying his taxes he would have left, on the basis of 300 days in the year, $163 a day to spend. The person getting $200,000 a year would have left $261 a day, while the person getting $400,000 would have left $419.38 per day.

I submit in all seriousness that before we give substantial relief to the persons in those brackets we should try somehow or other to get more people into the brackets where they would be paying income tax. It has not always been considered to be one of the responsibilities of the Minister of Finance to be concerned about the distribution of the national income, but I think the real objective of income tax has been to try to re-allocate the national income so that in the case of those who have not it will be possible for the federal government to have the resources available for family allowances, old age pensions, health and other desirable services.

I submit that in the next few years the Minister of Finance is going to have to worry about 34·2 per cent of Canadian families who have an average income of $1,500 a year. Anyone who has to go out to find living quarters on a rental basis, to pay for groceries, books, health and other services, will realize that it is just impossible to give his family the standard of living that we Canadians think we should have on an income of $1,500.

I submit that one of our fundamental problems is that 34·2 per cent who have to balance their budgets on $1,500. They are in the position where they are going into debt at a most alarming rate. I put figures on the record with regard to credit buying and the expansion of small loan companies which I think supports my claim that somehow or other we have to find ways and means to provide greater income for these 34·2 per cent. Those people should be able to get their hands on more money so they can buy the goods in Canadian stores and put more people to work. I hope that between now and next year when the minister is bringing down his budget he will take more from the privileged few in the higher brackets. I do not suggest for a moment that he take all the income from the 1,840 people in the higher brackets and that would solve all our financial problems, but those people who are in those higher brackets really cannot buy all the consumer goods that are piling up in our stores. I hope the minister will make some comment on the table I placed on the record at that time and the fact that such a large percentage of Canadian families have to get along on an average of $1,500 a year. This distribution of farm incomes points out that we have a large number of families of two persons or more, actually 8 per cent, who get less than $1,000. You have another large group, 7 per cent, getting between $1,000 and $1,499; and another 8 per cent between $1,500 and $1,999. Some ways and means have to be found of seeing that we change this very large percentage who are getting an average of $1,500.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, item No. 7 states that costs of issuing or selling shares of capital stock of a company are to be exempt for taxation purposes. Does that refer to new incorporations or companies already in existence that are issuing further issues of shares?

Mr. Harris: It applies, Mr. Chairman, to all expenses of this kind, whether it is a newly incorporated or an existing corporation.

Mr. Monteith: All incorporation expenses?

Mr. Harris: It is intended to cover corporation expenses, which again will be set out in the bill, legal expenses and the like.

Mr. Monteith: Prospectuses?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question about section 2 of this resolution with regard to a reduction in the rate of tax on income of corporations from 47 per cent to 45 per cent. Am I right in suggesting that the idea of this reduction is the same as I mentioned before, that it provides funds for further expansion in industry? Is that the basic purpose of it?

If I am right in that assumption, then it seems to me that it would be more effective in producing new enterprises in this country to raise the exemption rate from $20,000 further up the scale rather than to provide the extremely massive tax reductions to some of the very large corporations in this country. I have in mind the largest one in my own constituency, which reckons its profits in the $15 million and $16 million a year category. This is going to be something really thumping for them. They do not need it. They have ample funds for all the expansion they can do. On the other hand, a higher exemption than $20,000 might very well provide the stimulus for an expansion of a smaller industry. Has the minister considered that angle?

Mr. Harris: Yes, there were the alternatives that the hon. member has stated. It was thought that the general across-the-board reduction would give the opportunity of expansion to every corporation to be used in such a manner as they, according to their best judgment, thought most desirable. On the other hand we could have done what my hon. friend suggests, increase the $20,000 figure; but we felt that on this occasion at least we should make the general reduction apply to all corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell: It is very pleasant for me to find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Nanaimo for once.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The devil can cite Scripture.

Mr. Macdonnell: What he said merits careful consideration and, without labouring the point, we might ask the minister if it is too late to consider that even now. After all, we all hope that little companies will become big companies in as large a number as possible. I feel that the step when it was taken was a good step. I believe it has been extended once already, and I wonder if it would not be possible to extend it again. I commend that to the minister because, notwithstanding the fact that I disagree with the hon. member for Nanaimo on many matters, I am conscious of what he pointed out, that we do want a larger number of smaller units and we do not want concentration in a few units. I feel strongly that whatever can be done to help the small fellow is doubly and triply worth while.

Mr. Harris: I am glad to find myself in the position, which I hoped I would be in at some time during the day, of having the two hon. gentlemen opposing me on something instead of fighting with each other. As a matter of fact, I sympathize fully with what has been said and, if I were in the opposition, I believe I would take precisely the same view. But, since I had to make the decision on one course or the other, I chose the one course, though I recognized the value and the virtue of adopting the other course. It is too late to make a change along the lines suggested by the hon. member, but I assure him the matter will be given full consideration.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is it necessary to remind the minister that he is neither a Mede nor a Persian, and, therefore, he can change and will not have to stay the same forever.

Mr. Monteith: Paragraph 8 of the resolution mentions "sale or realization of inventories or accounts receivable." I wonder if we could have an explanation as to why this clause is included?

Mr. Benidickson: Paragraphs 8 and 9 are related; one, the sale of inventory and the sale of accounts receivable—inventories sold in the normal course of business—

Mr. Monteith: It is both inventory and accounts receivable in paragraph 8.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, in paragraph 8. Inventories sold in the normal course of business must be taken into account in computing income. Similarly accounts receivable are normally included in income in the year incurred or the year the report is received, depending upon the taxpayer's method of getting his accounts. However, following a recent court decision it appeared that some sales of inventories might have to be regarded as capital transactions and left out of the computation of income. Some doubt has also arisen as to whether accounts receivable of a taxpayer recording on a so-called tax basis could be made as to the tax when these are sold or payment is received by the taxpayer after ceasing to carry on business. This is a loophole that is taken care of.

Mr. Monteith: I believe I know the case to which the parliamentary assistant refers, which this is proposed to cover, where it had been granted there was a capital gain on the disposal of a business on inventory and accounts receivable. How does this operate as far as the fiscal year period goes? If it is an individual, it automatically means the calendar year 1955. If it is a corporation that, for instance, has a year ending February 28, 1955, and they happened to dispose of their accounts receivable and inventory in August 1954, are they affected?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. While it has been past practice to require them to do this, and this will make it certain, it will be applicable to a change that took place in August of last year. They will be required to follow this.

Mr. Monteith: In other words, it is retroactive to last year.

Mr. Benidickson: In the case of a corporation with a year ending this year.

Mr. Monteith: That does not seem to be quite equitable, does it?

Mr. Benidickson: Their return has not yet been made.

Mr. Monteith: It may well have been made by budget date. It is not required to be made for six months but it might well have been made. A company with a year ending January 31 would be in the same boat.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not out of line with recent practice. The department has been administering the act in this way. There were some uncertainties about it and it is just to eliminate that uncertainty.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Monteith: No, Mr. Chairman. I think that this provision is not working to the detriment of a corporation if a corporation's year ends December 31, 1955. It affects them the same as it affects an individual proprietorship, business partnership and so on. It certainly seems to me to be to the detriment of a corporation with a year ending before December 31, 1955. I mean he may have made his disposal in the previous income tax year. He has, if he made it last August.

Mr. Benidickson: Prior to bringing down the bill we shall have another look at the hon. member's remarks and see if the point should be met.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will this section apply in the case of an individual incorporating himself?

Mr. Benidickson: During 1955, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not sure yet that I understand exactly how this works out. May we have an illustration? Here we have this language:

> 8. That for the year 1955 and subsequent taxation years proceeds of a sale or realization of inventory or accounts receivable of a taxpayer upon or after selling or ceasing to carry on a business . . .

I suppose one can understand "upon ceasing"; that is to say he sells the business to some new entity or corporation. I am not quite sure that I follow the transaction through. Might we have explained to us step by step exactly what happens and how the transaction is going to work out practically from the point of view of the man who carries that through? Let us take the case of a man who decides to incorporate his business and sells to the new company.

Mr. Benidickson: I think that transaction would be better shown if we had the statute before us. I would suggest to my hon. friend that I do that when we have the actual words that are going to apply in the statute.

Mr. Macdonnell: When we come to a study of the statute I think we will be in a much better position if we have a better understanding now. I find these statutes difficult to understand when I get them, largely by reason of the highly technical wording which makes them more difficult to understand. Could we not have just a play-by-play account of what happens here so that we may know the exact transaction that is contemplated and the exact way in which it works out? I think we shall then be able more intelligently to study the statute.

Mr. Harris: I apologize for intervening, Mr. Chairman, but I think the hon. member for Greenwood is making light of his knowledge of this situation. This is an effort to provide taxation for the sale of accounts receivable and inventory by a person or corporation in the manner which has been heretofore adopted. However, in every change in the law, in the sense of spelling it out, one has to put in many things. In the bill there are a great many explanations.

Mr. Macdonnell: Might I interject a question there? At this point would the minister tell us exactly what the evil is or what the gap in the legislation is which it is felt necessary to fill? What are the difficulties they have run into?

Mr. Harris: There is no evil whatever in any legislation that we have before parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell: It might have been passed so long ago that it was done by another party.

Mr. Harris: Even then I do not think I would apply that adjective. Actually, we are making sure that a person who sells his accounts receivable or his inventory should pay tax on the proceeds. As my hon. friend says, we have a situation where a business may be sold. It may be sold by incorporation and sale. The point is that at that time or subsequent to that time, the man will dispose of his accounts receivable and his inventory.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask a question there? If I understood the minister correctly, that disposition would be made after sale by the purchaser.

Mr. Harris: I was trying to combine the two into one. It may be that in the sale the accounts receivable would not have passed in ownership from the seller to the purchaser

On the other hand the inventory might very well have done so under those circumstances if there was a sale of a complete inventory. But let us suppose the situation where on a sale occurring you had everything pass, including accounts receivable and inventory. So far so good. You may, however, have a partial sale and after the initial sale you will have a sale of the accounts receivable. The purpose of this resolution and the consequent bill will be to tax in the hands of the vendor the proceeds from the sale of the accounts receivable or the remnants of inventory, whatever they may be. As my hon. friend will see, there is a provision as to the method of taxation, spreading it over the three-year average.

Mr. Monteith: Why is that done, actually? I refer to spreading it over three years. If a man has $100,000 of inventory and he disposes of his business, why should not that inventory be taxed at the rate in that year? He has paid taxes in the previous years on his profit in those years.

Mr. Harris: That is quite true. But I do not think my hon. friend would suggest that we ought to tax this wholly in the one year received because he would undoubtedly pay at a higher rate than that which we now propose to charge under this provision.

Mr. Monteith: I am just wondering why the three-year period was picked. Why not five years, as is done in averaging farmers' income, or something like that?

Mr. Harris: One must fix a time. Three years looks like a good average which will permit fair taxation for what should be paid. But if my hon. friend feels that it ought to be one year or two years or five years, perhaps he can make a better argument than I can make for three years.

Mr. Monteith: I just wondered what the purpose of it was.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if this is what is in the minister's mind. Suppose a company has $1 million of inventory at the end of one particular year and shows a $1 million profit; then say at the end of the next year it has a $1 million inventory and shows $1 million profit. Then in the third year suppose they sell the business and they happen to get $2 million for their inventory. The profit would be commensurate with that on the previous year's operations and so on. Suppose they sold just at the end of the year. There would be $2 million profit on that basis. But this provision would put all the $1 million extra inventory over the three years.

Mr. Harris: Yes; because quite obviously the increased value has probably not occurred all in the one year. There has been a gradual build-up of profit in the inventory.

Mr. Monteith: It is really a protection against somebody showing a deflated inventory which he eventually sells at an enhanced figure. Is that correct?

Mr. Harris: Yes. That is what occurs. But I prefer to put it on the other ground, namely that it is relief against high taxation if it were charged in the one year.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Monteith: I wonder whether the minister could give us an explanation of paragraph No. 9?

Mr. Benidickson: This is another loophole provision of a rather technical nature. My hon. friend would probably like an explanation.

Mr. Macdonnell: This is not a defect in legislation, by any chance, is it?

Mr. Benidickson: No. We sometimes find that the act is deficient. This paragraph proposes a special tax of 15 per cent on corporations the control of which has been acquired by a non-resident corporation or a tax-exempt organization in Canada. The tax will be calculated with reference to the amount of designated surplus the corporation pays out by way of dividends to the non-resident corporation or to the tax-exempt organization. The general procedure for a company which has an accumulation of undistributed earnings is to distribute this surplus as dividends so that it becomes taxable in the hands of the individual shareholders, or the company may elect, under the appropriate provision of the Income Tax Act, to pay tax on it at 15 per cent so that it becomes what is called tax paid undistributed income. This of course may be capitalized under certain other provisions of the act well known to my hon. friend—section 105.

The present law also provides that if one Canadian company acquires control of another which has an undistributed surplus this undistributed surplus of the acquired company at the time control is acquired becomes a designated surplus as defined in section 28 (6) of the act. Dividends paid, therefore, out of the designated surplus to the company that has acquired control bear tax at the regular corporation income tax rates in the hands of the controlling company.

However, it was found that these taxes could be avoided if control of a company with undistributed income on hand was acquired by a non-resident corporation or a tax-exempt organization.

Mr. Macdonnell: If control was acquired by a non-resident corporation it would then escape tax?

Mr. Benidickson: It did, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: And this says that a corporation resident in Canada which pays a dividend out of a designated surplus to a non-resident corporation exempt from tax will be subject to a tax of 15 per cent. You are putting yourself in the position of getting the same 15 per cent that you would get otherwise.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No. I should like an explanation of paragraph No. 11.

Mr. Benidickson: Because of the difficulty of ascertaining just where and how income is earned in the operating of ships and aircraft most companies have exempted such income from taxation. However, the earnings might be exempt in the foreign land and also exempt in Canada. This is another loophole provision. We are just trying to avoid having Canadian companies become a haven for escaping taxation anywhere with respect to operations of this kind.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No. Could we have an explanation of paragraph No. 12?

Mr. Benidickson: This is new. It has been found that non-resident owners of certain timber reserves in Canada have been able to escape the normal tax that is payable on income of non-residents. I explained a little earlier how the non-resident would be subject to the withholding tax on his income from rents and so on. This provision will be similar. It is to make clear that on incomes from timber royalties a non-resident will pay the withholding tax.

Mr. Monteith: You say "from timber royalties". The paragraph reads:

> That payments made after April 5, 1955, to a non-resident, computed by reference to the amount of timber cut or taken from a timber limit in Canada be subject to the 15 per cent tax on income from Canada of non-residents.

That is the ordinary withholding tax. It refers to payments but that does not sound like income earned.

Mr. Benidickson: I referred to "timber royalties". That is a common phrase by which we would describe that kind of income, income calculated by reference to the amount of timber cut, stumpage and so on.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: I want an explanation of paragraphs 14 and 15. In that regard I wish to refer to an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of May 9 which is based, I think, very largely on a statement made in the house by the hon. member for Calgary South with reference to the whole question of depreciation. The Gazette takes up the matter under the caption, "Handicapping Our Own." As hon. members know, the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary South is that we are not giving a fair break to Canadian enterprisers. I am going to read briefly from the editorial in the Gazette and then I want to ask if we may be given an adequate statement showing us the approach of the government to this question of depreciation, because it seems to me one of very great importance. I shall read briefly from the editorial and then ask the minister or the parliamentary assistant to reply. It reads in part as follows:

> The discrimination against the Canadian investor in Canada comes about from the different tax regulations in the two countries on the question of depletion. The importance of these differences was well set out last week in the House of Commons by Mr. Carl O. Nickle, member of parliament for Calgary South. Mr. Nickle drew attention to the fact that the depletion allowances in the United States are so much more generous that a United States company coming into Canada has a huge advantage over Canadian companies.
> Depletion allowances are basically a recognition that a well or mine producing oil, gas, coal or any other mineral is a "wasting asset", strictly limited in the ultimate production it can yield. If the owner is to stay permanently in business, he must continuously explore for new wells or mines. Therefore an industry that must be seeking new reserves to prevent expiry incurs expenses that do not belong to a business that is not concerned with "a wasting asset".
> This principle, to be sure, is recognized in both countries. The trouble is that it is recognized far more fully in the United States than it is in Canada. Here is the difference.
> In Canada, for instance, operators of oil or gas wells are entitled to a depletion allowance amounting to 33⅓ per cent of their profits. But they may claim such a depletion allowance only out of net profits, if any, after other taxes have been paid. And they can claim depletion allowance only after they have completed making all tax allowances for the expenses of exploration and development.
> Under United States law, however, a company is permitted to make deductions for depletion before, not after, it has recovered the expenses of exploration and development. And these United States regulations apply whether the costs of exploration and development were incurred in the United States, Canada, or elsewhere. And, in addition, a company is permitted a choice of method in calculating depletion allowance, whichever may be the more to its advantage: either 27½ per cent of gross production income, before other taxes; or 50 per cent of net income after other taxes.

How do these differences work out in practice? Mr. Nickle shows how severely they discourage Canadian development by Canadian investment. In the first place, the huge expenditures in recent years have far exceeded gross production income. Only one-tenth of the Canadian companies engaged in exploration are in the position of having net production income against which to apply depletion allowance. The actual benefit of depletion allowance to date has been only about 1 per cent of the spendings made to replace and increase proved reserves. Therefore the conditions under which the depletion allowance is possible under Canadian tax law are so severe as to be inaccessible to most Canadian oil and gas companies.

In the second place, it is often better, under the Canadian tax law, for a Canadian company to undertake no exploration for new replacement resources but just to exhaust those already proved. In other words, the law encourages Canadians to abandon or curtail exploration at the very time when it should be encouraged. And in the meantime, the United States tax law is encouraging United States companies to do what Canadian companies are discouraged from doing.

There is no need to follow extreme policies of "Canada for Canadians". But surely there is no need to place our own investors at a disadvantage when competing in Canada with investors of the United States.

Now, that explains the argument and the criticism which is made, and I should like to have an answer.

Mr. Harris: Well, I am glad to know we are on the last item just before six o'clock. I would not want anything I say now to precipitate a long debate on this subject which I must say, with due respect, needs a great deal of consideration. I am prepared to make a short statement for the record. I had expected perhaps the hon. member for Calgary South would be here either now or when the bill is considered to deal with this particular point. If I do make a statement I would hope that he and others would consider it, and at a later time our views could be expressed at greater length. Perhaps the resolution could pass in the meantime, if that is agreeable to my hon. friend.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not want the minister to read it on the understanding we are necessarily going to pass this resolution before six o'clock. I would doubt if that is going to happen. I do not want the minister to be misled.

Mr. Harris: Since it is still the last resolution, may I ask the indulgence of the house to continue after six and pass it, unless there is a great deal more comment about this resolution than it appears there might be.

Mr. Macdonnell: Could we wait until we hear what the minister has to say?

Mr. Harris: I did notice that the hon. member for Calgary South had made a rather lengthy and quite serious contribution to the debate some time ago on this particular point.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Of course, he is well qualified to speak about this particular business with which we are dealing. The fact I am not prepared to agree with his conclusion does not alter the fact his views are seriously considered on every occasion he presents them to the house. The whole burden of his speech seemed to be the same as that which was interpreted by the article the hon. member for Greenwood just read. It seemed to imply that foreign investment in Canada is given a better break than domestic investment. This is not so.

It is quite clear that companies operating in Canada, whether they be Canadian or foreign owned, are treated exactly the same by our laws. I think the hon. member for Calgary South would agree with that. It is true, however, that in the United States there are certain provisions with respect to depletion allowances which are slightly more generous than in our own country.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister permit a question? Would it not be fair to say the hon. member for Calgary South was basing his argument on the over-all position of a United States company, including its treatment in the United States?

Mr. Harris: Yes, I quite agree. But I should like to point out, sir, that when the Paley commission in the United States came to look into the whole pattern of tax laws, both in that country and in our own, they came to the conclusion that the United States tax law was slightly more generous—I emphasize the "slightly"—in its treatment of the oil industry and slightly less generous in its treatment of the mining industry than Canadian law. I am ready to concede there are certain technical provisions in the United States law which are more generous than our own, but it should be pointed out at the same time that at the present time our corporate rate will be 47 per cent whereas it remains at 52 per cent in the United States.

I am inclined to think my hon. friend has been working on a rather slim basis if he is trying to show that on the over-all competitive position there is a factor weighted against the Canadian oil and gas industry. It is always easy to point out, of course, the more favourable factors in other countries while overlooking the unfavourable factors in those other countries. After dealing with the international competitive aspects of taxation, the hon. member attempted to show that our method of allowing depletion operates to discourage exploration.

I must say I found that difficult to understand, just as I have found all other presentations that have been made to me by the various interested groups difficult to understand. The argument, as I understand it, is that a company, after having achieved substantial production, is to a large extent deprived of its depletion allowance if it continues to explore. I am not prepared to accept that conclusion, nor am I prepared to accept the illustration he gave in the course of his remarks earlier this session. Every dollar of expenditure on exploration frees a dollar of profit from tax. This is the essence of the deduction for exploration expenses. The depletion allowance, so-called, frees only one-third of the profit dollar from tax. It seems to me it is quite obvious that the company which undertakes to explore is not discouraged therefrom, having regard to the fact that if from further exploration greater production is secured and he receives his one-third exemption on the profits therefrom at that time. His immediate depletion allowance is postponed because he has already secured an exemption from the deduction of exploration expenses. I have never felt the argument the hon. member has made—I must say that this goes as well for those associations who approached me last fall in this connection—is doing justice to the oil industry and the problems it has to face.

I believe I have stated fairly generally the position. If my hon. friend wants to consider it in terms of dollars, of course it is obvious that under certain conditions a greater tax benefit will accrue to Canadian corporations if we follow the proposal made by the hon. member. This does not mean it should be granted. All of us can think of special arrangements which would result in lower taxation for corporations, but it is not conceded that if they do not get them their exploration activities should be curtailed.

Mr. Fleming: There are several points about which I should like to ask the minister, not related especially to this last item.

Mr. Harris: We have gone through them all.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I say that we have gone through them in a way, but we have ranged all over creation. We did not take them up, as I originally suggested, item by item. It seems to me fair that the hon. member for Eglinton, who has been kept at a committee meeting, should be allowed to make what comments he wishes.

Mr. Harris: I have no objection, except I thought the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Perth had been working through the resolution systematically and I thought they were representing their party.

Mr. Fleming: These are individual points, Mr. Chairman, which I think are not related to any main argument. I do not intend to discuss them at length.

Regulation No. 1000, passed under the provisions of section 26 of the Income Tax Act, makes provision for exempting the income of nurses-in-training. It provides that for the purpose of the section income does not include income from employment as a nurse-in-training. This relates to the dependent of a taxpayer, the dependent being the nurse-in-training. I fully support the provisions of the regulation so far as they go, but I am wondering why a similar provision could not be made in other cases.

At the moment I am thinking of the case of the social-worker-in-training who, from the point of view of public policy, could well receive the same type of consideration as is accorded the nurse-in-training. Perhaps we should say rather their parents, on whom they are dependent, should receive the same consideration. I should like to bring that to the attention of the minister and ask him if he will not give consideration to an amendment to the regulation to include within the scope of the exemption the case I have mentioned of the social-worker-in-training, and put her on the same basis as the nurse-in-training.

Mr. Harris: I am afraid I am slightly prejudiced on this particular point at the moment. We had not considered it in the light in which the hon. member for Eglinton has placed it, and I would be glad to do that. I think I know some of the difficulties which in previous years have rather restricted the class of persons and led eventually to the opening up to nurses-in-training. I must say that I am not too familiar with the principle on which the decisions are made. I shall certainly consider the case of the social-worker-in-training.

Before my hon. friend came in I made a special appeal to continue until these resolutions were disposed of.

Mr. Fleming: I am ready to go on. Some one called it six o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall we continue?

Mr. Fleming: There are two other points, Mr. Chairman. The first concerns the large number of taxpayers who, at the present time, by reason of deductions at the source, are obliged to file claims for refunds. It seems to me that consideration should now be given to some change in the provisions of the act so that the rate of deduction at the source shall not be so high that so many taxpayers will be required to file claims for refunds.

At the present time, as I understand it, more than half of those who filed returns for the calendar year 1954 will be eligible for refunds totalling $146,000,000. The figures I have before me indicate that in Ontario alone 2,010,000 taxpayers are expected to file returns and that refunds will be payable in about 1,040,000 cases. This is rather typical of the position across Canada.

The method of deduction at the source in the case of persons whose incomes consist of wages and salaries is well recognized. I remind the minister that the percentage of deduction was increased several years ago. At that time the point was raised as to whether the increase was not so great that many people would be obliged to file claims for refunds. Now we have arrived at a situation where the government is taking, by way of deductions at the source, money from more people who are entitled to refunds than those who will find themselves having some further payment to make at the end of the year. That is a situation that should not be allowed to continue. Taxpayers whose income is drawn from other sources are not in that position. The position is accepted that in their case they pay the balance which remains owing on April 30, after they have paid their quarterly instalments during the income year. For that reason, it seems to me the time has come when the percentage of deduction at the source should be eased somewhat so that so many taxpayers will not be required to make claims for refunds.

Mr. Harris: The fact that the numbers claiming refunds appear to be increasing, as my hon. friend has said, would be an indication perhaps that the percentage being deducted might have to be reviewed. The hon. member made reference to this in his speech on the budget. I am making inquiry, sir, and shall continue to do so.

Mr. Fleming: The other point I should like to raise arises out of a Canadian Press dispatch of March 17. I presume this has already been drawn to the attention of the minister, but I raise it for his comment. The dispatch is datelined Kitchener, March 17, and reads as follows:

> An income tax official last night described as "vicious" a section of the federal Income Tax Act which gives civil servants power to seize property without a prior court hearing.
> H. R. McGrogan of the income tax department in Ottawa said that to his knowledge no other government department, person or corporation in Canada has such power.
> He told a meeting of farmers that under the section, a department assessor can at any time make an assessment or re-assessment. Whether or not the taxpayer owes the money, he must pay it to the Department of National Revenue within 45 days. If he does not, the department has the right to seize all his assets to satisfy the assessment, Mr. McGrogan said.

I do not think I know the official mentioned, and I cannot vouch for the accuracy of his description in all respects, but I would ask the minister to comment on this matter. I am sure it must have come to his attention before.

Mr. Harris: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have heard of it and without appearing to postpone the issue may I say that that also would be a matter of administration to which the Minister of National Revenue might make an answer. In the light of that, at the moment I am sure that I am aware of the practice and of the law which permits the seizure of documents and the like for the purpose of establishing assessments, if that is what my hon. friend is referring to. I think he will agree with me that such a power is necessary, though I admit that one does not want to have to exercise it unnecessarily.

If on the other hand he is referring to seizure of property for the purpose of satisfying a debt, then I shall be glad to look at the appropriate section, if it can be drawn to my attention.

Mr. Fleming: The press dispatch refers to the latter case. The seizure of documents is not mentioned. The taking into custody of documents in the course of investigation is a well-recognized procedure in the act and is not mentioned in this dispatch. I take it that the official is referring to the provisions of the act permitting the department to enjoy extrajudicial rights in the matter of the seizure of property. I have in mind the use the department makes of its right to attach wages and salaries for arrears without any judicial finding on the subject and without those restraints that normally attach to the execution of judgments.

Mr. Harris: I am informed that this arises after a certificate has been granted by the courts as to the amount owing and that, acting upon that certificate, certain seizures may be made. However, I am told by one of my officials here that the particular matter is known and I shall be glad to see that the whole details are given to my hon. friend. I am assured that it is in consequence of sections 119 and 120 of the act which do provide for seizure after certificate, and that the press report does not disclose the full story.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is just one final point that I want to bring to the attention of the minister. It is a matter that has been up here more than once. It has to do with the self-employed person's right to participate in a scheme of retirement benefits. The minister's predecessor turned this down and emphasized a good deal the mechanical difficulties. I am not taking the time of the committee now to go into it, but I do ask the minister to give this whatever consideration he can because it is obviously a matter which, if it can be arranged, is of vast importance to a very large number of serious citizens of this country.

Mr. Harris: I have read all of the past debates on this subject, and I have received many deputations and I have spent considerable time with my officials discussing it. I think I should only say it is true that my predecessor did emphasize the administrative difficulties and perhaps placed the onus on the public generally to find a way around these difficulties. But we have given consideration to it, and will continue to give consideration to it, having in mind that Mr. Abbott did place on the record some of the difficulties and at the same time suggested that while the principle was not precisely that which was placed before the house by those who were representing the arguments that there should be such a deduction, nevertheless we know that a great many people feel that something along this line should be done. With that in mind we shall continue to study the problem.

Resolution agreed to.

The Chairman: Do I understand we are to continue with the excise tax resolution at eight o'clock?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

EXCISE TAX ACT

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide amongst other things:

1. That the excise tax on automobiles adapted or adaptable to passenger use be reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent.

2. That the excise tax on tires and tubes for automotive vehicles of all kinds be repealed.

3. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture or production of feeds for poultry, cattle and other stock and fur-bearing animals;

(b) creosote oil and other wood preservatives when for use exclusively in the treatment of timber, poles or lumber;

(c) material to be used exclusively in the production of terrazzo flooring;

(d) perforated bituminized fibre pipe for drainage purposes not to exceed four inches in diameter;

(e) rims for kitchen sinks;

(f) floor tile;

(g) wallpaper.

4. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the sixth day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-five.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. This may be the best time to announce the business for the rest of the evening. Should the excise tax resolution pass, it is not our intention to go on with the Customs Tariff changes but to go into supply and take the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, it is undoubtedly a welcome occasion when a resolution under the heading of the Excise Tax Act proposes reduction in or repeal of excise taxes on certain commodities without at the same time proposing increases or new taxes. Therefore, as far as this resolution goes, I am sure it commends itself to the favour of the house.

However, in accepting the proposal for certain reductions and the repeal of certain taxes and before going too far in our enthusiasm it might be well to remind ourselves that it was this government which imposed the taxes which the committee is now asked to reduce or repeal.

There are several aspects of the resolution and of the excise and sales taxes broadly that I should like to comment upon briefly this evening. I suppose the leading feature of the proposal now under discussion is the proposed reduction in the excise tax on passenger automobiles from 15 to 10 per cent and the repeal of the excise tax on tires and tubes for automotive vehicles. The reduction in the excise tax on automobiles from 15 to 10 per cent is indeed welcome, but I should like to submit to the minister and to the committee that this tax is still too heavy.

This tax was applied in the first instance and presumably continues today as a luxury tax; it was introduced under that guise. In my submission it can no longer be defended as such. To a vast majority of the owners in Canada a motor car can no longer be regarded as a luxury, but in the light of modern conditions must be regarded as a necessity. However, our tax legislation takes no account whatever of that fact. The burden which this tax has placed upon the automotive industry in Canada, and indeed the acute way in which it has been making itself felt latterly, are well known to every hon. member of the house. We have on every hand evidence of the increasing state of disorganization in motor car sales right across Canada.

The automotive industry is a major employer of labour in Canada. Any reduction in the unfair load of taxes now borne by that industry is bound to reflect itself not only in a more equitable distribution of the burden of taxes but also in increased employment of Canadian workmen. While I do not propose to protract my comments on this subject I wish to emphasize that while this modest reduction in this tax is welcome it points to the necessity of a more resolute approach by the Minister of Finance and a more effective grappling with the problem and the realization of the need of further reductions or the removal of the tax which has become to an ever-increasing degree an unfair imposition.

The position in which many motor car dealers have found themselves since the minister introduced his budget resolutions is also worthy of note. I am sure that all hon. members have had representations made to them by motor car dealers concerning the position in which they find themselves as a result of the budget proposals, leaving them in so many cases with large inventories of motor cars on which they had already paid the 15 per cent excise tax. With the public expecting to receive immediately the benefits of the reduction announced by the minister, the dealers have been called upon to bear the full burden.

The attitude taken by the minister when this question was raised originally in the house was, I suppose, the traditional one. In effect the minister said that he could not consider making any adjustment either in regard to the effective date of his proposal or in the tax-paid position of motor cars held in stock by dealers. He seemed to imply that these were the same dealers who had derived some benefit in earlier years when the tax was being imposed or increased. It may be that when these taxes were imposed or increased in earlier years some people would derive benefit in so far as they had stocks on hand, but it is entirely unfair to assume that those same people are in business today in the same way and are now simply being called upon to part with the equivalent of some of the benefit that they received in earlier years in consequence of the introduction or increase of this tax. This is a very different situation.

The matter was raised later on May 18 when a question was put to the Minister of Finance on the orders of the day asking whether he was prepared to give further consideration to the matter. At that time the Minister of Finance indicated in effect that he would consider the matter. It seems to me that the time has come when the Minister of Finance must make his position abundantly clear. If he had no intention of affording any measure of relief to these dealers who are in the position I have described, then I am afraid it was a cruel way in which the minister may have given them some hope of relief when on this recent occasion he intimated that he was giving consideration to their problem.

On the other hand, if the minister has given serious consideration to the matter and if he is going to afford any relief in this situation it is time that he announced what the government proposes in that respect. If there is to be any measure of tax relief in this regard it must be proposed now because otherwise the administrative difficulties in calculating any claim for tax refund are bound to multiply as the days pass. Therefore the matter calls for an immediate announcement on the part of the minister.

When the government is announcing a reduction in the excise tax it is easy enough to content ourselves with welcoming it, but I ask the house to observe the commodities upon which it is proposed that the tax be reduced. All of these are commodities upon which a reduction in the taxes is justified and indeed overdue. But let us remind ourselves at the same time, Mr. Chairman, that there is a long list of commodities more closely and intimately related to the necessities of life than any of those on the list before us now, upon which no reduction of indirect taxes is proposed by the government. Do hon. members of this house keep adequately in their minds and on their consciences the fact that this government goes on levying under the Excise Tax Act taxes upon the very necessities of life, upon our clothing, our boots and shoes and household furniture, certain prepared foods, and indeed on many drugs and medicines that are essential to those who require them?

I do not know how long this government thinks it can justify the continued imposition upon the Canadian people of a 10 per cent sales tax on commodities as essential as these to the average Canadian family. Think of it—the government deriving revenue by an imposition upon clothing, boots and shoes, household furniture, drugs and medicines. I hope that members of this house will in their might and in their indignation make it abundantly clear to this government and to the Minister of Finance that they will no longer tolerate heavy impositions of this kind that add so grievously to the cost of the necessities of life.

It is well that we should remind ourselves also that these taxes are levied at the manufacturer's or producer's level and, as everyone knows, as these goods pass from hand to hand, to the wholesaler, to the jobber, to the retailer, and finally to the consumer, they attract mark-ups. Concrete cases have been given to the house on similar occasions without number in the past, to demonstrate beyond all challenge or question that a tax that begins as a 10 per cent tax at the manufacturer's level will in most cases become a tax of 20 per cent or more when the goods are sold by the retailer to the consumer. The consumer, in the case of these indirect taxes, is never told what portion of the price he pays for goods goes to pay these taxes. They are hidden; and because they are hidden they are popular with a government that chooses to go on levying these taxes and avoiding as far as it can the wrath of the taxpaying public, by not letting the taxpaying public know what portion of the price is collected by the government in taxes.

A tax of that kind as applied to the type of commodity of which I am speaking is doubly iniquitous. It is bad enough that there should be taxes upon these basic necessities of life, but far worse that they should be applied in such a manner as to go on attracting mark-ups, mark-ups on mark-ups, and marks-ups on mark-ups on mark-ups, all at the expense of the consumer. That is another feature of this tax which in my submission this house can no longer tolerate. The government is not going to remove these taxes from the necessities of life, nor substitute a fairer system of collecting taxes than through the medium of indirect taxes in the way I have described, unless hon. members of this house, aroused and indignant, make that demand.

One could go further. Do we stop adequately to ponder upon the effects of these taxes as applied to purchases made by municipal governments or boards of education across Canada? It is a fact that there is no exemption in favour of municipal councils, school boards or boards of education; and the municipal taxpayer, already bearing a crushing burden of taxation under the present condition of unfair distribution of tax revenues as between the various levels of government, has his burden increased by reason of federal impositions on purchases made by his board of education, school board or municipal council.

This is no small matter. Many municipal councils and boards of education have made representations to the government about it in times past. The increasing gravity of the revenue position of the municipal governments is emphasized by the degree to which municipal governments and school boards are expressing themselves firmly on this subject. Many of them have passed more resolutions in recent times than ever before. I should like to read a resolution that was passed a few weeks ago by the municipal corporation of my own city of Toronto, conveyed in the following telegram from His Worship Mayor Nathan Phillips:

> For years Canadian municipalities through Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities have sought to have supplies and materials purchased solely for municipal purposes exempted from federal sales tax in the same way as exemption now granted to provincial governments, their boards and commissions, as well as hospitals. Government indicated that such exemption too involved, notwithstanding that other governmental bodies and hospitals were exempted and similar exemption given on books, newsprint and other materials used in newspapers and magazines. Municipalities now bearing crippling financial burdens and exemption from sales tax would provide some measure of relief at comparatively little cost to federal treasury. Earnestly solicit your support of such exemption when budget before house for consideration.

Similar communications went to all the members from Toronto, and I am looking forward to hearing something said on this subject by Liberal members from Toronto constituencies. It is time indeed that they made their voices heard on this subject in this chamber and that they declared themselves on this important matter of federal taxes on purchases made by municipal governments and boards of education. It is grossly unfair that in the face of the burden being carried by these municipal bodies the federal government should be collecting taxes on purchases of goods made by them for their use, which means for the use of the municipal taxpayer.

There is one final matter upon which I should like to dwell briefly. It is also a matter of high importance. Surely the time has come when steps should be taken to exempt welfare and philanthropic organizations from the burden of sales tax on goods purchased by them for use in welfare work.

This matter has been raised in the House of Commons before. For my own part, I have raised it every year for a good many years past. It is becoming more urgent than ever for these worthy organizations. There is not one of them that is not faced with serious financial problems in meeting the growing demands made upon such organizations. There are abundant evidences that they are now more alive than ever before to the unfair burden that is cast upon them when the federal government taxes them on their purchases of goods for use in their beneficial work.

Let it not be said that the administrative difficulties in the way are too great to be overcome. Adequate safeguards could be attached to the type of exemption for which I am pleading here tonight. Safeguards have been proposed by many of these organizations in their submissions to the government. There are four in particular which I have found in some of the communications on this subject submitted by such organizations. The four are as follows: First, that the social welfare organization in question should be certified by the Department of National Health and Welfare as a bona fide social welfare agency, organized and operated exclusively for charitable purposes, the proceeds of which are used in the public interest and not for the benefit of any special individual or group. The second is that they should be qualified as a charitable organization permitted to issue receipts for donations which exempt them from income tax. The third is that the organization should be incorporated as a non-profit organization for charitable purposes; and the fourth is that it undertake an annual audit of accounts by a chartered accountant. With those safeguards there need be no fear of administrative difficulties or of improprieties on the part of those seeking this needed exemption.

Mr. Chairman, these are but a few of the urgent problems which this budget, in relation to the Excise Tax Act, has ignored. It is deplorable that, in the face of urgent problems like these, the Minister of Finance has chosen to ignore not just one, but all of those that I have mentioned. It will remain for hon. members of the House of Commons to make known to the government in firm and resolute terms that they will no longer tolerate a continuation of its imposition of the burden of these indirect taxes in the cases that I have mentioned.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare is in the house.

Mr. Martin: He is always here.

Mr. Fleming: I think it is time that he should make his voice heard by his colleague the Minister of Finance in pleading for consideration for welfare organizations. The bulk of welfare work in Canada is not carried on by government departments. It is not carried on by the Department of National Health and Welfare or by the corresponding provincial departments. The bulk of welfare work in Canada today is carried on by organizations of the kind I have mentioned. Why then should they be handicapped by federal tax impositions? They are not asking for any favour. They are simply asking that the burden that has been unfairly placed upon them by the federal government should be removed from them. I hope the committee will have the opportunity tonight of hearing from the Minister of National Health and Welfare some statement to indicate that, as far as he is concerned and as far as his department and its policy are concerned, they seek urgently at the hands of the Minister of Finance consideration for this problem and an early removal of a burden of taxation which cannot be justified.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I am sure we will all agree with the hon. member for Eglinton that one of the most deplorable features of the sales tax is its cumulative effect in what he has described as mark-ups on mark-ups on mark-ups. But it occurs to me that it is hardly fair to blame the government for this particular feature of the sales tax situation because the government, like my friend the hon. member for Eglinton, is firmly committed to the maintenance of what is humorously known as free enterprise. This cumulative sort of racketeering is merely one of the features of the capitalist system.

Mr. Studer: You should make that speech in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should be delighted to do so. I should be delighted to come and make it in your riding.

I am more heartily still in support of the hon. member for Eglinton in his attitude with regard to this imposition of sales tax on municipal purchases. For the life of me I cannot think what argument can be brought forward in favour of it. I think it is a vicious principle that a senior government should impose taxation on a junior government. When one bears in mind the fact that many municipalities—and many municipalities in my part of the world suffer badly on this score—suffer from the effects of federal crown property within the limits of the municipality, with the consequent very deteriorating effects on municipal revenue, that consideration would seem to me to be an added argument for the abolition of the sales tax on all municipal purchases. It is a fantastic proposition that the taxpayers as municipal taxpayers are obliged to dig into their pockets to pay revenue to the federal government while at the same time being obliged to pay the ordinary federal taxes. I think that is something that should be made one of the items on the agenda of any provincial-federal conference that is to be held in the future; I refer to the removal of this quite irrational and quite unjust form of taxation.

I now want to deal with the items that we have before us in this resolution on the Excise Tax Act. I can see that in the first two items there is a certain rationality. When the decision was made to reduce the tax on passenger automobiles, logically enough it followed that the tax on tires and tubes for automotive vehicles of all kinds should be repealed. There is a certain logic in that decision to exempt this particular class of commodity with perhaps foreseeable effects on the economy. There is also a certain logic in the first two items of the section headed No. 3 which reads: "That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed". I can see some logic in the decision to repeal the sales tax on materials to be used exclusively in the production of feeds for livestock. There is some sort of reason to that decision, namely that it will stimulate, I presume, that section of our economy. The same argument can be used for section (b), creosote oil and other wood preservatives when for use exclusively in the treatment of timber, poles or lumber. There again there is a reason, namely for the encouragement of more economical use of wood. But when we move on to (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) we simply seem to sail into the wildest flights of irrationality. I am almost forced to the conclusion that whoever drew this up blindfolded himself, took a pin and stabbed it into a list, and wherever it hit decided that would be the thing that would be exempted. Why in the name of heaven do we decide to remove the sales tax on material to be used exclusively in the production of terrazzo flooring while on the other hand if you want a wooden floor or a cement floor you pay the sales tax? If you want a terrazzo floor then you are going to have the relief that this provision offers.

Then we have subsection (d) which refers to perforated bituminized fibre pipe for drainage purposes, not to exceed four inches in diameter. Why should four inch pipe be exempted and six or eight inch pipe not be exempted? Why decide to exempt four inch pipe? Then we come to something that to me is quite utterly daft. Why pick out rims for kitchen sinks? Why not rims for bicycle wheels or rims for eyeglasses? Why not soap dishes or kitchen faucets? What is the rhyme or reason for this? Then we have floor tile. Floor tile is going to be exempt in addition to material used in the production of terrazzo flooring. Then we have wallpaper. Why is wallpaper selected?

Mr. Benidickson: Because paints and varnishes are exempt.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Why not roofing paper or any other type of paper—

An hon. Member: Toilet paper.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Somebody said "toilet paper"—or tar paper or cigarette paper, any kind of paper? Why select one thing? If you have selected wallpaper as a building material, then why do you not exempt all building materials and be done with it? If, on the other hand, you are exempting it as a wood pulp product, why do you not exempt all wood pulp products? Where is the rhyme or reason to this? It seems to me an example of complete irrationality.

Mr. Studer: In Saskatchewan the socialists not only tax building material but actually tax the building of hospitals.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): We should be very glad to hear from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek later, I am sure. Seriously, I should like an explanation from the government of these last five items that are to be exempted from sales tax in order to get some idea of what formula has been used in selecting one material and rejecting another. They are not grouped into any logical categories in the way that the first items in this list have been grouped into more or less logical categories.

Mr. Benidickson: If I may answer the hon. member for Nanaimo, first of all let us take terrazzo flooring. Instead of being inconsistent we are trying to be consistent, and I think I can show the hon. member that we are. Every item that goes into the construction of a terrazzo floor is exempt, so all material under the embracing term "terrazzo flooring" is being exempted. As to fibre pipe, hitherto we have had a restriction as to the length of the pipe. It was only exempt if it was under 12 inches in length. A new process in manufacturing has resulted in the development of longer pipe, and we are extending the exemption to be consistent.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is not the length you have referred to but the diameter.

Mr. Benidickson: Up to now four inch pipe has been exempt only if it was not in excess of 12 inches in length, and now that limitation as to length is being eliminated. I suggest that is consistency and a broadening of the field in respect of a related type. So far as rims for kitchen sinks are concerned, rims are the only item mentioned in this particular change because the sink as a whole, if it does not have a metal rim, is exempt already. We are simply making sure that we are not going to exempt sinks and then tax rims simply because a few kitchen sinks are built in this manner. With respect to floor tile, because we already exempt hardwood floors, it seems consistent that in that competitive group all floor tiles should be exempt and not just certain floor materials. As far as wallpaper is concerned, wallpaper is being added here to be consistent. It is in the same competitive field as paints and varnishes for decorating rooms. Paints and varnishes are already exempt and it is felt that there should not be a tax on wallpaper, a competitive type of interior decorating material.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have listened with interest to the parliamentary assistant's explanation, but it still seems to me that the much more logical thing to do would have been to decide on a blanket exemption for all materials used in the construction of dwellings instead of going at it piecemeal in this way, adding one material this year and next year presumably something else. There must be some purpose behind this, and presumably the purpose of all these exemptions is to enable dwellings to be built more easily and economically by the people of Canada. Therefore why not do a job on it and exempt all materials that are going to be used in the construction of dwellings?

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, Social Crediters will welcome these reductions as, I am sure, will all other members of the house and the people of the country. It is natural that people in the opposition should so do because they do not have the responsibility for raising the money to take care of the difficulties which need to be looked after in the country.

I should like to associate myself almost word for word with the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton. I thought his case was accurately and admirably put. I think every member of the house would say amen to his sentences if he were free to do so politically. Of course all members in the opposition are free to do so.

I should like to draw attention to one important matter which, in the interests of clarity of thinking in the house, is of vital importance. Within the last two days a prominent member of the Conservative party made a speech in which he termed as inflation all the increases in prices that have taken place since the end of world war II. I thought that was one of the crassest pieces of ignorance I have heard since I have been in the house. May I urge that the hon. member for Eglinton and all other members of the Conservative party get together and try to find out, if they possibly can, what inflation really means and then talk from now on as though they knew. To call inflation, increases in prices which are a direct result of government imposition of taxes and to insinuate that they have come about because of a surplus of money in circulation in Canada is simply to confuse the people of Canada beyond all possibility of accurate thinking whatsoever, and certainly to confuse the Conservative party and all who listen to them and even reflect subconsciously on what they say.

That was one matter I wanted to get up and say something about after the Leader of the Opposition finished his address the other night, but I thought I would hold my remarks until a more appropriate time. If there is any one word which we as a parliament and a country must get the definition of clearly it is inflation, if we are going to think our way at all through the maze of confusion, difficulty and anxiety which hangs over our future. Certainly inflation is not a rise in prices which results from government taxation, from a strike of employees to raise their wages or from the deliberate manipulation of the prices of commodities upward by a company that finds itself strong enough to do so, as was done in the spring of 1946 by the steel companies of Canada with the connivance of the government, thereby forcing up the cost of production of practically every commodity in the Dominion of Canada. Now, we have certain stupid Conservatives calling that inflation.

Mr. Harkness: We consider the source from which all these remarks come.

Mr. Blackmore: I think people will do that. But unfortunately, there are some who still believe in the fairy name "Conservative", and while they are getting over their affliction they will be led astray.

There is one more matter I should like to speak about briefly. While the hon. member for Eglinton condemned the government for taxation on various commodities, and I agree with him completely, and implied undoubtedly that such taxes, for example, as those on goods used by the municipality and on books and other supplies required by educational authorities—

Mr. Benidickson: Books are exempt.

Mr. Blackmore: Perhaps the hon. member for Eglinton was slightly in error, but to the extent he was not in error I agree with him completely. There can be no doubt that there are taxes being levied upon goods and supplies required by educational authorities throughout the country, so in the main the hon. member's case was well taken. While he urged by implication that all these taxes should be removed, he offered no alternative. Since the opening of parliament this year we have listened to Conservative after Conservative clamouring for a reduction of taxation, but they have never offered even a hint of a suggestion as to how revenue should be raised if that particular type of taxation were removed.

Mr. Fleming: We want reductions.

Mr. Blackmore: The important thing is that responsible men and women, elected by the Canadian people, could, in this portentous year of 1955, be held accountable for being able to offer some sort of a suggestion as to how the country may raise the finances with which to discharge the responsibility which rests upon the government. If they have no alternative, they should at least have the decency to hold their peace concerning the matter.

Now then, what would the Conservatives do as an alternative in order to obtain the money? They should get off in a series of huddles, and finally get their huddles together and come to a decision as to what could be done. Social Crediters make no bones about offering the suggestions which they have to offer. We will see immature men like the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, who the other night flippantly talked about funny money. I do not believe that if he had a six months' course he could tell the difference between funny money and not funny money. He spoke of funny money, thus showing a sort of detachment from reality, a detachment which I must confess no member of this house has any right to manifest.

We are faced with an unemployment problem, for example. These people have no jobs. We cannot afford to sit here and flippantly talk politics while they suffer and their numbers increase. The Social Crediters do not hesitate a minute to declare that in a country like Canada it is possible to create a great deal of money on the national credit, just as was done under the Finance Act of 1914, thereby providing a very substantial increase in the national revenue of Canada available for the discharge of all governmental responsibility. Up to the present time there has not been a member in this house for the last 10 years who has attempted to rise in his place and offer to show the fallacy of our contentions. All they do is use this silly little kiddish remark about funny money.

I maintain it is time, Mr. Chairman, that sort of irresponsibility on the part of members, even if they are members of the C.C.F. like the hon. member for Nanaimo or Conservatives like the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace or Liberals like the hon. member for Temiscouata, ceased. They are all expected to be responsible men and women when they get here. Now, we Social Crediters offer that as an alternative and I challenge anybody in the house who thinks he can get up and in a 20-minute speech or a speech of any other length show the fallacy of our position. The challenge will hold right from now on until somebody takes it up, and when he gets through I shall take him on. I must say I will not be the only member of the Social Credit group who will be quite ready and happy to do that little job.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that complaint has been raised time and again in this house concerning the effects of this drop in excise tax on automobiles. The hon. member for Eglinton reviewed the matter adequately, I believe, in a general sort of way. I think it is only fair I should tell the house something about the incidence of this manoeuvre in my constituency. I shall deal only with the city of Lethbridge. I am going to quote small passages from certain letters that have come to me showing how seriously this is going to hurt my constituency. I start with a letter from the United Service garage in Lethbridge, from which I read the following:

> The loss to this firm is small compared to most of the dealers but the percentage is still the same whether large or small, makes just the same kind of a hole in our profits. Our actual loss on five cars in stock and in transit was $461.53.

That does not sound like very much money, but if the $461.53 cannot be made up there is another bankruptcy to be added to the bankruptcies in Canada. This is the sort of thing which I believe too few people in this country take seriously.

I quote further from the letter:

> One of the above units has been held up through road bans for almost a month, but the tax has been paid and it is costing us finance charges until such time as it reaches us and is sold.
> We will also take a loss on the used cars in stock because the price drops accordingly, but as this is an everyday occurrence we cannot complain other than to point it out as an added loss.

Now, if that kind of thing is multiplied by several times, then this whole matter is not quite so inconsequential as the Minister of National Revenue has endeavoured to imply.

I turn now to a letter from the Lethbridge Automobile Dealers Association, a letter written on April 19:

> A local survey indicates that the Lethbridge dealers alone suffered a loss in excess of $14,000 on the new vehicles they had on hand at the time this reduction was made, and this does not take into consideration the loss they will have to absorb on the large stock of used cars they had in stock at this time . . .
> Your co-operation and assistance in having this matter receive proper consideration and action will be greatly appreciated.

When it is borne in mind that in that particular area, and the area contributory to that city, the farmers have not been able to deliver any more than just so much of their grain, then if the payment which the farmers make to the garages is not large because of that fact it becomes more serious still.

I turn to a letter from the Alberta Automobile Dealers Association, dated April 11, from which I quote the following excerpts:

> We do feel that in view of the fact there was no protection given on dealer inventories, this is an unfair burden beyond the capacity of the dealers to absorb.

These are solemn words, "beyond the capacity of the dealers to absorb". This is another excerpt:

> We respectfully request that you will make a recommendation to the Minister of Finance and the cabinet that rebates be given on new units in dealers' hands as of midnight, April 5.

I turn now to another automobile company in my own constituency, Marquis Motors. I quote from their letter dated April 15:

> We feel that some representation should be made to the proper authorities to have a refund made to the dealer on the automobiles which the dealer was holding in his inventory on his new automobiles and on which the tax has been paid and was subsequently reduced. If this is not done, in a good many of cases, the dealer will be financially crippled or may find it necessary to go out of business.

I know what is involved. I sympathize with the Minister of National Revenue and with the Minister of Finance, but nevertheless there are a number of people who have fought their way through for 20 years, all the way through the depression, all the way through the war and all the way through the vicissitudes that developed during the outlandish rise in prices that took place after the war, and now they receive this blow! I ask the Minister of National Revenue to take another look at this matter.

It is not my purpose at the present time to say any more relating to this resolution. I am quite sure I shall find it necessary to make further observations at a later time.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I am sure all hon. members welcome the tax reductions that were announced by the Minister of Finance. However, I join with the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Lethbridge in the representations they have made with respect to certain reductions in the excise tax on automobiles. I feel sure that automobile dealers from coast to coast have been adversely affected by the 5 per cent reduction in the tax.

While I am sure that everyone welcomes the reduction, the fact that it became effective on April 5 without the automobile dealers being able to save themselves from having heavy inventories has resulted in a heavy loss. There are in my own constituency situations similar to those outlined by the hon. member for Lethbridge. The dealers in my constituency are hard hit owing to the fact that up to the present time the minister has not seen fit to introduce any measure by which the automobile dealers could be recompensed for the tax which they have paid on the automobiles they had on hand at the time of the tax reduction. I know of one dealer who had 9 automobiles on consignment. His total tax bill will amount to $3,859. That includes the sales and excise tax that he has paid. He stands to lose a great deal of that unless the government see fit to introduce a measure which will permit the purchasers of these automobiles to obtain a rebate of the tax they have paid. Automobile associations across Canada have indicated that there are about 35,000 cars in the inventories of dealers. If one were to take the average reduction in tax as at $100 the total will amount to $3,500,000. This is the amount that the automobile dealers across the country will have to lose. Cars are in a different category from a lot of other goods which are held by dealers. There should not be any great difficulty in administering a policy which would correct this situation.

Like all other taxpayers, I welcome any tax reduction. I listened to some of the interruptions of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I am always interested in his interjections and in what he has to say. I was also interested in what the hon. member for Lethbridge said. He thinks that he and his party have some method by which the people of Canada could have the services they want, and at the same time not pay taxes, or the government could get the money to finance the various programs. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and I come from the same province. We do not say that our Saskatchewan government is without fault, but I can tell him that under the C.C.F. policy we could reduce taxes and at the same time give ourselves certain services. As long as any government wishes to maintain the capitalist system and permit all the remunerative and profitable enterprises to remain in the hands of private business, and at the same time take all the responsibility of giving our people services, in my opinion there is no way in which that can be done unless the people are ready to pay taxes.

In the province of Saskatchewan we have been successful with the few small crown corporations we have there. In a few years we have been able to give employment to over 4,400 people. In addition, we have paid into the consolidated revenue fund over $5 million profit. While that may be small when compared with the national income and what could be done in some of our big projects such as our fertilizer industries, yet it is a step in the right direction.

While I welcome these reductions, I should like to point out to the government that, with respect to the reduction in tax on automobiles in the dealers' hands, because of the representations that have been made the government in all fairness should do something about it.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to prolong the debate on this particular subject of retail sales of automobiles; but I do wish to add my voice to what my colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge, has said. I do not suppose I am in a different position from that of most hon. members in respect of having representations made by dealers in our own constituency. In fact, most of us from western Canada represent rural constituencies where there are a good many automobile dealers who might be regarded as more or less small dealers. These small dealers who have half a dozen cars consigned to them are suffering losses of anywhere from a few hundred dollars to $2,000 or $3,000. That may not sound much to the Minister of Finance who is accustomed to thinking in astronomical figures, but $500 to $1,000 or $2,000 or $3,000 is an awful lot of money to many a small dealer. As the hon. member for Lethbridge has said, for some of them it meant coming well-nigh to bankruptcy.

This situation is also accentuated by the fact that the cash position of farming communities in western Canada is bad. When the cash position of farming communities is bad it has an effect upon all other types of business, which means that generally speaking things in western Canada are not good. Since the prospects for the sale of cars are not as good as they might be, the effect of having cars on consignment becomes even more serious to the retail dealer.

I understood the Minister of Finance the other day to give some hope to the retail car dealers when he said that the matter was under consideration. I should like to ask the minister or his parliamentary assistant if that matter is still under consideration and if he can offer any hope to the retail automobile dealers. I do not think they should be left dangling in the air. As the previous speaker has said, the total loss throughout the country may be a couple of million dollars or so. If that represents the over-all picture it should not be very difficult for the government to compensate.

I urge the minister to do this. I think this is the proper time for the parliamentary assistant to state whether this matter is still under consideration and whether there is any hope for the retail automobile dealer in this regard.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member for Macleod, I confirm that the minister has been giving this matter continued consideration. Representations continue to be received, but this is a most difficult decision to make. Probably the final answer will be given by the minister after he brings down the bill.

While it is true that there is a relatively small number of units involved when you are dealing with a large and expensive product like an automobile and therefore it may be administratively possible to rebate the tax on this particular product, the hon. member for Eglinton was good enough to recognize that it is contrary to tradition to rebate a tax reduced by a budget.

If a rebate is given in connection with one product, even though it can be done administratively without too much inconvenience and if one is willing to forget the revenue, hon. members will understand how difficult it would be to follow this same pattern with practically any other product. There is no question in the world that if the traditional pattern were departed from in this instance it would be a precedent that would certainly be pointed to any time there was a budget change that affected inventories of goods upon which taxes had been paid.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering when this question was raised recently why the minister did not deal with it then as definitely as his parliamentary assistant has dealt with it now. One can readily understand the argument which the parliamentary assistant has made. Undoubtedly a problem is created by the precedent which may be set up, but if the hon. gentleman will look at page 3881 of Hansard of May 18 he will see that the Minister of Finance did not meet the question on that basis at all. May I read the passage from Hansard. It is as follows:

> Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he has received a brief from the motor car dealers' association of British Columbia asking for his consideration of their request for a refund of the excise taxes paid on cars in stock on April 5? Would the minister say whether he will be able to give further and favourable consideration to this admittedly difficult problem, and whether he is able to hold out any encouragement to that association?
> Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I received briefs not only from the British Columbia motor car dealers' association but from the national body, I think from all of the provincial bodies, and from quite a number of individual dealers.

Of course we accept these representations along with all others and give them our best consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Consideration is always welcome, but how about encouragement?

Mr. Harris: Encouragement is a word which I think is used on every occasion by this government as to its intentions with respect to the Canadian economy.

I repeat what I said when speaking earlier, that if the Minister of Finance had full knowledge of the difficulties which his parliamentary assistant has just outlined and if he meant to follow the traditional rule and not give any rebate on tax-paid cars as of the date of the budget, then he ought not to have made the statement which I have just read. If he did not mean to give any consideration to the matter, if he did not mean to entertain the request, then it seems to me that in all fairness and frankness he should have said so. Why did he not rise and point to the difficulties which the parliamentary assistant has just outlined? That would have been fair; that would have been frank. Those who had made the representations to the minister and to which the minister intimated he was going to give his best consideration would not have been misled, as I am sure many of them must have been, into thinking that there was some hope that they would receive remedial consideration at the hands of the Minister of Finance.

At the time the minister answered the questions asked by the hon. member for Kamloops I heard a remark made that if he did not mean to give some form of rebate to these dealers he should have said so then and there. It was nothing short of cruelty to buoy up their hopes by allowing them to think that their representations were being considered and there was a chance that some form of relief would be coming to them as a result of that consideration.

I think that there has been a lack of frankness in this matter. Whatever difficulties exist, as described by the parliamentary assistant, certainly did exist on May 18 and were fully known then to the Minister of Finance. If he did not mean to give consideration, if he did not mean to do anything for these dealers, then he owed it to them and owed it to this house to be frank in the answer he made to the question then put.

Mr. Benidickson: I said that the minister was giving this matter consideration and would give the final advice to the house when the bill comes up, probably early next week.

Mr. Fleming: In the face of what the parliamentary assistant has said I would think that there was much room for consideration.

Mr. Benidickson: I just pointed out some of the obstacles.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from a city constituency it was natural that the automobile dealers there would approach me to make representations to the minister. However, other members of our party have done this and up to the moment I have not repeated those representations. However, there are one or two comments I should like to make.

I am not rising tonight because I was approached by these dealers; I rise because I feel that there is some injustice in this particular measure. I remember the last time when taxation was removed—I think it was 10 per cent on that occasion—a large dealer in our city told me, and I have no reason to doubt his word, that he lost some $7,000 at that particular time. I think they took some warning at that time and I must say in fairness that the dealers on this occasion, when 5 per cent of the remaining 15 per cent was removed, were careful not to be caught with large numbers of cars in their inventories, either in transit or at their selling place. They raised with me one point which I do not think has been discussed tonight, and I might ask the assistant to the minister for his opinion on that. They reported to me that this was actually a consumer's tax. It has been the consumer, the person who buys and drives a car, who has been paying this tax, and the government has been using the dealer simply as an instrument of collection. The dealers rather resent this. When the government has used them as tax collectors they find themselves in the position that, instead of the tax being passed on, as is usually the case, to the consumer, they are just a few men having to pay the tax which under ordinary circumstances would be spread over many. I should like a comment, perhaps from the minister's assistant, in that regard. Is it not actually a consumer's tax in that sense, that those dealers have actually no responsibility to pay it except the responsibility now put on them by the minister's decree?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, according to the language of the act, I believe it could be said that it is a tax on the manufacturer. It is at that level that the tax begins. As to what competitive conditions will cause in a business subject to a tax, we can each only form our own opinions. My hon. friend from Saskatoon referred, of course, to another drop in a tax that occurred in 1952, when the excise tax went down from 25 to 15 per cent. It is now going from 15 to 10 per cent. I remind him that even since the end of the war there have been a few increases. What the trade did at that time, he knows as well as I do.

Mr. Knight: In any case, Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the minister, through Hansard if he is not listening to me, that there has been a considerable protest in this house in regard to the matter, sufficient protest to make me think that there is at least a general interest. Whether that has been prompted by the fact that those who have suffered have made themselves particularly vocal, or whether they are like myself—and I have no doubt that is so in many cases—imbued with the idea that this is an unjust measure, we have had protests raised by members of every party in this house, including a good many members of the government party as well as those who sit on the opposition side. Tonight we have had protests from the Conservative, C.C.F. and Social Credit parties. I have not heard any of my Liberal friends speaking tonight, but I certainly did on a recent occasion when they were discussing the budget provisions generally after the minister had produced his budget in this house. I hope that the minister may still, at this late date, take the matter under advisement and perhaps reconsider his decision.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I want to deal with the question that has been occupying the attention of the committee, with respect to automobiles, but I should like to subscribe wholeheartedly to a point made by the hon. member for Eglinton. That is not, of course, when he referred to the imposition of sales tax, by implication, as if the party which is presently in government was the only one that subscribed to sales tax. For the moment it might be worth while to recall that taxation on sales was introduced in 1920, and at that time there was the most unusual situation in Canada that the Liberal party was not in the seat of government. Coming back to the point to which I should like to speak and on which I am in full sympathy and cooperation with the hon. member for Eglinton, it seems to me that, when a sales tax is imposed upon basic foods and almost all the items that are described as foods—and I specify only a few of them now such as milk, fruit, bread, butter, vegetables, rice, sugar, soups—

Mr. Benidickson: Is my hon. friend pointing out the things that are exempt or the things that are taxed? None of those things which he mentions are taxed—

Mr. Richardson: These are food products but, it seems to me, food products which are so common now as tea and coffee might also be subject to exemption. It may be that all these other items would be subject to exemption.

Mr. Benidickson: They are.

Mr. Richardson: But certainly an item such as tea or coffee, like an automobile, may perhaps be no longer regarded as a luxury but as a necessity in this modern day. I would suggest that consideration might well be given to bringing tea and coffee under the list of exemptions.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to add just one word in regard to one point made by the hon. member for Eglinton—taxation on charitable institutions. That seems to me to stand in a class by itself. It has been pointed out that it does not really make sense to tax the other levels of government; we are just taking money from one pocket and putting it in the other. But when we come to the charitable institutions, it seems to me that they occupy a position different from everybody else. They are maintained by voluntary subscriptions of individuals, and they are doing work which cannot be done by other people. Whilst the parliamentary assistant might say, "We actually charge our sales tax to other departments of government", that does not matter so much; it may be just good clean fun. But when it comes to the charitable institutions, I submit that this is a case by itself. I just wish to add my voice to the appeal for consideration of this question.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fleming: I would have hoped that the parliamentary assistant would have something to say tonight concerning what hon. members have said about the continued imposition of sales tax on purchases made by municipalities and school boards and the same form of imposition on goods purchased by charitable and philanthropic organizations for use in their welfare work, and about the continued imposition of the sales tax on clothing, boots and shoes, household furniture and certain prepared foods. Surely the parliamentary assistant has something to say on these matters.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend knows that these matters are always considered at each budget time, and in the light of revenues that can be forsaken and having regard to the things that the administrators of our statutes say that they can do safely and without undue expense in proportion to the benefits being extended, these are always reviewed. Most of the items referred to by my hon. friend were again considered this year. Something was said tonight about its being a vicious policy—I think that was the extreme phrase—for one government to impose taxation on a junior government. Of course, his reference was made particularly to the lowest levels of government, the municipalities and school boards. Our contact with those levels of government, of course, in much more removed than in the provinces. Some five or six of the provinces impose sales taxes of their own.

Mr. Knight: They are not hidden taxes.

Mr. Benidickson: Very few if any of the provinces, in spite of the close relationship they have with these bodies, exempt even their so-called children in government from the sales taxes imposed in the provinces.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, two wrongs do not make a right. If some of the provinces have a sales tax and impose the sales tax on municipalities in respect of the purchase of goods by the municipalities, that is no justification for the federal government's doing it. We have this clear distinction drawn between sales tax imposed by the provincial government on the one hand and sales tax imposed by the federal government on the other. In the case of the federal government the tax is imposed at the manufacturers' or producers' level, it is hidden, and the consumer does not know what he is paying. In the case of the provincial sales tax it is imposed, as it must be constitutionally, at the consumers' level and the consumer at least knows what the tax is that is being imposed upon him. But, Mr. Chairman, even if half a dozen provinces impose a sales tax on purchases made by municipalities, that is no justification whatever for the federal government's doing it.

With respect, Mr. Chairman, may I say that it seems to me that this committee is still left completely in the dark as to why the federal government has made no effort this year to bring remedy or relief in the cases that have been under discussion. We are left to guess whether it is a matter of policy on the part of the government to continue this tax or whether they see certain administrative difficulties involved, or whether it is for some other reason. We are given no clue in the very brief remarks that have just fallen from the lips of the parliamentary assistant. In matters as serious as this, Mr. Chairman, surely the House of Commons is entitled to something more informative than what we have heard tonight.

Here we have taxes on the basic necessities of life. When this question is raised as a serious issue in the House of Commons it receives what can be described as, at the very best, mere cavalier treatment at the hands of the government. No reason is given as to why the government ignores these pleas and continues to impose these taxes upon the basic necessities of life. Only in the case of the plea for the repeal of the sales tax on purchases made by municipalities and school boards has the parliamentary assistant vouchsafed to the committee any form of explanation, and even then it is not an explanation. It is simply an attempt to justify this tax on the basis that some provinces do the same thing. To the minds of reasonable men, it seems to me that will be no justification at all.

We have yet to hear one word from the government by way of attempted justification of the continued imposition of the sales tax upon goods purchased by philanthropic and welfare organizations doing work in the field of philanthropy which is basic and essential to organized life in this country. Instead of helping them the federal government imposes handicaps and burdens upon these organizations which are trying to do their work for humanity in this country. I do not believe that there is in the House of Commons one member who, if he were asked privately if he could justify federal exactions or federal handicaps being placed upon philanthropic and welfare organizations, would in conscience attempt to do so. Then in this chamber, when we meet here as a House of Commons, how can hon. members sit back and condone the continued imposition of these burdens upon philanthropic and welfare organizations and at the very same time condone cavalier treatment of the problem on the part of the government? They do not even mention it. They think they can ignore it when the question is seriously raised in the House of Commons.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that hon. members are not going to tolerate that kind of treatment of a serious problem at the hands of the government. We have not heard from the minister. He has left this resolution tonight in the hands of his parliamentary assistant. The parliamentary assistant owes to the committee the same serious consideration of matters of this kind as the minister would owe to the committee if he were present himself and were piloting through his resolution. I hope that hon. members are not going to tolerate the way in which this problem is being ignored and sidestepped on the part of the government tonight.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

INCOME TAX ACT

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 417, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 418, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration (including advisory committee on agricultural services), $496,998.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members will recall that resolution No. 1 is to be found at page 4 of the book of main estimates, the details at page 83.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, when the minister made his statement last week the intention was that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand would reply and present to the house and the country the feelings of the opposition as far as the estimates of the minister's department are concerned. It happens that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand is at home today, and so I am in the position of being more or less of a pinch-hitter. Pinch-hitters are, of course, supposed to hit the ball and score, but I am not so certain that is going to be the case tonight. However, I welcome the opportunity to make a few observations with respect to agriculture in Canada. When the minister introduced his estimates he was as optimistic under the circumstances as he usually is, but regardless of the way the facts were presented by the minister it is pretty difficult to make the farmers back home believe that everything is all right.

It has been said that most of the reductions in agricultural income have been caused by the difficulties in marketing our wheat crop, but may I point out that, while a great deal has been said in the house and in the standing committee on agriculture in the last few days about the west, I am amazed at how little is said about the problems of the eastern farmers. I suppose it is probably because of the conservatism of the Ontario members that we allow the western members to monopolize all the time and to create the impression that the problems of the Canadian west are the only problems that agriculture faces in this country. But such is not the case.

In most of Ontario last year harvesting conditions of the cash crops were difficult indeed, and there was a considerable amount of waste. Thousands of acres of crops were not harvested last fall. Some of them were harvested during the winter and some this spring, particularly last year's corn. But there was tremendous loss through wastage and depreciation in grades and quality. We in the east also suffered considerable losses, but I am going to say that we have taken them with better grace than the western farmers.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I do not think that is called for. We appreciate your problems.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): We never hear anything about them.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): That is up to you. We try to co-operate with you.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I am presenting now the problems of the eastern farmers. We have heard about the problems of the western farmers for weeks and months.

Mr. Blackmore: We are listening. Go right ahead.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): In the past few years agricultural producers' costs have risen while the prices of many of the products they sell have gone down and in some cases are still going down. I have before me the statement of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. In 1951 net farm income amounted to $2,154 million, but by 1954 it had decreased to $1,357 million, or nearly $800 million less in the hands of the farmers to spend. Is it any wonder, therefore, that in the last two years, particularly during the winter months and even later, there have been as many as 600,000 people unemployed? Until the farmers have more money in their pockets to spend there are going to be marketing problems in connection with many of the things that industry and labour produce.

Hon. members will recall that through the war years—I am going to reiterate it—our farmers were told that if they would sell to Great Britain at lesser prices then they would have a guaranteed market when the war was over. Ceiling prices were placed on agricultural products, and if some farmer was caught selling a cabbage for five cents more than the ceiling price his name was blazoned in papers all over the country and he was regarded as more or less a traitor to his country. But our farmers were told in the same breath that by means of the price support act, with $200 million behind it, steps would be taken to see that they did not suffer losses when the war was over. Not many farmers are taking such statements today with the same grace as they did during the war years. We were all prepared to make sacrifices then but now, as far as agriculture is concerned, nobody is prepared to go very far in making such sacrifices.

Our farmers, having produced in abundance, now find themselves faced with surpluses and are being penalized because they have produced in abundance at a time when consumers the world over should probably be thankful that they have. I am not saying there are not dairy farmers in all the provinces, but in my opinion the dairy farmers in the east in particular have probably taken as great a beating as any branch of agriculture. We have the fact that 2¼ million pounds of cheese were imported into Canada when we had a surplus of cheese. Oils for the production of a substitute for butter are also coming into the country without duty. For years the farmers have heard it said that tariff protection was a good thing for our manufacturers and for the people employed in our industries, but apparently it is only a good thing for our manufacturing industries and not for our farmers. They have to compete in the markets of the world, and that is particularly the case today so far as the dairy industry of the country is concerned.

Mr. Blackmore: Very well said.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I wonder sometimes whether the farmers should complain bitterly in view of the fact that many of them voted for the government. Maybe they should blame themselves as much as the government. I hope they will think that over before the next election rolls around. But another issue will be brought up and they will be soft-soaped. But will it be successful? I doubt it.

I have before me a clipping from the Farmers' Advocate of February 26. The subheading of the article is "The Prosperity of Agriculture and of Industry are Interlocking", and the article reads in part as follows:

> The reason given by our government for this move is that it is necessary to balance our trade with New Zealand which has been buying more from us than we have been buying from that country. In order to make up the deficiency in our purchases, we buy their cheese. The question that a lot of people are asking is, why was it necessary to pick on cheese? Was there not some other commodity that could have been bought—something that we are not already loaded with? Could it be that the expected feeble squawks of the cheese producers would carry less weight at next election than would be the case were the pinch to have been applied elsewhere? Well, anyway, the dairy farmers in these parts are really hot under the collar.

I think that expresses quite plainly the feeling of the dairy industry across this country. I mentioned the drop in net farm income. In the past the minister has been quoting the gross income of farmers but the gross income of any industry or any business does not mean a great deal unless you know what the expenses are. In the year 1954 net farm income has been reduced by $453 million.

Some assurances have been given by members of the cabinet that further importations of cheese were not expected in the future. I am just going to point out that these assurances are not too reassuring. The farmers are taking them with a little grain of salt. They are not sure whether or not it is in the book. It seems to depend a lot on other factors apparently, such as who the government's friends may be.

Then, there is a policy which affects the westerner just as much as the easterner and that is the policy concerning freight assistance on feed grain. I am one of those who believe that subsidies are an evil, but because subsidies in the form of tariffs have been a part of our policy for many years, subsidies to agriculture in lieu of some tariff protection I would say are a good thing. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, so I would say freight assistance on feed grain is probably one of the best subsidies this government has ever introduced. It allows the western producer of grain to sell his product to the farmer in the east who is in the poultry or dairy business. This enables these farmers to buy feed a little cheaper so that when they sell their products in competition with the world, in some years they can earn a living. At a time when net farm income is down $453 million it is difficult to understand why the government would decide to change this policy in so far as freight assistance on feed grain is concerned. I reiterate, I believe that it should have been incorporated as a permanent policy.

I have a question on the order paper which the Minister of Finance spoke about today, indicating that it was almost impossible to answer because of the dozens of items involved. I will give you an idea of what I had in mind. I am just going to take one product as an example, potatoes. Except for about a period of six weeks, potatoes enter Canada duty free. When Canadian potatoes are sent to the United States there is a 37·5 cent per bushel duty on the first 3·5 million bushels, and over 3·5 million bushels the tariff jumps to 75 cents per bushel. Yet potatoes from the United States enter Canada duty free except for a period of six weeks.

To change the subject for a moment, may I say it is my considered opinion that the agricultural institute of Canada and the federal Department of Agriculture should be asked to assist the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in working out a practical plan of soil and forest conservation. The problem of such a plan in the northern areas is far different from what it is in the agricultural areas, particularly in central and western Ontario. I believe that in my county of Middlesex only 3·5 per cent of the land area is under forest. We are, therefore, suffering from soil erosion as a result of rains during the winter and spring months, and soil erosion by wind if there is a dry windy season. We are suffering also from a shortage of water in many farm areas during the summer season. In many areas the farmers are finding that the cities are encroaching upon the country areas; the residents are drilling deep wells and putting in pumps that are capable of pumping enormous amounts of water. As a result, farm wells that have served families with sufficient water for 100 years are going dry. In many cases the farmer has to either give up or spend up to $1,200 or $1,500 to drill a well. These city residents are stealing the water from under the farmers' land.

At the moment, not a great deal can be done about it. This presents a very serious situation. Then, too, we see some of the finest land in the world in the Niagara peninsula going out of the production of fruit, vegetables and canning crops and used in the development of cities and industrial sites. In my opinion that is a serious situation, although as I said a moment ago we do have farm crop surpluses at the moment.

There is another problem from which agriculture is suffering and that is the problem of education. The farmer, just like any other Canadian, wants to pay his fair share towards education. We are not educating acres, we are educating children, and yet the tax in the rural areas of Ontario is based on acreage in many cases. Many farmers say that every acre they own should have a university degree, yet neither they nor their children have such a degree. The costs are based on acres, and I think that is one of the things that should be surveyed. It is one of the reasons for the request for federal aid to education. I realize, of course, that education is primarily a provincial problem.

Some years ago, I am not quite sure what year, the Ontario government set up a commission under the chairmanship of the minister of agriculture, the Hon. F. S. Thomas. I believe the commission made a complete survey of the province so far as services are concerned, and tabled a worth-while report. There was a meeting of the commission held at the University of Western Ontario, and as one of the invited guests I listened with considerable interest to the briefs and statements presented to that commission. At that time I suggested to the commission that ways and means should be found of providing water for the whole of western Ontario from the lake Huron area. Since that time the C.C.F. group in Ontario jumped on that bandwagon, and claimed it as their own. The premier of the province and many of the members from western Ontario have also claimed that as their own. I wish to point out that long before that time I had suggested that very idea to the commission that sat under the chairmanship of the Hon. F. S. Thomas. Since that time I have had the opportunity to discuss this with a high-ranking engineer in the city of London, and he has worked out two or three alternative plans that would and could supply water to the western Ontario area.

Not long ago I was talking to the hon. member for Essex South, and he described to me the problems of the cash crop growers in Essex and the need of water for irrigation from the lake Erie or the lake St. Clair area. These are things that, with the co-operation of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the federal Department of Agriculture and the Canadian agricultural institute, could be worked out in a plan that would be of mutual benefit not only to Ontario farmers but to all Canadians. We hear about these projects in the west. For less money more people could be served right here in the thickly populated area of western Ontario.

Yesterday it was my privilege and the privilege of the hon. member for London to join with 275 of the leading businessmen from the city of London in a visit to this House of Commons and to the Ottawa district. They are all conscious of the conservation and water-supply problem. We read in the press of the needs of the county of Waterloo. They are so short of water that they hesitate to encourage new industries to come to the cities of Waterloo and Kitchener. Therefore, they are facing a very difficult problem.

I hold in my hand the policy declarations of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce as they relate to agriculture. I find the following:

> Seventeen per cent of Canada's population live on farms. These people not only constitute about one-sixth of the domestic market for all the various goods and services produced by Canadian workers in every type of occupation but are also the source of food and other farm products for the rapidly increasing urban populations. Food industries, which are wholly dependent upon farm production, rank among the 15 largest of all industries.

Farther on in the article they say:

> Loss of soil fertility and erosion by wind and water are among the most important problems facing agriculture in Canada.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce are to be complimented on their fundamental interest in the basic industry of this country.

It is a minute to ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I think we had better call it ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we should call it ten o'clock and that I should report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take the departments of agriculture, labour and fisheries. On Monday, we shall take legislation beginning with the international river improvements; Canadian National Railways resolutions; the resolution with respect to the fishermen's loans; second reading of the Prisons and Reformatories Act. Should we complete that, then we shall take any other legislation that may appear on the order paper. I would imagine that the item after that would be the Municipal Grants Act, but, as I say, we may have to take anything to fill in the rest of the day. The first item on Monday of course will be the third reading of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Nicholson: I understand that the Minister af Agriculture has made an engagement for the dinner hour tomorrow night. Do I understand we are to go on with agriculture until six o'clock and with some other department after six o'clock?

Mr. Gardiner: I hope, of course, the estimates will be through by six o'clock, but I have made arrangements with regard to the other activity.

Mr. Nicholson: I do not think we shall be through by six o'clock, and I should like to be here for the estimates. I understand the minister is to be the main speaker at the Saskatchewan jubilee function which is to take place sometime after 8.30 o'clock. If we do not finish agriculture by six o'clock, will there be a change?

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to say that the chairman of that function telephoned me this afternoon, and he has made arrangements which do not make it necessary for me to leave here until ten o'clock, if I have to sit here until that time, which we shall see about later.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 3, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. FELICIEN-LAKE CACHE BRANCH LINE—SUBSIDY FOR CONSTRUCTION

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, during the session of 1954 the governor in council was authorized by parliament to provide for the construction and completion, in whole or in part, prior to December 31, 1964, by the Canadian National Railway Company of a branch line in the province of Quebec consisting of three sections: one between St. Felicien and lake Cache; another between lake Cache and Chibougamau; and the third between lake Cache and Beattyville.

At the time the question as to whether or not any subsidy for this branch line would be necessary to avoid imposing too heavy a present burden on the finances of the company was left in abeyance for further study. Nevertheless the company commenced in November, 1954, construction of the two sections between Beattyville and Chibougamau, being convinced that if the whole of the traffic into and from the Chibougamau area, as well as the additional traffic along the line, moved over those sections they would be apt to be self-supporting almost from the start. However it was realized that the channelling of all such traffic away from the lake St. John area, of which it is geographically and economically a part, might seriously interfere with the normal development of that whole area.

An intensive study of the problem with the co-operation of the company and local interests has led to the conclusion that national interests as well as the normal development of the area would best be served by having the whole branch line authorized by parliament proceeded with at once, and that it would be appropriate, in order that this be done, to recommend to parliament that capital assistance for this construction be provided in the form of a subsidy of $25,000 per mile.

Accordingly, provision is to be made in the supplementary estimates for the payment to the Canadian National Railways of the sum of $1,250,000 being the part of the subsidy that it is estimated will be required during the current fiscal year. I expect, of course, that construction of the St. Felicien-Lake Cache section will be commenced as soon as the preliminary work has been completed, and that it will be finished without delay.

In conclusion I would like to commend the interest in the project of le conseil d'orientation économique du Saguenay and other local organizations, and also of the hon. members for Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) and Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve). Though all have shown a continuing and keen interest in the building of the St. Felicien-Lake Cache section, these two hon. gentlemen have been unremitting in securing and bringing to the attention of the government impressive information about the possibilities of development that would thereby be opened up. I hope it will not be too long before the project becomes a reality, and that their hopes in this connection are fully realized.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this statement by the minister, may I merely say that the minister seems to have forgotten entirely that the demand for this action started on the opposition side of the house, coming not only from the official opposition but also from the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon).

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I have too long been in opposition myself to be unfamiliar with the technique followed by my hon. friend.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): May I say to the Minister of Transport that we forgive him because he has not been a minister for very long, and he may not have known that we have worked also for this road. I should like to know if the minister can tell us whether the road will be commenced from both ends in order to relieve unemployment.

Mr. Marler: I am unable to give the hon. member for Lapointe any information as to where the work is to begin, or whether it will begin at both ends.

Pacific Great Eastern Railway

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

PROVISION OF SUBSIDY ON PORTION OF EXTENSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement on a subject closely related to that about which the Minister of Transport has just spoken.

The government of British Columbia has made a number of proposals to the federal government concerning financial assistance for the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, which is owned by the provincial government. It will be recalled that parliament in 1949 passed an act granting assistance for the extension of this railway from Quesnel to Prince George. British Columbia is now extending the railway at the southern end from Squamish to North Vancouver, and proposing to extend it northward from Prince George and through the Rockies to the Peace river valley.

We regard the southerly extension from Squamish to North Vancouver as a replacement of the existing barge service, and consider that it constitutes an improvement, rather than an extension, of existing transportation facilities. The government of British Columbia is apparently satisfied that there will be resulting savings in operating costs which warrant such improvement and make it a sound business investment. We are therefore unable to conclude that the improvement is of a character requiring federal assistance such as was granted in the extension from Quesnel to Prince George.

In regard to the proposed extension northward from Prince George to Fort St. John and Dawson Creek, we doubt that the construction of the whole of this line would be an economic undertaking at this time. It does not appear to us that the potential volume of traffic over the next five or ten years and the probable economic development in the area that would be opened up by the mid-portions of this line would be sufficient to warrant the high capital and operating costs.

The principal resources to be developed are the forests north of Prince George. In the mountains to the north of the Parsnip river there are coal deposits which are apt some day to be worth developing, but we are advised that those operating equally good coal deposits in southern British Columbia are now facing economic difficulties due to shrinking markets. Consequently there does not seem to us to be need at this time to carry the extension northward through the mountains in order to develop coal. The oil and gas on the eastern side of the mountains would, of course, move by pipe line rather than by rail.

The Peace river area itself already has rail access through the Northern Alberta Railways, and although this railway taps the greater part of the area it does not obtain a sufficient volume of traffic to result in profitable operations.

Though these considerations lead this government to believe that the through line proposed by British Columbia is not economically justified at this time, we consider that the possibilities for development of the timber resources north of Prince George would justify an extension of up to some 50 miles in that area. We think this would assist materially in the further development of central British Columbia, and that would be to the obvious advantage of the national economy.

The government therefore will ask parliament, in the supplementary estimates being brought down next week, to make provision to pay a subsidy of $25,000 per mile for not more than 50 miles of an extension of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway northward from Prince George.

Our view that the present outlook does not justify a further extension of the line at this time would not, of course, prevent consideration of this matter again in a later year if the prospects for economic development then appear to be sufficiently promising to warrant a contribution toward the cost of constructing such an extension at that time.

I have written to the premier of British Columbia informing him of the views of this government and of this proposal, and saying that I shall be glad to arrange discussions between representatives of his government and this government on this matter if he wishes to proceed further with it.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the government seems to be in the railway business overnight. I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has given consideration to the speech on this subject made by the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) at the time a subsidy was granted for the extension of the line from Quesnel to Prince George. If he has not done so, I would commend that speech to him. If he agrees with it I think the government would grant a subsidy for the whole extension into the Peace river area.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman is quite in error if he thinks these things are decided overnight. They have been receiving very serious consideration and we have had extensive investigations made in an endeavour to reach the kind of conclusion that we could recommend to parliament as one that would further the interests of the national economy of the country.

I must say that I have not given recent consideration to the speech to which the hon. member refers, but we have tried to take into consideration all the facts that we could obtain by the studies we have had made of the project, and we have come to the conclusion that it would be premature at this time to endeavour to construct another railway over the mountains. Of course if the government of British Columbia, which owns the railway, decides otherwise, it will be its responsibility and, I hope, its successful venture. But we have not yet been able to come to the conclusion that it would bring to the national economy such advantages as would warrant recommending more than we are recommending as an item in the supplementary estimates to be brought down.

Mr. Macdonnell: Might I ask the Prime Minister if there is no credit going to any Liberal members in connection with this matter?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think there is credit going to all those who are interested in the development of the country, no matter in what part of the house they sit. We are all Canadians and are all endeavouring, in the different spheres in which we find ourselves, to do our best to further the development of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Macdonnell: Only some more than others.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, it may be that some are more fortunately placed to be able to be effective in that regard.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SASKATCHEWAN-ALBERTA ANNIVERSARY—WELCOME TO JUBILEE CHOIR

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before motions are proceeded with I should like to ask the indulgence of the house to do something which it is not customary to do; but as it can not happen again until Newfoundland has been a province of the dominion for 50 years I am sure the house will agree that what I am going to do will not set any dangerous precedent. The fact is that this is the fiftieth anniversary of the setting up of the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The people of Saskatchewan conceived the idea of having a group of our young high school students travel not only in this country but in the United States, indicating that we can produce something else in Saskatchewan besides wheat. During the past week they have done a very big job in Chicago so far as international relations are concerned. They are on their way home and are taking the long way around via Ottawa in order to be here this evening. I understand they are going to be in the railway committee room at six o'clock, and it is hoped that most, if not all, the members will be able to hear them sing there. The press not only of this country but of the United States have indicated that they are well worth while hearing.

The members of the choir are in the gallery at the moment. I know it is not customary to refer to persons who are in the gallery, but I should like to ask the house to give them a very warm welcome to the city of Ottawa and the House of Commons.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I am a completely modest man. Even though the rugby team from my city won the junior championship of Canada, and the high school curling team won the championship of Canada, I have up to the moment said nothing in regard to those things. But since the Minister of Agriculture has set a precedent at least for today I should like to join him in his words of welcome to these Saskatchewan high school students.

Saskatchewan high school students are people in whom I have been greatly interested for most of my life, and one reason for rising today is that I should like to pay tribute to my friend and former student, Neil Harris, the director of the choir, and one of his assistants, Don Cowan, also a former student of mine. It is unfortunate that these boys, although natives of Saskatoon, have for the time being gone to the foreign city of Regina, but we hope that will soon be remedied.

Speaking seriously again, sir, may I say welcome to our visitors.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this is one time when there is perfect agreement among the members from the province of Saskatchewan, as to the wonderful contribution of the jubilee choir. Because of the fact that there is no gallery in the House of Commons I cannot mention that the jubilee choir is in a non-existent gallery. Without regard to party considerations, in this year, the fiftieth anniversary of the entry of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta into confederation, we join and walk with history.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): May I ask the indulgence of the house for a moment. As the member of this house representing Regina City I am proud of the opportunity to welcome this choir that has come from the high schools of that city. I feel I could not let this opportunity pass without saying how proud I am to be the member representing that city. I am certain that the reputation which these young people have built up, not only throughout Canada but across the continent, is well known to members of this house. They will all have the opportunity of hearing these young people at six o'clock tonight, and they will be singing in a concert at eight o'clock in the Capitol theatre.

[Later:]

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I inadvertently referred to the Capitol theatre rather than the Fisher Park high school auditorium. I think the reason for that mistake is quite obvious. The Capitol theatre has been the scene of the "celebrity" concerts; and knowing the standard of those performances my mistake was quite natural.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should speak on behalf of those who do not come from the province of Saskatchewan or Alberta. I should like to tell the members of the Saskatchewan choir how delighted we are to welcome them here, and how we are looking forward to hearing them this evening. We are all very proud of the fact that Saskatchewan is celebrating its golden jubilee, as is Alberta. All together we say, "God bless Saskatchewan and Alberta".

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS—CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient, in the proposed measure to amend the Municipal Grants Act, Bill 258 now before the house, to provide for the amendment of clause 6 so as to add a new section 8 to the main act as follows (the proposed sections 8 and 9 of the main act to be renumbered 9 and 10):

"8. (1) A grant may, pursuant to this section be made to a municipality in respect of real property that is

(a) owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada,

(b) leased to or occupied by a person who is an employee of Her Majesty in right of Canada or a member of the Canadian forces, and

(c) is used by such person as a domestic establishment.

(2) Subject to subsection (3) the amount of a grant made pursuant to this section shall not be greater than a fraction of the accepted value of the property in respect of which a grant may be made under this section, such fraction to be determined as follows:

(a) the numerator is the total amount of the real estate tax levied in the appropriate tax year, and

(b) the denominator is the assessed value of all taxable property in the municipality.

(3) Where in preparing its budget for any tax year a municipality has not taken into account the amount of a grant that may be paid under this section the denominator of the fraction referred to in subsection (2) shall be the assessed value of all taxable property and the accepted value of the property in respect of which a grant may be made under this section in the municipality.

(4) The minister may, in determining the amount of a grant under this section, deduct from the amount that might otherwise be payable an amount that, in his opinion, represents the value of a service that would customarily be furnished by the municipality to the property in respect of which the grant is made and that Her Majesty does not accept in respect of that property.

(5) No grant shall be made under this section in respect of

(a) property in respect of which a grant has been made under section 5,

(b) property described in subparagraph (iv) of paragraph (c) of section 2, or

(c) property in respect of which a real estate tax has been levied on a person described in paragraph (b) of subsection (1).

(6) In applying paragraph (a) of section 2 to this section, the words "federal property" shall be construed as meaning property in respect of which a grant may be made under this section.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF POWER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I understand that this morning a statement was made by Ontario Hydro concerning plans for the construction of an atomic energy power plant in the vicinity of Chalk River. Could the minister give the house further details about this plan?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe it would be preferable, Mr. Speaker, that I accept this question as notice and have a statement prepared which I could give in the house next week.

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that his resolution to set up a committee to study atomic energy and research generally has been on the order paper for more than two months, is it the minister's intention that this resolution shall be proceeded with at this session, or is it intended to kill the committee before it has even been born?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member that the resolution in question was put on the order paper at the request of members of his own party. They were consulted about the wording of that resolution. I understand, though not officially, that there has been internecine warfare within your party, and that there is disagreement there about the wording. I have waited patiently for that disagreement to be resolved. I understand now we have all agreed that it is too late for the committee to do any useful work during this session.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, in connection with that answer may I point out that the minister's information is entirely wrong. The main reason for the delay in setting up this committee was the fact that the minister was away in Australia. I do not know why he should try to place all the blame on others.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make an observation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): As the minister is well aware, I had a motion on the order paper in this connection. When the minister gave us the assurance on February 3 that a committee would be set up, I withdrew my motion to avoid discussion in this house. There is no reason for the minister's statement at the moment except that he is too cowardly to say—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member used an expression which is not parliamentary when he said the minister was too cowardly to proceed. I shall have to ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): I gladly withdraw it, but I suggest that the minister did not have intestinal fortitude.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the words the hon. member has used in substitution are no better, and I shall have to ask him to withdraw those as well.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): I shall be very glad to withdraw them and say in my Irish way that he did not have courage.

Mr. Speaker: Of course that is not as bad. The hon. member knows that he could have made his remarks without necessarily indulging in the qualification he did, and when he was asked to withdraw he did not necessarily have to substitute another expression. Now that he has found one that he thinks is inoffensive I do not think I should ask him to withdraw the last one, because we must give him credit for the effort he has made to water down the first one.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF GOVERNMENT SPONSORSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to comment on the accuracy of current reports that the Canadian government proposes to withdraw its sponsorship of the international trade fair in the future?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No decision has been reached. As a matter of fact council has not considered that question, but I expect to place it before council for decision before the end of the fair.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY SENIOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Has his attention been directed to a speech delivered yesterday in Toronto by Air Vice Marshal John L. Plant, and also to the controversial reply to that speech by Lieutenant General Guy Simonds? I would like to ask this. Is it in keeping with our system of parliamentary democracy that high military officers should engage in open debate on controversial subjects, and is it proper and fitting that declarations such as those of the last few days, in a spate of statements by military officers, should be made, as they indicate that something in the nature of a military junta is trying to take the place of parliament?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I think the hon. member's apprehensions are perhaps greater than the facts warrant. I have not seen any comment on the part of the chief of the general staff concerning the speech by Air Vice Marshal Plant. However, I have seen a report of the remarks which Air Vice Marshal Plant is alleged to have made in Toronto yesterday. The remarks as reported in the press do not represent government policy, as the air vice marshal took care to state. Moreover, they do not even represent the views of the air force.

I hesitate to make any further comment until I have tested the accuracy of the report in the press, which reports are sometimes not as accurate as one would wish, and I have not had the opportunity to do so as yet. Until I have done so, I feel that any question as to the propriety of the remarks should be reserved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask one further question. Whatever may be the degree of accuracy, is it proper for high military officers to be making declarations punctuated by the suggestion that "we are not uttering government policy", but with respect to controversial matters? That is the question.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Campney: Of course it is not proper for high officers in the services to make statements with respect to government policy. The extent to which they may make other statements is a question of fact in each case. That is why I think we should be sure of the facts before we comment on any such statements.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Air Vice Marshal Plant is reported as having said that the Canadian army should be abolished. If this is not government policy, is it part of a policy by the air force to secure a greater share of the defence dollar, a campaign which the government is encouraging or allowing to go on.

Mr. Campney: I would say the answer to all those questions is no.

Mr. Harkness: Then may I ask another question. If the answer is no, why is it, then, that the government allows this sort of thing to go on?

Mr. Campney: The government has not allowed this matter to proceed along the lines the hon. member suggests, at all.

H.M.C.S. "ALGONQUIN"—STATEMENT AS TO REPAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) asked me a number of questions with respect to the repair and refit of H.M.C.S. Algonquin. I may say that both the hon. members for Halifax have also asked me about the same thing. As a matter of fact, I think these questions might more properly have been addressed to the Minister of Transport. However, as this is a navy vessel, and as I am familiar with the facts, perhaps I might answer his questions generally.

A contract for the repair and refit of H.M.C.S. Algonquin has been allocated by the Canadian maritime commission to the Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company at Lauzon, Quebec. The contract was not transferred to that yard from another yard, but was allocated to the Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company in the first instance. Some protests have been received concerning the allocation, but I am informed that it represents no change in the practice which has obtained for some years now by which the Canadian maritime commission allocates shipbuilding and ship repair contracts with a view to maintaining a reasonable level of employment throughout the industry.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

FEDERAL BRIDGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, on May 16, as reported on page 3786 of Hansard, a question I had asked regarding federal bridges was passed as an order for return. Could the Minister of Transport advise me when I might expect to get this information?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I thought the return had been prepared. I shall see that it is brought down shortly.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN QUOTAS IN FLOODED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the wheat board will give consideration to extending and expanding the quotas in the flooded areas, so that farmers with wheat on hand will not have that wheat destroyed as the result of flood conditions.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The question of the movement of grain from particular areas is being worked out between the wheat board and the elevator companies. The elevator companies receive requisitions for certain quantities of wheat, and have the privilege of allocating those requisitions in areas where they will do the most good. If the residents of a particular flooded area will take up their situation with their local elevator company, and if the owner of the elevator company finds that an additional quota is required to do what is necessary, I think the wheat board will co-operate in seeing that grain that needs to be moved is moved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By extending the quota?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Probably.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration (including advisory committee on agricultural services), $496,998.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, when the Minister of Agriculture made his speech a week ago tonight I was quite annoyed, and would have made a heated reply had I been able to speak then. However, a week has passed and I realize that the Minister of Agriculture and I must appear on the same platform tonight, so it is important that we remain on speaking terms. I do plan on making some critical remarks regarding his speech of last week, but before doing that I shall devote a few minutes to the hon. member for Vancouver South.

On May 17 the hon. member for Vancouver South made a most provocative speech which was the basis of an editorial in the Regina Leader-Post of May 21 entitled "Undiluted Bunk". The hon. member for Assiniboia had presented the case for western agriculture and suggested that it was in the best interests of all Canada that parity prices be established. The hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that this was a ridiculous proposal, and that to carry out the suggestion would cost the taxpayers of Canada between $300 and $400 million. I do not know how much it would cost and I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver South knows, but I would remind him that the drop in net farm income in Saskatchewan between 1952 and 1954 cost the farmers of that province $439 million.

I submit that this drastic drop in net farm income is a matter of national concern. The Minister of Agriculture has given the impression that this drop was the result of a disastrous crop season last year, but that is not the whole story. The main factor is that farm products have not been selling in the domestic or world markets at prices which would give the farmers a fair share of the total national income. Only a small percentage of last year's crops has reached the market, and a great many farmers are still holding grain on their farms which was threshed in 1952 and 1953. Many of them have been unable to deliver a single bushel of the 1954 crop. So this very drastic drop to $126·5 million for Saskatchewan in 1954 from a figure of $565 million in 1952 is an urgent national problem.

The hon. member for Vancouver South should spend some time and find out what is being done for farmers in other countries. The idea of a price support program is not new. It is a program that has been accepted in Canada. Our chief quarrel is that the government of Canada is not attaching enough importance to the problems of agriculture. The hon. member for Middlesex East, when he spoke last night, made some critical remarks concerning those of us who sit in this section of the house, suggesting that we did not face our problems in very good spirit. I do not know of anyone anywhere who accepts injustice with any semblance of gratitude.

We recognize that the problems which confront farmers in the prairie provinces are very similar to the problems which confront agriculture in the maritimes, in Ontario and Quebec; and our reason for not discussing the problems of the cheese producer, the dairy producer, the tobacco producer and the potato grower in eastern Canada is that we do not feel we are competent to deal with these problems, since we have not firsthand information regarding them. We leave it to those who represent farming constituencies, whether in the east, in the west or on the prairies, to speak for them.

To the hon. member for Vancouver South I would suggest that he read one of the United States department of agriculture bulletins, "Price Support Handbook" which points out that the Commodity Credit Corporation was established as a federal agency in the United States in October, 1933, after farm prices had fallen to extremely low levels and farm foreclosures had mounted to record high levels. It was found that as a result of the wise policy which was introduced in 1933, when war came the free nations enjoyed the benefits that resulted from having these very generous supplies of farm products. This bulletin points out that there are some very good reasons why all the taxpayers of the country should contribute public funds to support the industry. It says:

> Agriculture is the most basic industry in our nation . . . Agricultural production conditions are not man-made and as a result production is much more uncertain than production of industrial goods.

They point out that as a result of the improvements in farming techniques, it has been possible for a much smaller percentage of the people to reside on farms. As people have moved from farms to cities and are able to join trade unions and other organizations, they are able to negotiate for a fair share of the national income.

Those of us who are older have seen the trend. I was born in a little town in Ontario where they still have a flour mill. Originally the people of this community made their own clothing on the farms. Every farm had a spinning wheel. Many of the farmers made their own shoes. Many of them made all their farming implements. But as part of our progress farm people decided it was in the best interests of Canada that we produce our machinery, our clothing and our implements in the most efficient manner, and so we have had the development of industry. As a result we have had a diminishing percentage of the population of Canada left on the farms, and those who have remained on the farms have been unable to get their fair share of the wealth of the country.

This study points out that 40 years ago in the United States farmers produced most of their own fuel, their power and their fertilizer, that most of the material needed for the production of food came from the farm. But now in the United States the farmers use 7 million tons of finished steel, more than the quantity used for a year's output of passenger cars; 50 million tons of chemical materials; 16½ billion gallons of crude petroleum; 320 million pounds of raw rubber, 15 billion kilowatt hours of electrical power. These are some of the changes we have witnessed in our own lifetime.

Regarding the over-all costs in the United States, in spite of the criticism in the thirties of the use of public funds to encourage the production and storing of farm products, over 19 years the program has cost about $1 billion in price support. This is an annual average cost of about $55 million a year, or about $1.40 per family per year. So I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver South and to the editorial writer of the Regina Leader-Post that they read something about what is being done to support farm prices and establish parity prices in other countries. In contrast to the editorial in the Leader-Post, I should refer to an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of May 19 entitled "Trouble Out on the Farms". This editorial makes a reference that might be of interest to us:

> Those who hear or read parliamentary debates will feel that the wheat farmer has able spokesmen who present his case to the nation. But the measure of farm discontent may not always be understood.

They refer to an editorial in the Western Producer, a well known Saskatchewan publication, pointing out that at the recent dominion-provincial conference which was held here the unemployment problem was given top priority. The premiers and those who were with them apparently had reached the conclusion that that was Canada's No. 1 problem, but the Western Producer and the editorial writer of the Ottawa Journal apparently share the view that Canada's No. 1 problem now is our agricultural prices. The Western Producer said:

> The consequences of price declines, the falling off of markets and the uncertainty of future prospects which at best are shrouded in gloom all emphasize the gravity and urgency of a worsening situation which, if nothing is done to forestall it, may become very bad indeed. The effect of this gathering crisis should it develop will not be confined in its impact on the fortunes of the farmers alone. It will automatically strike at the whole fabric of the national economy and might easily mark the beginning of a major depression.

I should like to draw these remarks to the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver South. Now let me come to the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture last Friday night. The minister is very skilful in analysing statistics. I think he should have a new set of glasses; he has had those for a long time now. While one cannot say there are any inaccuracies in the figures the minister placed before the house the other night, it is very unfortunate that his whole speech did not even recognize that his department is confronted with a very serious problem.

It should be remembered that the Minister of Agriculture is the only farmer in the cabinet. It is only natural that some of his colleagues who are hard businessmen should be concerned about protecting the public treasury, and if the main spokesman for agriculture in the cabinet presents a picture that is as rosy as the picture the minister presented last week, I do not think we should expect his colleagues to be greatly excited, for example, when the minister points out that last year was a pretty bad year but the trouble was confined chiefly to the prairies.

If you take last year's net farm income and average it with the three previous years, you get an average for four years that is higher than the average for any other similar period of time. That is quite right. But that is cold comfort for the people who are obliged to live for 12 months on last year's income. I think the minister should have brought to the attention of the committee and of his colleagues the fact that the net farm income in Saskatchewan last year was down to $126 million from a high of $565 million in 1952 and that it was down in all Canada to $1,125 million from a high of $2,154 million in 1951.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I did give that latter figure.

Mr. Nicholson: The minister glossed over it. I think his emphasis was on the fact that the average, taking last year with the three previous years, gave us a fairly good picture. I think the minister should have drawn attention to the fact that, with present costs as they are, it is difficult for anyone anywhere in Canada to venture into the farming business and ever hope to make a decent return on his investment and a decent living for his family, on the basis of 1954 prices and the outlook for marketing as we can see it from this angle.

I might refer him to the findings of the Searle Grain Company Limited reported in their weekly letter of January 5. This is in connection with the high cost of starting farming. This is the result of a survey in the west. I am sure the minister will agree that these figures are approximately correct. They suggest that an efficient farm unit should be at least a half section. These are figures that the Searle agencies apparently collected from all the western provinces. They suggest that you would have to invest $13,500 for your land; $8,950 for buildings; $8,469 for equipment; $1,580 for livestock; and that you need $2,099 to carry on for the first year. In other words, you would require $34,604.

I am sure if you take these figures, and take similar figures for the maritimes, Ontario, Quebec or any other province in Canada, the conclusion would be that if you were to hope for interest at 5 per cent on this sort of investment and take the prices currently being paid for dairy products, meat products, cereals and other farm products, you would have to live a long, long time and have better crops than we have had on an average over a period of time.

I do not want to suggest that the Minister of Agriculture and his department have not done anything. In his speech he mentioned two things that I should like to endorse. He referred to the contribution they made in fighting foot-and-mouth disease. I think his department did a remarkable job at that time. I also believe Canadians should be proud of the fact that they came out with Selkirk wheat before the United States was able to produce a similar grain. Last fall some of our farmers were being offered as much as $50 a bushel for Selkirk wheat if permits could be obtained to move it across into North Dakota and Montana. I must therefore give the minister's department credit for the scientific work that is being done.

My main quarrel with the minister and his department is that in my opinion they are not presenting the problems of agriculture in all parts of Canada in their true light so his colleagues in the cabinet will make available sufficient funds to give the farmers a fair share. The situation is as one of these briefs pointed out. One says 20 per cent of the people are classified as farmers, and another says 17 per cent; but whichever figure you take, the share of the national income going to the farmers is now down to under 10 per cent. You are bound to have trouble if an important section of the people such as the farmers are getting about half their rightful percentage of the national income. The minister should have recognized that in his own province—

Mr. Churchill: You should have said half as much as they should get.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sorry. Yes; the farmers are getting about half what they should be getting. The minister, in my opinion, should have drawn attention to the fact that as the result of factors over which the farmers have no control—as a result of drought and flooding—we have special problems which do not exist in other parts of Canada. I know that members from the east and from the west think we complain too much about drought or flooding, but I submit that when you come to parliament you have a responsibility to represent the people who send you here.

In the last few weeks I have written to municipalities in my constituency to ask them the picture in regard to arrears of taxes and how much damage there has been from floods. The minister will be familiar with these rural municipalities. They are all in an area where we have never had crop failures from drought. Some of this is the best land anywhere in the world. For example, Moose Range municipality is in the Carrot river area. Much of this area was opened up for settlement under a Conservative government. Later a Liberal government in Saskatchewan continued the program, and then the C.C.F. carried on. There is therefore no political issue that can be raised with regard to the problems in Moose Range municipality.

Mr. Gardiner: Will my hon. friend not agree that the provincial government drained the Moose Range area? It was not the federal government; it was the provincial government.

Mr. Nicholson: I am not going to discuss the drainage problem, although I think that is one we might discuss. Again the Conservative government and the Liberal government—

Mr. Gardiner: I happen to have been the minister at the time it was done.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: It was done by the provincial government with no assistance from Ottawa at all.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sure the minister will also agree that when he was the minister he had no idea that the rainfalls in the years 1950 to 1954 were going to be two or three times as much per year as they were when it was decided that the area was to be drained.

Mr. Gardiner: I had a letter this week from a man who lives in that section—not up that far north but in the northeastern section of the province—who says that if the people who are writing now had been here in 1882 and 1884 they would have seen the water level about where it is today.

Mr. Nicholson: Anyway, Mr. Chairman, here is a rural municipality that has arrears of taxes of $210,000. Here is a municipality that has had damage to its roads and bridges this year estimated at $85,000.

Mr. Castleden: Due to flooding.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, due to flooding. That is a grave problem for the people who live in that municipality. As I said, it is a municipality in an area where Conservative, Liberal and C.C.F. governments agree there is exceptionally good farm land. It was never known that there would be the rainfalls we have had within the last four years. I do not think there are any engineers anywhere who can devise a drainage program—at least they could not have done it 10 years ago—that would have assured them that they would pass through this era without any problems. The Porcupine municipality has arrears of taxes of $123,000; Preeceville, $72,000; Livingston, $49,000; Kelvington, $99,000; Invermay, $39,000; Clayton, $89,000; Bjorkdale, $109,000.

Those nine municipalities have arrears of taxes totalling $910,000. They have estimated the damage to their roads and bridges this year at $356,000. I submit that the people who have gone into those areas to produce foodstuffs for the nation have no way of controlling the rainfall. They have no way of taking out insurance so they can be sure that whenever they have this excessive rainfall they will have the wherewithal to meet their taxes.

There is a very closely allied problem. The Canadian wheat producer is selling his wheat in world markets at the lowest price being paid to farmers anywhere in the world, with the exception of one very small country that I mentioned when I spoke on this question in the house on May 17. In the April, 1955, issue of the minister's publication, "Agriculture Abroad", there are interesting articles on what is being done in Australia, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, France, the Soviet union, Spain, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States. I know the minister will say that in the final analysis farming conditions are better in North America than anywhere else in the world, and that is true. I must say that in all these countries it seems to be admitted that the farmers are getting less than their fair share of the national income.

In the iron curtain countries of Czechoslovakia and the Soviet union one problem is that the farmers are not getting their fair share of the national income. But our main competitors are putting large amounts of public funds into subsidizing the production and sale of cereals, and I submit it is not fair to ask Canadian wheat producers to buy everything they have to buy in a highly protected market, and sell their products in the open market.

France, for example, hopes to raise the farmers' share of the national income by 7 per cent. I wish the minister had said last Friday might that he would do his very best to win the approval of the cabinet for the support of net farm income in Canada. At page 14 of the publication, "Agriculture Abroad", there is the following:

> With the inauguration of the new Faure government in France, a number of statements on agricultural policy have recently been made, all of them tending to follow the same lines as those of former governments. In his investiture speech, Mr. Faure promised to raise farm income by 7 per cent during the next year, the same rate of increase as promised for general purchasing power. He also expressed the hope of setting prices for basic crops two years in advance to permit farmers to plan ahead.

The sum of $20 million is being put into the pot to enable French wheat to be sold in other countries in competition with Canadian wheat. How can we expect the Canadian farmer, who is getting a final price of $1.56 a bushel, to be able to ship his wheat to Europe and compete with wheat produced in France having the benefit of such a large subsidy? In the United Kingdom 70 cents a bushel is being paid to wheat producers to encourage the production of wheat. The countries of western Europe have all decided that they want to be more self-sufficient if at all possible, and in Great Britain 70 cents a bushel is being paid by way of subsidy.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: He says the farmers of Great Britain are being paid 70 cents. In addition to what?

Mr. Nicholson: I am sorry I have not those figures here, but that is approximately the amount of the subsidy the United Kingdom is paying per bushel of wheat. I put those figures on Hansard on the 17th of May.

Mr. Blackmore: Perhaps the hon. member could give them a little later.

Mr. Nicholson: If the hon. member will be good enough to look up what I said then he will find the figures for the United Kingdom. The Tory government there, in an attempt to give agriculture a better deal, is making quite generous provisions in a number of fields. I might say that at the British Labour party conference held at Scarborough last year I sat in with the farm experts of the Labour party. They are not quite as vocal as the farm experts in our party, but one of the things they decided had to be done, if and when they formed the government of Great Britain, was to see to it that somehow or other the farm population would receive a larger share of the national income. They said the fact that the farmers were receiving such a small share was affecting the whole economy, and so they were counting on doing better than the Tory government.

The Tory government has instituted subsidies of £12·8 million for fertilizers, £7 million for lime, £4 million for grants for plowing up grassland, £2·4 million for field drainage, £1·7 million for improvement of livestock rearing, £1·1 million for marginal production assistance, £10 million for bonus payments under the tuberculosis herd scheme, £135,000 for improvement of livestock, £6·5 million for a calf subsidy, £1·3 million in respect of payments for hill sheep, and £1 million for guaranteed prices for home-produced wool. The total of these figures has been expressed in dollars by the minister's department, and it amounts to $132,480,508.

In addition wheat is being subsidized at the rate of 70 cents per bushel. The wheat subsidy does not appear in the table of figures to which I have just referred, but from other figures I have found that it works out to about 70 cents per bushel. I think it is an impossible situation to ask the Canadian farmer to produce farm products in a highly protected market and sell them in an open market in competition with products receiving that sort of assistance.

I realize the minister is not the only one who creates problems for us. My attention was drawn to certain speeches made in England by Mr. J. H. Wilson of Indian Head, which were given a good deal of publicity over there. Naturally the people of Great Britain want to buy their food at the lowest possible prices, but in the Manitoba Co-operator of March 10, 1955, I find the following with respect to what Mr. Wilson had to say:

> According to the Corn Trade News, he can produce 30 to 35 bushels of wheat to the acre and, on this basis, he estimates his average cost per bushel at 50 cents.

That reminds me very much of a speech the minister made some years ago when he said that wheat could be produced at 40 cents a bushel.

Mr. Gardiner: I wish my hon. friend would finish the story. I said if the farmer had 20 bushels to the acre.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, I am glad to have that added.

Mr. Gardiner: That was 20 years ago.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, when costs were a good deal less than they are now. But what about this figure of 35 bushels to the acre? Of course many farmers have produced 65 to 70 bushels to the acre. Quite frequently in the Moose Range country a figure of 65 bushels to the acre has been reached, and in that area land has changed hands at $15,000 a quarter within recent years. Everybody agrees it is the best of land, but all our land is not of that quality.

The Searle Grain Company has issued a table giving the average yields as far back as the records go, 1878. In 75 years there have only been 21 years when the average in the prairie provinces was over 20 bushels to the acre. Therefore when a man makes speeches in London and says we can produce 35 bushels to the acre he is talking through his hat. While it can be done on small parcels of land, the average over the years in the prairie provinces is much less than that.

The best year was 1887, when the average was 26·5 bushels. The next best year was 1952, when the average was 26·3 bushels, but from 1934 to 1938 the averages were 11·3, 11·3, 8·1, 6·4 and 13·5. An average of 35 bushels to the acre has never been realized.

Mr. Wilson makes another very strange proposal. First of all he says he can produce wheat at 50 cents a bushel. Then he apparently wants the wheat board out of existence, but at the same time wants the government to guarantee a price of $1.55 a bushel. Well, that certainly makes no sense to me. If he can produce at 50 cents a bushel, why does he want the government to guarantee the farmer a profit of 200 per cent? Wheat cannot be produced at this price if you take into account the farmer's cost of production, his investment in his land and all the other factors that enter into cost.

The minister referred a good deal to the representations of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. While I think cabinet ministers and members of parliament should read these representations and study them carefully, I feel we have to reach our own conclusions. The president of the federation used a very good quotation in his annual address that I think the cabinet should never forget. He referred to the late Mr. King's radio address back in December, 1943, when Mr. King said:

> If to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to insure them against an agricultural depression after the war. As an essential part of its post-war policy the government intends to ask parliament at the next session to place a floor under the prices of the main farm commodities.

At the next session parliament placed a floor under the prices of main farm commodities. Mention was made of this fact in the speech from the throne closing the session, as follows:

> As a further safeguard of a basic standard of living provision was made at the present session for floors under the prices of farm and fish products. These measures insure two great primary industries against the hazard of a collapse of markets or prices after the war.

I believe the general understanding at that time was that legislation would guarantee the farmers and fishermen a fair share of the national income. However, I believe we could substitute for those words the words "parity prices". I believe the simple definition of parity prices is fair prices to the farmer for the products that he produces, so he will have a fair share of the national income. I feel the minister has scientific people in his department who could work that out.

In the brief presented by the federation of agriculture on March 1 certain proposals are put forward in support of their discussion of the dairy industry, which I feel are quite constructive. I believe their suggestions regarding price support should be noted. However, this is where I find myself wedged in between the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Assiniboia in their discussions concerning 100 per cent parity. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture brief states in this regard:

> We do not believe it is sound or practical to look to a price support program to guarantee the farmer prices which represent a full fair (or parity) relationship for each individual product. The result of such 100 per cent guarantees, if attempted, would inevitably be a high degree of government direction and control over agriculture. We do not believe farmers wish to submit to such extensive government participation in their business, nor do we believe it is reasonable to ask the government to undertake such a commitment.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot go along with that reasoning. I agree that a parity price for wheat may be considered too high, and one might decide that he did not want to go to parity. But I see no reason why those who speak for farmers should not insist on 100 per cent fair prices for the products of the farm.

Mr. Gardiner: Would the hon. member indicate where in that representation by the federation they stated that?

Mr. Nicholson: They say here—

Mr. Gardiner: I said in my speech that they did not agree with you on that.

Mr. Nicholson: That is the point I am making. The federation of agriculture seems to take it for granted they cannot get a 100 per cent fair deal from this government.

Mr. Gardiner: They did not say that at all. They simply made up a table. In the first place, the speech that has just been quoted from was made in Edmonton last January. Then they sat down in committee and worked out the basis on which these support prices should be established. When they worked it out it was found to be almost identical with the one we had worked out before.

Mr. Nicholson: If the minister is correct—

Mr. Gardiner: I am correct.

Mr. Nicholson: —there is no reason why the farmers' share of the national income should be down to this very low level. If the prices the minister has worked out in consultation—

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend just takes the table there in the article from which he has been reading he will find that the base prices are as they are now.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sorry but I cannot agree with the federation of agriculture and the minister if they are trying to establish that the prices in Canada for dairy products, for meat products, for cereals and for all agricultural products are giving the farmers a fair share—

Mr. Gardiner: They have not said that, and that is not what you are discussing. They established what they think the floor ought to be. When they established what they thought the floor ought to be it was found to be about what the floor is. Prices have been above the floor many times and are, in many instances, above the floor right now.

Mr. Nicholson: If I may read this again:

> We do not believe it is sound or practical to look to a price support program to guarantee the farmer prices which represent a full fair (or parity) relationship for each individual product.

Mr. Gardiner: Then they say it should be from 65 to 85 per cent of parity. All our floors as established are between 65 and 85 per cent of their parity and the prices are considerably higher than that in most instances.

Mr. Nicholson: The point I should like to make is, if you are going to drop some to 65 per cent you must build some up to 135 per cent or 155 per cent. You must see that for some products the farmer gets a price that is a great deal higher than a fair price in relation to the prices the farmer is paying for his machinery, fuel, taxes and other factors that go into farm costs. Unless you see that the farmer gets above parity in some of these cases he has no chance in the world of getting a fair share of the national income. That is the point the hon. member for Assiniboia has been trying to make, that the over-all structure should, in the final analysis, see that the farmer of Canada gets his fair share of the national income and nothing less.

I cannot see the suggestion that the taxpayers of Canada might share the point of view of the hon. member for Vancouver South that farmers are unreasonable in asking for a wheat board and asking for support prices for Canadian products, when these other countries competing with us in the markets of the world are subsidizing their products to the extent I have mentioned.

My time is running out, but I have had several interruptions from the minister, so I shall conclude shortly. Before I conclude I want to say a word about the international responsibility we should face. I feel the objective of Canadian agriculture should be to produce maximum quantities of food in Canada, for the use of the Canadian people and to be made available to our customers who can buy it, as well as those in other countries who cannot buy it. I feel that the farmers of Canada should not have to pay the price of give-away wheat.

The hon. member for Assiniboia enumerated a 25-point program some little time ago. I should like to emphasize 10 points that we might remember a little more easily than 25. They are in line with what he said.

1. We should have maximum production of food for use at home and abroad at parity prices.

2. We should establish a national marketing board for all agricultural products.

3. We should establish a board of livestock commissioners.

4. We should support the continuation of the international wheat agreement and the establishment of other international commodity agreements.

5. Canada should participate in an international food pool to distribute food to hungry people.

6. We should change the P.F.R.A. to the C.F.R.A.—the Canadian farm rehabilitation act.

7. There should be an increase in payments under P.F.A.A. to provide for depreciation in value of the dollar since the act was passed.

8. We should provide a free school lunch program in co-operation with the provinces, to dispose of surplus bread and dairy products.

9. There should be federal assistance for the building of storage space and the storing of surplus foods on farms; and,

10. There should be federal assistance for the maintenance of municipal roads in various parts of Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, the point I was making a moment ago was that the federation came here with a worked out formula which I called an algebraic formula. That algebraic formula indicated that if we were about half way between the 65 per cent and 85 per cent of parity in setting a floor price for hogs, that price would be 23 and a fraction cents. As a matter of fact it is 23 cents. It was set at 23 cents in January of 1953, and it has been 23 cents all the time since.

But the price of hogs has never been down to 23 cents, basis Toronto, during that period of time. Today it is either 26 or 27 cents. During that time it has been up as high as 38½ cents. So when a floor price is set for any particular product you do not say what the price is going to be; you simply say that it cannot get lower than that floor price. If it does, the government will take that product. During that whole period of time we have never had to buy a single hog. Hogs have been above 23 cents all the time. I just wished to make that clear.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, as I have already discussed the subject of floor prices this session I shall not have anything to say on that point at the moment. However, I do wish to discuss another matter that I believe is of major importance not only to the farmers of western Canada but also to those in eastern Canada. I am sure the hon. member for Middlesex East would agree that what I shall say will have application to eastern Canada, though it is true that when I speak I have western Canada in mind.

When the interprovincial farm union council presented their brief to the committee on agriculture they stressed that in their opinion crop insurance was second in importance only to the subject of support prices. Therefore at this time I wish to deal generally with the whole question of crop insurance.

There is no doubt that today in western Canada there is a growing demand for the institution of a system of all-risk crop insurance, which would be put into operation by the federal government in co-operation with the provinces. It is interesting to note that all western farm organizations, along with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, have urged the government to bring in a scheme of crop insurance, in conjunction with the provincial governments. At the present time hail insurance is the only kind available in western Canada.

I am sure the minister would be the first to admit that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is not crop insurance. I say that because there is no guarantee under that act if a farmer suffers loss he will receive compensation. Payment of compensation depends upon what the situation may be surrounding certain farms. Of course the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been of tremendous value to certain areas in western Canada, and I think no area has benefited more than part of the constituency I represent, so far as the province of Alberta is concerned. In many parts of that area prairie farm assistance has been given practically every year since the act was introduced. On the other hand there are areas in my own constituency, on the gumbo plains, where I doubt if it has ever been paid.

However, you hear this same criticism of the act, both in areas where it is paid almost continuously and in areas where it is rarely if ever paid, that if a farmer is compelled to contribute to a scheme he should be entitled to compensation under it. This is not the case under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In the park belt and on the gumbo plains there are many farmers who rarely have crop failures. When they do have failures it is due to hail or possibly to frost. Drought is almost unknown in those areas.

So we hear farmers, both in areas where it is paid regularly and in those where it is not paid, saying they would be willing to pay a higher levy if in return they had the guarantee that in the event of loss they would receive compensation. In other words, they want a system of all-risk crop insurance instituted.

Last year a number of meetings were held at Drumheller, where the agricultural association discussed the whole question of crop insurance. At that time they brought certain officials from the United States who were familiar with the operation of crop insurance in that country. Those officials were asked to explain the act, and a great deal of interest was shown in their explanation of the way crop insurance has operated in that country. I think the time is long overdue for the institution of a system of crop insurance in Canada.

I am not suggesting that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be changed to a system of crop insurance because, as the minister has said on many occasions, it would probably run into constitutional difficulties. But it seems to me there would be nothing unconstitutional about a voluntary system of crop insurance. Surely we have not got into such a constitutional strait-jacket that if the federal government, in co-operation with some of the provinces, desired to institute crop insurance, we would not be able to find ways and means of doing it. If we could do it in no other way we could do as we have done in connection with marketing; we could have a national crop insurance scheme and then have the provinces pass enabling legislation.

Under a system of crop insurance I suggest the country should be zoned into districts in which coverages and premiums would be adjusted in accordance with crop conditions existing therein over a period of time. Probably it would be necessary to leave certain areas out of the scheme; that is, areas where crop failures are recorded continuously. Those areas could not be brought under a system of crop insurance because the rates within such areas would be prohibitive. They could continue under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I suggest that if the country were zoned each zone could vote as to whether it should be allowed to continue under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act or should come under a system of crop insurance. Where crop insurance was instituted, P.F.A.A. could be discontinued and the levy no longer collected. Losses could be met by a levy paid on wheat within P.F.A.A. areas, and from the general revenue fund. After all, there is no reason why farmers who live in an area where P.F.A.A. is not paid should have to contribute twice, because if they were not going to be eligible for compensation, then why should they be contributing twice, first by the levy and second by taxation? I suggest in that case losses could be met from the general revenue fund and by levies on the wheat of those within the P.F.A.A. area, and those who went under crop insurance would be paying for their own protection through premiums for crop insurance.

I know some members have argued that crop insurance in Canada is not feasible. Instead of discussing the question on a theoretical basis, I think it is better to discuss it on its past record. We are fortunate in being able to do that, because crop insurance has been in operation in the United States since 1938. I would say the hazards in Canada are no greater than they are in the United States, especially when you consider the dust bowls that were created in various parts of that country.

Reference has been made to a study made by the late R. E. Motherwell entitled "A Study of Crop Insurance", published in 1944. I notice that on page 19 he states that it might be said that the experience with all-risk crop insurance in the United States was disappointing. Note that that statement was made in 1944.

Crop insurance in the United States was instituted in 1938, and from that year until 1944 very heavy losses were suffered. During that period there were losses of about $71 million, $7 million being for wheat alone. In 1944 the act was suspended. Therefore in making an analysis of crop insurance in the United States it certainly would not be fair to base it upon the period 1938 to 1944, during which crop insurance was in its infancy and heavy losses were suffered. An interesting point to note is that after 1944 a number of radical changes were made in the act, and during the past six years the act has operated most successfully.

As I say, the act was first instituted in 1938. No private insurance was available in the United States, as in Canada, except hail insurance. During the first year wheat only was insured but in the following year cotton, flax, corn and tobacco were included in the scheme. Insurance could be for 75 or 50 per cent of the average long-term yield. The contracts were for one year only, meaning that the insurance had to be sold every year, increasing the expenses of selling the insurance.

At that time adjustments were in the hands of local committees, and it was found quite often that the local committees were far more interested in paying large indemnities to the farmers than in trying to really assess the actual losses. As I have pointed out, during that period from 1938 to 1944 the losses were $71 million, of which $7 million was for wheat.

I should like to refer to the various changes that were made in 1946 and 1947, and which are applicable today. Now insurance is allowed only up to 75 per cent of the average long-term yield or the actual amount invested in the current crop, whichever is the lesser of the two. Coverage and premium rates are set by areas instead of on an individual basis. Adjustments are of course on an individual basis. A local agent is appointed in each county to sell and service the insurance instead of having it handled by local committees as in the past. The adjusters who set the losses are responsible directly to the state authority instead of to the local committee.

Largely as a result of these changes there has been considerable improvement in the over-all position of the insurance corporation, and during the past six years we find that the premiums and indemnities have been virtually in balance. This is in spite of the fact that during the past three years they have had heavy crop losses. In the report to congress in 1953 by the federal crop insurance corporation we find this on page 1:

> The 1953 losses were the heaviest of three successive years of serious drought losses under the crop insurance program.

And then at page 5:

> The most significant fact revealed by this chart from the standpoint of sound insurance operations is that premiums and indemnities are virtually in balance for this six-year period.

A table shows that during that six-year period the premiums were $106·5 million while the indemnities amounted to $106·6 million. In other words there was only one-tenth of a million dollars lost during that whole six-year period. It is interesting to note that in connection with wheat alone there was actually a profit of $1·3 million, so the losses shown were on crops other than wheat.

Roughly, crop insurance in the United States is put into effect by guaranteeing the farmer a certain amount of production. If his production falls below that amount he is indemnified for the shortage. For instance, if a farmer insures 100 acres at a yield of 10 bushels per acre; if for insurance purposes the price is set at $2 per bushel and then he produces only 400 bushels, the shortage of 600 bushels would be made up to him at $2 per bushel, or a total of $1,200. The first application for insurance must be made before the closing date, which is a short time before planting; but once the first application has been made the insurance continues in force until it is cancelled. After planting the farmer must fill out certain forms and pay the premium, but he may delay paying the premium until his harvest operations.

Considerable interest has been shown in the premium rate for insurance in the United States. Some people are of the opinion that the cost is prohibitive to the farmer, but the actual figures prove the opposite to be true. The premium rate varies considerably across the country, but the average is $75. We find that some large farms paid over $1,000, while small farms would pay $5 or $6. The actual percentage figures are quite interesting. Taking 1953, which was a year of quite heavy losses, the average premium for all types of insurance bought was 6·2 per cent of the protection afforded. The average premium that actually would have been required if all losses had been met would have been 6·7 per cent of the protection afforded. That is for all crops. On wheat alone, in 1953 the average premium paid was 8·5 per cent of the protection afforded. If all losses had been met in 1953 it would have required a premium of 8·7 per cent of the protection afforded.

It must be remembered that many farmers in the west pay considerably more than that for hail insurance alone. I think hon. members will agree that these are most moderate rates. I am satisfied that under an all-risk system of crop insurance in western Canada the hail insurance rates would be brought down considerably. If you had an insurance scheme applicable to all areas I am satisfied you would get the insurance rate down.

The reason for this is obvious. Those people who insure against damage by hail are chiefly those who feel they might suffer losses from hail. Then, farmers hesitate to insure against hail because they know if they have a crop failure from other causes than hail they are not going to be able to pay their hail insurance premium in the fall. I am sure if there were a system of insurance covering all hazards you would have a wide coverage in western Canada and your rates would be similar to those in force in the United States.

The federal crop insurance corporation is an agency of the United States department of agriculture, with a capital stock of $100 million in the form of a revolving fund. That $100 million is subscribed by the federal government. It covers all hazards except theft, neglect and poor prices. Insurance is not written unless there are 200 applications within a county, or unless 30 per cent of the total number of farmers in the county make application for it. Insurance is on a voluntary basis. Premiums are required to be set at a level that it is believed will be adequate to cover losses that may occur.

Insurance is not available in all counties. In counties where the hazard is very great, insurance is not written and the farmers there have to depend upon some form of relief measure. In Canada, of course, areas like that would continue to be covered by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In most counties insurance is written only for one type of crop. On the other hand, there are cases where two crops have been insured under a form of insurance known as multiple insurance.

It is interesting to note that insurance covers the majority of the heavy wheat producing areas in the United States. In 1954, some 803 counties were insured out of a total of 3,000; that is, more than a third of a million farmers were insured. Wheat is the main crop that is insured.

Some may ask the reason there are not more farmers under crop insurance in the United States. The answer is that crop insurance in the United States is still on an experimental basis, and therefore the government are not willing to allow all counties to insure. But the area is being steadily extended. I should like to quote from the report by the federal crop insurance corporation on that question. This is found on page 22 of their directive, referring to the period after 1944:

> As a result of the new legislation and other changes made in the insurance and its operation the financial experience improved greatly on wheat and the experience on flax, tobacco and corn was quite satisfactory. However, large losses occurred on cotton insurance in 1945 and 1946, primarily as a result of droughts in the southwest. By the end of 1946, over three-fourths of the original capital of $100 million had been lost. However, a profit of about $8·5 million was made in 1947 recovering part of these losses, but not before the congress had reviewed the operations in the light of the 1945 and 1946 experience and had decided to reduce the program to more of an experimental basis. Insurance was authorized in only a limited number of counties. There were 200 wheat counties and 56 cotton counties and a smaller number of counties for the other crops. Provision was made that insurance should not exceed generally the investment in the crop in the area. While the number of counties was restricted, the congress indicated that this experimental period should be used to develop insurance for other types of crops so that when the insurance was offered again in some of these counties, it could be offered not necessarily on wheat or cotton but on the crops that provided the major source of income for the farmers there. Since then insurance has been started on beans and citrus fruits and with the multiple crop insurance started in 1948, insurance has been applied to many different crops . . .
> The insurance experience since 1948 has been more satisfactory. Insurance operations since that time might be considered as more intensive rather than extensive operations. Congress on several occasions has reviewed the program and has authorized gradual expansion of the number of counties where insurance is offered.

It points out that it was brought down for a short time to 200 counties; that was all the counties where the corporation was allowed to write the insurance. That has now been expanded to 803 counties, and there is every indication they will be able to continue to expand the operation of the insurance. When we say that, comparatively speaking, there is not a large percentage of the farms in the United States insured, I would point out that it is largely as a result of the insurance corporation keeping its operations down rather than the farmers refusing to insure under it.

The report shows quite conclusively that all-risk crop insurance can be provided at a reasonable cost so long as you exclude the submarginal, heavy risk areas. Those areas have to come under some form of relief measure, and in Canada they could continue to come under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I would suggest that any attempt to bring some of these submarginal areas into a crop insurance scheme would break that insurance program. I am convinced that all-risk crop insurance could operate in Canada, but it will have to be underwritten by the federal government in the same way crop insurance is underwritten by the federal government in the United States. It is interesting to note that the late Mr. R. E. Motherwell, in the study he made of crop insurance in 1944, came to the same conclusion. On page 35 he states:

> Since the three prairie provinces are so closely associated in agricultural production, any attempt at crop insurance could best be handled by federal administration affecting the area now affected by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Admittedly, insurance is not a federal matter but this problem clearly seems one requiring a broader scope than just one province.

The part played by crop insurance in the United States has been important. I believe it could play just as important a part in this country. I should like to quote from the federal crop insurance corporation's report to congress in 1953, upon the effect the system has had upon the general economy of the country. I quote from page 1:

> The service to individual farmers and the nation that a soundly operated crop insurance program can provide is strongly emphasized by crop disasters such as resulted from the widespread 1953 drought. This program utilizes established business principles of insurance to enable farmers to do for themselves what otherwise requires emergency assistance from the government. The value of this service is not measured solely by the indemnities paid. Crop insurance policies provide security for crop loans which often cannot otherwise be obtained from private sources. Moreover, the protection provided by crop insurance is not limited to the insured farmer but extends through him to the community in which he lives and the channels of trade through which his crop or indemnity dollars pass. The need for such insurance has increased in recent years as the operating capital required for successful farming has increased. There is still much improvement to be made in all-risk crop insurance before it can attain the goal of providing all farmers the opportunity to insure the money spent on crop production against loss from causes beyond their control. The attainment of such a goal will require the development of crop insurance protection on additional crops and in areas where the program is not currently operating.

Those remarks could apply to Canada just as well as they apply to the United States. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture would say they apply equally as well to the operation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and I would agree with him; but on the other hand the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was never intended to provide crop insurance on a wide scale, nor can it do so.

In view of the high cost involved in producing crops, there is a need today for crop insurance that will make it possible for the farmer to insure the money he has invested in the production of the current crop. At the present time unemployment insurance gives stability to labour. Crop insurance would be able to give a great deal of stability to the farmer. The government contributes to unemployment insurance, and there is no reason why the government should not be prepared to at least underwrite a system of crop insurance. It might mean that in many years they would not have to make any contribution at all. It would merely mean setting up a revolving fund which could be used in case of catastrophe.

There are minimum wages to protect labour. Support prices in the same way should protect agriculture. I would suggest that with adequate support prices and a system of crop insurance we could stabilize farm income; and if you stabilize the farm income you will be helping to stabilize the whole Canadian economy.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, as whip of the party I am perhaps not supposed to make speeches. Possibly this would be particularly so with respect to the first item of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture. I am supposed to be something like the small boy, to be seen but not heard. However, there is a matter that I think is of sufficient importance to the members of the House of Commons and to the country that they should know more about it, and I am taking advantage of this opportunity, on the minister's estimates, to speak of it. I think I am justified in doing so because it involves agricultural policies and, as well, certain features in the estimates of the minister's own department.

I refer at this time to the serious flooding conditions now existing along the Assiniboine river east of the city of Portage la Prairie and affecting farm lands in the municipality of Portage la Prairie, Cartier, St. Francois Xavier and Macdonald. At the present time there are well over two townships of land completely inundated and which will not be seeded this year. In addition the village of Elie is also in danger of being flooded.

This is the second flood in part of this area this year. The first was caused by an ice jam during the spring breakup. It forced the evacuation of about 300 families in the middle of the night on the south side of the city of Portage la Prairie, as well as endangering the R.C.A.F. station south of the city. The second flood is of a much more serious character and, of course, of much longer duration. This second flood now under way is due to a heavy rainstorm in the upper reaches of the Assiniboine river and the Qu'Appelle valley in the province of Saskatchewan. Apart from the ice jam which occurred earlier, there would have been no serious flooding along the Assiniboine river this year had it not been for this critical storm in the province of Saskatchewan.

I made a trip to my constituency to view the flood and damage caused by the ice jam during the Easter recess. During the beginning of this week, along with the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for St. Boniface, I spent the greater part of three days looking over what is now taking place.

The Assiniboine river drains an area of nearly 60,000 square miles, which includes a large part of eastern Saskatchewan and all of western and northern Manitoba and includes the run-offs of the Duck mountain, the Riding mountain and the Nut mountain. Its main tributaries are the Souris river, the Qu'Appelle river and the Minnedosa river. All the water from this area must flow down the Assiniboine river and meet the Red river at the city of Winnipeg. Should those two rivers meet in full flow it could be an extremely serious matter to the city of Winnipeg.

I should like to indicate for a moment just what I saw on this last visit. I saw thousands and thousands of sandbags. I saw volunteers placing those sandbags in an attempt to save the dikes and prevent a break-through. I saw bridge planks and timbers packed in weak places. I saw as well the army taking its part in attempting to protect the dikes and prevent any additional flooding. Perhaps I can describe it best by saying that the Assiniboine river, in full flow, was carrying 20,000 cubic feet of water per second. There was a break-through on the south side about 1,000 feet in width. Through that break-through, at its full flow, one-quarter of the river was passing, going down to the south and east over those high-class farm lands in that area.

That is the picture we saw out there. Just how those men have been able to do the amount of work that has been done on those dikes in order to try to protect them is something I do not know. I am surprised that we did not hear of more people suffering heart attacks, exhaustion or something of that nature. That tremendous job was done, and it was done mostly on a voluntary basis.

I should like to say a word or two about the history of this river. It has been classed as a navigable stream, and it is also an interprovincial stream. Until now, so far as any protective works along it are concerned, that has been considered a federal responsibility. Flooding has not been uncommon on this river. As a matter of fact, as far back as 1916 efforts were made to provide a certain amount of protective work against flooding. It was then done under the department of the interior, and for a while under the federal Department of Public Works. The records show that some $300,000 was spent on protective works in the lower reaches of this river between 1923 and 1950. Since that time I have persuaded the Minister of Agriculture to take this river under the jurisdiction of his department, and the repair work since then has been done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Since that time about $55,000 a year has been expended on protective works.

Mr. Churchill: Did it take your persuasion to get him to act?

Mr. Weir: No, he was very glad to do so in that he looked upon it as a reclamation job that the prairie farm rehabilitation organization was well able to undertake. I need not tell my friends from Manitoba that in its lower reaches this river is about as crooked as anything one can imagine; that the soil is of an alluvial character which erodes very easily, and as a consequence, because of these crooks in the river, there is continual erosion leaving it open to overflowing its banks at any low places. That is the problem that has so far been faced in an attempt to prevent the river from overflowing its banks.

May I say also that major floods have been reported on this river in the past. I am told that the most serious floods in the recollection of the present generation occurred back in 1922 and 1923. But I know, as do others who settled there, that there has been serious flooding in the interval. As a matter of fact, in recent times a flood or the danger of a flood has occurred about every second or third year. The problem has therefore become one of major concern. I repeat that this affects the best land in Canada, namely, the lower reaches of the Portage plain. The matter of water control in our province is a critical one in that we are perhaps the lower part of the run-off region from such a large area both to the south and to the west. It is one of the problems that our province has continually been facing. Steps have been taken to try to effect a remedy, but I am afraid something more will have to be done.

Hon. members will recall the flood of 1950 at Winnipeg. Immediately thereafter a survey commission was set up to see if they could establish some means of protecting this flooded area. The report of the commission was published in 1952 and is known as the conservation and flood control report on the Assiniboine river. I commend the reading of the report to hon. members. It is one of the most readable, practical and scientific reports I have had the experience of reading and is most understandable from a layman's point of view at least. I am going to take the liberty this afternoon, for the benefit of those outside the province of Manitoba who may not be too familiar with the circumstances in our province, of referring to certain parts of the report. First of all I refer to a paragraph on the introductory page which is in the following words:

> The following study of the Assiniboine basin problems has been preceded over the past 60 years by various other studies carried out by different agencies. During 1886 an examination of the Assiniboine river was made by the Department of Public Works of Canada with a view to ascertaining the cause of annual floods. As far back as 1920, a scheme was evolved whereby a canal was to be dug from the Assiniboine river somewhere near Portage la Prairie to lake Manitoba. After the floods of 1922 and 1923, the federal departments of public works and of interior undertook various investigations. Their reports concluded that control of floods was possible only by a combination of detaining a portion of the flood waters in the upper reaches of the river and the construction of dikes. The only construction carried out, however, was the building of dikes between Portage and Winnipeg.

I also wish to refer to another part of the introductory section of the report and read a paragraph at page 7 having something to do with the creation of the problem that now exists. It reads:

> At the end of the glacial period the topography of the Assiniboine basin was very similar to what it is at the present time, but the water conditions were entirely different. The receding glaciers released tremendous quantities of water, and at the same time blocking off the drainage to the north. A glacial lake stood at the foot of the ice fields extending southward until it found an outlet along the present course of the Minnesota river, thus draining off into the Mississippi basin. The Saskatchewan river was forced by the ice barrier to overflow at the Elbow into the Qu'Appelle valley. Thence the river took its course east, entering the Assiniboine river at the present site of Lazare. From there on the combined flow of the Saskatchewan, the Qu'Appelle and the Assiniboine rivers eroded a very wide and deep valley down to the glacial lake Agassiz.

I simply refer to that as indicating part of the early history of the developments that have taken place with respect to the entire drainage basin of the Assiniboine river. I want to refer now to a section having to do with the conclusions in the introductory part of the report. This is what it says, as found at page 17:

> Most of the flood water of the Assiniboine river tends to come from the Riding mountain, Duck mountain and Nut mountain, as shown on figure 1. This part of the drainage basin is roughly 25 per cent of the total area of 59,000 square miles. There are no exceptionally high floods in the Assiniboine valley on record since 1900. The information about the extreme flood of 1882 is vague. From a statistical point of view it can be expected that flood peaks about twice as large as the ones of 1922 or 1923 will occur within a hundred year period.

I might say that in more recent times, perhaps owing to the removal of bush and the extension of drainage, flood possibilities have become much greater. That leads me to say something about what is the main purpose of my remarks this afternoon, having to do with the flooding conditions of the Assiniboine river. I should outline to the committee what the policy has been up to now. I said a while ago that this was looked upon as a navigable stream under the jurisdiction of the federal government. The policy that has been followed has been an effort to protect that area most subject to flooding by dikes along the lower places and by straightening out bends in the river by cutting through the crooks. It has not been entirely satisfactory but it has provided a large measure of control. No other step of a practical nature was seriously suggested until the report of this commission was submitted two years ago. I have heard others talk about other possibilities of providing protection, but from the engineering standpoint none of the suggestions has met with engineering approval. The report of the flood control commission that examined the whole problem, and to which I have referred, suggested three ways of providing protection. One was the building of a large storage reservoir at Russell. The second was to build a cut-off from the Assiniboine river, in the neighbourhood of Portage la Prairie, to lake Manitoba. The third was to continue the diking program on a much extended scale. There was also some consideration given to the possibilities of a further diversion near the vicinity of the city of Winnipeg.

No matter which one of these undertakings is considered each one of them is a costly undertaking, so costly that I doubt very much if it would be undertaken at the local level at all. So far as the cut-off to lake Manitoba is concerned, that would go through some of the most valuable land in the province of Manitoba. It would have to pass through a highway and two or three railway tracks. Having regard to the fact that lake Manitoba itself is about 3·5 feet above normal level, this project could hardly be entertained at this time unless there was some assurance that the level of lake Manitoba could be lowered in order to protect those who live along its shore line.

This brings me to the point where I have come to the conclusion, after living with this problem for 20 years, that a start should be made on providing for protective works upstream. As I review this report I believe the logical location for such a protective undertaking would be at Russell in Manitoba. This, too, is a very large undertaking but I do not believe we can neglect the fact that something of a permanent character should be undertaken. I am prepared to admit that even the building of a dam at an estimated cost two years ago of $6 million is not a guarantee of complete protection against flooding in the lower reaches of the Assiniboine river. But I do submit it would provide a measure of protection in most years of flooding, and on that ground I feel it should be given serious consideration.

The reservoir that would be built up behind this dam would, I might say, be largely in Saskatchewan and only partly in Manitoba. When the proposed dam is in place, it is estimated, the reservoir of water will stretch back into Saskatchewan for 50 miles and will be from one mile to two miles wide. It will contain about 450,000 acre feet of water.

Mr. Nicholson: Is that 50 miles from Russell or 50 miles into Saskatchewan?

Mr. Weir: It is 50 miles from Russell. The drainage area is estimated to be 7,600 square miles. According to this report the engineers have designed a reservoir which, at flood level, would contain approximately 600,000 acre feet of water. With the spillway operating and a normal water level, it would be 450,000 acre feet. The amount of water estimated to be ordinarily in storage is 350,000 acre feet. The surface area at flood level would be about 22,000 acres.

This is a major undertaking, and I am not suggesting to the minister it could be undertaken in his ordinary prairie farm rehabilitation estimates alone. It should be looked upon as a major project of interest to practically all of the northern half of Manitoba, and particularly the Assiniboine river valley. This proposition will have the advantage of protecting the city of Brandon, the city of Portage la Prairie and the R.C.A.F. station located there, as well as the flooded lands lower down against most of the flood conditions that have arisen in recent years. That is one feature of it. In addition to that the holding back of the water, and allowing it out gradually during the summer, would also be of particular advantage to places like Brandon and Portage la Prairie for their water and sewage projects. I might add that now that the two airports at Portage la Prairie are going to be tied in with the city's water supply, it is of considerable interest to them as well.

I am suggesting this afternoon that while this is a costly undertaking, it is nonetheless a means of making a start in relieving the flood condition that recurs with all too great frequency on the Assiniboine river. I am not unmindful of what is involved in this undertaking. I go farther and say to the house that one of the problems today is not the cost of building the dam itself but the cost of removing or changing the location of existing public utilities and things of that nature. According to the engineers' report the actual cost of the dam is not too unreasonable, but the project involves as well the moving of a railway, the raising of three roads, the building of several bridges and the purchase of the land.

Now, that may seem like a big undertaking; but, having regard to the land that is flooded in the lower reaches and knocked out of production, I think something of this nature has to be considered. It may well be that the cost feature of it will shock some people. However, according to this report the cost, as compared to similar undertakings in the United States, is not unreasonable. The per acre cost of this undertaking is estimated at $15 per acre foot of water. The average weighted cost of 168 flood control projects in the United States according to this report, based on the 1952 price index, is estimated to be $60 per acre foot of water storage. On that basis, by comparison with other undertakings that have been proceeded with, the cost of this project is not excessive.

This afternoon, Mr. Chairman, I am urging the construction of this dam at Russell. I believe it would be beneficial, particularly in dry periods, in retaining a supply of water in the upper reaches of the river in Saskatchewan. It will provide also a large measure of control against flooding and will supply a more normal flow of water during low water periods on the Assiniboine river, all the way from the dam to the city of Winnipeg, helping the water supplies of those places along the way.

It of course takes time for undertakings of this nature to be accepted. I know that there will be a good deal of concern expressed by people in the area that is likely to be flooded, if this project is proceeded with. However, I am happy to say that there is an organization known as the Assiniboine river control organization set up to press this particular matter of the flooding of the Assiniboine river. It has held two or three meetings. I have before me a report of the discussions that took place at their last annual meeting held only a few weeks ago. I might say that this meeting was representative of the reeves and councillors of most of the municipalities along the Assiniboine. I find in reading the report a very general recognition of the problem and an indication of willingness to co-operate, provided of course that those whose properties might be taken over or subject to damage would be compensated. That is the general tenor of the report. I was going to read certain sections of it, but I do not think I need to do so, more than to quote one or two observations:

> Mr. Lacroix of Cartier municipality said this: "I believe we need the dam, but we do need some dikes as well and some straightening of the river, in order that dikes will be of some permanent use. Some farmers have donated as much as 30 to 40 acres for diking purposes."

That brings me to another point in connection with the Assiniboine river. The department has been doing the work of diking and straightening the river, and providing money for that purpose; but the land has been provided either by the farmers or by the municipalities. In some cases this land has not been forthcoming; and in certain places where dikes should have been built the farmers were not prepared to give the land, or even to sell it, to the municipality.

I am suggesting to the minister therefore that, having regard to the vote already in the estimates, consideration should be given to exercising expropriation proceedings or something of that nature to acquire this land for the dikes and cut-offs, and pay for it out of this vote, so that a logical and more reasonable process of diking and straightening the river could be undertaken. That has appealed to me as reasonable; and I think the farmers in the area have donated about all the land they can be expected to donate.

I was going to make one reference to the flood, and at this point I should like to hand two pictures to the minister. The first I would hand him is a picture showing the flooding of the Assiniboine river where it crosses the highway between Elie and Oakville. The second picture is one of the places I saw myself. It is at the break where the Assiniboine broke through the dikes and is now going across country. I said that a quarter of the river was going through this break. However, that amount is lessening at the moment, and the last information I had was that the flow was down to about 1,000 cubic feet per second. Men were starting out to plug that hole. I would give a picture of this to the minister, as an indication of the location of the break, as well as its extent. The land below that point is flooded.

My reference now will be to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which admittedly has not been too popular in Manitoba. There have been many complaints about its application, on the ground that it does not meet our circumstances as satisfactorily as some feel it should. The hon. member for Acadia has just referred to crop insurance. Well, we do not have a scheme of crop insurance in operation up to now; but in this area, in the coming summer, the land will be flooded and no crop will be seeded. As a consequence there will be no basis upon which to establish the seeded acreage as a basis for prairie farm assistance. The area will be large; certainly in Manitoba it will be more than two townships.

I am wondering if the minister would entertain or could work out some amendment or some change in the application of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act whereby, in large flooded areas such as we have in Manitoba, these flooded areas could be made eligible for prairie farm assistance payments. Their circumstances are certainly as critical as those who are in the dried out areas; yet, because of the application of the act, they cannot qualify technically for assistance because they are unable to seed. I am suggesting therefore that, with these abnormal conditions developing, perhaps a measure of relief could be provided under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, whereby large areas—townships or half townships—might be included as those entitled to assistance under the act.

I know I have talked on only one subject, but I did so because it is of special interest to Manitoba, including Winnipeg; and naturally it is of particular interest to my own constituency. I think my suggestion, that of building a reservoir at Russell, Manitoba, is a sound one, and I hope that it will be entertained favourably. It would be of advantage not only as a conservation project but also to prevent flooding. It would at the same time provide an added supply of water to places at points lower downstream during periods of dry weather.

I submit this in all earnestness as a first practical and reasonable approach to the flooding conditions in the Assiniboine river.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, if I might speak for a moment—and I will not be more than that—I would point out that, of course, the report referred to, which I have here, is one which was issued as the result of an investigation we ordered some time ago. That is, it had to be agreed to and ordered by myself as minister. It has been carried out by P.F.R.A. engineers. The matter has been under consideration, and will continue to be under consideration.

I am not in a position at the moment to say whether it will be proceeded with. The very amount which is involved indicates that it could not be proceeded with under the votes we have had for P.F.R.A. If it were going to be considered at all it would have to be considered under what have been known generally as a vote for large projects, to which my hon. friend refers.

So far as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is concerned, let me say that we have been giving consideration to possible amendments. There are difficulties in connection with amending P.F.A.A. to take care of some of the difficulties the farmers have. Nevertheless we have been looking at it and attempting to work out something which would be satisfactory, and we will continue to do so.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There being no business under public and private bills, the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration (including advisory committee on agricultural services), $496,998.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, most hon. members who have spoken so far in this debate have suggested that the minister should spend more money for one purpose or another. I am going to suggest that he should spend less on one item. I wish to comment briefly this afternoon on the Canadian butter situation. I realize quite well that probably few members will agree with my views, but one of the advantages of sitting in the independent corner, sir, is that I embarrass no one but myself.

I am going to maintain this afternoon that the government's present butter policy is shortsighted and economically unwise. Not only is this policy costing the taxpayers several millions of dollars; I submit it is also resulting in thousands and thousands of Canadians, who otherwise would be eating butter, switching to margarine and similar substitutes. As a result, the butter industry today is in a serious predicament. The government has set the floor price at an unrealistic level if butter is to compete with substitutes.

There has been a steady piling up of storage butter over the past several years. According to figures which I obtained from the minister's department, on May 1, 1952, the government had in storage approximately 17 million pounds of butter; on May 1, 1953, this surplus had increased to approximately 27 million pounds; on May 1, 1954, the amount on hand was 33 million pounds; and as at May 1 of this year the figure had reached the record high of over 50 million pounds.

Butter is a perishable product and if you keep it on hand too long it is likely to go bad. That is precisely what I fear may happen, if our surplus continues to increase. If this butter should go bad, then the taxpayers will be given a bill for additional millions of dollars. In view of this fact, it seems to me that parliament should re-examine our whole floor price policy in connection with butter which the government inaugurated a short time ago.

I realize that the minister has been concerned about the problem. In an effort to do something about it, last February he introduced a program of selling butter to hospitals, orphanages, et cetera, at a discount of about 21 cents per pound. After four months of trial, it is pretty obvious that this scheme has not been too successful, because according to a return tabled in the house, page 3656 of Hansard of May 11, only 932,523 pounds had been sold up to May 6. That would indicate to me that this scheme has not been too successful. Month after month our butter surplus continues to increase. Probably a great part of this butter sold to institutions would have been sold anyway.

Mr. Gardiner: Just to put the latest figure on the record, as of May 27 the figure was 1,299,611 pounds, which I agree is not as high as I had hoped it would be.

Mr. Thatcher: That is a slight improvement, but when you compare it with the total amount of butter in storage it is pretty small. Last week the minister announced another step in an effort to get rid of some of our butter surplus. He said that the government would sell storage butter at 56 cents a pound. Of course this means that the taxpayer will have to absorb the difference. I do not think that this step will solve the problem any more than the first effort.

Mr. Gardiner: This is just a repetition of what we did last year and the year before for a period at the beginning and it will be cut off some time later.

Mr. Thatcher: I agree, and that is why I say that such action is not going to be any more successful this year than it was in 1954 in disposing of our surplus. I do not need to tell the minister that the surplus at the end of the period during which this step was in effect was infinitely greater than it was at the beginning.

It seems to me that if we are going to get rid of our butter surplus, some additional step will have to be taken. I may be alone in the house in taking such an attitude, but I think that the basic trouble with our butter policy at the moment is that the 58 cent floor price is too high. It is too high for the good of the consumer, it is too high for the good of the taxpayer, and it is too high for the good of the producer.

An hon. Member: You are sure alone.

Mr. Thatcher: I know that originally the 58 cent floor price was introduced by the government in good faith, in an effort to help the producer, and in an effort to stabilize the dairy industry. Yet I contend that the legislation is having the opposite effect. As I stated a moment ago, about all that this subsidy has done is to force thousands and thousands of Canadians, who otherwise would probably be eating butter, into eating margarine and similar substitutes.

The statistics will bear out that fact and I should like to quote some from the dominion bureau of statistics. These show that in 1953 the per capita consumption of butter was 20·88 pounds, while in 1954 it had dropped to 20·69 pounds. In the same period the per capita consumption of margarine jumped from 7·45 pounds in 1953 to 7·61 pounds in 1954. As I see it, the Canadian butter producer is gradually losing his share of the Canadian market because of this artificial floor price.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Would the hon. member put on the record the cost of producing this butter?

Mr. Thatcher: I must tell the hon. member for Moose Mountain that I cannot put that cost on the record, but I could find it very easily, as could he. I will be ready to help him look it up later on if he wishes to.

What about the export market for butter? The export market for Canadian butter has completely disappeared. The reason is fairly obvious. It has disappeared because the world market price is about one-third lower than the Canadian price. For instance, New Zealand today is laying down butter in Great Britain at under 40 cents a pound. Now, if the minister or the government should decide to try to get rid of our surplus butter by exporting it, the taxpayer is going to be called on for a very huge subsidy. If we sold 50 million or 60 million pounds at a competitive world price in the export market to dispose of our surplus, it might cost the taxpayer anywhere from $10 million up.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say this in order not to scare the taxpayer too much. There is no possibility of selling 50 million or 60 million pounds of butter out of Canada without running our own people short.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to tell the minister that sooner or later he is going to have to take some action to get rid of his surplus butter. He does not want it to spoil on his hands. Each month that goes by, the surplus is getting larger as compared with the same period a year ago.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I should like to say that the hon. gentleman was just criticizing the method by which that has been done for the last two years. We know that, if we were still holding 1953 butter, it might go bad, but we do not have any. We sold our older butter at 56 cents and got new butter in to replace it. That is the plan, under which we do know butter could not be spoiled.

Mr. Thatcher: I wish to sum up the present situation as I see it, rightly or wrongly. The Canadian butter producer has lost his export markets. Each month that goes by, he is being squeezed out of the domestic market. What should be done? The present government program has been costly to the taxpayer. I would not object to that, if it were actually helping the producer but, as I say, I am convinced that it has not. I think that both the government and the dairy industry must face certain hard, harsh economic facts. If the producer wishes to regain his share of the Canadian market, he is going to have to bring his prices down to a competitive level. I cannot see any other way around it. I believe in reasonable floor prices for agricultural products—but note that I say "reasonable". As far as butter is concerned, there is a complicating factor because of the substitutes which exist. The only way that this government can eventually deal with our mounting surpluses is to reduce floor prices by four or five cents a pound, to a point where they will be more competitive with margarine. I would remind you, Mr. Chairman, and the house, that a year ago President Eisenhower took precisely such action in the United States. He reduced the floor price of butter by a few cents, and immediately consumption increased by 7 per cent. So I say to you that this parliament should give serious consideration to revising our floor price structure on butter. I would say, by all means keep a floor price, but make that floor price more realistic.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on the minister's estimates, I wish to bring up again a subject I have brought up already. It is the most important subject in my constituency, as far as agriculture is concerned.

The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa has made it much easier for me because he has dealt with the flood situation in his constituency. I know what his problem is, because part of his constituency used to be mine. Now I have a worse situation than I ever had before, because we do not have good roads by means of which we can build dikes. The two lakes that enclose the interlake country are 4·7 feet above normal, and everything is flooded. Take the Fisher Branch, Broad Valley, Eriksdale, Riverton, and the St. Martin districts. There is just one lake running into another. The people in these districts had Selkirk wheat to sow, but they have given up the hope now because it is too late to sow it, and they will not be able to sow any crop. It is to be hoped that in July they may get some grain feed in.

The minister knows my problem because I have talked it over with him at different times, and I am hopeful he will be able to do something for these farmers. I do not know what the solution is. I do not know how much money the government can spend on it, but certainly something will have to be done to keep these people alive, so that we do not lose them. They had practically no crop last year, and they have not been able to sow anything this year. I tried to make some calls there at Eastertime, and I had to be pulled out with a tractor four times on the main road. With conditions like that, it is so hard to know what to do. The hay lines are flooded with water. The cows are going along picking branches and they are getting sore feet from walking through the water. Some of the people have put away their herds and have just kept some foundation. I do not know whether the suggestion made by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa would help, that we might take flooded areas into consideration, as the P.F.A.A. only applies to crop land at the present time, or to crop that has been destroyed. It would help some. I do not know why the provincial government in Manitoba has not made a survey and got in touch with the federal government on this matter, because it is so serious. I know that the minister is doing some work in conjunction with the provincial government, but I believe it is going to extend over five years. This is something that needs immediate attention. I can go on repeating myself about the terrible conditions of the people in the interlake country, but I do not know that it would do any good. I have made representations to the minister and I have brought it to the attention of other people. Relief of some kind will have to be given to these people. They cannot just lift up and go away. Some of the men folk may go away, but it is hard for these men folk to get jobs in the city of Winnipeg; jobs are not too plentiful there.

The hon. member for Acadia talked about crop insurance. That is all right, but even crop insurance at this time would not help the people in the interlake area. The Minister of Agriculture should have a survey made to see the deplorable conditions these people are in and see if something could be done for them. I could elaborate on this and tell you stories and read letters from the district, but I want you to take my word for it that there is nothing political about this. It would not matter who was representing the constituency of Selkirk; they would run up against the same problem. I appeal to the government most urgently to try to do something for these poor people. Some of them certainly can get by, but a big percentage of them will not be able to get through. I appeal to the minister and ask him to appeal in turn to the treasury benches to try to do something for these poor folks.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, on the first item of the department it is usual to have a general discussion on agricultural problems. This afternoon we have heard a considerable amount about flood conditions in Manitoba and we sympathize with the people affected. I first want to congratulate the hon. member for Middlesex East on his speech last night. If he considered that he was pinch-hitting for anyone, may I say that I am sure he did not need to apologize; he scored many hits.

I want to say a word with regard to this flooding situation. I want to reiterate what the hon. member for Middlesex East said last night, namely that we have never in any way criticized any of the grants or assistance given to the western farmer such as that under P.F.R.A. or P.F.A.A. But in the case of Ontario last fall as the result of "Hurricane Hazel" our losses were simply terrific. Millions and millions of dollars were lost in crops that were never harvested. Corn along the Grand river that could not be harvested was a complete loss. Yet those farmers did not receive one nickel for that loss. It is true that the vegetable growers received some remuneration through the Hurricane Hazel relief fund which was mainly taken up by a collection of people in Ontario who realized the seriousness of the situation and gave freely of their own funds to help those people out. Certainly we received a grant from the dominion government of $1 million but that was probably about one-tenth of the loss that was sustained and for which moneys were paid out.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Charlton: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: I am quite interested in this matter. I was interested in that whole "Hurricane Hazel" matter. I wonder whether the Ontario people asked for more than the $1 million. Did they ask for a considerable sum and find it refused?

Mr. Charlton: All the Ontario people asked for was a fair and reasonable amount of money to be given to them in this case of a national disaster.

Mr. Blackmore: Who decided on the $1 million?

Mr. Charlton: The dominion government decided on it, apparently. This government here decided on that amount to be given to those people. But the damage was not only the result of "Hurricane Hazel"; it was the result of flooding caused by the extreme amount of rainfall which amounted in some districts to eight inches or nine inches over a period of 24 hours.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I want to say something about the planning of the debates in this House of Commons in relation to the sittings of the committee on agriculture and colonization. Here we are this afternoon debating the estimates of the Department of Agriculture—

Mr. Weir: Where were you yesterday?

Mr. Charlton: I would ask the hon. member where he is leaving for tonight that he had to be in such a rush getting his speech off. I will tell you where I was yesterday. I was attending a farmers' picnic in Haldimand county at which the lieutenant governor of the province of Ontario was a guest of honour and guest speaker. It was my honour and privilege to be in attendance at that picnic and to show my respect for the lieutenant governor of Ontario. Are there any other questions?

Mr. Weir: Do not complain about not being here when the agricultural estimates are under discussion.

Mr. Charlton: The agriculture estimates were not under consideration yesterday. I am complaining about discussion of the agriculture estimates being held at the same time as the meetings of the committee on agriculture. I have complained about that matter several times but apparently it does not seem to do a particle of good. As I have said previously in the House of Commons and in the committee, the bill that was standing on the order paper from January 11 was called in the house on the very first day that the meeting of the committee on agriculture was called. That is just a sample of the planning of the business of this House of Commons that is carried on by this government.

Mr. Gardiner: On two previous occasions I tried to answer that complaint and my hon. friend interrupted me in the middle of it, with the result that I did not get back to it. I do not know why he rises now and states it all over again. It has no relationship to these estimates. The Department of Agriculture has not referred anything to the committee on agriculture. The committee on agriculture is sitting to consider a matter that was brought before it by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have attended the committee on agriculture for only about 15 minutes during all the time they have been sitting. It has nothing to do with this department whatsoever.

Mr. Charlton: If the minister thinks he answered that complaint before, may I say that I did not hear his explanation.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not make it before because you did not let me make it.

Mr. Charlton: I did not interrupt the minister when he was making his speech. I have never interrupted the minister in any speech he has ever made in the House of Commons.

Mr. Gardiner: No. My hon. friend rose and asked me a question that got me off on something else and I did not get back to it.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I am making a statement of fact and I do not think the minister can refute that fact. Whether it is under the Department of Trade and Commerce or not, it has to do with agricultural matters. Regardless of whether or not he thinks it is under a different department, it has to do with agricultural matters.

Mr. Gardiner: I have refuted the inference you are drawing. I am not refuting the facts you stated.

[Mr. Charlton.]

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Charlton: It still has to do with agricultural matters. It is dealing mainly with western agriculture or dealing with wheat. It is true it has to do with the matter of feed problems here in the east and we did discuss that matter to some extent. But I am still critical of his government for having had an occasion arise when the committee on agriculture was meeting at the same time and was called on the same day as one bill that had been standing on the order paper from January 11 was brought forward in the house. That is all I am going to say on that matter, but I think it is an example of extremely poor planning on the part of this government to let that be the fact.

With regard to the farmers' position today, I want to go back a little bit in history because apparently there is a good deal of confusion among people in urban areas as to farm thinking. I regret to say it but there are few people living in large cities in this country or in the United States who understand the farm psychology. They say that the farmer beefs a lot. They criticize him for getting money handed to him by way of subsidies and that sort of thing. But they do not understand what that farmer puts up with. They do not understand his way of life.

Years and years ago the farmer was in fact self-sufficient. He did not need to worry very much about what happened in the cities. He grew his own food. He made his own clothes. He made his own implements, as it were. He even made his own bullets with which to shoot the food he ate or part of it. But as time went along that condition changed. It changed considerably with the advent of an increased population in the country. One hundred years ago probably 90 per cent of the people in this country were on farms and depended on farms for a living, and the agricultural income was in proportion to the number of people getting their living from the farm. At that time the consumer in the city realized where his food came from. In most cases he dealt directly with the man who grew the food. He bought his potatoes, his fruit and his vegetables from the farmer himself. Today the farmer's position has changed in that he is no longer self-sufficient. He requires fuel to use in his tractor. He no longer uses horses for which he grew the necessary fuel. He has to purchase fertilizers, and in many cases he has to purchase feed. Therefore the farmer has placed himself in the position of being a consumer of a great many goods.

But the consumer in the urban districts is also in a different position. He has lost his personal contact with the producer of his food. Many young people in our cities hardly know what a farm is or what a cow looks like. I would even go so far as to say that many young people in our cities today probably wonder what colour of cow chocolate milk comes from. As a matter of fact, I have been asked that question by young people. The consumer now goes to the chain store. He purchases his food in packages, and very attractive packages they are. There is no definite link between the consumer and the man who produces the food. It is more or less an automatic process and I regret to say that many people in our cities take food for granted. There is good reason for that. Never in the history of the country has anybody ever gone hungry because of a scarcity of food. There has always been plenty, and often there have been surpluses. I regret to say, for that very reason many people take food for granted.

In his opening remarks the other night the minister made some statements about prices. I want to quote a paragraph from his speech to be found at the bottom of page 4210 of Hansard of May 27. He said:

> The Canadian Federation of Agriculture statement points out that prices of farm products have fallen further in North America than in other countries of the world. This is quite true, but prices in general after the drop are higher in North America than in other countries of the world, all of which indicates that since the war farmers in North America have had the highest prices in the world.

I should also like to quote one sentence from the middle of a paragraph on the next page, and I do not think it is unfair to quote only the one sentence. The minister said:

> The shrinkage of foreign markets, however, came about partly because there has been a higher price level here than elsewhere.

In the one case the minister says that our farm prices are the highest in the world, which is true, but later he qualifies that statement by saying that the shrinkage of foreign markets came about partly because there has been a higher price level here than elsewhere. Certainly the only thing that actually counts is the net income the farmer receives. As found on page 4212, the minister said:

> No sound conclusion can be reached by comparing anything related to production or returns from farming, by comparing one year with the one before it or the one immediately after it.

Then the minister went on to say that the prices in any four-year period since the Liberals have formed the government have been higher than they ever were in the period from 1931 to 1934. We have heard that argument so often, Mr. Chairman. Does the government believe that the farmers of this country will accept that sort of statement? There was a world depression then and prices were down, but later in my speech I hope to show by figures that the situation in proportion to other prices was not as bad then as the government would like to lead people to believe.

Net farm income for 1954 was down by something like 48 per cent. In 1951 net farm income was $2,154 million, and in 1954 it was $1,125 million. The minister says that, taking the average of the last four years, prices have been better than they ever were before. I have here the April, 1955, issue of the Economic Annalist, and I want to give a few figures from this publication. Taking the period from 1935 to 1939 as representing 100, the average figure for farm prices for the five-year period from 1943 to 1947 is 188·9 while the figure for January, 1955, is 221·2. These figures are for farm prices of agricultural products.

Let us now take the composite index of commodity prices. The average of those prices for the same five-year period, 1943 to 1947, was 154·2, and by January, 1955, the figure had increased to 231·7. What is interesting is the difference between the figures representing the five-year average from 1943 to 1947 inclusive and the figures for January, 1955. As far as farm prices are concerned, there has been an increase of 17 per cent between the average for the years 1943 to 1947 and the figure as at January, 1955. There is an increase of 17 per cent.

Mr. Blackmore: In which direction?

Mr. Charlton: Up. I said "increase". As far as commodity prices are concerned, prices for the things the farmer has to buy, there has been an increase from 154·2 to 231·7, an increase of 77·5 or practically 50 per cent. There, Mr. Chairman, is your answer.

Mr. Gardiner: Is the last one a five-year average too?

Mr. Charlton: No, of course the last one is not. I said I took the figure for January, 1955.

Mr. Gardiner: That just proves what I said is correct. It does not get you anywhere to compare five years with one day.

Mr. Charlton: There is never any use in placing figures on Hansard as far as the Minister of Agriculture is concerned.

Mr. Gardiner: Not that kind of figure.

Mr. Charlton: He places his own figures on Hansard to show his own trend of thought, but anybody else's figures do not mean a thing.

Mr. Blackmore: You are doing well.

Mr. Charlton: I have taken these figures from the Economic Annalist, and I challenge the minister—

Mr. Gardiner: This is funny money.

Mr. Lennard: Yours is sometimes, you mean.

Mr. Charlton: The minister seems to be having a lot of fun. He does not bother me a bit, so let him have his fun. I say again, that is the answer to our problem today. The net income of the farmer is down 48 per cent, and that is the reason it is down. The prices of farm products have gone up only 17 per cent on an average over the five-year period 1943-47, while the commodities the farmer has to buy have gone up 50 per cent. The farmer's net income has been greatly decreased as is shown by these figures.

The minister went on to quote what the figures were back in the period 1931-34. This Economic Annalist, put out by the Department of Agriculture, does not include comparable figures for those years, so I have no way of proving anything by quoting figures from this pamphlet. In the column relating to farm prices of agricultural products there is, however, another item here, the general wholesale index for 1931-34. This index varies from 94 down to 86·9. I remind hon. members that these figures are all quoted on the basis of 1935-39 equalling 100. Then the composite index of commodities and services used by farmers for the period 1931-34, as compared with the high of 94 and the low of 86·9 for the general wholesale index, goes from a low of 89·8 to a high of 100·9. There is not as much difference there, Mr. Chairman, in the 1931-34 period as there is now in this 1955 period.

I should like to quote a paragraph from the minister's statement in Hansard of May 27, 1955, page 4212. He said:

> I have before me a table which shows that, taking the average price on farm products for the 4 years before we came into office as the beginning, there has been an increase every 4 years since, until now the price on all cereals is from 2½ to 3 times as high from 1951 to 1954 as in 1931 to 1934.

Just imagine, 2½ times to 3 times as much.

> The price on hogs is over 3 times as high, and the price on cattle over 4 times as high. The price on butter is 2½ times as high, the price on cheese 3 times as high and the price on eggs almost twice as high.

Now, is that not something to be proud of? The minister compared the average prices in 1931-34 with the average prices in 1951-54, after we have had a war, and conditions have changed so much. Our economy has entirely changed, and our dollar is worth just half as much, and yet the minister insists on comparing these two periods.

I put a table on Hansard of March 15 that appears at page 2066. This table showed quite clearly that there never has been a year in the history of this country when an hour's wages would buy so much food. That, Mr. Chairman, is the answer to the farmers' problem and the answer to many other problems across this country, especially the unemployment problem. If any other industry or any other class of people were asked to take a 48 per cent net decrease in income in the last four years, I wonder what would happen. But the farmer, has taken a 48 per cent decrease in net income, and people wonder why there is unemployment in this country. The implement manufacturers are practically closed down because they cannot sell their implements. The farmers have not the dollars to buy these implements. Yet, the minister gets up and says they are better off than they ever were before.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask my hon. friend how long this government would stay in office if we put conditions back to what they were from 1931 to 1935? We would go out as fast as your party went out.

Mr. Charlton: It was a Liberal government that put them there in the first place, because that depression started long before 1930 and the minister knows it very well.

Mr. Gardiner: Why did you not say that from the start instead of arguing the other way?

Mr. Charlton: I have listened to the minister now for quite a number of years and I am getting used to him. As a matter of fact, I do not pay too much attention to what he says on many occasions.

Mr. Gardiner: Some people do.

Mr. Charlton: But that is a fact; it is here in Hansard. The minister says that farmers are better off now than they ever were. I am just going to leave it to the farmers themselves to say whether or not they are better off than they ever were. They will probably say it in another way at the next election.

Mr. Gardiner: You have been making that prophecy ever since you came here.

Mr. Charlton: Sometimes it takes quite a while for things to seep in, you know, but the farmers are getting just about as fed up as I have ever seen them. I think probably the minister knows that very well.

Mr. Lennard: That is why he is on edge.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not on edge.

Mr. Charlton: We hear a great deal, Mr. Chairman, about the subsidies paid to farmers. This afternoon we listened to a speech by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. He has his own ideas, and he is entitled to them. I am sorry he is not in the house now but I do want to say to him that, although I cannot quote the exact figure for the subsidy on butter, the amount is infinitesimal. The amount that subsidy costs the taxpayers of this country is infinitesimal. I must be fair, however, and say that the farmers of the country do appreciate the fact the government kept the floor price at 58 cents. The government showed very good judgment in doing so. They knew what would happen under the circumstances if they had lowered that floor price, on top of the importation of 2·25 million pounds of New Zealand cheese. The farmers of this country were up in arms just a little farther than I have ever seen them in my life before as a result of that importation. As I say, I have to be fair to the minister, and the farmers do appreciate the maintenance of that floor price.

It has been suggested that the farmers should be able to compete in the free market of the world and left to themselves to go along in the best way they can, without any support prices and without any floor prices. I will say that in most things the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre is consistent, although I wonder if he would like to see everything thrown wide open. I think the farmers of this country would take their chance if that were the case, but when one industry has protection they believe they are entitled to some protection at least.

It was stated also that the floor price did not help the producer. I cannot conceive of anyone making that statement. I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that the maintenance of the floor price on butter helps the consumer just as much as it does the producer. It stops these great fluctuations in price. I will say that during the period from 1947 to 1953 inclusive the total subsidies paid to agriculture, including the subsidy of $69 million paid out for losses as a result of foot-and-mouth disease, amounted to less than 15 cents per capita per year.

It is true that in 1952 there was an increase in the price of butter. It was unnecessary, and of course it stayed up for only a day or so, because when it was found that stocks were not as low as some people had led us to believe, the price broke. I think it dropped as much as 17 or 18 cents in one day.

I wish to point out that by maintaining the floor price on butter the consumers of this country are assured that they will not have to pay an extremely high price for their butter in the wintertime, even though they might get it at a low price in the summer. The cost of the subsidy has been saved many times over through the maintenance of stability and farmer purchasing power.

A number of years ago the farmers of this country were promised that if they would accept lower prices during the war they would receive a square deal after the war was over. Let me quote what was said in this connection in a radio broadcast by the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, on December 4, 1943, he said:

> If, to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to insure them against an agricultural depression after the war.

The farmers were also promised that markets in Great Britain would be retained if they accepted lower than the world price during the war. But what happened? Practically all those markets were lost. I mentioned a moment ago that subsidies have been criticized from many quarters.

I should like to put on the record some figures concerning other subsidies—and these are not paid to farmers. I have before me the answer to a question appearing in Hansard of May 4. On that date the hon. member for Jasper-Edson asked the following question:

> What was the total amount paid in price support of gold mining industry in 1954?

To that question the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys replied:

> Assistance paid by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys during the calendar year 1954 amounted to $14,879,334.33.

Strangely enough immediately following this question was another asked, again, by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. His second question was:

> What was the total amount paid for price support on all farm commodities in 1954?

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture replied as follows:

> The estimated net cost of operations of the agricultural prices support board during the 1954-55 fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, is $3,210,928.

In other words about four and a half times as much was paid by way of subsidies to the gold mining industry in this country, which employs approximately 25,000, as was paid to agriculture in which 660,000 are employed. I place these figures on record at this time to point out to the people of Canada that farmers are not the only ones who are receiving subsidies. It is costing the taxpayers of this country very little for the help being given to the farmers. As I said before it amounted to 15 cents per capita per year over a six-year period.

It is claimed that prices are high. I said a few moments ago that there never has been a year in the history of this country when an hour's wages would buy so much food. Yet we hear many complaints about food prices. I have some figures here that I believe would be interesting. Milk is one product about which considerable complaint is heard. Yet one can have a quart of milk delivered to his door at a cost of 22 cents. However, if he goes to the store and buys a large bottle of ginger ale it will cost him 20 cents for the 30-ounce bottle, or at the rate of 26 cents for 40 ounces, or the equivalent quantity he would receive in the quart of milk. If he buys a small bottle of a soft drink he will pay 6 cents for 7½ or 8 ounces, or for 40 ounces he will pay at the rate of 30 cents. Then, if he buys a 12-ounce bottle of beer it will cost him 17 cents, or at the rate of 46 cents for 40 ounces.

When we compare the price of 22 cents for a quart of milk with 46 cents for the same quantity of beer, 30 cents for a soft drink, or 26 cents for ginger ale—and if he buys Coca-Cola it would be even more expensive —we see that the price of the milk is low in comparison. The farmers are not as well off as the minister would lead us to believe they are.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that at any time in my life. I never have said the farmers were well off.

Mr. Charlton: Perhaps the minister did not say so, but—

Mr. Gardiner: I am a farmer, myself, and I know.

Mr. Charlton: Then we will have to presume that they are not well off, and he is now admitting it.

Mr. Sinclair: Better off than they were under the Tories.

Mr. Charlton: The minister says that they are better off than they ever were before. The government has a long way to go to make it possible for the farmers to say that they are well off. And the minister admits that they are not well off.

Mr. Gardiner: They have been getting along so well as compared with the way they got along under other governments that they are content to keep us here.

Mr. Sinclair: There are no fishermen going to California, I can tell you that.

Mr. Charlton: I would like to put a few more figures on record.

Mr. Blackmore: Could we call it six o'clock?

Mr. Charlton: This will not take long. Out of 630,000 farms across Canada we find that 423,000 have no water supply piped into the house; 528,000 have no bathrooms or showers; 473,000 have neither flush nor chemical toilets; 275,000 have no electricity for lighting; 535,000 still use wood or coal for cooking and 427,000 have no refrigeration.

These figures show that 51·5 per cent have electricity, 17·5 per cent have hot and cold running water, 15·5 per cent have bathing and shower facilities and 21·9 per cent have refrigeration. I will let the people of Canada be the judge of whether the minister is correct in his statement that the farmers are better off than they ever were before.

Mr. Bryson: May I ask what we shall be discussing after eight o'clock?

Mr. Sinclair: We will continue with these estimates.

Mr. Gardiner: I think I ought to say to hon. members who asked me last night to try not to go on tonight that we have tried to make arrangements, which we could not, to have others do so. That was impossible for certain reasons, not all originating on this side of the house, and for that reason I will go on tonight.

Mr. Sinclair: In view of the social engagements which Saskatchewan members have, as acting leader it is my intention to ask for the adjournment of the house at a quarter to ten this evening so that they may attend the Saskatchewan functions.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be permitted to tell the minister that during the recess tonight we were very much impressed by the group of young men and young women coming from his own province, carrying the banner of the Saskatchewan golden jubilee and representing the high schools of the prairie province.

Before six o'clock I was very sorry to hear the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand making a comparison between the subsidies paid by the federal government to the agricultural industry on one hand and those paid to the gold-mining industry on the other, for the simple reason that a great part of the gold subsidy is benefiting the farmers of northern Ontario and northern Quebec. I would be very much afraid to think of what would become of our farmers if the gold-mining industry was closed down. The gold subsidy is one way of helping the farmers, and there should be no suggestion of discontinuing it at this time.

I shall be brief in my remarks, Mr. Chairman. First I wish to congratulate the minister on his comprehensive statement on the general situation in Canadian agriculture at the present time.

I also wish to offer my sincere thanks to the officers and the technicians of the department for all they have done to help the farmers of our district. More particularly, I wish to say that the farmers of northwestern Quebec are grateful to the directors, the technicians and the other employees of the federal experimental farm of Kapuskasing and of the experimental substation of Macamic for their guidance, and the good advice and encouragement they have supplied in performing their duty. We are in great need of this kind of service and we hope that it will be accelerated.

Agriculture gradually becomes a basic industry in northwestern Quebec, more particularly within the clay belt which is eminently suited to the production of fodder plants, and consequently to stock farming, either for meat or for dairy products. Also, small-scale farming and gardening can be made profitable around the larger centres such as Rouyn-Noranda, Malartic, Val d'Or-Bourlamaque and Amos. In this respect, I would hope that the division of horticulture of Kapuskasing would conduct some experimental work in the growing and preparation for market of vegetables in those centres. There are a great number of small farms which are suitable for that kind of production, and their owners are in urgent need of guidance and encouragement. I will go as far as saying that an experimental station for that purpose would be a profitable investment.

As it is, in northwestern Quebec, the development of agriculture depends mostly on the mining industry. The latter injects a pecuniary serum, enabling the settler to live through the difficult years when he has to work on virgin soil which will bear fruits only after years of unceasing labour. The settler finds in the mining centres a ready market for his lumber and other farm products, and the mining industry provides work for him during the off-season. So, gradually, the settlement lot becomes a productive farm, and the settler a real farmer ready to take his rightful place in the community.

Now, the majority of our farmers are at a stage where they need more help, additional guidance and encouragement. They need help in connection with their livestock and in connection with the classification, storage and distribution of their products. Studies of these various problems are now being made by local organizations, but it is only with the help of duly qualified technicians, the guidance of good management, the encouragement of the business people of our district and the financial aid from both the federal and provincial governments that a program of such breadth can be carried out.

There are over 65,000 people in the cities and towns of northwestern Quebec. Carloads of such commodities as meat, vegetables, dairy products and poultry come from outside the district and are distributed by many merchants in the different localities. In such a situation we would think that the local products would find an outlet. We are aware of the fact, however, that a grocer cannot buy products that are not classified. Moreover, if he is not assured of a steady flow of products from the local farmers, he cannot buy from them. Our farmers need a distribution centre in which they can find facilities such as a slaughter house, cold storage and good management for the distribution of their products. These facilities are lacking at present, so the flow of products is not steady. This is partly due to a lack of guidance in distribution. Further progress could be made also by a livestock improvement program, jointly operated with a program for the development of grasses. This would enable the farmers of the district to continue the production of livestock on a more sustained basis.

Finally—and I have mentioned this before—so that the farming industry in northwestern Quebec may fulfil expectations, let us hope that a large-scale program of drainage will be undertaken with the co-operation of both federal and provincial governments in the whole of this part of the Pre-Cambrian clay belt, which is level with the farm lands. In addition to improving arable land, it would help reforestation and the development of large marshlands which are now absolutely useless.

The farmers of northwestern Quebec keep toiling to clear and improve their farms. The heavy work they took on from the beginning is now producing results. However, if we want the progress of the farmers of our district to be on a par with that of other industries, we will have to give a hand, we will have to help those who have worked so hard to clear the land and, finally, we will have to try to make it easier for the farmers to distribute their products. We know how steadfast our farmers are, and if we help them ever so little we may be sure that they will do their full share in the development and progress of that part of the country.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, last week in the committee on broadcasting we were privileged to hear representatives from the musicians union. The suggestion was put forward by that group that it might be a good idea if members of the House of Commons organized some sort of musical group in order to increase harmony in the chamber.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): We have one on this side of the house.

Mr. Dinsdale: After hearing the excellent performance by the western young people during the supper recess, I am sure that we would all agree that the union representatives had a worth-while suggestion to make for members of the house. Already tonight I think the discussion on agricultural subjects is proceeding on a more harmonious note than before the commencement of the recess. In my contribution I hope to continue on that same level as far as is possible.

I was delighted this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa take up the cudgels in no uncertain terms in behalf of the proposed Russell reservoir. I say that I was delighted to hear him take this stand because hitherto the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa has rather inclined to the view that diking instead of the reservoir was the solution for the problem of flooding in the Manitoba area.

I have been interested in this subject ever since I came into the house. Each year since the report was prepared by P.F.R.A. on the problem of flooding on the Assiniboine river I have asked the Minister of Agriculture on the estimates when action might be contemplated on the basis of the report. Last year, unfortunately, the minister was not able to be in the chamber during the discussion of the estimates. I therefore presented the question to his parliamentary assistant who was acting on his behalf. As reported at page 6738 of Hansard for 1954, I put this question to the parliamentary assistant:

> Last year when I questioned the Minister of Agriculture on the matter he referred me to a report on conservation and flood control on the Assiniboine river that was prepared by the P.F.R.A. branch, and completed and published in December, 1952 . . . The report to which I have referred recommends two major projects in flood control and conservation in the Assiniboine basin. I refer to the Russell reservoir at Russell, Manitoba, and the Portage la Prairie diversion . . . As I indicated, the minister said last spring when we were considering the estimates that the matter was under consideration. As this condition has been developing from 1886, and has been under consideration since that time, I would hope this year that some specific information might be available as to what the department contemplates in regard to the recommendations of the report.

In reply to that question, Mr. Chairman, as reported at page 6750 I finally succeeded in getting from the parliamentary assistant, after I had queried him further, an answer as follows:

> I understand that was with respect to the survey made of the Assiniboine river. That survey was undertaken along with the Red river survey at a time when they had flood trouble in the Red river valley a few years ago. These few projects were undertaken together but what is going to take place with respect to the survey in which my hon. friend is interested, I am not in a position to say.

I repeat the question this evening, Mr. Chairman, because it is becoming quite obvious that the problem on the Assiniboine river requires urgent attention on the part of the federal administration in co-operation with the other government levels concerned.

The reason I think the emphasis is being placed on the effectiveness of the Russell reservoir project today is the formation of the Assiniboine river control association last fall. It was my privilege to attend the organization meeting of this group made up of representatives from all the municipalities adjoining the Assiniboine river. At that time they spent several hours considering the three alternatives that have been proposed in solving this problem, namely, the reservoir; second, continuation of the program of diking; and third, the Portage diversionary cut-off into lake Manitoba. Even as far back as last fall members of the association came to the conclusion that neither diking nor the Portage diversion was the suitable solution and began to press for the Russell reservoir. Just two weeks ago they had another meeting to which the Minister of Agriculture was invited. At that meeting some further strong recommendations were forthcoming supporting the reservoir solution to the problem. Some of these resolutions were placed on record by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa this afternoon.

While the association has moved towards solid support for the reservoir, it has not entirely abandoned the principle of diking. It suggests, however, that diking is only a temporary solution to this flooding difficulty. The correctness of that suggestion definitely has been demonstrated by recent events in the district of Portage la Prairie. It will be recalled by hon. members that the city of Brandon was in the headlines, both in the press and on the radio, for a period of almost two weeks recently because in that city a heroic struggle was taking place to maintain their diking system intact. I am pleased to be able to say that largely as a result of action on the part of the municipal authorities, assisted by an excellent civil defence group supported by police and fire departments, Brandon was able to maintain its diking system intact and that no major flood damage took place within the city proper. However, while Brandon was saved, the dikes erected there merely succeeded in pushing the additional water in the direction of Portage la Prairie and, as has already been indicated, the Portage dikes were breached and considerable damage done to the extremely fertile farm land of the Portage plains.

In reference to this diking problem I would further point out that the city of Brandon has spent in the past two years some $70,000 of its own funds. Of course I think it will be understood that an expenditure of that kind to cope with the flood problem is much too high for any one municipality to bear. I would therefore join heartily with the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa in suggesting that some definite action be taken with reference to the recommendations of the P.F.R.A. report on flooding on the Assiniboine river published in 1952 and that this action be taken in consultation with the municipal authorities as well as the provincial authorities.

Just before leaving the subject of flooding, which comes under the general heading of P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A., I want to say I have received certain resolutions from municipalities and areas affected suggesting that something be done by way of compensating farmers who have been flooded out, in some cases for three years in succession. There is a group of farmers along the Assiniboine river in Saskatchewan as well as in Manitoba west of Brandon who have suffered almost complete crop failure during the past three years because of the regular flooding. Unfortunately, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Acadia, there is just no way under the P.F.A.A. scheme whereby these farmers can be compensated.

I know the government is aware of the problem because two or three weeks ago I submitted a motion for the tabling of letters, documents, etc., relating to the problem of flooding on the Assiniboine, and I have been informed by the government departments concerned that the correspondence is so voluminous they hardly know where to begin in responding to my motion. Obviously the government is well aware that the farmers of Manitoba are quite exercised over this difficulty. They are and have been so exercised that in the past year the provincial government established a committee to examine thoroughly the question of crop insurance. This of course is related to the whole problem of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and its adequacy in meeting present-day problems in the prairie provinces. While the committee has not yet submitted its final report there is every indication through preliminary press releases that the consensus will be that the present P.F.A.A. legislation is quite inadequate to deal with the problems of floods and other agricultural hazards as they apply to the province of Manitoba.

From time to time farmers in Manitoba have complained because it was becoming increasingly obvious that Manitoba farmers were not receiving proportionate returns from their contributions to the P.F.A.A. scheme, largely because Manitoba does not have so much submarginal agricultural land as the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Even this year the figures for P.F.A.A. assistance, if I remember them correctly, are something like $19 million for Saskatchewan and $3 million for Manitoba. In addition, I have already had letters from farm constituents pointing out that any assistance they have been able to obtain under P.F.A.A. as it stands is quite inadequate to deal with the problem created largely by the flood emergency.

I am not going to take the time of the house tonight to deal with the question of crop insurance as comprehensively as did the hon. member for Acadia. That would merely be going over ground already covered. I would, however, point out very emphatically that Manitoba farmers are very much exercised over this matter, and no doubt when the report of the committee investigating crop insurance is brought down there will be strong recommendations that something be done to provide more adequate protection on an actuarially sound insurance basis not only for Manitoba farmers but for other farmers of the prairie section of Canada.

There is one final point, perhaps an incidental one, on the question of flooding to which I should like to refer before leaving this section of my remarks. I wish to draw the attention of the house to a report that emerged from a government department a few weeks ago concerning moisture control experiments that have been taking place in southwestern Manitoba and in two areas of west central Saskatchewan during the past two years. The Canadian Press report on the matter emanating from the government weather service branded as a failure the commercial rain-making experiments carried out in 1953 and 1954 in sections of the prairie wheat belt. The official summary of the weather service report says that the most likely effect of the cloud seeding was a decrease in rainfall of 14.1 per cent.

Since this official statement was made by this government source the group carrying on these experiments in Manitoba and Saskatchewan have issued a counteracting statement in which they point out that the appraisal of the experiments is completely inadequate, if not entirely wrong or distorted, because no final opinion concerning the rain-making experiments can be formed until there have been at least seven years of experimentation in this particular section of the country. I am taking the opportunity tonight to point out that there has been considerable interest in this experiment among the farmers. Earlier in my remarks I talked about flooding, but most hon. members will recall that an excess of water is not the only problem of the prairie region. For many years during the so-called dirty thirties we had the problem of drought to contend with. This work relating to the drought problem has been carried out on a voluntary subscription basis by the farmers interested, and it is unfortunate that the government weather service allowed a premature report to be circulated before the scheme had had an opportunity to prove itself one way or the other.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni also dealt with this subject in the house on the 17th of May, and as found at page 3869 of Hansard for that day he stated:

> As I stated somewhat facetiously, I admit, in conversation with some of my colleagues, if this situation were permitted to develop it is conceivable that we in British Columbia would have the power to turn the entire prairie provinces into a desert by taking all the water out of the clouds coming in from the Pacific.

The hon. member was referring to similar experiments that have been taking place west of the mountains. He himself described his remarks as being somewhat facetious, but unfortunately the press picked up the statement I have quoted and headlined it in the west. They said that a member of parliament had suggested the possibility that the prairies might become a desert as the result of cloud seeding weather modification experiments being carried out on Vancouver island. That, I trust, will put the record straight. I have taken the time of the house to do so because this publicity has been somewhat disturbing to the farmers who have invested substantial sums in this experiment.

Now before concluding, Mr. Chairman, I should like to have a brief word on general agricultural matters. This is the first time I have taken part in any agricultural debate in this chamber during the present session. There has been a great deal of time consumed in discussing the agricultural picture. Because it is in the process of transition, I have waited until we had the opportunity of hearing statements from the responsible cabinet ministers, and particularly until we had the opportunity of getting the picture from the farm organizations, the representatives of the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners who appeared before the agriculture committee. The pattern that has been taking shape during the year has definitely come into focus during recent weeks.

I admit that the minister, in his general preamble to this discussion a week ago tonight, was very optimistic in his generalizations. I would conclude from his remarks, to use a phrase that might appropriately be used by one who is an Indian chief as well as a minister of the crown, that he believes all the smoke that has been raised in this chamber is, "heap big smoke and no fire". However, the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, emphasized that agriculture was having a difficult time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is also an optimist, made the announcement of the final payments for western grain and said he was disappointed in the final price which was the result of strong competitive factors in the export market, particularly competition arising from the United States surplus disposal program. There is, therefore, definitely some cause for alarm on the part of those who are vitally interested in the prairie agricultural economy.

The current review of agricultural conditions for Canada gives the farm net income for Canada by provinces for 1953 and 1954. I was interested to note that every province with the exception of the four western provinces pretty well maintained its net income position as between 1953 and 1954. On the other hand, Manitoba net income for 1953 was $110·6 million and for 1954 was $72·5 million, a percentage change of minus 34. The percentage change for those two years in Saskatchewan was minus 73, and the percentage change in Alberta was minus 42. I put that on the record, Mr. Chairman, merely to suggest that things are not too rosy in the prairie agricultural picture at least.

This fact was verified—

Mr. Gardiner: May I suggest that that verifies every statement I have made here in the last six months.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not quite understand that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gardiner: Every time I have spoken on this question I have pointed out that the reduction in farm income in 1954 was brought about by what happened in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. Dinsdale: I get the point.

Mr. Charlton: Not altogether.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am speaking largely from the viewpoint of the westerner, and therefore I stressed the prairie position.

Mr. Gardiner: I do, too.

Mr. Charlton: That is obvious.

Mr. Dinsdale: The appearance of the interprovincial farm union before the committee again indicated that they were very unhappy with the prairie agriculture position. I was most interested in one statement on page 4 of their brief to this effect:

> For many years Canadian farmers advocated complete free trade, and if given that offered to produce in competition with all the world. This offer was spurned by Canadian industry which insisted on protection. Since that is now the accepted policy of Canada, we contend that Canadian farmers are entitled to equivalent benefits in some effective form.

I stress that phrase, "since that is now the accepted policy of Canada". I think that is the first time I have ever seen any western farm group appreciate the fact that the free trade propaganda that has been promulgated by a Liberal administration at Ottawa during the past two decades is a myth. They are now aware that Canada has a protectionist economy which favours the industrial provinces of central Canada. I think that is most significant. So far as I am concerned, it is the first time I have seen that expression of opinion from a prairie farm group.

The farmers' union opinion, as I understand it, is merely a new expression of the agricultural discontent that is peculiar to the prairies, and has been peculiar to the prairies ever since the early part of this century. It is the old agrarian protest raising its head again, a protest that has had such dramatic effect on Canadian social, political and economic life. But it is expressing itself in a somewhat different form this time, and definitely demonstrates that it has seen through the myth of the so-called Liberal free trade.

I have not much time left, but I want to say that the one observation that kept coming to my mind as I listened to the proceedings in the agriculture committee was this: After 20 years of continuous Liberal administration in Ottawa the prairie economy is still in a vulnerable position. We are still beset by the crisis of price and market, and this has been eloquently demonstrated in the remarks made by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the various groups before the agriculture committee. In fact, if it were not for the existence of the wheat board the situation would be much more difficult than it actually is. If I might be allowed to say so, Mr. Chairman, I would remind hon. members that the Canadian wheat board principle was laid down by a Conservative administration in 1935. There are many historical references in this chamber from time to time, and I am amazed at the tendency in all parts of the house towards the distortion of history.

I am reminded of a criticism that was once directed at Hitler and his henchmen when they were playing with history a few years ago in the greater Reich. Someone dared to criticize that gentleman to the effect that in the long run history would catch up with him; history would tell the true story. Hitler replied that he did not have the slightest misgiving in that regard because they would be writing history. I am afraid it is the tendency for all politicians to write history according to their own lights. I merely indicate that the wheat board principle, which emerged as a result of the economic crises of the thirties, was a by-product of a Conservative administration.

I would like to emphasize further, Mr. Chairman—because this point was discussed to a certain extent this afternoon—that, in turn, the depression of the thirties was a by-product of a century that had been saturated by what economists call Liberal laissez-faire economics. It was Mr. Bennett, with his new deal, and with his central bank principle, that first put a halt to the rather illusory and fanciful principles underlying Liberal laissez-faire economics which had dominated the western world ever since the industrial revolution.

I think that fact should be placed on the record, because sometimes even opposition groups are taken in by distortions of history, emanating from government sources. Just a short time ago the hon. member for Peace River, referring to the same period, suggested that Mr. Bennett had done nothing during the thirties to solve the problem. This is what he said, as it is reported at page 3986 of Hansard for May 20:

> Every time anybody said to the Conservative government, "Why don't you get some purchasing power in circulation to start the wheels of industry going again?" the answer he got was, "There is not any money." They kept on saying that all through their regime up to 1935 when they were pitched out by the people of Canada largely because they had not found a solution or begun to find a solution for the unemployment problem.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope the hon. member will not continue to read into this debate the record of another debate on a different subject. I am sure he will agree with me when I suggest that if we are going to go into matters of history, other than those connected with agriculture, we will be a very long time disposing of the estimates of this department. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the estimates of this department.

Mr. Dinsdale: I accept your gentle reprimand, Mr. Chairman, and shall conclude by saying that the significant and shocking fact that emerges from the recent discussion of agricultural problems is the fact that we in the west are just as vulnerable, just as unstable and just as economically immature as we were 20 years ago when a Liberal administration first took over. We will have these problems with us, and we will be wrestling with them until such time as we are able to establish a diversified and mature economy, not only in the two central provinces but right across the country. And I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that is the alternative the Conservative opposition has been offering for several years now—the development of national resources, both human and natural, so that we might deal with the basic and fundamental difficulties of the western economy.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, we in this group are not only concerned, but we are disappointed that at this session of parliament the government has failed to appreciate the very serious decline in Canada's agricultural position. We feel that at this session the government should have introduced some comprehensive farm program that would have placed agriculture back on a sound economic base.

In order to do this we believe that the new program should take into consideration a completely new approach to the problems agriculture is now facing. We believe that is necessary, if agriculture is going to make that contribution to the Canadian prosperity of which it is capable. And so it is because of these things I rise this evening to speak in criticism of the present agricultural policy the government is pursuing and has pursued in the past.

Certainly it is not my intention to place once again on the pages of Hansard the many arguments that have proved our contention that agriculture is in a difficult position. That has been done on numerous occasions, and was done again very well this afternoon by the hon. member for Mackenzie. However, in spite of the fact that many members on the opposition side of the house try to set out the problem faced by this industry in Canada, during the budget debate the Minister of Finance pointed out that in 1954 Canada's gross national product had fallen to the extent of some $400 million, and that in large measure, as a matter of fact to the extent of three-quarters, that drop was due to the fall in the income of farmers. On that admission therefore we can safely say that agriculture does play a tremendous part in the economy of the country.

It would be equally difficult to argue that the economic recession we see all across this country is not largely attributable to the very serious position in which agriculture finds itself today. Certainly the great measure of unemployment experienced throughout the country can be traced to the very unfavourable position of agriculture. That unemployment to a great extent has come about through lack of operations in the farm machinery industry, an industry which must be associated with agriculture; and the condition of that industry is due to the lack of purchasing power in the hands of Canadian agricultural producers.

Surely this condition has many repercussions. Figures from the dominion bureau of statistics show that in the last six months there has been a decline in retail sales in this country to the extent of $129 million. Businessmen throughout the country are holding meetings among themselves to try to devise some method whereby they will be able to continue in a liquid position, and still be able to supply in some measure the goods and services required by the agricultural producers. I am sure these men, not only in western Canada but in all parts of the country, have come to realize that we cannot let the farmer slide down the economic rat hole without its having very disastrous results on their own businesses. No wonder these businessmen are worried. When we look at the economic picture in agriculture we find that, in spite of the fact that we have experienced at least 10 years of good crops and high production, the agricultural policy being pursued by the government must stand condemned. In spite of this tremendous production in Canada farmers are experiencing a serious decline in purchasing power. I think it is a rather different situation. The farmers of western Canada have experienced five normal crops in so far as production is concerned in three years. It does not seem reasonable to me, when a condition like that has existed and one crop failure follows, that the farmer should find himself in a most embarrassing economic position. I think that there must be something wrong with the agricultural industry of this country when it is not able to survive one crop failure after having harvested five normal crops in the three years previous.

This afternoon the hon. member for Acadia spoke in support of crop insurance. Apparently he has given a great deal of study to this matter because he spoke at length and in detail. It is not my intention to discredit anything he said, as I think this is a question that needs considerable study. Personally I have reservations as to the merits of a comprehensive crop insurance plan that will do the job.

I believe that subsidies of any kind are not going to provide an answer to the agricultural program. I believe that agriculture, like any other industry, should stand on its own feet. I believe it could do that and we would be able to eliminate many of the subsidies now being paid, and which are not doing the job, if we had an agricultural program that gave the farmer a return that had some relationship to his cost of production.

The average net income of Canadian farmers is in the neighbourhood of $2,000 per year. Agricultural producers feel that they should have an income not less than that of workers in non-agricultural industries. As I mentioned before, when we say that, we do not mean that the non-agricultural workers should get less, but we do contend that the agricultural workers should get more.

With the average income of Canadian farmers being in the neighbourhood of $2,000, that means that a great many farmers in this country are getting less than $2,000. I submit that that is rural poverty with a vengeance. We contend that agriculture should get its fair share of the national income. I am aware that arguments are made that that can never happen. We are told that agriculture must become more efficient; that you cannot expect the national income to be shared among farmers who are not efficient. I agree with that to some extent, but I think this talk of inefficiency in agriculture is overdone. I believe that this talk of efficiency in industry is overdone. I doubt very much if industry is as efficient as we are led to believe. So I do not think we should take that kind of argument into consideration when we ask that the farmer get a fair share of the national income.

This afternoon the hon. member for Mackenzie placed on the record the fact that while some 14 per cent of the people of Canada are engaged actively in agriculture they get only about 8·7 per cent of the national income. The farmer's position has deteriorated over the last 20 years and it has deteriorated very quickly over the last three years.

I should like to place on the record one set of figures to substantiate my argument that last year the farm net income declined by 30 per cent according to the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics. In 1953 net farm income in this country was $1,669,600,000, yet in 1954 that net farm income had declined to $1,125,600,000. In all probability it will be even lower this year. During the last three years the net farm income of agricultural producers has fallen by 50 per cent but on the other hand operating costs have remained constant or have declined only slightly. As a matter of fact in 1954 they declined by only 2 per cent. For the three-year period to which I just referred in which farm net income declined by 50 per cent the cost of production dropped by only 5 per cent.

I think it is common knowledge that when farm production in respect to grain and livestock falls by as little as 5 per cent, farm prices fall by as much as 20, 30 or 40 per cent. Again, when the demand for some particular farm product drops off by 5 per cent farm prices fall, not by 5 per cent but by 10, 20 or 25 per cent.

This price squeeze, this disparity between the prices received by the farmers for what they produce and the cost of production, bears no relationship. This is the thing which is causing great concern today to the industry. There is no relationship between the prices the farmer gets and costs involved in his production. Under the present economic setup today agricultural producers are trying to operate when their costs are administered. Not only is the farmer open to all the hazards of farming, he must deal with things beyond his control outside of these administered costs. He seems to be legitimate prey for everyone.

As someone has said before, and I think this is significant, the farmer is the only person who sells at wholesale and buys at retail. As was said by an hon. member this afternoon, farm prices have changed most radically over the last 25 years. Mechanization is costly and because of the tremendous mechanization that is taking place in agriculture the farmer must have a greater return to support it.

The government is concerned over surplus production of wheat and many people in the government are advocating that production should be cut in the hope that prices will be maintained. I admit that that is a policy which can be carried on most effectively in industry where you can maintain prices by cutting production, but the very opposite is true with respect to agriculture. As soon as prices fall, the agricultural producer, in order to maintain his income, increases his production. That has been the story in Canada over and over again. We believe that the time is overdue when we must have some new approach, if we are going to solve this problem with which we are faced. As I said a moment ago, I believe it is impossible to hope that subsidies are going to do the job; I do not believe they will. Subsidies should not have to be used. I believe that, if there were some relationship between farmers' prices and their costs, we would not need many of the subsidies which we are using today; but until that happens we have no alternative but to continue to ask for subsidies and to expand them.

In connection with this question, I should like to ask the minister something concerning P.F.A.A. Certainly I do not look on that as a subsidy in the same way as I did the other matters I mentioned, but it is rather unfair that, in certain parts of the country where farmers had a crop failure last year and have no prospect of a crop this year, they are being denied P.F.A.A. payments because they are forced to take some part-time employment in order to keep their families. I hope some leniency will be shown in some of those cases. I can very well understand the overall policy and I see nothing wrong with it, because we all know that a great many people living in every town in Canada own land. Certainly sometimes it is only a part-time occupation, but I feel that, because of the crop failure that was experienced in most of western Canada last year, where a farmer went out in the winter months and took part-time work, even when he knew he was not going to harvest a crop, some consideration should be given in those cases.

We believe that, if we are to evolve a farm production that will do the job, it should be based on the parity concept where we would have some relationship between prices and costs. In advocating such a policy, we believe we are completely justified. This is nothing new. I will admit that the Americans are in trouble to some extent in some phases of their parity scheme, but in the main much of that could have been avoided if some different administration had been used in that policy. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other important farming bodies of this country are supporting the principle of parity. Whilst the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is advocating a sliding scale, I cannot accept that. Parity means equality; it means justice; and if anybody can tell me that there is such a thing as 70 or 75 per cent of justice, then I have something to learn. You cannot have 75 per cent of justice. You either have full justice or you do not have any justice. So I maintain that we in this country must advocate full parity. When I say "full parity", I do not mean full parity on everything across the board. I do not think that is necessary; I think it would be disastrous. I do not mean that at all. We should establish a system of parity prices. We should establish the principle of parity. I cannot think of any other industry or any other business in this country that operates on any other basis than that they have some regard for what the product is going to cost them. If they do not take that into consideration, they are just not in business. Yet the farmer goes on year after year in the hope that he will get back the cost of his production, and he very seldom has. We believe that agriculture is important enough in Canada's economy to warrant our asking that it should receive the same consideration as that enjoyed by every other industry in this country.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the house and the minister that I have no intention of delaying him. I understand that the Saskatchewan concert meeting down town is waiting for the highlight of the evening, that is for the Minister of Agriculture to open the meeting. Judging from the rate at which we are going now, he will not get there in time to pronounce the benediction. I wish to deal tonight with one point in particular, and that is the price support on butter. I am strongly in favour of all sound price support schemes. When I think of all the price support schemes we have had in Canada so far, I believe the price support on butter is the soundest. For one thing, as a city man, I am strongly in favour of maintaining the farmer's income by any reasonable and sound method; and I believe this is a sound method.

But I want to point out that there are two sides to a pound of butter. If you have price supports which keep the income from butter high enough to enable the farmer to make a living, perhaps at times you make the price of butter so high that some people who should be able to eat butter cannot afford to eat butter at all and have to eat that unspeakably poor substitute for butter, namely margarine, which I am sure is having a lot to do with the bad health of some of the people because it does not have the vitamins in it.

I for one do not believe there is any solution to the butter surplus problem, if it is a problem, by foreign give-away programs or by trying to dump the butter which we have over and above our own needs for the domestic market. I for one would not even favour selling the butter at cut rates behind the iron curtain, as I have heard some people suggest from time to time. I should think that the only thing the Canadian people would not forgive with regard to a price support program would be this, that in our price support program we accumulated surpluses from which no human being got any benefit. I should think that, if we are trying to get a good sound farm support system, we must be sure that we have no stagnating surpluses, and we must be sure that the butter which enjoys the price support gets to the ultimate consumer. With all respect, I should like to make this suggestion for the consideration of the minister and the consideration of the government. If it should turn out that we have an accumulating surplus, I should like to see careful consideration given to the issuing of coupons to people in a certain amount of need, especially to people on old age assistance in Canada and on war veterans allowance in Canada. These coupons could be issued on a monthly basis.

Last year I had the duty and privilege of looking over the family budgets of a good many hundreds and perhaps even thousands of people living on old age assistance or old age pensions, and I was appalled to learn, after they had their budgets figured to the last cent, how few of these people were able to afford butter. They did not have enough fats; they did not even have enough margarine.

I would suggest to the minister and to the government, with all respect, that if they are considering disposing of the surplus, they do not try to dispose of it behind the iron curtain, that they do not try to dispose of the surplus in Asia, that they do not try to dispose of the surplus in Europe but that they do dispose of the surplus, if and when it occurs, to our own people and on the basis of those who need it most. We could try it out in a most moderate way by experimenting with the group on old age assistance; I refer to the people living on old age pensions with a means test from 65 years of age to 69. If that experiment proves to be sound,—and by that I mean if it is proved that it does not demoralize the regular market for butter; and indeed that is the real test, for whatever we do, it should not take away the profitable sale of butter through the regular channels—and if on a moderate and experimental basis it is proved that it can be done through old age assistance groups, I cannot see any reason why there should not be tried as an experiment, maybe once a year, the issuing of a cheap pound of butter or even a free pound of butter to everybody drawing family allowance, one for every child.

Mr. Trainor: I was interested and, I must confess, to a degree gratified by the remarks made by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa this afternoon when he said he advocated the amelioration of the flood conditions on the Assiniboine river. I can recall that no longer ago than last summer I had the honour of attending, with the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa and the hon. member for St. Boniface, a meeting with a number of farmers from the Assiniboine river area. At that time the hon. member indicated to that group that he did not consider the flood conditions along the Assiniboine river to be sufficiently grave to justify federal intervention. Consequently I am gratified that the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa has changed his opinion in this regard.

As a matter of fact, this situation along the Assiniboine river has been a real problem to farmers in this locality because, as the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa has pointed out, this river has been in an almost perennial flood condition. It is a fact that in the year 1950 the city of Winnipeg had a narrow escape from total catastrophe owing to the fact that the Assiniboine river did not coincide completely with the Red river in the matter of flood conditions. Had the two coincided, the city of Winnipeg would have been inundated completely and would have been under approximately three feet to four feet of water. I suggest that this would be a situation that would be completely catastrophic.

In his remarks subsequent to those of the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa, the minister indicated that this is a situation that deserves a great deal of special consideration on the ground that amelioration would be extremely costly. I would suggest that the cost would be not considerable in comparison with the cost to the country, and particularly the cost to the Winnipeg area, of a catastrophe such as that which I have outlined.

Mr. Gardiner: If I gave that impression, I gave a wrong impression in what I said. My suggestion was that we have only $3½ million a year with which to do all our P.F.R.A. work and that we could not take $6 million, $7 million or $8 million out of it in order to build this dam. I said that what we would have to consider was the possibility of doing it under the larger projects scheme, which is not P.F.R.A. For this larger projects scheme $7 million or $8 million is voted each year.

Mr. Trainor: I agree with the minister in this respect. I would suggest that he devote every effort to obtaining that extra appropriation that is required, because it is definitely required and it is certainly justified by the facts of the situation. Here we have a situation of which we had a foretaste in 1950. Those of us who experienced that foretaste have a healthy appreciation of what the situation might have been had the Assiniboine coincided with the Red river in flood. We know beyond any shadow of doubt what that situation would have been.

I would suggest to the minister that if he can do anything to protect us and to put into force measures that will give protection against the possibility of such a situation developing in the future, it would be a laudable effort on his part. I hope that he will do so. I believe that the possible economic results of such a catastrophe would be far beyond any possible economic outlay to which the government might be subjected.

The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa gave what I thought was an excellent outline of the facts of the case. I thought he indicated logically the facts of the Assiniboine river and put them forward in a sensible sort of way. One point that he perhaps did not bring forward sufficiently clearly was that this is not an unusual situation but that it is virtually perennial. I can recall that in years gone by, in the vicinity of Poplar Point, almost perennial flood conditions have existed along the Assiniboine river. As was indicated by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa, the farm lands that are threatened by these floods are among the best farm lands in western Canada. Certainly the economic loss that has accrued to these farmers over the years must have been severe. Perhaps that economic loss in the aggregate would amount to far more than the economic investment that might be required to prevent such a situation occurring.

I would therefore urge the minister to do everything in his power to see that the resources of the government are brought to bear to ensure that this Assiniboine river is harnessed as far as flood conditions are concerned. Perhaps, in the harnessing of it, it might be found that the periodic drought that occurs along the western plains in the basin of the Assiniboine river might be contemporaneously ameliorated.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I make no apologies for taking the time of the house to say a few words on behalf of the farmers of my constituency. I want to say at this point that the few lonely trumpets that are blown on behalf of the fruit growers of British Columbia do not pretend in any sense of the word to compete with the very effective 35-piece brass band from the prairies. I happen to represent a lot of small general farmers, fruit farmers, dairy producers and poultry farmers, the type of farmer whose battle with nature has been a somewhat different kind than that of the farmers of the prairie provinces. While prairie farmers have certain climatic hazards and possibly climatic disadvantages on occasions, the farmers I represent have to work 12 months a year and slave from morning until night on the whole in order to make a living on farms that have been wrested from the forests surrounding them. Therefore I am sure the minister will pay very careful attention to my representations.

Mr. Gardiner: As long as you do not think we do not work on the prairies.

Mr. Herridge: I am suggesting there is a difference in the type of work. I had to place the thing somewhat in focus in order to get the minister to appreciate the peculiar difficulties of the farmers I represent. When the minister spoke I was very interested that he repeatedly dealt with the representations made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I was most interested in that because it indicates the growing impact of farm organizations on the government and on public opinion in general. Because of that I cannot fail to mention the fact that the British Columbia federation of agriculture was first organized in 1933 by Mr. Charlie Hayden, Mr. Dodsley Barrow, a former minister of agriculture of the province to whom British Columbia owes a great deal, Mr. Clarence Oldfield and others in the interior of British Columbia. They have done some excellent work throughout the years.

The British Columbia federation is supported by the British Columbia fruit growers association, the Fraser Valley milk producers, the fruit and vegetable producers and the Vancouver island farmers in general. I think they led Canada in advocating the necessity for marketing legislation for the improvement of co-operative marketing, in respect of such things as getting the carbon content of fence wire improved so that the tensile strength of fencing is sufficient, and in arranging for marketing conferences on a provincial basis something along the lines of the federal conferences. They have been interested in getting the federal government to use live vaccine in connection with Newcastle disease. They have been very interested in conservation, taxation and agricultural policies, and all those things that are in the best interests of the farmers in general.

They have also shown a very forward looking approach by the fact that they were the first organization in British Columbia to make representations to the provincial government, which they did in 1950, urging that the water resources of the Columbia river be carefully preserved to the advantage of Canadian interests and that any deals made with the United States should be on the basis of payment in full in the form of power. I mention these few things because I was active in the early days in the formation of the British Columbia federation of agriculture, and know of its good work.

That organization was the parent organization of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture because in 1935 the late Major Hutton, who came from the interior of British Columbia, went to the Royal Winter Fair at Toronto and at that fair the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was organized. I am very pleased to know that the organization is so well thought of at this time.

I want to pay tribute to the good work that has been done by the members of the federation in British Columbia throughout the years and to the good work being done by the present officers of the federation because, while they work without the publicity of other organizations, the work that is done by the farmers' organization has a tremendous effect on agricultural legislation both provincially and federally. It is true to say that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was conceived in the interior of British Columbia. Second, it is true to say that the first natural products marketing act established anywhere in Canada was the result of the organization and the activities of the British Columbia fruit growers association. I mention these things to indicate the progressive and constructive approach that the agricultural organizations in the interior of British Columbia and in British Columbia generally have had throughout the years.

The marketing situation in British Columbia has changed considerably in recent years. Prior to the second world war about half the apples grown in British Columbia were marketed in Great Britain. During the second world war thousands of pounds of vegetable seeds such as onions, carrots, beets, lettuce and so on were grown in the southeastern portion of British Columbia particularly and shipped to Great Britain and some other countries. Owing to the shortage of dollars in Great Britain these markets have largely been lost, although we are glad to know there is a slight resumption in the sale of fruit to the British market.

But while these overseas markets have been lost to a considerable extent we are fortunate, owing to the 40 per cent increase in population in British Columbia and the great industrial expansion, that the domestic market in British Columbia has increased considerably and has to some extent offset the loss of the export market in some phases of agriculture. I think it is fair to say that the farmers I represent are doing all they can to produce high quality produce at a reasonable cost. An increasing number of them are making effective use of labour saving equipment, fertilizers, irrigation and agricultural chemicals. They are also doing what they can as the result of building up efficient co-operative organizations which have a history of good management throughout the years. The farmers I represent and those in British Columbia generally are first of all producing as efficiently as any farmers in Canada, and possibly lead the rest of Canada in the building up of well-managed co-operative organizations to market their produce, particularly through British Columbia Tree Fruits Limited, the interior and coast vegetable marketing boards, the Kootenay co-operative poultry producers, similar organizations representing poultrymen at the coast, and the beef cattle producers.

I say that to indicate that the farmers have not sat back idle but have tried to help themselves as far as possible. They have done the best they can. They have used all facilities available, their energy, capacity, experience and intelligence, to organize some of the best co-operative marketing organizations in Canada at this time. However, regardless of that they are faced at the present time with a problem of increasing costs and falling prices, the same as other farmers in Canada. That means they are facing a very difficult period particularly in certain sections of agriculture.

I am not going to deal at length with that matter, but they need a measure of government action, both on the provincial and federal levels, to assure them the security they are entitled to as a result of the efforts they have made on their own behalf. I think we need adequate provincial and federal marketing legislation which will enable them to develop broad marketing of their own products on a national scale. I think they need a program of price supports which, on general principle, will be available to all farm products if necessary.

I am not going to say any more about the question of floor prices or price supports because other speakers have dealt very fully with that question and have gone into it in detail. I would simply be taking the time of the house by repeating what these speakers have had to say. But I do believe there is a great necessity for an over-all policy of floor prices and price supports to give the farmer the basic security to which he is entitled as a result of helping himself to the fullest extent possible.

Then, we need a national agency with full authority to administer an over-all program of price support under specific terms of reference established by legislation. In addition to that, particularly in British Columbia, the fruit industry is of the opinion that provision must be made for establishing whatever import controls may become necessary in connection with administration of price support. These should be of a regional or seasonal nature wherever appropriate. Now, that is all I am going to say with respect to marketing in general.

I want to deal with another question for a few minutes because it is of particular interest to a number of producers that I have the honour to represent. In spite of the growing advances in agriculture in British Columbia there is an urgent need for additional research and extension work designed to promote the production of heavy yields of high quality produce at low cost without impoverishing our soils. It is very necessary in our district because we have very different conditions from those existing on the prairies. We have such changed circumstances, even with climate, within a few miles and our soils vary a great deal even from mile to mile. Generally speaking, many of our soils on which fruit is grown are what is known as benchlands, and are the lighter type of soils which can very quickly be impoverished by poor agricultural practices.

I want to take a minute to draw the minister's attention to a resolution or two passed by the British Columbia fruit growers association in convention on January 18, 19 and 20 of this year at Kelowna. I want to use these two illustrations as an indication of the interest of the farmers of interior British Columbia in an extension of certain research work. One resolution was adopted unanimously at the convention with respect to research in dwarf and semi-dwarf apple tree stocks. The resolution reads as follows, and I am going to place it on the record because it is an important resolution from our point of view:

> Whereas many apple plantings in the Okanagan and Kootenays are 30 years of age and older, and
> Whereas in the near future considerable replanting will have to be undertaken to replace those trees which are no longer economical producers as well as those producing unmarketable varieties, and
> Whereas it is becoming increasingly evident that the pruning, thinning, picking and spraying of standard type trees are both time and material consuming to such an extent that the profit from fruit growing is diminishing even in years of good crops and prices, and
> Whereas growers are becoming increasingly interested in dwarf and semi-dwarf stocks such as those from East Malling,
> Therefore be it resolved that this B.C.F.G.A. convention petition the experimental station to place greater emphasis on the propagation and planting of dwarfing stocks in order to find out whether any of our present marketable varieties are incompatible with certain root stocks, and to find the stocks best suited to widely different soil conditions of this area.

[Mr. Herridge.]

The area concerned is the Okanagan and the Kootenays. There is no reflection on the staff of the experimental station at Summerland which has done excellent work throughout the years. The resolution merely indicates that the staff must have sufficient funds to carry on that type of research. I want particularly to draw the minister's attention to the fact that it is necessary in view of the large replacement of older trees which will be taking place in the Okanagan and Kootenay valleys from now on at an increasing rate.

I now deal with another resolution adopted in connection with research because it is of particular interest to the Kootenay district. This is the resolution in connection with little cherry disease. I know the minister's officials have been carrying on research for some years, but it is a serious problem and has caused great loss to some growers. There is a feeling that more extensive research should be carried on in this connection. The resolution adopted by the convention in this regard was:

> Whereas development and research work on Kootenay little cherry disease has been carried on for the past eight or more years and while considerable knowledge of this disease has been obtained no solution seems to have been reached in regard to control or eradication nor have varieties been found that are resistant, and
> Whereas little cherry disease is becoming an increasingly serious problem each year in the Kootenays and has now appeared in the Wenatchee area south of the international border,
> Therefore, be it resolved that this 1955 B.C.F.G.A. convention ask the federal and provincial departments of agriculture to greatly increase the work being done on the little cherry disease and that the ministers of agriculture of both the federal and provincial governments be asked to see that adequate funds are made available for this work.

I am particularly interested in this, Mr. Chairman, because in the Kootenays we have the climate and soil, as well as conditions in general, to produce the finest cherries that can be produced anywhere in Canada. I think that is recognized, particularly so far as Bings, Lamberts and some of the other later varieties are concerned. A number of our cherry growers have suffered severely from little cherry disease, and it is a great impediment to them and the district. Until the disease is conquered the development of the cherry industry in the Kootenays particularly will be retarded because people are somewhat sceptical of putting in new plantings. It is a very important part of our agricultural development in the Kootenay area, so I support in full the representations of the B.C.F.G.A. and ask for further funds for extended research work in this very necessary field.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have another resolution or two passed at the convention, and I want to deal with one about fruit reaching the market in the best condition, which is a very important thing. This resolution was adopted in that respect:

Whereas it is of the utmost importance that fruit reach the market in the best possible condition, and

Whereas the least bruising will be effected in those railway cars carried nearest the engine,

Therefore be it resolved by this 1955 B.C.F.G.A. convention that all cars of fruit carried by railways be spotted next to the engine.

I mention that to indicate how much consideration they have to give to the handling of fruit by rail transportation. I give credit to the transportation companies and to the officials of the department, both federal and provincial, for the great progress that has been made in recent years in the provision of fast, efficient freight service for the delivery of fruit from the Okanagan and the Kootenay valleys to prairie and other points. I mention this resolution to indicate that there is still room for improvement in this connection.

I want to bring to the minister's attention the question of the shipment of cherries, peaches, apricots and certain soft fruits from the Arrow lakes north to Revelstoke on the main line where that freight is often loaded into fast freight trains which proceed to prairie points. The fruit comes up the Arrow lakes by steamer. It is fairly cool and it is taken care of there. A steamer moving on a large lake provides certain air ventilation and coolness that prevents any deterioration of the fruit. In recent years when it reaches Arrowhead it has been unloaded from this steamer on hot days—and cherries are very susceptible to the heat—and loaded onto the dock at Arrowhead. From there it is loaded into baggage or freight cars and put into the yards at Arrowhead and left there for some time, often in the very strong sun. These cars are then hooked onto a mixed train whose average speed is about 15 miles an hour. Consequently, these fruits are sometimes subjected to very high temperatures for several hours, before reaching Revelstoke. As a result, when they reach the market, sometimes in the case of cherries, they show some development of plum rot or some development of mildew and defects of that sort.

I do urge the minister's officials responsible to do what they can to see that these smaller collecting points get as good service as possible from the railways. Possibly if there were more people living in that area, and the volume of fruit were greater, they would receive more consideration. The points of which I am thinking would not ship more than 25 or 35 carloads in a season, but those 25 or 35 carloads are very important to the people concerned.

In the fruit industry of British Columbia in recent years there has been devised a very efficient system of advising growers when to spray—that is, when the trees are in a proper condition, the dormant, the pink blossom, and at other stages. Then there is also an efficient method of advising fruit growers when to pick certain varieties and have them transported to certain points to meet marketing requirements.

This is being done by radio. At the last convention of the British Columbia fruit growers association the matter was discussed, and the following resolution was adopted:

Therefore, be it resolved by this 1955 B.C.F.G.A. convention that the executive of the B.C.F.G.A. make every effort to have this broadcast included in the program of the C.B.C. booster stations at Oliver and Osoyoos.

I would add the booster stations at Creston and Castlegar, and one or two other points. It is also a very necessary and a very worthwhile service to the fruit growers living away from the main lines of transportation. It is useful to them to receive instructions when to spray and pick.

In connection with the question of booster stations I would point out to the minister that the farmers in west Kootenay district are anxious to listen to Canadian radio programs in general. I do hope he will urge the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to erect another two or three booster stations for general service of the farmers in the area I represent.

I see I have only a moment or two left before the hour mentioned for adjournment. I wish to support the remarks of previous speakers with respect to the good effect the price support on butter has had in this country, so far as the dairymen are concerned. I hope the government will continue this policy.

On behalf of the farmers I represent, may I voice my protest against reductions in freight assistance. I have mentioned this on two other occasions, but I feel I should not let this opportunity pass without mentioning it again. It has created considerable hardship to the dairymen and poultrymen particularly in my district.

I see we have almost reached the suggested hour of adjournment, and I shall conclude my remarks at this point in the hope, as usual, that the minister will give serious consideration to the representations I have made.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sinclair moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is one slight change in the order of business announced by the Minister of Finance last night. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will not be here on Monday afternoon, so that his bill, No. 3, goes to the bottom of the list.

First there will be item No. 1 on the order paper, which is Bill No. 5; the second is item No. 11, a resolution; the third is item No. 12, another C.N.R. resolution; the fourth is item 14, a resolution concerning fishermen's loans; fifth is item No. 10, the second reading of a bill amending the Prisons and Reformatories Act; sixth is item No. 13, an act respecting the boundary between Alberta and British Columbia. Item 7 will be next, a bill concerning the Defence Production Act. Then, last, will be Bill No. 3 respecting international river improvements.

That is the program for Monday and Tuesday.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 6, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake) presented the third report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Thirteenth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

TRADE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROTEST AGAINST UNITED STATES TARIFF ON HARDBOARD

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform hon. members that an official note was delivered to the United States government on June 1 on the subject of the United States tariff on a product of the pulp and paper industry which is known as hardboard.

Last week the Canadian ambassador in Washington made various official calls to express the concern felt here about a bill now before congress which would increase the duties on hardboard.

The text of the Canadian government's note is as follows:

The Canadian government wishes to draw to the attention of the United States government the serious concern which is felt about a proposal to increase substantially the United States duty on imported hardboard. This proposal is understood to have been included by the Senate finance committee as a rider in a bill HR 5559, "to make permanent the existing privilege of free importation of gifts from members of the armed forces on duty abroad." The United States hardboard industry has recently been investigated by the United States tariff commission and the resulting report is not such as to support increased tariff protection. It is hoped, therefore, that strong efforts will be made, within the United States government, to defeat this present measure which would have damaging effects upon the trade of other countries, including Canada, and damaging repercussions upon the attitudes of other countries in their trade relations with the United States.

It will be recalled that the Canadian government made representations to the United States government in a note of July 19, 1954, on the previous occasion when this measure on hardboard was before congress. The Canadian government drew attention in that note to the fact that tariff paragraph 1413, under which hardboard is imported into the United States, was negotiated with Canada and is bound by trade agreement.

To make brief reference to the events which have ensued, on August 9, 1954, the Senate finance committee directed the United States tariff commission to make an investigation of the hardboard industry and of the import classification of hardboard. In its report the tariff commission dealt only with the technical question of the classification of hardboard and it found hardboard to be a distinctive article of commerce of sufficient importance to justify specific enumeration thereof in the tariff schedules. In the majority findings, it was made clear that the tariff commission had not been asked to investigate the rate of duty appropriate to hardboard nor did it make any recommendations regarding the tariff rates themselves. The minority findings went further to say that "no information which they obtained in the course of the commission's investigation, indicates a need for revising those rates at this time". In the statement of findings of the commission it was said "The domestic hardboard industry thus far has not invoked the escape clause procedure or otherwise claimed to be seriously injured or to be threatened with serious injury as a consequence of increased imports of hardboard".

In summary, while some support was given to the idea of a technical reclassification of the item of hardboard, there was no support whatsoever for increased duties, nor does a careful study of the report show any justification for increased duties.

Representatives of the Canadian industry affected went to Washington to appear at the hearings which were arranged by the tariff commission. The commission made exhaustive studies and took evidence representing different points of view. When the tariff commission report was published, the Canadian government felt this matter to have been disposed of after a fair and exhaustive study.

Hardboard manufacturers have evidently been expanding in the United States and doing well. According to the report, of 11 domestic plants producing hardboard in 1954, two of them commenced operation in 1954, two in 1953, one in 1952 and one in 1951. According to the figures of the tariff commission, almost half of the rated capacity of the industry in 1954 has been constructed since 1947. The tariff commission report indicated in addition that four or five hardboard mills were being planned at the time, with one actually under construction, and another to be started shortly.

With production and consumption rapidly increasing in the United States, and with imports still accounting for a very small percentage of domestic production, it is difficult to see any need for increased tariff protection. If this new rider, which has been attached to the bill, "to make permanent the existing privilege of free importation of gifts from members of the armed forces on duty abroad", were to become law, it would be quite contradictory to the spirit and intentions of the general agreement on tariffs and trade which governs trade relations between Canada and the United States.

The Canadian government has on several occasions made clear the concern which is felt about the widening scope of escape clause procedures in the United States. Moreover, in this case, action is being proposed which is entirely outside the procedures which have been established

U.S. Tariff on Hardboard

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the statement that has just been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce should give every member of the house cause for concern on more grounds than those which relate alone to the subject matter of his statement. He has told us that if this new proposal should become law it would be quite contradictory to the general provisions of GATT. He has told us further that the measure is unjustified under the circumstances and represents a widening scope in the exercise of the escape clauses which are provided. This is not the first time that the government has felt impelled to present statements to the government of the United States with regard to other direct breaches of the principle underlying GATT or borderline cases which might conceivably come to constitute breaches.

I think I should mention that on an earlier occasion during the present session the Minister of Trade and Commerce thought it was appropriate to read immediately to the house a statement which had been sent to the government of the United States with respect to certain proposed restrictions on the movement of oil from Canada. I think all hon. members will recall the extreme difficulty we encountered in finding out subsequently what the answer of the United States government had been. In fact, to this day we have not received detailed information as to the position taken by the government of the United States in response to that proposal. We did have, after repeated requests, a very general statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but we do not know yet what the answer of the United States was.

On other occasions the attention of the house has been drawn to breaches of GATT or acts that came close to breaches of the principles underlying GATT. In view of that situation, I hope that on this occasion it may also be indicated to the government of the United States that it would be helpful to the members of parliament of this country, to whom this statement has been read, to have a statement in reply which would inform us as to the response extended to the statement now presented to the government of the United States. If the government has as great concern as is indicated today about the tendency in the United States to extend the scope of the escape clauses, then I would think we have come very close to the time when it may be necessary for the government to propose a general review of the effect of the escape clauses, because Canada certainly should not be in the position of having interferences raised against our normal trade with the United States within the general principles of GATT and at the same time leave ourselves in the position where we are extending not only the opportunities that are afforded in principle but also the opportunities that are afforded by letter.

By all means let us hope that we may continue friendly relations with the United States; but at a time when we are interlocking our defence arrangements so closely with the United States and, in doing so, of necessity bringing our economies more closely together in certain respects, I do believe that on this occasion we should receive a written statement in reply, which the members of the house may have before them, as an answer to the communication which has just been read to us.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not wish to enter into a debate on this subject, Mr. Speaker, but I would say that in the case of the restriction on the importation of oil into the United States we received the best possible answer from the United States when that country eliminated the offending clause from its tariff bill. I think the best possible answer we could get to this brief would be the elimination of the amendment to the bill in question before the bill receives the approval of the President.

Mr. Drew: Again, without making a debate of it, I would remind the minister that the amending section which was proposed in regard to the limitation of the movement of oil from Canada to the United States was only removed in view of the fact they had made voluntary arrangements which they found satisfactory to achieve the same purpose.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Does this statement not show the difficulty that the President of the United States has in working for freer trade with a protective government?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not competent to answer that question, but I will say that the important fact is revealed that protests from Canada are taken seriously in the United States, and that in most cases the correction is made to legislation which we represent as being detrimental to the trade position of Canada.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a supplementary question? If we cannot get satisfaction with respect to these tariff matters could we not retaliate very effectively by imposing an export tax on newsprint and nickel?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What we could do is one thing, and what we think it is policy to do is another. I doubt if we will retaliate.

TRANSPORT ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO AGREED CHARGES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (for the Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 449, to amend the Transport Act.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The purpose of this bill is to implement the report of the royal commission on agreed charges.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

PRIVATE RADIO STATIONS—POLITICAL DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Have applications been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by any of the private radio stations in any part of Canada to permit the holding of a political conference or a dialogue between two or more persons on political subjects?
2. If so, which private stations have made such applications and what was the date and the nature of the decision in each case?

Mr. McCann:

1. Individual applications by private stations on such matters do not arise since it is a question of generally applied rules, which are currently the subject of consideration by the corporation in consultation with private stations and political parties.
2. See answer to No. 1.

UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY—OBSERVERS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Who were the Canadian observers at the general assembly of the United Nations in 1953 and 1954?
2. What was the amount of expenses incurred by this country for each of the Canadian observers?
3. In what proceedings have they taken part and what are the names of those who delivered speeches thereat?
4. To whom was the report of their observations transmitted?
5. Where may copies thereof be obtained?

Mr. Pearson:

Questions

3. The only observers associated with Canadian delegations to sessions of the general assembly have been members of parliament. They are nominated by their party leaders and are appointed by the government to give members of all parties represented in the House of Commons opportunities to obtain first-hand information of the problems and activities of the United Nations. Customarily the government invites nomination of four Liberal members as observers, two attending each half of the session of the assembly; two Progressive Conservative members, one attending each half of the session; one C.C.F. member to attend half the session and one Social Credit member to attend the other half. Observers are associated with the Canadian delegation and attend delegation meetings but unlike representatives and alternate representatives they have no responsibility for formulating or expressing Canadian policy. They are free to attend all committee meetings and plenary sessions, but are not permitted by the rules of procedure to participate in debates. Many observers become interested in specific subjects during the session and devote all their time to following proceedings in one committee. Others prefer to obtain a more general view by moving from committee to committee. Their programs are left to their own discretion.

4. Parliamentary observers are not required to submit reports of their observations to the government and the delegation does not report on their activities. Whether observers present reports to their respective party leaders is a matter for decision by those leaders.

5. See answer to No. 4 above.

FISHERIES PRICES SUPPORT BOARD

Mr. Robichaud:

1. What is the net cost of operations of the fisheries prices support board since its coming into effect in 1947?

2. What is the total cost of fish purchased by the board as from April 1, 1948 to March 31, 1955 in each of the following provinces: Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, prairie provinces?

3. What are the total proceeds from sales of fish purchased by the board in each of the above named provinces as from April 1, 1948 to March 31, 1955?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. Net cost of operations of the fisheries prices support board since its coming into effect in 1947: $4,141,575.37 to May 31, 1955.

2. The cost of fish purchased, excluding freight, storage, handling, and other charges, is: Newfoundland, $383,601.30; Nova Scotia, $298,222.69; New Brunswick, $529,083.87; Quebec, $164,263.62; prairie provinces, $474,498.03.

[Mr. Pearson.]

3. Total proceeds from sales of fish purchased by the board in Newfoundland, $35,605.76; Nova Scotia, $18,658.11; New Brunswick, $32,665.49; Quebec, $4,856.03; prairie provinces, $55,550.23.

PAYMENTS TO APPLE GROWERS, ETC.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. How much has the federal government paid by provinces, in each fiscal or calendar year, in the apple tree removal program?

2. How much has the federal government paid by provinces in each fiscal or calendar year, under the authority of the Agricultural Prices Support Act or otherwise, since 1945, to apple growers?

3. How much has the federal government paid out by provinces, in each fiscal or calendar year since the start of these payments, for feed grain freight assistance?

Mr. Gardiner:

1. The following gives the amount of apple tree removal payments by the federal government to Nova Scotia growers by fiscal year:

Fiscal Year	Amount
1942-43	$ 156,050
1943-44	107,370
1944-45	30,574
1945-46	33,766
1946-47	135,200
1948-49	1,500,000
1951-52	200,000

2. The following payments have been made by the federal government either as a net cost under the Agricultural Prices Support Act or by special grant of parliament to the apple growers of Nova Scotia and British Columbia since the 1945 crop year.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES, PROVIDE FOR JUDGE IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Judges Act to increase the salaries of judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Exchequer Court of Canada and the superior and county courts of the provinces; to increase the number of judges for the British Columbia court of appeal and the supreme court each by one; to provide for a judge for the territorial court of the Northwest Territories; and to provide certain adjustments as to pensions of judges and widows of judges.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY SENIOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the impression that has been left by a statement of a senior officer of the Royal Canadian Air Force last Thursday, will the Prime Minister consider the advisability of making a statement on behalf of the government in relation to the extraordinary statement that was contained in that speech last Thursday, that war is inevitable and that the western powers are anxious and willing that such an event should take place?

I believe that it would be highly desirable that the Prime Minister give a statement in relation to this, in view of the various comments that have been made by different officers associated with the general staff, and also comments that have appeared across Canada since that speech was made.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had a discussion of the matter this morning with the Minister of National Defence. He has prepared a statement which I have seen, and with which I am in full agreement. Perhaps he might now make it to the house.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to a number of questions that were addressed to me on Friday last, with regard to the speech to which the Leader of the Opposition has just referred, I might say that during the course of the week end I had an opportunity to inquire fully into the circumstances of the speech of Air Vice Marshal Plant, to which reference has been made.

It would appear, as hon. members will have noted from subsequent press comment, that Air Vice Marshal Plant's address was really cast in an entertaining and humorous vein and was so interpreted by almost all those who heard him speak.

Some of the remarks as quoted in the press the air vice marshal admits having made, but states that in the first reports they were removed from their context. Nevertheless, in any event they were in my opinion highly inappropriate as coming from a service officer. Notwithstanding the reportedly facetious nature of the air vice marshal's remarks, and in order to remove any doubts regarding the continuation of tri-service co-operation on policy matters, I have decided to accept the recommendation of the chief of the air staff that Air Vice Marshal Plant relinquish his present position as air member for technical services where, as well as being an adviser to the chief of the air staff, his duties include dealing with and serving on tri-service committees. He will take over the position of air officer commanding air materiel command of the Royal Canadian Air Force, a position which is not concerned with tri-service policy matters but which will utilize to the full his unquestioned ability and experience in the technical field. He will take over this command from Air Vice Marshal H. B. Godwin, who had already been selected for another appointment.

I am also preparing for issue to the chiefs of staff of the three services instructions governing future public statements by members of the armed forces.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the statement which has just been read by the Minister of National Defence does not deal with the points that I placed before the Prime Minister. There was nothing either entertaining or humorous in the statement that war is inevitable and that the western powers are anxious and willing that this should come. In no statement now made by the Minister of National Defence is there any reference to these statements. I can understand the problem raised by one member of the tripartite service committee making a statement which would be inconsistent with what was put forward by other members of the committee; but I believe that what is much more serious is the public impression conveyed by the senior officer on the planning staff in regard to the subject which is perhaps uppermost in people's minds, namely, the likelihood or unlikelihood of war. I think we must have regard to the fact that a statement was made that would be taken very seriously outside of Canada. I would ask the Prime Minister to deal with those statements.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the whole question has been dealt with in a very effective manner, and in a manner that will prevent the recurrence of any statements of that kind being made in any kind of a speech, whether it be intended to be serious or facetious. I think it is quite inappropriate for a high ranking officer to make, even in a speech not intended to be taken seriously, statements that could, if removed from their context, give the impression that was given by the first reports of the speech that was made last week.

I think it is indiscreet, even when one is attempting to speak as we sometimes do at the press gallery dinner, to make statements of that kind when they can be reported and when they can cause the kind of anxiety that has been caused by the report of this speech. I am sure it is appreciated by most officers that that is most unfortunate and the action being taken by the Minister of National Defence will be effective in bringing about a situation where there will be more care taken about the possible effects of what might be by some—and what I gather from subsequent reports was by most of those who were there—felt to have been a very amusing, witty speech. Some of the language in which it was reported would not be the language that a high-ranking military officer would use in making statements that were intended to be taken seriously.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the Minister of National Defence a supplementary question? Will the minister make a statement on government defence policy in the near future so that members of this house and senior officers of his department may be aware of the changes which must inevitably have been introduced to policy through the emergence of the nuclear bomb, which have been introduced since the last statement on government policy?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I may say that I expect that my estimates will be before the house very shortly and I shall be glad then to make a statement.

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FEDERAL AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister make a statement in respect to what action the federal government contemplates in connection with the two Saskatchewan government representations that the flooded areas in Saskatchewan be declared a national emergency?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to quarrel with the exact terms of the hon. member's question, but there had never been representations made that an area be declared an emergency. As a matter of fact, when matters occur which constitute a disaster of such proportions that this government recommend to parliament that assistance be extended to those who suffer from the disaster, it is not a declaration of a national emergency; it is a declaration of a catastrophe of such magnitude that it is felt that all the taxpayers of Canada would feel it was proper for them to make some contribution to relieving the situation. That matter is still under consideration, and when a decision has been arrived at the proper recommendation will be made to parliament.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Would the Prime Minister, in view of the emergency, give us some idea as to when the government will make such a decision?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government is considering the situation, and the government at this time does not regard a decision as urgent. The government is informed that the things that should be done at once are being done under the aegis of the provincial government, and what we will have to decide will be whether or not the situation requires a recommendation to parliament that funds—not the funds of the government, but funds of the whole body of the taxpayers of Canada—should be used to help alleviate the situation which has arisen. Of course, for those who are the sufferers it is serious. Even when there is only one sufferer from a disaster of importance, it is serious for him; but I read a very interesting forecast in the Globe and Mail this morning of what is apt to be the general situation throughout the province, and I hope—as I am sure the hon. member also hopes—that the forecast will be realized in the province at large.

[Later:]

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the right hon. Prime Minister in connection with the answer he has just now given to the hon. member for Moose Mountain? Does his answer apply with equal force to farmers in Manitoba who have suffered flood damage?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I read in press reports this morning that the Minister of Agriculture had stated that he was gathering information for the purpose of submitting a request to the federal government, but that request has not yet been submitted. Of course, the government's endeavour will be to treat Canadian citizens anywhere in the manner that was adopted when the government recommended that assistance be extended in connection with the Fraser river flood or the Red river flood.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF POWER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): On Friday last the Minister of Trade and Commerce undertook to give the house a statement concerning the plan for the construction of a nuclear power reactor by the dominion government in conjunction with Ontario hydro and Canadian General Electric Company. Could he give that information today?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in looking into this matter I find that I made a comprehensive statement on that subject on Thursday, March 24, to be found at pages 2329 and 2330 of Hansard. I may say that the announcement by the province of Ontario had to do with the location of the project. As the site is being purchased by the province and as the building and conventional part of the installation as well as the operation of the power plant is the responsibility of the province, it is considered that the province should take the lead in determining where the project will be located. The location suggested by the province has been found suitable by this government and the atomic plant will be built in the vicinity of the Des Joachims power installation on the Ottawa river.

Mr. Green: Could the minister tell the house the amount of money that will be expended by the dominion on that plant, and also whether there are any other nuclear power stations under contemplation at the moment?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall answer the last question first. This is a demonstration power station in which all power authorities throughout Canada, both public and private, have been asked to give their co-operation, and they are doing so as to design and structural detail. Participation in this project will be the government's contribution to the power industry, as far as the introduction of nuclear power is concerned. As I recall the arrangement, the government is doing the nuclear part of the installation only, aided by some financial contribution from the contractor. I believe our contribution lies between $7 million and $8 million, spread over a period.

Mr. Green: About half the total cost?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): About that.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

INCREASE IN AMOUNT THAT MAY BE EXPENDED ON MINISTERIAL AUTHORITY

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak for a moment in regard to the amendments that are proposed in the bill now before the house on third reading. One of the things I wanted to suggest on this occasion has been answered in part by the Prime Minister in his remarks of the last few minutes. The other day during the course of the discussion on P.F.R.A. in committee, as I recollect it, the Minister of Agriculture stated that diking and drainage of the areas in question did not come within the ambit of the P.F.R.A. as it now stands.

I feel that the Prime Minister's statement today will be regarded with considerable disappointment throughout the prairie provinces particularly in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I hope I did not misinterpret the viewpoint that he expressed, but inherent in his words was the indication that postponement of acceptance of national responsibility is now the attitude of the government. P.F.R.A., in any amendment at the present time, having regard to the serious conditions prevalent on the prairies, should include a power to meet the draining and diking that will be necessary in large areas in the provinces. The Prime Minister mentioned an article in this morning's Globe and Mail presenting a rather hopeful appearance as to the future in these areas, but I would point out once more that the best opinion in the prairie provinces is to the effect that 8,000 farmers, who operate one million and a half acres of land, will be unable to seed them this year. A thousand others farming two million acres can only partially sow the acreage in question.

Mr. St. Laurent: Would the hon. member permit me to say that I did not intend to give the impression that those whose lands were now under water would not remain seriously affected. The article to which I referred was one treating with the over-all situation in the province and suggesting that the conditions which had brought about the disaster where the land is still under water might have a beneficial effect for the economy of the whole province which would compensate for the losses. I was careful to add that that did not remedy the situation of the individual who suffered damage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister mentioned that each individual might consider the situation a disaster with relation to himself, but left the impression that in general, taking the areas in question affected, the whole area might not come within the purview of a disaster area. I had hoped that by this time a decision would have been made on this question and that parliament would have been given an opportunity to place in the hands of P.F.R.A. the responsibility to do the necessary ditching and diking to meet the situation as it is today and also the situation that would arise in the event of a recurrence in future years. Such a recurrence is certainly within the realm of possibility, because of the effects of years of drought and also of mechanization, both of which conditions have contributed to the problem of erosion with the consequent dangers that have become apparent this year. Under this measure I wanted to suggest that there be evolved a federal plan, in co-operation with the province, for draining and diking; for certainly, according to recent estimates that have been made, the immediate drainage needs will cost $4,643,000, something that cannot and should not be met by the province but rather should be met in a joint contribution with the federal authority assuming at least 75 per cent of the amount.

If I might, I should like to put forward one further suggestion. As a further means to meet that problem there should be made available direct federal relief to these farmers who have suffered permanent damage, in order to tide them over until fall. The situation is not an individual one in which the individual regards himself as being in the throes of a disaster but is in fact one of the most serious things that has happened to the western economy in several years.

Having said that, I wish to repeat once more our objection to increasing the authority of the minister from $10,000 to $15,000 on contracts under this act. We feel that, while the act should be extended to meet an increasing field of responsibility, nonetheless the power of the minister, under the circumstances to which reference was made the other day, should not be increased and that no harm or delay will result from the need of having contracts over $10,000 being accepted by the governor in council.

I want to make one other reference because, when speaking in the house I have always aimed to place facts before the house, and the facts are unchallengeable as far as I am concerned. However, the other day in the course of my remarks I made a statement that Mr. Austin Dewar was public relations officer of P.F.R.A. and the Minister of Agriculture stated that such was not a fact. No one has brought this matter to my attention, but I checked afterwards and I found out that I had been in error in that regard. How I came to be in error will be shown by the following facts. Reports appeared in the various western papers of a meeting of a group of Liberals in Prince Albert on March 7, presided over by Dr. Partridge, the retiring or retired president of the Saskatchewan Liberal association which had brought representatives from northern Saskatchewan, a number of whom had been former members of the legislature. I am not going to go into what they dealt with on that occasion because it is no part of our discussion in the house. But during that discussion one reference was made to the fact that P.F.R.A. had become, in effect, the personal not puppet but instrument of the Minister of Agriculture. Then this appears in the record, and from what I now read it will become apparent where my error came in. The article referred to the Gardiner machine and then said this:

> The delegates went on record as favouring an immediate explanation by the leader himself—

That is Mr. McDonald.

> —as to the events which led to the appointment of Sam Carr—

That is the secretary.

> —and the subsequent difficulties and pressure that both had been under to re-introduce Glen Bruce into the office. It was also emphasized that Glen Bruce would not be acceptable as provincial secretary,—

That is where the mistake came in on my part.

> —nor would Austin Dewar, a former public relations "expert" under the Gardiner machine—

That is where my mistake came in. I read that with reference to an earlier reference that P.F.R.A. was part of the Gardiner machine. Then the article went on to say this:

> —or Dick Bird, the previous secretary to Bruce, and a former campaign manager for Gardiner.

When I stated the other day—

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to interrupt on a matter of personal privilege? I would judge that my hon. friend is going to say that his previous statement with regard to Mr. Dewar is incorrect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I am going to say.

Mr. Gardiner: I want to say to my hon. friend that the statement with regard to everyone in the report he is reading from is incorrect. I am not sure any of those remarks were ever made at the meeting.

There is not any such man that I know of as Dick Bird, for example. There are many other incorrect statements in the report. There is no truth in them at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is another Bird; apparently it is not Dick Bird but some other Bird that occupied a similar position. I am just reading from this article and explaining that when I stated that Austin Dewar was a public relations official of P.F.R.A., that statement was based on a misapprehension arising from the article in question and I want to clear that up.

Mr. Gardiner: In that article it does not even say what my hon. friend is saying he did not say.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My right hon. friend has apparently studied this article. I am not reading the whole thing. If my hon. friend wants to have it read, I will certainly see that it is read. But the reference was made in the manner I have indicated in that article and in the other articles to which I made reference. As far as Austin Dewar is concerned, his position apparently is that of one of the officials of P.F.R.A., but he is not in the nature of a public relations official and I want to clear that point up and to clear it up without any doubt. I do not want to leave with regard to anyone any impression that is not in accordance with the facts. But nonetheless, he occupies a position of responsibility and one to which I am going to make further reference. The rest of the criticism I made the other day is still as effective as it was, regardless of whether he occupied a position such as that or the general position with the general functions to which the right hon. gentleman made reference.

Mr. Gardiner: Now that my hon. friend has started to clear the matter up, I think we should have it cleared up completely. The statement made by my hon. friend was that this man had been appointed a public relations official. The statement now read says that at one time he was a public relations expert to my machine.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; it does not.

Mr. Gardiner: It does not say that he is now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. It says he was a former public relations expert under the Gardiner machine.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; "former". It does not say anything about what my hon. friend is talking about, namely what he is now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, that is a play on words. Let us have none of that play on words. That indicates that he had the position—

Mr. Gardiner: That does not justify the statement made the other day by the member for Prince Albert at all in any sense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It justifies every word of that statement. But I did want to clarify the fact that he had not the position with P.F.R.A. and that reading "machine" with "P.F.R.A." in the earlier context it is understandable why I felt that the machine and P.F.R.A. were synonymous. Having said that, I turn once more to the bill in question. Without repeating previous arguments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton):

> That Bill No. 5 be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to delete subsection 2 of section 1 of the said bill.

Mr. Gardiner: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know if the discussion has terminated on this motion, but I should like to point out to the hon. member for Prince Albert that the amending bill has two clauses, the first one of which says that subsection 2 of section 9 of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, chapter 214, is repealed and another subsection substituted therefor. The second clause says that sections 10 and 11 of the said act are repealed. We are dealing there with the repeal of sections. According to the amendment the only clause which will be at all new if the bill is enacted is to be deleted in committee of the whole. Is this not an expanded negative? Could the hon. member not obtain the same objective by simply voting against the bill?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Speaker: I may be wrong, and I do not want to argue the point at the moment. I am merely submitting these observations to the hon. member. I will listen to other speeches and in the meantime will examine the point further, but if the hon. member wants to say anything in reply to what I have said I would be very glad to hear him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are two portions to the bill before the house. The first clause has to do with increasing the jurisdiction of the minister from $10,000 to $15,000 so far as expenditures are concerned. The second clause has to do with the repeal of sections 10 and 11 of the act. In other words, the bill before the house has two sections. The first one provides for an increase in power and the second provides for the repeal of certain sections. As far as we are concerned if we were to vote against third reading of the bill as a whole we would be voting also against the repeal of sections 10 and 11, to which we have no objection.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. St. Laurent: Is the hon. gentleman going to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Zaplitny: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps the hon. member for Prince Albert would agree that the first part of clause 1 of the bill should also be deleted. If subsection 2 is to be deleted then perhaps they should have the power to delete clause 1 of the bill. Clause 1 only enacts subsection 2 of section 9.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, it could be the whole section.

Mr. St. Laurent: It would be the whole clause 1 of the bill if instructions were to be given to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What the Prime Minister says is entirely correct. It would be with instructions that they have power to delete clause 1 of the said bill in its entirety.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent the amendment could be amended to read as just indicated by the Prime Minister and agreed to by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman agrees with me and I agree with him. Section 2 deals with another matter.

Mr. Speaker: So the amendment will then read:

. . . that they have power to delete clause 1 of the said bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to discuss the phase of the bill having to do with the increase from $10,000 to $15,000 in the amount that may be spent under ministerial authority. I do so because I want to take up a specific matter having to do with government policy, which it appears to me has been undergoing changes by ministerial authority. The matter concerns the expenditure of moneys under the act for the payment of P.F.R.A. engineers where their services are requested by the provinces. Apparently it was the policy of the government until recently that, when a province requested that a survey be made to determine whether a certain project to be undertaken under agreement with the federal government was economical and a proper project, the expenses of the engineers making the survey were paid by the federal government.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Somewhere along the line a change has come about, and now the minister has informed the provinces that if they ask for P.F.R.A. engineers to make a survey prior to determining whether or not a certain project is suitable they will have to pay the cost of the engineers. From two points of view this is a serious matter so far as my province is concerned. In the first instance, as I have already mentioned on other occasions, the province of Manitoba has received a very small percentage of the total expenditures under P.F.R.A. and proportionately also a small percentage of the total expenditures made outside of the act by agreement under special votes of the house.

In addition, we now find that if the government of Manitoba, for example, wishes to investigate the possibility of building control dams in the Riding mountain area or the Duck mountain watershed area, something which has been under discussion for a considerable length of time, or if the province of Manitoba proceeds to investigate the feasibility of lowering lake levels in lakes such as lake Dauphin, lake Manitoba and even lake Winnipeg in order to prevent flooding by water backing up from the lakes on the farm lands near these lakes, it may find it will be saddled with the total cost of making such surveys whereas in the past it was able to call upon the federal government to assist at least to the extent of lending their P.F.R.A. engineers to do the job.

I raise the matter at this time because in my opinion the change of policy is a very unfortunate one. The province of Manitoba has experienced three years of floods one after the other. The other day the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) raised the question in the house. Other members have raised it from time to time. I have raised it on numerous occasions. The province of Manitoba is attempting to find some way to alleviate the condition. It is attempting to find methods by which the flood waters may be controlled, particularly so in the Riding mountain and Duck mountain watershed areas, with which the minister is very familiar.

Now, if they are faced with the proposition that if they request that a survey be made by P.F.R.A. engineers they will have to pay the full cost of such survey, and then after a survey has been made the federal government decides it is not in the public interest or it is not the proper time to proceed with such a project or for any other reason may decide to postpone indefinitely plans for the project, the result is nothing but a net loss to the province to the extent of the cost of such a survey. I would hope that the government would see fit to return to a policy which was in operation until recently. I have no information as to the exact time at which this policy was changed because apparently it was an internal decision that was not announced publicly to my knowledge. I do not believe it was announced in the house. The announcement was made in a letter from the federal Minister of Agriculture to the minister of agriculture for Manitoba, dated February 27, 1954.

I would hope that in view of the difficult position in which Manitoba finds itself, particularly in the northwest portion of that province where we have been battling flood conditions for three years, the government would return to the original policy of providing at least that much assistance by lending engineers, at federal government costs, to undertake legitimate surveys which may result in public works projects or P.F.R.A. projects in the future to alleviate these conditions. That is one of the matters to which I wished to direct the minister's attention. The other question has to do with liaison between government departments that expend money for this purpose.

In the same letter to which I have referred the federal Minister of Agriculture expressed his satisfaction to the minister of agriculture in Manitoba with the fact that such works having to do with improvements, reclamation or flood control would be channelled through the provincial minister of agriculture in Manitoba. Incidentally, may I say that I approve of that situation also. I feel that in the past some difficulty has been encountered in trying to find out just who is responsible. In the same letter the federal Minister of Agriculture referred to the request of the provincial minister of agriculture in Manitoba and stated that in so far as the works in the Riding Mountain national park area were concerned, for example, another department of government would be involved. This would be the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, of course. It is quite proper and legitimate that this department would have to be consulted. At some stage I should like the minister to state quite clearly in the house whether the same policy will be followed at this end as is being suggested in Manitoba, that is that all such works as have to do with flood control affecting agriculture will be channelled through the federal Minister of Agriculture.

This is important to us in Manitoba because, whenever a request for such projects is made at the municipal or provincial level, a question has often been raised as to the authority in the federal government through which these requests should be channelled. I would hope the federal Minister of Agriculture would be the liaison minister for all departments that have to do with such projects and that he, in turn, would deal with the ministers of agriculture in the various provinces. In that way an orderly method of dealing with these matters would be established.

Personally, I would have no objection to seeing the ministerial authority increased from $10,000 to $15,000, provided that the expenditures are handled expeditiously and efficiently. Whether or not they are, I shall leave to the members from Saskatchewan who have raised the question so far. My purpose is not to enter into any dispute as to whether political appointments have been made. I would rather leave that to a future occasion, if it arises. So far as my own constituency is concerned and my own province, we are interested chiefly in knowing whether the government is inclined to return to its policy of assisting the provinces in making surveys, to the extent of paying the full costs of P.F.R.A. engineers. Secondly, we are interested in knowing whether the federal government is prepared to enter into further agreements with Manitoba for certain flood control projects.

May I draw the attention of the minister to the fact that the letter to which I have made reference is dated February 27, 1954. I asked for a return of correspondence, which was brought down in recent weeks, but apparently there has been no further exchange of correspondence on the subject since that date more than a year ago. In the letter from the Manitoba minister of agriculture to the federal minister, which is dated January 19, 1954, we find this closing paragraph:

> I am informed as well that the province, in the past, entered into an annual agreement with your department in respect to P.F.R.A. undertakings. I believe that it would be necessary in the interests of our two respective governments to complete an annual agreement at the earliest possible date in order to facilitate this year's program.

That was written on January 19, 1954.

Mr. Gardiner: The 1954 program has already been agreed upon and carried out. I should like to say by way of explanation that probably a great deal of what took place following that letter took place through interviews between the minister and myself, either when I was in Manitoba or when he was here.

Mr. Zaplitny: That may explain the reason for the lack of further correspondence on the matter.

May I draw the minister's attention to the fact that we are now in 1955? I hope that some rather extensive projects are being planned at this time. While I am in complete sympathy with and fully support the requests that have been made for projects to alleviate the situation along the Assiniboine valley, I must bring to the attention of the minister the fact that we in northwestern Manitoba have gone through that same situation for the third year in a row. We have a very serious situation there that will require some major projects. I would hope the minister would be in a position to announce that further agreements have been entered into between the federal government and the province with respect to 1955.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to ask the minister three questions. Perhaps the minister will say whether or not all the sections of this bill were passed in committee of the whole, and if they were so passed is it likely they will be passed again? Secondly, can the house instruct the committee of the whole on what it is to do with any bill? Thirdly, can any new matter be introduced into a debate on third reading of the bill?

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): When the debate on this bill took place a week ago, my leader at that time expressed opposition on behalf of the C.C.F. party. Our opposition is to clause 1, as it reads in the bill that is before us. I want to agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Under this legislation the situation in western Canada, as it is now, calls for the undertaking of works to provide drainage wherever such drainage is needed and the project is feasible. Certainly with the serious flood situation on the prairies we are hopeful that this act may be used to the fullest possible extent to prevent such damage recurring in the future.

I want also to make some comment on the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I hope his statement does not mean that the government is not as sympathetic to this matter of awarding damages as it was some weeks ago. I think it should be pointed out that, even though the weather stays dry every day for the next month, and seeding goes on to the greatest possible extent under dry conditions, nevertheless there will be many farmers in sections of that province who will be unable to complete their seeding operations. There will be substantial areas of land under water; and it has been estimated that the damage to roads resulting from the flooding already amounts to many millions of dollars.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Just as in the past neither the Winnipeg flood nor "Hurricane Hazel" crippled the economy of either Manitoba or Ontario, so the serious flooding in Saskatchewan may not to any greater extent cripple the economy of Saskatchewan. But the flooding in that province has created a situation that should be considered a national emergency by the government, just as it has considered other situations as national emergencies. I believe when the information is all in it will be found that the extent of the damage in western Canada this year will exceed any damage that has taken place on any previous occasion when the federal government has paid compensation. Even though the grain economy may recover, I believe compensation should be paid.

The other part of the bill would delete sections 10 and 11 of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. When the debate was in progress before, I was afraid that this provision might result in the government's discontinuing the practice of leasing land and purchasing machinery where such was necessary to carry out the purposes of the act. We have had an explanation from the minister, and the assurance that, even with those sections deleted, there is sufficient power under the act, as governed by the Financial Administration Act, to undertake the leasing of land and the purchasing of machinery, where such might be necessary.

I think it is correct to point out however that clause 2 in the bill was not asked for by the minister; and from his statement of a week ago it is doubtful whether he is anxious to see clause 2 put into legislative form. It is clear to me, and I think it will be clear to the country, that clause 2 in the bill is a further effort by the minister's colleagues to whittle down his authority in the leasing of land and the purchasing of machinery. It would appear to me as a provision placed in the bill by the Prime Minister with a view to slowing down and governing at least to some extent the Gardiner machine, which has become a pretty notorious thing.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would not mind delaying his final speech until we have something on the record in respect to this matter.

I looked in Hansard to see what was said on May 30 by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), in speaking for this group. Perhaps I might quote from page 4245 where he said this:

> All the expenditures that have been made in that area—

And he was referring to his own area.

> —have been wisely made. We feel that the people have received full value for the money expended.

Therefore, I am not prepared to oppose this bill. The increase from $10,000 to $15,000 does seem reasonable and in line with the general increase in costs throughout the country.

The attitude of this group is the same today as it was then.

I am not going to make any extended remarks, but I would point out that the hon. member for Acadia did say there might be some difference in administration between P.F.R.A. in Saskatchewan and P.F.R.A. in Alberta. However, he did say that Alberta seemed to be satisfied.

Increases in costs of projects have taken place over the past few years, and in all probability costs today are perhaps half as much again as they were a few years ago. Therefore by giving the minister authority to pass on projects of $15,000 we are not necessarily giving him any more authority than he had a few years ago in connection with projects requiring the expenditure of $10,000. I think, therefore, for this reason the bill could be accepted, and I do not see how we could support the amendment.

Hon. members who have taken part in this and other debates have referred to the state of devastation in Saskatchewan as a result of the floods. I passed through that province a few days ago and I know the situation is serious. We would have to support our Saskatchewan friends in their desire to have assistance granted to the farmers of that province. At the same time I believe I would have to agree with the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon when he said that, after all, anything of that nature would have to come out of the over-all taxes of the country, and that unless it is a case of a national emergency, which would warrant such action, it should not be done. If we can conclude that the flooding has reached the proportions of a national emergency, then of course I would agree that something should be done.

Mr. Argue: On the basis of his observation of the disastrous conditions in Saskatchewan, would the hon. member say that those conditions warrant its being termed a national emergency?

Mr. Hansell: I cannot answer that question definitely. The part of the province I passed through looked very bad. However I did go through the northern part and did not see very much flooding there.

When we are dealing with the matter of giving assistance to people in circumstances of this kind we must be careful how far we go. I say that because I have a problem in my own constituency, one which affects the coal miners. I am not going to discuss the subject here, but I would point out that in that industry the coal miners are being laid off. They cannot find work because of certain conditions that have been brought about not through any fault either of their own or of the coal-mining industry, but purely because we have been making progress over the years. We might reasonably come to the government and say: This is an emergency; why can something not be done about it? Where are we going to stop in this matter of emergency? However, I do say—

Mr. Argue: You are out of character.

Mr. Hansell: Well, I want to be reasonable all the way around. I like to pull for my people and get all I can for them just as others do. I tell the hon. member for Assiniboia that I am right behind him. If this thing is needed in the province of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Argue: And it is.

Mr. Hansell: —to any great extent, then something should be done. However, as far as the amendment is concerned, Mr. Speaker, because of our previous pronouncements on the bill, I do not see that we can reasonably support it.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): It is not very often that I take up the time of the house, but it must be realized from previous speeches I have made in this house that Medicine Hat is in one of the drought areas where the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has done a wonderful job. I am very happy to see this bill which increases the expenditure from $10,000 to $15,000. We know to what extent prices have gone up; we know what it costs to put in a dam today that cost us $5,000 a few years ago.

This bill is necessary. It is not meant to deal with an emergency. It gives the minister authority to spend up to $15,000 on some of these smaller projects. I am well aware of that. In the southeastern corner of the province, which is one of the driest areas in Canada, much drier than the area of the hon. member for Assiniboia, I realize quite well what it will mean. I have a long experience in that area. I was a field man for the provincial department of agriculture in 1936, 1937 and 1938. I know the conditions there. I certainly know what the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has done. I have backed up the minister as far as I could, and I shall continue to do so.

As I said before, this bill is not meant to deal with an emergency situation. It authorizes the minister to spend up to $15,000. A few years ago it was $10,000. I think I am right in saying that. I am very happy to support the minister on this bill. I will support him all the way through on it, since I come from one of the driest areas of Canada where the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act really does mean something.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Gardiner:—I had not intended to say anything when I came into the house, and probably I would be wise if I did not say anything now in view of the very kind remarks just made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) and the previous speaker. However, in view of some of the remarks made by one or two other speakers, I do not know how I can resist the opportunity to say something.

As has been suggested by a number of those who have spoken, and as I said on second reading, I had the authority when this act was first enacted to decide on projects up to $5,000. There was a reason for that, the reason given by me and by others at the time, which was in 1939. The reason given was that in an area of Canada such as ours west of Winnipeg, where the winters are long and the summers are short, if you have to wait for every contract, no matter what its size, to go through all the process of being considered, first by officials, then being taken to the treasury board and being considered by them and then taken to council and considered by them, half the summer would be over before you got a decision at all on the small jobs. Therefore they decided, after more discussion than has taken place so far on this measure, the minister, no matter who he was—and they thought he was then just as much a machine politician as apparently some people do now—should have that authority. Well, then, we came along to a later period. I have forgotten exactly when it was but it was half way between then and now. They said that $5,000 was not enough for the same reason. They raised it to $10,000 and I have been operating under that. Now, they come along and, for the very reasons recited in the last few moments, say that $10,000 was all right the last time we dealt with it, but it is not good enough now. It must be $15,000 because of the higher cost and for other reasons in connection with it. Therefore, it is suggested that the amount be $15,000.

Some of my hon. friends from the province of Saskatchewan who try to make it appear that they want to be very helpful to the people out there in these difficult circumstances want to say that because Gardiner has always been a machine politician we are not going to let him decide whether or not they are to have this help up to $15,000; we are just going to stop it. Well, I want to say for the benefit of those who do not know—and apparently there are not very many in this house from Saskatchewan who have looked over the problem—the greater part of the problem is in my constituency. The only member from where the real problem exists who has spoken of it is the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang), whose constituency is immediately south of mine. The Qu'Appelle river is the boundary line between our two seats. He outlined to this house on the second reading of the bill the reasons why we are spending money in the Qu'Appelle valley and what the flood conditions are there. There are places in the Qu'Appelle valley where water is nine feet higher than it ever was before. The towns in the east end of that valley are in my constituency. They happen to be all on my side of the river except one, which is on the other side of the river, but for some reason or other it was put in my constituency. All the towns and summer resorts along there within that area are in my constituency. If there is anyone in this house who knows what the conditions are, it is I. Someone asked the other day, why have you not gone out to look at them? I was out there all during the Easter holidays. I was there for three weeks. I was pulled half a mile by tractor while attempting to go from my farm to Regina. On another occasion I was pulled for a piece, and did not reach where I wanted to go. I wanted to go down into the valley on two or three occasions but I could not get there because a section of the valley was badly flooded. I know every foot of it. I have driven over it; I have ridden over it on horseback; I have walked over a lot of it, and I do not need to be there to know what the conditions are. I have seen the conditions in the whole 41 years that I have been in politics, and for some time before that. I have represented those people through all that time, and what I am going to tell you is that they know me sufficiently well and they know the conditions sufficiently well that there is not a single one of them who has ever written me a letter about it. Other people in this house may think they are getting a lot of correspondence, but the people out in my section of the country know that I know the conditions and know that I am making representations that should be made in connection with them, and they are not listening to this propaganda put out largely by the C.C.F. I am not at all surprised that my friend from Prince Albert joins with the C.C.F. on that kind of thing, stating that the Minister of Agriculture is such a political propagandist and such a political machine that you just cannot give him any more authority.

Let me repeat. They said that when it was made $5,000. They said that when it was made $10,000. There is not a member of this house, on any side of it, who has been able to come here on this occasion and name one specific case where there has been a dollar misspent in connection with the activities of this organization—not one. So I am going to say this. I have prided myself on being somewhat of a political organizer. I would not have been elected every election since 1914 if I were not. Every time my seat has been contested I have been elected. I know something about organizing. I do not think that is something for which one should be criticized by men who have sometimes been able to get into the house and sometimes have not. But I am going to say this to the C.C.F. Since I came here I have had absolutely nothing to do with organization in the province of Saskatchewan in so far as determining how it was going to be run and who was going to run it. If I had, they probably never would have been here.

The fact of the matter is that I had sufficient experience in the province of Saskatchewan getting myself elected in the time I was there provincially, that I was able to win all my elections. I was able to set up an organization, if you like, or you can call it a political machine or whatever you like to call it, which won elections. My last experience in the province of Saskatchewan was in wiping out a government. We were not the government; we did not have control over appointments in the civil service. We had no control over any of those things for five years. My hon. friend from Prince Albert was one of the campaigners against us and followed up by being leader of the party that was in power during that period—

Mr. Diefenbaker: During what period was that?

Mr. Gardiner: During the time the Anderson government was in power.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct my hon. friend. If I recollect the date, it was November, 1926, when I became that.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; when Mr. Anderson ceased to be leader of the Conservative party, you became leader of the Conservative party, the follower of the premier who was leading the province in 1934. When the election was all over—and this is where I got my reputation—there was not a single member of the government nor a single supporter of the government elected anywhere in Saskatchewan; they were all wiped out. I am rather proud of that reputation.

An hon. Member: It lasted for 20 years.

Mr. Gardiner: Until this last year there never was another Conservative elected in the province of Saskatchewan. My hon. friend started out with something over 100,000 Conservative voters in the province and wound up last year with 17,000. I do not lead parties in that direction, I am proud to say, and if I am accused of being a party politician, a machine campaigner, and so on, I would very much rather have that accusation made against me than the accusation that I took over a party when it had so many votes and now have it with so few. But the fact is that I took over the party with a certain vote, and I increased the Liberal vote in Saskatchewan until 180,000 people voted for us, and so many had never voted for us before or since. Figures are thrown around of 200,000 and 210,000. You have to count everybody who votes in Regina three times to get it that high. You have to count twice everybody who votes in Saskatoon to get it that high. Each one there votes for two candidates, and in Regina each one votes for three candidates. You have to count twice everyone who votes in Moose Jaw, because each one votes for two candidates. But when you take the actual figures of people who have voted, there never were more who voted Liberal than in 1934 when 180,000 voters voted for us. Even in the last election in Saskatchewan the Liberals got the votes of 168,000 people, only 12,000 down from where we were at our peak. If my hon. friends want to talk about a situation of that kind there, all I have to say to them is that they had better be careful how they vote on this bill, because the people out there do think something about the question as to whether it is sufficient to deal with the situation that exists out there now by saying that the minister can only decide on an amount up to $10,000. The Leader of the Opposition saw the point the other day, when he was speaking in committee. He wanted to know whether this was to give me authority to deal with these particular situations that were going to arise as a result of the flood conditions out there now.

An hon. Member: He does not know the situation.

Mr. Gardiner: He had moved to a line of reasoning that is followed today by some of our friends who do not know the situation either. He got around to suggesting that this is an effort to give Mr. Gardiner, the machine politician, the opportunity to go out and take hold of these jobs up to $15,000, whereas previously he could take hold of them only up to $10,000, and decide the situation himself and go out and deal with this flood situation with that power in his hand. The government had no such idea at the time they were considering this matter. They were considering it on its merits before the flood problem ever came up. It was considered by council before that problem came up, and therefore that could not have been the reason. But my hon. friend from Assiniboia today says that we ought to do this and we ought to do that, and that we have never given any thought to the matter. They are a long way from the mark. As a matter of fact, I have a copy here of the Leader-Post of June 3, which was last Friday, the day when we were previously discussing this question. It reports the speech which Mr. McIntosh, the minister of municipal affairs in the Saskatchewan government, made to the urban municipal association. There could not be any group of people getting together in the province of Saskatchewan who understand the situation better than the municipal association. Here is what the article says:

> The provincial government is not too concerned about the 1955 agricultural picture in the province, municipal affairs minister L. F. McIntosh told the Saskatchewan urban municipalities association convention in the Hotel Saskatchewan Thursday afternoon.

Then it goes on to recite the conditions that do exist and to indicate the same figure which has been used here, taken out of the documents presented here when the representatives of the governments have been here on two occasions. It says that it is going to require some $5 million put up by somebody to deal with this situation. May I tell my hon. friends that we have not been losing sight of the fact. We knew, as a matter of fact, what it would cost in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan, from the main line of the C.P.R. to the farthest settled points, to take care of their problem. We knew the problem did not exist in other parts of the province to the same extent and that something had to be done about it in the northeast. So we took action to deal with it, not now but last fall, after that country had been flooded for a whole summer and the provincial government had done nothing at all about it. Now they come here and say to us that this country was flooded in 1953, this country was flooded worse in 1954, this country is flooded worse now in 1955, and they say, "Come and help us out". Of course we help people out when they require assistance when we are responsible. Knowing as I do that one of my constituents on the north side of the valley has had as many as eight families living with him at one time because they were flooded out of their homes, we know what the situation is, and we also know that you cannot sit down the next morning and evaluate the damage and start to pay for it and deal with people as they ought to be dealt with. So we wait until the minister of municipal affairs in Saskatchewan is able to make a more definite report to a municipal association than he does in this case, and also until we have more definite information.

It has been said by member after member that there ought to be $5 million spent in that area in order to take care of the needs of these people. Last fall we could see something like this coming if it rained a lot, even if it snowed a lot. It did not snow a lot so we thought we were by that, but it rained a lot in the first part of May and so we had the same result as if it had snowed in the wintertime. So we started to look over the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to see what assistance could be given to these people, if any, under the act that had been prepared to deal with drought. We referred the matter to the justice department and they said yes, you might have intended—and we had intended at the time—to be paying on drought but you did not so state in the act. The word "drought" is not in it anywhere. So it is possible for you to pay for other reasons when the results are similar and when the conditions under the act can be made known. So we referred the matter to the treasury board. We referred the matter to the treasury and they agreed. They said, "Yes; payments can be made and this is the way in which you can make them this year under this act and take care of people in areas that perhaps have been paying all the time but never had much if any assistance under the act or very little since 1939." So we made the payments. Fortunately, when this vote is being taken at this present time, practically all the payments have been made. Do you know how much they amount to? They amount to $6,327,766 in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan in the constituencies we are talking of from the main line of the C.P.R. right up to the north. Do you know how much they were from 1939 down to last year? They were $5,505,000. For all the years from 1939 down to the present that area drew only $5,505,666. But for this one year, because of the difficulties that are being spoken about in this house, there has been paid in there $6,327,000. That is, we have paid in almost $1 million more in one year than was paid during all the other years from 1939 down to this year; and this money has been paid in since the first of January this year and it has been paid up to now. In other words, we have paid $1 million more into that area already out of the treasury of Canada than the provincial government estimates will be required in the whole province in order to take care of the problems we are talking about.

We have not been losing sight of the needs of the people in that section of the province of Saskatchewan, nor have we been playing politics with the matter. I venture to say that 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the farmers living in that area have had assistance already and all that is being proposed when they come to see us is that we put in sufficient money to make it possible for the provincial government to go out and put some of these people to work. I know it is a fine thing to put people to work but, from a long experience in the province of Saskatchewan, I also know that $200 or even $150 or $300 or at the outside limit $500 under the act put into the hands of an individual between January 1 and June 1 will do him more good than all the work he can get no matter how much he is paid for it between now and the time that he has to be looking forward to harvesting whatever crop he is going to have. In other words, I just want to impress upon this house the fact that the government has not lost sight of the facts. This report I have read of the urban municipal convention in Regina indicates that what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said a little while ago is correct. He said the province is going on doing the job. What they are suggesting is that, when the job is done, maybe we ought to help pay for it. I am suggesting to you that we put more money into that area before the job was ever started—

Mr. Diefenbaker: For last year.

Mr. Gardiner: No; for this year. The money which the farmer gets this year paid on account of last year's crop.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But it is for last year's crop.

Mr. Gardiner: The farmer uses the crop he grew last year in order to help him put in one this year; and if he has got prairie farm assistance this year, it is going to help him in order to make it possible for him to put in this year's crop. Our friend the provincial minister says that the provincial government is not too much concerned about the 1955 agriculture picture.

Mr. Campbell: That is the general picture.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the general picture in the province. He goes on to say this:

> "The department of agriculture—

That is in Saskatchewan.

> —is making a stern effort to encourage the natural flow of streams in the flooded regions of the province", he said. "This week two cars of dynamite were sent out to help in the program" . . .
> In 1954 some 17 rural municipalities suffered excess moisture . . .

And so on. I just recite that in order to say this. The provincial government after coming here went back home and went to work to try to do the job, no matter who paid for it. They are working at it. All this particular piece of legislation does—if it does anything in relation to it—is to say to the minister: You do not have to wait until you get through with all this detail that is required in order to get certain things done; whenever the problem is put up to you as to whether you can help with it, if it is not going to cost more than $15,000, you can make a decision about it.

Mr. Wylie: Go out and do it.

Mr. Gardiner: That is one of the reasons my friends over there who come from the province of Saskatchewan say, "Do not give it to him. We want to be able to tell him when the next election comes along that he did not do anything about it." It is nothing but politics, pure politics and the meanest kind of politics. I know this house is not going to say that to the Minister of Agriculture on this occasion. They are going to say that you have been carrying on under this act since 1939; there has not been a single member who has been able to come here and put up one word of criticism in connection with the expenditure on any project. Members in opposition to the government here, such as those in the Social Credit group, coming as they do from the driest areas in western Canada, similar to areas in southwestern Saskatchewan, come here and say, "Vote for this measure because it is going to be helpful".

I am going to emphasize what the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) brought out a few moments ago. This house voted for this measure on second reading. This house voted on everything that has been put up this afternoon in committee. This house is now asked to send it back to that committee all over again, to have all that talk go on again and another vote taken. I am going to suggest that the quickest way in which to get it over with is to vote for the third reading of this bill and send it over to the Senate. No doubt some people there may have some suggestions to make about amendments. If any amendments are made they will come back here and we will deal with them again. But let us get on with the job. There never was an area in which certain people needed assistance to a greater extent than they do out there now. I am not going to say that it is a national problem nor am I going to say that it is even a provincial calamity all told. There will be areas where the land will produce much more than they have had for a long time past because they have had these three years of additional moisture. There are other areas, however limited, where there has been a great deal of suffering. This article of the provincial government says that 369 people were evacuated. Saskatchewan is not a very small province, even in population. I am going to say that among the 369 people who have been so affected are some just as hard hit as anyone was in Manitoba at the time of the Red river flood, just as hard hit as those people affected by the Fraser river flood at an earlier period, but in no place were they as hard hit as the people along the Humber valley where scores of people lost their lives. In no place in Saskatchewan is there a condition like that. Because there is not, we ought to get down to earth when we are considering this problem and get on with the legislation that makes help possible. Of course anything the federal government does there is likely to be done under P.F.R.A. because the whole organization is set up which can deal with such matters.

May I say here that if I had not come to that point I would have forgotten what the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) said. He misunderstood what I said the other night. I stated there were conditions under which the engineering was not paid. I recited one of those conditions as being the condition we have reached in Alberta. We did the engineering in connection with the St. Mary's dam. We did the engineering in connection with the laying out of the main canals through the whole system right down to south of Medicine Hat. But when it came to letting the contracts on that particular system of canals we said to the provincial government after some experiences, well, maybe you had better let those contracts yourselves and get your own engineers to advise you on them. If you do want the help of some of our engineers because you have not properly trained men that is all right, provided you pay them. We will lend them to you and you pay them because we do not want to get into difficulties on contracts you are handling.

Mr. Zaplitny: Would the minister permit me to say that I am afraid he has also misunderstood me. What I was referring to was survey work done outside the P.F.R.A. designated area in the province of Manitoba. What I stated was taken directly from a letter written by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to the minister of agriculture of Manitoba stating that there is a change in government policy on that question.

Mr. Gardiner: There is a change in government policy on the question I have just stated. I went further in the letter and indicated to the minister in Manitoba that when we were simply trying to determine whether or not a project should come under P.F.R.A. or was something that the province should do we would still carry on that work. At some stage we may say, "This is yours, we are through". But we pay for it up to that point. I also pointed out that there are different schemes from those we were talking about in the earlier part of the letter. There is the one having to do with Clearwater lake, a summer resort, and also a federal park. If there were going to be any drainage work done inside the park I would have to take the question to the proper department here in order to have it settled whether they wanted drainage done there. But as to any condition outside the park resulting from the fact that snows had melted in the park and the water had run down the rivers and flooded farms we would help. The reason we will only help is the fact that we assume some responsibility because the water came out of the park.

In other similar cases all over the west and all over the rest of Canada we have not assumed responsibility, whether in a P.F.R.A. area or not, for drainage as such. When it comes to matters of drainage of that kind they have to be cases where we have some responsibility apart from what the constitution gives us before we agree to pay. Those were the cases I was talking about together with the development in Alberta. In that case we have reached the point where we think we should turn it over to the province and get out of the picture. We believe they should let the contracts. I think my friend can see the reason for that.

It is not even weeks after you start to put your engineers in to deal with contracts that the provincial government is going to let until some fellow comes in and says that he has been to the provincial government—it does not matter whether it is Alberta or where it is—and has been told that our engineer made a decision and therefore we have got to pay for it. We just do not do business that way. When we get to that point we have to tell them that any engineer who is there at their request, even if he is a man we trained, has got to be acting as their engineer and they must pay him. Then nobody can say to us that we are playing around with their contracts.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask this question for clarification? In the event of the province and the federal government arriving at a tentative agreement on a certain project and wishing to have a survey made in order to ascertain the estimated cost, the feasibility and so forth, will the minister state that the federal government is still prepared at their expense to lend their P.F.R.A. engineers for that purpose?

Mr. Gardiner: There are no contracts like that. The federal government never sits down and makes an agreement with any province until our engineers have been all over the project. When we use our engineers to determine whether or not we are going to go into the contract we pay the price. If the job is undertaken and is said to be a provincial responsibility, we may still agree to pay half, as we did at Dauphin. We may also still continue to have our engineers do the engineering work. We do not do that in all cases, but in some we do. However, in determining whether or not we are going to go into a project at all at any stage we do that by putting our engineers on it before any agreement is made with the province, and that will still continue to be the situation.

Finally, I just want to say that I hope the house will vote in the same or even larger proportion for third reading of the bill as they did for second reading and on the different clauses as they were discussed.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say first—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister has just closed the debate.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I am no authority on the rules, but was the minister not speaking to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert? Therefore he could not close the debate at this stage.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is quite right. I hope I did not mislead even the minister by announcing that when he spoke to the amendment he was closing the debate. It may please him to know that he has another speech coming if he wants to make one.

Mr. Gardiner: I think we should take the vote.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Mountain.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, under your ruling the hon. member for Moose Mountain cannot speak until the vote is taken on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: No. We started by debating the third reading of the bill. The hon. member for Prince Albert moved an amendment, and all the members who spoke since the amendment was moved were speaking to the amendment.

Mr. Gardiner: I am asking for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but the minister cannot ask for a vote unless the discussion is terminated.

Mr. Gardiner: But when I moved the motion in the first place I spoke. The Speaker stopped me the other day because I wanted to speak after someone got up and asked me a question and I yielded then, but today we have an amendment moved and I was told that if I spoke the debate was closed. I presumed that we were through with the discussion of the amendment and were coming to the vote. Now I am told we are not through with the discussion on the amendment but are in the middle of it. My friend will still have a right to get up and speak, but I would just like to know what the correct ruling is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I may speak on the point, what the minister says is correct as to the order of things. Your Honour did say that the minister was closing the debate, and according to the rules that was not correct, with deference. Would it not be better for the vote to take place now? It would not do the hon. member for Moose Mountain any harm and he could then speak on the main motion. Certainly the minister was under the impression he was closing the debate.

Mr. Gardiner: If the house wants to do so, I am quite prepared to let it go on provided there is only going to be one vote, on third reading. I am not worrying about it.

Mr. Speaker: May I again apologize to the house, and especially to the minister, because when he rose I completely forgot about the amendment that had been moved and I announced that if he spoke he would close the debate. I would have been right in doing that if the amendment had not been moved, but since an amendment was moved I had no business saying that at that time. I made that announcement, which should not be regarded as a ruling. I was merely acting—at the wrong time—in accordance with the provisions of standing order 43. Since I was in error I think the house should continue the debate as if I had not made the announcement that the minister was closing the debate.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The main point at issue is not the political success or failure of the Minister of Agriculture in Saskatchewan, but that we should get some action in respect to flood conditions in that province. I feel deeply concerned about conditions existing there, and have repeatedly brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister in the hope that we would get an early decision as to what action, if any, the government intends to take.

There have been precedents for the declaration of a national emergency when large scale disasters have occurred in various parts of Canada. It is my hope, of course, that the federal government will see fit to take an active part in the appraisal and restoration of the damages in Saskatchewan resulting from recent floods. I am sure the people of the country would be agreeable to such a course.

I want to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that I am concerned about the basis on which assistance will be provided to the people of these flooded areas. I quite recognize that there is no national authority such as I advocated in an earlier speech, when I indicated that I thought these interprovincial problems affecting drainage in the different parts of Canada and the recurring flood conditions would indicate the advisability of setting up a dominion-provincial diking and drainage authority on which there would be adequate representation of the provinces and the dominion government. Then these large projects could be undertaken in a sensible and businesslike way.

The problem which affects my district more particularly, and the one with which I am fairly familiar, is the flood condition in the Kipling area. In that area approximately a million and a half acres of excellent farmland is presently flooded and will not be seeded to crop this year. A great portion of that land has been flooded for one or two years. It so happens that it is not a marsh area in the true sense of the word. As a result of the natural basins being filled, the water has no other course to follow except to flow over the more level area sometimes referred to as Kipling marsh.

It would take approximately six or seven miles of drainage works to drain that water into the Pipestone river. In turn this water that is now flooding a million and a half acres there would flow into the Pipestone and on into Manitoba, causing a difficult situation there. I think it should be obvious to the house, therefore, that this is a situation that concerns both the provincial and federal governments, and action by both governments would be necessary to prevent a recurrence of these flood conditions.

I might say that precedents have been established for federal government assistance in some of these projects. I could name quite a number of them, but there is one in particular in the Pipestone lake area where the federal government contributed $130,000 of a total cost of $230,000 in order to remedy that difficulty. I say to the Minister of Agriculture that when we appeal to him to undertake certain action under P.F.R.A. we do so not in an attempt to spell out how action should be taken, but to bring the attention of the federal government to the fact that corrective works in some form should be undertaken in collaboration with the province and the municipality.

I am aware of the fact that in the Kipling district the local authorities have set up a drainage association. Contrary to the impression left by the Minister of Agriculture that Saskatchewan had not done very much in respect to some flooded areas, I want to say to him that since 1949-50, when the conservation act was passed in Saskatchewan, the province has spent approximately $2·5 million. In addition the province completed a survey of the flooded area at Kipling, and I believe they are awaiting federal government action to assist in solving that problem.

I want to close, Mr. Speaker, by appealing to the minister to use his department or use his authority to have assistance given to those people who are—

Mr. Gardiner: And you are going to vote not to give me any authority.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): We have had another interjection by the minister. I think it is true to say that under the measure upon which we are to vote, the minister is now going to have to go to the cabinet to get approval for any projects costing over $15,000. He now has authority up to $10,000. As I also understand, certain sections will be deleted which will prevent the minister from undertaking these works without the approval of treasury board. While on the one hand the bill perhaps gives the minister further rights, on the other hand certain sections are deleted by the amending bill that will curtail the powers of the minister and force him to go to treasury board for approval.

Mr. Gardiner: No, not under these sections. The only difference is this. I have to go to treasury board instead of to council.

Mr. Argue: Did you always go to council before?

Mr. Gardiner: Usually.

Mr. Argue: Usually, that is the point; that is the reason for the bill.

Mr. Gardiner: It is no such thing. Every minister does exactly the same thing. Up to a certain amount he can decide, but when it gets over that amount, under the general legislation he has to go to treasury board. Until now I only had to go to council, and now I only have to go to treasury board.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I do not know who is making this speech.

Mr. Gardiner: We are both making it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister had to say. I think both the house and the minister will agree with this statement. If the minister puts a proposition before the cabinet in such a way that he gets the active support of the cabinet, we do not need to fear whether or not those projects will be undertaken. It does not matter whether the minister's power is limited to $10,000 or $15,000, here is a situation that is going to take much more than $15,000 to correct. It is one for which the minister will have to get cabinet approval before taking action.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS AND ISSUE OF SUBSTITUTED SECURITIES

Hon. R. O. Campney (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada in respect of such refunding to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Benidickson: The bill to be founded on this resolution is to provide for the refunding of Canadian National Railways securities maturing or callable in the years 1956 to 1962. Provision is made either by the issue of railway bonds guaranteed by the government or by temporary loans from the government. The amount provided is $200 million, the same as was provided in similar acts passed by this house in 1935, 1938, 1944, 1947 and 1951. When hon. members see the bill they will find that it is patterned on the 1951 bill.

The details of the maturing issues are shown in a statement which I should like to have placed on Hansard. It shows the securities that are to be refunded between 1956 and 1962.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that this table be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: The table follows:

Securities to be Refunded Under Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1955

Major Refundings
1956
	C.N.R. 4½ per cent 25 year bonds	$49,853,548
	Equipment trust issues	9,060,000
	C.N.R. 4½ per cent 30 year bonds	64,136,000
	Equipment trust issues	9,060,000
1958
	Equipment trust issues	8,500,000
	C.N.R. 3½ per cent debenture stock	5,636,506
1959
	C.N.R. 3 per cent 20 year bonds	35,000,000
	Equipment trust issues	3,550,000
1960
	Equipment trust issues	2,450,000
1961
	Canadian Northern Ontario Railway 3½ per cent debenture stock	3,597,518
1962
	Grand Trunk Pacific Railway 4 per cent sterling bonds	7,186,889
Miscellaneous refundings 1956-1962		1,969,539
	Total	$200,000,000

The securities include Canadian National equipment trust issues, Canadian Northern Ontario railway debenture stock and bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and they total $200 million.

The usual practice is to borrow temporarily from the government and issue securities to the public at the appropriate time and in an amount suitable to the market covering requirements for refunding and other purposes. Of the $200 million authorized by the 1951 act, $102,893,898 has been financed by public issues, the remainder by government loans. The details of these public issues are shown on an additional statement that I also would like to have printed in Hansard.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to have these tables printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: The tables follow:

Mr. Macdonnell: The parliamentary assistant has indicated the purpose of this legislation. We have these various maturities running over the years until 1962 and totalling $200 million. The parliamentary assistant has explained the method followed. I take it the real question that arises is that of interest rates and suitable time for making offerings. That is something that it has been indicated will be dealt with in the judgment of the officials of the Department of Finance or the railway as the years go by.

Mr. Benidickson: And the bank, yes. They are now issued through the Bank of Canada, and of course the bank's judgment will be used.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is there a further amount of $27 million of Grand Trunk Pacific securities in addition to the $200 million to be dealt with?

Mr. Benidickson: Not with reference to this bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question relating to one portion of this resolution which states that provision is made for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways, and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada. I should like to ask whether the trend toward the elimination of the word "dominion" in the description of the Dominion of Canada has now terminated, and whether this is a recognition by the government that a few years ago the Prime Minister was correct when speaking in this house he described this country as the "Dominion of Canada"? In a speech in the House of Commons on June 16, 1942, he said, as reported at page 3394 of Hansard:

> Canada has been for the last 75 years the "Dominion of Canada", organized by and governed under the British North America Act.

I simply inquire from the parliamentary assistant whether the trend that has been apparent in recent years has now been brought to a temporary stop. I would point out, sir, that while parliament went to considerable trouble to eliminate the word "dominion" in various statutes, it is still recognized as a not unclean word in the Dominion Succession Duty Act, which was amended without changing its name; and indeed in 1952 in the first two vice-regal messages brought before parliament by which the estimates were transmitted the expression used at that time was "for the service of the dominion". However, in June of that year a change was made and in the next message brought down the language was "for the service of Canada". I simply would like to inquire whether or not the government now has arrived at a point where the word "dominion" is recognized as a proper word.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like an answer from the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that would be an appropriate question to the Department of Finance on this particular resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the parliamentary assistant cannot answer it, possibly the Prime Minister could clarify that situation.

Mr. St. Laurent: The expression "Dominion of Canada" has been used for something over 86 years now, and it certainly is not an improper expression, but the name given by the constitution to this country is "Canada". The provinces were united in one dominion under the name of Canada, so "Canada" is quite sufficient to describe the entity that was created by the British North America Act, but it was created as one dominion under the name of "Canada".

I think it is quite proper to use the expression "Dominion of Canada" or to call the country "Canada". The expression is in the British North America Act, and so long as it is there it is certainly complete justification for the description of this country, which has the name of Canada, as the "Dominion of Canada", because the provinces were united by the constitution into one dominion under the name of Canada.

Now, there are some who feel that the expression that was used at that time connotes that this country is under the dominion of some other country. I think the public at large, not only of this country but throughout the world, has now fully accepted the position of equality of status that was declared at the conference of 1926 and confirmed by the Statute of Westminster in 1931.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in the Statute of Westminster in 1931, Canada and the other portions of the commonwealth to which that act was made applicable were referred to as the dominions. Is that not correct? I should like the Prime Minister as well to say why it is that we shift back and forth. Some statutes have been amended so as to provide for the description of our country as "Canada"; other statutes retain the words "Dominion of Canada". What is the reason for the uncertainty about it, and why should it be necessary to change to "Canada", instead of allowing the description to remain as it appears in the Statute of Westminster?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know of the need for any change, but the hon. gentleman is sometimes described as Mr. Diefenbaker, Q.C., and sometimes as the hon. member for Prince Albert. They are both appropriate descriptions, and we all now understand who the gentleman referred to is, whichever expression is used. I believe the public now understand that this is the country referred to, whether it is referred to as "Canada" or "the Dominion of Canada".

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Harris) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 450, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1955 not exceeding $123,508,334 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1956; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $115,999,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $115,999,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is the annual resolution that precedes the introduction of the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act. Hon. members will recall that in 1952 the form of this legislation was changed so as to include the financing of all capital expenditures whether authorized in that act or in earlier financing and guarantee acts. This procedure has been followed again this year.

The bill to be founded on this resolution is divided into three specific parts. The first is to authorize the Canadian National Railways to incur capital expenditures up to $75,999,000. The second authorizes the railway company to make capital expenditures prior to July 1, 1956, to discharge obligations incurred under this act which become due and payable after January 1, 1956, in the amount of $40 million. The third authorizes the railway company to enter into contracts for new equipment and for general additions and betterments in the amount of $45,681,498.

To summarize, parliament is being asked to approve financing, either by way of the issue of new securities guaranteed by the government or by way of direct loan, in the amount of $115,999,000. For the convenience of hon. members I would ask permission to place on Hansard a table giving the details of this amount.

In addition, this year's bill will provide for the appointment of the auditors of the Canadian National Railways for the year 1954. Hon. members will remember that in previous years the appointment was made by a special bill. As this relates to the finances of the railway it was felt appropriate to include it in the annual financing and guarantee act. I may say that the figure of $115,999,000 that I have mentioned for this year compares with $234 million last year.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to place the table he mentioned on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: The table is as follows:

Additions and betterments (excluding new equipment)		$ 44,758,334
Branch line construction		12,160,000
New equipment		60,897,000
Acquisition of securities		5,693,000
Capital expenditures, January 1, 1956 to June 30, 1956, incurred prior to January 1, 1956		40,000,000
		$163,508,334
Less:
Amount available from depreciation reserve	$ 12,394,000
Retirement of equipment	20,115,334
Working capital available for capital expenditures	15,000,000
		47,509,334
		$115,999,000

Mr. Macdonnell: The statement which the parliamentary assistant has placed on Hansard, and of which I received a copy, shows certain amounts deductible from what would otherwise be expended, namely depreciation reserves, retirement of equipment, and working capital available for capital expenditures, totalling in all some $47 million. That does not include a figure which was in the statement placed before the committee by the officials of the railway, a figure of some $19 million from the sale of preferred stock. My understanding is that that will be referred to in the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: It was referred to in last year's bill. This year's bill will be patterned on last year's and will provide that the $115,-999,000 is to be inclusive of anything that is subscribed by the finance minister for preferred stock of the railway under the refinancing act of 1952.

Mr. Macdonnell: While it is as broad as it is long, when in fact that preferred stock is purchased the amount required will be altered in that way. I have one other question. The Minister of Transport notified the house a day or two ago of certain additional expenditures on branch lines in Quebec. Will that amount be included in these figures, and will it be in this legislation?

Mr. Benidickson: That is apart from the amounts referred to in the C.N.R. resolution. My understanding is that those will be covered in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell: By what?

Mr. Benidickson: The supplementary estimates.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Harris) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 451, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system, etc.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES

MEASURE TO PROVIDE GUARANTEE ON LOANS TO FISHERMEN

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to assist fishermen engaged in primary fishing enterprises by encouraging the provision of bank loans to fishermen, such loans to be guaranteed with limitations by the crown; moneys payable to banks under the act to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance was good enough to ask me whether I would give the explanation of this resolution. This is to be a bill of the Department of Finance, but of course it is of special interest and concern to the fishing industry in Canada.

With all due modesty I must claim some little part in the paternity of this measure. In the four years that I was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, twice I put through in this house the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I must confess that I do not think any other bill so impressed me as being an extremely useful piece of legislation that proved to be of great assistance to the farmers of Canada. The first year the act was in operation, as I recall it, just $3 million was lent for limited purposes. In recent years almost $100 million a year has been lent under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

When I became Minister of Fisheries I was naturally anxious that a similar act be passed in order to enable the fishermen to get the same type of intermediate credit from the chartered banks at reasonable rates because of a government guarantee to the banks against losses. However, we found that there were certain obstacles. One of the obstacles was the fact that the type of fisherman who needed such assistance most—that is the fisherman with just a small boat—found it almost impossible to insure his vessel at reasonable rates. Naturally the banks are rather reluctant to lend money on the security of a fishing boat which could be lost at sea, if that boat had no insurance.

Two years ago, as a first step in this direction, as hon. members will recall, we brought in the fishermen's indemnity fund, which gives a form of insurance to commercial fishermen on payment of a premium of 1 per cent. That scheme is now working out very well, so it is now possible to take the next step of introducing a fishermen's improvement loans act similar to the Farm Improvement Loans Act in order to give these fishermen the opportunity of obtaining intermediate credit on favourable terms.

Having made that explanation I think perhaps I should now actually read the statement which would have been given by the Minister of Finance, in order to give accurately the financial details of this proposal.

The purpose of this bill is to increase the availability of intermediate-term credit to fishermen. It is to help the average fisherman to make more use of the credit facilities of the banks to meet his business needs. As hon. members are aware, the existing practices by which the average fisherman who owns his own boat and fishing equipment can borrow money to improve his capital equipment differ throughout the industry and in different regions of the country. In general they fall short of the opportunities which are open to small urban business owners and to farmers.

Fisheries

In the fisheries, short-term or seasonal credit is provided mainly by fish buyers, supply houses, merchants, credit unions and, to some extent, by the banks. In addition there are provincial loan boards in some of the provinces which provide long-term credit to fishermen for the purchase of larger boats, as part of the provincial economic development programs. The government feels that additional credit facilities should be particularly useful in the field of intermediate-term credit. We believe that a gap exists so far as this type of credit is concerned, and it is hoped that the proposed act will put the fishermen on an equal footing with farmers with respect to bank borrowing to meet their capital needs.

In short, we hope this act will enable fishermen to borrow from the banks for periods of, say, two to eight years for the purchase or major repair of boats, engines, gear and the like. This will not only improve the lot of the average fisherman but, in those cases where fish-processing companies are thereby relieved of the need to lend money to fishermen for capital improvements, it will also mean a lesser demand on the working capital of these processing companies and, consequently, an improvement in their competitive position.

Perhaps I could intervene here in order to explain the various ways in which fishermen across the country get what intermediate credit is available to them. In the province of Newfoundland it is almost entirely given by merchants in the little outports. It is very seldom in the form of cash but generally in the form of credit.

In Nova Scotia it is a combination of credit by the merchants and credit by the fishing companies. The fishermen who work for fishing companies will get credit from the fishing company for the improvement of their boats and gear. The fishing companies, of course, borrow that money on their credit standing from the chartered banks. In British Columbia it is almost entirely from the fishing companies. The major fishing companies of British Columbia have millions of dollars outstanding in interim credit to fishermen for the purchase and improvement of their boats and gear.

The situation is not very satisfactory either to the fishermen or the companies. The companies have to borrow money for purposes other than the processing of fish. The fishermen who obtain loans from these companies naturally feel bound to them as far as the sale of fish is concerned, and so perhaps have not the full advantage of a competitive market.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

The introduction of direct bank loans to the fishermen will remove both these difficulties. It will remove from the companies the obligation or necessity of advancing such moneys which they have to borrow from the banks, and it will give the fishermen the opportunity to borrow directly from the banks and so will relieve them of any direct tie in with the company which might affect the way they choose to sell their fish.

Returning to the statement of the Minister of Finance, for these reasons it is thought desirable that facilities similar to those provided under the Farm Improvement Loans Act should be made available to the fishermen. Since the enactment of the Farm Improvement Loans Act in 1945, over $500 million has been provided through bank loans to farmers for the improvement and development of farms. A certain proportion of these loans is guaranteed by the government and, as is well known, the actual amount of loss over the years has been small. On the whole these farm improvement loans have been of considerable value in the improvement and mechanization of Canadian farms.

The Farm Improvement Loans Act has ensured that credit facilities are available to farmers at reasonable rates of interest and for sufficiently long terms. The scheme under which these loans are made takes advantage of the existing network of branch banks, and the government guarantee has had the effect of encouraging the banks to engage in a new field of bank lending. As a result, Canadian farmers have benefited from a cheaper and more efficient method of financing the purchase of farm implements and equipment. It is hoped that similar methods will prove of use to fishermen and enable them to take advantage of more efficient methods of operation.

I feel it necessary, however, to point out that these objectives cannot be realized overnight, and that we must be prepared for fairly slow progress. Fishing communities are more scattered and isolated compared with the average farm settlement, and bank facilities are not easily accessible to all of them. It is to be expected, therefore, that additional bank lending, even under a government guarantee, will only develop gradually. Mind you, that was the picture, too, of loans under the first Farm Improvement Loans Act. The actual progress was very slow the first year or two, but when knowledge of the plan became more widespread and the banks became more accustomed to this type of loan the rate of lending increased very rapidly.

I turn now to the provisions of the proposed act. Simply stated, the act lays down the general conditions which the banks must meet in order that their loans to fishermen can be covered by the government guarantee. Of necessity the details governing these and other aspects of the scheme must be left to the regulations. In order to offset the special risks of bank lending in a relatively new field, and to provide a reasonable incentive for the banks to expand their business in this direction, each bank will be guaranteed against loss up to 15 per cent of the total amount of its loans where the aggregate amount of its loans does not exceed $500,000. A guarantee of 10 per cent will be applicable to the total loans made by each bank in excess of $500,000—a 15 per cent guarantee on the first $500,000 and 10 per cent on loans above $500,000. Any amount payable to a bank under the act will be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

I would hope that this guarantee will diminish the obstacles to bank lending in the fisheries, or compensate for them. Our previous experience with loans made by the chartered banks under a partial government guarantee to farmers, veterans and home owners has shown that the banks have been fully co-operative. They have expanded their operations in these directions and this experience, along with the efficiency shown by the banks in these operations, give us good reason to look with confidence toward the improvement of the fisheries in this regard.

Of course it will be necessary to fix an over-all limit to the total amount of loans made by all banks to which this government guarantee will apply. Having considered the annual capital requirements of the primary fishing industry, a ceiling of $15 million over a three year period was thought to be reasonable. At the end of the three year period it will be appropriate to reconsider the adequacy of this figure.

Mr. Macdonnell: Revolving?

Mr. Sinclair: It would be, yes. I may say that as Minister of Fisheries I think this figure is more than adequate for the first three years.

The purposes for which bank loans may be made are broadly defined in the act and include every kind of permanent improvement associated with a primary fishing enterprise. Loans may be made for the purchase or construction of a fishing vessel or the hull, superstructure or engine of the vessel; the purchase or construction of shore installations, and the purchase, construction, repair or alteration of any building used in a primary enterprise, such as a net loft, for example.

I should point out, perhaps, that the act does not make provision for loans for home improvement. As you know, this type of borrowing from the banks is provided for under the National Housing Act. It is quite true the Farm Improvement Loans Act now provides for home improvement, but that came in only after several years of operation.

Guaranteed loans will be confined to bona fide commercial fishermen. The conditions of eligibility are not onerous, but a borrower will be expected to have a financial stake in fish-catching equipment appropriate to the type of fishery in which he is engaged. It is not intended to make the benefits of this legislation available to commercial fishing enterprises, that is, plants ashore.

The provisions in the act dealing with the taking of security are substantially the same as in the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. It is intended that the security requirements to be laid down in the regulations will be flexible and will be appropriate to the conditions and practices of the different fisheries.

The maximum amount which may be borrowed by a fisherman has been set at $4,000. The maximum period of repayment will be eight years and the regulations will set forth appropriate terms for loans of various amounts. The rate of interest which the bank may charge on loans will be 5 per cent, the same rate now applicable to farmers. The regulations will give guidance in the matter of down payments and the frequency of instalments. As far as is practically possible, the terms and conditions of loans will be such as to conform with the individual circumstances of the borrower, having in mind the size and purpose of the loan.

Among other things, the act will make provision for regulations and the measures which the banks must or may take in the event of default. This follows largely the example set in the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

I should add that although we already have on the statute books a Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act, this act has proven unsuitable to the needs of fishermen. Very few loans have been made under it, and it is therefore intended that no further loans shall be made under this act when the proposed fisheries improvement loans act comes into force.

The Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act was enacted in 1935 as a companion act to the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It is chapter 52 of the statutes of 1935. It provided for only long-term loans and security by mortgage on the fisherman's land and home. It has proved of very little advantage. In the last report of the Canadian farm loan board, that for 1954, they say there have been only 79 loans under the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act since it was passed in 1935, totalling $40,000, and there are only eight of these loans outstanding today. That act will be repealed when this act comes into effect.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from a province where agriculture is our first industry in importance and fisheries our second, I am very conscious of the comparison and contrast between federal legislation dealing with agriculture on the one hand and with fisheries on the other. We are all familiar with the legislation placed on the statute books at various times dealing with certain phases of the two industries—production, research, marketing and long-term credit. There has been similar legislation in both fields. But for a number of years now, as the minister has pointed out, there has been provision under the Farm Improvement Loans Act for intermediate-term loans to farmers. I think most farmers will agree this is most useful legislation, and that it has been very successful and has fulfilled very well the need for which it was designed.

In contrast to that, until now, for reasons which the minister has pointed out, the same type of credit was not readily available to fishermen. Fishermen in the maritimes at least have suffered from that lack of credit. The circumstances under which they have laboured have been a handicap to them. Therefore the legislation forecast by the resolution is, generally speaking, welcomed by this group because we feel if it is as successful as the Farm Improvement Loans Act it will certainly meet a very considerable need.

However, there is one thing I should like to point out. When credit of this type was not available to fishermen through the banks in certain areas of the country the fishermen formed credit unions. These credit unions have financed this type of loan for a great many years.

It has occurred to me to wonder whether consideration has been given—I presume it has, or I hope it will be—to the position these credit unions will now occupy when this legislation guarantees loans from the banks. Perhaps loans from credit unions will not be guaranteed by this legislation; I am not sure of that. I would hope the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Finance would both carefully consider the possibility of including loans made by credit unions to these fishermen, and treating them the same as loans made by banks. This would avoid putting the credit unions in an unfavourable credit position with the banks, after they have served the fishermen well for a number of years so far as intermediate-term loans are concerned.

Having said that, I think I might say that in principle it would seem the legislation forecast by this resolution will improve the position of the fishermen. I should like to say again that I hope the position of the credit unions, which in many cases are owned by the fishermen themselves, will not be forgotten, and that consideration will be given to incorporating into this legislation a provision guaranteeing loans made by credit unions. After all, the fishermen contributed to these unions and in that way worked out their own financing problems for some years.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I rise to welcome this legislation. My constituency has a large fishing interest. There are one or two points about the legislation as outlined by the minister which I think bear some comment.

It does seem to me that the top limit of $4,000 is rather low in view of the present-day engine and hull prices. I am sure the minister will agree with me that $4,000 does not buy very much of a fishing boat at today's prices and in the light of today's technical requirements.

I wonder whether any consideration has been given to the possibility of making loans to fishing partnerships. I have in mind this sort of situation. We have on the Pacific coast a number of seiners that are owned in partnership, perhaps two or three members of the crew being the owners of the vessel. In some instances of which I know all six or seven members of the crew share in the ownership of the vessel. I wonder whether any provision may be made to permit such individuals to pool their borrowing eligibility under this new legislation.

The same argument might apply even to such types of operation as gill netting. The minister may be aware that large gill net vessels on the Pacific coast often require two men for efficient operation. It would seem to me that if two men in partnership were permitted to operate under the terms of this act it would be much more effective.

Then there was some reference to shore installations. I presume, judging by the later comments of the minister, that this was meant merely to apply to comparatively modest shore installations. He mentioned a net loft, though even that is a fairly extensive proposition. I presume it would not include anything in the nature of really elaborate shore installations, such as are owned by the large commercial fishing corporations. I wonder whether any consideration has been given to the installations of such an organization as Kyuquot trollers on the west coast, a co-operative organization with which the minister will be well acquainted. It is one of the most successful of our fishermen's co-operatives on the Pacific coast. For a number of years they have maintained not so much shore installations as what we on the Pacific coast call fishing camps for the collecting of the fish and the circulation of groceries and supplies the fishermen require. Here again it seems to me the same type of combined loan to all the members on their joint property might be of considerable value.

I should like also to support the contention of the hon. member who spoke just before me concerning credit unions. We have one of the largest credit unions in the city of Vancouver, the gulf fishermen's credit union. It is a very efficiently run organization, and has been supplying a great deal of the financial requirements of the fishermen during these years.

I should like to see some provision made to help the credit unions continue this sort of work, rather than perhaps place them in such a position that they will wither away and die. It is not merely for loans for fishing equipment that the credit unions have been valuable to the fishermen, but to meet other types of expenses as well. It would be a great loss to them if the credit unions were obliged to fail on account of what would virtually be government subsidized bank competition.

With these few remarks I should like to say again I am certainly happy to see this legislation introduced. I am quite sure the fishermen on the Pacific coast will benefit greatly from it.

Mr. Patterson: I rise to express my appreciation of this resolution that is now before us, and to give it our support. For some time now the fishermen have felt that in some respects they have been placed at a disadvantage. They have looked around and seen the facilities that have been placed at the disposal of those engaged in other industries, and then compared their own limited facilities. This has led them to believe they have been at a disadvantage. I am sure the measure now before us will receive the wholehearted support of the fishermen, and they no doubt will express their appreciation of it.

The minister has made a statement outlining some of the features that will be embodied in the bill. At this time it is not possible for us to comprehend all that is involved, so we are going to leave any further comment until the bill is introduced. However, let me again say we welcome this measure and intend to give it our support.

Mr. MacEachen: Like other hon. members who have already spoken on this measure, I want to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries for introducing the legislation forecast by this resolution. Since he has been minister the fishermen of the Atlantic provinces have become accustomed to getting constructive measures from his department, and this is simply another constructive measure in the series already adopted under his leadership.

The effect of this legislation will be to assist in the further capitalization of the fishing industry of the Atlantic provinces. In reaching that objective the legislation will be meeting one of the real, historic problems of the fishing industry in the Atlantic provinces. The need for the modernization of the fishing industry in production, distribution and processing has been already underscored by persons who are very familiar with that industry in this country. One of the great difficulties in attacking this modernization has been the lack of available capital for the development of modern equipment for production, distribution and processing.

In 1945, when the provincial government at Halifax appointed its royal commission on provincial development and rehabilitation, Professor Dawson, the chairman of that commission, retained the former deputy minister of fisheries, Mr. Bates, to investigate the condition of the fisheries in the Atlantic provinces, more particularly in Nova Scotia. I think it was as a result of the masterful analysis of the industry made by Mr. Bates that we have obtained so many commendable improvements in the industry.

I am sure it will surprise hon. members to learn that as late as 1940 the investment in fishing vessels in Nova Scotia was $3·1 million and in gear was $2·5 million. The total investment in catching equipment as recently as 1940 in Nova Scotia was $5·6 million, which represents an average investment per fisherman of something like $800. This of course has reflected very seriously in the type of craft the average fisherman could use. It was reflected also in his range from the shore, and also in his great dependence on the weather. So the fisherman in the maritime provinces was always handicapped by the instruments with which he had to pursue a very difficult and hazardous occupation. The result was that over 80 per cent of the fishermen of Nova Scotia had to depend for their incomes upon the types of fish that were easily caught along the shore.

This lack of capitalization in the fisheries of Nova Scotia resulted from the fact that no credit agency ever interested itself seriously in providing loan facilities for the fishermen. As the minister pointed out in his remarks, the fishermen depended primarily for the satisfaction of their credit needs upon the fish exporter or the local merchant, which resulted in a type of feudal bondage in the fishing communities of Nova Scotia that has been very difficult to eradicate, and has been one of the real obstacles to improvement in the industry itself.

Also the general unprofitability of the industry, in the thirties particularly, led to a condition in which no facilities were provided either by the life insurance companies, the mortgage companies or the trust companies to service the credit needs of the fishermen of the province of Nova Scotia. It was also realized that this lack of credit facilities, and the development of this relationship among the exporter, the local merchant and the fisherman, should be remedied. Great efforts were undertaken through the credit union movement in the maritimes to overcome this condition.

However, the development of credit unions was not adequate to provide long-term credit, although it did make an excellent contribution in providing for the short-term credit needs of fishermen of Nova Scotia. At that time the credit unions undertook a very difficult task in offering loans to fishermen whose gear and boats were never insured, and indeed who had very little security to offer to the credit unions offering the loans.

Therefore I wish to join with the other hon. members who have spoken in urging that the minister consider allowing credit unions to become lending agencies under this proposed legislation. The credit unions of Nova Scotia have an excellent history of sound and trustworthy business operations. Since the organization of the credit unions total loans of approximately $40 million have been made to their membership. Of that amount only $37,000 has been charged against the guarantee fund. During the same time in New Brunswick a total of $34 million has been lent and only $12,000 has been written off by way of bad debts. The result is that we can offer evidence of good and trustworthy credit institutions.

The credit unions, in many instances, are completely owned and operated by the fishermen. Furthermore they are located in small villages which normally are not served by the chartered banks. In addition to this, in the operations of many credit unions there is a loan protection insurance contract which insures that upon the death or total disability of the borrower, the loan is paid off.

Because I believe the inclusion of credit unions would indeed enhance the operations of this proposed measure, and would enlarge the number of outlets for service to the fishermen, I suggest that some further consideration be given to the institutions which really assisted the fishermen in those days when the normal credit organizations in the country regarded fishermen as poor risks.

Let me say in conclusion that the credit unions have taken a keen interest in the whole social and economic evolution of the many fishing villages in which they operate. For that reason I am sure they would be among the very first who would attempt to take advantage of the terms of this proposed legislation.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister referred to the fishermen's indemnity fund. Could he give us the figures in that connection?

Mr. Sinclair: On my estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell: Could he give us some information about the losses sustained in connection with farm improvement loans? I understand they are small. Perhaps he could give us a rough figure on that. Also I would ask what security the government demands. In connection with loans on land, of course they are very simple and easy to give, and facilities are available everywhere. Is there any difficulty in connection with fishermen giving security? Is there any problem connected with local laws which would make it difficult to do that, in a general way?

Mr. Sinclair: I understand the local problems to which the hon. member refers. Most of the coastal provinces have legislation forbidding the seizure for debt of a fisherman's boat or gear. Those are considered to be the implements of his trade. But our legal officers point out that in this instance the fisherman voluntarily enters into a covenant in the nature of a mortgage on his boat or engine, in return for this loan. Our legal authorities are assured that this sort of agreement can be entered into legally. So the security of course will be the fisherman's boat or gear, which will of course be covered by insurance.

Then, so far as the fishermen's indemnity fund is concerned, that is in fact an insurance scheme for small fishing vessels. We have the full details in our records for three years of operation.

Mr. Macdonnell: Speaking generally, has it been successful?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes; we have been able to increase the coverage in British Columbia for the same premium, because the premiums coming in have been much greater than the losses. In the maritime provinces we have just about broken even on vessel insurance, but have lost a little on gear insurance. We are trying out one form of gear insurance, lobster trap insurance, to find out whether it is possible to insure gear—that is, gear in the water.

Mr. Balcom: Mr. Chairman, I wish to give my hearty support to the principle behind this resolution. It is another important step in the progressive legislation affecting the fisheries enacted by this government in the past few years.

We hear much these days of productivity and its vital importance to a prosperous industry. We tend to think that efficiency and mechanization are more important to manufacturing and mining, perhaps, than they are to the fishing industry. I would like to put the emphasis the other way and point out that modern equipment not only means greater take-home pay to the fisherman, but it is also important to his safety and at times even a matter of life or death. This fact has been obscured because the fishermen have had to make do with what they could obtain on their own or on the credit of local merchants and processors. The very hazards of the industry have prevented the banks from providing much needed credit for the smaller individual fisherman.

The first steps to alleviate this problem were taken in 1953, when the government made provision for cheap insurance for smaller boats and gear. At the same time protection against extraordinary losses to lobster traps was afforded under an insurance scheme administered by the Department of Fisheries. These measures set the stage for the extension of bank credit, and with a guarantee against a proportion of losses proposed in this bill they should assure a flow of much-needed capital to the industry.

I should like to join with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond and the hon. member for Queens in their statements regarding credit unions. We have many credit unions in Nova Scotia and we have the credit union league of Nova Scotia at Antigonish which is affiliated with the credit union national association. There were times during the years when fishermen found it absolutely impossible to obtain any loans from the banks, and it was through these unions that they got into business, sometimes in a small way and at other times on quite a large scale. I would ask the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Finance to give every consideration to the credit unions so they may come under these guaranteed loans. As a matter of fact, today in Nova Scotia the credit unions play a large part in our economy.

As with the Farm Improvement Loans Act, this legislation is designed to be of assistance to the smaller fisherman. The loans are limited in size and term, and will be taken up mainly by the inshore fishermen. This, however, should not be taken as an indication of the government's paternalism to this aspect of the industry. The companies operating trawlers and associated processing plants can usually arrange their own financing because of the nature of their assets.

It should be emphasized that the inshore and offshore fisheries are really two different industries rather than competitive parts of the same trade. The lobster fishery, for example, is prosecuted entirely by inshore fishermen, and it is very important to all of us that the largest possible catches be obtained. Last year the volume landed in Nova Scotia was 22,971,000 pounds, with a value of $8,838,000. Almost the whole production was exported to the United States. There is no problem in marketing fresh lobsters from Nova Scotia, and the more our fishermen catch the more United States dollars Canada earns.

I am indeed sorry to learn, and I find it very hard to understand, that the bill does not include a provision for improving the living conditions of fishermen's families similar to that guaranteed in the Farm Improvement Loans Act, by facilitating the provision of electrification, refrigeration, heating and water systems in their homes, and other improvements to reduce work, particularly for women in the home; for we must recognize that fishing, like farming, is not only a means of livelihood but is also a way of life. The fisherman and his family are entitled to the benefits of our modern society, provided that their enterprise is soundly based. While we all admit that the fisherman's lot is a hard one, we state emphatically that it is soundly based.

Mr. Bell: I should like to indicate generally my interest in this piece of legislation. I think it will be accepted by the fishermen in the harbours and along the coast of New Brunswick. I have three hopes I should like to express, that I should like to see in the bill when it is introduced by the minister.

I mention first of all the regulations. They will be separate from the bill, and I express the hope that they will not be too rigid, too strict or too difficult with respect to loans. We all know that while the farm loans have been fairly successful they have been quite difficult to obtain, and we hope the fishermen will find it a little easier to obtain the small loans they need for their equipment.

The minister mentioned that the loans will be confined to bona fide fishermen. I would hope that the interpretation of this expression would include fishermen who are on a part-time basis, and even some who may be on a sharing plan. These are the small operators who have other occupations. They do other work in the winter, and when the fishing season rolls around they take to the harbours along the coast to fish for salmon and gaspereau. We hope they will be included, because this is one group who will be very much in need of assistance such as this.

Third, the insurance problem was not made clear to me. I know that insurance was mentioned. The minister said the equipment would be insured. I am wondering whether a mutual scheme is being considered. Perhaps that would be the best method. I am wondering whether the responsibility for insurance will fall on the fisherman. Perhaps the mutual plan would be a little more desirable from the fisherman's point of view.

With these reservations we welcome this legislation. It has been said that this is the second stage. The first stage was low-cost insurance. I hope there will be a third stage. I was pleased to hear the other day that consideration was being given to unemployment insurance. I hope that is another stage in meeting the demands of the small fisherman. The department and the minister generally have been making quite an effort for the fisherman. It has been directed mainly toward the offshore fisherman, as has been admitted. We hope this is another stage in the plans of the department, and that they will consider those people who will always be small operators but who perform quite a duty in our everyday life on the east coast.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, it is getting on to six o'clock. Ordinarily I would not discuss a resolution preceding a bill, I would wait for the bill; but in this particular case I am pretty sure the bill will not contain one of the features which I would like to see included in it.

Some three weeks ago I received telegrams from the secretary of the Nova Scotia credit union league and from one of the directors of the Nova Scotia co-operative union, asking me to determine on the resolution preceding the bill whether the legislation would contain a provision under which credit unions would be given the same privilege as the chartered banks. I checked with the people in the Department of Finance who would know, and after some time I was informed from that source that the provision I was thinking about, that the bill would be applicable to credit unions in the same way as to chartered banks, would not be in the bill.

So at this time I am going to argue, maybe at some length, why I believe what I want should be in the bill, in the hope that we may be able to persuade the minister to carry the matter a little further before the bill comes in.

Would you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, for a minute or two before six o'clock I was making a few remarks upon this resolution that precedes the bill. At that time I had pointed out that ordinarily I do not discuss a resolution preceding a bill but rather wait for the bill itself. However, in this particular case, after I saw this resolution on the order paper some three weeks ago and after others saw it outside the house, I received some correspondence and telegrams.

I mentioned two; one was from the treasurer of the Nova Scotia credit union league, and the other was from one of the directors of the Nova Scotia co-operative union, suggesting that I might get in touch with the people in the finance department who would have to do with the drawing of the bill and determine whether it was the intention of the government, in the bill that will come in after this resolution is passed, to bring credit unions as such within the scope of the legislation; that is, to find out whether it was the intention to provide for that chain of finance in what is being provided for the chartered banks by the proposed legislation.

After probing the matter with people in the finance department who, I suppose, checked it carefully with their officials and advisers, I was told this. You might as well make your speech, because that particular chain of finance is not going to be included. So at this time, before the bill is finalized and brought into the house, I am going to offer some arguments as to why I think the credit union chain of finance across this country should be included in the bill.

When the bill is brought forward, Mr. Chairman, it will embody exactly the same principle as that embodied in the Industrial Development Bank Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The industrialist who wants to expand his plant through the industrial development bank, or who wants to make additions to it, can go to the chartered banks and borrow a certain amount of money with the government underwriting the risk. The same thing is true with respect to the farmer under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. In the final analysis it is the taxpayers of Canada who accept the risk in that particular line of investment. I cannot see any reason why in this particular bill, if the taxpayers are going to underwrite the risks for the chartered banks, it is not possible for the government to include what is a fairly well established chain of finance across this country today, namely the credit unions.

I should just like to point this out, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the desirability of bringing the credit unions under this bill as lending institutions. I was associated with that movement for a long time, and I am still a participating member. I can remember the situation back in the 1930's. We were at that time living in what I considered to be a rather hopeless world. There was not much to fasten on to. Everybody was unemployed. Everyone was seeking a way out, and nobody seemed to know the way. At that time, when St. Francis Xavier University decided that at least they were going to try to do something, they proposed the setting up of study groups throughout the province. I might say I helped them in that matter. We began to study the possibilities of doing things for ourselves. At that time it looked to us as though the mechanics of society, as we had known them, had pretty well broken down and that there was not much hope.

When that credit union movement first started, with nobody seeking any remuneration but merely trying to establish an objective that would give people something to fasten on to by way of changing the mechanics of society, we were laughed at fairly generally. We were called the new bankers. I can remember quite well that I helped dig postholes for about the third credit union that was established in that province. We put on an excursion. We gathered a bit of money. We obtained some material. Then we dug the holes for the concrete posts on which we put our first building.

Of course we were ridiculed. There were not many of us then. But today that organization has proved itself. In this particular field—the field of the fishermen, right from the Gaspe coast clean through to Newfoundland—that was the movement that came to their rescue. The banks were not interested. There was no collateral. You could not get a loan. The credit unions were formed, largely along the Gaspe coast; and I think it was equally true out on the Queen Charlotte islands on the British Columbia coast.

The fishermen today have their own means of credit. They built those local organizations into leagues in the provinces; in every province in Canada today there is a credit union act. In addition to the acts that look after the legal and accounting needs of the local credit unions, there is the credit union league where the surplus finances of the credit union units are pooled for the purpose of making long-term loans.

In addition to that, the scope has been expanded. It was only recently, I think in 1953, that the present federal government enacted the national credit societies act. The purpose of that act was to link up the credit unions of Canada from coast to coast under a national charter. Today, for all practical purposes, you have the national chain with all the mechanics that can be devised by government linking that national chain from coast to coast.

I am at a loss to understand why the government should take the position that credit unions cannot be included as lending institutions under the terms of this resolution. The provinces provide for check-ups. Every three months the books of every local union are audited by a government auditor. Reports are made monthly to the provincial treasurers. Every bit of protection that can be brought to bear on the organization, in making it responsible to its membership and in forcing it to care properly for its funds, has been brought to bear on it.

Prior to the setting up of the national credit societies act the unions operated provincially, but that is no longer true. With the mechanics set up under the national act today, this organization can make loans interprovincially. Suppose, for example, a province like Saskatchewan, where there is quite a large amount of development, wanted to invest money in Nova Scotia. The last figure I saw indicated that the combined assets of the credit unions in Saskatchewan topped some $27 million, but they are lending money to a much greater extent than that. If Saskatchewan, for example, wanted to invest money in Nova Scotia or in New Brunswick or on the Gaspe coast, by lending it to fishermen, there would be nothing to stop Saskatchewan from investing in this organization for that purpose, if credit unions were included as lending institutions under the legislation that is being brought in here. There is no reason in the world why it should not be done at this time, unless the government decides not to do so.

I want to make it very clear that this is not a plea by any particular party in the house. Nobody has a monopoly of the field with which we are dealing this evening. The remarks of hon. members on the government side of the house, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond and the junior member for Halifax, the remarks of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and of several from this group, have indicated very clearly to the government that this is not a partisan move at all. It is a move that I think practically every member of the house will agree with, provided cabinet council or the advisers of the Minister of Finance say that the proposition is practical.

Let me call another important and very good witness from the other side of the house. He puts the case for the proposition perhaps much clearer than most of us could. Some time ago I happened to pick up an address delivered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the Stoney Point co-operative at St. Joachim, Ontario. In that speech he dealt with the purposes for which co-operatives were formed. The minister's speeches are always very good reading. They contain a lot of logic, are forward-looking, and he is a very good witness at this time. In speaking on the subject I am commenting on at the present time he said at page 3 of his speech, along with a lot of other good advice:

> In 1953 parliament passed the Co-operative Credit Associations Act which provided a legal framework for the co-operative credit structure in Canada.

If the minister's cabinet colleagues and the advisers of the Minister of Finance take the minister's words literally, in the way he intended them, they will realize he was pointing out to the co-operative group which he was addressing that the government had passed an act to set up a new financial structure in Canada under which it is possible for credit unions from coast to coast to pool their resources and sponsor any desirable project in any part of the country.

Mr. Sinclair: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member recalls, of course, that was a private bill and not a government-sponsored bill.

Mr. Gillis: It does not make any difference. The government certainly must have been favourable to it. Otherwise it would never have been passed.

Mr. Sinclair: There is a great difference between credit union societies coming forward to incorporate by private bill as federal companies and government-sponsored legislation in the financial field.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Gillis: I do not see any difference at all. The minister was taking full credit for it at this meeting. He said the government had passed the bill. That is all right, because if the government had not agreed it would never have been passed. I think they showed very good judgment at that time in passing the legislation, and I compliment the minister on making that clear to the people to whom he was talking. In his place I would have done exactly the same thing and would have never mentioned a private bill.

Mr. Martin: Did I not say that parliament passed the act?

Mr. Gillis: Yes, you did. I stand corrected, but that is merely a matter of quibbling with words. The government with its majority still manages parliament. However, I think that point is pretty well established. In referring to what I am arguing for at this time the minister pointed out that we should give these people the opportunity to finance their own endeavours through this new chain of finance existing in the country.

May I say here, Mr. Chairman, that as far as I am concerned if any sensible changes are to be made in the structure of society in future they will have to be based on more ownership for more people. Making loans available to fishermen for the purpose of expanding the fishing industry is one way in which more ownership can be placed in the hands of more people.

The fisheries industry, as the Minister of Fisheries points out very clearly every time I hear him talk, is undergoing a drastic technological change. The fishing industry, as well as almost every other industry in the country, is going through the process of mechanization. More and more the need for better equipment and larger boats for the shore fishermen is going to become apparent, for they are in danger of being swept off the water because of technological advances. The government has made provision for loans to companies for large draggers and trawlers, and the small fisherman is being pushed out of the picture. But if we can provide the means for him to join with his comrades in the industry in the pooling of their resources through the medium of a credit union, thus enabling them to secure larger boats and fish on a co-operative basis, I think we will meet the problem confronting the shore fishermen at the present time. I seriously suggest to the government that before the bill is finally adopted more consideration should be given to the possibility of including credit unions as lending institutions within the meaning of the legislation.

I wish to refer again to the very excellent speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I can tell those who are interested in the question of credit unions and co-operatives that it is good reading. Every member of the house should have a copy of it. The reason I am referring to it at this time, Mr. Chairman, is to underline the non-partisan attitude that has been taken by members who have spoken on the subject both in the house and outside of it. At page 5 of his speech the minister goes on to deal with the development of credit unions, and I think I will put his words on the record because they are much more eloquent than any words of mine would be.

An hon. Member: Don't quote too much.

Mr. Gillis: I am trying to get credit unions included. The minister said:

> The late Alphonse Desjardins, a Hansard reporter from Levis, founded in the year 1900 the first credit union anywhere in North America.

That should swing around our Quebec members. The idea had its very roots in the province of Quebec. The minister continues:

> Today, there are no less than 3,600 credit unions and caisses populaires, having a total membership of close to 1,500,000 people. Many of these credit unions have established provincial co-operative credit societies in order that the service they offer to their members may be more flexible and comprehensive. The co-operative financial structure is strengthened by the existence and growth of co-operatives in the closely related field of insurance.
> A few years ago I had the privilege of visiting St. Francis Xavier University at Antigonish, Nova Scotia, an institution which holds an honoured place in the development of the co-operative movement in Canada. At that time I had the opportunity of studying at first hand the bold and far-reaching program of the university's extension department which, under the direction of Dr. M. M. Coady and the late A. B. MacDonald achieved such remarkable results throughout the surrounding countryside.
> In the little fishing villages of Nova Scotia and in the mining centres across the straits of Canso in picturesque Cape Breton Island, I saw stores, banks, lobster factories and other community undertakings that had been developed under the guidance of men like Dr. Coady, Professor MacDonald, and the late Reverend Dr. James Tompkins, the beloved "Father Jimmy", whose name will always be associated with the pioneering project in co-operative housing at Tompkinsville, Nova Scotia.

I must say I compliment the minister on the research he did in bringing the story up to date. This speech from which I am quoting was delivered on March 22, 1955, so the statistics are right up to date.

I should like to point out further, Mr. Chairman, that in so far as Nova Scotia is concerned—I think it is equally true of New Brunswick and the west coast—there is hardly a section of the province where this legislation would not be operative if credit unions were included. For example, many people think of the town of Glace Bay and the cities of Sydney and Halifax as industrial sections. In each of those towns and cities in which there is a credit union functioning, a large percentage of the membership of those credit unions is made up of fishermen, as the minister knows. The town of Glace Bay is looked upon as a mining town, but one of the largest swordfishing industries in the country is located there, in addition to a large fish plant and a fishing fleet.

I know the important problem there is for the shore fishermen to improve their boats and equipment in order to avoid being run off the water by the larger trawlers. By accepting the recommendation that loans be made available to fishermen in this way you are covering the whole country. You would not only be benefiting the fishermen but you would have the backing of every section of Quebec, I believe—at least the Gaspe coast—New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I would certainly suggest, Mr. Chairman, that before the government puts this legislation in final form they give every consideration to amending it so credit unions will be included.

Again, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare points out, taking into consideration the world situation, the uncertainties of our times and the contending philosophies in our society, the crux of this whole threat of communism is contained in what the communists offer. What are they offering? They are only offering one thing. There is only one attractive part of their appeal; that is when they say, "Give us power over you and in return we will take the land from the landlords and give it to the peasants." Is that not their appeal? What is their appeal to the industrial workers in countries in which there are low wages, poor housing, slums and all the rest of it? Their appeal is when they say, "We will take control from the monopoly; we will decentralize industries, break them up into small blocks and give you, the proletariat, a share in the management and a share in the profits." They never do it, but that is their appeal.

In my judgment the only answer to that appeal is to improve the mechanics of society in this country, and all the free countries, so that every person can have a share in the development of the country. If we permit the fishermen and those associated with them in the credit unions the opportunity of sharing in the development of the resources of the country, then we are distributing to them individual ownership in proportion to the amount of capital they are able to put into an endeavour through their credit unions. The minister recognized that when he said on page 7 of his speech:

> Surely at no time in the world's uneven history has it been more essential for men and nations to foster and to maintain the ideals that have been the inspiration of these co-operative endeavours. In these times, when the godless philosophy of totalitarianism threatens the very foundations of our freedom, we must not lose sight of the vision of all men bound together by ties of understanding and co-operation. For nothing is more needed at this stage in the affairs of men than to bring to the relations between nations an appreciation of the value of co-operation and a recognition of the primacy of human welfare.

That, Mr. Chairman, is what I tried to say a moment ago, but the minister puts it in better language. I suggest that since we have already established a principle in two pieces of legislation, the industrial development bank and the Farm Improvement Loans Act, under which the taxpayers guarantee any risk that may be involved, we should now begin to test the principle enunciated in that speech by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As yet no member in this house has spoken against the proposal to include credit unions in the bill that is forecast by this resolution. There is a lot of common sense and the necessary machinery in this legislation if the government will get around to doing the sort of thing we are advocating here this evening. I trust that before the bill passes there will be a re-examination of it and the government will consider including credit unions.

If this is done, then for the first time we will be making a test on the national scale of the credit union leagues that exist across the country, buttressed by the Co-operative Credit Associations Act that now has all the legal mechanics to protect any investment that may be made through the medium of this legislation. We should now start to make a test of it, because in my judgment if we are going to retain a free world, a democratic society, then we have to begin giving the ordinary man an opportunity to participate in that democracy.

Mr. Ashbourne: I do not intend to take up much of the time of this committee, Mr. Chairman, but I think I would be remiss in my duty if I did not express, on behalf of the fishermen of Newfoundland, our sincere appreciation to the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Finance for the introduction of this measure. In my opinion this measure demonstrates again the great interest of the ministers in the toilers of the deep.

I feel that for too long, Mr. Chairman, the fishing industry has suffered from a lack of capital. While I know there have been instances of cash loans to fishermen by firms which have been interested in assisting them by providing various means to enlarge their income, there has been a limit to the amount of capital these firms have had available to assist these fishermen. In some cases, owing to the long term of the financing, it has imposed a hardship on the firms which have advanced the capital and has been a means of tying up necessary funds which might be employed in further extending their operations.

It has been said that fishermen are small capitalists. I believe this argument has been advanced as one reason why unemployment insurance has not been extended to them. I should like to point out that generally speaking the incomes of some fishermen are very meagre indeed. It is not easy to build up the necessary resources from their small earnings to undertake the type of fishing we see in this day and generation.

It was my privilege this morning to be present at the opening plenary session of the fifth annual meeting of the international commission on the northwest Atlantic fisheries here in the railway committee room. As I looked around—the Prime Minister was there and addressed the meeting, and the Minister of Fisheries was also in attendance—and saw the ten countries represented at that meeting, I thought of the fishermen, the men who pull the fish out of the water, sometimes pull them out fish by fish, or catch them in their nets. These are the people who will be helped by the bill now before us.

I know this bill will encourage these hardy, industrious producers, and will put new heart in them. It will encourage initiative; because when a man knows that his income will be for himself, and that he does not have to pay a large amount of interest and a large share of the profits for nets and twines, charges that are made to these people who have to depend upon credit, he will realize that by going to the bank and obtaining a loan he can be in a position where he can purchase the necessary supplies including nets, twines and the like, as well as boats and other equipment necessary in his occupation. They can get this equipment more cheaply if they have the cash available with which to make the purchases.

The indemnity insurance, to which reference was made by the Minister of Fisheries, has been of substantial assistance to those engaged in the fishing industry. I know that the provision of loans by the provincial government in Newfoundland has been most helpful in making available some very necessary capital to assist the fishing industry of that province to set up additional plants for the processing of fresh fish, and to have the industry operate along more modern lines.

This is a worthy beginning; and no doubt as time goes by certain amendments will be forthcoming which will provide additional coverage and additional benefits required by our fishermen. These additional benefits will be of great assistance to the fishermen and will meet other contingencies which may arise.

The standard of living of the fishermen in Newfoundland has improved in recent years. We want to make sure that this improvement is maintained, that there is no retrograde movement, and that as a result of long-term planning, something which is needed in the fishing industry, with additional capital, we shall see further improvements taking place in the matter of fishermen's earnings.

We realize that fishermen from other countries are coming over here to fish our banks —and may I point out that there are banks other than those which make money available for loans. I am thinking of those banks which do not close on Saturdays, of the Grand Banks in particular. Men are out there night and day, and when they go out to the banks they see trawlers from other countries which have come across here to take away fish which we have considered part of our resources. This is particularly true inshore. We know of course that in the waters offshore other countries can engage in fishing.

Only recently we know that Norwegian steamers have been operating off Newfoundland and Labrador, taking seals in considerable numbers. We know, too, that it requires capital to provide sealing steamers, and that it is not within the means of our fishermen, either singly or in groups, to provide sufficient capital to own and outfit steamers to go to the seal fishery. However, we do know there are some who go from Newfoundland, and that the fishermen who go out in these vessels, and engage in the dangerous occupation of catching seals, see fishermen from other countries coming in there with their ships. It is our belief that money should be provided so that our fishermen can engage in this occupation in a bigger way.

This resolution is a step in that direction. It will mean further expansion of the fishing industry, and I hope an improvement in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Chairman, representing a district to which fishing is of vital concern to a large portion of the population, may I add my voice to those who have congratulated the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries upon their joint effort in bringing forward this most welcome piece of legislation. In saying this I know I am speaking on behalf of my colleagues from Quebec who represent other fishing centres in that province.

May I remind the committee that this measure follows closely one no less progressive introduced two years ago by the Minister of Fisheries, and which has been of immense value to our fishermen. I am referring of course to the fishermen's indemnity plan.

I do not wish to delay unduly the adoption of this resolution, and shall take only a few moments to offer two suggestions. The first of these has to do with the regulations to be made under the provisions of the proposed legislation. My suggestion is that these regulations be so made as to render the provisions of the act applicable to as many fishermen as possible.

Second, may I impress upon the minister the importance of the suggestion already advanced by some hon. members to the effect that credit unions or, as we call them in our province, les caisses populaires, be added to the banks as recognized lending institutions under the proposed legislation. In doing this not only would we be recognizing once again these most deserving institutions, but at the same time we would be providing more outlets where our fishermen could obtain loans, because these credit unions have branches serving the most remote fishing areas in Quebec.

I know the minister will give his earnest attention to these two suggestions. Once again on behalf of our fishermen I wish to thank him for the two progressive measures I have mentioned, particularly the one now before us.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak on this resolution this evening, but when I heard the hon. member for Cape Breton South suggest that the scope of the legislation be enlarged to include credit unions I decided that I should put in a word to support his suggestion in the interests of my constituency of the Magdalen islands.

Unfortunately in the Magdalen islands we have but one bank, and it is not very generous when it comes to lending money. Therefore it would be very much in the interests of the fishermen of the Magdalen islands if the legislation were enlarged to include the credit unions, or the caisses populaires, as they are called in our province.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries on having introduced this very important piece of legislation. I do this particularly because it is another step in the direction I have often suggested the government should take. Both the agricultural primary producers and the fisheries primary producers should be placed on the same footing. Gradually the very generous legislation that we have enacted so far to help the farmers, and particularly the farmers of the west, is being extended to the fishermen, and I welcome this new legislation as another step in that direction.

It will be particularly useful in the Magdalen islands because there a transition is taking place from inshore fishing in small boats to offshore fishing in larger boats. It takes some capital to build the larger boats. Although the federal government gives a grant of $165 a ton to build those boats, the men are not able to get the capital needed. Though they get help from the provincial and federal governments, they still do not get enough. At the present time there are only two or three of these larger boats fishing around the Magdalen islands. I hope this new legislation will permit the fishermen to borrow money and get the capital they need to build these larger boats during the transition from the small inshore fishing boats to the larger offshore fishing boats, and that this step will be accelerated in the interests of the fishing industry and of the inhabitants of the Magdalen islands.

Something was said about the standard of living in Newfoundland. It is improving. Well, the same thing can be said of the standard of living in the Magdalen islands. If we really wish to bring it up to the standard of living in the rest of the country we have to give more and more help to the fishermen. The step the government is taking is most welcome, and it will do a lot of good in my constituency.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add my voice to what appears to be a rising chorus on the part of hon. members suggesting the desirability of the government considering the possibility of bringing the credit union movement within the provisions of the proposed legislation. I know I need not remind the Minister of Fisheries of the large part the credit union movement has played in the life of the fisherman on the British Columbia coast, and how important it is to him. As I have listened to those who have taken part in the debate it has become obvious to me that this applies equally, if not to an even greater degree, to the fishermen on the Atlantic coast of this country.

I have not at hand a speech by a cabinet minister, at least of the kind I would like to quote from. I would not mind if I had another one like the one the hon. member for Cape Breton South used. If I had I would be glad to quote from it. However, I should like to suggest to the Minister of Fisheries a way in which he could co-operate with those of us who have spoken on this question previously and who have indicated our general interest in the measure as well as our interest in particular aspects of fishermen's finances.

I was glad to know that the Minister of Fisheries was able to persuade his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to permit him to lead off on this resolution. I have been wondering whether the Minister of Fisheries could not arrange that after second reading the bill be referred to the marine and fisheries committee. If that were done, perhaps we could get the Minister of Finance and his high finance colleagues into that committee and have a real session on the ins and outs of the measure, and get down to the practical points that have been raised. I know the Minister of Fisheries will recall that recently he himself appeared before a committee under the chairmanship of one of his other colleagues. I refer to the industrial relations committee. As a member of that committee I felt that it was a very successful venture. Possibly we could have a repeat performance of that kind on this measure, with his colleague the Minister of Finance present before the marine and fisheries committee.

Before I take my seat may I say that I have had a bit of personal experience with the credit union movement, enough to realize that if they were brought within the provisions of this type of legislation the risks to the taxpayers of Canada would not be greatly increased thereby. At one time I was treasurer of a small credit union in its early days. At that time that little credit union had lent a total of something over $50,000. During that time all that was written off as bad debts was the sum of $37.50. Over half of that amount had actually been written off on compassionate grounds. We should indicate to the fishermen that when parliament introduces a measure to assist them in financing to equip themselves to meet the changing conditions of their industry, which require improved equipment, we at the same time recognize the fact that in the credit union movement there is a very important organization that can assist them in financing their lifetime vocation.

I am glad to know that the bill is to apply only to those who are considered bona fide commercial fishermen. As far as British Columbia is concerned, at the present time I do not think any of us who are at all familiar with the fishing industry would want to have it otherwise. I do feel that an overwhelming majority of the bona fide commercial fishermen in British Columbia would heartily support the inclusion of the credit union movement as such in the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. Kickham: I wish to commend the Minister of Fisheries on introducing this legislation to the house, because I think fishermen are entitled to legislation similar to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. This resolution forecasts very necessary legislation which the minister will bring in. As the minister suggested today, it is the beginning. After experience is gained from this initial legislation the minister will be in a position to bring amendments before the house from time to time.

I believe I am correct in saying, Mr. Chairman, that under the Farm Improvement Loans Act security is not taken on real estate but only on farm equipment, such as tractors. The chartered banks, I believe, take the bill of sale, which is the security the farmer provides for the loan that is given through the bank under the act. I should like to see this legislation extended so that real estate could be taken into consideration in the case of fishermen.

In our province of Prince Edward Island, in the past, assistance has been granted to fishermen for the construction of new boats, the purchase of boats, whether new or second hand, or the purchase of equipment such as engines, trawls, nets, and other equipment the fisherman needs for the small inshore boats. Within the last three years this assistance, given through our department of industry and natural resources, has also been extended for purchases of drag nets.

This department of industry and natural resources in our province has set up what is known as a fishermen's loan board. The applicant fisherman sends his application to this board for review, for rejection or approval as it may see fit. The loan board has done an excellent job for the fishermen in our province. I am very pleased to see that our draggers in the province of Prince Edward Island are doing exceptionally well. Last year our provincial government under Premier Matheson's administration passed legislation setting up what is known as the industrial assistance act, which gives assistance to processors of up to 50 per cent of their initial cost of constructing plants and the equipment necessary for the processing of the product.

Like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who has just spoken, I myself was at one time treasurer of the credit union. I have always been greatly interested in fishermen's and farm co-operatives. I should like to offer the suggestion to the minister that credit unions should be included as a loaning agency, as well as the chartered banks. I do not believe that our credit unions in Prince Edward Island at this time figure very largely in loans to fishermen. I repeat what I have already said, that the greater number of our loans to fishermen are granted through the fishermen's loan board under the department of industry and natural resources. Perhaps the minister would consider that suggestion and also include credit unions. I believe in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island they figure quite largely as agencies for providing loans for inshore boats and draggers.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, like the other hon. members who have spoken I shall be brief. I should like to assure the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Finance that this legislation will be welcomed by the fishermen on both coast lines, and perhaps to the same extent in the central part of our country. For a great many years several members in this chamber representing fishing constituencies have recommended insurance for equipment, and we now see that legislation on our statute books. We have also asked for loans to fishermen which I believe should have been considered before this time. I have always felt that all primary producers should be placed in the same category. Nevertheless we welcome it, and we wish to thank those responsible for the legislation coming forward at this time.

There is just one pessimistic note I have to express. I fear that fishermen may take it for granted that this legislation will take in more territory than it is planned to take in. I also fear that at least a small percentage of the fishermen may not qualify for loans, and there will be disappointment. Nevertheless it is a step in the right direction, and I hope it will provide the assistance we believe it will provide.

The fishermen's insurance plan which was introduced two years ago included at the outset lobster traps only. It has been broadened since that time, and now includes other equipment. This legislation, I have no doubt, was designed the same way. It is entering a new field and we must move cautiously. I would hope that in the future the legislation would be broadened so it would be perhaps of greater help to a greater number.

It has been mentioned tonight by other hon. members that the co-operatives and credit unions should be included. No doubt when we come back at another session that matter will be considered if not at this time, and I believe it will receive the support of all the members representing fishing ridings.

I can only say in conclusion that I do appreciate what the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Finance have accomplished. I wish them well, and I know that fishermen who will benefit by this legislation will have a warm place in their hearts for these gentlemen.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to detain the committee at this stage, but I was not able to be in the house earlier this afternoon, and I wish to say a word with respect to this legislation. The proposed bill will undoubtedly be a great improvement in connection with the extension of credit to fishermen. I want to express to the minister the hope that this legislation will go far enough so the position of our fishermen as primary producers will be as closely as possible equal to that of primary producers in the agricultural areas, in connection with securing the credit they need to improve their lot.

Farmers and fishermen require credit to improve and extend their operations, just as business and industry require credit for the same purposes. Undoubtedly the essential consideration in connection with legislation of this kind is to extend credit where required for the actual operations of the individual fisherman.

I think we should keep in mind as well that there are credit facilities available to the agricultural sections of the community for other purposes which are second only in importance to the primary purpose which I have already mentioned. No one denies the importance to rural life of improved living conditions. One can point to the provision of electricity, the labour-saving domestic and other appliances which come in its wake and the provision of running water and modern plumbing, to mention only two things. Life in the fishing towns and villages can be improved in exactly the same way; and it is just as important for the future development of this essential primary industry to see that the people engaged in fishing have the same facilities to secure these improvements for themselves as have the farmers. If this legislation does not in the first instance go far enough to achieve this end completely, I hope the Department of Finance and the Department of Fisheries will give further consideration to the matter and try to work out some method of improving the legislation.

The question of credit unions being regarded as financial institutions for the purpose of this legislation is important, but it is not really connected with the primary purpose and intent of the legislation. However, I think it is correct to point out to the minister that if credit unions are not regarded as financial institutions under this act there is a real possibility that the act will not be as useful and valuable as it otherwise would be. There is no question but that the credit unions in the past—and in the recent past, I may say—have carried the burden so far as extending credit to the fishermen is concerned, apart from the old-fashioned system of co-operation given the fishermen by the merchants who deal in their products.

The credit unions have done, I believe, an outstanding job in this connection, particularly in the maritimes. I think they have to their credit achievements that deserve encouragement rather than what seems to them some sort of discrimination. The credit unions in the maritimes provinces have an excellent record. As was pointed out by my colleague from the Magdalen islands, they provide facilities in many areas which are not served by the banks. The banks simply cannot be expected to keep branches in many of the small fishing villages which are remote and not too easy of access. So far as this legislation is concerned, I am afraid we shall find that its value may be somewhat dissipated by the inability or unwillingness of fishermen who need credit to make the journey that would be required to reach a bank and establish the banking relationships they would need.

Because of the previous representations made in connection with this matter I understand that there are some problems and difficulties in connection with the administrative situation which would result if credit unions were brought under this act. If that is correct, and if those difficulties are substantial and real, I would urge the minister to try to see to it that the problem is approached not from the point of view of putting up those difficulties as such but from the point of view of trying to see if the credit unions cannot be encouraged and given the direction and assistance which will make it possible for them to get their arrangements in such order that they will be brought under this act and will be financial institutions for this purpose.

I submit to the minister that the value of this act will be greatly enhanced, and that it will be made more valuable to the people who really need it, if that sort of approach is taken.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the committee unduly on this resolution, but I want to associate myself with other hon. members who have congratulated the government, and particularly the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Finance, on introducing this legislation which will undoubtedly be of great benefit to fishermen across Canada.

With a good deal of what has already been said by the hon. members who have preceded me, I am in accord. I am therefore not going to waste time by repeating what they have said. However, I want to stress one point which I think has been mentioned by most of the other members who have spoken, namely the matter of bringing the credit unions into the picture.

It so happens that the head office of the Nova Scotia credit union league is in Antigonish, which is the shire town in my constituency. There are also many branch offices throughout the constituency. When this legislation was mooted it was not long, as you can well imagine, before I had a telegram from Antigonish. I do not think it will do any harm to put it on the record. It reads as follows:

Antigonish, Nova Scotia,
May 31, 1955.

Ralph Kirk, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Fishermen of Nova Scotia will be sorely disappointed if their credit unions are not included with chartered banks as agencies to provide government guaranteed loans to fishermen for boats and equipment under new legislation being introduced by the Minister of Finance.

It is signed by the Nova Scotia co-operative union. That telegram was closely followed by a letter from the managing director of the Nova Scotia credit union league. I do not think it is worth while to read all the letter because the first part of it has been dealt with by others who have spoken. However, there is one little part that I do not recall having been mentioned by other hon. members, and of which I think it would be worth while for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries to take note. That part reads as follows:

Now that legislation is being proposed to assist the fishermen financially, we feel strongly that our credit unions should have the same opportunity of providing credit to fishermen as our chartered banks, especially in view of the fact that our credit unions have been doing this business, and even more so, because of the fact that many of our credit unions are completely fishermen owned and operated.

The paragraph of which I think particular notice should be taken is the one I am now going to read:

There is also the consideration that in most of our credit unions there is a loan protection insurance contract which insures that upon the death or the total and permanent disability of a borrower, the loan is paid off. This would decrease to some extent the risk that the government would be taking in guaranteeing such loans through credit unions, as losses because of death or disability would be made good by the insurance company and not the local organization or the government.

That is one part of the argument of the Nova Scotia credit union league that I want to draw particularly to the attention of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries.

As I said when I started, I do not want to delay unduly the passing of this legislation. Enough has already been said—and, in my opinion, well said—by every hon. member who has spoken, regardless of politics. I shall conclude by saying that I sincerely hope the government, and the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Finance, will consider seriously the requests that have been made by the credit unions through all the members of the House of Commons who have been addressing themselves tonight to this subject.

Mr. Zaplitny: I shall detain the committee for only a few minutes, but I do want to say a word or two on this matter. The constituency I represent is of course better known as an agricultural area, but it is a fact that we do have considerable fresh water fishing. As a matter of fact the nationally famous lake Winnipeg goldeye comes from some of the lakes in my constituency, which are quite a long way from Winnipeg.

I want to ask the minister a couple of questions, but before I do so may I say that I agree wholeheartedly with the stand taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton South in his very well developed plea for the inclusion of credit unions as lending institutions under the proposed legislation. Like the hon. member I am a strong believer in co-operation as a way of life, and I think it would be most appropriate if credit unions were included in the legislation to be presented.

I should like to ask the minister first of all what is included in the term "primary fishing enterprise". My second question has to do with Indian reserves. It may be that Indian fishermen living on reserves are treated in exactly the same way as anybody else under the legislation. If that is the case, that is fine; but if there is to be any differentiation I should like to hear what it is and what opportunities there will be for Indians living on reserves to participate in the plan. One of the chief difficulties is the fact that most fishermen of that type have very little collateral when it comes to applying for a loan. I hope the effect of the legislation will be such that it will not be too difficult for the individual fisherman with not too much collateral to obtain a loan, or that some method may be found for several fishermen to pool their resources on a co-operative basis so they can obtain a loan to buy a boat and the necessary equipment.

One of the chief complaints among the Indian population on reserves, and some off reserves, is the fact that they find themselves unable to purchase the equipment they require, and as a result they end up working for a fish company which employs them and pays them wages sufficient to enable them to keep going. It seems impossible for them to scrape together enough to obtain the necessary equipment and become fishermen on their own. I hope there will be something in the legislation to make it a little easier for such persons to participate and eventually own their own equipment and become fishermen in their own right.

The reason I have asked the meaning of the words "primary fishing enterprise" is so that it may be clearly set out what individuals, companies or co-operatives may participate, and just what limitation there may be on that phrase.

(Translation):

Mr. Legare: Mr. Chairman, I take pleasure in congratulating the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) for introducing legislation that will allow fishermen to borrow from the bank for the improvement of their fishing gear and boats. This decision will most certainly be greeted with a great deal of pleasure by all those who earn their living by fishing.

Nevertheless I would like to join the hon. members for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) and the Magdalen islands (Mr. Cannon) in asking the ministers concerned to include credit unions in this proposed legislation, so that they may be authorized to lend money as well as the banks.

The achievements of credit unions in Quebec cannot be overemphasized. I am convinced those unions would be only too glad to help the fishermen as they have already helped our workers and farmers in other ways.

The Quebec credit unions have already helped thousands of people to build homes and they would only be too happy to help the fishermen.

I hope that the sponsors of this resolution will see their way clear to include the credit unions as approved lending institutions in the proposed legislation.

(Text):

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, it is certainly very heartening to have such unanimous endorsement for this legislation by members of all parties from fishing areas in every part of the country. I think most members understand that this legislation is a start in a new field, and because it is a start it cannot be as all-embracing as the Farm Improvement Loans Act now is after some years of experience. This is, after all, the resolution stage, when the general principle of the bill to come is discussed. I have made a note of all the questions asked by hon. members and am quite prepared to answer them in detail, but I think almost all of them, with one or two notable exceptions, will be answered when hon. members get the bill tomorrow morning.

The hon. member for Dauphin asked a key question, as to what is a primary fishing enterprise. Roughly it is the actual act of an individual fisherman catching fish, but not processing it in any way at all. The legislation is limited to loans to individual fishermen, not to partnerships, companies or co-operatives. In that respect it is similar to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The position of Indians is not covered. Of course Indians on a reserve are very different from Indians off a reserve, who are ordinary citizens. Indians on a reserve cannot be sued if they are in default on a loan. I understand that my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, has a fund in his department for making direct loans to fishermen on reserves for fishing equipment. As far as the fish companies are concerned, I know the fish companies operating on the Skeena river have over $600,000 outstanding at the present time in loans to Indian fishermen.

The other notable thing about this debate has been the very warm and sincere tribute again paid by members of all parties to the tremendous work done by the credit union societies in this country. It may be true that the first credit union was founded in Quebec many years ago, but as far as the fishermen of Canada are concerned the real father of the credit union movement in Canada is that wonderful little university in Antigonish, St. Francis Xavier, which, during the very darkest days of the depression, taught the fishermen how to help themselves by pooling their scanty savings and using that money for their own benefit. The way the credit union movement has grown across the maritimes, in the Gaspe and Saguenay areas of Quebec, in the fishing areas of the inland lakes and out to the west coast, is quite remarkable.

The problem involved here with respect to the inclusion of the credit unions is one which comes very close to people from every fishing area. Hon. members will recall that during the four years I was assistant to the Minister of Finance I twice piloted the Farm Improvement Loans Act through the house, at which time the same request was made to include the credit unions as lending institutions under the act. My recollection of the answers given then is that first of all there was the difficulty of control. The eleven chartered banks are under direct control by the Department of Finance, under regular inspection by the inspector general of banks, and of course they operate under the Bank Act which is reviewed every ten years by the federal government.

Therefore in guaranteeing loans to the chartered banks we have the knowledge that we have very close control over the uses we are making of the taxpayers' money. On the other hand, there are many hundreds of credit unions across the country which are not under federal control but under varying types of provincial legislation. We have no way, without intruding in the provincial field, of inspecting the facilities and management of these credit unions. I do not think it is reflecting on the credit union movement at all to say that credit unions are not quite as stable as chartered banks. Occasionally credit unions do get into financial trouble.

The second reason I recall was the fact that the type of security which must be taken to protect the taxpayers' money under this kind of legislation is in general a little different from that required by the credit union associations themselves. There is, perhaps, one point which has been missed. When the government encourages the banks to go into what is the riskiest part of fishermen's credit, that is loans based on their fishing gear and their fishing vessels, they are taking the most difficult borrowing and the borrowing on which there is the highest expectancy of loss off the shoulders of the credit unions. This leaves the credit unions free to devote their funds to the other credit needs of the fishermen, the sort of thing mentioned by the two members for Halifax, the improvement of the fisherman's home, the electrification of his home and things like that.

However, the credit union movement is even closer and more important to the fishermen of this country than are the credit unions of the farmers. I say that without any sense of disparagement of the latter. The fishermen of the maritimes especially are genuinely attached to these institutions which did so much for them in the days of the depression.

I had a word with the Prime Minister just now, and he has accepted a suggestion made in the speeches by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, and repeated later by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that this resolution be regarded, as it really is, as a warning of a bill that is coming.

When the bill is before the house and is given second reading it is to be referred to a committee of the house. As Minister of Fisheries I do not think the committee on marine and fisheries is the proper committee to which to refer it, because this is a financial bill and the difficulties of including credit unions are financial ones. It will be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. The same procedure will be followed as was followed when unemployment insurance for fishermen was discussed before the industrial relations committee. Those members from fishing areas can attend and ask questions.

We will have this meeting some time next week, after due warning so that as well as the members concerned the representatives of these various credit union societies, including the national society to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred, can come here and state their case. They can show what guarantees they can give if the taxpayers' money is put forward as a guarantee to them. They can show whether it will be safeguarded in a manner equally satisfactory to the safeguards offered by the chartered banks.

I believe that covers the points.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Sinclair thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 452, respecting loans to assist fishermen engaged in a primary fishing enterprise.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BOYS' INDUSTRIAL HOME, NEW BRUNSWICK CENTRAL REFORMATORY

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 381, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. Bell: Is the minister going to give an explanation?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, this bill is concerned with the care of prisoners in the provincial jails of New Brunswick, and is before the house at the present time because the government of New Brunswick has asked that it be passed. This bill is an example of the type and degree of legislative co-operation that must take place between the federal parliament and government on the one hand, and provincial legislatures and governments on the other in order that provision may be made for the care of prisoners who are convicted under the Criminal Code and sentenced to periods of less than two years in provincial institutions. I think, perhaps, for the benefit at least of the newer members of the house I should give the references to the relevant articles of our constitution in order to make clear why what would appear to be a provincial matter is being taken care of in the parliament of Canada.

Under head 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act, provincial legislatures may exclusively make laws in relation to the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction and including procedure in civil matters in those courts. But so far as the procedure in criminal matters is concerned, under head 27 of section 91 of the British North America Act, the parliament of Canada has exclusive authority in respect of the criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters.

Then, head 28 of section 91 aforesaid gives parliament exclusive legislative jurisdiction in relation to the establishment, management and maintenance of penitentiaries. Authority over provincial jails on the other hand rests with the provincial legislatures, under head 6 of section 92.

Now, parliament has provided in section 634 of the Criminal Code that a person who is sentenced under an act of the parliament of Canada, which, of course, would include the Criminal Code, to imprisonment for life or for a term of two years or more shall be sentenced to the penitentiary designated for the province in which he was convicted. A person who is sentenced under such an act to imprisonment for a term of less than two years is required to be sentenced to imprisonment in a place other than a penitentiary, which is one way of saying in a provincial institution.

But it is not enough, and this is really the point of the necessity for this present legislation, for the Criminal Code or any other act of the parliament of Canada to provide that a person who is convicted of an offence and sentenced to imprisonment for less than two years will go to a place of confinement other than a penitentiary. It is necessary for us in this parliament to make provision for the courts to commit such persons to provincial institutions and to authorize the keeper of such institutions to detain them in lawful custody therein. Then, of course, we must make provision in this legislation for such things as the transfer of prisoners, the release of prisoners and so on, in the same manner as is done under the penitentiaries act in relation to federal institutions. All these matters relating to provincial institutions are contained in a federal act called the Prisons and Reformatories Act which it is the purpose of the present bill to amend.

This Prisons and Reformatories Act sets forth procedures which shall be adopted in relation to prisoners who have been sentenced for a period of less than two years to provincial institutions including special reform schools, reformatories, industrial farms or industrial schools and the like. If hon. members examine this Prisons and Reformatories Act they will see that, first of all, there is a general part dealing with matters of general application in all the provinces. Then, in relation to each of the provinces there is a separate part of the act dealing with institutions in that particular province. The part we are concerned with in the present case is part V, dealing with the province of New Brunswick.

As I have said we were asked by the attorney general of New Brunswick, Hon. Mr. West, to bring in this legislation. Permit me, sir, to quote from Hon. Mr. West's letter in this connection, as follows:

> This province is in the course of modernizing its penal system. We plan on erecting a central penal institution to be known as the New Brunswick central reformatory and it is hoped that the institution will be ready for partial occupancy, at least, during the latter part of this year.
> The province is also assuming regulation of the county gaols, and in some cases, is closing existing county gaols which are insecure or which, for other reasons such as health and safety, it is considered undesirable to keep open.
> In order to carry out these plans it will be necessary to have authority to transfer prisoners sentenced to gaol from a county gaol to the central reformatory and in some cases from one county gaol to another. This, of course, cannot be done in cases of prisoners sentenced under the Criminal Code or other federal statutes without legislative authority.
> I am attaching hereto a draft of a proposed amendment to the Prisons and Reformatories Act. This draft is patterned on similar provisions now contained in the Prisons and Reformatories Act with respect to the provinces of Ontario and Alberta. For your convenience, I have noted at the end of each section of the draft the comparable provision or provisions now contained in the Prisons and Reformatories Act.
> Our plans cannot, of course, be put into operation with respect to prisoners confined under federal statutes without some legislation of this nature. A large majority of prisoners in our gaols are sentenced under a federal statute. It will be greatly appreciated if legislation along the lines of attached draft is passed at the current session of parliament.

Upon receipt of this letter a bill in the terms hon. members now see before them was drawn up by parliamentary counsel and resubmitted to the attorney general of New Brunswick. He approved of it. It is now before hon. members for consideration.

This bill first deals with this New Brunswick central reformatory, which we understand will be a modern type of institution where up to date principles of penology are applied with a view to effecting the rehabilitation and reform of inmates.

The second main purpose of the bill is to vest authority in a parole board, provincially appointed, to release inmates of the boys' industrial home upon parole at any time during their confinement, under conditions approved by the federal Minister of Justice. This boys' industrial home is an institution specially designed in the province of New Brunswick for the custody, care and treatment of juveniles—that is, boys under the age of 16 years—who are convicted of offences under the criminal law. It is located at Bayside drive in Saint John, New Brunswick. It was first opened in 1893 and has a normal capacity of 60.

The purpose of the present amendment is to provide that where the inmates of this reform school for boys are now released under ticket of leave by the remissions branch of the Department of Justice they will, in future, be released by a provincial parole board in the same manner as they are now being released from similar institutions in the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia by similar provincial parole boards.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, as has been comprehensively stated by the minister, this legislation comes from the Senate and is being presented at the request of the attorney general of New Brunswick. The minister mentioned briefly this year, and also last year, that it has been his pleasure to have considerable co-operation among the attorneys general of the various provinces and his own department with respect to legislation of this kind.

We in New Brunswick are in the process of modernizing our penal institutions. I suppose one might say that we are reforming our reformatories. The situation which obtained a few years ago was most serious, and we thought it necessary to appoint a commission to look into the situation surrounding our jails and penal institutions in the province. For this purpose we selected Judge J. Bacon Dickson of Fredericton, a very competent jurist. Various other prominent and interested citizens served on the commission. They made a complete survey and study of the situation in the province and, after some time, brought out what is commonly known down our way as the Dickson report.

Among other things this report outlines the need for inspectors in our jails, and the suggestion was made that we take over the old jails. They went further and suggested an amalgamation of some of the county jails, and a general comprehensive survey was made with respect to the classification and segregation of criminals.

As I have said, this legislation is the result of our plans to gradually implement the Dickson report. The minister has outlined very carefully why legislation of this kind must come through the federal parliament. It is well known that section 91 of the British North America Act gives the federal authority the right to legislate in the matter of criminal law. Our criminal courts are excepted in that general classification. Further, for various reasons it has been necessary to have other institutions in our provinces under the control of the provinces, with the exception of federal penitentiaries. I understand that is why it is necessary, in view of the fact that the Criminal Code and some other criminal legislation is under federal jurisdiction, to have authority from the federal parliament to deal with various smaller phases of activity distinguished from the federal penitentiaries.

This bill, from the other place, has two main themes. First of all it purports to give some sort of authority to a New Brunswick central reformatory. This is in line with the Dickson report which, as I said, we are trying to implement. Further suggestions with respect to our county jails are also met to some extent under this legislation.

The second proposal in the bill concerns the boys' industrial home. A change has been made in the name of this home. Whereas it was known formerly as the industrial home for boys, it is now known as the boys' industrial home. Certain parole rights are given to the parole officers in connection with this institution, and there are some other minor changes in connection with the management of the home.

My understanding of this legislation is that no remission privileges are given to the provincial institutions except the remission powers that may be in the hands of the parole officers when they are dealing with matters affecting only their own institutions. In other words, remission rights are still in the hands of the federal government with respect to those who are sentenced to federal penitentiaries.

The minister has made careful reference to the boys' industrial home, which is in East Saint John, in my constituency. Let me say that this institution has been increasing in its importance. We are proud of the fact that we have modernized our staff and our procedure in keeping up with the requirements of corrective reform measures in our institutions.

This home, which contains the lesser criminals under 16 years of age, who are there for various corrective measures—and they number about 50 or 60—has a very fine reputation in our community for the interest shown both in agriculture and in athletics. They have built up quite a farm. They have not only a cattle farm but mixed farming as well, and they have been able to supplement to some extent the revenue of the home and also give the boys a very interesting occupation and help them with their plans when they are released. They have taken a very commendable and worth-while part in athletics along with boys of their own age in the community. When I was younger, going to school and playing hockey, the team we could never seem to beat was composed of the boys from the industrial home in East Saint John. On a later occasion I had a great deal of pleasure in getting acquainted with those boys and talking about those hockey games, which were conducted on a highly competitive basis. Of course no consideration was given to the fact that these boys came from the home. Their sportsmanship was highly appreciated in every way.

We have made quite an effort recently to interest various local retired sportsmen, who were connected with baseball and hockey, in taking part in sports at the school. Just the other day when I was home I was speaking to Gordon Drillon, who used to play hockey for Toronto Maple Leafs. He is employed at the home and is tremendously popular with the boys. He is, of course, a sort of local hero. He is teaching them athletics and is very well liked. This will give you some idea, Mr. Speaker, of the interest and effort we are taking in the boys at the school.

As has been stated by the minister, this legislation does grant certain powers. It enables us to correct our field institution along lines which I understand have been completely implemented in Ontario. Alberta and British Columbia have also started in this direction. The legislation that is up for second reading tonight is in line, if not on all fours, with sections of the Prisons and Reformatories Act which is now in force, various parts of which apply to the provinces.

In closing I should like to say we are hopeful that we shall be able to completely implement the Dickson report, which purports to correct our penal and reform institutions in the province. We are pleased to get the co-operation that has been given by the Department of Justice and the minister in meeting our demands in this respect.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that within the past few years there has been a growing interest in all the provinces of Canada and in the federal government in the question of criminality, its cause and its cure. There has been a growing interest shown by governments not only in the cause of criminality but in the methods used in our penal institutions, and most certainly it is all very much to the good. It has been evidenced in particular in the past two or three years by the federal government in the various commissions they have established to look into the matters of capital and corporal punishment, the use of the lash and the paddle, the question of parole and of the rights of prisoners in the penal institutions. As I say, that is all to the good.

This evening we have before us legislation at the request of the province of New Brunswick. The attorney general stated in the letter which has just been quoted that they are in the process of modernizing the penal system in that province. It is to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that this interest in modern penology will extend to the treatment, the education and the rehabilitation processes that are used in our penal institutions, and that the interest will continue, with even a greater study of the causes of crime, especially amongst youthful offenders.

As hon. members know, it has been my privilege for some 18 months now to be a member of the special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which is investigating the questions of capital and corporal punishment and lotteries. Unfortunately our report is not yet in, but all the evidence has been published. There has been some evidence dealing with the start of criminality. The evidence has shown that very often it starts in youth.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member just to ask him not to refer to that evidence because, even if it has been printed and distributed, as far as this house is concerned we do not know about it since it has not yet been reported.

Mr. Winch: I was not going to discuss the proceedings of the committee at all but just the matter of youthful criminality, which I felt was absolutely in order. This legislation deals with the establishment, the operation and the regulation of a boys' industrial school, and a boys' industrial school, naturally, contains boys who have broken the law.

I was merely commenting, Mr. Speaker, that we now have, in the words of the attorney general of New Brunswick, a recommendation to the Minister of Justice and from the Minister of Justice to this house, to modernize the methods of handling those boys who have broken the law. I was hoping that this approach would be carried on to include the causation that made these boys break the law. I was pointing out that there is evidence—may I put it that way—that they start young and the cause is environment. However, I am not going into that in detail. It was just an impression I wanted to give, and I am certain the Minister of Justice agrees with me. I am sure he hopes that all the provinces and his own department will carry on a modern study of the causes of criminality.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is a principle in this bill which I will not say intrigues me, but which I find disturbing. I know it is in effect in one or two other provinces. When this bill gets into committee of the whole I hope the Minister of Justice will go into some detail and explain the principle. The principle in the bill is that a youth under the age of 16 can be imprisoned on a charge in accordance with the laws of the province and of the dominion.

In addition he may have a second sentence imposed upon him on completion of the sentence under which he has been charged. In other words there is the principle in the act, as far as boys under 16 are concerned, that there are two sentences for one offence. The entire principle is contained in more than one clause but it is evident, because the powers are asked, that if a youth is charged with an offence under the Criminal Code he can be sentenced in the same way as an adult who has committed that offence, and he can get a sentence the same as that which would be given to an adult.

Under this act, if he was under the age of 16 I take it that he would be committed to the boys' industrial home, but the principle is also stated here that, in the discretion of a supreme court or county court judge, following the completion of his sentence he can then, on account of the offence for which he was found guilty, be given a further indeterminate sentence and retained in the institution for a period not to exceed a total of five years.

This applies not only to an offence under the Criminal Code but also to an offence for which the youth is found guilty on a summary conviction. If he is found guilty under summary conviction, as long as his sentence is not less than 14 days, then a judge of the supreme court or county court has the power to impose a new sentence after he has completed the sentence for the offence for which he was found guilty, and keep him in the institution for an indeterminate length of time not to exceed the sum total of five years. There must be a good reason for that principle, but I admit that I have been for some time, and am now, a little disturbed as to the justice of it.

Mr. Garson: Might I suggest to my hon. friend that if he were to read the section aloud and slowly the reason for the incarceration for the indefinite period would emerge.

Mr. Winch: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have read it aloud and slowly, I have read it to myself slowly and often, and I know what my hon. friend the Minister of Justice says is correct. The reasons they can do it are mentioned there. I am speaking about the fact that they can do it on one charge. After the youth has completed the sentence for the offence, then the judge has the power to keep him in the institution perhaps for another four or four and a half years. I am asking about the justice of doing that without two separate charges. If a youth under 16 has committed an offence, and has served his time, he should be released. But if he is still a bad boy, then perhaps the youth should be charged as as incorrigible by his parents or a welfare agency, or children's aid or some agency of government. I am just asking about the justice of this dual sentence. I must admit I find it a little disturbing from that point of view, even though I know the reasons for it. I sincerely hope we can have some detailed explanation from the Minister of Justice on that aspect of the principle of this bill when the house is in committee of the whole.

That is all I wish to say at this stage, Mr. Speaker. I am certain that I would join with others in saying that we welcome this as an advance in the system of penology in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put myself on record as being in favour of this legislation. The ground has been fairly well covered. Since New Brunswick is endeavouring to do what it hopes will be a good job, I do not think we need fear too much the clause in the act about the additional imprisonment. Anyone who has had much experience with boys knows there are times when it is necessary to give the judge or magistrate this power. It is something which I believe is desirable, especially in view of the fact that our courts are well looked after. Our judges are men of experience and we feel safe in their hands; and the system of appointing magistrates has been to confine the appointments to lawyers with considerable experience.

Therefore I just want to add that this bill gives our province an opportunity to bring in a reform which has been much needed for some time, especially with regard to jails. As recommended by Judge Dickson, since our jails in New Brunswick have become quite dilapidated and conditions have been quite bad, it was very important that something be done. In view of that fact I am very glad to see this bill before the house. I hope it will receive the sympathetic consideration of all hon. members.

As far as the principle in the act is concerned, I do not believe it is one which need give any cause for worry. I recently had the opportunity of meeting the new superintendent who will be in charge of this reform institution. He is a man whose name, by the way, came before the committee which my hon. friend who was speaking a few moments ago mentioned, and he is very highly recommended. We look forward to a real improvement in our province.

I might say to my hon. friend that there are some small towns there which have no juvenile courts, no social workers or welfare clubs, and no one to look after these youths. It is much better to have a provision in case the judge feels that a short sentence followed by an indeterminate sentence may meet the situation, so the offender will be left in the hands of youth officials who will let him out of control at the earliest possible moment and keep an eye on him, if they feel he is not likely to become a menace to the community. I believe the principle is not a vicious one; I feel it is a good one.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with the order of business given on Friday night. If we complete that business we shall then take second reading of Bill No. 415, to amend the Canada Elections Act. If we finish that, we shall then take any other bills that are on the order paper.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—CONCURRENCE IN FIFTEENTH REPORT

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou) presented the fourteenth and fifteenth reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the fifteenth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Sixth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Croll.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. SINCLAIR—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JUNE 6

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a correction not so much of Hansard but of a misunderstanding between the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and myself last night arising from our rather casual use of words. As reported at page 4467 of Hansard the hon. member for Cape Breton South said the national credit societies act was a government measure passed by this parliament. I asserted that was not so, that it was the bill of a private member to incorporate a credit union society under a federal charter. However, I was wrong. The bill I had in mind was not the national credit societies act but the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society Limited Act, a private bill passed in 1953 and sponsored by a private member, Mr. Bater. However, the hon. member for Cape Breton South was also wrong, for there is no such act as the national credit societies act. The act he probably had in mind is the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, a government-sponsored measure to control interprovincial activities of credit unions, passed earlier in 1953. Otherwise we were both right in that both these acts are important in the discussion which took place on the role that credit unions should take in the new fisheries improvement loans bill.

If I may add one final word, a couple of miners such as the hon. member for Cape Breton South and myself have at times been exasperated by the way lawyer members of parliament quibble over words. This incident shows us the importance of exact legal terminology.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, now that the minister has brought himself and myself up to date, I bow to the superiority of his research department.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BOYS' INDUSTRIAL HOME, NEW BRUNSWICK CENTRAL REFORMATORY

The house resumed, from Monday, June 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. 381, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Boys under 16 years.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, may I ask your advice with respect to procedure on clause 1? In that clause it is set out that sections 110 to 120 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act, chapter 217 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, are repealed and other sections are substituted therefor. That is the only actual governing clause. Under that clause do we discuss all the amending clauses? Is that correct, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Order. I have called clause 1, and it is of course in order to discuss any matter coming under clause 1 which apparently deals with a number of sections in the original enactment.

Mr. Winch: That being the case, I should like to speak on clause 1 with particular reference to what will now be known as sections 110 and 111.

On the second reading last night I asked a number of brief questions relative to a principle in the bill and asked the Minister of Justice if he would give a detailed explanation of that principle in the committee of the whole. After reading what I said in Hansard this morning, I realize I spoke far too briefly. Perhaps if I were to make my own position clear on this matter and state the reasons why I requested the minister to give us an exposition of that principle, my purpose would be served.

It has been my privilege, Mr. Chairman, in the past 22 years to have had some connection with boys' industrial schools, and in that period of time not only to have interested myself in the cases of boys under the age of 16 who have been bad boys, but also upon occasion to have been called upon by judges in charge of juvenile courts and welfare courts in cases of boys who were incorrigible. As a result of that 22 years' experience and knowledge, as I said last night, I am a little bit disturbed by the principle which is outlined in clause 1 concerning what will be sections 110 and 111.

A youth under the age of 16 is without doubt at a very impressionable age. He makes a serious mistake and comes into conflict with the law. He appears in court. Now, once in a while you meet, and I have met, youths under the age of 16 with whom there is not a thing you can do. In the majority of cases, however, so far as my experience goes, when you have a boy of the age of 16 who has been arrested and brought into court, he is a very frightened boy. Under the terms of this bill and the two sections I have mentioned that youth, because he has broken the law and been arrested, can be charged with a crime as though he were an adult. I do not think there is any way we can get around that. But, Mr. Chairman, he can also be sentenced as though he were an adult. I do not think there is any way to get around that, at the moment at any rate.

But having been found guilty and sentenced, under the principle which I am now discussing, he can then be sent to a boys' industrial home. I feel, sir, that is as it should be because it would be a terrible thing if a boy under 16 were sent to a provincial jail or a penitentiary. I am in complete agreement with the attorney general of New Brunswick and the Minister of Justice on that. Once he has been found guilty and sentenced on a definite charge, we now find under the principle in this bill, it is possible that, having served his sentence and having paid his debt to society for the crime which he committed, he can then be sentenced by a judge to an indeterminate time in the boys' industrial school so long as the total sentence does not exceed five years.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make my position clear, and that is why I am on my feet again this afternoon in committee of the whole. I believe that, as applied to youthful offenders, the indeterminate sentence is best. That is my belief—although I realize there are arguments against it. The chief argument—there is really only one—against the indeterminate sentence, one which I have learned from conversations with boys in the industrial homes and with adult criminals in penitentiaries who are serving indeterminate sentences on charges of being habitual criminals, is that they harbour a feeling of hatred against society and against the courts, a feeling of hatred against everybody, because they do not know when they can get out. I have yet to speak to one boy in a reformatory or one prisoner in a penitentiary, serving a sentence as a habitual criminal, who has not developed an aggressive hatred against society in general. They feel that they may be imprisoned for a month, or for life—they do not know which. Believing as we do in rehabilitation, in my opinion we make a mistake when we deny the many hope by withholding from them knowledge as to when they will again be free.

Referring more particularly to boys in reformatories, I said a few moments ago to the Minister of Justice, through you, Mr. Chairman, that it is my belief that, although these boys may not know whether they are going to be in the reformatories for a month or for five years, the indeterminate sentence is best for those under 16 years. However, I do not approve of the way it is being carried out in one or two of the provinces, and as recommended in the act. Under clause 110 and clause 111 they are charged with a definite offence and given a definite sentence. Take a boy under 16 years of age. He is impressionable. At that time you can work with him, or you can with the great majority of boys. After they have been charged and sentenced, and have paid their debt to society, it is possible under this legislation to keep these boys in an institution for a period that shall not exceed five years. Ask any psychologist or any psychiatrist what he thinks will be the reaction of the majority of boys who have committed a crime and served their sentence and still cannot be released but may be held in the discretion of the judge or the parole board up to a period of five years.

I say, sir, most sincerely from my knowledge of working with boys in an industrial school for 22 years that that is not going to rehabilitate them; that is not going to make them socially conscious; that is not going to give them a feeling of friendship. I am sure it will build up aggressiveness and a hatred that can lead them down the road to further criminality. I completely realize what the minister and attorney general of New Brunswick have in mind. We must have a provision so that boys who are incorrigible or anti-social can be handled, disciplined and trained in an institution in the hope of making them good members of society. I agree with that; but, sir, I disagree with a provision under which a boy who is charged, found guilty and sentenced, and has served his term, can be kept in an institution. From the psychological point of view it will be far better —and I commend this thought to the Minister of Justice—to have a different procedure with respect to boys under the age of 16. It should be one of two things. As I said last night on second reading of this bill, when a boy has served his sentence for the crime of which he has been found guilty he should then be released. If he is incorrigible, and if it is in the interests of the boy himself and society, he should remain in an institution. Then either his parents, the children's aid society, the welfare society or any government agency interested in the development of children could then bring him before the court as an incorrigible and give him an indeterminate sentence in the hope that a useful citizen can be made out of him. The boy would at least know that he had served his sentence and was being released.

There is one other approach which I favour even more than the one I have just mentioned. If a youth under 16 years of age breaks the law and is brought to court I suggest that a study be made of his background, his emotions and his outlook. If the boy is found guilty, instead of sentencing him to a period in an institution and then perhaps keeping him there after he has served his sentence, I suggest that he should be given an indeterminate sentence at the beginning. He would then know that his length of stay in the institution would depend upon his good behaviour and his adjustment.

Personally I believe that such a boy would feel better if he knew at the beginning that he was being given an indeterminate sentence and his length of stay would depend upon his attitude, his behaviour and his adjustment rather than to be given a definite sentence and then after having served it be told that he would be kept on for a further period after he had expiated his offence against society.

I must conclude, otherwise I shall be repeating myself. I feel deeply about this matter from the point of view of the psychological effect upon a youthful offender. I submit that the imposition of two sentences will not help to rehabilitate a boy under 16 years of age who has come into conflict with the law.

Secondly, I think it is a wrong concept of Canadian justice that when a boy is found guilty of a crime and sentenced he can still be retained in an institution up to a period of five years after he has expiated his crime. That is not my concept of Canadian justice.

I realize the motives of the Minister of Justice and the attorney general of New Brunswick, but I would ask the Minister of Justice if perhaps we are not making a mistake in an approach of this kind. I want the minister to understand that I believe sincerely in the indeterminate sentence; I think it is the best thing in the world. But let us have it as a first charge and not as a second one. Let us remember the psychological effect on a youth under 16 years of age when, having served his sentence, he cannot get out. I ask the minister if he will please give this approach some thought and if he will explain the reasons why, in his judgment and in the judgment of others, they bring in this kind of a recommendation.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I too have some knowledge of boys. I have often been convinced that there is no bad boy. I have sat in juvenile court and in police stations and I have been convinced that the individual who should have been sent to court was not the boy but the father or the mother. Where a boy has a father and mother who spend a good deal of time in the beer parlour and let him go where he likes, who is guilty? I was well pleased when the Prime Minister, when he was minister of justice, said it is far better to give the prisoner—whether he is a boy or a grown-up—the benefit of the doubt and not ask him to serve his complete sentence.

I should not say it but I have had 183 boys and adults out on permit or parole and only 3 have partially failed. I have never had a boy placed under our supervision who failed. I agree with the hon. member who has said that it would be far better to let the boy know when he goes in that a good deal depends on his conduct. That is one side of it. But the other side of it is that the folks at home that know him, outside of the family, should keep an eye on him, write him his weekly letter and tell him that there is hope for him and that he should make good.

I am sure that the Minister of Justice will be just as lenient as was the former minister of justice in giving the boy the benefit of the doubt and in letting him come out under the supervision of somebody whose Christian character is known to be practical and who is not afraid to spend a little bit in his behalf.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Vancouver East in the exposition he has just made on juvenile criminality. Certainly the arguments that he has advanced are cogent even though they are emotional as well. On the face of it, it seems that legislation such as this is more or less in keeping with the ideas of criminologists of 25, 30 or 40 years ago rather than of today.

As I listened to the arguments he advanced I tried to place myself for a moment, as one must, in the position of a juvenile offender who has been punished by the court for the wrong that he has committed. The initial punishment he receives is in keeping with the enormity of the crime he has committed. That punishment would be the punishment that would be administered to one of mature years. He starts off with that punishment.

Because of the fact that an indeterminate sentence commences after the termination of the fixed sentence, if I understand the authorities correctly, there can be no remission of part of the fixed sentence when it is to be followed by one that is indeterminate. The only reduction that can be made will be the reduction by the parole board of the sentence subsequently imposed and commencing at the termination of the original sentence. He is then in this position. He has paid his penalty to society in respect of the first sentence he has received. Then he starts all over again with a sentence that, as far as he is concerned, may be up to five years or may be shorter. That, of course, is something he does not know. In other words, there is no reward for virtue under this type of legislation.

If the juvenile has received a sentence of two years, under normal circumstances he should expect to be released at the end of a year and three or four months, with the balance of his sentence served outside the jail or penal institution and under parole. But the juvenile offender is not put in that position and is not today, in two jurisdictions, in that position. He must serve his two years. Then he starts all over again. To me that is a dangerous reincorporation in our law of a principle that is not in keeping with the advances that have been made in criminology in the last 25 years.

My friend the hon. member for Vancouver East has an experience that deserves the respect of parliament, in view of the degree to which he over the years has interested himself on behalf of those who are unfortunately in the penal institutions of this country. He points out that if the situation were reversed and if the first sentence were indeterminate, there would be a reward for reform. As the situation is now, the wrongdoer serves the sentence that any older person would serve; then having done that and having been denied the parole to which an older person would be entitled, he commences another sentence.

I feel that the minister should be able to place before the house and the committee suggestions arising out of the experience in the two jurisdictions that already have in effect similar legislation. I understand that Ontario is one of the provinces, and that there is another province with similar legislation in effect, namely British Columbia. Will the minister place before the committee the following statistics? How many juveniles under this legislation have, in each of those provinces, received first a set sentence and thereafter an indeterminate sentence? Of those so sentenced, how many became recidivists or repeaters?

After all, the aim of the criminal law today is to punish but at the same time to reform; that is, the aim is to give to those who have made a wrong step an opportunity for rehabilitation, an opportunity to go forward in the world, raising their heads once more because, while they have made one wrong step, society is not going to condemn them indefinitely into the future. As a matter of fact, today one of the major reasons for recidivism, as I see it, is the fact that when a man serves a term in a penitentiary or a jail and then comes out, particularly in times when jobs are not available, the situation becomes impossible for him, there being not available to him any unemployment insurance for the time during which he was actually in employment before he committed his offence. He goes forth into the world unable to find a job and hanging over him there is the stigma of recent conviction. Instead of encouragement to resist temptation that becomes stronger because of his previous conviction, he finds once more that he is forced into the position of having again to commit crime. I have had some experience with those who have committed crime. I have appeared for the defence in several hundreds of cases. I have never had a client who repeated, but in every case where I have acted and the person has been convicted I have taken a personal interest in him when he has come out of jail. I did not mean to speak about that, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to deal with personal matters. But I do know I am proud of the fact that I have never had a repeater.

This comes about through the simple act of trying to give assistance, not monetary assistance but encouragement. It is no encouragement to an offender, whether young or old, to know that at the expiry of his sentence, when he has satisfied his debt to society, society may say: Well now, for an indefinite period of the next two or three years you are still going to be kept in custody until such time as you prove you have shown a tendency to reform. First you blot out any hope of reform from the fact that the person has served a two year sentence. Then, having blotted it out, you want to resurrect that hope and have him come forth a good citizen.

I ask the minister to give the statistics. They are available and will tell the story whether or not this system has been successful in the jurisdictions where it has been tried. If it has, idealistic arguments have little place. If it has not, the hon. member for Vancouver East has graphically and powerfully placed before the house considerations that deserve the thoughtful respect of each and every one of us.

Mr. Knight: I should like to say a word or two on the bill, although not from the point of view that the hon. members for Prince Albert and Vancouver East have discussed it because I am not competent to do that. But I do want to say a word or two generally because I am interested in these industrial homes and in what they can and should be. I am principally interested in two phases more than any others. One concerns the educational facilities which are or are not and, if not, should be supplied. Another has to do with whether or not these places have the advantages of having trained psychologists attached to their staffs.

May I say here that when I questioned the previous minister of justice on the matter of trained psychologists in connection with our prisons and penitentiaries a number of years ago, I was surprised to learn that there was only one at that time and he was attached to Kingston penitentiary. Surely if it is necessary to have psychologists on the staffs of our high schools which are teaching boys and girls who are normal at least to the extent of not having committed any crime, there is an even greater need for the guidance of trained psychologists in industrial schools.

I am glad the bill has been introduced because its purpose ostensibly and actually is to advance the cause of penal reform in New Brunswick. A boy who might otherwise be given a sentence of three months or more in a penitentiary or common jail can now be sent to the boys' industrial home. If sent to the penitentiary he would have to mix with hardened criminals and sending him there would, in my opinion, simply defeat the purpose of the punishment. But an industrial home can be, and I emphasize "can", a source of individual rehabilitation and social redemption as far as the boy is concerned. Again, if a boy is sentenced for 14 days or more he can, by the decision of the judge, also be sentenced—

Mr. Winch: To five years.

Mr. Knight: —forthwith or at the expiration of the two weeks sentence, to a period in the industrial home. When I first read the bill I thought the boy had to serve the two weeks sentence first and would then be further sentenced, but I see he may be sentenced forthwith or at the end of his imprisonment. Why that provision, "or at the expiration of his imprisonment", is in the bill I do not know. Perhaps the minister will be able to explain that to us. He may be sentenced forthwith or after the expiry of the short sentence to a period not exceeding five years in an industrial home. I do not want to trespass on the ground already covered by the hon. member for Vancouver East, but I suggest that pretty wide powers are given there involving great responsibility over the life of a boy up to a period of five years. I take it, of course, that the people under whose authority this is done are responsible people. I believe they are judges under the terms of the act.

Then there is to be a parole committee which will have the power to discharge a boy or to discharge him in the custody of someone who can give him employment. The latter can only be done with the consent of the parent or guardian of the boy. There is of course a danger there as to the type of employer. We have heard of a number of unfortunate cases. I do not need to go back into the classics to find an example. We find them every day in our newspapers. I warn the minister that there are still Simon Legrees about.

The hon. member for Vancouver East has emphasized the matter of environment and what it does to people. The hon. member for Fort William meant exactly the same thing when he said there are no bad boys, there are only bad parents. That is simply another way of saying that it is the environment surrounding the boy which is usually—I do not say always—to blame for the condition that has arisen. If environment has been the cause, then I suggest that environment must be the cure. That brings me back to my first words. For the benefit of my hon. friend, may I say I am not arguing for a moment that we should commit these boys for five years, but if we are going to do so we want to know the sort of place to which they are going to be committed. If environment is to be the cure then the home, wherever it is, must be a place of joy—yes, I say "joy"—and reformation and not a place where they will suffer further degradation, as has happened in the past.

There must also be educational facilities of such a type that when the boy leaves the industrial home he will not be at a disadvantage compared with those who have attended our ordinary schools. I say again that while the boy is there he should be in the care of those who can exercise guidance—I think that is the word they are using now—in the same way as in our ordinary high schools and universities. There should be guidance instructors or guidance teachers. While the boy is there he must have the benefit of guidance and training by men qualified in that particular profession.

I want to mention one more thing and that is the stigma of a jail sentence. I suppose it is rather difficult to get away from that. But I do suggest that if we are to do away with the stigma of a jail sentence or of any sentence, we must send these juvenile delinquents, as I say, to a place where there is actual happiness and to which there shall be no stigma attached in their own minds upon discharge.

Mr. Dinsdale: I rise to speak briefly on this matter, Mr. Chairman, because as I listened to the discussion last evening it seemed to me that the interpretation then was somewhat different from the interpretation being placed on the bill this afternoon. Both the hon. member for Saint John and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton representing the province of New Brunswick spoke on this bill at the second reading stage. It was my understanding from their remarks that this legislation was coming before the house on the basis of a recommendation from New Brunswick, and the suggestion was to bring the legislation in line with a program of modernizing the New Brunswick penal system. On the other hand, this afternoon there seems to be a feeling that this legislation is a retrograde step in the handling of juvenile delinquents in New Brunswick.

Now, as I have attempted to read the bill and follow the discussion, I was rather inclined to the viewpoint that this legislation was more in sympathy with the modern emphasis in criminology, that we should think in terms of reformative measures rather than punitive measures. The essential purpose of the bill seems to be to provide for the establishment of a central reformatory, a modern type of institution. I think that is a good step because one of the weak links in the chain of our penal institutions is the inadequately staffed and inadequately programmed local jails and, in many cases, provincial institutions.

I know that in my own province of Manitoba there has been considerable discussion on the problem created in our provincial institutions as a result of the lack of adequate facilities to carry out a modern program of penology. As I understand, the purpose of this bill is to provide for a modern type of institution that will make possible the more comprehensive approach to the problem of treating juvenile delinquents. I raise that point because I should like to have a clarification from the Minister of Justice when he replies to the various points that have been raised in the discussion this afternoon. Either the bill is going to carry out the wishes of the government of New Brunswick or it is a retrograde step, as has been indicated in some of the remarks here this afternoon.

The second main purpose is to provide for a parole board. That is contained in what will be section 112 of the act. This section reads as follows:

> The lieutenant-governor in council may appoint a parole committee whose duty it shall be to inquire from time to time into the cases of prisoners sentenced to the boys' industrial home, and where as a result of such inquiry the parole committee thinks proper, it may permit prisoners serving sentences in the boys' industrial home to be discharged on parole under conditions approved of by the Minister of Justice.

I am in favour of extending the system of granting paroles because I believe it is a much healthier approach to the problem. Particularly in the case of juvenile delinquents, we should be trying to reform them within society rather than trying to provide an artificial environment in a penal institution. Again it is my impression from the remarks of the two members from New Brunswick that the purpose of this legislation is to broaden the parole facilities and to emphasize the remedial rather than the punitive aspect of dealing with juvenile delinquents. The Minister of Justice will notice that I am putting this in the form of a query because I am in a bit of a quandary as to which is the right interpretation of the legislation, whether it is a retrograde step or whether it is actually going to deal with the reforms suggested by the province of New Brunswick.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, in the granting of parole facilities to the provincial government, I am wondering whether the supervision of the parolee under those circumstances comes directly under the provincial authorities or still falls back upon the federal authorities? I say that because if any program of parole is going to deal adequately with the situation there must be proper supervision and properly trained personnel. There must have been some form of rehabilitation program that will help in the transition from the life of the institution to life in free society. Provided the personnel are available and provided an adequate parole program is available, I would tend to feel that this legislation is a step in the right direction.

So far as the indeterminate sentence measure is concerned, I am wondering whether the emphasis in allowing for an indeterminate sentence is to make it possible to further punish the delinquent, or is it to provide a longer period of time in order to apply a remedial and educational program? I would suggest it is much better, especially in the case of juvenile delinquents, to release them at the time when they are psychologically ready rather than subscribing to the philosophy that when their time has expired out they go, regardless of whether or not they are psychologically prepared. I would presume also that the indeterminate measure is there to allow a suitable time for completing any trade training that the juvenile delinquent may be undergoing within the institution. Again, if that is so, it is absolutely essential that the provincial authorities have adequate programs set up within the so-called modern institution.

I have presented all this somewhat in the form of a query because we seem to be at cross purposes as to the emphasis placed on the measure last night.

Mr. Hansell: Before the minister replies, I have a question or two to which he might reply at the same time. Although I did not speak on second reading, I am inclined to favour the bill because I believe it is a step in the right direction in giving boys a chance when they recognize they have done wrong. I believe you cannot stereotype human nature. You cannot impose penalties and say we imposed that penalty on one boy a few months ago, and therefore we are going to impose the same penalty for the same crime on another boy. Perhaps from the legal point of view that is a reasonable approach; but from the point of view of human nature it may not necessarily be. I have had considerable experience in work among boys and have been in charge of a number of boys' camps. I have studied boys under those conditions and believe I have learned something about them. In my earlier experience the philosophy was held out to me that, in reality, there never was a bad boy. However, after having operated some of those camps I am inclined to the belief that that philosophy is wrong, and that there are bad boys. Of course the philosophy has its background in the thought that we should never look upon boys as being basically bad, and that we should keep in mind that under proper environment and as a result of proper training their lives can be shaped so that even those who may appear to be the worst may turn out very well indeed.

I remember one boy who had the habit of inflicting punishment upon animals. He would grab a cat, take out his knife, and cut its head off, just to see the reaction. At one time or another however in that boy's life he received a different kind of instruction, and because of that instruction and an improved environment he turned out to be one of the best young men in the community. As a matter of fact he became a medical doctor. Perhaps his experience in cutting the heads off cats gave him a good deal of practice.

I do not believe human nature can be stereotyped. This bill gives the boy a chance. It may be found that, after all, his punishment may have been a little too harsh, and it may be felt that with the proper adjustments in his life he may make a great improvement.

However, what I had intended to say at this time was along slightly different lines. All the reformatories in the world do not get at the basic or root causes of juvenile delinquency. I doubt very much whether we could introduce legislation that would deal adequately with this problem. I made reference to the subject last year when we were considering the minister's estimates. Perhaps in doing so I was slightly out of order, because I noticed that at the time the chairman was tremendously agitated. I did so however because there does not appear to be any place in the estimates or, in fact, anywhere else, where one could discuss in detail the subject of juvenile delinquency, and suggest a remedy for it.

Mr. Winch: I suggest that it could be done under the administration vote in the minister's estimates.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps so; I am not going to argue the point. I have always made the claim that nothing could happen in Canada that would not find its place under some department of government, upon which responsibility could be focused. But when it comes down to certain principles of life it seems that we cannot legislate, and it becomes very difficult to know what action to take.

I claim that the solution to the problem of juvenile delinquency is not that of dealing with it when it is upon us. Rather, the basic solution is to deal with it before it becomes juvenile delinquency. Therefore I claim the home is greatly responsible for the situation, and it is something concerning which we cannot legislate. Not long ago I read an article stating that the wave of juvenile delinquency in these days could be traced to the condition during the war years, when mothers and fathers were working, or fathers were away and mothers had to assume all the responsibilities of the homes. It was suggested that under those conditions children did not have the chance they should have in their own homes, and it was pointed out that the war was responsible for the juvenile delinquency which followed.

This contention can be overemphasized, in my opinion. I believe we have to focus responsibility upon home and school life. Some service clubs have taken an active interest in this respect and have done marvellous work. It is unfortunate that we cannot appropriate more money to organizations of that kind, with a view to preventing juvenile delinquency.

However, when this condition develops it must be dealt with. The minister is taking the proper procedure in this bill when he gives the boy or the girl a chance. When it is found that proper environment and proper direction can help these young people, and that lives can be saved, it is only proper that they be given that environment and direction.

Let me say at once that I have no use for any process of mollycoddling. In my view when people commit wrongs they should be punished.

Mr. Winch: Is the hon. member in favour of two punishments for one crime?

Mr. Hansell: No, I am not in favour of two punishments for one crime. I believe that when the penalty is meted out, and when that penalty has been paid, then the debt to society is cancelled. However, I do not look upon this bill as making provision for two punishments.

Mr. Winch: That is my only point.

Mr. Hansell: I agree with my hon. friend on that. Referring again to my reference to mollycoddling, there are some who believe that only kindness should be shown in the treatment of crime. I do not think that is so. There are times when firmness must be shown, while at the same time showing a measure of kindness.

At this point I would ask the minister a question. Perhaps he would be prepared to discuss the matter at some greater length, because most of us are not too well informed about reformatories. I believe that the personnel of these reformatories must be very carefully chosen. If you get men in boys' reformatories or women in girls' reformatories who are going to be great big bosses and nothing more than bosses, who are going to throw their weight around and take it out on the boys just to be spiteful or to get their own way, that is not the way to handle them. I have found from experience that sometimes you can take a very bad boy who is upsetting the whole works by his attitude and give him some responsibility. He exercises that responsibility. He feels that he counts for something, and through that responsibility you can sometimes overcome the problem that he himself is making.

All I am saying here is that trained and efficient personnel should be chosen for the particular positions in those reformatories, but at the same time having due regard for everything. Their chief function should be to see whether they cannot make something out of the life of the boy or girl. If they are there simply to hold down a job and to see that the inmates are regimented, that they are in at night at a certain time and to act as big bosses, then they will not reform the children. That is my own view.

I note that the parole board is chosen by the provincial government. Can the minister throw light on the method that the parole board uses in determining what parole should be given? Do they interview the boy or the authorities? Is it paper work? Just what method is used?

I do not think I need to take up any more time of the committee. I have expressed my ideas. I do emphasize once again that you will not get rid of juvenile delinquency by all your prisons or all your penalties in the world. There has to be something basic in it. It has to be tackled at its source.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to hear and reply to all criticisms; but perhaps I might have shortened the debate somewhat if I had risen to my feet earlier in the discussion, and I am at fault to some extent for not having done so. Several of those who have taken part in the debate have proceeded quite sincerely upon what I must regard as a misconception of the arrangement that is envisaged in this proposed legislation.

But before I deal with this point perhaps I had better answer the question which has just been asked of me by the hon. member for Macleod. He asked what are the conditions under which parole would be granted by a provincial parole board appointed under this proposed legislation. I do not think I can do much better by way of a reply to that question than to read the conditions of the licence—that is the term used, the parole licence—which is issued by the British Columbia parole board under a provision in the Prisons and Reformatories Act, dealing with that province. They are as follows:

1. The licensee,—

That is the parolee.

—during the term of his licence, shall be under the supervision and authority of the provincial probation officer.

2. He shall proceed to such place and remain in the care of such person as is directed by the provincial probation officer and shall not move from that place or change his residence without the consent of the provincial probation officer or the person under whose care he has been placed.

3. He shall obey such instructions as may be given him and shall report periodically as and when directed.

4. He shall abstain from any violation of the law.

5. He shall not habitually associate with notoriously bad characters, such as reputed thieves and prostitutes.

6. He shall not lead an idle and dissolute life without visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood.

7. He shall preserve his licence and produce it when called upon to do so by a magistrate or peace officer.

Then there is a provision for further conditions to be inserted at the bottom, applicable to the specific person named in the licence.

I said during the debate on the second reading of the bill, by way of a suggestion to the hon. member for Vancouver East, that I thought the reason for this provision would emerge if he would read slowly and aloud the clause which is under discussion. Perhaps I had better indicate the sincerity of my suggestion by following that course myself. Clause 111 reads:

Where any boy, apparently under the age of 16 years, is convicted of an offence punishable by law on summary conviction, and thereupon is sentenced and committed to prison in any common jail for a period of not less than 14 days, any judge of the supreme court or a county court, in any case occurring within the county or counties for which he is such judge, may examine and inquire into the circumstances of such case and conviction, and when he considers that the material and moral welfare of the boy requires such sentence, he may, as an additional sentence for such offence, sentence such boy, either forthwith or at the expiration of his imprisonment in such jail, to the boys' industrial home, to be there detained for the purpose of his industrial and moral education for an indefinite period, not exceeding in the whole five years from the commencement of his imprisonment in the common jail.

The clauses of this section that require emphasis are these. When the judge "considers that the material and moral welfare of the boy requires such sentence", he may sentence the boy to be detained in the industrial home "for the purpose of his industrial and moral education for an indefinite period not exceeding in the whole five years". I must confess that—

Mr. Winch: As additional to the offence.

Mr. Garson: Yes, as an additional sentence.

Mr. Winch: To the offence.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that I do not get my hon. friend's point.

Mr. Winch: The minister emphasized certain clauses. I am asking him to emphasize the part which appears halfway down the clause as follows: "As an additional sentence for such offence."

Mr. Garson: As an additional sentence for such offence.

Mr. Winch: Is that in law?

Mr. Garson: In law?

Mr. Winch: An additional sentence for an offence.

Mr. Garson: The language to which my hon. friend refers is necessitated by the fact that the only way under our law in which one free man can lawfully interfere with another free man's freedom is by virtue of such a provision in the law as that under which an accused who has been found guilty can be sentenced and thereby deprived of his liberty for a period of time, determinate or indeterminate, not to exceed a prescribed limit, by reason of the offence that he has committed. It is perfectly clear in this legislation that the real reason for the indeterminate sentences for these boys of an age of less than 16—

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will let me finish the sentence, or the idea, then he can ask all the questions he likes. The real reason for this indeterminate sentence is to provide for the boy's welfare. The section says that the judge may do this in view of the circumstances of the case, and for the purpose of his moral and industrial education.

Let us take a concrete case of a young lad, we shall say, of 14 years of age who is brought before a magistrate for what may be a pretty minor and frivolous offence such as stealing a banana from a fruit stand, or something of that kind. They might let him off with a suspended sentence and without sending him to an industrial home, or jail, without taking his liberty away at all. But supposing the police who arrested the boy find on inquiry that the home he comes from and the environment in which he lives make it seem to be quite likely that this first offence is but the beginning, that if he continues to live in that environment he is headed for a really serious criminal career.

Under those circumstances it seems to me that while the offence itself might not be serious—if you will read the section you will see that where a boy is committed to a prison for not less than 14 days, that is anything above 14 days in the way of a determinate sentence, that is sufficient justification for an indeterminate sentence—the intelligent thing to do is to have that boy taken away from this unfavourable environment in which he is living and put in an industrial home where he can be properly trained. I am surprised to hear the hon. member for Vancouver East object to this procedure. I had always understood that in his humane attitude towards prisoners he had thought—and I must say that if I correctly appraise his thoughts I agree with him—that the real function of all prisons should be, not so much to punish as to rehabilitate. It is true that prisons are provided for the security of society; but if we do not rehabilitate in the prisons and merely treat the prisoner's incarceration as punishment, then the security to society that we provide is very temporary and in many cases will cease the minute the man is released from prison.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate what the minister is saying and his interpretation of my views on rehabilitation is absolutely correct. As I understand it, the minister is discussing the new section 111.

Mr. Garson: I am attempting to reply to a number of hon. members. I have no objection to my hon. friend from Vancouver East putting a question, but I should like to preserve some sort of continuity in my remarks and would appreciate that my hon. friend should not make a number of speeches in interruption of my own remarks.

Mr. Winch: Is the minister not referring to section 111?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend wishes to ask a question I shall be glad to answer, but I would prefer that he should not interrupt me in order to make another speech.

Mr. Winch: Section 111 deals with summary convictions under which a boy may be sentenced to a short term, but then, and I quote, there can be an additional sentence for such offence. I ask the Minister of Justice how that additional sentence of up to five years can be imposed on summary conviction which is for not over two years. Where in the law do you find that?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend will find it in the language of the section he has just quoted. That is what this section says; and that supports the argument I have been making. It makes it abundantly clear that where a boy has been convicted of a summary offence for which he may be imprisoned for only 14 days the judge, where he sees that the facts warrant it, may order that the boy be detained in an industrial home for an indeterminate period not exceeding in the whole five years.

Does any person suppose that this indeterminate sentence is really a punishment so much as it is an attempt at the rehabilitation of that boy in perhaps the only way in which it can be brought about? If the boy comes from a broken home, say with a drunken father and a prostitute mother, it does not strike me as being a very intelligent disposition of his case to put him in prison for 14 days and then let him return to that evil kind of environment.

Mr. McIvor: Would not the boy have a better place to sleep and have better food to eat when he goes to that place?

Mr. Garson: Of course he would have. In addition to that he would receive proper training. My observation has been that most criminals come from unhappy homes. During their childhood they have lacked that kind and intelligent care which would be given in an industrial home even though on an institutional basis. If you examined these cases, as I had to do in connection with the duties I discharged when we did not have a solicitor general handling the federal Department of Justice remissions, you would find that in a great majority of cases the men and women who are criminals have had an unhappy home in their childhood.

Even though the parents are poor, if there are a loving and respectable mother and father the child usually gets a good start in life. But even with wealthy parents, if there is no love and respect in the home the child gets a bad start. When therefore we come here with a provision of this sort I would have thought the hon. member for Vancouver East would have been the first member to support it.

Mr. Winch: If it is the first sentence, yes. I have said that twice now, that the first sentence should be the indeterminate sentence.

Mr. Garson: I have listened to this discussion as to the difference between a primary indeterminate sentence and the indeterminate sentence being imposed afterward. I must say that I find it to be a rather quibbling sort of argument. If the determinate sentence is 16 days and the indeterminate sentence lasts three years, what difference does it make with regard to the three-year period that it was preceded by 16 days?

An hon. Member: None.

Mr. Winch: It certainly does.

Mr. Garson: In all these amendments to the Prisons and Reformatories Act, as I went to some trouble to explain on the second reading of this bill in order that there would not be any misunderstanding as to just what function we are performing in this connection, we are dealing with legislation which has to do with the administration of provincial institutions. We are overcoming a certain difficulty under our constitution by providing in this case federal legislation for the government of New Brunswick which after careful consideration that government has asked us to provide.

That being so, I think that unless there is some clear evidence to the contrary we are bound to take the position that in asking for this legislation the provincial government of New Brunswick, which is a responsible body, was acting properly and within its rights. Unless therefore we have some cogent reasons which are quite apparent on the surface for thinking they are quite wrong in regard to this particular section we should grant it in the form in which they have asked for it.

In this connection, what are the facts? This section under discussion is not, as would seem to be indicated by some of the arguments we have heard, the product of some new brainstorm that has overtaken the government of New Brunswick in the last few weeks. As I indicated on the second reading of the bill, this industrial home for boys was set up in 1893. If the hon. member for Vancouver East and the other hon. members who have taken part in the debate will look at the legislation of that time they will see that this provision which we are discussing has been in our act since 1893. If it were subject to the abuses which are now attributed to it one would have thought that they would have become apparent long since.

Mr. Winch: There have been changes in thinking by 1955.

Mr. Garson: Certainly there have been changes in thinking by 1955. But I suggest quite sincerely to my hon. friend—who I think himself is of the same view—that, so far as this particular section is concerned, the concept that a juvenile delinquent who is the product of a bad home environment should be taken from that environment and put into a proper institution is one with which I am sure he would agree. It is certainly one with which I agree.

Mr. Winch: I have made that point clear all down the line.

Mr. Garson: I am saying that. I am giving my hon. friend full marks. That is why I say I cannot understand why he is opposed to this section.

Mr. Winch: On the procedure.

Mr. Garson: As to the procedure, what difference does it make whether there is this determinate sentence and then the indeterminate sentence?

Mr. Winch: It makes a great deal of difference.

Mr. Garson: Moreover, I would point out that this provincial parole board, which will be set up under the legislation we have before us here, will be made up of responsible citizens. It will operate under conditions which will be fixed by myself as Minister of Justice similar to those which I read to the committee a few minutes ago. If this provincial parole board had any reason to suppose that the juvenile who was serving this indeterminate sentence in the industrial home was not making the progress he should make, or if for any other reason that might occur to the parole board it thought he should be released, I am sure it would be glad to release him. But I am also sure that if the boy had an evil home environment there is small likelihood that the board would release him from the industrial home to go back to that evil environment.

The question may be asked—I think it was the hon. member for Saskatoon who raised it—whether this industrial home was to be properly staffed. In that connection I think probably I could not do better than read this letter. I may say that this is a different letter from the one I read on Friday. It is a letter which we received from the government of New Brunswick back in 1953 at the time they were considering the setting up of this industrial home. This letter reads as follows:

> In 1949, the child welfare officials of this province expressed such concern with respect to the spreading of juvenile delinquency that the provincial government appointed a committee to investigate the conditions leading to delinquency and to recommend methods of dealing with delinquents.
> The report of the committee, under the chairmanship of Miss Bessie F. Touzel, assistant director of the Canadian Welfare Council, Ottawa, recommended a number of important changes in the legislation respecting this subject.
> The Boys Industrial Home Act, chapter 22 of the revised statutes of New Brunswick, 1952, was accordingly amended at the 1953 session of the legislature to conform to recommendations contained in the committee's report.

In other words, legislation was put through the New Brunswick legislature to make in this home the administrative changes that are the counterparts of the federal legislation which is required to cover the question of the detention of convicted persons under the Canadian Criminal Code so they may be legally received and detained in that home. I quote again:

> The boys industrial home, which is specifically designated in part V of the Prisons and Reformatories Act as the place of imprisonment for the purposes of the act, was established by provincial legislation in 1893 as a reformatory prison, and a "governing board" was constituted a body corporate for the purpose of its administration.

The amendments made to the Boys Industrial Home Act during the last session of the legislature are, in short, as follows:

(a) The governing board of the boys industrial home, referred to in part V of the Prisons and Reformatories Act, has been dissolved and the administration of the home confined to the minister of health and social services.

In other words, it is directly responsible to a minister of the crown in the New Brunswick government. The letter continues:

(b) The home is now described as a reformatory or industrial home, rather than as a reformatory prison as heretofore.

Then listen to this:

(c) The aims of the home are now confined to—

Not detention or imprisonment.

—the education, industrial training and moral reclamation of juvenile delinquents.

(d) The act, as amended, provides for the establishment of an advisory board and a parole committee.

The board and the committee have since been established.

In keeping with the recommendations of the Touzel report, every effort is being made to provide the boys industrial home with trained personnel. The appointment of a new superintendent is pending;—

I think this answers the question raised by the hon. member for Macleod.

—the appointee, a trained clinical psychologist, will be assisted by a psychiatric social worker. These two officials are already on the staff of the department of health and social services.

However, the boys confined to the home will not fully benefit from the improvements adopted by the province of New Brunswick since most of them are committed for violation of the Criminal Code of Canada and as such are subject, almost exclusively, to part V of the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Then, in order to carry out these reforms which have been authorized by the provincial legislation, since they also come under the federal Prisons and Reformatories Act, he says this and I again quote:

I therefore request that consideration be given to amending part V of the Prisons and Reformatories Act so as to make all the provisions of the Boys Industrial Home Act applicable in all respects to juveniles committed for violation of the laws of Canada.

I am enclosing copies of the Boys Industrial Home Act, with amendments, together with a copy of the recommendations made by the "parole committee". These recommendations have been approved in principle by the minister of health and social services and myself.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, it seemed to us that the requests of the government of New Brunswick were fair, wise and proper. Indeed, I cannot find much higher praise for them than to say that they meet the views of the hon. member for Vancouver East in respect of the proper treatment of juvenile offenders, namely a treatment that is rehabilitative in character and not merely punitive. That being so I plead—and I think with good cause—for the support of the hon. member for Vancouver East and the other members who have spoken to the reforms which are covered by these suggested amendments.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks made by the Minister of Justice. On rehabilitation I of course agree with him 100 per cent. With the remarks of the attorney general which he has just quoted from the letter, I of course agree 100 per cent. There is no question about that whatsoever.

I have always had the highest regard for the Minister of Justice and I am rather disappointed at the line he has taken just now. He knows that not only I but all of us agree on all this approach, with regard to advancement, plans for rehabilitation and for taking care of the young. When I spoke on second reading last night and again this afternoon in this committee, at no time whatsoever did I criticize the advances provided for in this bill nor did I oppose the bill as a bill or criticize the question of rehabilitation. I have consistently raised only one point and the Minister of Justice unconsciously, shall I say—because I do not think he would do it deliberately—has kept completely clear of and away from the only point that I have raised.

I notice he has spent all his time on what will be section 111, having to do with summary conviction, but has made no mention at all of the new section 110 under which much heavier sentences can be imposed. I do not want to repeat. I have only one query, and it is the only one I have ever raised. It has to do with the psychological effect on a boy under the age of 16 who is charged with an offence under the law, found guilty, sentenced to a definite term and then having paid his debt to society, finds himself in the position of having a further sentence imposed in the discretion of a judge, which sentence can keep him in an institution up to five years.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Winch: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Would he, as in many cases is the only other alternative, send the boy back to the bad environment from which he came?

Mr. Winch: I am afraid that the Minister of Justice either did not listen to what I said last night or has not listened to what I have been saying this afternoon. As a matter of fact, I was called out of order by the Speaker last night when I tried to speak about environment as it affects criminals in this country, and especially as it affects our youth.

The minister will realize I was called out of order last night when I tried to speak on that very matter. I want to know, and the minister has not answered me yet, under what law, what phase of Canadian justice, is a person found guilty of the same offence twice? The minister partially explained that by the fact that it is being done by this legislation. I maintain that is not right. If a boy is guilty of an offence, find him guilty, sentence him, let him serve his sentence and then release him.

I come to what the Minister of Justice asked me. He wanted to know if I would send the boy back to the same environment. The answer is no. If it is wrong for the boy to go back to that environment then remove him from it not on the basis that he has served his sentence on the charge on which he was found guilty but on the basis that he should be removed from the environment as a delinquent, as a bad boy, as a boy needing the opportunity of education and training.

Mr. Garson: Read the section.

Mr. Winch: I have read it and I know it. In sections 110 and 111 you find him guilty first—

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Winch: Certainly.

Mr. Garson: What does he think that language means?

Mr. Winch: Where?

Mr. Garson: In section 111, the section we are discussing. It reads:

> . . . such judge, may examine and inquire into the circumstances of such case and conviction, and when he considers that the material and moral welfare of the boy requires such sentence, he may—

And so on.

Mr. Winch: Read the "and so on".

Mr. Garson: Certainly. I will read the whole thing.

> —as an additional sentence for such offence, sentence such boy, either forthwith or at the expiration of his imprisonment in such jail, to the boys' industrial home, to be there detained for the purpose of his industrial and moral education for an indefinite period, not exceeding in the whole five years from the commencement of his imprisonment in the common jail.

The point I would emphasize again, and which I think the hon. member for Vancouver East is overlooking, is that this is not done except where the judge considers on examination of the circumstances of the case that the material and moral welfare of the boy requires such further detention in the industrial home for the purpose of his industrial and moral education. So far as these purposes are concerned, I cannot imagine any that would be more worth while.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the weirdest situations in which I have ever found myself in my 22 years' experience. I am convinced the minister and I are not far apart and yet at the same time we are worlds apart because the minister will not recognize what I am trying to tell him, that as an additional sentence for such offence the judge can do so and so and so and so. I am trying to point out that from the psychological point of view that is dynamite in the case of a boy at that impressionable age under 16. How many times do I have to tell the minister that it should be put as an indeterminate sentence to meet exactly what the minister wants, but do not leave it so that the boy will feel that he has been sentenced, has served his term and is still there.

I can assure the minister and all other members of the house that it is not going to rehabilitate psychologically a boy under 16 when he can be sentenced to a definite term and then receive an additional sentence up to five years. It will not help in the case of those who come under section 110 which is taken from the Criminal Code. It will not help a boy who has received a sentence of two years or more to find that, having served his definite sentence, he still has more years to serve on an indeterminate basis. I am going to quit. The minister and I are very close together on what we desire, but I am convinced that the minister is missing out on the procedural effect. That is all I am asking him to consider.

As I said last night and this afternoon, I welcome the bill as an advance in Canadian penology. I most sincerely welcome the letters expressing the approach and views of the attorney general of New Brunswick. He should be most highly commended. But I feel a mistake is being made in sections 110 and 111, and surely it is our responsibility in the House of Commons to point out a possible improvement.

Mr. Hahn: I have a question or two I should like to put to the minister. When is the boy sentenced to the additional term? Is it at the time of the trial? Or after he has served his first sentence is the case again brought before a judge for review and the possible imposition of an additional sentence?

Mr. Garson: I think the terms of the section make that quite clear. It reads:

> Where any boy, apparently under the age of 16 years, is convicted of an offence punishable by law on summary conviction, and thereupon—

Sentence will be imposed right after conviction.

—is sentenced and committed to prison in any common jail for a period of not less than 14 days, any judge of the supreme court or a county court, in any case occurring within the county or counties for which he is such judge, may examine and inquire into the circumstances of such case and conviction, and when he considers that the material and moral welfare of the boy requires such sentence, he may, as an additional sentence for such offence, sentence such boy . . .

The boy could come up for sentence before a magistrate, and if my hon. friend will examine section 111 he will see that it is only a judge of the supreme court or a county court who has the authority to impose this indeterminate sentence. It would have to be done, therefore, after the boy had been before the magistrate because first of all there must be a primary, determinate sentence imposed by the court before which the boy is found guilty, and then a subsequent inquiry by a supreme court or county court judge into the circumstances of his case.

Mr. Trainor: May I ask the minister whether or not the accused has the benefit of counsel at this subsequent hearing resulting in the indeterminate sentence?

Mr. Garson: I certainly think there is no doubt at all that he has the privilege of having counsel. I do not think I could honestly say that in every case in which a juvenile came up he would be assured of counsel unless perhaps the bar association in New Brunswick, as they do in my own province, have a board set up for the purpose of seeing that prisoners are represented by counsel in all cases, whether or not they can afford it. I must say I do not know whether or not that exists in New Brunswick. He has the right to have counsel, that is certain.

Mr. Trainor: It seems to me that the point the hon. member for Vancouver East is raising is an objection to committal other than by due process of law. In other cases in which there is a committal it is always after a trial in which the individual has all the privileges of counsel. I should think that this would be a very important consideration, that no individual be committed to any institution on any type of sentence unless somewhat the same formalities are carried out as in a regular trial.

Mr. Garson: So far as the procedure in the administration of justice to which my hon. friend has referred in New Brunswick is concerned, it will be appreciated that those are provisions that would have to be made there as a matter of practice. In any event, I would think it would be a most extraordinary thing for a supreme court judge of that province or a county court judge to ever make an order of this kind without the most careful investigation. You see, the investigation he makes is into the circumstances of the case. How did the boy come to do this? What was his background and his environment? I cannot imagine a judge making an order of that kind without the most careful and exhaustive investigation, even if there were no counsel there at all.

Mr. Fairey: I think the difficulty has arisen here in the matter of interpretation. I support fully the preference which seems to have been expressed for the indeterminate sentence. The difficulty seems to be the objection to what has been termed two sentences for one criminal act. I have read these two sections carefully, and I would ask the minister if this interpretation is not really the true meaning of section 110, and the reason why the expression occurs, "may further sentence"?

Using the example of the hon. member for Prince Albert, where a person is convicted of a crime carrying a sentence of two years, who would then be released on parole after serving a term of probably a year and three or four months, does this not mean that the person is, in effect, given an indeterminate sentence? He could not be released at a time earlier than one year and three or four months. In other words, after he serves a sentence appropriate to the offence for which he has been primarily committed, he can be paroled?

Mr. Garson: In other words, what my hon. friend is saying is, does he not have to serve his primary determinate sentence in full before any probation can be exercised in relation to the indeterminate sentence? No, I think not. I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Prince Albert said and I will grant that in cases which have to do with adults where there is a primary sentence, determinate sentence and a further indeterminate sentence, the cases are exceedingly exceptional, if indeed there are any, in which the remission board grants a remission in respect of the determinate sentence until it has been served in full, knowing there is in addition to that an indeterminate sentence.

One of the reasons for that is, as my hon. friend may know, that most of these indeterminate sentences are imposed in respect of people who have been convicted as habitual criminals. There are not very many of them and there are not many indeterminate sentences. But when an indeterminate sentence of that kind is imposed upon a man convicted of being an habitual criminal he has always a record as long as your arm, he is usually a very desperate criminal, and there is no basis in fact for the granting of any remission, either of the determinate or indeterminate sentence. In other words, it does not arise from the rule that was referred to by the hon. member for Prince Albert which was, as I understood it, that having imposed a determinate and indeterminate sentence you could not remit in connection with the determinate sentence until it was fully served. It arises rather from the fact you very seldom have grounds for the exercise of any remission, in the case of an adult habitual criminal, in relation to either the determinate or indeterminate sentence.

In the case of a juvenile it would seem to me quite clear that if a boy were sentenced to a year determinate and another two years indeterminate, or three or four years indeterminate so the total would not be more than the five years indicated, then if at the end of six months perhaps the parole board had evidence brought before it whereby they were assured that this lad could get out of the industrial home and get a job with a farmer who was willing to take him and where he would have loving care, then I do not think they would have the slightest hesitation about granting parole. But as I apprehend it the main purpose of this whole legislation is that if there are no families that will take these boys, if there is no other environment in which they can be placed, at least they will be assured of the kind of environment which the industrial home will supply them. This will provide them with a decent chance in life. The thing we have to keep in our minds above all else in considering this legislation is that we are not dealing with adults, we are dealing with children. We are trying to provide that they shall not, if they have been convicted of an offence, ever have a worse environment than that which the industrial home provides.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question? I hope I am not out of order, Mr. Chairman. Would the Minister of Justice consider moving that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, in view of the fact that a committee meeting of the greatest importance in which he and I are both concerned has been called for 4.30?

Mr. Philpott: Before that is decided, Mr. Chairman, may I say that for the past two days I have listened carefully to all the arguments and for the life of me I cannot see that the hon. member for Vancouver East, whom I esteem very deeply especially in this particular matter, has really explained what his grievance is. I agree entirely with what he says about the psychological effect of indeterminate sentences, and what seems to be the imposition of a double sentence. Surely, the whole purpose of what we are trying to do here is to validate some legislation that has been requested by New Brunswick. What New Brunswick is asking for is exactly what has been in effect in Alberta and Ontario.

While my lawyer colleagues in the house may not like this term, I think that sometimes when you make laws you have to have a legal subterfuge to achieve certain good things. I think the end that is being achieved by the two sections in dispute, sections 110 and 111, is entirely the end that the hon. member for Vancouver East wants to achieve. It seems to me what he objects to is what seems to be the power of a judge to inflict a second sentence at the end of the determinate period. When you come down to reality, surely what it is in practice is that the judge, for the sake of the boy or the girl, can keep that boy or girl away from an environment that would do injury to that boy or girl. But when we come down to reality, surely what it is in actual practice is that a judge, for the sake of the boy himself, or for the girl, as the case may be, is keeping that boy or girl away from an environment that would be injurious. So it seems to me that if we had the complete privilege of wording the act as we would like to word it, we might have done so in such a way that it would not have caused such unnecessary conflict. However, I for one cannot see any difference between what the hon. member for Vancouver East is trying to get and what the Minister of Justice is giving us in this legislation.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest, and for two reasons, to the discussion of this matter. I have listened, first, because apparently the measure is intended to combat juvenile delinquency, which is a very important problem in Canada today. In the second place, I have before me an article which appeared in the Vancouver Province of May 30, bearing the heading "To the Penitentiary at Fourteen". It states in part as follows:

> A 14 year old British Columbia boy has been sentenced to two years in the penitentiary for car theft.
> The brief Canadian Press story about the sentencing of this lad had little to say about his case, except that he was one of four pyjama-clad youths who escaped from Brannen Lake school for boys a few days ago.
> We do know, however, that when he appeared before Magistrate L. Beevor-Potts in Nanaimo he pleaded to be sent to the penitentiary because "at least I'll learn something there."

This, apparently, indicates the expressed desire of a youth who found himself in the toils of the law, when he said he wanted to learn something that might be of some particular value to him. No doubt this is not the only boy who has recognized his difficult position and asked that something should be done for him. The fact that this boy has indicated a desire to learn, while being sent to a penitentiary, is most important indeed.

For this reason I would be most sympathetic toward the bill. I raised a question earlier because I felt there must be some way of getting around the principle of the double sentence. If the clauses are read carefully, as the minister has suggested, then every individual will be made to understand that a possible five-year sentence is facing him. That is a most important factor. Under those circumstances I would suggest that possibly the offender should be sentenced to an indeterminate sentence of five years.

Mr. Philpott: To a reformatory.

Mr. Hahn: Such sentence would be subject to review at a particular time, as stated by the judge who passed the sentence. It might be, of course, a magistrate who would sentence the individual to two weeks to begin with. It could not be done by a magistrate, because an indeterminate sentence of five years would not be permitted from him. But whoever sentenced the individual could ask for a review by the parole board at the end of two weeks, or a month, or two years, as the case might be. At that time it might be decided to set a later date at which the sentence could be reviewed, if it was found that the boy was making headway, that he was learning, or that it was hoped he might do so.

I would support the hon. member for Vancouver East so far as his contention regarding the psychological effect is concerned. A person who has paid for his crime has the right to feel that he will be free and able to continue his life with his old friends. If that boy were then to find that he was to be brought before a judge and sentenced to another five years, as an indeterminate sentence, it would simply sour his attitude towards society. I do not think we would be treating such an individual properly. I would ask the minister to give some consideration to the suggestion I have made, in the hope that something might be done.

There is one other question the minister might consider. Is there similar legislation in effect in any other province of Canada; if so, in what province or provinces?

Mr. Garson: I realize the hon. member does not have the federal statutes in front of him. However, if he would look at section 52 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act as passed by this parliament he would see that similar legislation is in effect in Ontario, that it is found in section 137 of the Manitoba part of this act, in section 92(6) of the Nova Scotia part and section 142 of the British Columbia part of this act limited to girls only.

Mr. Hahn: In view of the fact that it is in effect in British Columbia, if it is working properly I am wondering why a child of 14 would ask to be sent to a British Columbia penitentiary so that at least he could learn something, as is indicated in the editorial in the Vancouver Province of May 30.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I could not answer or give explanations about an individual case in any province. In such a case there may be a number of circumstances that would make a certain course seem the wise one. However, since I do not know anything about the case to which the hon. member referred, I could not comment upon it intelligently.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, this discussion has extended over a wide field. However, after listening to the minister's explanation I cannot see very much to worry about. I am not absolutely or 100 per cent familiar with the intention in this instance, or with the details of carrying out reformation procedure in New Brunswick.

I do think, however, that hon. members who have spoken about sections 110 and 111 have overlooked section 112. It is the new section that gives the protection, because it gives the provincial authority the right to set up a parole committee which will review cases from time to time, or as often as required. All these institutions will be under the supervision of a person to be known as the inspector of penal institutions. He is to be a trained man and will be in charge of county jails, the industrial home for boys and the central reformatory. It will be his duty to see that in connection with detention there will be associated the idea of reform, education and rehabilitation rather than that of punishment.

This principle was expressed clearly in the letters read by the Minister of Justice. My reading of sections 110 and 111 does not indicate that a judge or a magistrate would give a sentence for a definite period and then bring the boy back and give him a further indeterminate sentence. It is all done at the same time, and I doubt if one boy or girl in a hundred would know there was a fixed period of detention with an indefinite period added. It would mean to them that they would be detained for a certain length of time; then, under section 112, whether they are detained for a fixed period, or a fixed period plus an indefinite period, their case may be reviewed.

That is my interpretation. If I am wrong in that I am sure the minister will correct me. As I say, that is the intention of the clause. If that is so, then we are causing ourselves a lot of worry and taking up a lot of time on this bill which is not necessary. This legislation was given a great deal of thought before the Department of Justice was asked to present it. I have faith in those in charge of the administration of justice in New Brunswick; I am sure the legislation will be carried out with the idea of reform, education and rehabilitation in mind, and that is what we are all after.

ALBERTA-BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY

LEGISLATION CONFIRMING NORTHERLY PORTION

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 412, respecting the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to confirm the last section of the boundary between Alberta and British Columbia which has finally been marked on the ground. The legislatures of both provinces have passed bills confirming the boundary as marked, and we are introducing this bill to confirm it here. This will mark the final completion of the entire boundary.

The boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia is defined by sections 7 and 8 of the imperial act, chapter 29 and 30 Victoria, chapter 67.

In April, 1912, the surveyor general of dominion lands and the surveyor general of British Columbia, the latter at the instance of the minister of lands for British Columbia, discussed the matter of the survey of the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, with the result that at the suggestion of the two provinces concerned an order in council was passed on the 18th day of February, 1913, inviting the governments of Alberta and British Columbia to join in the survey of their respective boundary. Both provinces accepted the invitation and each appointed a representative by orders in council passed on the 16th day of June, 1913, and the 1st day of August, 1913, respectively. By P.C. 1721 of 1913 the government of Canada appointed its surveyor general to represent the dominion on the survey.

The part of the boundary to be surveyed at that time was from the 49th parallel, that is to say, the boundary between the United States and Canada, up to a point on the 120th meridian of west longitude about north latitude 57° 26′ 40·25″. The survey was completed between the years 1913 and 1924.

In 1931 the legislatures of Alberta and British Columbia passed acts consenting to the confirmation of the boundary as surveyed and marked on the ground under the supervision of the commissioners, from the international boundary to the point mentioned. The government of Canada by 22-23 George V, chapter 5, an act entitled, "The Alberta-British Columbia Boundary Act, 1932", declared the line so surveyed, marked and laid down in the manner referred to in the preamble to the act and to the extent thereof to be the boundary line between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia whether the same increased, diminished or otherwise altered the territory of either province.

In 1949 the members of the boundary commission representing the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, on behalf of their respective provinces, communicated with the surveyor general for Canada saying that the survey of the remainder of the Alberta-British Columbia boundary was urgently required, and suggested that the federal government participate in the survey. Having taken part in the first lap of the survey, and the survey being also required as control in the preparation of maps of the national topographic series, the federal government decided to again take part in the survey of that boundary. Federal and provincial orders in council were made and approved for the creation of a commission to delimit the boundary between the two provinces from a point on the 120th meridian about north latitude 57° 26′ 40.25″ to the terminus on the 60th parallel of north latitude as determined by the boundary commission.

That last part of the boundary is now completely surveyed and marked on the ground by monuments of a permanent nature, and the two provinces have expressed the wish that the boundary line so surveyed and marked on the ground be accepted and confirmed as the true and unalterable boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. To that effect, the legislatures of British Columbia and Alberta each introduced and passed a bill whereby they now consent that the parliament of Canada do declare the line so surveyed, monumented and shown in the manner referred to in the preamble of the bill and to the extent thereof to be the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia whether or not the same increases, diminishes or otherwise alters the territory of their respective provinces.

The purpose of this bill is therefore, in compliance with the requests of the two provinces and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the British North America Act, 1871, to confirm the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Green: The minister has indicated that the boundary between Alberta and British Columbia has now been completely marked. Can he tell the committee what the position is with regard to the boundary between British Columbia and the Yukon? It has been my understanding that that particular boundary has never been clearly marked. I should like to know whether or not that is the situation.

Mr. Prudham: I understand the work is continuing but has not yet been completed.

Mr. Green: Has there been any work done in the way of marking out the boundary between British Columbia and the Yukon?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, parties have been working there in the last year.

Mr. Green: It just started last year?

Mr. Prudham: No; they were working during the last year. I am not just sure what year it started. They are still working.

Mr. Green: When is it expected that the work will be completed?

Mr. Prudham: I am sorry, but I cannot tell the hon. member that. I will tell him that on my estimates.

Mr. Green: They are actually marking the boundary between British Columbia and the Yukon?

Mr. Prudham: They have been working on it. I do not know how soon it will be completed. I shall be very pleased to give my hon. friend more specific information when my estimates are before the house.

Mr. Macdonnell: Just as a matter of interest, how is a boundary marked?

[Mr. Prudham.]

Mr. Prudham: The boundary is marked at intervals of slightly over a mile by permanent markers of concrete or stone, or some other permanent marker.

Mr. Green: It is marked in that way along the Rocky mountain range, is it?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, it is. The intervals between the monuments may vary in mountainous country, but it is clearly marked at intervals of a mile or slightly more than a mile.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARY OF MINISTER AND EXPIRY OF ACT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (for the Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 256, to amend the Defence Production Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a simple bill containing only two sections. The first section provides that the salary of the minister shall be $15,000 per annum. At the present time the salary of the minister is $10,000 per annum, but unfortunately the present minister does not draw that salary; for the moment the salary is not paid. However, occasion might demand at any time that a separate minister of defence production be appointed, and in that case I think every hon. member would wish him to receive the usual salary of $15,000 per annum. Through an error this ministry was not included in the salaries bill, and it is now proposed to correct that error.

The second section provides that the act, which would normally expire on July 31, 1956, will not expire and that the section providing for its expiry shall be repealed. As I explained when the resolution was under discussion, the reason for that is that the work of the department is a continuing work. Perhaps at earlier stages in the life of the department the work has not been as complicated and as difficult as it is at the moment. The department has under construction the mid-Canada early warning line, a large and important and difficult project located halfway between here and the Arctic ocean. It also has under development a supersonic fighter plane involving a new supersonic engine and a new airframe. In addition it has all the supply problems incidental to maintaining troops in Germany and in Canada, and responsibility for keeping the equipment of the army, navy and air force up to the required standards.

Earlier discussion indicated that there is no particular objection to extending the life of the department. The necessity for extending its life is that it is impossible to hold the class of men we have in the department on the basis of temporary jobs. People who see that their jobs are going to expire in one year start looking for other jobs, and quite properly so. We know now that the services of these men and women will be required for a number of years, and we believe they are entitled to the security extended to service in permanent departments of government. Therefore it is proposed to make this department a permanent department.

The department has been permanent in effect since it was formed in 1939. After the department of munitions and supply was liquidated in 1948 its work was carried on as a branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce without a departmental act. It was found most difficult to carry on in that way, and we were glad indeed to have reason for forming the Department of Defence Production and asking parliament to enact a proper Defence Production Act.

Since 1939 the Department of Defence Production has spent probably $17 or $18 billion, yet it has been free from dishonesty, maladministration and the difficulties that frequently beset defence purchasing. I can tell hon. members from experience that defence purchasing is the most difficult type of purchasing to be undertaken by any government department.

The munitions and supply act was enacted in 1939, and was amended from time to time as the experience of the department indicated was necessary. The present act was based on the final edition of the munitions and supply act, and has proved to be comprehensive enough to cover all the situations we encounter in defence purchasing. It was drafted with that purpose in view and was based on the experience of several years of defence purchasing in wartime. We believe it is a model act.

I may tell hon. members that practically every country has the equivalent of our Defence Production Act. I am familiar with the acts in vogue in the United States and the United Kingdom, and I can say that the powers taken under our act are considerably more modest than those granted by either of the two acts I have mentioned.

There seems to be no objection to extending the life of the department; that appears to all hon. members as reasonable, but there was objection raised to extending the life of the Defence Production Act. During debate on the resolution I undertook to examine the situation with a view to amending the bill to take cognizance of some of the objections raised earlier. The matter has been gone into most thoroughly with the Department of Justice, with the Prime Minister and with the officials of my department, and for reasons which I shall state I cannot say at this time that we are prepared to amend the Defence Production Act in any manner whatsoever.

I note it is nearly five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps before going into why we cannot offer amendments at this time you would call it five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES, LTD.

The house in committee on Bill No. 376, to authorize Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipeline—Mr. Weaver—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1:

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, we do not seem to have this bill in its amended form. I wonder whether the sponsor could indicate whether the bill that is now before the committee is in the same form as the other similar bills that went through the house.

Mr. Weaver: If the hon. member will look up Votes and Proceedings of Wednesday, June 1, he will find all the amendments set out.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Green: Are you referring now to clause 1 as it was rewritten in the committee?

The Chairman: Perhaps I should call the clauses in this manner: Clause 1 as amended in committee. Would that be agreeable to hon. members of this committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses 1 and 2 as amended agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

The Chairman: I understand that the title will be amended on third reading. Shall the title carry?

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time? Now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Weaver moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I understood there was to be a motion to amend the title.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the amendment to the title is to be made in the last motion, which is to be that the bill do now pass and the title be as amended. That is the next motion. Shall the third reading be agreed upon?

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Perhaps it should be pointed out on third reading, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill originally came before the house it contained only two sections and was in effect a bill to authorize a Manitoba company to go into the operation of pipe lines. Objections were taken to the form of the bill on second reading. Then in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines it was changed from a bill which authorized a Manitoba company to construct a pipe line into a charter for a new company, that charter being much in the same terms as those of the other pipeline charters which passed through the house.

I think it was because those quite extensive changes were made that it is now necessary to change the title in order to describe the bill as a bill to incorporate a pipe-line company, whereas previously it was merely a bill to give, to a company which had already been incorporated under the Manitoba law, the power to construct a pipe line.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

Mr. Weaver moved that the bill do now pass and that the title be "an act to incorporate Trans-Prairie Pipelines of Canada, Ltd."

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: There are several divorce bills on the order paper. I understand that it is the wish of some hon. members that Bill No. 447 be allowed to stand.

Mr. Nicholson: Bill No. 427, Mr. Speaker.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Speaker: Then Bill No. 427 will stand. Shall all the other bills be taken in the one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall these Bills Nos. 419 to 426 and Nos. 428 to 448 inclusive, being divorce bills, be now read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY OF CABINET MINISTERS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 379, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that in the short time I had available on the previous occasion when we discussed this bill, I pointed out that there were certain obvious inequalities—perhaps I could use that word—in the proposals that had been put before the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I realize that the explanation he gave was an understandable one, namely that he thought the bill would be more acceptable in its present form than in some other form, though he probably would be prepared to say that the principle he was trying to have established by parliament was that a cabinet minister should not hold a directorship in a company during the time he was a member of the cabinet. For the reason one has not far to seek, of course. It is that there may be occasions when, at least in theory, a minister might be obliged to devote some time to the duties of a director, and that possibly the obligation of a cabinet minister is to devote his full time to being a minister of the crown.

This has not always been the case in Canada. I think everyone recognizes the fact that in late years it is true that the work of a cabinet minister has been taking more of one's time than it formerly did. I do not suppose it was very long ago that many ministers found it possible to discharge their obligations to the crown and their service to parliament in part of the time during the week, and could in fact engage in other personal occupations for part of the time. But in recent years, with parliament sitting from five to six months a year, with the greatly increased number of bills that come before parliament and the greatly expanded services that are being given to the public through the administration, a minister in many cases is rather wishful that the day had more than 24 hours, and there is not too much time to devote to personal affairs. Nevertheless, sir, until this debate arose I do not think the point was ever made that there should not be any time left for a minister to devote to other affairs to which he felt he owed an obligation, without for the moment examining whether such obligations may be such as to have a commanding demand on his time.

In the course of his introductory remarks the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred, as I recall it, to two countries outside Canada as examples, and I wish to deal briefly with his one reference to the United States and his one reference to the United Kingdom. In the case of the United States, as I understood him he had reference to the swearing in of cabinet ministers by the newly constituted Republican administration some three years ago. The house will recall that one of the cabinet ministers chosen by the President was obliged to divest himself of certain holdings in a corporation before he was acceptable to that particular committee of congress which passes on the acceptability of cabinet ministers.

That case is entirely different from that which is supposed to be placed before us in this bill. The objection taken at the time to the cabinet minister was not that he was a director of a corporation. The objection taken was that his holdings in a particular corporation were very substantial and that the corporation not only had many contracts with the government but in some cases exclusive contracts, especially in connection with the production of war materials and the like. It was not the case that he would have to devote some time to merely being a director, nor was there any suggestion that the trusteeship which he undertook as a cabinet minister could not be carried out properly under the circumstances, but merely that he himself was financially greatly interested in the company concerned, and that that was not a matter which ought to be passed over lightly by the committee investigating his qualifications.

May I point out what every member of the house of course knows, that the system in the United States is wholly different from that which obtains here. There the president is responsible to congress, it is true, in the sense that certain choices of personnel have to be approved by committees of congress in some cases, but he accepts full responsibility and indeed has visited on him the onus of full responsibility for the administration of the government of the United States.

That is not the situation here, sir. We as a cabinet are responsible both to one another and to the prime minister, and the cabinet as such is responsible to parliament in a wholly different manner from that which obtains south of the border. In any event, I stress the fact that to cite the instance of Mr. Wilson as an example of what has been done elsewhere which should be followed in Canada is merely to gloss over the great difference in the constitutional effect in both countries.

My hon. friend also mentioned, but only in one sentence, the practice in the United Kingdom. I was rather expecting him to give us some information about it, but perhaps because he felt his time was limited he did not pursue it further. He left with us the impression that the practice in the United Kingdom was such that if it were followed here we would in fact adopt the amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act that he is proposing. I intend to make some reference to the practice in the United Kingdom, and to point out that it seems to me illogical to suggest amendment of the Senate and House of Commons Act as a way of carrying out what he apparently has in mind.

In the United Kingdom, as I think we are all aware, directorships are matters of emolument, and certainly in the past at any rate have been lucrative to those holding them. In Canada perhaps that is also true in some cases, but certainly not on the scale that has obtained in the past at least in the United Kingdom. I should also point out that in the United Kingdom they have a unitary state, and we would not have the situation I have already mentioned with respect to provincially incorporated companies or federally incorporated companies. For that reason, sir, it might be supposed that in the United Kingdom they would have already taken the step that has been recommended to us by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In other words, where no distinction could be made one would have thought that if they felt there should be a statute they could have passed one, because anyone serving in the cabinet there could only hold a directorship in a United Kingdom corporation or a foreign corporation, and it would have been easy to lay down the rules in that way.

The fact that they have not done so has led me to suppose there may be some merit in not setting up a statutory bar to anyone serving as a cabinet minister and retaining or carrying on some other activity outside that of government. But I propose to examine in detail the practice in the United Kingdom, because it seems to me that in one sense it commends itself to us as a standard of practice. On the other hand, it definitely does lay down the rules which in effect obtain in this country in one form or another.

If I may have the permission of the house I should like to read from Hansard of the United Kingdom the rules that obtain there, for the purpose of placing them on the record and examining them to see if they are applicable to Canadian conditions. They will be found in Hansard of the 25th of February, 1952, at pages 701 and 702. A statement was made by the then prime minister in answer to a question which apparently had been put to the ministry some time before. The question was:

> What regulations govern the continuation of salaried service with a private company on appointment to ministerial office?

Perhaps hon. members would bear in mind that this happened just a few months after the government had changed in the fall of 1951, I think. The regulations are rather lengthy and I will have to crave the indulgence of the house for the purpose of examining them. I propose to read the record and then make some comments. The Prime Minister answered by asking leave to circulate a copy in the official report, which I take it is equivalent to asking that the document be incorporated in Hansard and not read. There are, as a matter of fact, eight rules. I shall read them from beginning to end and then, as I say, I should like to have the privilege of going back to discuss them. They are:

> 1. It is a principle of public life that ministers must so order their affairs that no conflict arises, or appears to arise, between their private interests and their public duties.
> 2. Such a conflict may arise if a minister takes an active part in any undertaking which may have contractual or other relations with a government department, more particularly with his own department. It may arise, not only if the minister has a financial interest in such an undertaking, but also if he is actively associated with any body, even of a philanthropic character, which might have negotiations or other dealings with the government or be involved in disputes with it. Furthermore, ministers should be free to give full attention to their official duties, and they should not engage in other activities which might be thought to distract their attention from those duties.
> 3. Each minister must decide for himself how these principles apply to him. Over much of the field, as is shown below, there are established precedents; but in any case of doubt the prime minister of the day must be the final judge, and ministers should submit any such case to him for his direction.
> 4. Where it is proper for a minister to retain any private interests, it is the rule that he should declare that interest to his colleagues if they have to discuss public business in any way affecting it, and that he should entirely detach himself from the consideration of that business.

5. Ministers include all members of the government except unpaid assistant government whips.

6. Ministers must on assuming office resign any directorships which they may hold, whether in public or in private companies and whether the directorship carries remuneration or is honorary. The only exception to this rule is that directorships in private companies established for the maintenance of private family estates, and only incidentally concerned in trading, may be retained subject to this reservation—that if at any time the minister feels that conflict is likely to arise between this private interest and his public duty, he should even in those cases divest himself of his directorship. Directorships or offices held in connection with philanthropic undertakings should also be resigned if there is any risk of conflict arising between the interests of the undertakings and the government.

7. Ministers cannot be expected, on assuming office, to dispose of all their investments. But if a minister holds a controlling interest in any company considerations arise which are not unlike those governing the holding of directorships and, if there is any danger of a conflict of interest, the right course is for the minister to divest himself of his controlling interest in the company. There may also be exceptional cases where, even though no controlling interest is involved, the actual holdings of particular shares in concerns closely associated with a minister's own department may create the danger of a conflict of interest. Where a minister considers this to be the case, he should divest himself of the holding.

8. Ministers should scrupulously avoid speculative investments in securities about which they have, or may be thought to have, earlier or confidential information likely to affect the price of those securities.

I notice that there was no debate on that answer, and presumably it was accepted by the house as a general statement that would be applied by the then prime minister in any future change in connection with his ministry. Presumably also he had applied those rules in the formation of the ministry which had occurred perhaps three or four months before that.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, sir, those are the only published rules of any kind with respect to the problem with which we are now dealing. There may be others in other jurisdictions, and perhaps hon. members will be able to correct me, but so far as I have been able to determine there are no other rules. However, as I may have implied a few moments ago, there are certain practices in the United States, and I have no doubt there may be some obscure statutes there that are the authority whereby the respective congressional committees consider the qualifications of the various candidates who are recommended for appointment by the president.

I should like to point out to the house that these are the rules which Mr. Churchill laid down, and which presumably he applied, and in the course of which he made the frank statement that with respect to certain matters therein it was for the minister himself to decide whether or not he was affected by these particular rules. He also went on to say that in the final result it would be for the prime minister to make the decision as to whether or not the minister should divest himself of these particular interests.

On the matter of interests, sir, may I repeat what the hon. member said to me in the few minutes I had two weeks ago, that he was not making any suggestion that in the particular case he had in mind and to which he referred there was any conflict of interest; that there was any financial advantage, or indeed that there was anything more than this proposal which had always been in his mind. Perhaps it could be said that certain present circumstances would only add to the strength of his argument. He did not, however, assert anything which in my view would contravene the spirit of these rules. In other words he did not make an argument for the amendment he was proposing which would be borne out by conduct which the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom was suggesting was improper under the circumstances.

I therefore repeat, Mr. Speaker, that it would seem to me that until recent years at least there has been no settled practice in commonwealth countries—perhaps in others for all I know—of a growing restriction on the activities of cabinet ministers outside the administration of their departments and in common with their colleagues in the administration of the government. If there is or has been a tendency to restrict those activities, it has grown up just in recent years, probably for the reason I have given, that it would seem there was not enough time in a day to devote to anything else but the affairs of the public.

I realize that some of the rules I have just read are more or less a repetition of rules which had been stated by a former prime minister of the United Kingdom many years ago in connection with another incident. Presumably in the 40-odd years that have elapsed these rules have been observed by succeeding prime ministers, and for some time at least these rules have been merely a reflection of a long-standing practice there. However, I think it is fair to say that I do not recall, nor can I find very much record in the United Kingdom of anyone suggesting prior to this, that a person should not be a cabinet minister if he was the director of a corporation, and this probably breaks new ground in that respect. I repeat that perhaps other researchers may find an earlier record of it.

For these reasons, therefore, I suggest that the bill before us, even if it were considered to be progressive, is at least no more than timely. It is perhaps even a little before its time. Evidently public opinion in the commonwealth countries, and perhaps in others, has not up until very recently at any rate approached this problem with any particular concern about whether cabinet ministers should or should not be directors of companies. I grant you, sir, that I have not found it possible to search all the statutes of other commonwealth countries and, as I say, there may be exceptions that I have not been able to find.

To go back over the rules, therefore, may I point out that the standard of conduct expected of cabinet ministers seems to include, first of all of course—and so obviously is it the case that it was left to the end to state it—that they should not engage in speculative investments in securities about which they have or might be thought to have confidential or early information.

That is, as I have intimated, a throwback to an incident in the United Kingdom of 40-odd years ago; and I do not recall any such incident in Canadian public life, though there may have been one. In fact, my recollection is that even prime ministers in this country have held directorships in companies, though not in recent years. We have gradually approached this problem as one which rests on public opinion, because the prime minister of the day is obliged to make his choice of cabinet ministers acceptable to the public, and acceptable of course to parliament as well, though not in the sense that the president of the United States must choose cabinet ministers who are acceptable to congress. I fear many of us would not be on the front benches if we had to submit our qualifications to opposition members.

Let us therefore consider these rules, though not in detail, because I do not propose to take them in detail. However, they divide themselves into three general groups. First there is the matter of private interest. And with respect to that, as I have said I do not find any evidence of any suggestion that private interest is conflicting in any way with public duty. I do not wish to widen the subject of the discussion, but my understanding is that hardly anyone would expect a cabinet minister so to remove himself from the trade and commerce of the country that he would not be able to resume his occupation or his livelihood should he cease to be a cabinet minister. All that need be said on that point is that his private interest should not conflict with his public duties. We are in complete agreement with that, of course.

The next rule has to do with the holding of directorships. Once again we find that in this particular case there is an exception with respect to private companies for the maintenance of family estates and only incidentally concerned in trading. From the wording it must be clear that the Prime Minister had in mind trading as such, that is, companies doing business by way of contracts with the government and so on. We had again here the inference of private profit, or the conflict of private interest with public duty.

In this case I pause only long enough to say that the sponsor of this bill is not suggesting that we are discussing that point at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Is it not correct that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, before he stated the exception, laid down a general rule against cabinet ministers holding directorships?

Mr. Harris: What he said was this:

> Ministers must, on assuming office, resign any directorships which they may hold, whether in public or in private companies, and whether the directorship carries remuneration or is honorary.

Then he went on with the exception. The exception is the one I have indicated, that he was not to be concerned in trading as such—a company dealing with the government by way of contract, and for profit. For a moment, if my hon. friend wishes, I shall comment on the general statement rather than the exception. The general statement was that a minister must resign certain directorships upon assuming office. My hon. friend made the point, however, in the course of his argument, that we are discussing generally the course to be adopted in Canada.

A full explanation has been made of the practice heretofore obtaining in Canada, namely that a total disclosure has been made, at least in recent years, to the prime minister of the day, as to the holding of certain offices in corporations. The prime minister, having been made aware of this, concluded that this was a matter which rested with the minister concerned. I am now referring to the occasion the Prime Minister referred to when he accepted office in 1941. That having been the practice heretofore, it might therefore appear that the proposal of the hon. member would be one that would apply in the future to any newly sworn-in ministers of the crown.

I take it that in this particular case Mr. Churchill was saying that. I do not know that he did in fact take into his ministry prior to that date anyone who at that date had been a director of a corporation. I have not made inquiries; but it would seem that on this particular date he proposed that hereafter any minister he asked to serve with him would be expected to resign his directorships. I have no way of knowing whether in fact that has been done from that date to this, but I suppose it has. I address myself to the fact that it would seem that the plain statement in the preliminary sentence was qualified by the remainder of the section I have read.

Now, with respect to shareholdings, I do not need to go into that because the hon. member does not cover it in his bill. However, I have read the whole of it so there will not be any suggestion that we confine ourselves for the moment solely to the purpose of the amendment before the house. Because I think the problem is much greater than just the immediate question of whether the Senate and House of Commons Act should be amended so that from the date the amendment was passed by the house those of us sitting here who happened to be directors would have to divest ourselves of those directorships, and that thereafter the prime minister would be put in the position that in offering a post to one who appeared to him likely to serve the public well in that post he should always make sure, before he was sworn in, that he had resigned any directorship or other office he might hold in private life.

That brings me, therefore, to the problem which confronts us in determining what should be done with regard to the bill before the house. The bill does propose, as I said the other day, that there would be certain exceptions to the rule that would be established with respect to cabinet ministers. A minister could not perform the duties of his office if he were a director of a corporation incorporated by federal statute or by letters patent issued by the crown. That would leave it, sir, that other ministers might serve and at the same time hold directorships in provincially incorporated companies.

I know the hon. member hastened to say that if I would move an amendment to the bill he would be glad to adopt the suggestion that cabinet ministers should not hold any of these offices; but I think it points up the peculiar position we have in this country, namely that we are not a unitary state and that possibly our ministers should not be subject to rules which were laid down in another jurisdiction which happens to be a unitary state. Nor should it be supposed, sir, that our position is precisely that of the United States, where they have other practices and other constitutional obligations.

For this reason it seems to me that we ought to examine the problem a little more than the mere discussion of it as the principle of this bill would allow; and that we should not as a parliament impose a bar against a future prime minister without very carefully considering what the difficulties might be, in so far as we can see them, which might be attached to the formation of a ministry at some time in the future.

It seems therefore, sir, that it would be better—and I place this before the hon. member knowing that he holds strong views on it—to say that this is not just a simple bill of six or seven lines that could be passed in this house in the course of the next two or three weeks or even a month. There are matters that ought to be considered at greater length than it is possible for us to do at the present time. We might do one of two things, sir. We might withdraw the bill for the moment on the assumption, and indeed on the assurance, that it will be given full consideration in the interval between now and the next session of parliament; or alternatively, we might consider it in this house in a committee.

I realize that what I have said might indicate that I would personally agree, after consideration, to an amendment to the statute. I hope that is not taken from what I have said, because as at present advised it seems to me unwise to have a statutory bar. Nevertheless it is not unwise, in my view, to consider rules that might be stated in much the same manner that Mr. Churchill stated rules in the United Kingdom for his guidance in the formation of a ministry. Let us however admit that if these rules were stated in the manner that Mr. Churchill laid down, they would not be binding on any subsequent prime minister, who would accept responsibility to parliament and to the country for any deviation that he might feel in honour bound to make from those rules. Perhaps that is what the hon. member has in mind.

There has been a quite steady approach to this problem, with a definite withdrawal of cabinet ministers over the years from private activity, and in time no doubt the number who will take part in other private affairs will be very small, as in fact it is at the moment. Nevertheless, even then the hon. member might feel that there ought to be a statutory provision with respect to the holding of these various offices.

I think I have made it clear—I hope I have—that I am not convinced there ought to be such a statutory bar, nor am I to be taken as saying that we ought to go back to the old days when many ministers did in fact hold directorships in companies, or that they should be allowed by practice and indulgence to devote considerable time to their private affairs. A parliamentary session today is lengthy. The preparation for it is onerous, and the discharge of administrative duties, even when parliament is not sitting, certainly takes a great deal of the minister's time. I firmly believe also that if a minister is not sitting in parliament or discharging the duties of his office or preparing for the next session of parliament, it is his obligation to defend the administration of which he is a member in public, and to see the public as often as he can so he may be aware of public sentiment on any given point and be prepared for it at the coming session of parliament. That does take a very great deal of one's time; but that is not to say that the holding of directorships in itself is wrong or improper. Indeed, no one has suggested that so far in speaking on this particular bill.

If my hon. friend does not feel that he can let this matter stand for the time being I propose to move:

> That this bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

You might ask me, Mr. Chairman, why privileges and elections? There is no particular privilege of a member of parliament involved here; but as I think hon. members know we have always—at least I personally have always—taken the view that the standing committees of the house can be most useful, and that names themselves do not mean very much. If we could refer more matters to committees than we have been doing in the past we would have better legislation and indeed better consideration of the subjects we choose to bring before this house. It seems to me that these rules—and, as I have said, the statutes of the United States congress and any rules or obligations that may be imposed in other jurisdictions—are matters which could be given serious consideration by the committee.

While I do not suppose they would feel that they could improve on some of these, representations ought to be made before the committee with respect to any variation there might be under Canadian conditions which would make these rules, if not inapplicable, at least inappropriate for our people here.

I was rather interested, sir, to find that in fact this seemed to be the only declaration made by a commonwealth prime minister since that which had been made by Mr. Asquith on another occasion before the first world war. If there has been any other declaration of principles as a whole rather than merely an explanation of a detached incident it would be desirable to have it to guide this parliament in determining its course in the circumstances. Whether the committee could in fact recommend to parliament rules which could be incorporated in the Senate and House of Commons Act is a matter of opinion.

As I said a moment ago, I am not yet convinced that there ought to be a statutory provision for this; and if I were convinced I think it would be with the conviction that we could only have a short statement, perhaps of a minimal nature, which would permit a future prime minister to have as much leeway as possible in the formation of his ministry.

Mr. Drew: I dislike interrupting the minister at this point, but since he has made certain statements that I would not wish to leave without comment I draw your attention to the time, Mr. Speaker, and suggest that it would be appropriate for the minister to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Sinclair: The minister is making the main speech in answer to the remarks of the mover of the bill; therefore he can take as much time as he wishes. The hon. member should know the rules.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the Leader of the Opposition is allowing the minister to conclude, and I presume he will proceed to do so.

Mr. Harris: If I have broken any rule of the house with respect to time limit it is the first time I have done so since I have been here. I do not propose to do that. I was interested in what the Leader of the Opposition said, and I am most anxious to have no misunderstanding with him about this. If I have made a statement which to his knowledge is incorrect, as I have indicated on more than one occasion when I have qualified what I have been saying to show that I was not certain that my remarks had covered the whole ground, I would be glad if he would correct me so that I may—

Mr. Drew: I am pointing out that the minister has spoken for over 40 minutes and that was the reason I said it would be appropriate that there should be some opportunity before this discussion terminates, which will be in seven minutes, to comment on certain of his observations that it seems to me should not be left on the record without comment.

Mr. Harris: I appreciate what the Leader of the Opposition has said. I rather thought from his prior remarks that he was intimating

I had made a statement of fact with which he did not agree. Now that he has said I have made observations on which he would like to comment, of course I would not want to delay him. I would correct immediately any error in fact that I may have made.

I take it that the hon. member is not prepared to allow further discussion to stand until another session of parliament. I have moved the amendment which is now before the house. I suggest to the hon. member and to the house that this would be the appropriate way of disposing of the whole problem of the holding of directorships and the like, and also of considering the principle of whether there ought to be a statutory bar, or whether we should not leave the matter as it has now been stated by the Prime Minister, who said that he felt that the matter rested with the minister. It could be considered also whether it would be desirable that the Prime Minister lay down certain rules and make it known publicly that they would be applicable to his ministry, though not necessarily to any other ministry.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rose to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that the time limit had elapsed for the reason that I felt some comment should be made on the observations which have been placed before you by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). I think the minister has been splitting hairs throughout the whole of the speech he has made.

There is no need to refer this matter to the standing committee. The rules are there. The minister read a statement made at Westminster in 1952 by Mr. Churchill, I assume with approval. I think hon. members will find that the statement made by Mr. Churchill on that occasion, in which he laid down eight rules, was a summing up of the practices which had been established over a long time.

I say at the outset that I would not have supported the bill before us, for the simple reason that I do not believe this is something that can be reduced to a statutory obligation. I believe this is something that must be established by the Prime Minister. There is a vast difference between the government in Canada and the government in the United States. The Minister of Finance has indicated that there is a greater degree of obligation upon a minister in the United States to divest himself of any possible conflict of interests. I submit that the very contrary is the case. In the United States we do not have a government which has by tradition established the degree of solidarity that there is in Canada, nor is that government answerable day by day to the house. The situation here is quite different. Our tradition is parallel to the tradition in the United Kingdom, as has been clearly indicated by the minister himself.

There is a long tradition in relation to this matter, and it goes back much earlier than the minister mentioned. As an example, in 1906 Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman laid down a rule for the conduct of ministers, and I should like to quote just one statement. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman said that all directorships held by ministers must be resigned except in the case of honorary directorships in connection with philanthropic undertakings and directorships in private companies. On a later occasion the prime minister of Great Britain explained that he was making that exception because there were a number of family directorships and private operations that would not possibly involve any conflict of interests.

The case to which the minister obviously was referring was known as the Marconi scandal, and in that connection Mr. Asquith laid down certain detailed propositions very similar to those laid down in 1952 by Mr. Churchill.

Mr. McCann: Was it law in either case?

Mr. Drew: What I am pointing out is that at the time the prime minister annnounced the rules they had become part of tradition. What I am saying relates to the statement I have made that I would not support the adoption of a law. The Prime Minister has said that it is a matter for the conscience of the minister, but I submit that it is a matter for the conscience of the Prime Minister.

Under our system the prime minister is called upon by the representative of the queen, or of the king as the case may be, to form a government. The ministers are not chosen by the crown; the prime minister is asked to form a government. The members of that government are answerable to him, and it is his conscience which is the determining factor. In fact the third rule stated by Mr. Churchill in 1952 and read to us by the Minister of Finance established the proposition that while it is the duty of the minister to examine the facts as he knows them, the judge is the Prime Minister. He is the one who must decide whether the course being followed is consistent with our tradition.

I would point out that in 1913, when Mr. Asquith was dealing with the situation which arose out of what was known as the Marconi scandal, be began by making the following observation:

> The first . . . and the most obvious is that ministers ought not to enter into any transaction whereby their private pecuniary interest might, even conceivably, come into conflict with their public duty . . . Again, no minister is justified under any circumstances in using official information, information that has come to him as a minister, for his own private profit or for that of his friends.

Then Mr. Asquith went on to lay down a number of propositions which bore a very marked degree of similarity to those now before us.

Mr. Harris: I think the Leader of the Opposition will agree that the rules in that particular case were with respect to speculation, not with respect to holding office in companies.

Mr. Drew: The situation arose out of speculation in connection with Marconi shares, but the statement as to the obligation of ministers covered a much wider field than that of speculation. I submit that while the eighth rule laid down by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons in Britain in 1952 referred to speculation, it was properly placed as being an important rule, but the earlier rules were also important. I should say that the earlier rules were vitally important, and the most important rule of all was that there must be no conflict of interests, that there must be no situation which would permit the possibility of the suggestion of conflict of interests.

That is something for the Prime Minister to lay down. I cannot understand the Minister of Finance saying that it would hardly be satisfactory to establish rules in this way because later prime ministers might not follow the rules that had been established. These rules have been established for some time. They must be established by the Prime Minister, because he accepts the responsibility from the crown. Instead of referring this matter to any committee I submit that the Prime Minister should tell us whether he agrees with the statement that has been read by the Minister of Finance when he quoted the words of Prime Minister Churchill in the British House of Commons in 1952.

I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Drew.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARY OF MINISTER AND EXPIRY OF ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe, Port Arthur (for Mr. St. Laurent) for the second reading of Bill No. 256, to amend the Defence Production Act.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was interrupted I had dealt with two sections of the bill and was about to deal with the objections to the Defence Production Act which were raised when the resolution preceding the bill was under discussion. I shall now proceed with the latter question.

I should like to deal first with the statement I made in March, 1951, on the nature of the special powers contained in the Defence Production Act. Reference to the continuing nature of those powers should not be taken out of its context but should be read in conjunction with statements on the situation made at that time. We were confronted with what we then believed to be an extraordinary situation, one we hoped would clear up within the three-year period set for the defence program. Our hopes have not been fulfilled. For the better part of four years we have been living in what was once considered an extraordinary situation, and there is still no indication of when we can expect it to improve to the point where our defence production program can be cut back. The statement I made in 1951 was made in good faith, in the earnest hope that we would now be living in a world in which normal peacetime conditions would prevail. Such is not the case, and it is in the light of present-day circumstances that I am compelled to recommend the continuation of the Defence Production Act in its present form.

At the resolution stage the Leader of the Opposition implied that in asking for the continuation of the Defence Production Act the government is getting away from traditional methods of parliamentary procedure and parliamentary responsibility, and that there is a denial of the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law. I must admit that I am only a layman in this field, but it seems to me that this is not the case. Under our present parliamentary procedures the house has an opportunity to review the responsibilities and functions of each department at least once a year, when the estimates are being considered. Traditionally this is the way in which legislation can be examined critically, the way in which it can be determined whether or not it meets the needs and conditions of the times.

Furthermore, in setting up a department of defence production, the minister in charge of that department is fully responsible to parliament for the way in which he discharges his responsibilities and for the department's operations. At any time he can be called upon by this house to account for his actions. Surely this is parliamentary procedure and parliamentary responsibility. As for the rule of law, there are numerous references to the right of appeal to the courts against the crown under this act. I would draw the attention of hon. members to section 37 which, while it does not permit court action against an investigator or controller in the performance of his duties, goes on to state that "nothing in this section limits or restricts the rights of any person against the crown."

To sum up the points I have been making, there is nothing in the act that denies the supremacy of parliament, nor is there anything that prevents recourse to a court of law or that contravenes the jurisdiction of the courts.

Before the resolution on the present bill was concurred in on March 14, I gave an undertaking that the government would consider the request made by the hon. members for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and Peace River (Mr. Low). This request was to include in the act a clause which would make the powers of the department subject to review within a reasonable period.

This question was referred to the Department of Justice, and officers of that department pointed out that in view of the fact that a review of legislation is a matter which parliament can undertake at any time, an express provision requiring a periodic review of this kind would have no real significance. In order to require a review by parliament and attach to it legal consequences it would be necessary, for example, to provide that the act would expire at a stated time unless reviewed and reapproved or re-enacted before the expiration of that time. This obviously was not the intent indicated by the request put forward by the hon. members.

Suggestions of the Department of Justice to achieve the results desired by the hon. members were along these lines, as in each case they required that certain sections of the act be singled out at this time and designated as clauses which should expire at a given date in the future. Again this is not satisfactory, as it is impossible to separate the powers of the act in this way. I would point out again that this act was drawn up on the basis of experience gained in handling defence production over a period of years, a period that included the unsettled era following world war II as well as the years of actual war. In my opinion these are the powers needed to carry out Canada's defence production program. Either you have a defence production act with these powers, and all these powers, or you have no act at all.

Much has been made of the so-called extraordinary powers in the Defence Production Act. Hon. members have been urged from several parts of the house to read the act carefully. I agree that this should be done, but I wonder whether some of those who have made the plea have followed their own advice and have read all the sections with equal care. There is not the slightest suggestion in the act that personal liberties or freedoms can be menaced or abridged in any way. There is in the act, and I think there should continue to be, authority to interfere with property rights in appropriate cases.

My hon. friends opposite have not seen fit to bring to the attention of the house the safeguards which are also contained in the act. Stirring denunciations have been made of sections 23 and 24, relating to directed contracts and requisitioning of supplies, but no mention has been made of section 25, which clearly provides for compensation to be paid, such compensation to be arrived at by mutual agreement or, in default of such agreement, to be fixed by the exchequer court. In other words this is definitely not confiscation nor anything approaching confiscation. It is in fact no different from the Expropriation Act which has been in force since confederation, and longer if we go back to English law. Under the Expropriation Act the land is first expropriated by the crown and compensation is worked out afterward. As I have already pointed out, this is similar to the procedure under the Defence Production Act.

A good deal has been said about section 32, dealing with offences, but no mention has been made of section 33, dealing with the defence of due diligence which may be made by any person charged with an offence. This clause gives the person who has been charged an opportunity to establish that he exercised all due diligence to comply with the terms of the act but failed because of reasons beyond his control. In addition, nothing in the act prevents any person who feels himself aggrieved from having recourse to the courts.

Now let me turn for a moment to sections 26, 27, 28 and 29, all of which have been mentioned adversely. I cannot see how it would be possible to have an act dealing with defence procurement and production without section 26, which deals with priorities. Priorities regulations are still in effect today in the United States. With respect to section 27, I do not feel that it is any indictment of this section, which deals with the appointment of a controller, to point out that it has not been used since 1951. What is important is not whether it has been used but whether it is a power which might be necessary, and what the consequences would be if it were deleted. Using this criterion, I feel that this is a necessary part of the whole purpose of the act.

With respect to section 28, dealing with relief from obligations imposed by the act, I would point out two things. First, this is a power exercised not by the minister but by the governor in council. Second, it is intended to help, not to penalize. In other words it is a necessary adjunct to the earlier powers contained in the act, and is designed to protect any business firms which might otherwise get into trouble through entering into a defence contract or complying with an order or regulation. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked if this section had been invoked during the life of this act, and the answer is no.

With regard to section 29, which deals with the appointment of an investigator and which has not been used since this act came into force, I should only like to say that this is a protection on which I believe the country is entitled to insist when the whole security of the state and the lives of its citizens may depend on matters being thoroughly, properly and expeditiously investigated. Furthermore, this section does not confer on the investigator any powers over and above those contained in the Inquiries Act, nor are the powers of entry and seizure any greater than those of the Income Tax Act. I am sure hon. members will agree that neither of these acts is as vital to the safety of the nation as is the act under consideration.

In the debate on the resolution I was asked the number of prosecutions under section 32, and the date of the last one. There have been nine different cases since the act came into force. The date of the last conviction was May 30, 1953.

I would ask hon. members to consider carefully what it is we are discussing today.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

No one likes the idea of large armed services, large expenditures for what are essentially unproductive and destructive purposes, and life in a world threatened by war waged with weapons of almost unbelievable powers of destruction. Nevertheless such are the facts of life. In addition, we do not now enjoy the leisure and time granted to earlier generations in dealing with threats to peace. When we act we have to act quickly. I do not know how the impression has been gained that all is now well, and that our difficulties are behind us. Certainly we have found no such happy interlude in defence production matters. We are faced with difficult and challenging duties which we hope to discharge conscientiously and expeditiously. These duties relate to the safety and security of each one of us, and I should not like to accept the responsibility for recommending that the means by which these tasks are carried out should now be made less efficient.

In conclusion I may say that I think I can claim to have more experience in defence purchasing than any other man now living. At least I am the only man doing defence purchasing today who did the same job throughout the last great war. I have tried to carry out defence purchasing under the munitions and supply act, then without an act, and now under the Defence Production Act. I say to this house that it is my conviction that to carry out an efficient job of defence procurement the department must be armed with an act giving the powers necessary to do the job.

I have had a great deal of experience in buying for governments. I started some 40 years ago as a consulting engineer, and I have been doing some buying for governments ever since. I can tell this house that generally speaking a government order does not receive the same attention as a privately placed order. The reason is that generally speaking the government cannot put on as much pressure as does the private buyer. That has been my experience, and that was my experience in buying for our defence procurement during the years when I had no act to support me.

I believe that when this country is supplying great sums for defence it is entitled to the assurance that those funds are being spent efficiently and carefully. For that reason I tell this house that as a minister of the crown I cannot conscientiously recommend that my department be deprived of powers which I believe are essential to that purpose. I may also say that I do not intend to make any such recommendation.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): This Bill No. 256, Mr. Speaker, to amend the Defence Production Act, stands in the name of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has today left it to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) to make the speech on second reading in its favour. I hope that before this debate has gone very far the house will have an opportunity of hearing from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Gingras: He is not afraid to talk.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. gentleman says the Prime Minister is not afraid to talk. I hope, then, that before long in the course of this debate we will have an opportunity of hearing from the Prime Minister. Perhaps he can give the house the reasons why the house should give second reading to this bill. If the hon. gentleman is giving assurance to the house that the Prime Minister will be heard on this subject, then that assurance will be welcomed.

When the resolution preceding this bill was before the house, which was about three months ago, at the conclusion of the discussion the government agreed to give consideration before moving second reading of the bill to proposals contemplating some limitation upon the life of the powers proposed to be continued by the bill. The Minister of Defence Production has made it abundantly clear in the course of his remarks tonight that the government does not intend to have anything whittled away from the powers contained in this bill. The suggestion which three months ago had sufficient merit at least to commend it to the consideration of the government finds today, at the hands of the government, not sufficient merit to warrant the subtraction of the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" from the Defence Production Act.

In spite of the brave words used by the minister in his speech today everybody knows that the cabinet has been divided on this question.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, that is an absolute falsehood. My hon. friend has no foundation whatever for that statement.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has used words that are completely unparliamentary, and I demand a withdrawal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The charge of "falsehood" is perhaps unparliamentary. I would remind the hon. member, however, that he has made his statement, to which the minister made reply; and the hon. member must take the assurance of the minister about things which are within his peculiar knowledge.

Mr. Fleming: May we have the withdrawal?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if my remark is unparliamentary. I was not referring to the hon. member but I was referring to the statement he made. I will say instead that the statement was wholly without foundation in fact.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister withdraw the unparliamentary remark he made, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no necessity to withdraw, as unparliamentary, remarks unless they were directed personally to the hon. member.

Mr. Green: It was.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I say there is nothing that needs to be withdrawn.

Mr. Fleming: Then do I understand it to be your ruling that, when a minister, referring to something a member says in the house, says it is a falsehood, that is not a reflection on the member? Do I understand that to be your ruling, because that is what we are dealing with.

Mr. Pouliot: If you will permit me, on a point of order, I would say I listened to what has been said. A statement was made by the hon. member for Eglinton—if I am not mistaken; I hope this designation is true, not false. I heard him make the statement to which the Minister of Defence Production answered, "This is false." He did not say the hon. member for Eglinton was false; he said that what the hon. member had declared was false. It may be true or false.

The hon. member for Eglinton cannot pose as one who has the gift of infallibility. He has not. He may make a mistake, if he will permit my saying so. He may make a mistake, an error in fact. Then what he says is false, but it is not said deliberately. It may be in good faith, and I presume it is. He has been led into error, like all the Tories in this country. I am sure he is sincere; and it is because he is sincere—I will not say "mad", because that might not be parliamentary—that he is offended, and offended because one does not agree with him. But those who do not agree with the Tories in Canada are numbered by the millions and millions. And in this house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I am discussing a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think perhaps I have had sufficient assistance to decide the point of order. May I draw the attention of hon. members to citation 256 in Beauchesne's third edition, which says:

> The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

It will be noted that the citation uses the expression "charging him with falsehood or deceit." The minister used the words, "that is a falsehood." He did not charge the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: He was in error.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister later said the remark had no foundation in fact, rather than using the word "falsehood". I consider the incident thereupon is at an end.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, do I understand then that you are not directing or asking the minister to withdraw the word "falsehood".

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Listen to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pouliot: If the hon. member—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He is intoxicated with his own importance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I listened carefully to the entire interjection, and in my opinion the minister made no imputation against the hon. member for Eglinton. He said that a certain remark made by the hon. member for Eglinton was a falsehood. He later said, after the hon. member for Eglinton had risen, that it was without foundation in fact. I think that is sufficient to close the incident.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, how would you term the member a "falsehood" if you did not term his remarks a falsehood?

Mr. Pouliot: May I rise on a point of order?

Mr. Macdonnell: Sit down.

Mr. Green: Sit down.

Mr. Pouliot: I was the first to rise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot, of course, deal with hypothetical points of order raised by an hon. member. The hon. member for Eglinton may proceed.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I say no more about the point that has been raised, except that I note that it is sufficient to make an alternative statement without withdrawing unparliamentary words. That is the effect of it.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, yes; that is the effect of the ruling that has been made, and careful note will be taken of it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Eglinton will please try to refrain from placing an enhanced interpretation upon the ruling I have just made. I said—and I thought clearly and distinctly—that the minister had substituted the words "without foundation" for the word to which the hon. member objected, and I think that closes the matter. If there had been any imputation against the hon. member, then of course I would deal with it in a different way.

Mr. Fleming: Well, no more can be said about it now; but—

Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: —the effect of it may be more far-reaching than some realize at this moment.

What I said, I said with some reason, in the remark I made. In this period when consideration was to have been given, according to the undertaking given by the government three months ago, what I say is that it is perfectly evident now that in the face of the demand of the Minister of Defence Production for a continuation of these sweeping powers under the act, the Prime Minister has wobbled. We will be waiting to hear from the Prime Minister in the course of this debate some justification, from his own lips, of the course he now proposes to condone; as to how a man who has been a leader of the bar, who has been president of the Canadian Bar Association, whose life in large measure has been dedicated to the law, can now be party to a course which proposes to embed permanently in the statute law of this country a denial of the rule of law. That is a task the discharge of which we await on the part of the Prime Minister in the course of this debate.

Mr. Pouliot: What is the denial of the rule of law?

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps my hon. friend could restrain himself. He may find it difficult to restrain himself when listening to me, but I am not going to have a lot of silly interruptions.

Let me make it perfectly clear on this point that we of Her Majesty's loyal opposition attach both importance and gravity to the measure now before us. The cabinet has had its opportunity to review this measure in these three months, with a view to giving effect to the very reasonable and proper suggestions that came from this part of the house at the resolution stage. Those proposals have been rejected. On the issue thus created we of Her Majesty's loyal opposition are prepared to join issue and, so far as we are concerned, a major issue it is.

Sir, it is not an uncommon complaint heard from time to time that there is not sufficient difference, in a political sense, between the two old, major parties.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Slander.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Well, sir, I am not one of those who attach very much importance to cries of that kind, because in my reading I have learned that the same thing was said 50 years ago about the same two parties. But, sir, to those who give ear to that kind of talk let me make it abundantly clear now that in this situation there is as between the government on the one hand and us of Her Majesty's loyal opposition on the other a deep issue, a clear-cut issue, an issue as to the status and the authority as well as the prestige of the parliament of Canada; and on that issue, that clear-cut, deep issue we are prepared to fight. We are not unmindful of the fact that this is an advanced stage of this session, that we have had a taste within the past two days of a temperature of 90 degrees, but here is a case that we consider to be of the highest importance, one that lays on every member of this house the highest kind of responsibility; and on this issue we now join battle.

Sir, the bill, as the minister reminded us this afternoon in seductive tones, is very brief. We are asked to measure the importance of this bill by its brevity. Well, sir, there are only two short provisions in it. I do not know that we have had any shorter bill before this house in a long time. It is quite unlikely that we shall have as short a bill as this is before us again for a long time. But let no hon. member of this house misjudge the importance and significance of this bill simply because of its unusual brevity. This bill, both in its effect and in the principle involved, is of far-reaching importance and of the utmost significance.

I can dismiss very briefly, sir, the provision in the bill that proposes an increase in the salary of the Minister of Defence Production from $10,000 to $15,000 per annum. Of course this was an oversight when the amendment to the Salaries Act was passed just over a year ago. It seems to me it should not be introduced in a bill of this kind; it ought to be handled by way of an amendment to the Salaries Act, but we are not making an issue of that. So far as that provision in the bill is concerned we shall put no opposition in its way.

But, sir, let no hon. member of this house dismiss, minimize or overlook the importance of eight words contained in this bill. These words are:

> Section 41 of the said act is repealed.

There are only a few words. Should we be spending time on so few words in this House of Commons at an advanced stage of the session, when most are impatient to conclude the business of the house as quickly as possible? Sir, the significance of these words is this. The measure we are asked to pass tonight is more far-reaching than the original bill that was passed in 1951. There is this fundamental difference in the two bills. The bill of 1951 was a bill which under the extraordinary circumstances then obtaining vested extraordinary powers in the government and in the minister, but it made it all subject to a time limit, which made it necessary for the government to come back to parliament if they wanted an extension of the life of that measure and of those powers, within the space of five years. But what are we asked to legislate for here tonight? Sir, we are asked in effect to re-enact this entire measure, and to remove from it that one saving provision.

Therefore, sir, what we have before us tonight is something much more than simply the continuation of a measure. The act of 1951 had a limitation of time. This amendment, if passed, will create an act without any limitation of time or limitation of any other sort by way of substitute. That is the true basis of comparison. That is the true measure of the effect of the legislation now before us.

Sir, I ask again, as I asked at the resolution stage, that no hon. member of this house should cast his vote on this amending bill until he has gone back and read the 22 pages of the act which, by these mere eight words, we are asked to extend and to embed on a permanent basis in the statute law of this country.

It is clear that we should turn back our thoughts to four years ago, to the conditions under which and the state of mind in which parliament considered and passed the Defence Production Act.

What were those conditions? Sir, it was nine months after the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, when the forces of aggression had swept over the 38th parallel and had overrun almost all of southern Korea; when the United Nations, taking advantage of the fortunate absence of Russia from the security council, had passed resolutions condemning that act of aggression and summoning the member nations to render aid in resisting aggression; and when Canada, along with 15 other nations, responded by sending aid in the form of army, air force and navy contributions to the forces of the United Nations. Then when, as it seemed, victory had been snatched from defeat, we found Chinese troops pouring over the Yalu river by the hundreds of thousands. It appeared that a desperate defeat was about to be inflicted upon the forces of the United Nations, and for a time a debacle was barely avoided.

These, let me remind hon. members, were the facts that stared this House of Commons in the face four years ago when in March, 1951, we were asked under those extraordinary and critical conditions to pass legislation that was itself of an extraordinary nature.

Sir, extensive description is really not necessary because the Prime Minister himself, at the resolution stage just three months ago, used these words to describe the situation with which we were confronted, along with the other nations of the free world, in April, 1951. These were his words, as we find them at page 1904 of Hansard of March 10, 1955:

> Hon. members will recall that when the Department of Defence Production was established on April 1, 1951, it was to meet an emergency situation brought to a head by the fighting in Korea.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What is the situation now? Tell us about that.

Mr. Rowe: Where is the fighting now?

Mr. Fleming: If the minister will possess his soul in patience for a while we shall have a look at the situation now and test whether the descriptions of the improvement in the situation that have come from some of his colleagues are entitled to a little more respect from the minister than he has undertaken to show in his statement tonight.

Sir, those were the conditions according to the Prime Minister's admission. This bill was passed to meet an emergency situation brought to a head by the fighting in Korea. Those were days of scarcities of materials, of a world-wide scramble for strategic materials. It was a world caught unawares by aggression, when it seemed that we were on the verge, it might well be, of a third world war. I can remember one of the colleagues of the Minister of Defence Production coming into the opposition lobby at that time and telling us in grave tones, with a long face, that it looked to him as though we were on the verge of a third world war.

That was the condition under which this statute was born. That was the frame of mind the government asked on the part of parliament in approaching this matter. That was the very time when parliament at the request of the government was legislating, if you please, in terms like these, and I read from the preamble of the Emergency Powers Act which received royal assent on March 21, 1951:

> Whereas an international emergency exists that threatens the security of Canada;
> And whereas it is essential that emergency powers be conferred to enable measures to be taken as urgently required from time to time to carry out adequate defence preparations, to regulate the economy of Canada to meet the needs of defence and to stabilize the economy and to safeguard it from disruption that may result from defence preparations in Canada or from emergency measures taken in other countries, in order that defence preparations may not be impeded;

That was the kind of legislation that parliament was passing in March, 1951, at the request of the government. Parliament was legislating in terms to give parliamentary and statutory acknowledgment to the fact that a grave international emergency existed that threatened the security of Canada.

Let us then compare those conditions with conditions in the world today. The Minister of Defence Production has asked parliament and the country in effect to say that there is no material change in conditions as between March, 1951, and today. What then is the meaning of the statements we have heard in Canada from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) about the improvement in conditions? In fairness it must be said that they have been guarded statements, as properly they should be. Nobody can say that there is no danger in the world today, but at any rate the Secretary of State for External Affairs has permitted us to believe that there has been improvement. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has invited us to believe that there has been improvement. Mr. Dulles has said that there has been improvement. Sir Anthony Eden has said, not once but on various occasions, that the situation is improving.

Are we to cast aside all these reliable assertions and accept the position which the Minister of Defence Production puts before us in saying that there is no material improvement, that to all intents and purposes the situation is as bad as it was in 1951 and therefore we should give him all the powers that were considered necessary in March, 1951, when parliament gave recognition to the existence of an international emergency which threatened the security of Canada?

Has there been no improvement since March, 1955? At the time this measure was being discussed at the resolution stage all the interested countries had not ratified the treaty for the rearmament of Germany, but we know now that this has been accomplished in the meantime, and that the time has now come which has been looked forward to for a long time, when the western nations are in the position, according to the accepted phrase, of being "able to negotiate from strength". Although four years ago we were faced with an international emergency threatening the security of Canada; although we have now, four years later, reached the position where the western nations feel that they are able to negotiate from strength, the Minister of Defence Production says there is no change in the situation which would justify parliament in subtracting from him one iota of those sweeping powers he had voted to him in 1951 at the hands of parliament.

So that this debate may be cast in its proper perspective, let me state with care the position we take. The minister correctly said this afternoon that we do not question the necessity for the continuation of the Department of Defence Production. The case for the continuation of that department was established to our satisfaction even before the resolution was introduced.

We agree that the civil servants in the employ of this department should not be on a mere temporary basis. We agree that a department of this kind should be able under present conditions to handle the problems of procurement better than a crown agency like the Canadian Commercial Corporation. So we support unreservedly the position that the department should be made permanent and that those who now have temporary status should enjoy the same status as the employees of other departments.

Second, we are quite prepared, as we said at the resolution stage of this measure, that the department should be given adequate powers to meet any foreseeable needs having regard to the situation and having regard to the fact that parliament is going to continue to meet and is not, we trust, going to be sent home indefinitely. But we say, and we say with all conviction, that the powers in this bill are excessive, and that under present conditions there can be no justification for the government asking that these sweeping, yes, untrammelled powers, be vested in the government and in the minister, since so many are vested directly in the minister.

We say that it is a curious paradox, indeed a paradox that could exist only at the hands and in the minds of this government, that when the world was faced with such an international emergency as to threaten the security of Canada the government asked parliament to confer such powers upon the government subject to a time limit, but now when the western world describes itself as being in a position to negotiate from strength, when the situation according to the description of every responsible world leader has improved substantially, the government opposite asks parliament to go further than it did in 1951 and confer these powers afresh, but this time without the effective limitation in time that was proposed and accepted in 1951.

The minister made an extraordinary statement today. He described this as "a model act of the kind". What kind? I say this can be better regarded as a model decree of a Caesar. What are the powers in this act? Do not take my description, rather let us take the government's own description of the powers in this act. First of all perhaps it would not be amiss to take the words of the minister, and I quote from page 839 of Hansard of March 2, 1951:

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Read the whole paragraph this time for a change.

Mr. Fleming: The minister described the powers in these words:

> By and large, these are the powers that are now contained in the Defence Supplies Act, which, hon. members will notice, is only being suspended during the life of the present proposed act. Other powers are of an extraordinary nature but fitted to the extraordinary circumstances of today.

Those are the words of the minister; that was his description of the powers conferred by parliament in March, 1951. They were powers of an extraordinary nature fitted to the extraordinary circumstances of March, 1951, when we seemed to be on the brink of world war III. That was the minister's description of the powers that were conferred upon him by this bill.

Mr. Macdonnell: Very good, too.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Don't be carried away by it.

Mr. Fleming: Lest it be thought that I am paying too much attention to the minister, let us look back at words which the minister used on that occasion and which the Prime Minister said three months ago, when this measure was under debate at the resolution stage, in clear terms represented the view of the government and the Prime Minister. At page 836 of Hansard of 1951 we find that the minister used these words:

> It is proposed that the act would expire on July 31, 1956. There is no particular significance to this date, other than to recognize that some of the powers sought in this bill are special powers which should not be of a continuing nature.

Let me repeat:

> . . . some of the powers sought in this bill are special powers which should not be of a continuing nature.

Those are not my words. Those are not the words of Her Majesty's opposition. Those are the words of the minister. Those are the words of the government, given complete recognition and acceptance by the Prime Minister in this house just three months ago.

What were those powers which came within the ambit of that description? Mr. Speaker, when this measure was under debate at the resolution stage you will recall the efforts I made to find out from the Prime Minister what were the powers in this bill that were so described. You will remember that when one endeavoured to pursue the Prime Minister on this subject he dodged, sidestepped, averted and avoided the question. If you will look at pages 1998 and 1999 of Hansard of March 14, 1955, you will see on the part of the Prime Minister about as complete an example or performance of sidestepping as we are likely to see inscribed in any parliamentary record. He would not answer the question. That was what it came down to. Faced with his own statement or the statement of his spokesman in 1951 that this bill contains special powers which should not be of a continuing nature, the Prime Minister was not prepared to say what those powers were. He avoided that question.

Mr. Dickey: That is only part of the statement.

Mr. Fleming: Very well. We turn now to what the minister himself says in 1955. If you will look at Hansard of March 11, 1955, at page 1967, you will find the minister saying this:

> I quite agree that all the powers set out in the act should not be continuing powers;

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Read it all.

Mr. Fleming: That is what the minister said.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is about the fifth time the hon. member has taken paragraphs out of their context. Again he reads it out of its context.

Mr. Fleming: It is the beginning of the paragraph. Must I go back and read the whole paragraph that goes before it in order to satisfy the minister?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I referred to that paragraph in my speech.

Mr. Fleming: Yes; the minister referred to it in his speech again tonight, and he tried to water down and run away from the plain words he uttered in March last. He tried to run away from the words he uttered in March, 1951, and he tries to run away from the words he uttered on March 11, 1955. Again in 1955, just three months ago, the minister is admitting that there are powers in this act that ought not to be of a continuing nature. Will he be frank enough to tell the house what are the powers in this bill that ought not to be of a continuing nature?

The whole balance of his speech tonight—which was not in balance—sought to make the house think that in this act there are no powers that ought not to be of a continuing nature. That was why I asked the Prime Minister, not once but many times, what were and what are the powers in this act that ought not to be of a continuing nature, according to the government's own definition, and the Prime Minister denied me an answer.

Then let us turn back once again, this time to the words of the Prime Minister. Let us look at the words uttered by the Prime Minister on March 5, 1951. You will find them at page 908 of Hansard. Here I quote the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra:

> Mr. Green: Then may I ask the Prime Minister whether any further powers would be required to carry out defence production if we were actually in a third world war?
> Mr. St. Laurent: I do not anticipate there would be.

Do hon. members appreciate fully what the Prime Minister was saying there? He was saying to the house in March, 1951, that the powers in respect of defence production conferred by this act were all that would be required even if we were cast into the maelstrom of a third world war. Let hon. members opposite ponder well that there are powers in this measure that the Prime Minister has said are all that would be required in respect of defence production even in the event of a third world war. Is the house going to legislate on that basis? Is the house going to go so far beyond the measures it took under those conditions and in the face of that statement by the government in 1951, and enact today a more far-reaching measure than the one it enacted in 1951?

In his speech tonight the minister sought to play down the provisions of this measure. To listen to him, Mr. Speaker, one would have thought it was such a milk and water measure that it did not give him adequate powers for the task that has been assigned to him. But let there be no mistake in the mind of any hon. member. The descriptions I have been giving to the house as to the powers contained in this bill are descriptions given by the government itself. They are descriptions given by the minister and by the Prime Minister; "extraordinary" and "special powers which should not be of a continuing nature"; "powers that should not be of a continuing nature"; "powers as great as would be required in the event of a third world war".

I submit to the house that the description of those powers that the house has heard in the passages I have quoted from statements made in this house in 1951 and in 1955 by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production were true, fair and accurate descriptions of those powers. I hope the house will not be misled by these cooing, seductive words of the Minister of Defence Production tonight into thinking that these powers are not what in fact they are. Look at some of these provisions, Mr. Speaker.

Section 15 reads as follows:

15. The minister may, on behalf of Her Majesty and subject to the provisions of this act—

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that it is the minister who may do these things; it is not the governor in council. These are powers conferred directly on the minister.

(a) buy or otherwise acquire, utilize, store, transport, sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of defence supplies;

(b) manufacture or otherwise produce, finish, assemble, process, develop, repair, maintain or service defence supplies or manage and operate facilities therefor;

(c) construct or acquire defence projects and sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of them;

(d) arrange for the performance of professional or commercial services;

(e) purchase or otherwise acquire, sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of real or personal property or any interest therein which, in the opinion of the minister, is or is likely to be necessary or desirable for any of the purposes mentioned in paragraphs (a), (b) or (c);

(f) make loans or advances to or guarantee repayment of loans or advances made to a person for the purpose of providing assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by, or to provide working capital for, that person for the manufacture, production, finishing, assembling, processing, development, storage, transportation, repairing, maintenance or servicing of defence supplies or for the construction or operation of defence projects or by way of advance payment on account of or to enable that person to carry out any contract entered into with the minister under this act or any defence contract; and

(g) do all such things as appear to the minister to be incidental to or necessary or expedient to the matters mentioned in the foregoing provisions of this section or as may be authorized by the governor in council with respect to the procurement, construction or disposal of defence supplies or defence projects.

Then, sir, section 16 goes on to provide for a fund to be known as the defence production revolving fund, to consist of $100 million, which shall be placed at the disposal of the department for these purposes. It is a revolving fund and has been used as working capital by the department. Then let us look at section 17, which reads:

17. (1) The minister may, on behalf of Her Majesty, enter into contracts for the carrying out of anything he is authorized to do under section 14 or 15 and the following provisions apply with respect to every such contract entered into by the minister on behalf of Her Majesty: . . .

Then follow a number of provisions, and I draw attention to subclause 1 (e), not because it is the only one that is important for this purpose but because I think hon. members should have their vigilance directed to it. It provides:

(e) a contract may be entered into by the minister without the approval of the governor in council if

(i) in the opinion of the minister, the contract must be entered into immediately in the interests of defence,

(ii) the estimated expenditure, loan or guarantee does not exceed $25,000, or—

You will see that these are alternative provisions.

(iii) competitive tenders have been obtained and the lowest tender involving an estimated expenditure not exceeding $50,000 is accepted . . .

Then, sir, turn if you will to section 23, which provides:

23. (1) Where a person who has been requested to enter into a defence contract on terms and conditions that the minister considers to be fair and reasonable has refused or failed to enter into the contract, if the minister is satisfied that such person owns or controls facilities that are suitable for or can be adapted to the work required to carry out such contract and that his refusal or failure was without reasonable excuse, the minister may direct that person to produce, deliver or store, or to construct, as the case may be, on such terms and conditions and within such period as the minister considers to be fair and reasonable in the circumstances, the defence supplies or the defence project or projects that would have been the subject matter of the contract if it had been entered into.

(2) A person who stores defence supplies pursuant to a direction under this section is liable for the loss thereof or for damage thereto as if he had agreed to store them for reward.

Then, sir, we have section 24 which is in these terms:

24. (1) The minister may, where he deems it necessary for any of the purposes of this act—

Note again, sir, that this is one of the provisions that confer power directly on the minister.

—by notice in writing to a person who owns or has in his possession, custody or control defence supplies, requisition the supplies on behalf of Her Majesty.

It goes on in subsection 2 to provide that where a notice is given, title to these defence supplies vests forthwith in Her Majesty. Turning forward now to section 27, it reads:

27. (1) Where the minister—

Again note it is "the minister".

—is satisfied that

(a) a person who has entered into a defence contract has failed or is likely to fail to perform the contract in a businesslike and efficient manner,

(b) a person who has entered into a defence contract has failed to keep proper and detailed accounts and records of the cost of the work performed under the contract, or

(c) a person to whom a direction has been given under section 23, or who is required pursuant to a regulation to give priority in the carrying on of his business to the production of or dealing in defence supplies, or construction of defence projects has failed without reasonable excuse to comply with the direction or regulation or the minister is satisfied that he will so fail or is likely so to fail the minister may authorize another person (in this act called a "controller") to carry on, until the minister otherwise directs, the whole or any part of the business of that person.

Then the further subsections go on to provide that the controller so appointed shall be deemed to be the agent of the owner for the purpose of carrying on that business.

Then I come to section 28:

28. (1) The governor in council may, by order, direct that a person shall not be bound by any obligation, restriction or limitation imposed on that person by or under any statute, order, rule, regulation, by-law or contract with respect to such matters as may be specified in the order affecting the entry into or performance of a defence contract by that person or the carrying out of an order made by the minister under this act.

(2) Where the failure to fulfil any contract, whether entered into before or after the first day of April, 1951, is due to the compliance on the part of any person with any provision of this act or any order or regulation, proof of that fact shall be a good defence to any action or proceeding in respect of the failure.

Sir, do hon. members realize the full import of the provisions of section 28? Is it realized by hon. members that at this time, at a time when the west is negotiating from strength, it remains possible for the cabinet to make an order directing that any person shall not be bound by any obligation, restriction or limitation imposed upon that person by or under any statute? That includes an act of the parliament of Canada. That means that even where an obligation is imposed upon a Canadian subject of Her Majesty by act of the parliament of Canada it remains possible under this legislation for the governor in council—

Mr. Rowe: To repudiate it.

Mr. Fleming: —to make an order destroying that obligation. That is what that provision means. It can nullify any obligation created by an act of the parliament of Canada or by a statute of any of the legislatures of Canada or by any contract, if it happens to be one that the governor in council chooses to think should be overriden for the purposes of this act.

Are hon. members of the house going to put themselves in the position of continuing legislation of that kind? Are they prepared to go further than before and embed permanently in the statute law of Canada provisions that the governor in council may nullify for these purposes any obligation imposed upon a Canadian subject of Her Majesty by an act of the parliament of Canada, by an act of any legislature of any province of Canada or by any contract?

Then follows section 30:

30. The governor in council may, from time to time,

(a) designate as an essential material any material or substance the control of the supply and use of which is, in his opinion, essential to ensure the availability of adequate defence supplies or for the construction or operation of defence projects; or

(b) designate as an essential service the carrying on of any commercial activity, including the generation and distribution of electrical energy, the control of which is, in his opinion, essential for the adequate production or use of essential materials for defence supplies or defence projects; to meet the requirements of the defence forces of Canada or for co-operative efforts for defence being carried on by Canada and associated governments.

Sir, do hon. members realize that under this act it lies within the power of the governor in council any time it chooses to do so to designate as an essential material, and therefore make it subject to all the provisions of this act, any material or substance the control of the supply and use of which is, in the opinion of the cabinet, essential to ensure the availability of adequate defence supplies and that, with respect to any defence project, it rests within the power of the cabinet to designate any project, any commercial activity of any kind, including the generation of electrical energy, as an essential service and so make it subject to all the provisions of this act? Do hon. members from Ontario stop to realize that under the provisions of this section it rests within the power of the cabinet to designate all the enterprises, all the undertakings, all the works of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario as an essential service and make them subject to all the overriding provisions of this act and the powers of the minister in regard thereto?

Then, sir, we find that section 31 says:

The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things and make from time to time such orders and regulations as he deems necessary to control and regulate the production, processing, distribution, acquisition, disposition or use of essential materials or the supply or use of essential services for the purposes of

(a) ensuring the availability of defence supplies or the construction or operation of defence projects for the defence requirements of Canada and for co-operative arrangements for defence being carried on by Canada and associated governments; or

(b) ensuring that abnormal requirements of essential materials and services for defence supplies or defence projects are obtained in the manner least likely to cause disruption of the trade and commerce of Canada dependent on those materials and services, which disruption might impede or prejudice the defence preparations or the economic stability of Canada.

Then, sir, it goes on:

Subject to the regulations, if any, the minister may, by order, as he deems necessary for the purposes specified in subsection (1),

(a) require any person who produces, possesses, deals in or has in his possession or control any essential materials to deal with, supply or dispose of any such materials in such manner and in such priority to that person's other transactions as the minister may prescribe;

(b) require any person who produces or processes any essential materials to produce or process any such materials in such manner and in such priority to that person's other production or processing operations as the minister may prescribe;

(c) prescribe the quantities of, the manner and circumstances in which and the conditions on which any essential materials may be produced, processed, used, acquired or disposed of, either generally or within periods of time prescribed by the minister, and for these purposes may require persons to obtain permits;

(d) require any person who supplies any essential service to supply the service to such persons, to such extent and on such conditions as the minister may prescribe;

(e) prescribe the restrictions and conditions according to which an essential service may be supplied or used, either generally or within periods of time prescribed by the minister, and for these purposes may require persons to obtain permits;

(f) fix the maximum prices, either by determining the selling price or the mark-up, at which and the terms and conditions on which any essential materials or essential services may be sold or offered for sale by any person; and require any seller to refund to any buyer any sum or consideration received in excess of a maximum selling price so fixed;

(g) prescribe the circumstances in which and the terms and conditions on which, for any purposes of this act, permits shall be obtained from the minister or from a person designated by the minister; grant general or other permits; and amend, suspend or cancel any permit;

(h) require any person to furnish such information respecting essential materials produced, processed or dealt in by him or essential services supplied by him, or respecting his production and other facilities relating thereto, in such time and manner as the minister may prescribe; and

(i) do such further things in regard to the production, supply, distribution, and use of essential materials or essential services as may be authorized by order or regulation of the governor in council.

Section 32 goes on then to attach a penalty to a breach of the provisions of this act or of orders or regulations made under authority of this act, and these penalties may go up to two years' imprisonment or fines up to $5,000. That is what that act does, and those are the powers the act confers, some of them on the cabinet but many of them directly upon the Minister of Defence Production. Is it any wonder, sir, that the Prime Minister acknowledged in 1951 that no wider powers than these would be required in respect of defence procurement or defence production in the event of a third world war? These are the powers that made, were intended to make, and which the government now asks this house to grant to make the cabinet and minister omnipotent.

The minister made the amazing statement this evening that this bill goes no farther than the provisions of the comparable legislation in the United Kingdom. I do not know what on earth he was referring to. He must have a different kind of statute book of the United Kingdom to refer to from the one which I have been reading. The legislation that was passed in the United Kingdom in 1951, on the basis of the emergency arising out of aggression in Korea, does not hold a candle to this Defence Production Act of ours. The legislation that was enacted at Westminster in 1951 was entitled the Supplies and Services (Defence Purposes) Act, 1951. This received the royal assent on May 26, 1951. It simply added to the purposes for which certain powers were conferred on the cabinet by the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945, the following:

(a) providing or securing supplies and services required for the defence of any part of His Majesty's dominions or any territory under His Majesty's protection or in which he has jurisdiction, or for the maintenance or restoration of peace and security in any part of the world, or for any measures arising out of a breach or apprehended breach of peace in any part of the world; and

(b) preventing supplies or services being disposed of in a manner prejudicial to the defence of any part of His Majesty's dominions or any such territory as aforesaid or to peace and security in any part of the world or to any such measures as aforesaid;

Then it went on to attach safeguards even to the use of those powers, which are very much more limited than the powers contained in our Defence Production Act. If you refer back to the act of 1945, the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, chapter 10, which was amended by the statute to which I have just referred, it will be seen that the powers that were conferred even at the close of world war II were not as great. I ask hon. members to bear that in mind. Here I am referring to powers that were conferred upon the cabinet in Great Britain in December, 1945, just after the conclusion of hostilities and while conditions were still very disturbed. This act conferred certain powers upon the cabinet, not upon a minister. Section 1 provides:

If it appears to His Majesty to be necessary or expedient that any defence regulation to which this section applies should have effect for the purpose of so maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services as—

(a) to secure a sufficiency of those essential to the wellbeing of the community or their equitable distribution or their availability at fair prices; or

(b) to facilitate the demobilization and resettlement of persons and to secure the orderly disposal of surplus material; or

(c) to facilitate the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace; or

(d) to assist the relief of suffering and the restoration and distribution of essential supplies and services in any part of His Majesty's dominions or in foreign countries that are in grave distress as the result of war;
he may by order in council direct that the regulation shall have effect by virtue of this act . . .

And so forth. Now, those are the provisions in the legislation of the United Kingdom. I say to hon. members that they will search in vain for legislation comparable to the Defence Production Act, at the time of its passing, as to the powers it confers on the cabinet, or powers conferred upon a minister.

I urge that hon. members, before they vote these renewed and extended powers—because they will be extended in the sense that now they will be without limit in point of time—should ask themselves this question and apply this test. Are these powers necessary? Well, surely in the light of the fact that we are negotiating from strength today it is not going to be said, particularly in view of the statements made by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that conditions are not improved over what they were in 1951. Therefore it is surely fair, in asking ourselves "Are these powers necessary today?" to ask what use was made of them, to ask what use the government and the minister found it necessary to make of them in the days of crisis, beginning in 1951.

What is the record? Well, the minister was asked some questions by myself in the house on March 11, at the resolution stage, as to the use which the government had found it necessary to make since 1951 of these sweeping and untrammelled powers conferred upon the cabinet and the minister by the sections of the act I have just quoted. Here are the statements of the minister as to section 23. He says, "There has been no resort to that section." Then as to section 24, he refers to the fact that there were priorities orders some time in 1951, 1952 and 1953, but acknowledges that two years ago the priorities system came to an end, and that accordingly no use had been made of the powers under that section for the last two years.

Then we went to section 30, and I asked the minister:

What orders are in effect under section 30?

The minister answered that there were none. Then we went on to section 31, and I asked if there were any orders outstanding under section 31 today, to which the minister replied that there were no orders outstanding at that time under section 31. Then I asked about prosecutions under section 32, and the minister said tonight that there were, altogether, nine prosecutions, and that the last conviction was entered on May 30, 1953.

So it is evident that there has been no occasion to use the powers under that section for the past two years.

Then the minister was also asked about section 27, which gives him the power to appoint a controller, and he admitted that the government did not find it necessary to use the power to appoint any controller. Then as to section 28, the minister has said tonight that the government has not invoked that section. It is evident again that the government did not find it necessary to use or invoke the extraordinary powers conveyed by that section. Similarly in regard to section 29, no use has been made of the powers to appoint a special investigator.

It is evident from this review that since those very trying days beginning in 1951 the government has not found it necessary to use more than a fragment of the powers the government now asks to be continued, and continued without any limitation whatsoever in point of time. The whole aggregate use made by the government and the minister of the powers under this act, the extent to which they found it necessary to resort to or invoke those powers, just falls infinitely short of justifying the sweeping powers under this act.

Sir, the minister himself gave away the whole case he was trying to make for an increase in those powers when he admitted this, as reported at page 1967 of Hansard:

I know of no one who does not take defence contracts, all the defence contracts they can get under this act; they are very glad to do so.

Sir, in the face of that statement how can the minister seriously ask this House of Commons to go on vesting in him sweeping powers which the government has not found any occasion to resort to or invoke in the very trying days behind us? The fact is that we are in a buyers' market today, and the minister well knows that. Industry well knows it. The minister has plainly admitted that he gets all the co-operation from industry that is required.

Now let us deal with one or two, indeed with all the arguments the minister has put forward in asking for this grant of powers. First of all, he has not told us explicitly but we know from past experience that the government always seeks to justify the granting of excessive powers to it, at the expense of parliament, by saying, "Oh, but we need stand-by powers." Sir, this government does not need stand-by powers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We did not say that, either.

Mr. Fleming: The fact of the matter is that parliament is an existing institution. Parliament can be called together very swiftly. We remember very well August, 1950, when parliament, even in the face of a crippling national railway strike, was called together in a matter of several days. Members got here somehow or other in a matter of several days after being called; in much less time, indeed, than a week.

Is it to be said that such a calamity is going to befall this country under present conditions that, with reasonable powers under a proper measure of this kind, the interests of the country would suffer while parliament was being summoned? Sir, I say to you that, in face of the facts, that argument just does not hold water any more. But if a supreme calamity should befall this country, then I say the only supreme calamity which could justify these sweeping and untrammelled powers being conferred by parliament upon the cabinet would be a third world war, and we might as well be frank enough to acknowledge that fact. Canada has all the stand-by legislation it needs for that purpose under the provisions of the War Measures Act, chapter 288 of the revised statutes, which stands on the statute books of Canada. There are continuing powers. If that supreme calamity which, pray God, may never befall us, should come about, every power that Canada needs, the supreme power, is there at the government's hand, if it chooses to invoke that act under those extreme circumstances.

Therefore I say, sir, that the argument the government has used in times past about the need for stand-by legislation just does not hold water. On the contrary, the existence of legislation of this kind places in the hands of the minister—a minister who has never been unwilling to accept grants of power at the hands of parliament—powers that could be used to create compulsion, a compulsion of fear on the part of Canadian citizens.

Will hon. members recall the words used in the house by this same minister on September 8, 1950, when, in reference to the Essential Materials (Defence) Act, he said this:

> I suggest to the committee that a word from the government is more effective if there is a law in the background that can be applied in case the response is not all that may be desired.

I suggest to you, sir, that there is a sinister meaning lurking in those words. And I say to you, sir, it is such a sinister possibility that the House of Commons ought to be supremely vigilant in not placing such powers in the hands of a minister as will permit him to hold a club over the head of any Canadian or a threat over the head of any person, particularly in face of his own statement that he has had co-operation from business, and that business wants defence contracts.

Then there is the argument sometimes used in connection with this legislation, one we have heard in years past, that this legislation could be used by a beneficent government for the purpose of distributing the benefits of defence production. This was the measure that some members thought was going to be used to bring the benefits of secondary industry to the maritime provinces, for instance, or to take some defence construction to the prairie provinces. Well, sir, that was a very hollow and empty promise, as hon. members well know. I do not think any hon. member is likely to be deluded by that argument again.

Then in fairness I wish to recall that the minister did tell us when this measure was under discussion at the resolution stage—you will find it on page 1995 of Hansard—that we were faced in Canada today with shortages. He was apparently trying to chill the blood in the veins of hon. members as they recalled the scramble for the strategic materials that were in such short supply when this measure was first passed in March of 1951. The minister used these words:

> As I have said, we have a shortage today of nickel. We have a shortage of copper. We have a shortage of aluminum, and we are threatened in Canada with a shortage of scrap iron.

Sir, what are the facts? The fact is that production of copper is running at record rates in Canada. The fact is, sir, that the same can be said of the production of nickel and of aluminum. Our exports of these metals are at record highs today. I do not suppose we have ever known anything like these figures in peacetime, and therefore in the face of the fact that Canada is exporting those metals at such a prodigious rate today, I do not think anybody is going to take very seriously the suggestion of the minister that we have a shortage of those commodities or metals in Canada today.

I appeal to hon. members, sir, and I do this respectfully and earnestly. Here I am not appealing to a minister whose mind is inflexible; I am appealing to hon. members who normally support the government, in the hope that they will individually take a serious and responsible look at what they are being invited to do. Here I am not dealing with something that is abstract or theoretical; it seems to me that in talking about the rights of parliament and the position of parliament as the champion of the rights and freedom of the people, we are talking about something that is more practical than anything else I know of.

Defence Production Act

The supreme duty of parliament, in discharging its responsibility to the people, is to be true and faithful to its traditional role of the champion of the rights and freedom of the people. I quote, sir:

> The privileges of parliament are the privileges of the people, and the rights of parliament are the rights of the people.

Sir, those are not my words. Those were the words of a greater Liberal than is to be found in the House of Commons today. These were the words of Edward Blake in his speech in London on August 28, 1873.

How this government loves to dress up what is in fact a denial of the rule of law, the subjugation of parliament to the executive branch of government, by having parliament go through the process of conferring upon them the power to legislate. And that vicious practice is dressed up. An attempt is made to clothe it with an air of respectability by calling it "delegated legislation". Sir, no euphonious title will succeed in applying a sufficient disguise to this vicious and threatening practice.

Hon. members can well see, in the light of the description of the Prime Minister of the powers under this act, that these are such powers as make it possible for the government to make itself dictator of the Canadian economy tomorrow. Under this legislation the government, and particularly the Minister of Defence Production, hold the Canadian economy in the palms of their hands. The government can override any other legal obligation howsoever created.

Sir, these powers are so sweeping that I am quite sure most Canadians just could not believe this is the way in which parliament is called upon by this government to legislate. But there are recent words by a very eminent Canadian Liberal whose political as well as professional views have been sought by this government, or have been made known to this government in more ways than one. I refer, sir, to a speech made in Toronto last Friday by Professor J. A. Corry of Queen's University, which was reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail, of June 3, 1955, and from which I draw a couple of paragraphs:

> The events of the last 30 years have reinforced the attachment of the thoughtful to the rule of law. But the substance of the rule of law will not be preserved unless very substantial numbers of the electorate put a high value on individual freedom, feel a sense of personal responsibility for its maintenance, and are habituated by constant practice to steering their own course. This opinion was expressed last night by Professor J. A. Corry of Queen's University, president of the Canadian political science association, speaking on the prospects for the rule of law . . .
> Dr. Corry outlined how the rule of law was threatened by the delegating by parliament to its executive government of wide-reaching discretionary power. Special study was made of the situation in Britain, with detailed consideration of the Crichel Down case in which a bureaucratic decision was finally reversed after a long fight.
> "No one knows how many Crichel Downs there really are over which village Hampdens failed to make any dent in the departmental armor," the speaker commented.
>
> If discretionary powers of executive government are concerned with the margins of activity in which individuals and groups engage together, and not with the core and centre of the relationships, the community can hope to benefit by discretionary regulation, Dr. Corry believed. If, on the other hand, government has pulled down too many of the guiding signs that law provides, and replaced them with a promise of policy directives which cannot be predicted as to timing and which can be changed at will, the essential self-generating initiative which is the mark of the free community will be paralyzed.
> "Where comprehensive planning and directing of economic and social life has been conceded to the government, the rule of law and its consequent individual freedoms cannot survive," the speaker stated.

Sir, these are not my words; these are not the words of any member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. These are the words of a very eminent Canadian political thinker, and a Liberal, if you please. This is what he has to say about the practice of delegated legislation, this vicious and unwholesome practice in which we are being invited by the government to indulge again.

Sir, hon. members, as I conceive it, were elected to this house to legislate, not to abdicate the legislative function to the government. They are elected to preserve freedom, not to open the doors or admit the Trojan horse of executive power into the citadel of Canadian freedom.

We of Her Majesty's loyal opposition have fought this kind of legislation, and I think we can point to some success. And, sir, we mean to go on fighting against this vicious practice. Let there be no doubt in the mind of anyone on that score.

Sir, I address myself, I will not say hopefully but at least earnestly, to hon. members opposite who normally support the government and call themselves members of the Liberal majority in this house. I quote to them words which are not mine:

> You are representatives of the people, and I put it to you, as you are greatly honoured, should you not greatly dare? You are sent to do your duty to your constituents, whether your acts always give satisfaction or not.

Sir, these are the words of Mr. Howe; not the Minister of Defence Production but the great Joseph Howe, than whom no Canadian had a greater understanding or perception of democracy, according to the British parliamentary tradition. Those were words addressed to the majority, that they should do their duty whether they give satisfaction or not; in this case whether or not they give satisfaction to the government opposite.

And again:

> Free and independent men in the legislature, as in the country, are the best counterpoise to faction and the mainspring of a nation's progress and greatness.

Those are the words of Egerton Ryerson, one of the greatest of all Canadians, uttered in 1867.

I give one more quotation. These are not the words of a Canadian, but they are worthy to be the words of any Canadian believer in democracy:

> The most dangerous enemy to truth and freedom amongst us is the compact majority.

Those are the words of Henrik Ibsen, to be found in his "An Enemy of the People". I do not wish to take anything away from the position of the majority in this house, but I do ask hon. members who constitute the majority to ask themselves as individuals, after they have read, marked and inwardly digested the provisions of this bill, whether they are justified in removing the time limitation which parliament found it necessary to write into this legislation in a day of crisis in 1951, and continuing to grant all these powers without curb and without time limit.

Freedom is not something abstract and theoretical; it is something intensely practical. Not so many years ago there was a man who said:

> It is true that liberty is precious—so precious that it must be rationed.

Some hon. members will recognize those as the words of Nikolai Lenin. In 1955 let the Canadian parliament not be a party to the rationing of that freedom which is embodied in the authority of parliament.

Hon. members have been asked to believe that it is necessary to do this, even in face of the fact that the government did not find it necessary to invoke more than a fragment of these powers in days more difficult than those we are living in now. I think of the words of William Pitt, who said:

> Necessity is the plea for every infringement of human freedom; it is the argument of tyrants; it is the creed of slaves.

If things were different the government's case might be stronger, but we as members of this house cannot close our eyes to the fact that whether it is exercising extraordinary powers or even ordinary powers this government has set its face against communicating information to parliament which the elected representatives of the people ought to have. Indeed it has reached the point now where there is a veritable complex on this subject in the mind of the cabinet and of those who have supported it through thick and thin. Under those circumstances parliament is curbed; under those circumstances the great days of parliament are gone. It rests with us to decide whether we shall reverse this trend and restore something of the greatness of parliament. I quote again:

> Parliament is the grand inquest which has the right to inquire into anything and everything.

Those were the words of a man who spent a great deal of his life holding ministerial power in Canada; those were words uttered in 1861 by Sir John A. Macdonald. In those days parliament was a grand inquest with the right to inquire into everything and anything, but it is not today, when we see secrecy imposed by the government, and hon. members of this house in the discharge of their solemn obligations to the constituents who elected them denied information they ought to have. Surely then hon. members are going to think seriously before they confer unlimited and untrammelled power upon this government without any limitation of time.

This is what I hope will be my final quotation:

> Our objects are open and avowed. We seek no concealment, for we have nothing to conceal.

Those were the words of a great Liberal; those were words uttered by Robert Baldwin in 1844. That was the predominant and guiding principle in Liberal thought in those days, that Liberal governments having nothing to conceal should not make an effort to conceal. But this Liberal government in this year 1955 finds it necessary to conceal from the elected representatives of the people in parliament.

Our duty here is to restore the greatness of parliament. It is our duty to know what is required to be known by the people and their elected representatives, and above all to see that legislation that is to bind Canadians is passed in the open for all to see according to proper and established and traditional parliamentary processes.

The minister says, "Oh, it is enough that my estimates will be up every year." How can you repeal or amend legislation on the minister's estimates? The suggestion has nothing but nonsense in it. All you can do then is just discuss things in an amiable sort of way. Yet we are asked to say that that is an effective substitute for a statutory limitation of time on these powers.

The minister talks about the rule of law, and then admits that he does not understand very much about it. It was not necessary for him to make that open admission. If parliament is to go on conferring the right of delegated legislation, then we have in fact torn the rule of law to shreds and tatters. Make no mistake about that. Some hon. members may not realize that tonight, but the day well may come when they will realize it.

We are told by the minister that the Department of Justice having reviewed the bill says that it does not find it practical to introduce a limitation on the powers, or to limit the life of the powers. Is anybody going to take that kind of statement from the minister seriously? It will be taken no more seriously than were some of the other statements by which he sought tonight to lead us along this path toward the destruction of the rule of law. Presumably this is the same Department of Justice which in 1951 approved a measure that contained a very effective time limit which is to be done away with by this bill.

Then the minister says, "We must have all the powers or no Defence Production Act at all." What a typical statement; all or none! As far as the minister is concerned, it is all or none. There is no place here for even a limitation such as parliament thought it necessary to introduce in the days of crisis in 1951. No, it is all or none; all the power or none! We know what the choice of the minister will be as between all the power or none; it will be all the power.

We have had opportunities in this house during the past decade to see what power does for people. How often I have thought of those words with which Shakespeare described Cleopatra:

> —other women cloy
> The appetites they feed, but she makes hungry
> Where most she satisfies;

The possession of power does not satisfy the appetite for power; it whets the appetite for more power. We have seen that in this government. We have seen that in this minister. The appetite has proved insatiable. Now when some powers the government has had are about to come to an end by the lapse of time the government's slogan is: what we have, we hold.

Mr. Speaker, the position of Her Majesty's loyal opposition is this, and I emphasize it again. We support the continuation on a permanent basis of the Department of Defence Production. We are prepared to give the government what powers are adequate to meet any proven existing need, or any that can be measured within the foreseeable future under present conditions, bearing in mind that parliament is never far away and can be called at any time if the government needs it. According to our view, these powers must be clearly defined and must be commensurate with a proven need. So far as we are concerned there will be no wholesale abdication on the part of parliament to satisfy a ministerial appetite for power.

May I remind the house that this legislation dates from the very time parliament passed the Emergency Powers Act. Indeed that act was passed in the same month—March, 1951. That legislation conferred upon the cabinet the most extraordinary powers, indeed everything the cabinet would derive from a proclamation under the War Measures Act except power to arrest, detain and deport the person. That legislation, however, had in it a safeguard which was thought to be wise and necessary. It was the safeguard of a short time limit, which compelled the government to come back to the house two years later and again, year after year, before it received an extension of these powers. That was a sound precedent in any case where any powers that have any reason to be described as extraordinary are voted to the cabinet by parliament.

Why should not that precedent be observed here, Mr. Speaker? You will recall that the Prime Minister on April 29, 1954, when he was asked if the government was going to ask parliament to renew those powers for another year, said this, as reported at page 4229 of Hansard:

> . . . we have come to the conclusion we will not at this session ask parliament to extend the Emergency Powers Act. We felt it was a grave decision to make because there is still a pretty explosive situation existing in the world. I hope the situation will not require the exercise of any but normal powers by the governor in council. But should it develop that there would have to be, in the interests of the safety of the nation, powers exercised that are not normally conferred upon the governor in council by existing legislation, we would have to resort to the War Measures Act. I sincerely hope that will never be necessary while I am a member of the government.

Every hon. member in this house will hope that it will never be necessary to invoke those powers. But note, Mr. Speaker, that a year ago, before the world situation had undergone the improvement that happily it has undergone in the intervening year, the Prime Minister then was saying that conditions had improved so far in 1954 over those in 1951 that that extraordinary legislation conferring these wide, sweeping powers could be allowed to lapse; and second, he recognized that stand-by legislation was available to meet any supreme need that might arise. How can hon. members then treat seriously any suggestion that it is now necessary to do away with the time limitation on the powers conferred by this measure? Words of this kind have a hollow ring today.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that the issue here is deep-seated, clear-cut and fundamental. It is the issue of the rule of law and the preservation of the authority of parliament. It is not simply a matter of the preservation of the form of parliament but the preservation of the substance of parliamentary authority and rule. We will have nothing to do with the grant of powers vastly in excess of need. We will not be parties to embedding permanently in the statute law of Canada sweeping and extraordinary powers so wide that they would not need to be widened for the purpose of defence production even in the event of a third world war, according to the Prime Minister's own definition. We will not do this to indulge the government's appetite for power.

This theory of the strong executive, so far as we are concerned, must be regarded with certain limitations. The very learned author of the book entitled "The Passing of Parliament", namely Professor G. W. Keeton, dean of the faculty of law at University College, London, England, in his chapter entitled "The Road to Moscow" points out that there are three principal attributes of the Soviet system. They are as follows:

> (1) a one-party organization in which, although there is a wide power of criticism within the party, no external opposition is tolerated; (2) an all-powerful executive, which can put into effect the program decided upon by the party, without substantial impediment or modification, especially that which might emanate from an independent parliament, and (3) an economy which is moulded within the framework of a comprehensive plan, and in which all the more significant activities are government monopolies, subservient only to executive control.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that while the government cannot be said to subscribe to the first of those attributes except in so far as it is permitting the other place to die by neglect, nevertheless the government is going overboard in the direction of the all-powerful executive and carrying with it the danger of the third attribute, namely the organization of the economy within the framework of a comprehensive plan. That may suit the philosophy of some parties in this country such as those with a socialist view; but, Mr. Speaker, it does not suit the philosophy of the Conservative party. So far as we are concerned there are higher authorities than these; there are higher principles and higher standards to guide the legislators in the Canadian democracy. Supreme over any all-powerful executive, in our view, must stand the authority of a free, sovereign and independent parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I guess there is nothing left for me but to move that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Knowles the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue this debate tomorrow. Then we shall take the committee stage on Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements, and then Bill No. 415, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 8, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO POSTMASTER GENERAL ON HIS RETURN FOLLOWING ILLNESS

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say from this side of the house how very happy all of us are to welcome the Postmaster General back to his seat in the house. I feel sure he will share my own experience of the very encouraging effect that the friendly welcome from both sides of the house really does give one who has been away for some time. I think I can do no better than to extend to him my earnest hope that his recovery is as complete as mine.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DREW—RELEASE TO PRESS OF CHANGES IN NATIONAL DEFENCE DEPARTMENT

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. An hour before the house opened the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence gave very important statements to the press which I think should have been given in the house while the house is sitting. I think the announcement of the retirement of Lieutenant General Guy Simonds is something that should have been announced here.

I think also that the announcement of the appointment of Air Marshal Miller as the new deputy minister of national defence is something that should have been made here. These are matters of concern to the members of this house. There are other appointments which I need not mention of considerable importance also dealt with in these statements.

We are sitting here doing the business of the people of Canada. These appointments affect very important aspects of the affairs of Canada. Naturally, at a time when the house is not sitting there is no choice but to make these statements to the press in the ordinary way. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is treating the members of this house with scant courtesy to announce an hour in advance of our meeting here information of this importance. As the people's representatives we are permitted to obtain our information through the press at second hand, which we should have obtained here. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a practice which should be discontinued, and that this offers another example of the disregard both of the dignity and the responsibility of parliament which should not be overlooked.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the tone of his remarks. Perhaps this is a practice that should be discontinued, but it is one that has been in existence since the beginning of this parliament some 88 years ago. These appointments have always been announced when they were made, and up to the present it has not been felt they should not be disclosed until they could first be announced to the house. But I am sure that so far as I am concerned, and so far as all of my predecessors and their colleagues are concerned, there never has been any intention of being discourteous to the members of the house. We will, of course, take very seriously these remarks by the Leader of the Opposition, and we will consider whether a change should be made in the matter of reporting to the house, before the public is informed of the usual permutations that take place in the civil service, even when it has become apparent that, either through speculation or otherwise, there has already been publicity in the press about the probability of their being made.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement issued by the Minister of National Defence relative to the retirement of Lieutenant General G. G. Simonds, with particular reference to the reason therein given, namely, his having completed the normal four-year time as chief of staff, is the retirement of General Foulkes imminent, seeing that he has held the position of chief of the general staff and chairman of the chiefs of staff committee for practically the entire period since the war?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is confusing two different positions, one of which General Foulkes did hold and the other which he now holds. When any change is made in his present position, I shall be glad to announce it. General Foulkes was for some time chief of the general staff and subsequently became chairman of the chiefs of staff committee.

Mr. Pearkes: I realize that. The first position was held for more than four years. Surely General Foulkes was appointed to his present position when Lieutenant General Simonds succeeded him four years ago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES BACK TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That items numbered 92 to 111 inclusive of the main estimates, 1955-56, approved and reported upon this day by the standing committee on external affairs, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

ANNOUNCEMENT OF WITHDRAWAL OF GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to make an announcement about the government's decision regarding the future of the Canadian international trade fair.

The trade fair was established by the government at the end of the war to promote Canadian trade. It was hoped that Canadian producers would take advantage of the opportunity to exhibit their wares to buyers from other lands. Equally important, it was hoped that the people from other lands, particularly from overseas countries which were striving to reconstruct their war-shattered economies, would use the fair to re-establish themselves in the Canadian market. This was to be a truly international trade fair, based on the principle that trade is a two-way street.

In many respects the Canadian international trade fair has been an outstanding success. I am sure those hon. members of the house who have visited the eighth fair now being held in Toronto will bear me out as to the excellence of the administrative arrangements and the attractiveness of the exhibits.

The government is also satisfied that the fair has played an extremely useful role in the re-establishment of overseas countries in the Canadian market. The fair has been used by many overseas manufacturers, not only to establish trade connections in Canada and in the United States during the post-war period, but it has become the means of inducing a good many foreign and commonwealth companies to establish plants in this country.

However, in spite of the unremitting efforts of the trade fair administration and of the Department of Trade and Commerce generally, the fair has not lived up to expectations as a medium for the direct promotion of Canadian exports. Three or four years ago, in response to an appeal from me that the fair would close unless there was a greater measure of Canadian participation, Canadians did exhibit in greater numbers. But enthusiasm soon waned, and in this year's fair Canadian participation, apart from prestige exhibits by some very large Canadian companies and provincial and municipal exhibits, is very limited indeed. The conclusion one must draw from the experience of the past eight years is that a trade fair of the kind we have been running in Toronto is not of much value to Canadian exporters.

On the other hand, while the fair has made an outstanding contribution to the re-establishment of overseas countries in the Canadian market and thus has indirectly aided Canadian exports, it does not appear to have fulfilled the hopes of those who believed that the fair could become a more or less permanent market place. Our experience has been that, to a large extent, overseas exhibitors use the fair to make initial contacts in Canada and then turn to other methods of trade promotion which are more natural to the Canadian environment, including exhibitions in other fairs such as the Canadian national exhibition, as well as industry exhibitions of one kind or another. In the post-war period it was highly desirable to have a fair just for this purpose of repairing commercial connections. On the other hand, this does not seem to offer a solid base for an annual trade fair under government auspices and with government financial support.

For these reasons the government has decided that the Canadian international trade fair has fulfilled its purpose and fulfilled it well and should now be discontinued.

This decision will, I know, cause some disappointment. I can assure the house that there is no change in the government's view as to the desirability of stimulating two-way trade with our customers. The trade fair was one of Canada's main contributions to this end during the post-war period. It has been an outstanding success. We shall now bend our efforts in other directions and I hope with the same success. For example, the Canadian government will this year be exhibiting in 15 trade fairs, and exhibitions of one kind and another in 13 different countries. In this competitive world we cannot wait for the customers to come to us; we must carry our merchandise to the buyer in his country, just as we expect that he will continue to bring his merchandise to Canada.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the minister has made a statement that, I take it, was at least in part prompted by the question I asked him on this subject several days ago. The international trade fair has been an extremely useful institution in these recent years. It has been a good advertisement for Canada. It has helped to create good will for Canada with other countries, and it has provided a meeting place not only for private citizens engaged in trade but also for officials at government levels from various countries with which Canada seeks to stimulate her trade.

I should like to express regret that the government has found it necessary to reach the decision the minister has announced today.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, based on the statement which he has just given to the house. In view of press reports of the success of the fair in relation to imports into Canada and the fact that sales opportunities have increased, can the minister state whether or not the high-priced Canadian economy has anything to do with the reason for discontinuing the trade fair?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the trade fair is being discontinued on the recommendation of my trade officers and after consulting a good many Canadian businessmen and commercial organizations.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): May I ask the minister whether the province of Ontario has contributed anything toward the fair?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask a supplementary question? If the province of Ontario were willing to contribute a substantial sum of money, would the federal government reconsider its decision not to continue the trade fair? I know definitely that a large number of industries from Europe were brought to the trade fair. They are now established and are doing very well. They are producing products that were not produced here before. There is no doubt that the trade fair has been tremendously beneficial to Canada from one end to the other. Since it has created labour opportunities, it is a shame to close it up. Ontario could well afford to contribute substantial sums of money to keep this fair open. Possibly the federal government could afford to spend a substantial sum of money in association with the provincial government because the fair has benefited all of Canada and not only the province of Ontario. I repeat, the province of Ontario could well afford to contribute to the fair to keep it running. Would the federal government reconsider its position if the province of Ontario were to offer assistance?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, although the expense of operating the fair is considerable, that is not the reason why it is being closed. Replying to my hon. friend's question, I may say that if the Ontario government is interested in continuing the fair we shall be very glad to deliver the fair to them as a going concern, with all the equipment that has been accumulated over the years and with such technical assistance as the Department of Trade and Commerce can offer.

Mr. Ferguson: That is a very generous offer. The province of Ontario could well afford to contribute toward keeping the fair going.

QUESTIONS

R. F. WELCH CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many extra gangs of the R. F. Welch Construction Company (British Columbia) Limited are at this day working on all divisions of the Canadian National Railways?
2. What is the total number of employees in all of said extra gangs?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:—

As of May 24, 1955—

1. 20.
2. 558.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

What amount was paid to residents of Nova Scotia for old age assistance in the year 1954?

Mr. Martin: For the fiscal year 1954-55 federal payments to the province of Nova Scotia on account of old age assistance amounted to $1,063,165.10, being 50 per cent of the total amount paid to recipients.

Defence Production Act

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—USE OF WORD "ROYAL"

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, since January 1, 1954, which have passed between the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any person for and on behalf of the railway and any department of government, including any letters written by any official of any department of government whether in answer to previous correspondence or not, concerning the use of the expression "royal" by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. Pinard: I table the return forthwith.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can say whether a date has been set for the federal-provincial meeting of cabinet ministers and whether at that meeting, in addition to discussing the method of unemployment relief, there will be discussion as to the timing of joint works projects in order to overcome unemployment.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In reply to the first part of the question, may I say that no date has yet been set. I am meeting with some of my colleagues and officials this afternoon to go over the information which has been received from the various provincial governments bearing upon the volume of relief that was extended by the provincial governments and the municipalities during the last few years.

With respect to the second question, I do not anticipate that there will be anything more considered at the forthcoming meeting than the matter which was reserved for discussion at that meeting, namely, some system of sharing in relief that might be necessary for unemployment as well as handicapped and other needy persons.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARY OF MINISTER AND EXPIRY OF ACT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe, Port Arthur (for Mr. St. Laurent) for the second reading of Bill No. 256, to amend the Defence Production Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will be glad, as I am, that the second opposition speaker in a debate of this kind does not have unlimited time. If I may say so, I think the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) would have done better last night had he tried to make his remarks in something less than the 101 minutes which he took, at the end of which he failed to tell us how his party is going to vote on the motion now before the house.

Mr. Fleming: I thought I made it perfectly clear to everybody that we intend to vote against the bill.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, how many more minutes does the hon. member get?

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: I do not blame hon. members opposite for their interjections, but I am sorry I did not hear the hon. member for Eglinton. Maybe he told us in the half minute he was now speaking how his party intends to vote. At any rate—

Mr. Ferguson: May I remind the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: —that no one man speaks for this party; we speak for ourselves.

Mr. Knowles: I gather from the interjection of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) that the members of the official opposition may vote both ways on the motion.

An hon. Member: Would there be anything new about that?

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, that would be the logical conclusion from the speech made last night by the hon. member for Eglinton. He spent a great deal of time —101 minutes to be exact—railing against the government and against the Minister of Defence Production in particular, and railing against the bill that is before the house. But toward the end of his speech, in one of his many attempts to conclude his remarks, he said:

Mr. Speaker, the position of Her Majesty's loyal opposition is this, and I emphasize it again. We support the continuation on a permanent basis of the Department of Defence Production.

Well, if they support the continuance of the Department of Defence Production on a permanent basis, that is exactly what this bill calls for, and I presume therefore they will vote for the second reading of the bill.

Of course, true to Eglinton form, the hon. member went on and said:

> We are prepared to give the government what powers are adequate to meet any proven existing need, or any that can be measured within the foreseeable future under present conditions, bearing in mind that parliament is never far away and can be called at any time if the government needs it. According to our view, these powers must be clearly defined—

And they are defined in the bill, as a matter of fact—

Mr. Fleming: That is not part of the quotation.

Mr. Knowles:

> —and must be commensurate with a proven need. So far as we are concerned there will be no wholesale abdication on the part of parliament to satisfy a ministerial appetite for power.

Those sentences, Mr. Speaker, are like the whole speech; they are so wordy that one cannot be quite sure what they mean. But I admit that in those latter sentences there is a possible basis for a vote against the measure, as there was in the first sentence I quoted a moment ago a possible basis for a vote for the measure. So our hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party are once again going both ways.

Mr. Ferguson: Good old socialism.

Mr. Knight: At the same time.

Mr. Knowles: There was a great indulgence in words last night. All the clichés were trotted out.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Fisheries is wrong so often that I am beginning to wonder if there is not something wrong with what I am saying, in view of his endorsation of my remarks.

An hon. Member: Well you might.

Mr. Knowles: Despite that concern, I would point out that we were told last night that we must not stand for concealment, that we must not stand for secrecy, that we must not stand for any infringement of the rights of parliament, and that we must not stand for any curtailment of the principles of freedom. Yet what we are doing is not being done behind closed doors. There is no concealment about it; there is no secrecy about it. We are right out in the open, dealing with a measure to lay down the rules and to lay down the basis under which defence purchasing will be done. So far as we in this party are concerned, we believe in responsible government; we believe in parliament laying down the rules for the executive departments of government to follow. That is what this bill does. This bill does not leave the question of defence purchasing in a vacuum. It lays down the rules by which defence purchasing will be carried on.

We think it is the responsibility of parliament to lay down these rules. If there are some clauses in the bill that hon. members do not like, it is their responsibility when we reach those clauses to move any amendments they may feel to be necessary. But to oppose the whole proposition of there being a set of rules, of there being a statute to govern defence purchasing, is, I suggest, the height of irresponsibility. If the hon. member for Eglinton meant in his 101-minute speech last night that his party was going to vote against this measure, I ask them: What is their alternative? How do they propose that defence purchasing should be handled?

Mr. Fleming: It was said very plainly last night but apparently you did not listen. It was said about three times.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I remember listening with great pain to every word that the hon. member uttered last night, and even though it was adding to the pain I looked through his speech again today in Hansard. I still say that if he is opposed to defence purchasing being carried on by a department regularly established by a statute, he has not presented any alternative. I hope some speaker in his party who will be limited to 40 minutes will be able, in that lesser amount of time, to tell us what alternative the Progressive Conservative party has unless, of course, in the end they are really going to vote for second reading after all.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the truth of the matter is that the bill will continue to repose in the elected government of the country, a government responsible to the people of Canada, the power to direct and, if necessary, to control industry in the national interest.

Mr. Trainor: Excellent socialist doctrine.

Mr. Knowles: And that is what my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party do not like.

Mr. Ferguson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: When they rave and prate about freedom what they mean is freedom for private industry.

Mr. Ferguson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: The minute they see any government, even if it is a private enterprise government, bringing in legislation that proposes some direction of private industry in the name of the people, boy, they trot out all the words, all the clichés and use all the time they can to rail against such a proposition. The hon. member for Eglinton had great pleasure last night quoting various remarks that have been made about this legislation by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) as well as by others. I was waiting for the hon. member for Eglinton to give certain quotations from the Minister of Defence Production which he seemed to overlook. I am sure he is not unaware of these remarks of the minister because they were made at an earlier stage in the debate on this measure in response to questions asked by the hon. member for Eglinton. I refer to statements made by the minister as recorded on pages 1993 and 1994 of Hansard of March 14, 1955. In answer to one question that the hon. member for Eglinton put to the Minister of Defence Production, the minister said:

> In the last war there was great pressure for textiles that were needed to clothe the troops. One particular textile mill refused to make cloth for the services on the ground that it did not like to do business with the government. It had the facilities and should have contributed its bit to the government program but it was more profitable for that mill to refrain from government work and to serve the domestic market which was also short of material.

When the hon. member for Eglinton objected that that was an example from the days of world war II and the minister should get up to date the minister said this:

> But it might occur tomorrow. For instance, we are going into the far north to build a great project under conditions of considerable stress. Suppose our steel fabricating companies say, "Sorry, we do not like that type of work; we are going to use our facilities to build something else".
> I maintain that we have a right to insist that those facilities be used for that early warning line which we believe is urgently needed, whether the steel companies prefer to do something else or not.

Then over on page 1994 the Minister of Defence Production is recorded as saying:

> I seriously suggest that I can think of firms in Canada—not in the steel fabricating business—that I would not be too sure would willingly give up their domestic business in order to do defence production business.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton, who had unlimited time and could have quoted at length, did not bother with these quotations from the Minister of Defence Production which point out the need in the national interest for legislation of the kind that the government now asks parliament to keep in force. Of course the hon. member for Eglinton was not here in 1939 so he would not be expected to quote from anything the Minister of Defence Production said on that occasion. But it is relevant to the question before us, and I think we should remind ourselves of what the then minister of munitions and supply said in reply to a question from the then member for Weyburn, now premier of Saskatchewan, the Hon. T. C. Douglas, as reported at page 179 of Hansard for September 12, 1939. This is what the minister said:

> The provision of 5 per cent was put in the last act after a good deal of consideration as a minimum return for the service rendered, but it was one which men of considerable experience believed to be unworkable. I can say to my hon. friend that from that day to this the defence purchasing board has done its very best to place contracts on that basis and has used every pressure that could be brought to bear in the form of patriotism and so on, but to date it has not succeeded in placing a single contract on that basis.

Mr. Gillis: 1939.

Mr. Knowles: These statements I have quoted, which seriously condemn the ethics of private enterprise, are not remarks that we socialists make on street corners. These are statements made on the floor of the House of Commons by the Minister of Defence Production. If he feels there are circumstances such as these with which the government must be in a position to cope in the national interest, I suggest it is the height of irresponsibility for the member for Eglinton to say that the government should be denied this kind of legislation.

I could not help but feel that a good deal of the 101-minute speech of the hon. member for Eglinton last night was by way of a personal attack on the Minister of Defence Production. I do not blame him for that. I have had occasion to attack the minister frequently during the past 13 years, and I shall probably continue to do so as long as he and I are both here. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but think that if that same Clarence Decatur Howe, instead of entering parliament, had remained in private industry and had become a great captain of industry with great powers, able to influence and direct great sectors of our country's economy, able to push men here and there and do all sorts of things as a great captain of industry, he would have been a hero in the eyes of the Tory party.

Mr. Fleming: Not a chance.

Mr. Knowles: But when he wields power in the name of democracy on the basis of responsibility to parliament and responsibility to the people, oh no, that is a different story. He is interfering with the great basic concept of freedom because he enunciates the principle that the national interest should come before the interests of private firms. That is the position of my Tory friends.

Mr. Ferguson: You will be a new senator soon. You will be in the Senate all right.

An hon. Member: That is all you think of.

Mr. Knowles: We have had a lot of nonsense from my friends to the right and we are still getting it.

Mr. Lennard: There is more truth than poetry to it.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Eglinton had a great deal to say about controls in his remarks last night. He and his friends do not like controls over industry when they are put into effect by parliament, by the government, by the people of this country through their elected representatives. But I have yet to hear a hue and cry from the hon. member for Eglinton or from any Tory in this house or out of it against the way in which private firms, private individuals, the heads of great corporations and boards of directors control and influence the economy of this country. Thousands upon thousands of Canadian workers have the question of whether or not they will be employed determined, not by the elected representatives over whom they have some control but by the individual heads of great corporations.

Mr. Trainor: They know how to do it.

Mr. Knowles: Here is the hon. member for Winnipeg South with an interjection that they know how to do it. In other words, he is saying he does not believe in democracy. He would rather have the country run by these people who, he says, know how to do it, rather than by elected representatives responsible to the people. Not only do the same captains of industry, who have no responsibility to parliament and no responsibility to the people of this country, determine the extent to which there will be employment or unemployment, a livelihood or a lack of livelihood for thousands of Canadians, but they are wielding a tremendous power with respect to the natural resources of this country.

We have no control over companies like the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway or the Hollinger interests or the Aluminum Company of Canada, the pulp and paper outfits or the timber companies. This country is rich in natural resources, mineral and timber and so on. Surely these resources really belong to the Canadian people, to those who are here now and to generations yet unborn. But whether or not the generations yet unborn will reap their heritage of these resources is determined to a large extent by private interests outside of this parliament and in many cases outside of this country so far as their ownership and direction are concerned. If my hon. friend wants to rail against controls, wants to rail against the wielding of great power over the lives of Canadians, there is a field for him to get into instead of levelling all of this at a man who, for all his faults—he has them and he knows it as well as I do—at least is a member of parliament, a member of the cabinet responsible to parliament and responsible to the people of this country.

We believe in responsible government. We believe that the affairs and the economy of this country should be run in the national interest and that it is important that parliament, on behalf of the people, should have the say in economic activities of all kinds, particularly where the national interest is involved as in the case of defence purchasing. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton did not bother in his lengthy speech to face up to the question as to the issue—

Mr. Ferguson: It was 105 minutes.

Mr. Knowles: It was 101 minutes; he started at 8.19 and quit at ten o'clock.

Mr. Ferguson: I certainly wish I had been here.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Simcoe North is luckier than he realizes.

What is the issue that is before us? The question is, how will defence purchasing be handled? Is it to be by order in council? Is it to be handled in some vacuum without any arrangements or regulations whatever, or is it to be done by a department with the rules and regulations of that department laid down by parliament? We think that—

Mr. Fleming: They will not be laid down by parliament under this bill.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend still believes he is debating the emergency powers measure.

Mr. Fleming: You have not read the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, I have read the bill. Not only did I read the bill, but the hon. member read most of it to us last night.

Mr. Fleming: I had better read it to you again.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend thinks he is still debating the Emergency Powers Act which did have in it undefined powers. He and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as well as we in this party, complained against the Emergency Powers Act. What we complained against was that its powers were undefined. We said that any powers to be given by parliament to the government should be specific, should be defined, should be spelled out, and that is what we have in this legislation that is now before us. But the hon. member for Eglinton does not seem to realize we are dealing with a different piece of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, we will deal with the matter of the extent of our defence expenditures when we come to another subject. It may be possible, in view of world conditions and the efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and others, to reduce defence purchasing one of these times. I certainly hope so. But even if we do achieve a reduction in defence purchasing to whatever extent may be possible, it will still be necessary to have a department to do the purchasing. We feel, therefore, that this department of government should be continued. We want the government to do something about health and welfare. We do not leave it to the cabinet in a vacuous state, we set up a Department of National Health and Welfare. We want the government to do something about agriculture, so we set up a Department of Agriculture and we lay down rules and regulations. The trouble with that department is the minister seems to find ways of getting around those rules and regulations. If we want something done about labour matters, we set up a Department of Labour. I submit that one could go down the list, and if we feel there is a need for defence purchasing we have to have a Department of Defence Production. So far as parliamentary control over the matter is concerned, I may tell the hon. member for Eglinton that we can deal with it on the estimates, and unless we do parliament is not on the job.

He wants a time limitation in the bill. He did not state how many years or what length of time. I suggest it is parliament's job not just to say we will turn these powers over and we will review them in two, three, five or ten years. No, it is parliament's job to maintain a constant scrutiny of a department of this kind. It is parliament's job not only to examine the expenditures of the Department of Defence Production, but to examine closely the expenditures of the Department of National Defence. A good deal of public money is spent in making purchases through the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Trainor: How much chance is there of that?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend wants to know how much chance there is of that. Instead of spending so much time opposing measures of this type, it would be better if we were to spend the time examining the estimates of this department and other departments. In fact I feel, and I make an appeal to the house leader, that at the next session of this house this whole department should be referred to the committee on estimates.

I believe it is obvious from what I have said that, although the hon. member for Eglinton spoke at great length last night without ever saying which way his party was going to vote, we believe in responsible government. We believe that this sort of thing, defence purchasing, should be done by a department responsible to parliament, with rules and regulations laid down by parliament. Therefore, although we may have some suggestions to make when we get into committee on the bill, we intend to support second reading of this measure.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): We look upon the bill that is now before us as a very grave and important measure, Mr. Speaker, and one which we view with considerable concern. I hope that the gravity with which we view the bill, and one of its provisions at least, will not be judged by the length of the speeches which we make. We cannot, of course, hope to compete with the hon. member for Eglinton who spoke last evening, and who made what I thought was a very long speech. The rules of the house, of course, forbid our carrying on that long.

Mr. Knowles: That is one good rule.

Mr. Low: Perhaps it is a good rule. I feel that the hon. member who has just interjected has spoken, if not so long at one time, very often and fairly long at each time. So I think he should have no complaint about the length of the speech given by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). If you just multiply 40 minutes by a sufficient number you can get easily an hour and 40 or 50 minutes. I just draw that to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because he made quite a point of the length of the speech by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Knowles: I did not mind its length. I just wished he would tell us where he stood.

Mr. Low: I do not think it is necessary in connection with this bill, especially after the case put up by the hon. member for Eglinton, to speak at great length. So far as the arguments are concerned, I think the hon. member did not leave much to be said. Furthermore, I find myself in substantial agreement with the position he took on the bill. It may be that the hon. member did not state specifically how he and his party would vote on the motion for second reading. I do not suppose any one of us can tell; and it is none of our business, anyway, until the vote is taken.

But on March 14, at the resolution stage of the bill, I think that all on this side of the house took a reasonable position and made a reasonable request of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). The stand we took then is exactly our position today; and I wish to put that categorically so that there will be no misunderstanding. I assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that before I sit down I will tell him where we stand on the vote to be taken shortly—at least I hope shortly.

In the first place we support the provisions of clause 1 in the bill. In my judgment it is only right that the salary of the Minister of Defence Production should be in line with those of other ministers. It appears that at the time of the revision of the Salaries Act some action was taken; and we have no objection at all—in fact we want the Minister of Defence Production, so long as there is a separate minister, to have a status in keeping with that of his colleagues in the cabinet. So that there is no quarrel in that regard.

In the second place we are in agreement with the minister when he says that the Department of Defence Production should be made a permanent part of our government set-up. We agree that the employees of his department should be able to count on something like permanent status. I can understand how unsettled they might be without a status that could be considered permanent. It is only right therefore that they be permitted to count on such permanent status. As Canada grows in population and in prestige, in what has become an unsettled world, our security will be more and more bound up in an efficient Department of Defence Production.

Let me hasten to say that I do not make that statement because I think in terms of war. I do not. Nor do I make the statement because of any belief that we have no hope of achieving peace in the world. I do say it however because the facts of the world situation tell us quite plainly that we are going to have to make almost constant defence efforts and preparations perhaps for many years to come. Even if peace does come—and I sincerely hope and pray that it will, and very soon—we will not even then be able completely to relax in our defence efforts. Nor can we hope to depend upon other countries to do our defence producing for us. And so we support the minister in his request that the department be made, looked upon and considered in every respect as a permanent part of our government set-up. We do express the hope, of course, that the time will come, and come speedily, when that department will not need to be as busy as it has been and as it is now. And I would expect that if such time should come soon, good sense would prevail, the powers that are in the Defence Production Act would not be invoked, and that no one would expect to make them permanent so that they could be invoked.

The third important point is this: We believe that the minister and his department should be clothed with powers sufficient to enable them to furnish Canada with all the materials needed to secure us as best we can be secured. We realize that the powers as set out in the act of 1951 are very broad and very sweeping, and to anyone unaccustomed to considering the transfer of such powers to government they appear a bit frightening. I do not think that at any time during the emergency of war this parliament and its members have looked upon the transfer of such powers as are outlined in this bill with anything but grave misgiving—even in a time of war and stress.

How, then, should we look upon them now, in a period, not of war, but surely one of great danger, but not one considered to be of great emergency? I think we can all be excused for looking upon such transfer with some misgivings, and not with the apparent joy with which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seems to view the transfer. Once those powers are transferred on a permanent basis, as a parliament we could exercise no effective check over them.

I draw my hon. friend's attention to the growing number of items in the estimates that come before us from time to time bearing the notation "S", with a circle around it. When we are in committee of supply and reach one of those items, what do we do? We leap right over it, for the simple reason that these are statutory provisions, clothing the minister of the department with powers this parliament has no right to question. And that is something to which I believe careful attention should be given.

Any time anyone says that all we need to do is exercise vigilance, I would say to him that all the vigilance in the world will not exercise a check on those powers permanently transferred by statute, because by statute they are given, and only by statute can they be returned. And if a majority sits in the House of Commons and refuses to bring in a statute for their return, or to support such a move, then how in the name of common sense can any vigilance be exercised or any review be made of such power which in any way could be considered effective?

I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to consider that, when he says so glibly that he is not afraid. Let me point out that it is easy, in any country that seeks this, to build up at some time or other what the hon. member for Eglinton last evening described so well as a compulsion of fear. And I say to the house that there are certain parts of our country where there is compulsion of fear, and where that compulsion of fear can be exercised in unrighteous ways and in ways that are good for the government but certainly not good for the people.

All one has to do is to travel through the province of Saskatchewan today to find out about compulsion of fear. All he has to do is hear some of the businessmen in that province talk about the fear under which they have to carry on, and how unsettled they are.

Mr. Campbell: Baloney.

Mr. Low: The hon. member says "baloney"; I expected some such interruption as that. But I have travelled through there, and—

Mr. Campbell: Tell me one merchant who said that.

Mr. Low: I have travelled through that province; I have talked to many people. They have given me that statement, that they do live under compulsion. Why is that? It is because the government has unusual power. Consider some of the acts they have put on the statute books of the province—and I am thinking particularly of the crown corporations act.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I might interrupt to say that the debate should not deviate into a discussion of provincial affairs. If that were permitted we might have a lengthy argument.

Mr. Low: I ask your forgiveness, sir. I was led away by the statement that was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and I merely wanted to use evidence to cement the thing that I had said. I will respect your wishes, sir, and will not deal with that any further.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question just to get him back to his own line of thought?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Does he know how many items there are in the Department of Defence Production that are marked statutory?

Mr. Low: No.

Mr. Knowles: Only one, the minister's salary.

Mr. Low: I could not say. I did not say the Department of Defence Production. What I did say was a growing number in the estimates, and it is a growing number, and year after year you will find more and more of those statutory provisions. Those statutory provisions represent a straight give-away by parliament of powers which we cannot exercise. It is just a question of vigilance.

Mr. Fleming: There are only seven items for the whole department.

Mr. Low: One out of seven is a very fair percentage. However, it is difficult for any of us to say with any degree of assurance that we are right; that the powers as set out in the act of 1951 are excessive to the needs of the government today. I would not like to say so at all. I know, as I said, they are broad and they are sweeping and they are such as to make it possible to create that compulsion of fear in the country. But at the same time I say it may be that the situation in which we live is such as to demand those. I would not like to say to my hon. friend the minister that I believe they are excessive at all. I do not believe they are excessive at all in times of emergency or of great danger. In times of war or in times of strong threat of war, I believe the Department of Defence Production requires vast powers. We have recognized that in times past and we have given vast powers for the reason that we expect them to act quickly and effectively, and they must have them if they are to work fast and effectively. In time of danger parliament has granted more powers, even more powers than may be used; for in my judgment there is always uncertainty about what the department and the government might have to deal with.

War is not what it used to be by any means. In these days no one is inclined to abide by the Marquis of Queensbury rules with respect to war. As the minister said last night, we do not have the leisure or the time these days to get ready for war. It simply strikes like lightning, fast, and in most unexpected ways and places. Therefore we are not inclined to beef too much about the powers in the bill of 1951, although one contrasts, and cannot help contrasting, the powers in the Canadian bill with those in the British bill.

I draw your attention to the contrast which was made last night by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). When one looks at those and makes a comparison he finds that the powers in the Canadian act do appear to be excessive. Would the minister or anyone else say that the United Kingdom government has been any less efficient in preparing for defence than we have been? I should like to have a statement on that. It appears to me that the United Kingdom has been most efficient and has done a good job, and one does not hear any complaints about it. When you go back to the days of the Labour government in Britain you find that they did not resort to the kind of transference of powers to any department that we have here, and that we are asked to make on a permanent basis.

The minister admitted last night that there are powers in the Defence Production Act which he has never used. Probably he will never have to use them. I sincerely hope not. I hope he will get that kind of co-operation in the Dominion of Canada that will make it unnecessary for him to use those powers. When it is essential in the interests of our security to invoke those powers, then we think they should be made available to him to use. We are not kicking about that. Our position in this respect was well put by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) on March 14, when we were discussing the resolution. I just wish to quote briefly what he said as recorded at page 2003 of Hansard:

> What conceivable chance has the opposition of obtaining a review of this act once it is passed and goes into the records? What assurance have we that 10 years from today there will be in charge a man who will be as sane, as wise and as responsible as the present Minister of Trade and Commerce? I do not hesitate for a minute to say that I think what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has done, with the tremendous powers he has had during the last few years, has been admirable. I do not see how a man could have done any better. But let me say this. We do not often find a man like the Minister of Trade and Commerce; we do not find more than one in about every million. We therefore must take precautions to see that the country shall be reasonably safe no matter what kind of minister gets into that position.

I say amen to that. We cannot always count on having the same kind of person in the department as we have now. Therefore we must be careful. That is as far as the agreement with the minister goes. But when he asks today that the powers in the defence production bill of 1951 be made permanent or continuing powers, then we have to part company with him.

Both the minister and the Prime Minister have said, in different ways it is true and at different times, that there are powers in the bill that should not be continuing powers. Why then does the Prime Minister, who introduced this measure, ask that section 41 of the act be repealed? Section 41 is that section of the act which terminates the unusual powers in the midsummer of 1956. Neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Defence Production has advanced one single good reason why the unusual powers should be continuing or permanent powers; not one. I listened with great interest to what the minister said last night, and I read over again what he said and marked it in Hansard so that I would not make any mistake. He did not give one single good reason to show why he needed to have those powers made continuing or permanent powers. He did convince me with his logic that the department should be made permanent, and we agree with that. But, as I say, he did not give one single good reason to help us to believe that these unusual powers in the act should be made permanent and continuing powers. I searched carefully through what the minister said yesterday and I could not find a single thing that would make me believe that I should vote for the repeal of section 41 of the act, except of course that the department should be made a permanent one and that the employees should be given permanent status.

I have already said that we are prepared to support the two things that the minister has asked for, namely, permanent status for the department and permanent status for his employees. But we are unalterably opposed to any action of this parliament to give permanent status to the powers that should only be given to a minister or a department in times of emergency and great danger, and for those times. We made that quite clear on March 14, too.

While we were considering the resolution we thought, from what the Prime Minister said at that time, we had some reason to believe the government would bring in some amendment to the bill before it was taken up again, which would make it necessary for the government to bring this act before parliament periodically for complete review. After three months we are now told by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) that he wants the bill as it is or not at all, which means that he has closed his mind to the reasonable request we made on March 14.

We have not heard anything from the Prime Minister, and I am wondering why, as did the hon. member for Eglinton. I think the Prime Minister should make a statement on this bill and tell us why in the three months that he has had to consider the matter he did not bring in some provision to successfully replace section 41 and make it mandatory upon the government to bring the act in for periodical review by parliament so we could have a check on it.

We have heard nothing from the Prime Minister and I suppose we must assume from that that our request for inserting such a provision in the bill as I have suggested, a terminal provision or a provision requiring that it be submitted periodically to parliament for review, is not to be met and that he has closed his mind on that matter as well.

I speak for my group in this house when I say that we have approached this whole matter with a view to finding out what is right. We believe that it is right that parliament should never delegate powers to any individual, group of individuals or department without surrounding the granting of those powers with adequate checks and balances as insurance against the misuse of the powers. I think that that is the principle of the rule of law and the supremacy of parliament. We believe that this parliament is the repository of all the sovereign authority of the people of Canada and therefore we have no right to dispose permanently of any of those powers. Even if we hand over powers only on a temporary basis we are obligated not to do so without a provision for terminating the grant or the requirement that parliament be given an opportunity to review and to make full scrutiny of the way in which the powers have been used.

That is what we want now. I think our request is reasonable and fair. What is the right thing for us to do on this motion for second reading? I think the right thing for us to do would be to support those things which the minister requires and which are right, but also to serve warning that when the bill is in committee we will move for the deletion of clause 2, which repeals section 41 of the act, and offer an amendment to make it mandatory upon the government to bring the act back to this house for complete periodic review and scrutiny. We are unalterably opposed, may I repeat, to the granting to the minister and his department of unusual powers on a permanent basis, and against that we will continue to fight.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I listened with keen interest last night to the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and today I listened with interest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I find myself somewhat in agreement with the last speaker with reference to certain things in this bill which has been moved for second reading on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

I am surprised that the Prime Minister has not been in the house during this debate. I realize his responsibilities are great, but I can think of no greater responsibility after having moved this motion than to be here to safeguard the rights of parliament which, in the years that have passed, have been championed so often by those who sit to your right.

I observed that the hon. member for Eglinton spoke at some length and with some enthusiasm about this issue as it concerns parliament itself, as it concerns the rights of members, and as it concerns the rights of the Canadian people. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that the hon. member for Eglinton had spent 101 minutes. I have been in this house for a long time and in the last 30 years in this parliament I have never known anyone who has talked so much and so long and said so little as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. During the last session he spoke over 700 times. One week I observed that during the five days he spoke 30 times. I sometimes think that as he belongs to a party that will never have the responsibility of government he feels that he can talk as long as he wants and say as much as he wants, as often as he wants.

I cannot quite understand the admiration he has for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He was almost offering bouquets to the government today. I have heard the hon. member in the past speak quite differently, when he was more critical of the government than he was today. This seems to suit the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quite well. He says that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been in business he could have shoved men around. How he could have shoved men around! Now he wants to lay down legislation so that someone in the minister's place can shove all men and all industry in Canada around. They are not satisfied to be just a little dictator in connection with one industry; they would like to nationalize all the industries of Canada.

I have great regard for the Prime Minister, who has moved this motion, and I have keen regard for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I realize that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has had long experience in engineering. Since I have been in this house I have become convinced that there are two professions, that of Your Honour, the law, and that of engineering, which are best fitted for parliamentary service. A lot of engineering must be done in political tactics and careful observation must be given to see that the rule of law is maintained.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has rendered good service to this country. In fact he almost became a hero in the wartime boom. His ability is undoubted and indeed his integrity is unchallenged. He has been a most fortunate and happy victim of favourable circumstances so far as prosperity is concerned.

There is another thing I want to say about this bill. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is said to be usurping powers, but he cannot usurp powers because he has the power to do as he likes under this act. In all fairness I want it understood that I am not speaking personally, but this is laying a pattern which is dangerous for the welfare of this country. That is why I submit that in connection with an issue as important as this the Prime Minister should be here during this debate.

We of Her Majesty's loyal opposition want to hear from the Prime Minister on this issue. We want to know where he stands. Last night the Minister of Trade and Commerce was quite indignant and spoke with some heat about the rumour that there was a difference of opinion in the cabinet in connection with this matter. I notice that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and the Prime Minister are conspicuous by their absence today, and there are not very many ministers in the house either.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Quite a few members of your party are absent.

Mr. McIlraith: What about the members of the loyal opposition who are absent today?

Mr. Rowe: It was not so well timed. Perhaps this was timed so that it would come at the same time as the Ontario provincial election when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce expected that many hon. members would be away. That is how they expected to slip this through without too much attention. After all, our members wish to exercise their franchise, even in provincial affairs. In fact those who sit to your right said a short time ago they were all going to be down there campaigning, but when they saw how things were going they came back to their original tents very rapidly.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to be disturbed at all by the cackles and growls from the back benches on this issue, because this is an important issue. This is one which concerns the life of this house. This is one which concerns the supremacy of parliament. This measure is unnecessary today. No doubt the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre enjoys it. You could not put his type of policy into practice without it. You have to have all these powers in order to nationalize industry and socialize industry across Canada. It is a socialistic move, as far as the government is concerned. The government has never been embarrassed. But, Mr. Speaker, no government of this country has ever been embarrassed by the policies of the Conservative party in times of emergency. All through the years our record has been clear in that regard. We have never stood between the government and necessary authority in time of trouble. Our record is clear, back over the years. In the years of the 1914-1918 war this party suffered because of its stand in that regard. We would not be worthy of our place here if we did not follow that attitude. The Liberal party has at times refused to take the action it should have taken, as when it refused to provide for airfields in 1938. But today where is the emergency? Is the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance now studying it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Why are we spending $300 million or $400 million to build early warning lines across Canada?

Mr. Rowe: If there were a greater emergency than there was when you said this should not be continued, why are you reducing your over-all expenditures this year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We are not.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, by some $20 million or $30 million. Why is the expenditure less?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What percentage of the total estimate is $20 million or $30 million?

Mr. Rowe: I know, "What's a million?" In this case it is, "What is $20 million anyway?" Under this act you can deal with $100 million without coming back to us. Yes, what is $20 million in the kind of expenditures that this government carries on? They have increased their expenditures all through the years on civil account and for a time reduced them on defence; yet they come to the house now and tell us now that there is such an emergency in connection with defence that we have to have powers that five years ago we would not touch at all. The Prime Minister himself, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce also, said as far back as 1951 that some of the powers sought in this bill are special powers and should not be of a continuing nature.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Now read the rest of it. That is half a sentence.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Trade and Commerce himself said that it should not be of a continuing nature at that time.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I believed that it should be continued as long as the emergency continued.

Mr. Rowe: Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce not intimate by that that we will be in an emergency as long as we live?

Mr. Fleming: As long as he is minister.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, may I point out to my hon. friend that in 1947 I liquidated an act with powers equal to this, because I did not think it was needed any more. It would have remained liquidated except for another emergency. When this emergency is through we may wish to liquidate this act. I do not propose to be told now by any hon. member just when I will liquidate it.

Mr. Rowe: I realize that, but somebody may liquidate you some day, at election time. I do not know whether it is a falsehood, but we hear rumours that the minister is going to retire, and in fact we even hear rumours that the Prime Minister is going to retire. What is going to happen then? Is this a deal that has been made? Has the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made a deal with the government so that there will be a coalition between the socialists and the Liberal party in this country? I wondered why he was so happy today. Somebody is going into the Senate. He may be going into the cabinet.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): When my hon. friend takes over, he can repeal it.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a great champion of free enterprise and he knows, as well as he knows I am looking at him, that he does not need this parmanent bill. No emergency needs a permanent bill.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If you think that, you do not know what is going on in the world.

Mr. Rowe: He has said that when the fact that it is not needed has appeared he can liquidate it as and when he wishes, not when parliament wishes. Mr. Speaker, I have listened for a quarter of a century or so to speeches in this parliament—

An hon. Member: And learned nothing.

Mr. Rowe: You have not learned much in the few years you have been here. I have listened to my hon. friend for many years talking about the supremacy of parliament and saying, "Trust the people", and I have heard him say that when a government fails to trust the people the people fail to trust the government.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The people do trust us.

Mr. Fleming: Forty-eight per cent.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): When they trust you, you can do something about this legislation.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Rowe: It is like the answers we get from the other side of the house. They say, "Look at the support we get in the country; that is why we can liquidate acts when we please; that is why we can hold parliament in contempt; that is why we do not need to listen to the opposition". A trend has been developing in this country so rapidly since this government has been more or less power-drunk, in the last several years, that one would think no one had any right in this house to criticize the government in any way. If we use that term "for emergency", why does not the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce take us into his confidence? If they are not satisfied to let the public in the gallery know, they can call a private session, a war session, and let us know what this emergency is. They have the War Measures Act, if required, and they have all the powers they need without half the powers of this act. If they need it at all, then they should tell us why, and not say, "We are a free enterprise party, but we want to make this permanent. We are not at war, but we want a plan for an emergency that has passed, so that we will have a pattern for socialism for the future for our friends to the left."

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am glad to know the emergency has passed.

Mr. Rowe: I am speaking in terms of an emergency that needs the powers under this bill. I am speaking of the use of the term "emergency". This party has not criticized the government for the amount of money it has spent even though we have criticized the way it has been spent in some respects; we have not criticized the war budget. We do not intend to criticize the war budget. We have told the people that we need taxation, that people must pay taxes in order to defend this country. There is no monopoly on sincerity in that regard. But there is no monopoly on the rights of parliament. There is no monopoly on those who would destroy the powers of this house. I say in all sincerity that this, in the guise of a war emergency, is a blueprint of a perfect pattern for a socialistic regime. True, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has more confidence in his party and his free enterprise policies than to believe that he or the Prime Minister would use it as a socialistic plan. But why do they want to make it permanent? Why have it after they are gone?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We have confidence in our judgment.

Mr. Rowe: We have heard that said before by certain people in Europe who ran everything in a one-man show. I cannot understand why a party that has the powers that this party has must have a form of an act that is a pattern for a totalitarian state. All they need to do is to have the socialists elected and get into this house, and then they would be able to put that into effect.

The pattern is made to order. I think that is why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre appreciates it so much. I have never seen him laud an act of the government as vigorously as he has lauded the bill before us today. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production have both said that these are unprecedented powers, powers that should not be continued. But now they are continuing them with, I say again, less of an emergency staring us in the face than there was when they said they did not need to be continued.

Why do they need to be continued in this manner? Is there any minister or any member within the sound of my voice who will say for a moment that if we pass this legislation now for a period of a year we will not do so again next year if the emergency remains? Why this permanency, why this long-term socialistic pattern even for an immediate emergency, if the Minister of Defence Production is right?

The minister attempts to frighten us today by suggesting that there is an emergency. I do not know what the emergency is, Mr. Speaker, but I think I have a right to know something about it. A lot goes on in this department and in several other departments that I do not know anything about because questions often go unanswered or are sidetracked and debates are juggled and fumbled so that we only get a few days on one debate and then it is postponed in order that the government may get through the session as easily as possible, and with the least embarrassment.

Let the government take the house into its confidence. If we are facing an emergency, if we need this measure let us know it. If conditions are that bad then let them clear the galleries, clear the press gallery, call a secret session of parliament and tell us why they cannot face the emergency unless they have this authority. We can count on the Canadian people to support us, exactly as they did all during the war. Every industrialist, every workman in the country played the game just as the soldiers did.

But I do not believe the Minister of Defence Production has decided that he will nationalize the whole economy of Canada. Why then does he seek this power? Why have the power to do it? No wonder the socialists to my left are lapping it up. They would be delighted, in the same way as the socialists in the United Kingdom who almost ruined the country and who recently suffered a terrible defeat. If they need powers of this kind then let the minister tell us in private session, if necessary, or in committee that the situation is so serious that he needs the power to take over real or personal property at whatever price he decides, that he needs the power to make contracts and then turn around and break them if he wishes to do so. He has that power under the act. Let him tell us that the situation is so serious he needs power to examine the books of a corporation and then refuse to believe the books; that he needs power to name an agent to run a business when he does not think it is being run properly, even if only part of that business has to do with war production; that he needs power to force a company to enter into a contract and to take over the company if it refuses to sign a contract. If they sign a contract and make a deal he can refuse to pay them what he said he was going to pay because he thinks they have made too much money. If he likes the colour of their eyes he can pay them more than he agreed to pay them.

All these things can be done under this bill. If the minister's agent at Ottawa thinks the bookkeeper of a corporation has had more expenses than he considers reasonable, the agent can set the figure to suit the minister. These things sound ridiculous, but the bill is ridiculous. These are the powers vested here. Are these the reasons the cabinet benches are so empty today? Are some members of the cabinet not satisfied? Some conspicuous members of the cabinet are not here now, and they did not look happy when they were here. There are many members in the party to your right, Mr. Speaker, who must squirm when they read that if a person refuses to make a contract with the government the minister can make him enter into a contract or surrender his business. They must squirm when they see that if the person makes such a contract and loses money he must regard the position as being the same as if he had tendered on the job.

I do not believe for a minute that the Minister of Defence Production, as long as he is in office, would use this legislation to injure Canada. I do not believe he would use the act to nationalize industry. I know his inclinations in that regard quite well. I do not believe he would use the act to tell a candidate he could not run for the Conservative party.

Mr. Cardiff: I believe he would.

An hon. Member: I think he would.

Mr. Rowe: I do not believe he would say to a person, "I do not think you can fulfil this contract if you are going to be a Conservative candidate." I do not believe he would use the act for political purposes. I do not believe he would tell them not to contribute to the Conservative party and I know he would not tell them to contribute to the Liberal party. But under this legislation he has power to do almost anything he likes. In fact I should like to know what he could not do under the act. He cannot take a man and throw him into jail without a trial, as he could under the War Measures Act. He cannot tell the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that he has to quit parliament and go and dig ditches.

But, Mr. Speaker, if I am the head of a corporation which is engaged to some extent in defence production, and if I make a contract with a labour union—let the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre tell his labour friends about this—under the act the minister has the power to break the contract made with that labour union, whether it means 10 cents an hour more, 20 cents an hour more or guaranteed annual wages. That is a pretty far-reaching power. It can be done at the whim of the minister. It can be done by the action of his agents. As I watch the actions of the government and look at this legislation I am more than ever convinced that what Lord Acton said is still true, that all power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

When power is being sought that is not needed can you blame us, Mr. Speaker, for being critical? I do not like to be critical of the government. I realize the responsibilities they carry. I realize the Minister of Defence Production has carried a great load of responsibility. We have long since recognized his sound ability in many respects, as have most Canadians. In fact before he was in parliament he was employed by the party to which I have the honour to still belong, and he performed great service for us. If we had known he was going to enter politics we might have persuaded him to join us.

An hon. Member: Then the bill would be O.K.

Mr. Rowe: But, Mr. Speaker, that is beside the issue. Let no one think I am attacking the Minister of Defence Production or the Prime Minister, but it is our duty as members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition to see that the supremacy of parliament is maintained, and we are not going to be sidetracked by the anxious and hungry desires of the socialists to our left or the whims of a minister who seems to think all power is safe as long as it is in his own hands.

[Mr. Rowe.]

This is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. This bill says that if the officers or directors of a corporation are not doing a service as the agent of the minister thinks they should, and if by their conduct they are going to fail to complete a contract as they should, then they can be dismissed. The innocence of their failure must be proven by them. The old axiom has been changed, and no longer under this act are you innocent until proven guilty. If the government does not like you, you are guilty until proven innocent.

As I said at the outset, I am not a lawyer. Neither is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But I am amazed that the Prime Minister of Canada, who has been the head of the law society of Canada and is such an eminent member of the bar, would ever allow an act like this to be made permanent. In time of war no one in this house and few in the country would not be satisfied to pay their debts like the boys and girls have paid who lost their lives; that is not an issue. Surely we can trust the people. But why introduce an act with all these powers merely because a minister says, "You should trust me; I liquidated one act before and I can liquidate this." Should we sit idly by and wait and wonder whether or not the act will be liquidated, or the minister liquidated by an election? Elections are uncertain.

Does anyone think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—of course I know it is but a dream, and there is little chance of the hon. member sitting where the Minister of Trade and Commerce now sits—would ever let go of these powers? He would laugh and hang onto them like a bulldog to a bone. They would be the blueprint for his socialism. He could say to anyone sitting in the opposition that his party did not introduce this act. It was brought in by that great free enterpriser the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This act was brought in by that great Prime Minister who had been head of the bar association and was an eminent lawyer. This act was brought in by the party that received the greatest majority in the history of Canada. This act was brought in by the party that talked free trade one day and attacked it another. This act was brought in by the party that talked about the supremacy of parliament from one side of their mouth and destroyed it from the other. This is the party that talked about the individual rights of parliamentarians, and then ignored them one after another. The Minister of Trade and Commerce today has demonstrated his qualities more than ever by the fact that he says he alone should liquidate it; that he should be trusted to liquidate it.

Mr. Philpott: He did not say that.

Mr. McIlraith: Quote him accurately.

Mr. Lennard: Take the plugs out of your ears and listen.

Mr. Rowe: Perhaps I did add a word, but the meaning is still the same. In this instance the Minister of Trade and Commerce did say he liquidated one before and he thought he should be trusted to liquidate this one as he saw fit.

Mr. Philpott: My hon. friend told the house the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that only he could liquidate it, and of course he said no such thing.

Mr. Rowe: No, Mr. Speaker, I stand corrected. He did not say only he could liquidate it, but he said he would be the only one who would liquidate it. He said he should be trusted to liquidate it. I realize that someone else could liquidate it, but the chief liquidator is the man who has the power. I realize there is a clear-cut distinction. In fact the hon. member, being a member of the press for so long, is closer to being a lawyer than I am, but the spirit of the answer is the same and indicates the same socialistic trend.

Mr. Sinclair: You are just confused.

Mr. Rowe: If I were confused I would not seek any help from the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), who has just interrupted.

Mr. Sinclair: I am glad of that, too.

Mr. Rowe: I know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will not likely tell his labour friends just what these powers mean. I say quite seriously that the minister or his agents have power under this act to annul or repudiate any contract between a company and a labour union, when even part of the work of that company is for defence purposes. This same power could be used to repudiate any contract made with a government, any contract made with a municipality, or any contract made with a province. In fact the minister has power under this act to repudiate even a statute of this parliament.

Where are those old champions of the supremacy of parliament? Where are those who have worshipped at the shrine of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mackenzie King? Let them go back and read the speeches of 1921 and 1925, as well as others. Why, Mr. Speaker, those men would almost turn over in their graves if they saw their successors now so hungry to take these powers and make them permanent. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce will do nothing else, will he not rise in his place today and say that these powers are only needed for defence purposes, and that if we think the act is that strong they will only ask for them for three years or five years? I believe that is longer than the Minister of Trade and Commerce intends to be here. According to rumours it is longer than the Prime Minister expects to be here. It will be longer than that before the Minister of Fisheries can ever hope to be prime minister.

Mr. Sinclair: You will be gone.

Mr. Rowe: I was here before you were.

Mr. Sinclair: You can console yourself.

Mr. Rowe: I hope I am not here then. I do not wish any of you ill luck, but I do expect to be around for a long time. I know some of the younger people, the youngest of them all, will have lived a long time before the Minister of Fisheries ever assumes the role upon which he casts his eye sometimes.

Mr. Sinclair: You have been here 30 years and learned nothing.

Mr. Rowe: You have done pretty well. I do not intend to say much more, but I am amazed and shocked, and I say in all sincerity that never in my experience in this house, which now covers 30 years, have I ever witnessed a spectacle like this. I have never witnessed the spectacle of a government seeking powers such as are being sought in this act and trying to make them permanent.

Another thing no less conspicuous is the fact that the Prime Minister himself, the sponsor of the bill, has not been here to listen to a single word of the argument for or against it. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has not been here either. I can tell by the weary and worried face of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that if it were not for the sake of decency he would probably rather not be here.

So, Mr. Speaker, last night when the hon. member for Eglinton was charged with uttering a falsehood I believe the hon. member deserved the sympathy of the house. All one had to do was look at the faces of those opposite to realize that there must have been many of them who were worried. I have watched the faces of cabinet ministers for a long time and I cannot help but think there must have been rumblings in the mulberry bushes over this bill.

I would urge the Prime Minister to come back into the house and tell us what he thinks of this bill. Tell us why he has moved it. Tell us why he has to have powers he is never going to use. Tell us why all these spectacular powers are going to be conferred.

Is there an hon. member within sound of my voice, any hon. member among this great mob of government supporters, who cannot see the real intent? Are they content to sit idly by and listen to the gibes of the Minister of Fisheries and the rumblings of some other backbenchers, such as the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and others who, so long as they pound their desks or interrupt Conservatives while they are speaking, believe that they are paying homage to the all-powerful Liberal government? Some of them act like socialists and are admired by socialists, whether they are socialists or not.

I hope there is no collusion between those who sit to my left and the government; because while hon. members sitting to my left have no chance alone, they perhaps feel that if they clothe this government with power through this bill, then they will be making some sort of negative contribution to the economy of this dominion.

This government has taken many powers it did not need. It has done so, not only for the general purpose of having power, but—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We thought the hon. member had finished his speech.

Mr. Rowe: Well, I believe my time has almost expired. I realize, of course, that what I say will not matter very much. If this bill is going to pass it will not matter whether one talks for 40 minutes or 20 minutes. It would matter very little, in fact, whether individual members spoke at all. The government seems to think that it matters very little what kind of deal they make with the provinces and the municipalities. It will matter very little except as to the personnel, the man who is going to administer the act. I have complimented the present minister much more than he has complimented me, and I believe more than the Minister of Fisheries. He is a lawyer, too, and—

Mr. Sinclair: No, thank God.

Mr. Rowe: I was going to say that if he is, then he must be a very poor one. But I say in all sincerity that if this act is made permanent we will have it that way forever in Canada. Sound, sensible and honest people, people who believe in the free enterprise system, have made this country what it is, despite what is said by hon. members sitting to my left. Here is a pattern made to order, a blueprint ready to be followed by the wildest socialists we have ever seen, if they wish to use it.

I urge the Prime Minister, who is not present this afternoon, and I urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce to do some quiet and private thinking in the quiet hours tonight. Let them go home and conclude that perhaps they can do with three years. Perhaps it would be safe to have five years. Perhaps it would be safe to make it ten; or will they just leave it so that no matter who comes into power they can do as they like, and instead of having parliament supreme it will become negative and almost useless because they do not like parliament anyway.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I have not been 30 years in the house so perhaps I may be excused if sometimes I am somewhat puzzled. I have been under the impression that we are discussing a bill to amend the Defence Production Act, a bill of two clauses. But as I listened to the two wings of the Conservative party yesterday and today I find that they are concerned with the actual provisions of the Defence Production Act itself.

I would like to know if either of these groups is going to have the courage to implement the complaint they made last night and again today, by bringing in a measure to amend the powers set out in the Defence Production Act. Are they going to have the courage to call for a reduction in defence expenditures? They have changed their line. Now they are no longer the voice of doom, predicting communist aggression almost every other Thursday; now they have decided that there is no urgency. Are they going to bring in a motion to reduce defence expenditures?

I listened last night, as long as I was physically capable of doing so, to the hon. member for Eglinton, and I did not discover a single argument, except his argument against the powers that are in the act and have been in it ever since it was passed. It may or it may not be that the government requires these powers. But I suggest that it is frivolous irresponsibility on the part of members to stand up in this house, on the pretext of an amending bill of this sort, to object to the powers in the act, if they have not the courage to offer amendments to that act themselves. It is frivolous irresponsibility, and I challenge the spokesmen for the Conservative and Social Credit parties to bring in an amendment which would curtail these powers which they consider so extremely dangerous.

We have been told for the last two years, time and again, from both wings of the Conservative party, that we have to watch out, that communist aggression is lurking just around the corner. If that is so, then presumably Canada requires defence. And if Canada requires defence, then we have to purchase materials for that defence. I do not mind being called a socialist; I am a socialist. In fact I do not care if you call me a communist. But I will say this, that the welfare of Canada and of the Canadian people must take precedence over any private interest.

Let me point out to members of the Conservative and Social Credit parties that, as has been pointed out before, it was private industry that went on strike in 1939. I would tell the honourable and loquacious member for Dufferin-Simcoe that it was not labour that went out on strike; it was capital that went on strike in 1939, and that was prepared to let Canada go down the drain if they could not have the terms they wanted from the government and people of this country.

I suggest that these hon. members who have been objecting should name specifically the powers they would take away from the Minister of Defence Production. Let us have it spelled out so we can understand easily. What is it he is no longer to be allowed to do? If they are not prepared to come forward with that information, then let them tell us just what is the sinister aspect of making this department permanent.

I heard it suggested here last night at appalling length, and again this afternoon, that it is not possible to do anything with the Department of Defence Production once this amending bill is passed. That seems to me a confession of failure on the part of members of the House of Commons, because every year the operations of that department are under review by parliament. Every year every act of parliament is under review, potentially. Any member in the house who feels that there is an act vesting the government with powers they should not have is free to bring in an amendment.

Do we hear them doing it? No; we hear them getting up on the basis of a small amending bill and making an attack on the Department of Defence Production, and they have not the courage to make the attack openly. They have not the courage to state specifically that certain powers must be taken away.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if we have an emergency as we are told we have—and I have not the slightest doubt that some time, even in the remaining few days of this session, members of the Conservative and Social Credit parties will be warning us about the dangers of communist aggression—then we must face the realities of this modern world. We must realize that we have to prepare for that emergency ahead of time. It is no use to say that we will give the minister these powers when the first hydrogen bomb drops. If there is any way of stopping that bomb from dropping he has to have power to act now.

I do not know how he has exercised his power in the past. I have been told that he has exercised it well. He may have done it well or otherwise; but somebody has to exercise this power in the paramount interests of the Canadian people so as to override the selfish interests for whom the parties to my right and left are such eloquent spokesmen.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the various speeches that have been made I must admit that there is very little left to say. However, one way of emphasizing certain points is by repetition, and I want to emphasize very clearly the stand enunciated by our leader, the hon. member for Peace River, a few moments ago.

Before doing that, may I say I was rather intrigued by the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. But I must say I was not surprised at his socialistic views favouring national control. We expect this, and expected him to commit his group to support a measure that is centralizing control of industry in the national government. I trust the government appreciates the fact that it is sponsoring control over private industry, which meets with such enthusiastic support from our socialist friends.

Another statement the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre emphasized was "we believe in responsible government". Who does not? We in this group are as jealous of our belief in this principle as any group in this house. But at the same time we also realize it is possible to have too much government. We believe the people of Canada are entitled to enjoy a wide degree of individual freedom and individual rights, and we shall oppose any action by any government, national, provincial or municipal, which takes away these rights in times of peace, in times of non-emergency.

The only criticism I have to offer of the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton is that he left very little for the rest of us to say. Another statement that rather tickled my fancy last night was one made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in describing this bill. He said, "It is a very simple bill". Well, it is simple; it is one of the shortest, if that is what he means by simplicity, that have come before the house this session. There is an old saying that many good things are done up in small parcels. It is equally true that many highly explosive articles can also be done up in small parcels.

The sad part of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that it is another one of those package deals that we have been getting so often this session. Clause 1 deals with raising the salary of the Minister of Defence Production. I do not think there is any quarrel with that. So far as we in this group are concerned, we believe there should be a permanent Department of Defence Production. We are firm in our belief that whoever heads the department should be paid the salary that is being paid to other ministers of the government.

While saying that and agreeing that the Department of Defence Production should continue, we should also like to pay tribute to the right hon. member who has occupied the position of Minister of Defence Production for the past few years. He has been paid a good many compliments during the last few hours, but a few more might be in order.

I believe the people of Canada, from one end to the other, are well aware of his personal contribution to the business of government and to the wonderful developments that took place from 1939 to 1945 which made it possible to win the war in which we were engaged. When the minister steps out of office, as he is bound to do sooner or later, to take that well-earned rest to which he is entitled, I often wonder where the government of the day will find two men to fill the position which this one man is filling at the present time.

While we are in favour of a permanent Department of Defence Production, we cannot agree with the arbitrary powers over industry in time of peace that are given by this act. We admit that in time of emergency, or in time of war, rigid controls are necessary, and I am sure we would have no objection to invoking the War Measures Act, or any legislation necessary to make this act effective. These measures could be invoked by parliament on very short notice.

We maintain that Canadian industry should not be under the heel of any dictatorship; and I am afraid, despite other words to the contrary, that is what is being set up in this house at the present time. I was going to read some of the sections to which we take such strong objection, but the hon. member for Eglinton read them last night. They are sections 23, 24 and 27. To my way of thinking they are most objectionable, but I recall that last night the Minister of Trade and Commerce interjected and said, "Did you read section 25?" Well, I read section 25, Mr. Speaker. It says the party concerned shall be compensated. Well, surely to goodness no one believed that any department of government would confiscate goods and plants, if necessary, without compensation.

[Mr. McLeod.]

These are dictatorial powers, and the least I can say about them, using language that is not too strong, is that they certainly are not democratic powers. In wartime and in peacetime industry has done a good job under free enterprise. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group, I would say let us keep it free until an emergency calls for some drastic regulations.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention this afternoon of dealing with the challenge thrown out by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). I merely say that sometimes I am reminded of the statement made by the C.C.F. party in this house on the outbreak of the last war, when they urged upon members of parliament and on the nation that Canada should send all the materials she could overseas but under no conditions should send one man. They were so far out of line with reality on that occasion that when they get out of line again, as they have done this afternoon, I suppose none of us should be surprised. Their stand on some of these issues shows much more clearly than I can in a few words just why they are unlikely to be entrusted by the people of Canada with the direction of the affairs of this nation.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it might be of some value this afternoon for me to outline the course of the debate on the resolution which preceded the bill. That debate commenced on March 10. It was opened by the Prime Minister. It has already been pointed out by several hon. members that this measure has been sponsored throughout by the Prime Minister. As I said, he opened the discussion on March 10, though yesterday he failed to open the debate on the motion for second reading of the bill. As yet he has not taken any part in the debate at this stage.

Speaking on March 10 the Prime Minister admitted that the Department of Defence Production had been set up to meet an emergency which had been brought to a head by the fighting in Korea. He admitted also that at that time, which was three months ago, the peak of Canada's defence program was past. As a reason for this present measure he stressed the production of aircraft and electronic equipment, but admitted that there were certain powers under the Defence Production Act which were not being used. I quote from page 1905 of Hansard of March 10, where the Prime Minister had this to say:

> There are other powers which are not being used at this time but which were placed there because they were considered to be essential in dealing with any emergency which might arise and which might interfere with the regular production and procurement of what was necessary to build up our forces and to discharge our commitments to our associates in this joint undertaking.

After the Prime Minister had spoken, members of the opposition pointed out various facts in connection with the Defence Production Act. For example, we referred to the statement made by the Minister of Defence Production on March 2, 1951, a little over four years ago. On that occasion as well the Prime Minister was the sponsor of the bill, but the first speech on the motion for second reading was made by the Minister of Defence Production, and I quote from page 836 of Hansard of March 2, 1951, as follows:

It is proposed that the act would expire on July 31, 1956. There is no particular significance to this date, other than to recognize that some of the powers sought in this bill are special powers which should not be of a continuing nature. Bearing in mind the present situation, and the program which has been announced by my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), a period of five years seems a reasonable minimum for the duration of the act. In the bill, provision is also made for the repeal of the Essential Materials (Defence) Act and for the suspension of the Defence Supplies Act during the period of operation of the Defence Production Act.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That was a three-year program.

Mr. Green: At that time the minister pointed out clearly that some of the powers in the Defence Production Act should not be of a continuing nature. In the same debate I questioned the Prime Minister about the extent of the powers contained in the act. The interchange is to be found at page 908 of Hansard of March 5, 1951, as follows:

Mr. Green: Then may I ask the Prime Minister whether any further powers would be required to carry out defence production if we were actually in a third world war?

That was a clear question, whether there were any powers not in the act which would be required in the event of another war. The Prime Minister answered as follows:

I do not anticipate there would be. I think the enabling sections here are expressed in language which probably would be broad enough to apply; but of course with respect to that, as with respect to all our other moves in this connection, we would expect to declare any change in policy to parliament, and we would have to be asking parliament to appropriate moneys, so there would be ample opportunity for parliament to concur or refuse to concur in the carrying out of any further policy that was declared.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister has said that this bill as presented contains all the powers that would be required in the event of a third world war.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not want to promise the house that if we ran up against something where the courts said this was not good enough we would not come back to parliament; if we thought it should be done, we would ask parliament to authorize it; but I think the law officers have drawn this in language that should be sufficient to cover all the enabling powers apt to be required.

We pointed this out to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production when the present measure was under debate in March of this year. We also pointed out that in the report of the department for 1951 there is an admission that the powers possessed by that department are war powers. I would refer to page 14, where the following statement is made:

Although the powers now in effect are virtually the same as those which existed during the last war, it has been understood that these powers would be used to the minimum extent necessary.

I have not heard the Minister of Defence Production state during the course of this debate that the powers in the Defence Production Act are not all the powers that would be required in a third world war. I think we may take that as an admission that such is the case. When the previous debate took place, in March of this year, the Minister of Defence Production confirmed the statement that he had made in 1951 to the effect that some of these powers should not be continuing powers. I would refer to page 1967 of Hansard of March 11 of the present session, where the minister is reported as follows:

I quite agree that all the powers set out in the act should not be continuing powers;—

This was not back in 1951; this was three months ago.

—but I do maintain that if they were necessary in 1951, they are just as necessary today.

Of course our whole argument hinges on the question of whether these powers, which it is admitted should not be continuing powers, should be placed in a statute along with all the other statutes of Canada and thereby given permanent status. The minister went on:

My hon. friend reads out these paragraphs as though they were fantastic.

Mr. Green: They are.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, I can tell him that every one of those powers has been exercised during the period I have been in charge of defence production in this country, and exercised not once but many times. The reason they were put in the act is that experience during the second world war indicated that that type of power is necessary to mobilize the industry of this country for war.

Mr. Green: May I ask a question? Has the minister used these powers within the last year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No; they have not been needed.

Then three days later, on March 14, the minister made another most significant statement, and I refer to page 2001 of Hansard of that date, where he is reported as follows:

If we get back to a reasonably normal time and the powers are not required, I think the government of the day will certainly come forward and revise the act voluntarily—

Of course that was wishful thinking. In my experience I have never known this government to do anything of that kind; they have always had to be prodded.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No one prodded us to repeal the munitions and supply act.

Mr. Green: They had to be prodded into that, too.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No one prodded us.

Mr. Green: The minister went on:

—but neither the hon. member nor I can see too far into the future—

These are the significant words.

—and I do not think we should attempt now to decide whether or not the powers of this act will be required over a long period in the defence of Canada.

Yet what the minister is trying to do is make these powers permanent, in spite of that statement made by himself on March 14 of this year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend is trying to discuss this logically. I am trying to make the status of the Department of Defence Production permanent. I do not know how I can make the status of the Department of Defence Production permanent unless I can make the act which creates the department permanent. If my hon. friend can tell me that, I would be very glad if he would elucidate.

Mr. Green: Nobody is questioning the wisdom of making the Department of Defence Production permanent, just as all the other departments of government are permanent. We have had bills here in recent years setting up the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Nobody objects to the Department of Defence Production being made a permanent department, but what we do object to is giving this department these terrifically wide powers on a permanent basis. We have argued that if they require extensive powers of this kind, then let us give them those powers for a period of years, say for another period of two years, and then at the end of two years we can again take a look at the act and see whether they still require the powers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, if we extend the act for two years, we are extending the life of the department for two years.

Mr. Green: No. I cannot see why it is so hard for the minister to understand.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You cannot contribute much to this debate if you cannot see this point.

Mr. Green: The minister never admits that I contribute anything to any debate. If that is his view he is welcome to it. There is no reason why the department cannot be set up as a permanent department and yet not be given these powers on a permanent basis. Look at the Defence Production Act. Read section 41, which shows what can be done:

This act, except subsection 6 of section 4, shall expire on 31st July, 1956.

In other words, in this very act subsection 6 of section 4 is made permanent, while the rest is made for a period of five years. If that can be done, why cannot the reverse be done; divide the Defence Production Act into say two parts, one part setting up the department and the other part giving them powers. Why not make the first part permanent and provide that the second part shall continue in existence for a period of three years? That has been done time and again in legislation since I have been in the house, and I cannot see any reason why it cannot be done with this particular act.

Mr. Lennard: There is a contribution right there.

Mr. Green: My friend the hon. member for Eglinton points out that the first 14 sections of the Defence Production Act provide for the setting up of the department, and most of the sections from there on deal with the powers. I am afraid that this talk by the minister that you cannot make part of an act permanent and the other part for a period of years is merely a smokescreen, merely an alibi, so he can get all these powers put into permanent form. It was admitted during the debate in March that most of the powers about which there has been complaint have not been needed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Have not been used.

Mr. Green: We shall not quarrel over the word. I think he said "not been needed" himself on several occasions. First of all, reference to section 23 is made on page 1993 of Hansard. The minister was questioned by the hon. member for Eglinton about section 23, as follows:

Let us take section 23, for example. It is the section which empowers the minister to oblige someone to enter into a contract with him to furnish defence supplies or to construct defence projects. What use has been made of that section by the minister? Have there been any cases where the minister has resorted to the powers conferred upon him by that section in order to procure defence supplies or to procure the construction of a defence project.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, since this act was passed there has been no resort to that section; however it is a section which I think should be in the act.

Then section 27 is dealt with at page 1996 of Hansard:

Mr. Fleming: The minister has not answered my question, so I shall put it again. Have any conditions arisen or has any situation arisen where the minister has found it necessary to exercise the powers conferred by section 27 and appoint a controller?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, we have not appointed a controller since 1951, but we have had situations where if the owners or others responsible had not been willing to resolve them we would have appointed a controller.

Mr. Fleming: Was it necessary in any such case for the minister to threaten to appoint a controller?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We never threaten.

That answer, of course, brings smiles from all sides of the house.

Mr. Fleming: You never threaten?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Never threaten.

Then section 29 is dealt with at page 2000 of Hansard:

Mr. Fleming: The next question is in relation to section 29, under which the minister may where he deems it expedient cause an inquiry to be made, and may appoint an investigator. Has it been necessary at any time for the minister to act under section 29?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Inquiries are carried on by a section of the audit division of the treasury which is attached to the department. These inquiries have been carried on quite frequently. As I recall, I do not think we have appointed a special investigator.

Then section 30 is dealt with at page 1994:

Mr. Fleming: May I now ask the minister a question with respect to section 30 which is the section under which the governor in council may designate materials as essential materials and certain services as essential services. What orders are outstanding under that section now? What orders are in effect under section 30?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): None at the moment.

Section 31 is dealt with at page 1995:

Mr. Fleming: I take it that the same answer would apply to section 31 which is the section that gives the minister power to do certain acts and things and to make orders and regulations with respect to control and regulation of production, processing, distribution, acquisition, disposition or use of essential materials or the supply or use of essential services for the purposes that are set out in the subsections. I take it that there are no orders outstanding under section 31 today.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not at the moment.

These facts all came out during the discussion of this measure in March. Eventually the official opposition made a proposal to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production for changes to be made in this act so that all the parties in the house could unite behind it. They will be found in Hansard commencing at page 2002:

Surely some legislation could be brought in which would provide that the defence production department will continue as a permanent department but the question of what powers it should have shall be reviewed within a certain length of time. If some provision of that kind were made I think it would pretty well meet the objections which have been brought forward in this debate.

Here was the answer given me by the minister:

Mr. Chairman, I remind my hon. friend that he fought the Defence Supplies Act much more violently than he has fought this act; he kept at it for days. I do not know why anyone would get any comfort from going back to the Defence Supplies Act, but if the house wishes to adopt this resolution before the bill is brought in, the government will consider the request of my hon. friend. I do not know whether or not the government will accept the hon. member's suggestion, but at least it will be given consideration.

Then the Prime Minister was asked this question by the hon. member for Peace River:

Surely it would be a simple matter for the Prime Minister to say "We shall give consideration to such a provision in the act and will bring something in". That is all we are asking. What about it, Mr. Chairman? May I ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to give consideration to such a provision?

Here was the Prime Minister's answer:

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has already stated that the government would give consideration to the views which have been expressed here in that regard.

There we had a suggested compromise after there had been a somewhat extended debate on the measure. Obviously the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production did not take the same strong stand against any change that is now being taken by the minister. In fact they had shown out of their own mouths reasons why the powers of the department, as distinguished from the department itself, should not be made permanent. That was three months ago. We had hoped that in the meantime the government would decide there was no reason to place these drastic powers on the statute books in permanent form.

But the Minister of Defence Production went to Australia; and whether he was chased by a kangaroo or what happened to him over there I do not know, but in any event he has come back now and he alone, without the Prime Minister beside him, is taking the stand that he must have all these powers or no act at all.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has read excerpts from my remarks. Why does he not read excerpts from my remarks of yesterday bearing on that very point?

Mr. Green: I am just going to do so.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Good.

Mr. Green: They are found at page 4511 of Hansard of yesterday. The minister said then:

Either you have a defence production act with these powers, and all these powers, or you have no act at all.

That was the stand he took in the house last night. Certainly neither he nor the Prime Minister wanted these powers so badly in March. The minister also said yesterday, as found at page 4501 of Hansard, "We believe it is a model act". Let the Prime Minister come into the house and tell us he believes it is a model act, that he believes the department must have these powers and all these powers without any change. It is very significant that the Prime Minister has been absent today.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is very significant that the Leader of the Opposition has been absent, too, and a lot of other hon. members opposite.

Mr. Fleming: He will be back in a moment.

Mr. Green: Never mind about the Leader of the Opposition. You will hear something from him about this matter before the debate is over.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Good.

Mr. Green: Let the Prime Minister of the country tell us why he wants the department to be given these dictatorial powers.

An hon. Member: Read on.

Mr. Green: Last night the minister dragged in arguments to support the new, tough stand he is taking on the measure. First of all he tried to explain the statement he had made in 1951 to the effect that some of the powers should not be continuing powers. He apparently forgot he had said the same thing in March of 1955.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): All right, you have read it. Don't read it again.

Mr. Green: I have what the minister said last night right here. He said, as found at page 4510 of Hansard:

> I should like to deal first with the statement I made in March, 1951, on the nature of the special powers contained in the Defence Production Act.

Then he went on to say that conditions at that time were different but, as I pointed out, he made exactly the same statement in March of 1955. Then he referred to the position of the defence program, and went on to indicate that the defence program was in such condition that he simply had to have all these powers. In answer to that I read the following from page 11 of the report of the Department of Defence Production for the year 1954:

> At the end of 1954 almost four years of procurement and construction for Canada's expanded defence program had been completed. The initial build-up of the country's defence potential was largely completed during the past year and, in line with the long term needs of the armed forces, the emphasis was shifted to the scheduling of production to meet a continuing high level of defence procurement.

The report goes on to indicate all the steps that have been taken and all the progress that has been made. Then at page 13 we have this sentence:

> Defence industries had no difficulty during the year in obtaining their necessary requirements of essential materials and skilled manpower and no domestic controls were required.

The report of the minister's own officials shows that the argument about needing these powers for the defence program was a phony argument. Then the minister said last night that the house could review this legislation on his estimates. That of course was the most fantastic excuse of all, to say that on the estimates the house could review these powers written into a permanent statute. How long would it be before we would be ruled out of order by the chairman if we tried to raise an argument of that kind on the discussion of estimates? What power has anyone in the opposition to bring in and put through a bill amending a measure such as the Defence Production Act? Consider how ridiculous the argument that we can review this legislation on the estimates would be as applied to any other act on the statute books of Canada, and particularly an act of this nature.

Then the minister got all confused and at page 4511 he said, with reference to the question of the wording of an amendment:

> This question was referred to the Department of Justice, and officers of that department pointed out that in view of the fact that a review of legislation is a matter which parliament can undertake at any time, an express provision requiring a periodic review of this kind would have no real significance. In order to require a review by parliament and attach to it legal consequences it would be necessary, for example, to provide that the act would expire at a stated time unless reviewed and reapproved or re-enacted before the expiration of that time. This obviously was not the intent indicated by the request put forward by the hon. members.

He was referring to the request made by the hon. member for Peace River and myself. All we had requested was that there be a time limit placed on the powers which were being granted to the department; and the minister, in making an excuse of that kind, was merely trying to confuse the issue. Then the minister said it was impossible to separate the powers, that they could not draft an amendment to separate the powers. That is done in the house at every session. In fact the minister's own bills, the essential materials (defence) act, the munitions and supply act and the Defence Supplies Act all have different provisions, and there has never been the slightest difficulty about varying the provisions from bill to bill.

The minister made one other excuse. He said the powers taken in this act were no greater than those in the Expropriation Act. How he reached that conclusion is quite beyond my ability to understand. The Expropriation Act provides a procedure for filing a plan in a land registry office, expropriating the land, and then compensation, but there is nothing in that act such as is contained in this act giving the power to appoint controllers, to seize a man's business, conduct investigations into his business, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Why not read what I did say?

Mr. Green: On page 4511 of Hansard for June 7, 1955, I find this:

> It is in fact no different from the Expropriation Act which has been in force since confederation, and longer if we go back to English law. Under the Expropriation Act the land is first expropriated by the crown and compensation is worked out afterward. As I have already pointed out, this is similar to the procedure under the Defence Production Act.

The sections of the Defence Production Act go farther than the Expropriation Act and the minister had no business trying—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend is reading a portion that refers to a particular section that I mentioned before I made those remarks, and he then refers it to the whole act. If he feels that is fair debate, then carry on.

Mr. Green: Even if the minister meant to restrict that to a comparison of sections 23, 24 and 25 of the Defence Production Act, I suggest to him that those sections go infinitely farther than the Expropriation Act.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, this is a bill tailored to suit this one minister. I point out that under section 5 all the powers given to the minister can be exercised by an appointee. It reads:

> The minister may authorize any person, on his behalf and under his control and direction, to do any act or thing or to exercise any power that the minister may do or exercise under this act.

The minister says that his appointees and his department must have these wartime powers. That is the way he does business, Mr. Speaker, and that is the way he has been doing business for a good many years in this house. It may be summed up by the expression "he carries a big club". The fact that he believes in carrying a big club is shown by statements made by him down through the years. On September 8, 1950, when we were considering the essential materials (defence) act, I find these words on page 460 of Hansard:

> I suggest to the committee that a word from the government is more effective if there is a law in the background that can be applied in case the response is not all that may be desired.

The next year, 1951, on May 21, page 3253 of Hansard, we find him saying this:

> Who would stop us? Don't take yourself too seriously. If we wanted to get away with it who would stop us?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is quoted from Conservative election propaganda that did not work. That is what my hon. friend is quoting now.

Mr. Green: And C. D. Howe is pretty deeply mixed up in election stuff, too. In 1953, April 21, page 4197 of Hansard, we find this. We were discussing an order in council passed under the emergency powers act when the house was in session, and which was thrown on the table here:

> If we have overstepped our powers, I make no apology for having done so.

On March 14, 1955, just three months ago, at page 1996 of Hansard, we find this:

> We did not take action under the powers. The powers were there, however.

Here we have a case of the greed for power of one man. Parliament is asked to bend the knee, just as business in Canada has been asked to bend the knee to this minister. It is high time this tyranny was stopped. We offered to agree that the minister could keep the powers if they were made for a period of time, say for two or three years, when they would again be subject to review. We offered to endorse the bill if the powers were restricted to such products as aircraft and electronics, instead of having a definition of defence supplies so broad it covers everything produced in this country. We suggested that the government go over the bill carefully and remove the sections that they themselves admit should not be continuing. We have been met with a refusal of each one of those suggestions. The minister's stand today—not the Prime Minister, and we want to hear his stand—is all or nothing.

The war has been over for 10 years, Mr. Speaker. The emergency powers act was dropped last year, and the Prime Minister admitted that act should be dropped. The Defence Production Act, in its present form, is not needed today any more than the emergency powers act was needed last year. If the minister cannot operate this Department of Defence Production without these powers, then let him give up that portfolio and devote himself to the Department of Trade and Commerce. He has a full-time job in selling Canada's wheat and looking after some of these trade problems he is having with the United States. I suggest the minister take on that job and let somebody else handle the defence production department.

If there were a new minister there is not one member in the Liberal or C.C.F. parties who would suggest that he be given these wide open powers the present minister is demanding. If a new minister asked for powers of this nature he would be laughed out of the house, and properly so. Because it happens to be this minister, the members of the Liberal and C.C.F. parties are prepared to give him all the powers for which he asks.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say there has been a lot of emphasis on the need for building up our defences, and a lot of emphasis on the need for defence production. That is all very true, but the strongest weapon of this country is not defences or defence materials; the strongest weapon of this country is freedom. This act takes freedom away from the Canadian people. For that reason there is no excuse for this government asking that the act in its present form be accepted by the house.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): It is with considerable hesitation that I take part in this debate—

An hon. Member: Why bother?

Mr. MacLean: —but for reasons which the hon. member who has just interrupted would perhaps not appreciate, I feel I should take part, because I consider the subject matter to be one of the most important to come before this parliament in recent years, or likely to come before it in the near future.

On this occasion we are debating a piece of legislation which strikes at the very roots of our democratic system. We are being told, of course, that it is quite innocent legislation, not only innocent but necessary. It is necessary because at this time we find ourselves in a world which is divided into two factions. We are told that we must keep ourselves strong militarily in order to survive. These, of course, are facts and I do not disagree with them; but they are not justification for throwing away bit by bit the liberties and freedoms which we have set out to defend.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to take part in this debate because I realize my capabilities are perhaps not such as will measure up to the magnitude of the problem. This is a subject which would require the full powers of a Churchill, a Burke or a Lincoln to appreciate and expose the full significance of the insidious tendencies exhibited in this legislation.

It has been urged that it is necessary to make permanent the Department of Defence Production, and I do not think there are many members in the house who would quarrel with that suggestion. So far as we can see into the future it seems likely that we will require to procure large amounts of munitions. Therefore in the view of most of us it is justified that the Department of Defence Production should be permanent. I, for one, am perfectly willing to go along with that suggestion.

The first clause in the bill would increase the minister's salary. That would appear to be an innocent clause, to which no one objects so far as I know.

However, when we turn to the second clause we find that not only would it make permanent the Department of Defence Production, but that it is a package deal. Tied up with the objective of making the department permanent we find that it also makes permanent these extraordinary powers now contained in the act.

The minister has suggested that it is impossible to bring about the desired result in any other way. He even led us to believe that he was open to suggestions as to how this package deal could be avoided. If the minister was sincere in that suggestion, then I am sure there are many who could offer suggestions to him to solve his dilemma.

As was said by the previous speaker, the sections of the act to set up the department on a permanent basis could be enacted in their present form. On the other hand those sections in the act which would make permanent these extraordinary powers vested in the minister could have a time limit imposed upon them. That is one suggested solution. Another solution would be simply to extend the life of the present act but to impose a time limit of four or five years during which it would operate.

Then an entirely different approach could be made. The present act followed the Defence Supplies Act. I think the purpose of the procurement of defence supplies could be met if an entirely new bill were introduced which would set up the Department of Defence Production in much the same way as every other department of government is set up. That act could come into force at the expiration of the present one; and when the present act expires the Defence Supplies Act would automatically come back into force. It could give the power required by the Minister of Defence Production for the procurement of defence supplies.

I should like to quote briefly from what was said by the minister in the house on March 2, 1951, when the Defence Production Act was under debate. This is what we find at page 839 of Hansard:

By and large, these are the powers that are now contained in the Defence Supplies Act—

He was speaking of the powers in the present Defence Production Act.

—which, hon. members will notice, is only being suspended during the life of the present proposed act. Other powers are of an extraordinary nature but fitted to the extraordinary circumstances of today.

That is, fitted to the extraordinary circumstances existing in 1951. Then I should like to quote what the minister had to say when the Defence Supplies Act was being debated in the house in 1950. These are his words, as reported at page 3633 of Hansard:

The threat seems to be made from all sides of the house that this legislation will be defeated. I will say at once it is all right with me if it is defeated because I will at least get full marks for having tried to remove from the statutes legislation that is far too dictatorial and stringent for peacetime. I have tried to retain from the existing legislation only those powers which are reasonable peacetime powers for carrying out the procurement duties involved in the defence of Canada.

I am curious as to why the minister realized in 1950 that the powers required for an all-out war effort are not suitable for peacetime, and why he now turns his back on his viewpoint of five years ago.

It is a fact of history that most civilizations of the past, setting out to make sure that they would continue into the future, taught that their sole danger was from without, and that they could be destroyed only by attack from without. History teaches us, however, that in nearly all cases civilizations have ceased to exist not as the direct result of attack from without but because of rot from within. And the principles upon which they first prospered were whittled away to such an extent that eventually those civilizations collapsed from within.

That is my fear at the present time. Many people take the shallow view that progress is inevitable and democracy is permanent. I see no reason why our civilization or our way of life should be considered immune from the forces which have existed throughout history. I feel there is a real danger that in our efforts to defeat totalitarian attack from without we will destroy our civilization from within. To my mind that is a great threat.

Many people realize, too, that when we give extraordinary powers to any minister—and I am not casting any reflection upon any particular minister or any particular individual, because I make due allowance for human nature—such extraordinary powers tend to corrupt. I should like to quote briefly from a book entitled "Faith and Freedom", by Barbara Ward. This quotation is found at page 202, in these words:

After the French revolution, thoughtful men were profoundly impressed and disturbed by its brief showing forth of total dictatorship.

They came to believe that any attempt on the part of the community to concentrate all power—moral, political and economic—in the hands of the state and to use that power to bring about an earthly Utopia could result only in unmitigated despotism and the defacement of humanity. They appealed to the older traditions of Europe—incorporated in the political systems of Britain and America—to the separation of powers, to the supremacy of law over government, and governed, to the idea of a religious loyalty which transcends the state, and to a modesty in political aims which could recognize that paradise cannot be built and ordinary men deified by violent acts of state.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What did Cleopatra say about it? Did she not have some comment along that line?

Mr. MacLean: I notice that the minister is attempting to make light of the statement that I have made.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No; Cleopatra was quoted yesterday on another matter.

Mr. Fleming: No, there was no remark by Cleopatra. It was about Cleopatra.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Was it Mark Antony?

Mr. MacLean: No. There is a great deal to be learned from history, and I commend a study of history to anyone with such aims. Anyone who would preserve our present civilization can certainly learn from the mistakes of the past.

Behind all the constitutional checks imposed by medieval theory upon the governors of society lay the perception that unchecked power will be abused. Power is never exercised in vacuo. It is exercised by men. Expose them to the possibility of unlimited domination and they seize it; all but a minute fraction of them will deteriorate in the process as the ego grows by what it feeds on. This is the lesson of all history. This is the fundamental reason why human freedom fills so brief a span in the long development of man.

I do not consider for one moment, Mr. Speaker, that this is something to be taken lightly, or that it is only a case of getting a bill enacted by this parliament within a certain length of time, or anything of that sort. It should be remembered that all dictatorial powers which get into a position of control do so by a gradual and insidious process. It behooves us to guard the ramparts of freedom, not only by military arms and by efficient military forces, although they are necessary, but by safeguarding the principles on which our free civilization and our democratic system of government are based.

I should like to read a quotation from a book entitled "The Urge to Persecute" by A. P. Davies. The quotation may be found on page 139, and reads as follows:

It is always "little by little". As James Madison warned us, "There are more instances of abridgement of the freedom of the people by gradual and silent encroachments of those in power than by violent and sudden usurpations."

Many peoples and many civilizations have realized their mistakes when it was too late. They looked upon trends that were taking place as necessary ones that were not especially dangerous, but before they realized it they had gone beyond the point of no return.

I should like to read another quotation from "The Urge To Persecute". It will be found on page 111:

> The time to deal with tyranny is before it becomes established; once entrenched, it maintains itself with ease against those who could have prevented it. This, unfortunately, is the lesson which, again and again, the human race has learned too late. The little courage which it would have taken to stop a would-be tyrant before he had achieved power was more courage than his prospective victims could muster. They wrung their hands, they muttered their dismay to one another, they whispered their fears—but they did not act. They were too afraid.

My suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is that now is the time to act. There can be no valid justification for the extraordinary powers which the government would have us give to the Minister of Defence Production. The purposes of the Department of Defence Production in the efficient procurement of supplies for the defence forces can be achieved without such extraordinary powers. I continue with the quotation:

> Yes, evil ascends unchallenged, not because it is unrecognized as evil but because good people are not brave enough to check it. It is all in those six short words: "For goodness dares not check thee."

This United States writer goes on to say:

> That is what has been happening in our own country in the last few years. Not that we are yet ruled by tyranny; we are still a free people who elect our own government. But we are indulging tyrannous elements that operate under the protection of our government. In the eyes of many, what these elements are doing is not alarming; if there is wrong in it, it must be condoned because of the end it serves—or which they think it serves. They do not see that this is how tyranny has always been excused—until too late!

I should like you to pay special attention to these words:

> No would-be tyrant announces that his aim is power; he is the protector of the people, warning against their enemies, the popular champion of a plausible crusade, a persecuted hero, intrepid and dauntless amid the host of his detractors. Thus he presents himself, and although his character is plainly manifested by his deeds, thus he is accepted —by too many until it is too late.

I believe that is exactly what is happening now. This extraordinary legislation is being justified in the name of the protection of freedom. It is being justified because the minister admittedly has to work under difficulties, and the procurement of sufficient defence supplies is naturally a great problem.

For all of these reasons attempts are being made to justify this very extraordinary legislation.

The quotation I have read is only one man's opinion, it can be argued. It can be said that it does not carry any more weight than anybody else's opinion. The man who wrote it happens to be an authority on the study of present-day history, and I think his opinion is worth while. Nevertheless we can test the validity of the opinion. We can consider for a moment the statements that have been made in support of this legislation. It has been said that this legislation is necessary because it is for the good of the employees of the Department of Defence Production, who want to know that there is permanency in their jobs. It has been said that it is a good thing because it will help in the procurement of munitions and supplies for the defence of freedom, which is a worthy cause. It is justified on the flimsy suggestion that you cannot have a Department of Defence Production without extraordinary powers. Those extraordinary powers are justified by the statement that they will rarely be used, that likely they will not have to be used in the future so there is no harm in having them since they will not actually be brought into operation.

That reminds me that our most recent dictator came to power under constitutional law, using the ordinary and recognized methods of gaining power to a great extent. Adolf Hitler came to power in Germany by having a large group of his party elected to the parliament of Germany in election after election, supported by the socialists. I think they are familiar with what nazism stands for.

Mr. Gillis: The socialists were in the internment camps.

Mr. MacLean: Nazism happened to stand for the nationalist socialist workers party.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member has not read his history as well as he should have. He is at the wrong end.

Mr. MacLean: I admit that the party was backed by the industrialists, who went along because they wanted to curry favour with what they considered the strongest party. They realized their mistake, as many people do, when it was too late. As I was saying when I was interrupted, the nazi party in Germany came to power by using the accepted methods of politics in that country to a great extent, until eventually by negotiation with other parties and by dealing with the communists and by the use of other methods they obtained a majority in the German parliament.

Hitler gained his first important position of power by the passage of a bill in the German parliament. It was a simple bill, and it was said that its provisions would not need to be used and it would do no harm. Just as we have been told now, it was said that the rights of parliament would not be disturbed or lessened. When I listened to the explanations given by several members of the government—I say this in all sincerity—they unwittingly and by absolute chance reminded me of Hitler's statement in the German parliament when he introduced the enabling bill of which I am speaking. I took the trouble to look up his speech, and these were Hitler's words on that occasion:

> The government will only make use of these powers in so far as they are essential for carrying out vitally necessary measures. Neither the existence of the Reichstag nor that of the Reichsrat is menaced.

It would not interfere with either houses of parliament.

> The position and rights of the president remain unaffected. It will always be the foremost task of the government to act in harmony with his aims. The separate existence of the federal states will not be done away with.

In other words it would not interfere with the rights of the provinces.

> The rights of the churches will not be diminished, and their relationship to the state will not be modified. The number of cases in which an internal necessity exists for having recourse to such a law is in itself a limited one.

The law is justified because the occasions on which you could possibly use it are few and far between.

> All the more, however, the government insist upon the passing of the law. They prefer a clear decision.

Every sentence in that statement has a familiar ring.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think I should say that no member of the government has ever said that these provisions are not to be used if the occasion arises where they are required.

Mr. MacLean: That is exactly what I am saying. The speaker on this occasion did not suggest they would not be used, either, but he justified their existence by saying it would be necessary to use them only rarely.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I never attempted to justify it on that ground. My hon. friend is dragging in extraneous material and trying to make it fit.

Mr. MacLean: I admit that the minister is annoyed, but I quoted from that particular speech because I was reminded of it by what has been said in the house during the last few days. I have not said what I have just said for the pleasure of annoying the minister or any other member of the government. If I happen to be annoying them—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just to kill off another ten minutes.

Mr. MacLean: Not to kill off another ten minutes, either.

Mr. Drew: Ten minutes is not long when you are trying to kill off a parliament.

Mr. MacLean: It is because I believe in the democratic way of life which was established by our forefathers that I think it behooves us to protect that way of life by retaining our parliamentary system which has been gained with such great difficulty. I feel sincerely that these things must be protected, not only by means of war or military defence but also by the exercise of unspectacular and tedious methods through the use of free speech and seeing that no undemocratic bits of legislation creep into our code of law.

This piece of legislation is being enacted because there is a threat of communism, and we must make ourselves strong against that threat so we may bargain from strength. The vast expenditures of treasure and energy which are being made for defence purposes by the western world are being made to defend our way of life. It is just as necessary to defend our way of life in less expensive ways.

In closing I should like to sum up this point of view by another quotation from a book from which I have quoted already, called "The Urge to Persecute" by A. P. Davies. This quotation will be found on page 212. The book was written by an American, and it looks at the problem from the American point of view. It is a point of view that applies not only to the United States but to Canada as well, and to the whole western world. He says:

> If our cause is just, if we are worthy of it, if we serve it wholeheartedly, the laws of God are with us.
> We have not sufficiently remembered this. It is not that we have done badly in all respects. In some we have done well. We have fed the hungry, succoured the needy, defended the oppressed, resisted the aggressor, pled for peace. But we have also distrusted—many of us—our great traditions and we have lost confidence in our freedoms.
> Communism is the enemy. But we cannot defeat it by remaining as we are. We cannot shorten the struggle. We cannot subdue it by force of arms without inviting—even if we won—a measureless catastrophe. We must wear it down.

We must resist its aggressions and be alert to its conspiracies. We must outplan it, outperform it. We must carry our way of life to a level that leaves communism a hopeless and irrelevant contender. Our truth must defeat its falsehoods, our liberty its servitude, our justice its oppressions, our compassion its cruelties, our faith its cynicism, our humanity its degradations and debasement.

We cannot do this if we lower our own standards and betray our principles. That is why we must rebuke those who say that they are fighting communism but who are careless of our moral values. They could all too easily lose us the battle. For the struggle is not between communism and a debased democracy; that would be a struggle that we could not win. The real struggle—and the one we can win and must if we are to survive—is between communism and democracy's moral values.

Mr. Speaker, for these reasons I find it impossible to support this measure in its present form. In saying that I do not minimize in any way the importance of our military forces or the importance of having them adequately equipped. However, I do believe there are better ways of achieving that objective than what is suggested here. I believe those objectives could best be achieved by setting up a defence production department on a permanent basis like any other department of government, but having these extraordinary powers limited to those which are appropriate in a situation which is short of all-out war.

For myself I freely say that if the government would come forward with any reasonable compromise limiting these powers, either in extent or by a time limit, or finding some solution that will break up this bundle bill that is being handed to us, I would almost certainly support it, if there were no other strings attached. But I cannot possibly vote for this legislation as it now stands.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) made a thoughtful suggestion in answer to the minister. He pointed out a simple alternative in keeping with the views expressed by the minister on the 2nd of March, 1951, when he stated that these powers should not be of a continuing nature, apparently because of their absolute nature. However, there has been no suggestion on the part of the government that it intends to deviate one whit from the trend that apparently is to be followed, of establishing for ministers of the crown and this government an absolutism.

It begins to look, from what we heard this afternoon through the press, before parliament opened, that in the department of defence as well a spirit of absolutism is coming into being. One wonders, in view of the paucity of the explanation this afternoon, whether General Simonds is about to depart from the service of this country because of a lack of sycophancy in his attitude to the government. Certainly that is but another example of the trend that is revealed in this legislation now before parliament, which in effect emasculates parliament and places the minister in a position where he is all-powerful, under a statute which places him above parliament by the extension of powers far beyond those that are necessary, regardless of what conditions may be.

The Prime Minister introduced this legislation. The Prime Minister's place is in this house, to explain why such extraordinary powers are being asked for an indefinite period into the future; why the pathways of absolute power, which was previously limited, are to become under this legislation the highways of permanence. This is a serious bill. It is one that in its simplicity looks innocuous, but on examination it reveals that continuing trend to absolute power. Under this legislation the Minister of Defence Production will have granted to him absolute power for an indefinite period into the future, uncontrolled by parliament.

As I sat and listened to the debate I waited for something other than the specious explanation given up to the present time as to the reason for the change in attitude from that of 1951.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this debate tomorrow, and when it is concluded we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 9, 1955

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DREW—RELEASE TO PRESS OF CHANGES IN NATIONAL DEFENCE DEPARTMENT

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday, at the opening of the house, I raised the question of the statements that had been given to the press just before the house met. Naturally, I had not had a chance to read those as they were just handed to me as I came in before I raised the question about those announcements being made outside the house. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) replied, and in the closing part of his remarks he said this:

> . . . we will consider whether a change should be made in the matter of reporting to the house, before the public is informed, the usual permutations that take place in the civil service, even when it has become apparent that, either through speculation or otherwise, there has already been publicity in the press about the probability of their being made.

I realize that just as I had only received the press reports when I came in so also the Prime Minister only had this subject raised when I made my comments in the house. For that reason I can quite understand that there may not have been a consideration of all the aspects of these announcements that he would have an opportunity to give since that time. I do point out however, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion that these announcements simply represented the ordinary permutations is inconsistent with the facts and it is on that basis of privilege that I raise this at the moment.

General Guy Simonds was appointed chief of staff on February 1, 1951. On the very day that he was appointed and the announcement was made, General Charles Foulkes was appointed chairman of the Canadian chiefs of staff. He moved up from the position of chief of the general staff. I have nothing but admiration to express for General Foulkes. If, however, these were merely the ordinary permutations in the movement of officials, then at this time—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, unless members on the other side no longer even want to know matters of important business coming before the house, then I suggest they restrain their comments and not try to interfere with suggestions that we get the information to which we are definitely entitled.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order; I listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew)—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, my remarks were directed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the Minister of Finance was rising on a point of order.

Mr. Harris: One always permits the beginning of a question of privilege until one hears what it is. As I understand the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, he is attempting to launch into a debate as to the past practice, about which some reference was made. That is a matter of opinion and a matter of debate; it is not a matter of privilege.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am not attempting to launch into a debate. I am stating what the facts are. And I hope that when the Prime Minister rises he will deal with the fact which he now has had an opportunity to examine, and that he will explain to the house why the best qualified staff officer has been released from the service.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: Let the iron curtain fall.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, but a point of order has been raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) after which the Leader of the Opposition was allowed to explain. That is why I let him present his explanation in relation to the point of order. But I noticed that he was carrying on an argument from his own position with respect to a question of privilege which he raised yesterday. I do not know whether at this moment the Leader of the Opposition has terminated his remarks. If he has not, then I shall have to tell him that I have Hansard of yesterday before me and I notice that he raised a question of privilege stating as his question that an announcement which had been presented to the press should have been made to the house prior to its delivery to the press. To him the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) replied, as to that particular aspect of the matter.

Then today the Leader of the Opposition seems to argue with respect to the reply that was given yesterday by the Prime Minister. It seems to me that there will be an opportunity to discuss the propriety or the impropriety of delivering news to the press prior to its being given to the house when, let us say, the estimates of the Department of National Defence are before the house, at which time the Leader of the Opposition will have full opportunity to go into the significance, as he sees it, of these various permutations which were announced.

In the mind of the Leader of the Opposition these permutations were not ordinary ones. On the other hand, the Prime Minister has indicated they were just the ordinary permutations which from time to time are announced through the usual channels, and which frequently are given to the press.

I think the point the Minister of Finance has made is well taken, and that what the Leader of the Opposition has risen to do is a question for argument and debate. Indeed, I think even yesterday the Leader of the Opposition was close to not raising a proper question of privilege. Therefore I think we ought to leave the matter at that for the time being. Presenting reports—

Mr. Drew: No; I trust, Mr. Speaker, you will not deny me the opportunity to point out that I am not dealing with the question of the delivery of information to the press; and I made that clear. I am dealing with a statement made to this house by the Prime Minister of Canada, a statement that manifestly, on the basis of the facts, is not accurate. I am hoping the Prime Minister will accept that statement.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I must protest against this attitude of the hon. gentleman which is so reminiscent of what took place in the first period after his entry into this house. The hon. gentleman has a good many privileges, but he has not the privilege of determining the manner in which public business will be dealt with, unless it be on grounds that are serious in themselves.

We were told repeatedly after the hon. gentleman came here that the manner in which this house was conducting its business was entirely wrong. I have ascertained that the manner in which this announcement was made is that which has been followed since the very first days of this parliament.

Mr. Drew: It was not followed the day before.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. St. Laurent: There have been several occasions when important appointments to the public service have been made while parliament was in session, and none of the hon. member's predecessors, as leader of the opposition, or none of my predecessors as prime minister, has felt that it was a discourtesy to the house to hand releases to the press without making any statement about them in parliament. I have ascertained that since I became Prime Minister there were four or five occasions when deputy ministers were appointed and the announcements were made in the manner that had been practised from the very first days of our parliamentary institutions, without any comment whatsoever that it was a discourtesy to the house, and it certainly never was intended by any of those who occupied either the office that my hon. friend occupies or the office that I occupy that there be any discourtesy to the members of the House of Commons.

Now, as to the appointments made in the army, they are the primary responsibility of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney), and we all share with him that responsibility. If any discussion is to be made about the manner in which he exercises his responsibility as Minister of National Defence there will be an appropriate time for making it; but it certainly is not a violation of the privileges of the members of this house to announce what has been done in the manner in which these announcements have always been made.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would point out that quite contrary to what the Prime Minister has said, it was only the day before that the Minister of National Defence chose to come into this house to announce a change in regard to another officer. If it was proper to do that, it was certainly proper to do it when the most highly skilled army officer that this country has produced was being relieved of his service in the Canadian army.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Second report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Jutras.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REPORT ON ALLEGED COMBINE IN MANUFACTURE, SALE AND DISTRIBUTION OF BEER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I am tabling the report, both in the English and in the French languages, concerning an alleged combine into the manufacture, sale and distribution of beer in Canada.

QUESTION

EXPORT OF SPRUCE LOGS, B.C.

Mr. Barnett:

1. Were any unmanufactured spruce logs exported from British Columbia in the years 1953 and 1954?
2. If so, what are the names of the firms which exported these logs?
3. What was the quantity of logs exported by each of the exporting firms in the respective years?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Export of spruce logs through customs ports in the province of British Columbia were as follows:

Year 1953	389 M ft.
Year 1954	63 M ft.

2 and 3. Names of firms and quantity exported by each firm are not recorded.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DATE OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) asked me if a date had been fixed for the meeting that is to be held to consider the information obtained about unemployment relief. I told him that I was having a meeting with the committee of the cabinet and officials to go over the information. We had that meeting, following which I telegraphed the ten provincial premiers suggesting Monday, June 20, and if necessary Tuesday, June 21, for that meeting with them or their representatives.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REFERENCE TO ADVERTISEMENT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of National Health and Welfare has had time to look at the two-page spread in yesterday's daily papers where the following appears:

> Welfare . . . Premier Frost's initiative at Ottawa secured old age pensions for all at 70 and for needy senior citizens at 65.

Would the minister care to comment on the accuracy of that statement?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that any hon. member sitting in any part of this house would want to raise that question. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) indicated to me that he intended to ask the same question. I may say that about a week ago I made a statement and took public issue with the very contention to which my hon. friend is referring, but in another context.

As everyone knows, including the premier of Ontario, the fact is that the old age security program providing for a means-test-free pension was the product of a parliamentary committee of this house, which was followed by a recommendation made to the house by the present government, as the result of which the people of Canada through federal action now have a non-means-test old age security provision. The fact is that at the conference when this matter was discussed the premier of Ontario, undoubtedly acting with the best intentions, took issue with the scheme in its entirety as presented by myself at that time as Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question? In view of the increase in the cost of living and the decrease in purchasing power of the dollar since the $40 pension was brought in is the government considering increasing this amount?

Mr. Martin: The government is continually giving these matters attention and I hope that my hon. friend, who has influence with certain provincial governments in certain parts of Canada, will see that they give the same consideration to this that other provinces have.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

SUGGESTED SUPPORT BY ONTARIO GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if, in the light of the statement by the premier of Ontario reported in today's press concerning the carrying on of the international trade fair, the minister's officials will be instructed to enter into early discussions with the province so that continuity may be assured after this year's fair?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the press report, but I am told that the premier of Ontario made a statement that the province would carry on the fair. I made a statement yesterday in the house that, if the province decided to do that, we would be glad to turn over all the equipment and to give all the technical advice that this government has at its disposal. The moment we are approached in the matter by the province, we will give immediate attention to all matters necessary to give the fair continuity.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Would the right hon. minister enlarge his statement to include the carrying on of the trade fair by the city of Toronto or other agencies which might be interested in taking up from the beginnings which have been made? As I understood his statement, it was limited to the withdrawal of federal financial support.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the government is withdrawing sponsorship of the international trade fair for reasons that we believe are sound. I said yesterday that we would be glad to turn everything over to the province of Ontario, but I think I should not expand that offer until I get requests. Since we are withdrawing from the fair, we will consider any request made by a capable and bona fide public body that wishes to carry on the fair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACCEPTANCE BY CHANCELLOR ADENAUER OF INVITATION TO VISIT MOSCOW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he be prepared to make some comment on Chancellor Adenauer's acceptance of an invitation to go to Moscow, and does he consider the acceptance of that invitation as somewhat difficult to understand in view of the recent admission of West Germany into NATO?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I knew that the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany had been invited to Moscow. I did not know that he had yet accepted the invitation. I understood this morning that it was still under consideration. But whether he accepted or not, I am quite sure that Chancellor Adenauer will be able to take care of the interests of his country and himself, if and when he goes to Moscow.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

D. R. BISHOP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General? Can my hon. friend tell me when I might expect the tabling of a return ordered by the house quite some time ago, on January 24, 1955, involving correspondence with a certain self-appointed director of patronage in the province of New Brunswick?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): It must be a case of mental telepathy, because only this morning I was asking the officials if the return was ready, and they assured me it would be early next week.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARY OF MINISTER AND EXPIRY OF ACT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe, Port Arthur (for Mr. St. Laurent) for the second reading of Bill No. 256, to amend the Defence Production Act.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I had commenced last evening to deal with this matter, and at the time I was concluding I had asked consideration by the Prime Minister to his participation in this debate; for he himself introduced this resolution in March and as yet has not given the views of the government, in particular with regard to the constitutionality of this measure and also to the degree to which it interferes with the rights of the individual and denies him under several sections recourse to the courts. I mention the question of constitutionality for this reason. In the act as it is now constituted there is nothing to indicate in any way on the part of parliament that an emergency exists, nor is there any declaration of emergency in that act. Immediately someone might say: This is the act that was passed in 1951; if the act has been operative since then, is not that the answer to the question that I propound? I submit, however, that that is not the case, for in 1951 the Emergency Powers Act was part and parcel of the law of this country. Under that act there was a declaration of emergency which in effect, under the authorities, grants the right to the federal parliament to invade provincial rights and provincial subjects of jurisdiction under the British North America Act.

I think it is particularly pertinent to recall to the Prime Minister his words in 1945 when dealing with the introduction of the first of the emergency acts. As reported at page 2451 of Hansard of that year he pointed out:

> I think that only a declaration of this parliament will be sufficiently impressive upon the Canadian people to be accepted as to whether or not there exists a condition which gives to some of the things normally within provincial jurisdiction aspects which require that they be dealt with in another sphere in the national interest.

In the course of his remarks on that occasion he dealt particularly in detail with the Fort Frances pulp and paper company case. At that time he set out his conclusions with regard to the whole question of federal emergency legislation having the right to invade provincial jurisdiction and provincial fields of legislation and, incidentally, at the same time mentioned that legislation such as this should be limited. At that time the original act was limited to a period of one year.

I mention this matter because the present legislation has no longer, to bolster it up, the declaration under the Emergency Powers Act to the effect that parliament has declared that an emergency exists. Without that declaration, are the courts to conclude—contrary to what they have decided in the past—that the legislation now before parliament will be within the constitutional jurisdiction of parliament? I ask the Prime Minister whether he has given consideration to that fact, for certainly the situation has changed greatly within the last year since the emergency powers legislation was permitted to lapse.

Commencing on that note, may I say that I think we in the house as well as the people of Canada generally have the right to hear the Prime Minister on this question and to ascertain from him his views on this important matter, and in particular whether or not consideration has been given to the fact that the emergency powers legislation is no longer in effect in this country. I am not going to attack the act which we are asked to extend indefinitely, or the carte blanche on powers which parliament is being asked to extend indefinitely, by simply attacking the whole act. However, I am going to mention two or three sections in this act that constitute, in my opinion, an encyclopedia of powers that any glutton for power would envy the possession of. In some sections it places the minister above the courts, and in other sections the governor in council. It denies any challenge from the court and by the courts. Indeed, it can be summed up in much shorter form by stating that I, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), have absolute power except within the limitations contained in two or three sections. This is not the production of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), it is the handiwork of the Minister of Defence Production himself. In 1951 that minister used these words: "I have supervised the drafting of this bill." In other words, every power conceivable and inconceivable that would make a minister almost all powerful has been incorporated in this act.

Originally, parliament was going to have the opportunity in a matter of three years to review the powers. The minister's stand now is: we need this act; it must be continued for an indefinite time in the future. The Prime Minister said the two reasons for needing it for a non-terminable date were the fact that conditions today are still difficult internationally and that the officials of this department wanted to be assured of the permanence of the department. I thought the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) covered that question yesterday when he stated, upon being challenged by the minister as to how that could be achieved, we could have the department made permanent but the powers reviewable at an appropriate expiry date of one, two, or three years as the case might be. View that act in all the amplitude of its powers and tell me not that similar powers are vested in the government of Great Britain. I have the latest act, 1951, here and they did not find it necessary to pass legislation giving the minister powers unchallengeable in the courts in certain sections of the act and in other sections of the act placing the government above the control of the courts of the land.

I know this subject will interest the Prime Minister, because as a former president of the Canadian Bar Association he spoke on more than one occasion, as I recall, of the power of the rule of law and the need for its preservation and maintenance. I ask the Prime Minister now: Do you have to circumvent the rule of law in order to achieve power under this legislation? Nothing of the kind! Have the powers, but in order to assure that no individual shall be discriminated against and denied equality before the law, to assure that the individual shall not be a puppet in the hands of the minister, give to the individual who is able to establish that he has been discriminated against a right of review by the courts of the land. Surely, we have not arrived at a state of mind in this country when parliament is asked to abdicate the rights of the courts for an indefinite time in the future in order to satisfy the desire for power of any minister or of any government.

Review this legislation; review it in detail and dispassionately. There is an immense number of possibilities within this legislation. There are invasions of provincial rights and jurisdictions, and those rights and jurisdictions are, in several cases, placed above the law. Let me refer to one or two sections. The only sections to which I shall refer are those to which the argument applies. In some sections there is a provision for the protection of the rights of the individual, but qualified or diminished to a great extent. In others, there is none.

Let us take section 28 as an example. Section 28 reads as follows:

> The governor in council may, by order, direct that a person shall not be bound by any obligation, restriction or limitation imposed on that person by or under any statute, order, rule, regulation, by-law, or contract with respect to such matters as may be specified in the order affecting the entry into or performance of a defence contract by that person or the carrying out of an order made by the minister under this act.

I ask the Prime Minister to let the house in on the secret as to how power can be given to the governor in council to interfere with a contract made within a province. Where is that power? Where is the declaration of emergency that ordinarily is used as a subterfuge or means in order to invade the constitution of this country? There is not one reference to it in this act. I ask him this. Does he, as an outstanding constitutional lawyer, suggest that if in the province of Ontario a contract has been made as between A and B for the delivery of certain goods or substances, which afterwards are declared by the Minister of Defence Production to be needed for defence, parliament can by a simple statement like that delegate to the governor in council the right to say, "You are bound under your contract but we release you from that contract." Do not tell me we have arrived at that position in this country where a government, absolute in power, can interfere and make a plaything of the constitution and its rights.

Will the Prime Minister say that if under the statute of a province certain rights are determined for an individual, this parliament could, without a declaration of emergency, under that section say to the individual, "While under the provincial statute you are required to do a certain thing and undertake a certain obligation, the governor in council releases you from that obligation." If we have, then the constitution, in the hands of this government, indeed has become the bauble of the Minister of Defence Production and the government itself. Supposing a by-law of a city is passed whereby certain rights are secured by an individual in the province of Quebec. Can the governor in council, by order, direct that a person to whom liability attaches under that bylaw is no longer subject to the law because the Minister of Defence Production does not consider he should be? I ask the Prime Minister to consider that.

I look at section 31 and ask the Prime Minister: Without a declaration of emergency and without the assistance of the emergency powers act, does he say—if he does parliament will listen with the greatest of interest—that the powers contained therein can be exercised? These are amongst the powers:

The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations as he deems necessary to control and regulate the production, processing, distribution, acquisition, disposition or use of essential materials . . .

Section 31 (2) (f) says—

—fix the maximum prices, either by determining the selling price or the mark-up, at which and the terms and conditions on which any essential materials or essential services may be sold or offered for sale by any person—

Have we come to a condition of affairs in this country where any person occupying the almighty position of a minister of the crown in the federal parliament can, with the assistance of the cabinet, fix prices—not the prices of things that are to be sold to the government, or under this legislation, but just to "fix the maximum prices". And I will read it:

—fix the maximum prices . . . on which any essential materials or essential services may be sold.

Have we arrived at a position in Canada where gluttony for power will permit the governor in council to say, "I fix the price of essential services on hydroelectric"—to do which they will have the power under one of these sections? Have we arrived at the point where the governor in council may say to an individual in any province in this country, "You dare not sell what you have on hand, or offer it for sale to any person, except at prices that we fix." No wonder the minister said, "I drafted the statute". Yes, and what is next:

and require any seller to refund to any buyer any sum or consideration received in excess of a maximum selling price so fixed.

I ask the Prime Minister this: If I in the province of Saskatchewan have certain things on hand, and the Department of Defence Production does not take them over when I have them on hand, can he give the authority to the governor in council to say to me, "You shall not sell that, except at prices we fix."

If you have gone that far, then certainly you have laid the foundation for galloping socialism in this country. You have done a job. You have done the job effectively. The constitution heretofore was able to protect provincial rights over property and civil rights. Here, in one line, you are asking for the right to fix the price, to determine the maximum price, and in the next the right to determine as between private individuals dealing with those things. And if you are not satisfied with the deal as it was made, you come along and say, "I order you to refund to the buyer any sum in excess of the maximum selling price."

I am asking the Prime Minister this: Does he consider that that type of legislation is in keeping with the protestations we have heard for so long from the government of the day, and from the government of the Prime Minister's predecessor, Mr. King, of the awfulness of the invasion of the rights of the provinces? I ask the Prime Minister: Have we arrived at that point, considering that only a few years ago the Prime Minister said: "We cannot fix prices, except under emergency legislation."

Today, has the constitution been changed; have alterations been made; and has it been diluted down so that now the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) has the power to fix prices in any province in deals of private contracts? If that is so, then we have proceeded a long way.

Yes, and it also gives the right, as I said a moment ago, under the preceding section, by order, to direct that a person shall not be bound by any obligation, restriction or limitation imposed on that person by or under any statute. Have we arrived at the point in parliament when what was done during the days of war, at which time by order in council this government had the power to suspend, amend and abrogate statutes passed by parliament—and did—I say, in days of peace are we going to give to the governor in council authority, regardless of laws passed by parliament, in statutes, to interfere with and to change them? If we are, then parliament is indeed going on a vacation.

And I ask the Prime Minister this: Supposing there is a statute in Ontario that provides that I shall deliver, or that people in my classification shall deliver certain things, are you going to have the authority under this act, as now worded, to say, with respect to that statute in Ontario, "We, the governor in council, are above it." I wonder sometimes how much consideration was given to the several sections to which I intend to refer. There are sections that provide recourse to the courts, protecting the rights of the individual. But under certain sections of this act the federal parliament is given power to evade and circumvent the statutes of provincial legislatures at the will and the whim of the governor in council.

Now, what about the rights of individuals? The constitutional freedom of the individual is being preserved in one degree. Section 29 provides that the minister may conduct an inquiry. Over and over again I have heard leaders of the bar, such as the Prime Minister, in meetings of the Canadian Bar Association and outside it, demanding that we preserve the rights of the individual against the unfairness and the injustice of a denial of those fundamental freedoms and rights that every person of the British tradition has the right to expect—except during days of war, when parliament deliberately took measures as a security for victory.

But look at this subsection 3. They hold an investigation; and we have had one of these examples, in the Eldorado case. That was in 1945, during the days of war. Provision was made for the appointment of an investigator who was authorized to do anything he wanted, legally or illegally, and he was not subject to any action whatsoever, nor could any action be taken.

What do we find in section 29? It says:

> The minister may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause an inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter . . . arising out of . . . any group or series of defence contracts or any dealings in or with defence supplies.

And then:

> An investigator may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this act . . . to be represented by counsel.

He may "allow" it. Well, that certainly was a relinquishment to absolute power. And you know how that would be interpreted: "Provision is made that after you are charged you shall have counsel."

Well, I took it upon myself to look back to find out how many centuries ago the right to representation by counsel, and when one was not forced to speak without counsel being there, was established. I find it was in 1637, and the man, whose name is not as famous in history as his achievements warrant, was John Lilburn, who was brought up before one of these investigatory boards, the council of the star chamber. He wanted counsel, and they said, "You cannot have it." He said, "Then, I do not want to talk." But they had ways in those days, and they endeavoured to force him to talk, and finally found him guilty. He was punished because of "the crime of his boldness in refusing to take an oath". And those words are in quotation marks.

Even in the days of Charles I parliament sometimes acted. John Lilburn served his term. He came out and he filed a petition with parliament because his rights had been interfered with; that he had been placed in an inquisition that was a denial of his personal rights. Parliament acted. If you are wrongly punished here you have no right of recourse. But in 1641 he filed a petition with parliament on the ground that his imprisonment had been illegal. The House of Commons agreed and the House of Lords also agreed and they gave John Lilburn an indemnity of £3,000, which was a very large sum in those days. That happened in 1641, and in 1955 we are going to allow investigators to set up their own private courts, and they may allow counsel to be present.

Surely there is no reason whatever, with danger facing the country today,—and this is the year in which we are reducing defence expenditures—to deny to the individual the right to be represented by counsel.

I just cannot understand section 19. Imagine taking away the rights of the individual, despoiling him of his rights, and then denying him a right of action. Let me read section 19. I am sure the Prime Minister did not draft this, or even give an assist to the drafting:

> No person is entitled to damages, compensation or other allowance for loss of profit, direct or indirect, arising out of the rescission or termination of a defence contract at any time before it is fully performed . . .

You have the right to say to the individual, you shall perform this contract. He gets ready to perform it. Suppose it is building work on the D.E.W. line. He has to buy the necessary supplies and then the government comes along and says: well, the contract is rescinded. You have incurred a great deal of expense, but you shall have no right of action whatsoever. There was no need for that type of tyrannical inclusion in a statute in order to assure the preservation of our security.

These are some of the sections of the statute to which I am asking the Prime Minister to give consideration, to ameliorate them. You will have all the powers you need but you will not have absolute power if you ameliorate those sections that deny the individual the rights to which he is entitled, or to invade the constitution by a subterranean method such as this.

I have referred to section 28 and section 31. These are the major sections to which I take objection. I ask the Prime Minister why the inclusion of arbitrary powers such as these? The answer given is: we do not use them. What have you them for—a club, a threat, intimidation? Do you want the sword of Damocles to hang over everybody? Oh, we do not use these powers! Why have these inexcusable powers? In two particulars they are beyond anything that was used in time of war. Why do we need them today?

Then there is the other question, and I am not covering any of the ground that my hon. friends who preceded me have covered. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) outlined the general picture in an outstanding address. All I am doing is pinpointing two or three sections. I am asking the Prime Minister why? What has changed since 1945? I say to the Prime Minister, through you, sir, that in 1941 he made a statement to the effect that these great powers should not be exercised for any great length of time. He said there should be periods, not exceeding one year, when parliament should review the situation. That is what they did in Britain. In 1951 my hon. friends agreed to a period of three years.

Mr. St. Laurent: Five years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Five years; the correction is proper. Why the unlimited power today? What is the reason? Certainly we should not be overborne by the desires of potential bureaucrats who are fearful that at the end of five years the department is going to end. Make the department permanent, but make provision for the grant of extraordinary powers contingent on early review by parliament, and give consideration to the removal of these items to which I have made reference that I am sure the Prime Minister in his heart of hearts cannot justify.

Where is the rule of law? Have we placed the rule of law in the refrigerator of security? Is it put away? There is no need for that. Individuals have rights. Parliament has rights: the provinces have rights. I say to the Prime Minister. Do not answer me in the way I have heard the answer given in the last two days. We won in 1949 and we won in 1953; look at our majority. That is no answer to the interference with the rights of the individual with contractual obligations. With respect to constitutional power, read Burke. What did he say? What were his words? The tyranny of the majority is a multiple tyranny. No better answer can be given today than that. It is no excuse that you have a big majority. You need powers. We shall give those powers to the minister. Set up his department as a permanent one; but for the life of me I can see no justification to strangle the rights of the individual, to deny him counsel, to deny him the right of appeal to the courts, to place the governor in council in certain particulars above the law of the land.

I say no more, sir, but I do ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to this matter. As far as the Minister of Defence Production is concerned, he wants power. As far as the Prime Minister is concerned, in the grant of that power I suggest to the leader of this government that he see to it that provincial jurisdiction is not interfered with, that contractual obligations are not destroyed at the whim of the government, or of somebody to whom the minister sublets the power. And the power to fix prices as between A and B dealing with these commodities is something that should not be interfered with during days of peace.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with growing bewilderment and some concern to the strange merry-go-round of talk that I have heard from the opposition benches in the past couple of days. I remember that some of the Conservative speakers were flattering enough to quote something that I had written on the need for the repeal of the emergency powers act. After hearing some of the unmitigated nonsense uttered in the past couple of days by some of the Conservative speakers in connection with this Defence Production Act, I am not so sure that I should be flattered to be quoted by them. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) concluded by saying that the Minister of Defence Production and Minister of Trade and Commerce was lusting for power. I say that that is absolute nonsense and everyone in this chamber, including the hon. member for Prince Albert, knows it is absolute nonsense.

Then my good friend and fellow-Vancouverite, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), went on at some length to say that the minister is lusting and thirsting for power, that the minister is attempting to set up a tyranny. I do not believe that there is a single person in this house, and I for one do not believe that there is a single person in the whole Dominion of Canada, who believes any such thing.

Then I heard the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) stoop to great depths last night when he compared the request of the Minister of Defence Production for the tools to enable him to carry on his job effectively with the request of Adolf Hitler for the granting of complete totalitarian powers in Germany. I say that that is not only an insult to one of the world's greatest statesmen that this country ever produced, it is an insult to the intelligence of every hon. member of this house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there have not been many interjections, but the hon. member has made several comments which should not pass unchallenged. Your Honour will find if you read the rule book that to say a statement by an hon. member is an insult to the house is not within the rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. On the point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), if the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) stated that the remarks made were insulting to the house I am sure he will be glad to withdraw them.

Mr. Philpott: I shall be glad to withdraw them and say that the statements made by the hon. member for Queens were most unfortunate and I think were the most regrettable I have ever heard in all my life, and I am getting along in years; in fact I am as old as the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Knowles: How unkind can you get?

Mr. Philpott: When I hear unjustified statements such as we have heard in this house in the past two days, statements which were completely unjustified and ungrateful when referring to one of the world's greatest business statesmen that this or any other country ever produced, I may perhaps be forgiven a personal reference which makes me realize that I am getting along in years. I happened to have the honour of assisting in the entry into this house of the very distinguished gentleman who sits on the front benches. I made speeches for him all over northern Ontario during the election of 1935. The only thing I have against him is that I had a very good joke which I used in I think nine of the ten speeches I made on behalf of the present Minister of Defence Production, but on the tenth night he spoke before me and swiped my best joke and left me with nothing.

An hon. Member: The biggest joke was the result.

Mr. Philpott: The results speak for themselves. When an hon. member gets up in this house and likens the request of the Minister of Defence Production, for legislation to enable him to carry on his job, to the request of Adolf Hitler for the concession of complete totalitarian powers in Germany, that, stated in the mildest and most parliamentary terms, is hitting so far below the belt that it should not be condoned by any hon. member in this house.

If there is one Canadian more than any other who is still in this house who did so much to overcome the menace of that same Adolf Hitler and to enable this Canada of ours to attain the place she has in the company of nations, it is the unassuming and modest gentleman who sits on the front benches of this House of Commons.

Unfortunately the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) is not in the house today because I wanted to set him correct on a quotation he made. I set him correct on one he made yesterday when he was here and I should like to correct another one of his quotations. He misquoted Lord Acton. He quoted Lord Acton as having said that all power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely. If the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe or any other hon. member will look up the book of quotations he will find that the correct quotation is:

Power tends to corrupt; absolute power corrupts absolutely.

Mr. Fleming: A distinction without a difference.

Mr. Philpott: We have had enough misquotations. If the remarks of the Minister of Defence Production or of Lord Acton or even of Cleopatra, referred to by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), are going to be quoted, let us have the quotations correct.

It seems to me that there are a few questions which have to be asked about this particular bill. The first is whether there is a world emergency. One day we hear the hon. gentlemen on the Conservative benches opposite shouting to high heaven that our armed forces are not good enough, that we should have a bigger army, a bigger navy, a bigger air force and a bigger everything else to meet the urgent communist menace, and then in the next breath saying that there is no emergency at all, that we do not need any Defence Production Act, that everything is sweet and lovely, that we should all relax and go to sleep for 20 years like Rip Van Winkle; when that happens we do not know whether the Conservatives are coming or going or continuing to go around in circles.

There is a world emergency and it is perhaps the most serious emergency there has ever been in the history of the world. While the political picture in Europe is tending to get better, the very fact that it has got better means that there will be a greater emergency across the northern boundaries of Canada. I do not think that any defence production minister in any country of the world has a more difficult and intricate job to do than our own Minister of Defence Production here in Canada. Let us give him the tools to do the job and do it right.

I submit that whatever else hon. gentlemen may want to say about the Minister of Defence Production it must be admitted that he has the experience that is needed to do this job. He knows how to do a job when he takes on a job as a result of 20 years' experience. He says that he needs these tools to do the job so I say we should give him the tools to carry on that job.

This brings me to another contradictory point. I am frankly amazed at some of my hon. friends who sit on the Conservative benches. Not only do they blow hot and cold as to the world emergency, not only do they say one day that we need a bigger air force and so on and then the next day say that we need no Defence Production Act at all, I believe they even—

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the hon. gentleman what member in this house has said that there was no need for the Defence Production Act?

Mr. Philpott: Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. member for Eglinton because in his 110-minute speech—

Mr. Knowles: 101 minutes.

Mr. Philpott: —he said so much that meant so little that I came to the conclusion his speech was full of sound and fury, signifying nothing. The Minister of Defence Production says he needs these tools to do the job. I say, let us give him the tools and let him finish the job. To get back to the point, my hon. friend is blowing hot and cold. In one breath we are told by the usually intelligent member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that the Minister of Defence Production is thirsting and lusting for power. Then we are told by some other member sitting on the same side of the house that it will be a sorry day for Canada when the present Minister of Defence Production has to give up his job.

The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) says that it will be such a sorry day for Canada that we will have to have two men to do the job that is now being done by one man, the Minister of Defence Production. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) must be needed in Toronto today, because he is away; but he has said that before very long Mr. Howe will have to step down, and when Mr. Howe steps down, they say, there will be some hope for the good old Tories at long last. I might say, what a vain hope! But we will let that pass.

Today we have to answer some very simple questions. Is there a world emergency? Of course there is a world emergency. Is Canada vitally concerned in the world emergency? Of course, Canada is vitally concerned in the world emergency. Do we need a ministry of defence production? Of course, we need a ministry of defence production. Do we need to make that department stable? How else can you have an efficient department? How else can you have people work for you willingly unless you make it stable?

Then I come to the final pièce de résistance of my hon. friends, the illogical members of the main opposition, who say, "Let us forget all about this Defence Production Act and wipe it off the statute books; after all, if anything very bad happens, let us invoke the War Measures Act." I have heard that from four different sources.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman if he is suggesting that some member in this house has said that the War Measures Act should be invoked? No member in this debate has said the War Measures Act should be invoked. On the contrary, the hope was expressed that the conditions would never arise under which the War Measures Act could be invoked.

Mr. Philpott: If my hon. friend had listened more and said less in the debate during the last two days, he would have noticed that on at least four different occasions members of the opposition have said that if we abolish the Defence Production Act, in case of need the War Measures Act—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, there must be some limit to the continued inaccuracies of the member for Vancouver South. No hon. member has stated or implied what he has just stated, and he knows it. He knows perfectly well that what has been said is that, if the circumstances of a condition of war arise, the War Measures Act is on the statute books. He knows perfectly well that the hon. members on this side have stated that they want the defence production department to be made permanent, but they do not want it to be made permanent with unlimited powers.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I hope you will note that the Leader of the Opposition has now spoken in this debate.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: If so, how can the hon. member for Vancouver South speak again?

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Speaker, if I have misunderstood what I certainly took to be the plain meaning of the several statements of the opposition, all I can say is that it proves the words from the Holy Book of Wisdom, which says "In a multitude of words there is want of wisdom". Certainly that was my reading of what several members of the opposition said.

Mr. Fleming: You were not even in the house to listen.

Mr. Philpott: They say that if we abolish the Defence Production Act we can put our sole reliance on the War Measures Act, that we could invoke the War Measures Act if and when some particular necessity arises to give the government some emergency powers. I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that by invoking the War Measures Act before there is a condition of actual war in the world we would ourselves have contributed most terribly and disastrously perhaps to the very world crisis which we are endeavouring to avert.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the hon. member is not permitted to leave an inference on the record which is wholly inconsistent with the facts. He should know, if he does not know, that the War Measures Act can be invoked only in the event of war or apprehended war, and he should not seek to leave on the record of this house an impression which he knows, or should know, is completely unrelated to the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: They cannot take it.

Mr. Philpott: I can thoroughly agree with my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, that it would be a most disastrous and fallacious thing for this house to abolish the Defence Production Act and leave ourselves totally dependent on the War Measures Act, which we could not invoke unless there was an actual war, without gravely aggravating the present world crisis. I have tried to listen very carefully to the words of the hon. members of the opposition. Of course, I admit that at times I am confused by the two wings of the opposition. There are two wings to our Conservative opposition over here. There are the Conservatives with whiskers still and the Conservatives to my extreme right with their whiskers shaved off but under certain circumstances their whiskers would grow again very quickly.

Mr. Harkness: That remark shows how little you appreciate the situation.

Mr. Philpott: We do not often get assistance from the two wings of the Conservative party in this house. The only concrete suggestion I have heard from the members of the official Conservative opposition in this house is that there should be a cut-off date in this Defence Production Act.

Mr. Fleming: No, in the powers.

Mr. Philpott: I for one have listened for two whole days, waiting for some member of the official Conservative opposition either to move an amendment or to make a concrete suggestion so that we would have something to go on in this house, but all they do is complain and continue to go around in circles.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the few interventions in this debate by members of the government and by members of other opposition groups have not done very much to clarify the issue which is involved here.

An hon. Member: The confusion is created by the official opposition.

Mr. Michener: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seemed to leave the impression that the issue was the length of time which had been taken by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in his very clear and able posing of the issue which is before the house.

Mr. Knowles: One hundred and one minutes without telling us where he stood.

Mr. Michener: That seemed to be the issue in the member's mind, the length of time in which the hon. member for Eglinton clearly raised the issue as it is seen by members of this party. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott), who has just spoken, very cleverly has avoided the issue which has been raised by most of the opposition speakers. He has failed to discuss the powers which are carried forward in this bill, other than to call them tools. That is a very glib and easy way of disposing of the issue. By using a pat phrase, "give the minister the tools" he has, as he thinks, disposed of the issue. But the bill we have before us is Bill No. 256, to amend the Defence Production Act. The bill itself is quite simple in its terms. May I refer to the substance of the bill. One part of it deals with the minister's salary—which is not an issue—and the other part extends the Defence Production Act.

It may be repetitious but it seems to be necessary to repeat that the matter of extension of the Department of Defence Production is not an issue. If that were the entire content of the bill—or that plus the salary—there would be no issue before the house. The issue is not either of those matters. We agree on them. I agree with the argument put forward by the minister that there is a necessity for the Department of Defence Production or some such department. I agree that it must have a lifetime ahead of it and not be subject to termination if it is to be staffed with people of the competence required in such an important undertaking, and that therefore it is not satisfactory from the departmental point of view to be labouring under a deadline. I agree that such a department and its co-operation with industry in this country with a view to remaining on a defence footing is an essential and desirable objective, and it is something upon which I suggest all parties in this house would agree.

As has been clearly stated, the disagreement arises with respect to the powers which the government appears to have considered to be necessary to carry on the Department of Defence Production and for it to do its business. In other words, the issue before the house is the issue of the perpetuation of emergency powers, not only of the minister but of the governor in council, which powers are in fact emergency powers but are not defined as such and are not based on any declaration of emergency, as has been pointed out this morning.

[Mr. Michener.]

We have had in this country 15 years of experience of emergency powers. That is plenty of time in which to form an opinion of the necessity for and the circumstances in which those powers are necessary; how they operate; and what their effect is on the economy, the people of the country, the constitution, business and industry, and private rights and liberties. All of these things have been the subject of observation as the result of the exercise for 15 years—since 1940 or 1939—of emergency powers.

The authority for the exercise of those powers still exists, as has been well pointed out, in the War Measures Act; and those powers can be invoked again, if necessary. They have existed under the War Measures Act, under the emergency powers act, under various acts of parliament such as the ones creating the department of munitions and supply, defence supplies and others which were passed in the circumstances of a conflict which was an all-out contest between the western democratic countries and powers organized on totalitarian lines. I believe that every Canadian agreed with and endorsed the organization of Canada in a centralized or what one might properly call a totalitarian organization which was necessary in the circumstances to combat a similar mobilization of the entire resources of the nations with whom we were fighting. That centralization and concentration of emergency power continued, Mr. Speaker, after the war was over. It has been the subject of strong and, at times, acrimonious debate in this house, as to whether the necessity continues for those powers.

Well might the subject give rise to such debate because the powers which were exercised by the federal authority went far beyond its normal constitutional powers and it looked as though Canada were taking a shape and substance which was by no means normal for a democratic society. In other words, it looked as though it was assuming the permanent character and organization of a wartime economy. It was proper that that trend should be questioned because, as I say, the powers which were exercised by the federal authority went deep into the lives of the Canadian people, and went far beyond any authority which had been exercised by federal power prior to that date.

Examples will readily occur to the mind. The federal government acquired authority over rental which is purely a matter of provincial control. We all remember that the rent control regulations reached into the farthest villages of Canada and dealt with matters which are not the subject of federal legislation in normal times. The same thing happened with regard to private property, which was dealt with in great particularity. I recall an instance in which a farmer up in northern Ontario was unable, without authority from Ottawa, to kill a pig he had on his farm for his own use. That authority was required under control orders of that time dealing with the use of livestock. We all remember that if a suit of clothes was to be made, the federal government prescribed how many pockets it should have and whether or not there would be a cuff on the trousers. We had the most minute control and regulation of affairs centralized in Ottawa.

It was naturally the desire of all Canadians to enjoy, in their personal affairs and in their property affairs, as much personal freedom as was consistent with the public interest and to be relieved of that great mass of regulations and controls. It was the desire of the municipalities and of the provinces to be restored to their normal authority under the constitution. Hence, when the fighting ceased, pressure was brought to bear to remove these extraordinary and emergency powers; and they have been removed, bit by bit. I suggest that we have before us today the last of the emergency powers of substantial proportions. As the minister has said, the emergency powers act itself was liquidated two years ago. In those circumstances I suggest that the government is under the onus of making a strong case before it asks parliament to continue these emergency powers. As I have said, this is the last of the emergency powers. These powers are due to expire on July 31 of next year. If they are to be continued, we should have some justification for their continuance. We are not asked to continue them for another period, even; we are asked to continue these powers indefinitely. It is therefore a perpetuation of what began in an emergency and should be limited to an emergency.

The question is whether there is today an emergency of such a nature as justifies the continuance of the powers for a period of time. There may be justification for a temporary continuance of these powers but the case has not been put to us in that way. We are asked to give a perpetual life to these emergency powers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the principal objection and one of the main reasons why the government is under an onus to make a very clear case is that these powers interfere very deeply with the normal freedom of a citizen to deal with his property. The minister has indicated, rightly I believe, that there is no attempt to deal with Canadian citizens directly. In other words, there is no power to imprison or to order the person directly, but there are a great many indirect powers which affect personal rights, mainly the personal rights of property which have been enjoyed and which are the bulwark of this Canadian society. In my opinion you cannot continue to have a free society unless the people have economic independence and freedom which is not in any way dependent on the government. We have had, and we have submitted to, a condition of economic dependence for these few years which, if it were continued, would soon lead directly into some form of state socialism or state authority of a kind which is not consistent with free enterprise such as this country has enjoyed and should continue to enjoy in the future.

There are really very important issues involved, although they perhaps do not appear on the surface. It has been pointed out that this kind of control does commend itself to those who give a greater role to the state in peacetime, the socialists, who would organize affairs more completely through the state and who are prepared to nationalize a good part of industry. They do not seem to be concerned when authority of this kind is given to the state. This is because their political theories and views run in that direction. My whole belief is of a contrary nature. I believe that economic independence is essential to any kind of personal freedom in any democratic country. If everyone is dependent on the state there can be no survival of individual liberty.

What is the justification that has been put forward by the minister for these powers? I think it is stated perhaps as concisely as anywhere at page 4512 of Hansard for June 2, 1955.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Is the hon. member talking about the economic independence of the unemployed?

Mr. Michener: I shall deal with my friend's interjection in due course, but I prefer not to be interrupted at this stage. The minister says this:

> I can tell this house that generally speaking a government order does not receive the same attention as a privately placed order.

In my opinion this is a most astonishing assertion, and one that in my experience I have never found to be true.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): How much experience have you had?

Mr. Michener: I have had quite a bit. I have lived my whole lifetime in this country, and I do not think the minister can make the same assertion.

> The reason is that generally speaking the government cannot put on as much pressure as does the private buyer. That has been my experience, and that was my experience in buying for our defence procurement during the years when I had no act to support me.

The minister puts that forward as a reason for the need for these powers. What does he want to buy that he cannot procure? I have been looking at the Defence Production Act to see what kind of things are mentioned there. We all know in a general way what kind of things are essential to defence. Although we do not know the details of modern weapons, we do know in a general way what is needed and what prospects there are of procuring them on a normal basis of purchase without having to advance upon the supplier with the payment in one hand and a big stick in the other. Really that is the proposition the minister puts forward, that he and his department cannot obtain the supplies they need on the basis of free trade in the open market. He must have a club with which he can belt the supplier if he is not prepared to deal.

Now, what is it the government needs to obtain through this department? There are a great many elements that enter into defence, in fact defence could cover everything that is the subject of commerce. If one considers the definition in the act in its broadest terms, one finds it covers articles of all kinds. In these days perhaps even cosmetics would be covered as a necessary part of defence supplies because we now have women in the armed services. However, the main items are such things as ships. Under this government our shipping has gotten into such a condition that many ships are fleeing Canadian registry. We have a very small merchant marine left. There is no inducement to the ship owner to build for profit in this country, so the shipyards are only too ready to supply the government with such ships as may be needed. In my opinion there is no case made out for any problem in securing such ships as are required for defence.

Then, we come to the next item, motor vehicles. I do not think the minister suggests that the Department of Defence Production cannot be supplied with all the motor vehicles the industry is capable of making. The industry is only too ready and willing to supply such vehicles. Aircraft are in a different category because for the most part the aircraft industry seems to be dependent on government orders. There is no possibility of a sufficient volume of private sales to maintain an independent aircraft industry. Surely, however, there is no need to do more than has been done in the normal process of subsidization and other processes which have been used with such great corporations as Avro. Incidentally, this morning I saw an announcement that Avro was purchasing all the stock of Canadian Car. We shall have, therefore, one great concern that will comprise the main source of aircraft and engine supplies for the Department of Defence Production. It does not strike one, at least from the outside, and the minister has not given any convincing proof from the inside, that there is any real necessity for more than the normal processes of commerce to secure this kind of equipment.

I believe the same remarks apply to electronics in this country. They are an important element, but there are a great many manufacturers who would be only too ready to make a profit on a government contract. There is no need to do more than offer them contracts to get the materials that are needed. In so far as textiles are concerned, we all know that the textile manufacturers, like the shipbuilders, are in such a condition today they would welcome substantial contracts to keep them in employment. There is no need to hold a stick over the head of any textile manufacturer in this country today to get him to accept an order. The same is true in connection with the production of metals. The mines of the country are all operating as freely as they can. Even the uranium supply, which is beginning to flow out of our Canadian mines, apparently is not much needed in Canada at the moment. It can be secured if it is needed; but as I understand it, a government agency is purchasing most if not all of the uranium for American account.

As I say, there is no problem in connection with getting metals, even uranium. And certainly the same applies to food, so far as it enters into defence. We have surpluses which have been a problem to the minister in his other capacities.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask the hon. member a question? If there is no problem, then why have the Department of Defence Production?

Mr. Michener: I recognize that these things have to be procured as required by some agency. To my mind the Department of Defence Production has two functions, one of which is simply that of purchasing or to get the materials needed. The other is the function of developing new types of defence materials according to specifications of defence research. And perhaps there is a third function, that of retaining the capacity to produce in wartime those things which are not normally produced in quantity in peacetime.

But none of these things involves anything more than the willingness of the government to pay. It is clear that parliament is prepared to pay for what is needed for defence purposes. The defence estimates have been voted year in and year out in these times without any question as to the amount required. And it has been basing its defence estimates, not on any emergency quick-time procurement, but on a long-range five-year plan of procurement which does not give the impression to me, at least, that there is any emergency in connection with the obtaining of defence supplies, the setting up of defence projects, or any of the matters within the competence of the department, as it now functions.

The fact that there is no emergency of the kind which warrants our allowing these powers to continue is demonstrated by the government's attitude toward manpower for defence. There has been no attempt to draft manpower, and no concern that that aspect of defence, a very important one, presents an emergency condition, or that that aspect of defence requires compulsion of the kind asked for in this other aspect.

I have dealt with what seems to be the central issue, and that is the continuation of these powers. There have been suggestions, in which I concur, that this bill be split. The minister himself suggested that he had consulted the Department of Justice to see whether that was possible. His answer that it is not possible does not strike me as being convincing. It is clearly possible to continue the department with certain limited powers, such as are normal in any departmental administration, but without these extraordinary powers which have been set out by speaker after speaker.

Not only are they powers of the minister, or of the governor in council, but they are powers also of anyone the minister may see fit to appoint. The extraordinary feature about this act is that anyone named by the minister may, under his direction, do any of the things he may do himself. And the things he may do, in the realm of property at least, amount to complete control of the production of the country that may be used for defence purposes.

The initial description of the minister's powers, as they are contained in section 11, are in terms just as broad as that, when the section says:

> The minister shall examine into, organize, mobilize and conserve the resources of Canada—

I repeat the words "organize, mobilize and conserve the resources of Canada". Those are laudable objectives and, if they are accomplished in the ordinary way, well and good. But to have them accomplished by decree of the government which goes as far as to permit the breaking of contracts, the subject of provincial legislation, and without compensation, and at the same time absolving people of their obligations, both contractual and statutory, is as broad a power as I have ever heard given.

It seems to me that statutory obligations and powers imposed by parliament should be dissolved only by parliament itself. I do not think it is necessary to indicate the extent of the powers given, because that was done thoroughly by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). However, before leaving entirely this subject of powers I would point out that, under section 5, not only appointees of the minister may carry out any act or exercise any power he has, but that in addition he may set up corporations ad lib.—and has, in fact, set up a great many corporations—which may exercise and carry out his powers.

Then, in section 8(2), the minister may contract with any person to act as an agent. That is obviously designed to operate outside the department. So he is permitted to give the character of the Minister of Defence Production to someone who may not even be a public servant, who has not been elected in any representative capacity and is not a member of the House of Commons. He may not be a member of the public service at all, but someone completely outside it. And yet such person could exercise all the powers of a minister of the crown acting as an agent of Her Majesty.

I think the real reason for the request now made could best be described as a habit of governmental practice acquired over a period of 15 years. It is a habit which the minister does not wish readily to abandon. If these powers are dissolved, then so far as I know at the moment it dissolves the last of those emergency powers which have been exercised for a very considerable time, not only by the government but by the minister whose department it is. And in his person we see the continuity of that exercise of a wide and overriding authority which has gone on for such a long time that neither he nor any of his colleagues apparently can contemplate its discontinuance.

Therefore, although the reason for such power has gone and the need for it has not been demonstrated, we are asked to continue the authority. That brings me to a few remarks which I feel it my duty to make about the minister himself because, although it is a problem of the future, we are dealing with a department which may or may not have the Minister of Trade and Commerce as its minister, and therefore we are handing authority to unknown quantities. We do know that this measure is brought forward by a man who has been the focal point of Canadian industrial activity for a long period of 15 years, and has exercised more authority than any other man in the history of Canada. That is regarded by some people as a good thing, and by others as not so good. It depends on the point of view. No one detracts from the job which the minister has done in organizing Canadian industry on a war footing. I do not wish to detract from that myself. However, I am not one of those who feel that because we have had one good custom we must follow it indefinitely. If we are to believe the poets, we have to make changes "lest one good custom should corrupt the world". There is as much truth as poetry in that. It is not desirable that any one person in his own hands should exercise and wield so much power for so long a time. Therefore, we find today that the minister who is regarded by some as the patron saint of Canadian industry—and certainly he has been the best customer of Canadian industry—is regarded by others as an arbiter, an autocrat and a czar of Canadian industry.

If these powers are continued it will be possible for the minister to continue to play that role in the years to come. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, that is not a desirable thing. We have submitted to five years of what might be called absolute authority over Canadian industry. Businessmen had very little choice in their actions during that period. In fact, if they came within the essential realm they had no choice and they were perforce dealing with the government of Canada as their principal customer.

That was followed by a period of not quite so intense control, which has continued to the present time. Even today the businessman of this country has to be very careful of his relationships with the government because of the authorities which exist in this act, and authorities of that kind which have existed in the past. It is not possible for a man to be independent in these circumstances, or as independent as he would wish to be, and that extends not only to what is normally regarded as munitions and supply and defence industry but into all the collateral industries that are connected in any way with defence production. There are a great many others. It goes through the whole breadth of the manufacturing industries of the country. If for no other reason than that, it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the justification which this house should have for the continuation of that state of affairs has not been forthcoming.

It is not easy for those who resent or resist these influences and would like to see them curtailed to say anything, and it is the duty of their representatives in the house to speak for them in that respect. The man in business who is so directly connected with the government has no freedom to express himself, and it is not limited to defence. The minister's authority has extended throughout the realm of trade and commerce, which involves imports. At one time it was necessary to have export licences which involved exports which were under control. It involves a great deal of the commerce of the country. The fact that the same person is the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Defence Production does not help the situation at all at this time. In addition to that, the same minister has the responsibility for the western farmers almost completely in his hands. There is hardly a farmer in western Canada who does not have all his products taken by this government and sold for him and the returns paid to him, and all under the direction of this same minister. Therefore, I say, much as one will give credit to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Defence Production and the minister of munitions and supply and the head of many other agencies, corporations and instruments of government, much as one will credit him with the accomplishments that have taken place, it becomes necessary to consider the cumulative effect of these authorities on the country and on the state of mind of the businessmen of the country.

I am rather astonished that those who call themselves Liberals and claim a liberal view of our economy and of our personal relations with government have submitted and are willing to submit to so much centralization of authority, even though it may have been exercised so well. The practice is not justification for the principle which is being followed by this kind of legislation.

Will you call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): May I point out at this moment that if the hon. gentleman wishes me to call it one o'clock it will then be my duty to tell him that his time has expired.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1955-56

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1956, was presented by Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARY OF MINISTER AND EXPIRY OF ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe, Port Arthur (for Mr. St. Laurent) for the second reading of Bill No. 256, to amend the Defence Production Act.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have sat here for the past couple of days and listened with great attention and some profit to the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill. The thing that struck me most forcibly was that there was no issue as far as most of the official opposition speakers were concerned, and in my judgment a controversy must have an issue. They were not prepared to say that we should not have legislation of this type; they were registering complaints rather than raising an issue or making concrete proposals to offset the legislation before the house.

I always like to listen to the last speaker for the official opposition because you get the impression that at least he means what he says. He was very earnest in his presentation and he did clearly point up the issue that he had in his mind. In my judgment that issue was that the house should determine the rights of private property as against the security of the state. This was the ground put forth by the hon. member and in my judgment that is the issue before the house.

The first question we will have to ask ourselves is whether it is necessary to have this type of legislation. With his long experience in this field I am sure that the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) would not come before this house to ask for this kind of bill unless he had a good reason for so doing. In my judgment all this talk about dictatorship and the loss of democracy is denied by the very discussion that has taken place on this subject. The minister has come before the house and given hon. members representing all the people of Canada an opportunity to discuss the advisability of granting to him the modified amount of authority over the economy of Canada which he is asking for in this bill. That is all it amounts to.

In my opinion this type of legislation is made necessary because big business begets big government. When you examine the economic processes outside of this house you find that during the past 20 years the practice has been to take a dozen or score of small companies that have been functioning as separate units and amalgamate them under a charter from the government. Nobody has objected from that source to that type of thing. By getting a charter which gives them practically unlimited powers in certain economic fields they can water their stock, squeeze out the small shareholders and in effect control the destinies of the communities in which they operate. That in turn forces the government which is responsible to the people to develop the same type of organization in order to be able to meet those who manage the economy of the country on the outside on common terms in the event of an emergency.

To suggest that we should not have this kind of law or that the minister should not be given this type of authority in an emergency is to argue against the very basis of law itself. We have laws against bank burglars, not because we want to enforce them but because we know there are people in our society who will commit that type of crime if they think they can get away with it. We impose the penalty of capital punishment in the case of murder, not because our lawmakers want to enforce that law and hang people but because it might act as a deterrent. It is a notification to all those who might violate the laws of society that there are penalties which will be imposed when such crimes are committed.

We establish procedure for the reading of the riot act under our Criminal Code, not to promote riots or because we want to enforce that law but as a penalty in the event of something like that happening. That is the principle which runs through all our law, and there is no difference in this case.

Is there a reason why this should be done? Is it, as has been suggested by the official opposition, that the minister is merely looking for power? Is there any reason why he should do this? What precedents exist arising out of his own experience that tell the minister that he has to have this kind of thing? We have precedents but I do not intend to go over them at this time.

I sat in this house from 1940 during the years of the war and I saw where this government had to place a controller in one of our national steel companies because they were not playing ball in the emergency. I saw them put a controller in the Montreal tramways in order that transportation in that particular city might not be scuttled and defence industries tied up as a result. Another example is that mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the profits limitation act. While the house was not in session the minister was forced to repeal by order in council a statute of this country in order that materials which were necessary to war and which were controlled by certain people could be brought into production at a time when the very life of the nation was at stake and the future of the world hung in the balance. I think that example alone is sufficient to justify the minister in asking for this authority.

If the minister is to be responsible he must have authority. If we place the Minister of Defence Production in the position where he must face the circumstances which he is trying to prevent or avoid by this bill, if we give him that responsibility, then we must go along with him and give him the necessary authority. There is no doubt in my mind about that.

In my judgment this bill is designed to prevent sabotage. I am amused when I hear my hon. friends the Conservatives say these powers are not necessary in peacetime. Is this peacetime? When you look at your national defence estimates, right now you will find we are going to give the Department of National Defence $1,769,680,500. Then there is another $5 million in round figures fixed by statute. That certainly does not sound like peace, does it? Then again, if we were sure that there was no danger of war, there would be no need of the defence production department over which the minister presides. There is another $23 million in round figures being voted for this particular department here.

To suggest that the minister is asking for wartime powers in peacetime, in my judgment, is just not being realistic. We believe that these powers are necessary. Why should they be limited? The argument is made that the minister will be in a dictatorial position, that once he gets those powers he can exercise them and no one has any control over him. That is nonsense. This minister has to come to this house once every year with his estimates and account for his department. During that period we can examine that department from top to bottom. Where is the necessity for limitation? There is no more need to limit this department's functions than there is those of any other department of government.

The crux of the problem here is this. We believe in responsible controls. We believe the people of this country who are elected to represent the different ridings across Canada in this house have the right to control and regulate as suggested by this bill in the circumstances for which the bill is designed. What my hon. friends are quarrelling about is that they do not want that power here. They believe that power should remain on the outside with the large corporations. As I said before, as these corporations grow and amalgamate and seize more power over the economic processes of this country, that in turn forces us in this house to accept the responsibility of setting up machinery so that we can at least talk to these people on even terms.

While we believe in responsible controls, my hon. friends the Conservatives believe in irresponsible controls, the right to manage the country on the outside without any reference to the elected representatives of this country. I am sure I would much rather be able to talk to the minister in this house on things that will happen under the terms of this bill to different corporations that I know across this country than I would to try to get in touch with someone in Mount Royal in Montreal over whom I have no control and with whom I have no contact at all.

That is the difference; irresponsible control on the outside, and responsible control on the inside. The question of price controls in this picture is the same question that existed in the profits limitation act; it is the same question that existed when a controller had to be placed in the steel plant in Hamilton. They were not concerned about the emergency of war. They were still thinking in terms of making money.

With regard to this suggestion that contracts can be broken, I say any contract should be broken that interferes with the security of this country.

An hon. Member: Including a labour contract?

Mr. Gillis: Exactly; any contract that interferes with the security of this country should be set to one side during the emergency. There is no doubt about that. There is not one labour man in this country who would disagree with that. I am not unmindful of the fact, either, that during the process of fighting the war one very prominent gentleman who sat in the Senate and was at one time a leader of the Conservative party, made the statement—

Mr. Sinclair: Two times.

Mr. Drew: "Twice" is better grammar.

Mr. Gillis: His attitude to the war was—and this statement was made publicly in the Senate—that I and some of my associates are riding on our oars; if there are no profits to be made out of war there is nothing to fight for. That is not the position taken by the labour men.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before the socialist ally of the government makes any more irregular statements of that kind, he should give the quotation or the source from which he makes that statement. I would recall to his memory, if he has forgotten, that the man about whom he is speaking had two gallant sons in uniform during the war and that he has no reason to be ashamed of his participation in the war.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to look up that reference, he has a bigger research department than I have and he can put it on the record when he has his chance to speak in the debate.

An hon. Member: Where did you find it? Give us that page now.

An hon. Member: You would not find that in the Senate Hansard.

Mr. Gillis: I am making the statement, and it stands until you disprove it.

Mr. Fleming: That is not worthy of you.

Mr. Gillis: The funny thing about my hon. friends the Tories is that I did not mention any names but apparently every one of them knew who it was.

Mr. Fleming: Every one knew that you had not given a correct statement.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, let us keep the debate on an orderly level. The hon. member knows perfectly well that there is only one former leader of this party to whom these remarks could apply, and he is making remarks without any justification and without being prepared to have the courtesy to offer a quotation from some known record.

Mr. Sinclair: There are so many former leaders it is hard to distinguish them.

Mr. Gillis: As I have sat here for the best part of the last two days, I have listened to some crazy statements, but at least I had the courtesy to sit and listen patiently, recognizing the fact that those who were making them had a right to the floor.

Mr. Fleming: When they quoted they gave the sources, and quoted them accurately.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Eglinton, who talked for a long time, certainly read the Defence Production Act in its entirety three times.

Mr. Drew: Obviously he did not read it often enough.

Mr. Gillis: If the quotations had been taken out of his speech, he would not have made any speech at all.

Mr. Fleming: I did it for your benefit.

Mr. Gillis: When I get up here to speak I at least try to express my own opinion—

Mr. Fleming: And your own paraphrase of other people's.

Mr. Gillis: —after having listened to what was said in the house over a long period of time. However, I am merely pointing out the need for this legislation. If the minister has had the experience that many members of the house have had, of having to deal with people who place their own interests and the business of making money above the interests of the country, even in the emergency that existed from 1939 to 1945, then there is just as much justification for placing that legislation on the statute books as there is for writing laws against bank robbers or potential murderers or, as I said before, riot acts and the rest of them. It is not that we want to go out and enforce these laws, but they are there as a deterrent. This law is designed to prevent those who control the economic processes of this country, particularly the materials that are essential to war, from bartering the interests of the nation in order to make profits for themselves. The only people who are afraid of laws are those who are potential lawbreakers.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Gillis: That has always been my approach to any particular law.

Mr. Knowles: Let those whom the cap fits wear it.

Mr. Drew: That is what Hitler said.

Mr. Gillis: Once a democratic law—as this one is—is passed and we know it and it is advertised, if you are a good citizen you will obey that law. I think the fastest way in which to get repeal of a bad law is to enforce it often enough. If this law is bad and it were to be exercised by the minister in the manner suggested by the opposition, I think at the next session of the house it would be repealed. But these powers are not something that is new. I think the powers contained in this particular bill are already contained in the British North America Act.

I do not want to get into the field of arguing law. I believe that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is considered to be a good lawyer. I believe there are others on the other side of the house. At the present time, under the British North America Act the government has the power to declare any work in Canada to be a work in the interests of Canada, if they so desire, and to bring it under the management of the federal government or at least within the scope of federal laws. What is there in this bill that changes that particular picture? As to the matter of conscription, somebody says they never suggest doing that. It is enough to have a law, if they want to enforce it, under which they can requisition the life of every man and woman in this country in an emergency such as that. All they have to do is to invoke the old militia act. They do not do it. It has never been done. But that law is there if it is necessary to use it. The principle contained in this emergency bill is exactly the same as that principle. There is not any difference in it.

I do not think it is serving a particularly good purpose in this country to carry on the kind of debate that we have had carried on, particularly by some of the members who point the finger across the floor of the house and say that the government are seeking dictatorial powers and then stand up and try to kid the people of Canada that this is the kind of action that Hitler took. I do not want to get into that story and I know the Leader of the Opposition does not want to get into it. Anyone who knows the history of the failure of the league of nations and the parties and principles that were responsible for the scuttling of it—it did not fail; it was scuttled—will easily recognize the difference between the members in this house and the people of Canada generally with regard to what was taking place in Europe at that time. It certainly was not the socialists or the liberal-minded people in Europe who pulled the structure of democracy from under Europe and handed it over to a mad dictator such as Hitler. Do not forget this. One of the reasons that I am concerned about getting control over those who manage the economic processes of this country is this. I was closely associated with that league of nations. I followed it all the way through as well as the rise of Hitler to power. I am convinced that the people who had the largest share in tearing down Europe and nearly destroying the world were those who were more concerned about profits for themselves and the sale of their materials, whether for war or otherwise, and not any particular individuals who had any ideas of democracy. When I hear the arguments that have been advanced here to retain outside control as opposed to control by the government in certain fields in emergencies—powers such as are asked for in this bill—I am brought to a realization of where some people would go if they had the opportunity to do so.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made it quite clear that, as far as we are concerned, we are prepared to support this bill. We see no reason to limit it. We can review this bill and the actions of this department and of the minister year by year when his estimates are before the house.

Mr. Trainor: How long is he going to give you?

Mr. Gillis: As long as you want to take. As to the suggestion by some of the opposition members that all of these terrible things are going to happen because of the exercise of that power, may I assure them that if they come before this house at the next session after this bill has been in operation for a year or two years and can then point out an instance where any of the things which they suspect are going to happen have actually happened, this group will be standing alongside of them in asking for repeal of the bill. But at this time we do not anticipate anything like that.

We feel that the kind of world in which we are living today is an uncertain one and that, with the defence expenditures we have today, a department with some powers must be in existence. If you abolish the defence production department, what have you left? You have a couple of billion dollars which go to national defence. Who spends it? The brass hats on the outside spend it to suit themselves. They are not accountable to parliament. In this way we have some control over defence expenditures. I have suggested on a good many occasions that we should have set up a permanent defence committee to examine all of these things all of the time while we are in the circumstances in which we now find ourselves and are obliged to make these huge defence expenditures. But failing that, some control is exercisable over that matter through this department. I do not think the minister is the kind of person whom we cannot trust. Over the years I think he has proven that we can trust him. I believe that if he left the department next week he could be replaced. None of us is indispensable, although there are many people who think they are. I believe the minister has built up a department and has set up the machinery necessary for its functioning. He has officials who know the ramifications of this department thoroughly. Another minister, without a great deal of difficulty, could take his place and manage the machinery that he has set up.

My capable whip has just done a little bit of research. He is fast at it. In order to save the Leader of the Opposition and his overworked staff the necessity of looking up this quotation, I am now going to put it on the record. The Leader of the Opposition asked for it. The date is December 6, 1940, and it is from Senate Hansard, page 57. It is about half way down the page, I may say, so the Leader of the Opposition will not have too much trouble in finding it. I quote—

Mr. Knowles: "And until I indicate otherwise, I shall be quoting."

Mr. Pearson: Who said it?

Mr. Gillis: These are the words of Right Hon. Mr. Meighen:

> I have no sympathy with those who would tax profits at 100 per cent. People will not work for nothing. Human nature is the same in war-time as in peace, and instead of helping the war effort you are defeating it by stripping people of the stimulus to toil and run their business right. Leave the incentive, so that the greater the toil and the greater the success, the greater will be the reward. You have to do that. You do not do it under this bill. I do not exaggerate at all when I say I have had business men by the dozen tell me that they are leaning on their oars: they have nothing to work for. They say: "We might just as well take it a little more easily now, for we are only working for taxes anyway." You will get that result in any case if you take away all incentive to work.

Mr. Drew: I take it that the hon. member would tax profits 100 per cent.

Mr. Gillis: End of quotation. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has asked me if I would tax profits 100 per cent. At the moment we are not talking about an excess profits tax. We are talking now about the desirability of giving the Minister of Defence Production the necessary authority in an emergency to deal with people who place profits for themselves above the national interest. As an indication of the need for a bill of this kind, I quoted a person who had long business experience and long experience as a parliamentarian. He expressed the opinion that, in so far as he was concerned, if there were not profits the businessman was going to lean on his oars regardless of the national interest.

With regard to the taxing of profits 100 per cent, I do not believe anyone ever suggested that. We did suggest that there should not be any profit in war. We did suggest that in case of war normal profits were all that could be expected, and that anything in excess of what was fixed at that time as normal profits should be taxed 100 per cent. In other words, we do not believe in blood money. I would ask my hon. friends who talk about this contract proposition to consider what happens when there is a war. Thousands of patriotic people place the interests of the nation even higher than their own lives. They leave their businesses, their farms and their jobs and take a contract with the country through the national defence department to go to foreign shores and offer their lives. What happens to their contract when they come back? Can they establish their own businesses? Are they sure of their jobs? No; they do not think of themselves. They are not thinking of contracts, they are thinking of the safety of the nation and they are willing to offer their lives for it. I believe anyone who is a responsible citizen of this country would take that attitude, rather than the attitude that was taken in the quotation I have just given.

I would not mind that kind of thing coming from the ordinary industrial tycoon whose only interest was making money and manipulating the stock market, a man to whom money is a god. But when you get it from people who have taken the active part in public life that the particular person referred to has, then it makes one wonder and it should make one very careful of the people to whom the reins of government are handed, as to the motive for which they want to operate the economic processes of the country.

I want to say this, Mr. Speaker. When you talk about freedom and dictatorship, economic freedom is the greatest freedom we can have. That is what we in this group are struggling to achieve. It is the struggle to establish economic freedom that puts me in this group today. Very early in my life I realized that he who controls my job controls me. There is not any economic freedom in the large companies that exist across this country today. There may be 20 or 30 subsidiaries in one corporation, and they are the lords of all they survey. If a subsidiary of theirs in any particular area is not earning the kind of profits they think it should, what do they do about it? Do they consult the public? Do they consult governments as to what they should do? No, they do not. They say, close it down; close that plant or mine or factory, whatever it is. They do not take into consideration the millions and millions of dollars of investment that people generally have in these towns and cities that are built up around particular industries. This particular plant does not make enough money, so we throw it into the discard. Is that dictatorship in the economic field? It surely is. How much freedom have the millions of people who work as wage earners in those industries? The powers the minister requests in this bill are merely powers that are granted by those who are opposing this bill to every executive of every major corporation in this country.

Mr. Harkness: Nonsense.

Mr. Gillis: They wield them indiscriminately. You can go from Vancouver to Cape Breton, and the Leader of the Opposition knows this as well as I do, and you will find ghost towns, lumber ghost towns, mining ghost towns and ghost towns resulting from other industries that were built up and wiped out overnight. There is no social responsibility at all. The human factor does not enter into it. When you ask them what is going to happen to these people who are being thrown into the discard they say, that is not our responsibility; we are operating this industry for a profit. Let the churches or the government look after them.

Well, in my judgment this is one time when the government is making an attempt at least to get the necessary authority to talk to the kind of person who has that kind of mind. I am not going to try to compete with the marathon speeches that were made to my right. I think I have said enough at least to indicate—I have said one thing that the official opposition has not said as yet, how we are going to vote on this bill—that the members of this group are going to vote for this bill as a step in the right direction.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): At the outset, I should like to say a word about the suggestion made a few moments ago in regard to the alleged socialist allies of the government on this matter. I would just say that it seems to me the quickest way to turn the country over to socialism or perhaps communism is to indicate that you would enforce the law in regard to the little man most rigidly and let the larger corporations take advantage of a time of crisis to make large profits which they would not be forced to disgorge. I cannot think of anything that would make people lose faith in our free enterprise system more quickly than an attitude that you would not endeavour to control the larger corporations who had business with the government but you would rigidly enforce the law against the so-called little man.

I would say that the government, in taking the attitude that in times like these, when they are spending fairly close to $2 billion of the taxpayers' money, it wishes to ensure that neither is the money misappropriated nor is advantage taken of the situation to make exorbitant profits, is taking an attitude which is more likely to result in the continued faith of the people in our present system and less likely to cause them to turn them towards socialism.

A few propositions that seem to me very clear have arisen in this debate. One is that the need for a Defence Production Act is not seriously contested under present circumstances. I think members as a whole realize that we are in a period when, along with our allies, we have to spend large sums of money to provide for our defence, and that it is only by doing so that we can hope to have peace, and hope ultimately to get through this period without war taking place.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Another is that it has been found from experience that the best way to spend the vast sums of money which have to be spent and the best way to control our preparations for defence is through a Department of Defence Production headed by a capable minister. And so it seems to me that all members in the house would grant the necessity of continuing this act. No one will say that we can count definitely on when this present period of tension will come to an end. So it seems to me there is no reason for saying that we should not extend the powers indefinitely, as provided in the bill.

In introducing the measure the minister said that if we are going to have a Defence Production Act we should have one that is completely effective. I do not think anyone in the house would say otherwise. What is the use of having a statute setting up a department unless that department is given the power to do a good job, the power to do the job experience has shown can and should be done? I do not think anyone would say that the minister, who has said that the powers in the act are those which experience has shown are absolutely necessary to do the job, has not had the experience which would warrant his giving an opinion in the matter. He has been in charge of this work for almost 16 years. I do not suppose there is anyone in the democratic world who has had as long an experience, or the admitted success in organizing his country for war, as the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) has had.

I do not think anyone on the opposition side of the house would maintain seriously that the minister does not know what he is talking about when he says that this power is necessary, from his experience. I do not think one of them would wish to match his opinion in this field against that of the minister. When the minister says that, I wonder if in their hearts hon. members opposing him really believe that at this stage of the minister's career he is asking for the passage of this measure so that he might have more power? Do they not rather believe in their hearts that he asks for these powers in the act because he wishes to give the nation the benefit of his long experience in the service of our country; that he is asking for them because he really believes them necessary? I fancy most members in the opposition believe that when the minister makes these statements he is speaking his honest opinion.

I am sure one of the reasons the country generally believes that the minister is speaking honestly and should be listened to is that during the time he was in charge of this work the country spent between $17 and $18 billion; and Canadians are proud that with that tremendous expenditure of money, not only was no question raised or allegation made concerning any misappropriation of funds, but there was a definite appreciation that large sums of money that would have been considered an undue profit were recovered by the country. This has meant that the burden upon the people paying the taxes was reduced to that extent. The record of the minister and of the government in administering that $17 or $18 billion, and seeing to it that the taxpayer was protected, is one of which Canadians have a right to be proud.

My understanding of the main objection by the official opposition to the bill is that, by continuing in effect the powers set out in the existing statute, we will be getting away from parliamentary control and the rule of law. Dealing first with parliamentary control, it is my understanding that the official opposition following the war insisted that the emergency powers act should be brought to an end because they said, the government should not have the power to pass laws by order in council giving itself further authority. They said that if the government required certain powers, then it should secure those powers by legislation passed by parliament. They said that under those circumstances they would know what powers the government had, and it could be called to account at each session of parliament. They urged that this would be true responsible government.

This is what the official opposition have been asking for during the last six or seven years. Now that the government is laying down in legislation, section by section, exactly the powers to be given to the minister to carry out his work, they find fault. I wonder if the country will not have grave doubts about the present opposition to this bill, when they see that when the government is doing the very thing the opposition has claimed should be done they now find fault with those very actions.

Those sections giving power to the minister must be administered, and the government is answerable to parliament each year as to the manner of that administration. This, as it has been pointed out, is responsible government. But, in addition to that, the courts are there. If in any way the government does not administer the law in accordance with the act, the courts are there to protect the citizen.

This brings me to the argument about the rule of law. Particular reference was made to this by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). He made special reference to the question of price fixing, as it is provided for in section 31 of the act. My understanding of that section is that the question of price fixing has to do with essential defence material, supplies and defence projects. There seemed to be a suggestion that a government which is spending well over 40 per cent of its entire income in preparing to defend itself would have no right to protect itself if a group of people got together in an endeavour to profit unduly from a situation where such a large amount of money had to be spent. That very situation would not only undermine faith in our system of government, and its adequate powers to handle the problems confronting the country today, but it would destroy faith in the system of free enterprise under which we operate. It would also weaken the effort we are able to make to defend ourselves.

The hon. member for Prince Albert is a lawyer with a distinguished record, and I would have thought he would have been the first to admit that the first and paramount power given to the central government in Canada, when Canada was established as a nation, was the right to defend itself and to take all the necessary steps to that end. I had no doubt in my mind that the fathers of confederation had not overlooked that when they drew up the British North America Act. I was certain that provision appeared in section 91, which gives the overriding jurisdiction to the dominion parliament in various national matters.

Section 91, which without doubt prevails over any provincial power given in section 92—and sometimes it seems to me we overlook the sweeping powers given by this section—says:

> It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

Then we come to heading No. 7, which reads as follows:

> Militia, military and naval service, and defence.

Section 91 concludes by saying:

> And any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

In other words, when this parliament is legislating under the head of defence it has overriding powers regardless of such matters as property and civil rights in the provinces. The decision as to whether legislation passed under this head was intra vires of course would be a matter for the courts. Any suggestion that the constitution is being violated by this legislation and that the courts are being superseded is of course fantastic. For example, if the government takes any action in this regard by stating that certain prices shall be charged for certain essential defence materials, and the courts saw the situation as such that the class of goods for which the government was purporting to fix prices was not such as to bring the action definitely within section 91, they would say so and the action would be set aside. In other words the courts will still be supreme with regard to any action taken under this legislation. Furthermore, if a situation of great emergency were to arise the very declaration of the state of emergency would make this section operative.

What harm then is in it? Why should the official opposition, who have been crying out for years, demanding that parliament be asked to write the different rules and regulations into the statutes, find fault with the fact that this is now to be done, by an act of parliament instead of by an order in council?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this not made under an order in council by the governor in council?

Mr. Tucker: If the order in council is passed under this head and it is not within the powers of Canada, due to the fact that conditions as they exist at the time it is passed are not such as to warrant the exercise of that right, the courts will unhesitatingly set it aside. Undoubtedly circumstances could arise, and I do not think my distinguished and learned friends across the way, and I include the Leader of the Opposition and the whole group, will say that conceivably circumstances could not arise within the next 12 months, under which an order in council passed by virtue of this section would not be held by the courts to be completely within the powers of this parliament.

The same thing applies to the section providing for relief from obligations. Is the strength of a nation to be dissipated by a shortage of essential supplies of some particular article and the country held up for ransom because of that shortage, and then parliament, speaking for the whole of Canada, not to have the right to protect the people of Canada against something like that? I submit that the fathers of confederation, in drawing up our constitution, were not ready to put our parliament in such a helpless position to protect the new nation they were bringing into existence. These powers are there to be used in certain circumstances.

The hon. member for Prince Albert said that investigators could be appointed to look into any defence contract or anything of that nature. That may be done only if it is deemed necessary, for example if it is clear that a person had made an exorbitant profit which he otherwise could be asked to return to the country. I wonder whether the opposition are against the government having that right to protect the taxpayers who find it so hard to pay their taxes and provide for the defence of themselves, their homes and their country. Do they really seriously contend that some large private industry should, if it manages to make an exorbitant profit, be able to say to the government, "Yes, we have done so, but there is nothing you can do about it". I take it from their speeches that they would like the government to be in that helpless position. If they would not like it to be in that helpless position they would support this bill.

The hon. member for Prince Albert drew attention to the section which provides that if a person is being investigated he might have counsel, but if a charge was laid he had the right to have counsel. I was interested to hear what he had to say in that regard. I have here the Inquiries Act which has been in force for a long time. I do not know what the stripe of government was which originally introduced it into parliament. It is chapter 154 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. It refers back to the previous revised statutes. I find that the section which the hon. member for Prince Albert drew attention to is exactly the same as the section in the Inquiries Act which has been in the law of our country for years and years. In other words, the provision in the Defence Production Act does not give the government any greater powers than it already has, in regard to investigating under the Inquiries Act. I should like to read the section to indicate to the house that that is true.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Tucker: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: Will he not agree that there are no powers derived in respect of investigation under the Inquiries Act in favour of the Department of Defence Production unless they are conferred by the Defence Production Act?

Mr. Tucker: I do not admit that at all. If the hon. member will be patient I shall indicate that to him.

Section 2 of the Inquiries Act reads:

> The governor in council may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof.

In other words, under the Inquiries Act, the governor in council can cause an inquiry to be made into any of these questions. It provides that the governor in council may appoint, by a commission, commissioners, and give the commissioners power to summon before them witnesses and require them to give evidence on oath or on solemn affirmation. It goes on to say that the commissioners have the same power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to give evidence as is vested in any court of record in civil cases.

Then there is provision in part II of the act for departmental investigation. Section 12 reads:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

That is exactly the same as in the present Defence Production Act and as stated that has been the law of Canada for years and years. I was very sorry the hon. member for Prince Albert suggested that in some way there was something unusual in this act, at a time when a distinguished member of the government of a commonwealth country was sitting in the gallery. He suggested that in some way parliamentary government was being abrogated in this country by the provision that a person could be appointed to inquire into matters under the Defence Production Act and—

Mr. Fleming: Does the hon. member not appreciate that under the Inquiries Act an inquiry may be instituted only by a decision of the government through an order in council, whereas under section 29 of the Defence Production Act the minister is given power to appoint an investigator who under subsection 2 of section 29 has all the powers conferred on commissioners under the Inquiries Act. In that case he is not receiving them through an order in council passed by the whole government.

Mr. Tucker: In answer to that statement I would suggest that if that is all the criticism the opposition have to offer of this bill, that it is quite all right for the government to set up a commissioner to go into these things by order in council but it is quite wrong for a responsible minister to do the same thing, then that is not consistent with the opposition attitude that the policy of the government is terribly wrong. Where is the fundamental difference which infringes upon the liberty of the subject? And is this the tremendous far-reaching change outlined by the hon. member for Prince Albert? Is that the only basis for attack, the difference between the cabinet doing it or a minister doing it, a minister who is acting as a member of the government of which he can remain a member only if he is satisfactory to the government as a whole and to the Prime Minister? Do they now say it is quite all right to have these powers to summon somebody in front of a commissioner and not give him counsel, if the commissioner does not wish to do so, until a charge is brought against him; that it is all right if it is done by order in council, but if it is done by a responsible minister then it becomes an infringement upon the liberty of the subject?

Mr. Fleming: Who ever said that?

Mr. Tucker: That was the point made by the hon. member for Eglinton, obviously.

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, my hon. friend read section 12 of the Inquiries Act which, while it reads as follows:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel——is altered in effect by the subsequent provisions of that act in general.

Mr. Tucker: The commissioner has the right to summon a person before him, and if he does not come and answer questions he may be prosecuted. It says that in the Inquiries Act, and I shall read it again:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

Let me read the wording of the similar section of the Defence Production Act about which the hon. member for Prince Albert waxed so eloquent this morning. Here is what it says:

> 29. (1) The minister may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause an inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter relating to or incidental to or arising out of a defence contract or any group or series of defence contracts or any dealings in or with defence supplies, and may appoint a person or persons by whom the inquiry shall be conducted.
> (2) An investigator has all the powers conferred on commissioners by sections 4 and 5 of the Inquiries Act or which may be conferred on commissioners under subsection (1) of section 11 thereof.

(3) An investigator may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this act, and shall allow any person against whom a charge is made in the course of such inquiry, to be represented by counsel.

The words as to counsel are exactly the same, yet we had this terrible attack upon the government because a man could be investigated, and while the investigation is going on and before any charge is brought against him he is not to be allowed to speak through counsel. I suggest that if that is so terrible it is a strange thing that this same provision should have been in the Inquiries Act for so long. It is not a new principle. The hon. member for Prince Albert has been a lawyer long enough to know that. If everyone had the right to refuse to answer questions except through counsel the chances of conducting investigations would be very poor. But it is provided that when a charge is going to be laid the person shall have the right to retain counsel. That is one of the fundamental principles of British administration of justice.

A coroner may call persons and examine them and ask them questions as to how certain things happened. I do not think the hon. member for Prince Albert would get very far if he took the attitude that anyone called before a coroner would have the right to speak only through counsel. Obviously the state must have the right to investigate these matters. The British system protects the citizen by providing that nobody shall be accused and put in jeopardy without a chance to have counsel advise him. That right is fully preserved in this act, the same as it is in the Inquiries Act.

Hon. members opposite seem to object to the right to mobilize the industrial facilities of the country in the event it is found necessary to do so. Surely hon. members opposite will not say that it is not a good thing for the government to have that power with the threat of a world war under which we live today. Whether that power is adequately or properly exercised is something for which this parliament can hold the government to account, but surely in the world of today the government should have the right if necessary to mobilize the industrial and economic set-up of the country, to require returns to be made so there may be a check of how defence requirements are being met and whether exorbitant profits are being made. Section 19 of the act reads:

No person is entitled to damages, compensation or other allowance for loss of profit, direct or indirect, arising out of the rescission or termination of a defence contract at any time before it is fully performed if it is rescinded or terminated pursuant to a power contained in the contract or pursuant to a power conferred by or under an act of the parliament of Canada.

I ask hon. members of the opposition what is wrong with that. If I enter into a contract with the government of Canada to provide them with supplies and it is provided that the government has the right to rescind or terminate the contract, that being one of the terms of the contract, why should I ask for damages if the government exercises its powers under the contract? Then it goes on to provide that if the contract is terminated by an act of parliament there shall be no damages. People who enter into these contracts know the government has the power by law to terminate. If through a change in the international situation it is not necessary to spend the millions of dollars involved in defence contracts, surely the government should have the right to terminate them.

Is it not right to put it in the act that the government shall have that power? Then if the contract is terminated the person has no complaint, because he then would know it was the law that it could be terminated and it would be something he took into consideration when he entered into the contract. Why is there anything wrong with that? Is it not just a matter of protecting the interests of the country? I cannot imagine the opposition actually being opposed to that.

Mr. Fleming: Who has expressed opposition to that?

Mr. Tucker: It seemed to me it was being said that the government was asking for dictatorial power. I am running over some of these powers that have been so referred to.

Mr. Fleming: Pick out the sections conferring the powers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Make your own speech.

Mr. Tucker: Another section with which fault was found was that giving the right to make orders appointing controllers, establishing the circumstances under which the government could have the right to appoint a controller. I suggest that under the present circumstances every democratic country in the world that has the same system of government as ours has vested that right in the government. It certainly exists in the government of the United States; it certainly exists in the government of the United Kingdom, and I believe it exists in the governments of Australia and New Zealand. That is the right to appoint a controller of some industry if a crisis should develop under present world circumstances. I wonder if the opposition think the government should not have that right if the appropriate circumstances arose and if, having exercised it, they have to account to parliament for having done so.

With regard to the right to designate materials as essential for defence, under present circumstances does the official opposition really think the government should not have the right to designate the materials that are absolutely essential for defence?

Sections 21 and 22 indicate the sort of bill this is. Section 21 provides in subsection 2 that—

> Where the minister is satisfied, either before or after the performance, in whole or in part, of a defence contract entered into after the 1st day of April, 1951, that the total amount paid or payable thereunder to any person is in excess of the fair and reasonable cost of performing the contract together with a fair and reasonable profit, he may by order reduce the amount that such person is entitled to retain or receive thereunder to such amount as he may fix as the fair and reasonable cost of performing the contract together with a fair and reasonable profit thereon and the minister may direct that person to pay to the Receiver General of Canada forthwith any amount which that person has received under the contract in excess of the amount so fixed.

When this bill is passed it becomes part of the law of Canada. Anybody entering into a contract for defence supplies knows that if it turns out that he has made what may be regarded as more than a fair and reasonable profit, the minister has the right to say, "You must refund the difference". That is part of the basis upon which he enters into the contract. I wonder if the opposition would say the government on behalf of our people should not have that protection and that, no matter how it might turn out, how large the profit might be in supplying something necessary to the defence of our country, the government should not have the right to recover an amount over and above the cost and a fair and reasonable profit.

I have no doubt, if the opposition, under the guise of arguing that this gives the government too much power, vote against this, most people will think they do not want the government to have the power to adequately protect the taxpayers. That is only a fair inference. Surely this right is one that a government should have. When it is spending between 40 per cent and 50 per cent of its entire outlay on defence it should have the right to protect the taxpayer to that extent.

But section 22 goes on to say:

> A person affected by an order or direction made by the minister under section 21 may, within thirty days after the receipt of a copy of the order or direction, inform the minister of his intention to appeal against the order or direction to the Exchequer Court of Canada and shall, within such period of thirty days, file a notice of such intention in the court . . .

Hon. members opposite have had a great deal to say about the government taking the power to do things and putting themselves beyond the jurisdiction of the courts. Here is one of the basic powers in this act, and it is provided that if anybody is dissatisfied with the ruling of the minister in exercising it, he can go to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Only under that section and another section, but the one to which I referred had nothing to do with that; there is no appeal there.

Mr. Tucker: I am dealing with the powers that were found fault with. This is one of the vital powers in the act. It is subject to the right to go to the exchequer court.

Another section, section 23, deals with refusal to co-operate:

> Where a person who has been requested to enter into a defence contract on terms and conditions that the minister considers to be fair and reasonable has refused or failed to enter into the contract, . . . the minister may direct that person . . .

—to comply on terms which are considered to be fair and reasonable. In regard to that particular section, I wonder if the opposition would say that under our present economic set-up, for example, in the automobile industry, where a few people are in charge of the production of vehicles which are just as necessary to defence as guns or anything else, if the time came that somebody would not co-operate on fair and reasonable terms to provide vehicles to put this country in a position to defend itself, the government should be left without any recourse to protect the people it is supposed to protect. I wonder if the opposition would think that the wills of a few of the big captains of industry should be permitted to prevail over the will of the people of Canada as expressed by a duly elected parliament and government. Is that what they say they want, a government so weak that it cannot take the necessary steps to protect the country at a time like this? Is that what they mean by this talk that the government is wanting too much power?

I have yet to see any particular respect in which powers are given in this act with which they can really find fault. A general charge can be made, but I have gone over the sections of the act and dealt with them, and I suggest to the house that these sections are necessary for the proper government of our country at this time. This happens to be a Liberal government, but it is the elected government of the people of Canada, and the members of the opposition should want to see it in a position to protect the interests of the Canadian people just as much as if it were a government of their own party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is my duty to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Tucker: I just wish to say in conclusion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Tucker: I thank the house very much. I shall not take more than a minute. There is one point I wish to make in conclusion. I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members of the opposition section 37. While it provides that the people carrying out their duties under this act cannot be proceeded against, it definitely provides as follows:

Nothing in this section limits or restricts the rights of any person against the crown.

Thus rights are fully preserved, to go to court and to protect the interests of the citizens against the crown.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I submit that for anything done by the government under this act in the realm of interfering with individual liberties they must answer to the courts on the grounds of particular action. For anything that may be done along the lines of general policy they must answer to this parliament and the elected representatives of the people of Canada. I submit that in no way are the rights of the individual diminished or infringed upon except as is necessary to protect our country in these times undoubtedly of great crisis.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he say how he can square section 28 of the act with the statement he has just made, to the effect that there is no trespass on the rights of the individual or on the constitutional position of the provinces?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): People with short memories should not ask that question, because it has been invoked for a purpose that my hon. friend should recall.

Mr. Fleming: I am asking the question for the benefit and the information of the minister.

Mr. Tucker: I have been asked a question with regard to section 28, which reads as follows:

28 (1) The governor in council may, by order, direct that a person shall not be bound by any obligation, restriction or limitation imposed on that person by or under any statute, order, rule, regulation, by-law, or contract with respect to such matters as may be specified in the order affecting the entry into or performance of a defence contract by that person or the carrying out of an order made by the minister under this act.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. Fleming: And subsection 2.

Mr. Tucker: It goes on to state:

(2) Where the failure to fulfil any contract, whether entered into before or after the 1st day of April, 1951, is due to the compliance on the part of any person with any provision of this act or any order or regulation, proof of that fact shall be a good defence to any action or proceeding in respect of the failure.

With regard to that section, I was asked whether I said that did not entrench upon the powers of a province. My answer to that question is this. If any action is taken under this section that in any way infringes upon the rights of a province under the constitution, all they have to do is go to the courts about it and that action, if actually such an infringement, will be ruled to be ultra vires.

Mr. Drew: If the hon. member thinks this would be ultra vires, why is he supporting sections that are themselves ultra vires, in his opinion?

Mr. Tucker: I am saying this, and I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition was in the chamber when I was speaking—

Mr. Drew: I have not been out of it.

Mr. Tucker: This is to be a permanent act now. I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that conditions might arise which would be different from those of today. Whereas today certain sections of the act might be ruled by the courts to be ultra vires, conditions might arise during the life of this act, which is indefinite, whereby without any doubt these powers would be regarded as intra vires of the government of Canada. For example, a declaration of national emergency would bring all these powers into full force and effect without any question, and there is nothing to prevent that declaration being made if conditions so warranted.

Mr. Fleming: But lacking that declaration now in this legislation are we to understand the hon. gentleman to say that under existing circumstances if any order is made—

An hon. Member: We are not in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid I shall have to point out to hon. members that we are not in committee, and that the hon. member had extended time by unanimous consent.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, in spite of all the charges and countercharges that have been flung back and forward across this chamber today, it would appear that all the groups in this house are in agreement on one thing, namely that the Department of Defence Production should be continued. What the disagreement seems to be about is the continuation of the unusual powers contained in the act. I think the key to the whole thing could be summed up in the words used by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) just a few moments ago when he said, "in times like these".

I do not think anyone in this house would have any complaints whatsoever about the government having the powers laid down in the Defence Production Act in times of emergency. Certainly I would not. What I object to is that those extreme powers are being held and can be used by the government and by the minister not only in times of extreme emergency but at any time they desire to invoke them. There is no doubt that the terms of the defence production bill allow the Minister of Defence Production to control all phases of life in this country at any time he desires to enforce the terms of this act. In other words it could be a virtual dictatorship if the minister should decide to make it so.

Mr. Hansell: Or if his successor wished to make it so.

Mr. Thomas: Yes. I was going to say that; or any other minister who might come after him.

There should not be on the statute books any law which will allow to creep in abuses which could oppress the people of this country. That is the thing in this defence production bill that we are protesting against most strongly.

In introducing the original act the Prime Minister said there were some sections that should not be permanent. The Minister of Defence Production made the same statement. But now they seem determined to make them permanent, in spite of all the objections from those on this side of the house. We want to know what ones are objectionable, and we want to know what changes have occurred over the past three or four years which make it necessary to make these sections permanent now, when it was felt that they should not be permanent in a time of emergency and preparation for the Korean conflict.

As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said the other night in speaking on that matter, if the government feel that these special powers are necessary at this time—and I am not going to argue with them on that score; maybe they are—they should make provision in the act to allow parliament to periodically review the need for these special powers, preferably every year or two. If that is done, then the parliament of Canada at given intervals could determine whether or not the powers of this department are necessary.

It is all right to say we can discuss this matter on the estimates and that we can cut down the minister's money if we feel that he is abusing his powers. Let us face the facts. Who is going to deny to the minister the money to make this country secure, even though we dislike the policy that department of government is carrying out? These powers could be—I am not saying they would be—used to pressure any person or any group of persons or any business into submission simply by threatening to invoke this act and make the products of any industry necessary for the defence of Canada.

I do not like any legislation, indeed I fear it, which gives any person or persons the right to oppress the people of Canada, whether or not they are going to use those powers. The powers are there and they can be used if anyone not quite as sincere and honest as is the Prime Minister should decide to do so.

The hon. member for Nanaimo, speaking yesterday, said we did not have the nerve to move amendments to the act. It is quite apparent that he was not listening too carefully when the hon. member for Peace River spoke the other night, because the hon. member for Peace River, in making his statement, said this:

> I think the right thing for us to do would be to support those things which the minister requires and which are right, but also to serve warning that when the bill is in committee we will move for the deletion of clause 2, which repeals section 41 of the act, and offer an amendment to make it mandatory upon the government to bring the act back to this house for complete periodic review and scrutiny. We are unalterably opposed, may I repeat, to the granting to the minister and his department of unusual powers on a permanent basis, and against that we will continue to fight.

This quotation will be found on page 4540 of Hansard for June 8 of this year. As the minister said, this is a simple bill. It is short in length but extremely long in implication. This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) and other members as well, speaking from the C.C.F. or Liberal side of the house, said the question we should ask is this. Is there a world emergency? I do not think that is the question that should be asked at this time, because there is a world emergency now; and since there is a world emergency probably the minister needs the powers set out in the Defence Production Act at the present time.

The question that should have been asked by hon. members is this. Is there a permanent world emergency? Let us hope not. If there is not a permanent world emergency, then there is no necessity for making this act permanent.

Mr. Nicholson: When is it going to end?

Mr. Thomas: We do not know when it is going to end. The solution is for the minister to ask for an extension of the act, as he has been doing. It expires in 1956, and he should ask for a four or five year extension if he so desires. If in the meantime it is desired to make the Department of Defence Production a permanent department, then that could be done under a special act without these special powers, and these special powers could be made a sort of appendix to the act.

It has been charged by at least two speakers, I think, that we have opposed the continuation of this department. I hope this afternoon I have made it quite clear that we do not oppose the continuation of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. McIlraith: Why not vote for the bill, then, and take up the other points in committee?

Mr. Thomas: I have told the hon. member what we were going to do in committee.

Mr. McIlraith: Why do you not vote for the bill, and get it into committee?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. member can make his statement later. I am going to say this, and I shall repeat it for the hon. member's information. There has been no Social Crediter who has ever said the department should be discontinued.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. Thomas: That should be clear enough, I think. But let us have adequate control by parliament. As to the length of time there may be a necessity for these unusual powers in the act, let us have something of the nature that was requested at the resolution stage, giving us the right to periodically dig into the department to see whether or not the department should continue to have the same powers.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, that great parader of red herring, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), really excelled himself a few moments ago and paraded before us a whole procession of red whales to confuse the issue. He was not content with that smaller breed of fish usually referred to in this regard. One would think from the hon. member for Rosthern's remarks that no defence arrangements whatever could go ahead in this country unless this bill were passed and the Minister of Defence Production were given a free hand. One would think from the hon. member's speech that this bill was essential to prevent wholesale profiteering and other terrible spectres of that nature which he conjured up from his imagination. One would think from his speech that this bill was essential to protect the liberties and pocketbooks of the taxpayers. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what could be further from the real facts than all those red herrings which the hon. member for Rosthern paraded before us in his usual loud voice?

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to get back to the realities of the situation, to get out of this more or less wholly imaginative field into which a number of speakers on the government side and of the C.C.F. seem to have strayed. I think the hon. member for Rosthern, of course, took the palm as far as these imaginative wanderings were concerned.

When the Minister of Defence Production opened this debate on second reading last Tuesday he said this was a simple bill containing only two sections. I will agree that when you look at the bill it is a simple bill. It contains just two short sections. But what is involved in the bill is anything but simple. This is a bill amending the Defence Production Act. Naturally, as with all amending bills, we have to relate the bill which is before us to the act that is amended. So far as the first section of this bill is concerned, which increases the salary of the minister to the usual $15,000, we have of course absolutely no objection. Nobody has, and that does not enter into the argument. As was pointed out by the last speaker, no one has said during this debate that the defence production department should be abolished. I believe everyone is agreed that it should be continued on a permanent basis.

But when it comes to the second section of this bill, which repeals the time limit on the powers contained in the present act, that is a totally different question. It seems to me this second section contains a new, and I think extremely dangerous, principle so far as the government of this country is concerned. We in this party base our opposition to this particular bill on that principle.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Ottawa South (Mr. McIlraith) asked why we did not vote for the bill if the defence production department should be continued on a permanent basis. The reason I am not prepared to vote for the bill, and I think the rest of the members of this party feel the same, is that it contains this principle. I would state the principle in these terms, that the government or the minister shall have extraordinary and dictatorial powers in a time of peace, or at least as close to a time of peace as we are likely to get in the foreseeable future. That principle is definitely embedded in this clause repealing section 41 of the present act. The minister wants to repeal the only saving clause in that act, the one which permits a review of the act by parliament at a specific time.

I believe the whole trend in British countries enjoying the British parliamentary tradition has been that extraordinary powers are given to the government in times of emergency or semi-emergency for a limited period of time, and a limited period of time only. In this particular bill the government proposes to forget all about a time limit and to have embedded in the statutes of this country on a permanent basis these extraordinary powers which the minister and the government would have.

That is the principle involved in this bill, and that is what we object to. It seems to me an extremely dangerous precedent to set, when an effort is made to put on the statute books a measure of this sort without any time limit whatsoever. It would be an admission on the part of this parliament that the ordinary safeguards against the executive becoming too powerful have been forgotten and abrogated. It would seem that the government does not care about those things; but we in this part of the house do care about them, and that is why we are opposing the bill.

It did not seem that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) realized the principle at stake. He never mentioned the principle to which I have drawn attention, but spoke entirely about other things. He was attempting to argue that this is not a period of peace. Well, it may not be a period of peace such as was known before the first great war, or between the first and second wars. But it is certainly a period of peace when compared with what we had between 1939 and 1945 and from 1950 until a few months ago, when the war in Indo-China came to an end. Certainly at the present time there is no hot war in progress that I am aware of.

I say therefore that this is a period of relative peace, or as close to peace as we are likely to get for some time. I suggest we must consider the Defence Production Act from that point of view, and not relate it to a lot of fancied dangers or emergency conditions because we are not back to a situation such as prevailed in Victorian times.

This bill is directly contrary to the accepted tenets of British parliamentary government and the rule of law, as they were taught when I went to university and as I believe they are still taught. It is contrary to what most of us have been taught to accept as the best form of government any country could follow. There can be no doubt that to embed powers of this kind in our statutes on a permanent basis, to be used in time of peace as well as in time of war, is not consonant with the general principles of British parliamentary government.

We have seen what might be called a competition between members of the C.C.F. and of the government in praising the Minister of Defence Production. They have said some very nice things about his qualifications for the job he has done in the last 15 years. I suggest, however, that those considerations should not enter into this discussion at all. It is a red herring. Those who have spoken from the C.C.F. and Liberal parties have been saying that the minister has been a good patriot, has been a good controller of industry, and that we can safely leave things in his hands.

I do not accept all of that; it has been a little too fulsome for me. But, even accepting all that, what does it have to do with the principle of this bill? Absolutely nothing. No matter what may be the qualifications of the minister, those qualifications have nothing to do with embodying in the law of this country a principle which is contrary to the basic ideas of the rule of law and British parliamentary institutions. I can only look upon this competition between members of the C.C.F. and those of the Liberal party, when they praise the minister, as taking place because they have no other argument to offer. They had no real arguments to offer to support the principle of the bill, and neglected to discuss the principle so far as they could. The minister did not deal with the principle involved, either. He glossed over it; and I do not blame him for glossing over it because had he not done so he might have spoiled the case he made, if indeed he made any case. His speech was devoted chiefly to why in his opinion the powers are needed.

Mr. Dickey: What other principle is there in the bill?

Mr. Harkness: I have just dealt with the principle of the bill, but if the hon. member wishes I shall give it again. I have said that I think the principle of the bill is that the government or the minister shall have extraordinary and dictatorial powers in a time of peace and without any time limit. That is the principle involved in the bill, and to that principle we object.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. member a question with reference to his comment about the time limit. I am wondering if he has read section 34 of the Defence Production Act.

Mr. Harkness: I have read it, but offhand I cannot recall exactly what it says. However, after looking at it briefly, as it is now handed to me, it is clear that the hon. member is even more confused than his colleagues who have taken part in the debate.

Mr. Richardson: I was just asking the question.

Mr. Harkness: Section 34 refers only to the annual report.

Mr. Drew: It shows that nothing was done last year by way of special orders.

Mr. McIlraith: Read it out loud.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member wishes to have it read, then I shall read it. It says:

> The minister shall, before the 31st day of March in each year, prepare a report showing the operations of the department during the year last preceding and shall after completion of the report forthwith lay it before parliament, or if parliament is not then sitting, shall lay it before parliament within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

What has that to do with the time limit? I do not know how members on the Liberal side can be so confused and so completely unable to read and understand a section in a statute.

Mr. Dickey: People in glass houses should not throw stones.

Mr. Harkness: I am beginning to understand why we have had some of the speeches in support of the government. If there is no sensibility apparently there is no feeling, and no understanding.

Mr. Dickey: That is more than can be said about the speech we are hearing now.

Mr. Harkness: I was saying that the minister had neglected to discuss the real principle in the bill. He glossed it over in the hope, I suppose, that the rest of us would pay no attention to it either. The greater portion of his speech was devoted to a discussion of why in his opinion the powers are needed. Then he stated that they are not really such extraordinary powers as opposition members have said. As I have said, his speech ignored completely the principle in the bill, and that is why we are offering this opposition.

The minister said that in his opinion there are no provisions in the bill which could be considered contrary to the supremacy of parliament. I submit he is not the best judge of that.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It takes a good lawyer like you, eh?

Mr. Harkness: I think perhaps a number of members in the house might agree that the minister is either the poorest or one of the poorest judges as to what would constitute an infringement on the supremacy of parliament. However, the minister—

Mr. Dickey: What section is infringed?

Mr. Harkness: The minister may be more expert in this regard than I am giving him credit for, because I know he is the author of quite a number of these infringements; therefore he knows something about infringement of the supremacy of parliament from the practical point of view.

Mr. Dickey: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am always ready to permit sensible questions, but I have found that the questions of the hon. member are generally inane and in the circumstances I would prefer to wait until I finish my general remarks, so they will not be broken by these senseless interruptions. At the end of my speech I shall be delighted to answer the hon. member's questions.

Mr. Richardson: On a point of order, the hon. member has just referred to an hon. member of this house as having infringed the supremacy of parliament. Let him make it more specific.

Mr. Harkness: Well, I do not know that the hon. member needs to come to the defence of the Minister of Defence Production, who apparently has not taken issue with that statement. Therefore the hon. member sitting in the far corner has no question of privilege. If anybody has a question of privilege it is the Minister of Defence Production, but he has not raised it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: I might tell the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) it is difficult to follow the orderly development that I was intending because of the various interruptions.

Mr. Herridge: It is difficult for us, too.

Mr. Harkness: I can understand that. It is nearly always difficult for the hon. member to follow anything of a sensible nature. Therefore there is no change in that point of view; it is just normal.

Mr. Herridge: We get very little of it in speeches from the right.

Mr. Harkness: Let there be no doubt that the powers which are contained in the present Defence Production Act, and which the minister wishes to have continued indefinitely by this bill, are extraordinary powers. The minister himself admitted readily enough back in 1951, when the act was introduced, that these were extraordinary powers. He made no bones about it at that time.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Let us read it once again.

Mr. Harkness: If the minister insists.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I love to hear it read. This will be the tenth time.

Mr. Harkness: On this particular occasion, in order to prevent—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is a great contribution, now.

Mr. Fleming: You asked for it.

Mr. Harkness: I am not going to read the quotation you think I am. Lest there be any question that the whole thing is not being read and that it is being wrenched out of context—the minister is very fond of things being wrenched out of context—I shall read all the particular paragraph that is applicable. It is found on page 836 of Hansard of 1951:

> It is proposed that the act would expire on July 31, 1956.

Before I continue with the quotation I should like to point out that all these great cries on the part of the hon. member for Rosthern and others that if this bill were not passed and the minister were not given these powers our whole defence effort would practically crumble up, and we would be in immediate and terrible danger, is complete nonsense. This act will be in effect until a year from this coming July. There is no emergency about this matter; there is nothing to worry about whether we pass this bill or not.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Who is worrying?

Mr. Harkness: I would suggest that the minister—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend is worrying. I do not think anyone else is worrying.

Mr. Harkness: I am not worrying.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I live in Ottawa; I would just as soon stay here all summer.

Mr. Drew: You may have to stay longer than you think.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Rosthern was worrying, and the hon. member for Cape Breton South was worrying. He suggested that if we did not get this bill through the emergency situation is so frightful that the whole economy of the country might collapse. Let me continue the quotation:

> It is proposed that the act would expire on July 31, 1956. There is no particular significance to this date, other than to recognize that some of the powers sought in this bill are special powers which should not be of a continuing nature.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member said he was going to read the whole paragraph.

Mr. Harkness: I shall read it all, if you like.

> Bearing in mind the present situation, and the program which has been announced by my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), a period of five years seems a reasonable minimum for the duration of the act. In the bill, provision is also made for the repeal of the Essential Materials (Defence) Act and for the suspension of the Defence Supplies Act during the period of operation of the Defence Production Act.

Is the minister satisfied that everything is in context?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes; this is the tenth time it has been read.

Mr. Harkness: As long as the minister is satisfied that nothing has been wrenched out I shall devote my attention particularly to this. "Some of the powers sought in this bill are special powers which should not be of a continuing nature." The minister said that in 1951. Neither he nor anyone else has said in 1955 that that was an incorrect statement and that it is not still applicable. If that were true in 1951 I submit it is still truer in 1955.

Some of these powers are of an extraordinary nature, and they should not be of a continuing nature. Yet that is the very thing this bill proposes to do. The minister was agreeable to a time limit in 1951. I ask him why he is against a time limit now? What has occurred to change his mind? Is the emergency greater now than it was in 1951?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It certainly is.

Mr. Harkness: Well, the minister is the first one to say that, and this is the first occasion on which I have heard him say the emergency is greater now than it was in 1951.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The communist countries did not have hydrogen bombs in 1951.

Mr. Harkness: No, they had no hydrogen bombs. I shall come to that. Certainly the minister is the first one, and this is the first time I have heard anyone say that the emergency we are in now is greater than it was in 1951.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What do you think?

Mr. Harkness: The Prime Minister has not said so. I doubt very much whether the Prime Minister will say so. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has not said so; the Minister of National Defence has not said so.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think most people read the papers.

Mr. Drew: The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the very opposite.

Mr. Harkness: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has certainly done his best—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): To say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said it is not as dangerous now as it was in 1951 is ridiculous.

Mr. Drew: That may be so, but say it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Harkness: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has done his best to give the impression to this house and to the people of Canada that things are considerably better now than they were a year ago, two years ago, three years ago, four years ago.

Since the minister has raised this point, I should like to examine what the situation was in 1951 and examine briefly what it is now. What were the circumstances in 1951? The Korean war was going on. There was extreme apprehension of a third world war breaking out at that time. In view of the extreme apprehension of a third world war breaking out, not because of Korea but because we were afraid a third world war was coming, a whole new defence build-up in Canada was announced and proceeded with. That was the situation then. We started the big expansion in defence at that time. The world situation was looked upon as extremely uneasy, extremely dangerous. We got started on a whole lot of civil defence activities at that time, and so forth.

What is the situation today? There is no fighting war going on at the present time. The world leaders are all making statements that they are hopeful the tension of the world is easing, including our own Secretary of State for External Affairs. In other words, the picture is better from every point of view except for one thing. That one thing is that the Russians now have better and faster bombers, they have a larger atomic stockpile, and they have the hydrogen bomb. Apart from that the whole situation is better than it was in 1951.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is wonderful.

Mr. Dickey: Is that not enough?

Mr. Harkness: In other words the emergency is not nearly as acute as it was in 1951.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It begins right after they drop the first hydrogen bomb.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: The minister is trying to bring up another red herring, another bogeyman. As a matter of fact if a hydrogen bomb is dropped on this country it will not make one iota of difference whether the minister has these powers now and for the next year or two or whether he has not. It will not matter one iota. If a hydrogen bomb is dropped on this country the giving to the minister of these extraordinary powers in the next month or so, the next year or so, or whatever the length of time may be is not going to make any difference. That is a complete bogeyman.

The greatest period of activity by the Department of Defence Production presumably is over. We have had the defence build-up. I am not arguing, and no one is arguing, that the department is not going to still have a great deal to do, but its greatest period of expansion, its purchasing and so forth in such large quantities, is presumably over unless a full-scale war comes on. Whilst all this was going on, whilst all this large amount of purchasing was taking place, the minister got along quite well with the present act. The fact that there was a time limit in it had no effect. Why is he now opposed to a time limit? I ask that question again; why does he say that this section 41 must be repealed and there must be no time limit in this act? Nobody has answered that question, and as a matter of fact I think the reason nobody has answered it is that there is no reasonable answer. There should be a time limit.

Taking it from another point of view, as far as I know there are no shortages which require or are likely to require on short notice the institution of a priorities system. As far as I know there is no shortage at the present time of any essential material. As a matter of fact people are trying desperately to sell them. As far as some commodities are concerned, we are in a surplus position and are having difficulty finding markets.

I think it is quite evident that there is no industry which requires coercion on the part of the government to have it fulfil government orders. Practically all our industries are only too glad to get government orders. They are bidding vigorously against one another and taking all measures possible to get government orders, rather than requiring to have coercion applied to them to take such government orders. So from the point of view of the necessity for priorities in the case of essential goods, and the necessity of coercion to force industry to manufacture certain articles which are wanted, there is no need for these powers at the present time.

It just does not relate to the practical situation as we have it before us at the present time.

If the situation worsens, and if greater powers are required by the Minister of Defence Production and by the government generally, they can be readily secured. Some of us regret the fact that parliament is in session for over half the year, but at times we have sat here for nearly the full 12 months, with just short breaks in between. Parliament would be available the greater portion of the time; and in case the situation worsened, or in case there was apprehension that it would worsen, parliament could readily give these powers. If parliament happened to be out of session it could be called together within a very short time to grant these powers. There is nothing in the argument that these things are necessary for the security of the country.

As I pointed out, the minister has all these powers anyway until July, 1956. If the worst happens, if what the minister was referring to a moment ago happens and a hydrogen bomb is dropped on this country by any unfortunate chance—

Mr. Dickey: It would not be by any chance.

Mr. Harkness: —the fact that the minister had or had not these powers would not have anything to do with it. If that sort of thing happened it would happen rapidly; and if it did happen the War Measures Act would come immediately into force. Therefore from that point of view there is no argument as to the necessity for these powers at the present time, in a period of comparative peace.

I think it really comes down to this, that there is no real need for the extraordinary powers in the Defence Production Act from any practical point of view. However, the minister likes these powers and he is determined to have them, and without any time limit. I think that is what it really comes down to. The minister's speech on Tuesday was quite illuminating and significant from this point of view. I should like to examine one or two of his statements, and he will be glad to know that these have not been quoted before. Perhaps he will be happy to hear again what he said on Tuesday. I would refer first to page 4501 of Hansard of June 7; and so that I may not be accused of wrenching something out of its context —there are only four lines I really wanted to refer to—I shall read the whole paragraph, which is as follows:

> The department has been permanent in effect since it was formed in 1939. After the department of munitions and supply was liquidated in 1948 its work was carried on as a branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce without a departmental act. It was found most difficult to carry on in that way—

This is what I want to emphasize:

> —and we were glad indeed to have reason for forming the Department of Defence Production and asking parliament to enact a proper Defence Production Act.

Just think of the implications of that statement, that "we were glad indeed to have reason for forming the Department of Defence Production and asking parliament to enact a proper Defence Production Act". By a proper Defence Production Act the minister means one which gives him all these extraordinary powers. What the minister is really saying there is that he was glad the Korean war gave him a reason for resuming the powers which he had during and subsequent to the last war under the various emergency measures of that time, and in the immediate post-war period.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not the meaning of what you have read.

Mr. Dickey: Nonsense.

Mr. Harkness: I know the hon. member is a connoisseur of nonsense because he produces so much of it; nevertheless I give him sufficient credit for being able to read English, and I recommend this reading to him. I shall read it again:

> —and we were glad indeed to have reason for forming the Department of Defence Production—

Mr. McIlraith: For forming the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Harkness: What that means is that the minister was glad the Korean war gave him an opportunity to resume his extraordinary powers.

Mr. McIlraith: To form the department, is what he said.

Mr. Fleming: With those powers.

Mr. Harkness: With those powers.

Mr. Dickey: Absolute nonsense.

Mr. Harkness: It is obvious from that paragraph that those powers were liquidated in 1948 and the minister was lonesome without them. He felt lost without them. He had had them for about nine years at that time, and he just did not feel at home without them. He had become accustomed to these special extraordinary powers, and he was delighted to get them back. That is what he said in this statement. He was happy that he could resume with these special powers.

This is a most revealing statement from the psychological point of view. I think it points up strongly what we have all been told quite frequently and what I think we know, that power once held is never willingly released but always augmented if possible. The minister seized on this chance to get back his wartime powers, and he is now determined to have these powers for as long as he wants and without any question of referring back to parliament to have them extended or not extended or perhaps taken away from him. He is not going to take any chance on losing them or on making again what he no doubt considers the mistake of relinquishing these powers.

What he did in 1951 was really getting in the thin edge of the wedge, with the passing of this Defence Production Act in a period of emergency, with a time limit on it and so forth. But now he wants to drive in that wedge right to the hilt, and to embed it so firmly and strongly in the constitution that we will never be able to get it out; at least we will never be able to withdraw it as long as he is minister.

Now let us look at another statement by the minister which is found on the same page, immediately beneath the previous one I read:

> The munitions and supply act was enacted in 1939 and was amended from time to time as the experience of the department indicated was necessary. The present act was based on the final edition of the munitions and supply act, and has proved to be comprehensive enough to cover all the situations we encounter in defence purchasing.

The part I wish to emphasize is that the present act was based on the final edition of the munitions and supply act. In other words the present Defence Production Act to which this amendment relates was based on the act which was in force at the very peak of the minister's dictatorial powers during the war. He took as the model for this act the form of the act when he was right at the top as far as dictatorial powers were concerned. The minister wants nothing but the best, nothing but the most extreme, as far as these dictatorial powers are concerned. Not for him any watered down version of these special or extraordinary powers, not for him any cold war shadow of his hot war powers. He wants the whole thing. He wants all or nothing. He went on in a subsequent statement to elaborate on that again, and I would like to put that on the record. At the top of page 4511, on the righthand side, of Hansard for Tuesday, June 7, 1955, the minister said:

> In my opinion these are the powers needed to carry out Canada's defence production program. Either you have a defence production act with these powers, and all these powers, or you have no act at all.

The minister is not prepared to admit that you could have a Defence Production Act which would be quite adequate for the present situation to enable him to operate and get all the supplies he needs without having all of these special and extraordinary powers which he secured and had at the very apex of his position during the last great war in 1939-1945. He must have them all. Apparently nothing will satisfy the minister except complete power to do as he wishes as far as the economic life of the country is concerned.

With all these powers, as has been pointed out by the minister and by others, I believe it is true that he will not use a large number of them. There are quite a few of these specific sections, and so forth, he will not use; but the important thing is that he has a bludgeon once he has this passed, a bludgeon with which he can threaten any businessman or any other person in the country to get what he wants. I have no doubt that is a very satisfying feeling for the minister to have. He likes to be in that position. He was in it for a long time; he has admitted in his own speech he was disappointed when he got out of that position, and was glad to get back into it when the Korean war came on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member permit a question from me now?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Dickey: Would he be good enough to tell us the sections in this Defence Production Act he considers abrogate the rights of parliament?

Mr. Harkness: Yes. I think section 5 is one that would come in that category, and sections 15 to 32 or 33 inclusive—I have forgotten exactly which—would come in that category. Most of them at any rate are far beyond what is needed.

Mr. Dickey: I was asking about those that abrogate the rights of parliament, not whether the powers are needed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They all do that!

Mr. Harkness: As Mr. Speaker has indicated that I have come to the end of my time, I do not wish to transgress.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Saved by the bell.

Mr. Harkness: I fear I cannot answer. I had a considerable number of words for my hon. friends, the socialists on my left, and I am sorry I am not able to give them.

(Translation):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, through this bill the government would have us continue those immense powers granted by the Defence Production Act of 1951, and not only for one year, two years or five years, but indefinitely.

As everyone will recall, this act of 1951 had been passed at the time of the crisis resulting from the war in Korea, in the face of an emergency, and even then the opposition had made some well-advised reservations. At that time hundreds of thousands of communist Chinese were pouring across the North Korea boundary and casualties among the United Nations troops were running into the thousands. The situation had really become disastrous, and the free world was keeping an anxious eye on the battlefields in Korea.

Fortunately, today, while the world situation remains unsettled, we can rejoice at a considerable improvement. The situation in Korea has been stabilized and Western Germany has regained its sovereignty and freely joined the organization of Atlantic nations. Western nations are now experiencing their greatest boom since the beginning of the 1939-45 war.

For that reason, an atmosphere of relief can be felt throughout the world. Instead of living in an atmosphere of tension and emergency, as in 1951, those who are responsible for the defence of this country now have time to plan the co-ordination of our defences and do not have to take action in the midst of a crisis or emergency which is getting worse day by day.

No doubt, because of the cold war and the dangers of aggression from Soviet Russia and its satellites, our country has to assume obligations which warrant the existence of a department of defence production whose job it is to look after the procurement and production of supplies needed for our armed forces, without, however, jeopardizing the whole economy of this country.

But if Canada's obligations in the international field justify the existence of such a department, they certainly do not warrant the fantastic powers which the government seeks to have renewed and forever included in the statute books.

The government seems to have forgotten altogether that there is still a parliament in Canada. Of course, there are times when parliament is not sitting, but we should keep in mind that the house is in session from six to eight months a year, and that within the last five years the house has been known to sit for some ten months. Moreover, members may be required to convene here at any time, at a few days' notice. Why should all these extraordinary powers, which may have such impact on the economic life of the nation and even on the dearest rights of individuals, be withdrawn from parliamentary jurisdiction?

The minister may say that he needs such powers to face any emergency that might occur; but it is precisely in order to face this emergency that the War Measures Act has been included in the statute books.

At any rate, nothing in the present outlook can justify the enactment of a measure which would delight the most autocratic of dictators, especially in a democracy such as ours.

The members of my party who have spoken previously have shown eloquently the dangers which would threaten our parliamentary system if such powers were granted to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). The member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), with all the logic for which he is known, has very ably shown how dangerous such legislation would be for the individual citizens.

As for me, I should like to use the few remarks I wish to make to protest most strongly against some particular sections of that legislation. I would refer first of all to section 28, which reads as follows:

> 28. (1) The governor in council may, by order, direct that a person shall not be bound by any obligation, restriction or limitation imposed on that person by or under any statute, order, rule, regulation, by-law, or contract with respect to such matters as may be specified in the order affecting the entry into or performance of a defence contract by that person or the carrying out of an order made by the minister under this act.
> (2) Where the failure to fulfil any contract, whether entered into before or after the 1st day of April, 1951, is due to the compliance on the part of any person with any provision of this act or any order or regulation, proof of that fact shall be a good defence to any action or proceeding in respect of the failure.

That section is a breach of the Canadian constitution and it certainly cannot be said that the present government did not do all it could to tear apart our constitution. It has become a matter of habit for the hon. members opposite.

Section 28 grants the governor in council the power to annul the obligations placed upon the citizens by provincial laws. Nobody can deny that in this case provincial rights are being placed in the hands of a federal minister, who is given powers, truly arbitrary in nature, which go against the spirit of confederation.

It simply means that the federal cabinet can annul a purely provincial law merely by passing an order in council.

By a mere order in council, the federal cabinet may annul a perfectly legal contract entered into between a provincial government and those under its jurisdiction.

Now the seriousness of such a step on the part of the government implies a situation of extraordinary urgency, such as actual war or imminent danger. In that event, and in that event only, there might be some justification for the enactment of legislation imparting such tremendous powers to a minister of the crown. But in peacetime, and merely in order to ensure that the government may make purchases necessary for defence purposes and to ensure that Canadian factories turn out the materials necessary to our armed forces, we are writing into a federal statute certain sections under which the federal cabinet is allowed, merely through an order in council, to annul a law which is purely provincial in character and even to make null and void a contract duly entered into by a provincial government, on the one hand, and those under its jurisdiction, on the other. Such powers are excessive, but the tragic thing about this is that the government dares ask this house to place this act permanently in our statutes.

Let us consider for a moment the possible effects of section 28, if it were to be applied fully. In short, we are now being asked to insert forever in our statutes a section which would allow the federal government to disallow a provincial act, on the sole condition that the Minister of Defence Production obtain an order in council to that effect. I cannot think of a better example of dictatorial powers, and I wonder if it is not characteristically dictatorial to ask us to give carte blanche forever to a minister, at the very moment when the rights of the provinces are being consistently attacked by the most centralizing government which has ever existed in this country.

I don't have to multiply instances, as I believe that the Canadian population, at least in the province of Quebec, has not failed to realize the state of mind in which my hon. friends opposite approach this matter. No doubt some will say that, up to now, those dictatorial powers provided by section 28 have not yet been exercised. Nevertheless, we are being asked to insert forever in our statutes this section which includes all that is necessary to enable the federal government to lay hands on part or even on all the power resources of any province, even though such resources come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Section 30 gives the federal government the power to take over the whole highway system of a province.

Moreover, under section 28, the federal government may exempt from all provincial taxes any company or corporation holding some contract with the Department of Defence Production. I dare hope that those who drafted the legislation were not aware of the dangers of section 28, and I am satisfied that the Minister of Defence Production does not intend to use the powers it grants him. It is rumoured that the Minister of Defence Production will retire next fall and that the Prime Minister will do the same. You may well imagine—

Mr. Robichaud: As well as the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Villeneuve: Those rumours have been circulating for the past ten years.

Mr. Balcer: Well, this morning in the press gallery I heard that the Minister of Defence Production would probably be replaced by the chairman of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Gordon. You can imagine—

Mr. Robichaud: The appointment is announced in the house!

Mr. Balcer: You can imagine how much that little dictator of the Canadian National Railways could blackmail the provinces, corporations and companies, if he had the extraordinary and dictatorial powers granted by sections 28 and 30. We of the opposition strive strenuously to erase from our statutes certain sections which constitute a danger for Canadian democracy, sections which go against the true spirit of the Canadian constitution. It is unthinkable in peacetime that our statutes should include a section which would authorize the government—not as a result of a vote taken in the house but merely by means of an order in council—to vest such powers in the Minister of Defence Production. In fact, upon request by the minister, the federal cabinet could exempt from provincial taxation companies or corporations that held contracts from the Department of Defence Production.

The federal government would then be in a position to deprive the provinces of their sources of revenue and compel them to accept subsidies that would make them wards of the federal government, an aim which the central government has been striving to achieve for several years past. That is why I am asking the members of this house to look closely into sections 28 and 30 so that the Canadian constitution will not be imperilled and that the rights of the provinces and all that they represent will not be infringed upon.

Mr. Speaker, such rights are an absolute denial of our constitution. I am now beginning to understand why the socialists rushed to the defence of their Liberal brethren in order to ensure that this dictatorial measure be permanently written into our statutes. These people, the socialists, have come to the aid of their Liberal brethren, knowing full well that the only way they can manacle the Canadian people is to ensure the passage of socialistic legislation which would paralyse private enterprise in this country, legislation such as is exemplified by sections 28 and 30, to mention only those two concrete examples.

Like this government, they never miss a single opportunity to make our country move towards the single central government and to put the provinces under its thumb.

The act as it stands endangers the prerogatives of parliament and the rights and prerogatives of the provinces. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it is not justified by the present world situation, and its permanent inclusion in our statutes would weaken our constitution and the democratic ideals guaranteed by the constitution.

For all these reasons, I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. Boisvert: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. Balcer: If you get any fun out of it, go ahead.

Mr. Pouliot: This is going to be a press conference.

Mr. Boisvert: Does the hon. member agree that in 1951 the act, with the powers it confers, was necessary?

Mr. Balcer: We needed it at the time to ensure our defence but we certainly did not need such ridiculous powers as are requested by the adoption of sections 28 and 30. Besides there was a state of emergency at the time.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): But in 1951?

Mr. Pouliot: It is the first time you are saying this; you did not say so before.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): What was the emergency at the time?

Mr. Boisvert: May I ask a question—

Mr. Balcer: Make your own speech.

Mr. Boisvert: —a supplementary question?

Mr. Balcer: Go on, you have the floor.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why don't you reply?

Mr. Boisvert: You just said there was a state of emergency—

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I think the time has come for me to point out that the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) may, if he sees fit and with the permission of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), ask a question, in which case when the question has been asked I suggest the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska should resume his seat and the hon. member for Three Rivers should come to his feet if he is going to answer the question.

(Translation):

Mr. Pouliot: He did not get this out of his own head, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member if he would answer a supplementary question to the question I have already asked?

Mr. Balcer: I shall be pleased to answer it.

(Translation):

Mr. Boisvert: Is the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) aware that a high-ranking officer of the Royal Canadian Air Force is said to have stated last Thursday that war could not be avoided?

Mr. Balcer: I think I saw it in the papers.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That, of course, is more annoying.

Mr. Balcer: Was that your question?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That's not so sure.

Mr. Boisvert: Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to make it clear at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, that it is not my intention to attack the present minister, nor to advocate that parts of this bundle of legislation that has been placed before us should be abolished. In common with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), I believe there is a principle involved upon which I feel I must express an opinion.

Before coming to that, however, I should like to give the reason why I am quite prepared to consider the government justified in asking for the continuation of the department. I think the Prime Minister, when he introduced the resolution on March 10, gave us a good explanation as to why the department should be continued. I do not want to read all of what he said, but there are a few lines I should like to quote in order to show that he went far enough and gave us enough information to enable me, at least, to support the continuation of the department. He said, as recorded at page 1904 of Hansard for March 10, 1955:

> This amendment is being introduced to extend the life of the department so that it may operate on a more permanent basis. We feel that there are a number of reasons for recommending this action at this time.
> Hon. members will recall that when the Department of Defence Production was established on April 1, 1951, it was to meet an emergency situation brought to a head by the fighting in Korea. At that time it was impossible to predict how long the need for greatly increased military defence procurements would continue. To meet the immediate situation, the government embarked on a three-year defence preparedness program which it was later found necessary to extend because of circumstances which continued to exist. Procurement machinery to carry out this was established on a short-term basis. Almost four years have elapsed since the Department of Defence Production was set up and it is now apparent that the temporary character of the department is neither in keeping with the international outlook nor satisfactory from an administrative point of view.
> As far as the need for a separate department responsible for the production and supply of Canada's military requirements is concerned, the situation has not changed. The peak of the defence program is past—

I think those are significant words.

> —at least we hope that what is past will prove to be the real peak, that will at no time be exceeded—but it is levelling off at a relatively high level and the magnitude of the program is such that we feel it should not be left to the responsibility of crown agencies or branches of other departments with important functions of their own to perform.

Then, leaving out certain portions and coming to the foot of page 1904 of Hansard for March 10, 1955, we find this:

> To carry out production and procurement to meet Canada's present sizeable and complex defence program requires a department staffed by competent and experienced officials. Hon. members will appreciate that it is difficult to attract and retain high-calibre civil service personnel in a department that is looked upon as temporary, that is to say, to have them come there for an indefinite time, and that is particularly true in peacetime.

This was on March 10, 1955, and it will be noted that the Prime Minister refers to this period as one of "peacetime". Then he continues:

> When the situation is really critical, well, the critical nature of the situation weighs heavily in the minds of those who make their services available for the benefit of their fellow citizens. But when it extends as something which nevertheless becomes a semi-permanent feature of the necessary requirements, it is desirable, we feel, to have some permanent character to the organization.

That does give some information. I think every member in the opposition, including myself, agrees that if we can be shown something is necessary we will not oppose it. We are satisfied it is important that the department be maintained for the purpose of retaining the personnel.

Then we have no quarrel with that clause in the bill which fixes the minister's salary. However, when we come to the powers being conferred upon the minister we feel that an important principle is involved. The Prime Minister is not very definite on that point, and says this:

> I do not feel that the time has come to take out of the act those powers which are there and which enable the department to deal expeditiously with any situation that would interfere with the regular maintenance of Canada's defensive strength and the regular carrying out of Canada's undertaking.

The Prime Minister says he does not feel the time has come. I suggest that neither would he feel that these powers about which hon. members have been speaking, and which they have quoted, should be written into the law of the land. And that is where we take issue with this bill. Certainly no one wishes to tie the hands of the minister. When the Defence Production Act was introduced in 1951 it was my understanding that it was considered to be emergency legislation. The country was engaged in actual warfare. We had troops fighting in the front lines. We had commitments with our allies which had to be carried out with the least possible delay. Apparently, however, there was nothing but disorganization facing the government. We were neither prepared nor organized to meet that sudden emergency. Apparently no efficient machinery was available, and the country was faced with an emergency.

I understand that at that time the government did not wish to invoke the War Measures Act because it might indicate that our people were becoming involved in a major war, which the Korean outbreak was not considered to be. As has turned out, the military activities at that time were confined to what might be described as only a minor disturbance when compared with the two great wars which in our generation have bled not only this but other countries.

Therefore the government at that time, and I believe rightly so, decided that it should have these extraordinary powers. While I was not in the house and did not hear the arguments, I understand there was very little objection to the legislation. It was considered to be of a temporary nature and for a limited time only. It was to bring about speedy and efficient action in meeting a sudden emergency in which the country found itself. It was deemed expedient and wise to set up a new department of government. And as the years have gone by everyone seems to agree that this was a wise procedure, and that the department has done efficient work. The minister was charged with the responsibility of securing the necessary defence supplies, not only for the Department of National Defence but other supplies considered necessary for the successful prosecution of the war, or the carrying out of a full defence program.

As I said, I have come to such conclusion from reading the remarks of the Prime Minister in 1951, when he was speaking to the resolution. Let me quote briefly from his remarks as they appear at page 613 of Hansard for February 23, 1951:

> The greatly increased defence program not only calls for greater purchases, but, what is more important—

And this was in 1951.

> —requires some direction of the production program in such fields as production, aircraft, shipbuilding, vehicles, armament and ammunition. The present high level of demand for practically all major commodities has already made it necessary for the government to take a certain measure of direction and control or allocation of such an essential material as steel, for instance.

Those are not very strong words, but from them one can gather that there was good cause for setting up the Department of Defence Production and giving it some powers of control and direction. Those words were spoken at a time when it was believed that such action was necessary, and at a time when it was necessary that there be some direction of the production program. It was a reasonable conclusion that there should be a separate department to look after the procurement of supplies which were then so urgently needed. There was no question about fixing the minister's salary. He was to be paid the same as other ministers, but then follow these words, and they are significant:

> The present high level of demand for practically all major commodities has already made it necessary for the government to take a certain measure of direction and control or allocation of such an essential material as steel, for instance.

That was in 1951; and hon. members will recall, some better than I do, that that was quite a different situation from what we have today. Even then the Prime Minister did not use very strong words. Even when we passed the act we put a time limit on it. I do not think hon. members can say that today conditions are similar to what they were in 1951. Today many industries are running on part time. There is a surplus of goods and commodities. Thousands of men have been put out of work because industry has not been able to give them employment. As a result, industry is anxious to get orders.

If that is not so we have not been told by the minister or by any member of the government today that the facts are different from what we read in newspapers and what we hear around us. Even the aircraft industry, which is one of the essential industries in our defence program, is not operating at full capacity; nor are the shipyards to which the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) referred. I am not going to say anything more about it. As I see it, conditions are not the same at all. I cannot help but feel that industry would be very glad to do business with the government, glad to get orders for defence contracts, and there is certainly no evidence to the contrary.

Compare that with conditions in 1951, when this country was engaged in a hot war, when the people had ample money with which to buy goods, when the civilian population acquired a lot of goods. I can understand that the government might have difficulty in obtaining the supplies they wanted under those conditions. I can understand why the minister required those powers at that time. But when we come to consider putting this type of legislation in a permanent form so it becomes the basic law of our land, and when we consider and boast about freedom and democracy, it seems to me we are inconsistent, and we shall be looked upon by other countries as being inconsistent. We brag about how much freedom we have, and then we pass such a law as this and make it permanent on the statute books.

The Prime Minister indicated at the time that since the present Minister of Trade and Commerce had been carrying on throughout the war and had great experience in handling defence supplies, he had been asked to draw up or frame the act, and he was the one who would be responsible for it. While at that time he did not say the minister would be in charge of the department, I gather it was understood that would be so. Therefore the act was drafted by the minister or at least it was under his guiding hand, as he wished it to be, since he was the minister who was going to administer the act. No doubt he was pretty sure of that.

From his point of view I do not blame him much for wanting to get all the punch into it that he could. With his experience in business he felt that he could get things done as and when he wanted them done. Because of his experience he would know where to draw the line. I have no hesitation in saying that he put every bit of power into the act that he could possibly get into it. He knew that he had to organize and control the products and materials in a period when civilians were clamouring for many of the same materials. Because the economy was strong and purchasing power was high it was natural that he should obtain such broad powers, since he had a job to do and was responsible for doing it. I can understand that. As far as I can learn no one seriously quarrelled with his motive.

However, at the same time he realized that such laws should not be made permanent, and I assume he set the time limit. He was responsible for drawing up the act and he realized that it was giving one minister great powers. The present minister had no assurance that he was to remain in charge of this department as long as it lasted. Therefore, since he realized the danger, he himself recommended and put a time limit on it. In my opinion, and from the experience of the last four years, I believe the time limit was sufficient to bridge the gap in the emergency.

There certainly is no evidence, and no information has been given to the house, as far as I know, that convinces me that section 41 should be repealed. If it is repealed it will have the effect of placing on the statute books of this country a bundle of laws. It seems to me that we are being handed a bundle of laws in the same way that you would be handed a bundle of kindling wood. There is some good and some bad. I do not think that is a good way to present legislation to any parliament, without considering too much its effects. That is the way it seems to me. It is giving us a bundle of laws, part of which is good and part of which, in its administration, could be most vicious.

When I say that I am not thinking of the present parliament; I am not thinking of the next five, ten or fifteen years. I am thinking of the law that is being written into the statute books and that is going to remain there. Once it gets there it is going to be difficult to get it off. It could be used for the following purposes: for the control of the complete economy of this country; to destroy business; to kill private enterprise; to make inoperative provincial and municipal laws and regulations; to make ineffective contracts between labour unions and management; and, worst of all, as an efficient political machine to ruin our free and democratic methods of choosing a parliament.

No doubt hon. members will say that I am taking this too seriously. They may say that such things cannot possibly happen here. I hope they are right and that I am too pessimistic. I have not said these things are likely to happen, but I say they could happen under powers like this granted in peacetime. Once this bill passes and becomes law there is a vehicle waiting, ready to be put into action any time hereafter.

[Mr. Montgomery.]

I do not believe the members of this government or their supporters have really stopped to realize what would result from such legislation. I am not at all surprised that hon. members who believe in the socialist doctrine welcome this type of legislation, because as far as I can learn from listening to their speeches they believe in a fully controlled economy. I do not question the sincerity of any hon. member sitting in this chamber, nevertheless socialism in action can be dangerous. Socialism in action has been compared to a car going down a mountain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I hesitate to interrupt an hon. member in the middle of an argument, but I can see again the danger, with which we were faced on a similar occasion not so long ago, of this debate on the advisability of adopting certain amendments to the Defence Production Act becoming a debate on the merits or the demerits of socialism. I would ask the hon. member to co-operate by holding his remarks as closely as possible to the bill we are discussing.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is proper, because this in fact is socialism. I think it should be open to us to discuss it from that point of view.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order, we have heard a great deal during this debate from members of the C.C.F. and also from the hon. member for Rosthern on the values of socialism, and I think it should be open to hon. members of this party to refute those claims.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): All I have done at the moment is to ask the hon. member to co-operate by making his remarks pertinent to the bill we are considering, and I have the right to insist on that. I do not propose to permit an abstract debate on the merits or demerits of socialism at this time. I do not believe it is within the rules of the house that the debate should be allowed to stray that far afield. I have not at the moment ruled any hon. member out of order, but I have requested the co-operation of the hon. member who has the floor so that we may not find ourselves in difficulties which might be the cause for a more drastic intervention.

Mr. Montgomery: I shall try to co-operate, and possibly I should not continue from where I had reached; I shall leave that out. This legislation seems to me to point to full control of our economy, to what in other words would be state control. We have seen examples of where state control can place dangerous governments. I would hate to think that we were parties to placing legislation on our statute books which could be used to bring about such conditions in this country.

I think the minister realized this to some extent when he was moving the second reading of the bill on March 2, 1951, because he is reported at page 836 of Hansard of that day as having said:

> It is proposed that the act would expire on July 31, 1956.

I believe this has been quoted before.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, how many times does the same paragraph have to be read in order to constitute repetition? I have kept track, and this is the eleventh time in this debate.

Mr. Montgomery: I will not quote it if that will make the minister feel any better.

Mr. Dickey: Read it; it will take up some time.

An hon. Member: Time killing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We will forgive the hon. member if he is three minutes short.

Mr. Montgomery: Sometimes I have to talk a little longer in order to get my ideas over, and I hope hon. members will forgive me. That particular passage has been quoted so many times that I think every hon. member knows, and I think the minister knows, that when he introduced this legislation the minister made it quite clear that there was a good reason for not making it permanent. That is the principle behind this, that these powers should not be made permanent.

What has happened? That question has been asked before, but it comes to my mind again. What has happened that has changed the minds of the minister and the government? If there are reasons and they are stated clearly, as the Prime Minister stated the reasons for maintaining the department, perhaps we could be convinced. At least if there are good reasons for keeping and extending these powers at the present time I certainly could go along with that. But what bothers me is that we are handed a bundle of legislation. How are you going to distinguish it? Some of it you are quite happy with and some of it you are most unhappy with. Is it being put up to us this way so that if we vote against it we have to vote against it all, or vote for it all?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It does not matter.

Mr. Montgomery: There is only one thing I can say; it is disappointing to me. I will have to choose the least serious of two courses and vote against it. This matter has been discussed before, and the minister came back with this bill without any amendments. If I should vote for this in the hope that we would get amendments afterward I am afraid I would be left holding the bag, so to speak. We certainly would be disappointed. I think the only honest thing a person can do will be to vote against it. The only thing I can do is vote against this, at the same time feeling that the minister will get what he wants. I want to help the minister to carry out his work, but I have to vote against this bill to express my opposition to the other part of the act in which I cannot concur.

I do not think there is much more I can think of right now. It has been said this afternoon that this legislation is to control profits. Several excuses were given by the hon. member for Rosthern, that would lead me to think they have a different viewpoint on this from mine. As I see these powers, they are purely to give the minister the power to make industries do what he wants done when they refuse to co-operate. But so far I have not heard any evidence, nor have we been given any information, that in the last few years any industry has refused to co-operate with the Department of Defence Production. If we were given reasons and asked to support an extension for the time being that would be a far different thing from asking us just to repeal section 41 and make the whole parcel the permanent law of the land. I think, in all fairness, that we deserve either a full explanation—

Mr. Fleming: From the Prime Minister.

Mr. Montgomery: —from the Prime Minister or from the minister whose responsibility it is to operate this department. The main thing is a question of principle. I gather from what the minister has said that he feels the time will come when the government may dissolve the whole thing but, after all, once this gets on the statute books permanently, is it not dangerous?

Unlike some other hon. members, I have not been here very long. I am not worrying in the least about the present minister getting along with or without these powers. I am satisfied that the present Minister of Defence Production can get along very well without these powers. I would not worry about procurement for our defence program, as long as the present minister is in charge of it, if there were none of these powers. What bothers me is that he wants to lead us to believe that he has to have these powers in order to do this job. I do not believe that. He can do it without these powers. He has been doing it for all these years. He had educated industry in this country so well that they are anxious to do business with him. Our program of continuing defence is not the emergency it was in 1951. Our program is, I venture to say, proceeding according to plan and as fast as possible.

This act still has another year to go. I should like to see what the hon. member for Calgary North suggested, this bill withdrawn and a new bill brought back next year if it is necessary to have some powers. The bill could be drawn in two parts, so that an assurance would be given to the personnel of the Department of Defence Production that they are not going to be thrown out in one or two years. In the other part of the bill the powers could be limited; and when the time runs out, whatever minister is in charge of this department could come before parliament, and I do not think he would have to worry about having those powers granted, if they were needed. All he would have to do would be to show this house that they were needed.

I think that has been borne out in the last seven or eight years. Whenever the government come to parliament and ask for money for defence or something of that nature, they get it. That is good evidence that there is confidence in the minister who is running the department. But where we have no confidence is in the fact that the next minister who is operating under this law may not operate as well in using these powers. That is the principle involved.

Hon. members should give a little serious thought to this matter. This is not an emergency, and I do not think anything would happen if this act did not pass this year. I am satisfied that the officials of the Department of Justice and the minister's assistants can draft an act that will be acceptable, that will not be dangerous and that will protect the personnel of the Department of Defence Production.

After all, I am satisfied that that is what this legislation is for, more than anything else; because in explaining it the Prime Minister spent more time on that and gave a full explanation, because it was a sound ground. I do not consider that the explanations or the grounds are sound upon which we have been asked to repeal section 41 of this act. In all sincerity I do not see how I could support this bill, although there are some things about it which I can support.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in the past two days I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on second reading of this bill. I hope I shall not be charged with political heresy for what I am going to say, but after listening to all the debate and especially the remarks made by the hon. members who are a part of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, I feel it is time this was said. We are all elected here as members of parliament, but we are the representatives of parties. That is according to our custom and perhaps as it should be. Having been elected here to the House of Commons, although we are members of certain parties which stand by certain principles and philosophies and programs, we in this house as members have responsibilities which are somewhat changed upon election.

I believe it is absolutely wrong and not in the interests of parliamentary democracy if a party which has the control of government completely ignores all suggestions and recommendations from the parties in opposition, just because the parties are in opposition. On the same basis, it is absolutely wrong for members of the House of Commons in opposition to oppose anything introduced by the government just because it comes from the government and we are in the opposition. It is because of that feeling that I said I hoped I would not be charged with political heresy. I think it is wrong for the government to ignore all suggestions that come from the opposition, and I also think it is definitely wrong for the opposition in any or all parties to oppose a measure just because it is introduced by the government.

After listening to this discussion which has taken place over the past two days, and in particular what has been said by the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition on my right, I am afraid they are opposing this measure for one reason only, namely that it is a measure introduced by the government.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Winch: My friend here says "nuts".

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order. I said "nonsense".

Mr. Winch: That is my impression. That is my opinion. I say it does not make for a good parliament for members to oppose measures just because they are in the opposition.

In my brief time here in Ottawa I have at times thought the Minister of Defence Production, especially as Minister of Trade and Commerce, was wrong in some of his policies and in some of his decisions. Once in a while I think he is wrong in his decisions as Minister of Defence Production. But, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation at all, standing in my place here in the opposition, in saying that if this group, the C.C.F., were over there on the opposite side on the government benches, and if in an emergency a job had to be done and red tape had to be ignored, if I had anything to say—and I do not mind saying this—I would ask a man by the name of C. D. Howe to go ahead and do it. His record has shown that he can get things done in an emergency. I am proud to stand before this House of Commons and say that, even although I disagree with him on politics and very often on his policies.

What is the situation with which we are now faced in connection with this bill? There are only two sections to it. As to the first one, everyone says there is no opposition regarding the salary of the Minister of Defence Production. There is only one other section, and it relates to whether or not there shall be a limit on the time the act is in force. The amendment says it is now to be perpetual. Yet, Mr. Speaker, have you noticed that in two days of debate the discussion has been on the powers in that act, which powers have been in effect and have been law for a good many years in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Trainor: Five, to be exact.

Mr. Winch: My hon. friend says, "Five, to be exact".

An hon. Member: Four.

Mr. Winch: Four years or five years. The Conservatives change their minds all the time. However, it has been the law. The powers have been there over this period of years. The only question arising now is this. Shall they continue and be reviewed?

As I said, I have been listening most carefully to all the discussion that has taken place for two days. Most of all I have been interested in what my friends in Her Majesty's loyal opposition have had to say on this matter. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker—and I am going to express this only as an opinion, because otherwise I would be out of order—that they are putting up a sham battle and beclouding the issue because they are the official opposition and feel obliged to oppose anything brought in by the government.

That is a principle with which I as a member of the opposition do not agree. If the government brings in something that is good, I am going to support it. If I think it needs amending, I am going to try to amend it. If it should be opposed, I am going to oppose it. If the precedent is good, support it. If it is bad, then wipe it out. If a new precedent is required, then let us bring it in.

At this session we have heard a great deal about the serious world situation. We all hope for peace. We all want it. We will all work for it. However, things happen speedily in this modern age. We are now spending on defence 47 per cent of the entire revenue of the federal government. At the beginning of the last war it was made clear that private enterprise companies in Canada had no patriotism with regard to Canada, that they had patriotism only with regard to their own dividends. That fact was made clear in a speech made here this afternoon. It was made clear in a speech made by the minister in 1940, or was it in 1941? Because of experience, and because the minister desires to have protection for Canada and to be able to move speedily in the interests of Canada, he requires a continuation of these powers.

The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery), who spoke just before I rose, was talking about socialistic powers and said that a continuation of the act was socialism. Socialism introduced by whom? The bill was introduced by the Prime Minister of Canada, who I do not think is a socialist. Second reading was moved by whom? By the Minister of Defence Production, who is not, I am certain, a socialist. I know these men are not socialists. Yet from their knowledge that private enterprise in Canada, even in an emergency of war, will put their profits before the interests of Canada, they feel that they need these powers in order to ensure that in the event of another emergency the minister in charge of defence production will have the power to control industry on behalf of the Canadian people.

Mr. Fleming: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Winch: At six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was at the point of concluding my remarks on second reading of the bill which is now before us. Although there has been a two-hour intermission, I have not used that time for the purpose of adding to my remarks. I was at the point of closing at six o'clock, and I am only going to add exactly what I was going to say if I had had the time prior to six o'clock.

First of all I should like to reiterate my opening remarks. I would say that those on the government side should not oppose all suggestions from the opposition merely because they come from the opposition. Secondly, I would say that members on the opposition side, irrespective of party, should not oppose any government measure or principle merely because it comes from the government. I feel that this is the essence of good government and a good parliament.

I feel very strongly, sir, as I have already outlined, that the opposition to the bill itself, as presented by the various members, has not been on the basis of fact or on the basis of principle, but on the basis that because it is a government measure it must be opposed if you sit in the opposition. So far as I am concerned, and I know I am safe in saying that so far as our C.C.F. group is concerned, I approach this bill from the point of view of the facts and the necessity for it. We in this group believe that the direction and control of our entire Canadian economy, at a time when almost half of our federal revenue is required to be allocated to the defence department, should be in the hands of the elected representatives, that is parliament. If parliament is not meeting, then it should be under the control of the elected representatives as represented by the cabinet and, under this bill, as represented by the Minister of Defence Production.

I fail completely to understand the arguments that have been presented by the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. The bill does not deal with powers, it only deals with time. They ask for a review. In the intermission since six o'clock I have gone over the act again. According to my understanding the Minister of Defence Production has to make an annual report to this parliament, and the public accounts are open to all members of this house. In addition, all estimates have to come before our parliament. At that time any queries can be put to the minister.

Under these circumstances, sir, when the Minister of Defence Production has to report annually; when the public accounts have to be filed annually; when the estimates can be examined annually in the house, and when nearly one-half of the entire federal revenue has to be allocated to the departments of national defence and defence production, then in my opinion there is still a state of emergency. That being so, and because the present minister in the first year of the last world war had to report that Canada was being sabotaged by private enterprise companies because they placed their profits before their patriotism, I say any understanding, patriotic Canadian has no other choice but to do what I am going to do, support the second reading of this bill.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): It is not very often, Mr. Speaker, I take the opportunity of congratulating my very good friends who sit immediately to my right. They are my very good friends. In fact I always regard the hon. member for Cape Breton South as a bit of a chum. I must congratulate them on doing something I have been trying to do throughout the country for a long, long time. I have been trying to drive my socialist friends and my Liberal friends together. I feel that they have accomplished more in this debate than I have been able to accomplish for quite some time out in the country because—

Mr. Winch: I would rather join the Liberals than the Conservatives.

Mr. Hansell: —they are supporting this measure which, in principle, is a measure for the concentration of power, not only in the hands of a government but in the hands of one man. I have found in my reading and in my appraisal of socialism, and the moves that are made from time to time by my socialist friends, that they can always be depended upon to come to the defence of any measure that concentrates power in government hands.

Mr. Gillis: In the public interest.

Mr. Hansell: As a matter of fact, it is amazing to me that even my Liberal friends, as a party, should be so pleased with the support the socialists have given them in this debate. They seem to be extremely happy. They laugh at certain digs the C.C.F. give to those who are opposing the measure. You would think they were bosom friends.

I congratulate my socialist friends on something else. They have been more powerful in their speeches in support of this bill than have members on the government side of the house. But even though that is so, it seems to me there is something screwy in the discussion of this measure thus far, something that seems inconsistent. Here we have a measure which gives permanency to the Defence Production Act. Not only does it do that, but it gives permanency to the extraordinary powers given to the minister. That is one thing we in this corner of the house are concerned about.

We are in favour of a department of defence production. We believe that at the present time, when conditions are complex and perhaps dangerous, the minister should have those powers. My leader, the hon. member for Peace River, has already said that. The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) has said the same thing, as has also the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas), and I am saying it now. But we are not in favour of a bill that gives the minister this power forever and ever.

I have said there was something inconsistent in what some speakers in this debate have said. I would refer again to my socialist friends, who over the years have described themselves as great peacemakers, as those who are always holding out great hope for peace. Their attitude has been that you can save the day by negotiation. Yet in this measure they support the government in setting up the Department of Defence Production forever and ever, and giving the minister exceptional powers under the act to decide things for himself for the same length of time. Well, if there is such great hope for peace, and we all want it, one would not think the minister would need these exceptional powers forever.

How my C.C.F. friends weep and cry when the H-bomb or some other bomb or some new nuclear weapon is tested somewhere out in the Pacific. Oh, they are so alarmed. "Why is all this taking place?" Yet what they are voting for in this instance is to give the minister all the power he needs. Yes; if we happened to be manufacturing or finalizing these nuclear weapons the minister could go out into the middle of the Pacific ocean and bang them off or explode them. He would have power to do that under the act. And they are quite willing to support him, by accepting this measure.

Only a few weeks ago we were discussing the entry of West Germany into NATO. What was the purpose? The purpose was to make it possible for them to fight the aggressor with us, side by side. But the socialists split on that. "No, no; we cannot permit Germany to rearm even though they are rearming to fight by our side". But they are content to give the minister all these powers in the Department of Defence Production, so that we may continue producing the most deadly weapons it is possible to produce. It just does not add up, so far as I am concerned. It does not make sense; it is not logical; it is inconsistent.

If the government wants to have this department set up forever, if they want the minister to have these powers forever, then do they expect that war is inevitable? I do not know the answer, I do not know what their attitude is; but I do know that the other day a very high-ranking officer was fired because he spoke out of turn. And what was one of the things he said? While he may not have used these exact words, he indicated in what he said that war was coming, that it was inevitable.

I am not going to criticize the government for the position it has taken in reprimanding that gentleman for making a pronouncement of government policy. I stand with the leader of this group when he says that government policy should be announced by the government, and only by the government. And I stand with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that on major policy it should be announced in this House of Commons. Nevertheless there is an important factor in this matter. I am not so much concerned with whether that high official spoke out of turn as I am—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member not to continue discussing the matter to which he is now referring, unless it has some direct bearing on the legislation before the house. He can realize the kind of argument we could have on that particular subject.

Mr. Hansell: Yes; I realize, Mr. Speaker, that you may have been somewhat concerned lest I should go too far afield. However, I was only going to say that I am concerned as to the truth of the statement more than with what action the government took in the matter. Is it true that war is inevitable? If it is, then of course we must have a department of defence production. If war is coming, then we must give the minister certain powers in serious times to mobilize the productive capacity of the country and produce those goods which are necessary for war.

But if that is so, then the government cannot have it both ways. It cannot say there is going to be peace, and at the same time prepare for war. I do not think anyone will disagree with that statement. When the minister, with his powers over defence production, mobilizes the productive capacity of the country to manufacture war supplies, why is he doing it? Why do we make bombers, if they are not to fly? Why do we make bristling atomic guns, if they are not to be fired? Why do we make any nuclear weapons if they are not to be used? Why do we spend $3 billion a year on arms if they are not to be used? I should like to ask that question. Someone says, for safety. Well, I know that argument has been made over and over again, that we can negotiate by reason of our strength. It is a pleasant argument, but what does it really mean? It really means that if we are strong we can scare the enemy. Well, now, who is kidding who in this thing?

Mr. Knowles: Whom.

Mr. Hansell: Whom. War weapons are manufactured to be used, and certainly we are not kidding the enemy. We are not scaring the enemy as we negotiate, because up to now in their negotiations they have not shown one tiny thread of nervousness. As a matter of fact I am inclined to think that we are the boys who are nervous; for in all our negotiating from the standpoint of strength we have lost, for the most part.

We are opposed to this measure, Mr. Speaker. I am not saying we are opposed to the entire bill, particularly in respect to the continuation of the Defence Production Act. My leader has already stated that we are in favour of that. We are opposed to the concentration of power in the hands of one man. We are opposed to that not because we believe that the present incumbent of this office would use the power unwisely. We certainly do not believe that, because we have a great deal of respect for the minister. We are not opposed to the bill for that reason; we are opposed to the principle, and that principle is embedded in our Social Credit philosophy. We are opposed to the centralization of power because it is a negation of democracy. We are therefore opposed to this measure which gives the minister these powers in perpetuity.

We have been accused over and over again of holding to a philosophy of dictatorship. Just before the last election an article was published in Liberty magazine, written by Leslie Roberts. It did not bother us to any extent, but it was read by a great many people. The pictures were there. What were the pictures? They were not pictures of the Social Crediters; they were pictures of German troops marching the goose step. They were depicting that as what the Social Crediters would do. The article tried to indicate that we believed in the centralization of control; that we believed in dictatorship. Well, this is one time when we are opposing a measure that puts the power of dictatorship into the hands not only of the government, but of one man.

When he spoke on behalf of his party the other night the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre tried to indicate that it was all right to give the minister these powers because, after all, he has to come back to parliament whenever he needs another $2 or $3 billion. When my leader spoke the other night the hon. member interjected and asked how many of the estimates were statutory. Well, it is true that only one item is statutory.

Of course we can always oppose the minister when his estimates are before the house. That is a pleasant story to tell. It is pleasant to talk that way. I know we can talk when the estimates are before the house, but I should like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to tell me when any discussions on the estimates have been effective in reducing an item by $1, let alone reducing them to $1. It has never happened. It is technically true that the money has to be appropriated by parliament. The same thing that happens on estimates happens on a great many other parliamentary matters, such as legislation. If the minister wants it his party will back him up; and while we can talk about it and use this chamber as a sort of sounding board, the minister will get the money and will continue to operate with dictatorial powers.

My colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, pointed out to me this morning one section of the original act that we are amending. It is section 27 (2), which reads:

> Where a controller has been appointed to carry on a business or a part thereof, he shall be deemed to be the agent of the owner thereof for the purpose of carrying on the business or that part thereof—

I suppose an agent of an owner is an agent who represents the owner and does what the owner wants him to do or tells him to do. I continue:

> —except that the owner shall not have any right to control the business or that part thereof and the controller may, subject to any instructions of the minister, do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of carrying on the business or that part thereof.

If that is not expropriation in principle I do not know what it is. The minister has power from now to eternity to appoint a controller over any business and say "the controller is there with absolute power". The business may belong to someone else, but the owner has no right whatsoever to interfere in any way with the operation of his own business. I say in principle that is expropriation without paying for it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, you pay for it. The owner has recourse to the courts.

Mr. Hansell: I do not see anything here about paying for it. The minister does not need that in this act anyway, because he can do that. Governments have that right today by the use of proper processes.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Surely; that is what we are saying.

Mr. Hansell: But what this act amounts to is this. A person has a business. The government, because of powers given to one man, can take over that business.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): And pay for it.

Mr. Hansell: That may be so.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the hon. member's argument has been shot.

Mr. Hansell: My argument as to expropriation has not been shot; that is one thing that has not been shot, because all governments have it. Why put it in here; why put it in the hands of one man? That is what we in this group are opposed to.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Even the Social Credit government of Alberta has it, and it is administered by one man.

Mr. Hansell: I know they have that right as a government, and so has this government without this act at all.

An hon. Member: They are just spelling it out.

Mr. Hansell: It is being spelled out and put in the hands of one man forever. That is what it is doing.

Mr. Knowles: Who is the hon. member talking about, Methuselah?

An hon. Member: That is eternal life.

Mr. Hansell: It may be eternal life as far as the minister is concerned, because I cannot guarantee what is going to happen to him when he gets to the golden gates.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps he will expropriate the gates.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know that he would. When he faces those golden gates I know he will look at them and ask if there is a defence production act up there under which he could expropriate them. I am sure there will not be, because I made up my mind a long time ago that there is no socialism in heaven. I do not cast any disrespect upon my friends; there are socialists in heaven, but no socialism.

An hon. Member: Social Crediters but no Social Credit.

Mr. Hansell: I believe some of my good friends may get in by the skin of their teeth.

Much has been said during this debate about the minister having these powers to protect the taxpayer against unscrupulous big business. No person in this house, no party in this house is going to countenance the unscrupulous actions of big business, or even little business, but this act is not designed to protect the taxpayer. Let us not kid ourselves about that.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I interrupt the hon. member? There is a renegotiation clause in that act which netted the taxpayer over $600 million after the last war. I suppose the hon. member would want that eliminated?

Mr. Hansell: No, I do not want that eliminated; it is quite all right to have that in the act. But the argument is made that the purpose of this act is to protect the taxpayer from unscrupulous big business, as though they could not be protected without putting unlimited powers in the hands of one man. That is the thing we are getting at.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): How do you work that out?

Mr. Hansell: That is what we are opposed to.

Mr. Knowles: You had better try A plus B.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend talked about the people being exploited. This act is not designed to prevent the exploitation of the people; this act is designed to more effectively mobilize the productive energies of this country for defence purposes. That is the purpose of the act.

An hon. Member: Defence of whom?

Mr. Hansell: Let us not be pulling red herrings over the pathway. That is the purpose of the act, and we support the purpose of the act.

Mr. McIlraith: Then vote for it.

Mr. Hansell: We are not voting for the bill because, as my leader said the other day, it has a most iniquitous clause which gives the minister all these powers forever, by the repealing of section 41.

If the minister wants these powers for another couple of years we are quite willing to give them to him. That is all right; that is reasonable, because the way things look now the complexity of the times will perhaps last that long. If in a couple of years times have not changed we would be quite willing to extend the powers for another couple of years. There is nothing wrong with that. But that is not what the minister is asking us to do. He is asking us to take out of the bill a section which would permit this matter to come before parliament in that way every so often. The powers are to be given to him for eternity, until the act is repealed.

There is another thing I cannot quite understand, and that is why the minister needs these powers for all time. I cannot understand why he would not be satisfied to have them for two or three years at a time, and have the matter brought before parliament periodically so the powers could be renewed. I do not see why that would not be satisfactory to him. If he is willing to do that he will receive the support of this group, but he is not willing to do that. Why is he asking for the repeal of this section? There must be some other reason. I do not know what the other reason is, and any argument as to that would be only a guess, as there could be a variety of reasons.

The minister is not going to be here forever. The saying is going around that he may retire. I do not know, as that is his business.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he contemplate that this government will go on forever?

That seems to be the basis of the argument of all the other parties in the house.

Mr. Hansell: I do not contemplate that this government is going on forever. As a matter of fact, if I did contemplate that it would mean I would be banging my head against a brick wall because—

Mr. Knowles: You are.

Mr. Hansell: —I am out to defeat this government.

An hon. Member: That is the brick wall.

Mr. Hansell: I am pleased to say that here and there we are meeting with some reasonable and satisfactory success, but that is not the point. The point is that the minister is asking for these powers forever. The minister may not be here in a few years' time; I do not know.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Whom are you going to ask?

Mr. Hansell: Somebody will be succeeding the minister and that is what I had in mind in objecting to these wide powers being granted. I think we will all agree that the minister has done a good job.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Don't speak for all of us.

Mr. Hansell: He did a good job during the war and he is doing a good job now. We are not talking against the minister and his efficiency when we oppose this measure, not by any means. Writing this into the bill means that these powers will go to his successor, and we do not know who that will be. It may be someone completely unable to perform the same functions as the minister, but he will have these powers just the same. I do not know, but it could be that business generally in this country has some confidence in the minister. I hope it has. But there is no reason to say that business will have the same confidence in his successor.

Mr. Ellis: I thought you were arguing on the basis of principle.

Mr. Hansell: Therefore we are saying that the concentration of power in the hands of one man, written into the act in perpetuity, is a wrong and evil thing. We are opposed to the bill now presented to us because it calls for the deletion of section 41, which would bring this act before parliament in a year's time. As my leader said, we are prepared to give the minister the powers at present. We are willing to vote for the bill if section 41 is not repealed, but we are not willing to vote for this package bill which gives the minister these powers forever.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I find it remarkable that we should be having this extended discussion on this subject tonight in the Canadian House of Commons. As I read the act under discussion tonight, one part of that piece of legislation is designed to perpetuate wartime powers in peacetime. As I have listened to the remarks of hon. members on this matter, the only complaint they have raised concerning the legislation is on the part of the act which is designed to perpetuate these unlimited powers that have grown up during wartime emergencies, particularly during the emergency of world war II and the recent Korean crisis.

I say it is remarkable that we should have to take time to re-emphasize this point, because in a free parliament in Canada the dangers involved should be obvious. One good result emerging from the extended discussion is that it reveals the state of mind and soul of the Liberal majority, and reveals in particular the degree to which the doctrine of statism has crept into that party. We have listened to many members of the opposition make their contribution. We have heard very few representatives of the government in this discussion. In most cases the spokesmen on behalf of the government have tended to minimize the dangers that have been raised by members of the opposition, and actually we have had very few serious contributions to the discussion from that side of the house.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): What would you expect?

Mr. Dinsdale: It is bad enough, of course, Mr. Speaker, when we have government supporters ignoring the complaints, the accusations and the criticisms that are being levelled at certain aspects of this measure by members of the opposition, but it is infinitely worse when the same criticisms are ignored by the leaders of that group. I hope we might hear from the Prime Minister himself before this debate concludes, because the legislation stands in his name. I hope to demonstrate in the contribution I shall make to this discussion that the matter is of such importance that it demands a statement and an explanation from the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member? I have been glancing through the debate right from the beginning. As I had occasion to say previously—see Debates, May 24, 1955, pages 4063-5—whenever debates are extended over a long period we come to a point when arguments are often being repeated. Just as the hon. member is embarking upon the point that the Prime Minister, whose name appears on the order paper, as the mover of this bill, should be here and address the house on this bill, I want to remind him with all deference that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), at page 4513 of Hansard, expressed a similar contention; the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), at page 4540, made the same point; the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), when he made his remarks last evening, began by his appeal to the Prime Minister to address the house on this bill; the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), at page 4539, did the same thing. That is the list only of those members whose speeches I have read so far.

I would ask the hon. member to refrain from repeating. It may be that he has a totally different argument from all those we have heard so far, but it is my duty to remind the hon. member and others who may follow him in this debate that there is a standing order, standing order 40, subsection 2, which forbids repetition either of one's own arguments or arguments used by others in the same debate. Having said that, I shall ask the hon. member to bear these remarks in mind.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dickey: Not the same speech all over again.

Mr. Fleming: I take it that it is a point of order you have referred to. May I respectfully submit to you that standing order 40 (2) contemplates that there should not be undue repetition of an argument. But the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. members who have participated earlier in this debate, to whose remarks you have made reference, are making an appeal and a demand. It is not a matter of repeating an argument; it is a matter of making an appeal and a demand that the Prime Minister, in whose name this resolution stands, should come to the house and give his reasons for it. With great respect, in my submission to you there is nothing in standing order 40 (2) that this type of appeal and demand offends.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Another 101-minute speech.

Mr. Fleming: It is a matter of repeating an appeal and a demand.

Mr. Speaker: No matter how you put it, it is repetition. The hon. member for Eglinton, in making the appeal, advanced certain reasons for doing so. All the other members to whose remarks I have referred have done likewise. This is exactly what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has just announced. He says he is making an appeal, and he is going to give the reasons for it. After we have had the appeal and the reasons the appeal was made exposed by five members already, it is a question of judgment.

As I had occasion to say earlier, it is difficult to administer this rule, but the hon. gentleman himself, if he reflects on the wording of it, will probably ask himself, as I do, at what point does the repetition become repetitive and tedious so that it constitutes the next step, which is persistence in repetition. Then, if that obtains, the next step is so grave that I may direct the hon. member to discontinue his speech; and if then the member still continues to speak, I have the power to name him. So repetition of one's own arguments or arguments used by others in debate is a very serious matter.

At this moment, having asked the hon. member to keep in mind what I have indicated to him, I am satisfied he will continue his speech without repeating the arguments made by others. I am not making a ruling at this moment. I am merely asking the hon. member's co-operation with respect to the situation I have indicated. I shall follow the debate very closely from now to the end, and if there is no other cause for me to rise I shall be glad to remain seated and listen to the other speeches that are made.

Mr. Knowles: If Your Honour has occasion to cite standing order 40, paragraph 2, again, would you let us know whether there are any precedents for ruling that repetition refers to repetition of arguments that another member has made? There is nothing to that effect in standing order 40, subsection 2, itself.

Mr. Speaker: No. If the hon. member will look at the report of the committee on procedure in 1927, where to avoid redundance they eliminated those words and just combined the one standing order pertaining to relevancy and the one standing order pertaining to repetition, he will find it shows the words. But in practice the Speakers have always enforced the rule as it was in the text before the article was simplified by the committee on procedure in 1927. See Journals, volume LXIV, 1926-7, pages 242-3. See also volume III, Debates, 1920, page 2286; and Debates, March 10, 1939, page 1782.

Mr. Green: May I suggest to Your Honour that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is in order in commenting on the fact that the Prime Minister has not taken part in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: I say that for this reason if for no other. The Prime Minister was in the house this evening for a period, and now he has gone out.

Mr. McIlraith: Just like the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Green: He had an opportunity this evening to take part in the debate.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The mere fact that an hon. member does or does not participate in a debate or the fact that he is in the house or goes out of the house is not a matter which should be raised as a point of order. We have the right to speak, but we also have the right to listen in this house. It does not necessarily follow that one must speak. Hon. members are supposed to make their remarks relevant to the principle of this bill. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe not only asked why the Prime Minister did not speak, but mentioned all the ministers who were then present in the house. The hon. member recalls that. If he looks at page 4540 of Hansard he will see that appeal was made not only to the Prime Minister but to all the ministers who were then present. The hon. member said:

> I am surprised that the Prime Minister has not been in the house during this debate. I realize his responsibilities are great, but I can think of no greater responsibility after having moved this motion than to be here to safeguard the rights of parliament which, in the years that have passed, have been championed so often by those who sit to your right.

He made a similar appeal elsewhere. As reported at page 4545 he referred to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who were then present in the house. Why is there a rule pertaining to repetition if it is not to avoid repetition such as that to which I have just now referred?

As I said, hon. members may look at the pages to which I have referred. I have before me Hansard of June 7; that is the day before yesterday. I think the hon. member for Eglinton cannot deny that he made an appeal to the Prime Minister to say something on this matter. He also made a review of the pronouncements of the Prime Minister on a previous occasion when there was discussion of this legislation, when the creation of the department was first proposed to this house.

As I said, if that rule is to mean anything it must be interpreted along the lines I have indicated. Of course, generosity is rather on the side of the member who has the floor because, as I said, it is a rule which it is difficult to administer. I am merely pointing out to the hon. member at the moment that he indicates that he is entering on the same line of argumentation as that which, as I have indicated by quotations from Hansard, has been propounded by five members already. I think it is my duty to remind him of the rule and to ask him to be careful in the presentation of his argument.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That rule interferes with the filibuster.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Green: Surely Your Honour is not ruling that the hon. member cannot comment on the fact that the Prime Minister had not participated in the debate this evening or this afternoon. The comments to which Your Honour referred were made about the failure of the Prime Minister to speak yesterday or on Tuesday evening.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: Surely, as this debate progresses, an hon. member in the course of his remarks is entitled to comment on the fact that the Prime Minister has not yet taken part in the debate although the motion stands in his name. Surely the hon. member is in order in doing that.

Mr. Studer: What rule stipulates that?

Mr. Green: That is not repetition. It is referring to what is happening at the actual time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: It is quite a different thing from repeating arguments. The hon. member is simply commenting that today, Thursday, June 9, the Prime Minister has not yet seen fit to rise in his place and make any speech on the motion for second reading of this bill. I suggest to Your Honour that such comment should not be ruled as repetition.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is certainly paralysing when you cannot repeat.

Mr. Pouliot: If I may be permitted to do so, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the matter raised by some of my hon. colleagues, and in particular by my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. For many years I have noticed that the members of the opposition are strong in their advocacy of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. Knowles: Don't repeat yourself.

Mr. Pouliot: If freedom of speech is acknowledged, and if human rights and fundamental freedoms are to exist, may I say that the right to remain silent is just as sacred as is the right to speak.

An hon. Member: It is a virtue.

Mr. Pouliot: The fact that one prefers to remain silent rather than to speak cannot be held against him, because it would be a good example to all the members of the opposition.

Mr. Nowlan: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would say that if they remain silent twice, the rule of repetition can be invoked against them. I think there would be that real danger, that you might be accused of repetition if you remained silent too long.

What I am concerned about with regard to this point of order is this. Frankly it intrigues me and bothers me, because I feel that if this ruling is accepted which has been made by Your Honour, with Your Honour's background and wide knowledge of the rules, then I suggest with deference that it is a little bit novel, shall we say, to some of us.

I wonder why there ever was a closure rule in this House of Commons if repetition cannot be indulged in. You do not need a rule concerning closure because you are automatically cut off by your rule against repetition. I am remembering, this rule having come in in 1927, that between 1930 and 1935, on unemployment insurance we had a debate of 48 days. There was no time limit during part of that debate.

What I am wondering is this. Perhaps the members of the House of Commons then were more brilliant in those days than they are today, but I cannot conceive of a situation where somebody did not repeat some argument that someone else had used. I am wondering if the Speaker ruled against them on that score. I am rather intrigued with the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to precedents. Surely if my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, coming from the west coast, uses an argument in his forcible and dramatic way, which undoubtedly will be much superior to that which I could raise, is Your Honour suggesting that because I come from the east coast I cannot indulge in the same argument, that I would be foreclosed because of repetition? Frankly I think that ruling, if it is as I think Your Honour is trying to state it now, is going much further than it has ever gone before. With deference I suggest that we should question it quite closely.

Mr. McIvor: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would say that I feel even the Prime Minister would admit that it would be difficult to improve on the statement made by the Minister of Defence Production. I should like to hear the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, to see if he has new material, because he has brains.

Mr. Speaker: May I say a word to put at ease the minds of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). Whenever the Speaker rises some hon. members seem to think he always makes a ruling. There is a rule, standing order 12, however, that he shall preserve order and decorum. The moment he believes a rule is about to be violated he must warn the hon. member, and that is all I am doing. I feel I have full justification for that, because I have heard hon. members say and have read in Hansard during this debate exactly what the hon. member indicated he was about to do, that is to make an appeal to the Prime Minister to speak in this debate. He was going to give reasons for that, and I take it other members have done so.

I believe I have indicated that I base this suggestion on standing order No. 40, subsection 2. I claim that if the mention of repetition in subsection 2 is ever to mean anything or has ever meant anything, it is in a situation such as that which has just arisen. It may be because this rule is difficult to administer that it has not been invoked as often as hon. members perhaps would think in this house. In the United Kingdom, where a rule exactly the same as we have, with the exact wording as we had it prior to 1927, does exist, it is often invoked by the Speaker. See United Kingdom Commons' standing order 20, as it appears in May, fifteenth edition, page 1025. See also United Kingdom debates, 1404-1419, December 3, 1953.

There is also another point which I did not mention, and which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and others should keep in mind. It is that all government bills could easily be in the name of the Prime Minister, yet it could be one of his colleagues who would move second reading for him. Since relevancy is to obtain in any debate, I would ask hon. members of what use it is to bring that up in the debate and say that a minister should or should not speak instead of the Prime Minister. Hon. members know very well that there are some bills that are introduced by the Prime Minister. This one concerns the extension of a department and it appears in his name, but it does not necessarily follow that the minister in whose name the bill appears is the minister who will have to move the various stages of the bill. Is it relevant to the principle of a bill to make extended remarks on the point that the minister or the Prime Minister, in whose name the bill appears, has not spoken or should speak? In other words, at this moment I do not raise the point and I do not intend to proceed further.

Mr. Fleming: I know you are not inviting discussion on the point, Mr. Speaker, but in fairness I think there should be added to your closing observations this fact. The point you have just mentioned is not the only ground that has been put forward in this debate as to why the Prime Minister should take part. It was one point, but surely there are many important questions—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, this is the fifth speech by the same hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: There is, I suppose, some relationship to the point of order. However, I find it difficult to believe that what the hon. member is about to say has a direct bearing on the point of order I have raised. I would not want him to have to repeat the reasons which he advanced in his earlier speech. I am not ruling on that ground. I am not giving a ruling. I am merely asking the co-operation of hon. members not to repeat, as the rule says, arguments used by others in the same debate or to repeat one's own arguments in the same debate. The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Dinsdale: I certainly did not intend to become the centre of a procedural discussion, Mr. Speaker, and I most decidedly do not intend to comment on the point of order. I have been in the house long enough to realize that new things are developing each day in parliamentary discussion and procedure, and before one dares to inject himself into a discussion of this kind he must have considerable experience behind him. I must say, however, that I have learned something new this evening as a result of the discussion that has taken place, because from past experience in the house it has come as a surprise to me that repetition is one of the unpardonable sins. It seems to me that in the past repetition has proceeded apace in most discussions we have had.

Now, proceeding with my contribution to the debate, Mr. Speaker, this bill has been described as a very simple, innocuous bill. I fail to see certain aspects of it in that light. Perhaps if it were viewed in isolation and as a separate item one could so describe it. Certainly, as you examine the bill presented to us, it seems to be very simple and harmless. But on the other hand, if you look at this matter of perpetuating exceptional powers delegated to the minister in the Defence Production Act, I feel that we are justified in concluding this is just another symptom of a trend that has been under way for far too long, not only in this parliament but in other democratic parliaments.

From time to time in our debates in this house concerning trends in parliament the book "The Passing of Parliament" by G. W. Keeton has been mentioned. It deals more directly with the United Kingdom parliament than with this house, but I feel that if this Canadian House of Commons allows these exceptional powers to be included in this act in perpetuity it is definitely part of this fundamental erosion of the rights of members under our parliamentary system. At page 7 of this book Keeton says that parliament is tending to become merely a censor of executive acts.

The argument has been put up in defence of this measure that there is no need to circumscribe or limit these exceptional powers because the estimates of the minister will be coming before the house each year and hon. members will have an opportunity to level the necessary criticisms to keep the application of these exceptional powers within reasonable limits. Going back to Keeton's statement, that procedure is merely putting parliament in the role of a censor, not an active creative force in the legislative process. We would merely be censoring what had already taken place under these exceptional powers if they happened to be used by the minister. Certainly they are provided for in this act.

Keeton also goes on to say that there are many trends under way in our parliamentary system. He indicates that even in democratic parliaments such as our own and that of the United Kingdom, the democratic processes are on the road to Moscow; that is a phrase he uses.

He gives three points in support of that viewpoint. First of all, the road to Moscow is marked by the one-party state; and who will deny that we have come perilously close to that unhappy situation in this country? Only recently the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who should have a broad knowledge of this situation, decried the unhappy circumstances in which we have an opposition divided in its own councils and therefore rendered almost powerless to take an effective part in the parliamentary deliberations of this house. The one-party state has been a part of the trend.

Then Keeton points out that the road to autocracy is open when we have an all-powerful executive which can almost usurp and arrogate to itself unlimited powers because of the relatively weakened position of the opposition. Third, he indicates that the trend toward autocracy and the passing of parliament is marked by a path toward a planned economy, particularly a planned economy where government monopolies predominate.

I submit that we are moving in the direction of all three in this house; and the only thing that has slowed down the process is the fact that we do have an opposition which has prevented the executive from assuming absolute powers in this chamber. I say this matter is of profound importance, because if we are going to perpetuate in peacetime conditions the powers that have emerged during a wartime situation, then we are definitely assisting in this undesirable trend described as "the passing of parliament".

I listened to a discussion on "Citizens' Forum" not so long ago on this subject. "Citizens' Forum" is a program arranged by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to sound out public thinking on public matters. During that discussion, whether it was put forward seriously or not, someone described parliament in terms which I shall set out in a moment. "Citizens' Forum" is a responsible discussion group, and discussions reach a high level. Therefore it is rather a tragic state of affairs when we find someone defining parliament in these terms:

> Parliament is an inexpert, rigidly regimented, desperately overworked and intellectually exhausted agglomeration of lobby-fodder going through the motions of lawmaking under the scornful gaze of a public well aware that power rests outside the parliamentary system.

The person making that statement went on to describe the increasing resort to orders in council and the procedures of delegated legislation when, as Keeton describes it, there is a continuing shift in the governmental centre of gravity from the floor of the House of Commons to the offices of the great departments of state.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that I feel all these matters are involved in the legislation we are debating this evening. I have indicated that exceptional powers are necessary in time of war, but I would just as strongly suggest that as soon as actual war is removed as a threat to the country, we should try to withdraw from those exceptional powers as rapidly as possible, if we are going to preserve our free democratic parliamentary system of government.

Power became concentrated in the cabinet during the war. I quote from a government publication which reached my desk just the other day. It is an outline for discussion leaders issued in connection with Current Affairs, volume 8, No. 11. The first question asked in this pamphlet for discussion leaders is as follows:

> Is a democratic system of government an effective instrument in time of crisis?

Here is the answer appearing in the pamphlet:

> Parliamentary procedures, with full discussion of all sides of the question, are not always the swiftest way of arriving at decision and action. In times of crisis almost instantaneous decision and action are sometimes necessary. Parliaments have consequently developed the device of delegating more power to cabinets during emergency periods. Thus the cabinets of both Canada and the United Kingdom had more directly exercisable power during the second world war than they have now. Parliament grants those powers, usually for a specifically limited time—

I underline the words "usually for a specifically limited time".

> —and parliament can withdraw it when it is considered no longer necessary.

I suggest that the members of the official opposition are quite justified in demanding that some limit be placed on the powers incorporated in this act, particularly when we are in peacetime conditions. It is bad enough in wartime to have absolute cabinet control, but it is tragically dangerous in time of peace.

I know the difficulty arises from the fact that there has been no change in administration since the end of world war II. The United Kingdom perhaps is a little more mature in this regard than we are, because they turn their respective parties out of office more quickly than we do here. Unfortunately we have not had that salutary state of affairs since the end of hostilities in 1945, with the result that you have a group of politicians who have become inoculated with the power complex. The only argument I have heard in attempting to refute the opposition is. "We must be right, because so many support us. We have been returned time after time to a majority position in the House of Commons."

Well, I do not have to repeat that popular statistics concerning recent election results indicate that the government holds office on a minority popular vote, mainly because the opposition is divided in its councils. I feel that it is a tragedy if in defending freedom, which is the purport of this resolution—and we are all for it; we all realize that we must have a permanent Department of Defence Production to provide our armed forces with the necessary equipment—we lose by the subtle process of inner decay the very freedom we are defending.

I have another observation on this point from a Canadian writer, George Hambleton, who has recently produced the book "The Parliament of Canada". And—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member again. He is about to give us his fifth quotation. I heard several quotations yesterday. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) gave us quite a few quotations from a certain book, "The Urge to Persecute", and from another book, "Faith and Freedom". Now the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is giving us a review of a book by Keeton, "The Passing of Parliament". He has quoted from a government publication, and now he is about to quote from another book. I understand that it substantiates some of the points he is making. According to the rules he must present his arguments in his own words, not in the words of others. The hon. member may say, "Well, yesterday you allowed quotations to be made; why should you not allow them today?" He said a moment ago, "You allowed repetition in other debates; why do you not allow it now?" I understand that I have to bear the onus of that negligence, but there comes a time when it becomes so obvious that intervention is sometimes helpful.

I am sure the hon. member is not doing this purposely and does not want to take advantage of the rule. Therefore I am again merely pointing out to him that he has given us five quotations, and my remarks might serve to indicate to him that for the remainder of his remarks there should not be another five or six quotations.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am beginning to feel a bit frustrated as I keep running into these technical hurdles. Again I am amazed at the ruling because, as I have said in the house on former occasions, I have heard lengthy quotations read and no difficulty has been encountered. I would say that some of the points I have made have been more by way of paraphrase than direct quotation, and I shall paraphrase the gentleman to whom I referred, who reminds his readers that the power of the cabinet is now such that during world war II we had a regime which was nothing less than a dictatorship by consent. I feel that the exceptional powers in this legislation are perpetuating this unhappy condition.

If I may refer to a personal experience which involves an historical character, I think I can do so without infringing on the rule that we must not quote too freely. During the last war I had the privilege of going to the continent quite soon after the liberation of France. In fact the battle was still raging furiously in the Cherbourg peninsula. Hon. members are all aware of the stakes that were involved in that conflict. We went across the channel to try to establish direct contact with mobile radar installations under whose direction our particular squadron was operating. At the tip of the Cherbourg peninsula we were housed in the chateau de Tocqueville.

I was quite thrilled at that experience because, as hon. members will recall, de Tocqueville was one of the outstanding historians of the early nineteenth century. Over a hundred years ago he had foreseen just the unhappy state of affairs that modern democracies find themselves in today as they are confronted with crisis after crisis. In his writings on democracy in the Americas he pointed to four dangers that would be faced by American democracies within the foreseeable historical future.

The first point was the possibility of responsibility in government being bartered for security. The second point was the danger of democracy degenerating into majority rule, a form of oligarchy, and that is a question that has already been referred to by the hon. member for Prince Albert, who mentioned the tyranny of the majority in reference to this discussion. The third point was that dull uniformity would tend to depress the exercise of individual will; in other words, a trend toward a mass society would tend to deaden individual responsibility, and the individual would be willing to acquiesce in anything so long as his security could be guaranteed.

The fourth point was that increasing complexity of national life would lead to the necessity for a rigid autocracy. I thought it was ironical, Mr. Speaker; the night we stayed in the chateau de Tocqueville we were housed in the library. Incidentally the chateau had been occupied by the nazi forces until just a few days previously, and it was interesting to discover that the library of that great historian had been very carefully preserved even by the nazi forces. They at least had respect for the contributions of this outstanding man toward a better understanding of our democratic processes, yet there was a strange irony of fate. Here just a hundred years later a country which at the time that de Tocqueville had written was the centre of liberty, equality and fraternity, had fallen for several years under the iron heel of a dictator, a situation which he had prophesied in his writings a hundred years earlier.

It has been interesting, Mr. Speaker, to see the enthusiastic manner in which the members of the C.C.F. party have embraced this legislation. I was very interested in the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because I saw him in a new role. He was enthusiastic; he felt that this legislation might be regarded as the wave of the future so far as his particular point of view was concerned. He made reference to the fact that if we are to meet emergencies there is necessity to have what is sometimes called democratic socialism, national socialism, state socialism, state capitalism, or whatever phrase you like to use to describe this trend toward increasing domination by the state. On the other hand, it is necessary to curb the rights and the privileges of private industry, because the captains of industry are not to be trusted with the responsibilities that are inherent in the continuing emergency conditions that face us at the moment.

If I had time I should like to give another quotation, but I do not know whether to launch into it. It is very pertinent to this point. The members of the C.C.F. party are strongly in support of the idea of democratic socialism or state domination of our productive activities. In the book "Make This Your Canada", a review of C.C.F. history and policy, there is a very interesting and significant passage on page 24.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was in the house and heard the previous interruption of the hon. member. I do not want to anticipate what he is going to read, but from the title I judge it will be very difficult for one to relate it to the principle of this bill. If he can relate it to the principle of the bill, well and good; otherwise I would ask him to devote his remarks strictly to the principle.

Mr. Dinsdale: The only point I am making in my discussion, Mr. Speaker, is that the inclusion of these exceptional powers is a trend toward state domination, and that is why we are opposing this aspect of the legislation. My quotation is right on that point, if I may be allowed to proceed.

> Our own experience in the field of war production has been confirmed and emphasized by the accomplishments of the Soviet union. The whole democratic world has been filled with admiration of the victorious struggles of the red army. And that admiration is deeply deserved. Yet our appreciation is incomplete if we do not understand some of the reasons for the magnificent results achieved by the Soviet peoples in their opposition to Hitler's invasion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Having heard part of the quotation, I think most hon. members will agree that we are departing from the principle of the bill.

Mr. Dinsdale: Does this bill not deal with the emergency situation of war or the threat of war?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just defence production.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was under the impression that the Department of Defence Production was being established on a permanent basis in order to take care of any possible threat of war. Just to paraphrase the remainder of this quotation, it goes on to point out that the soviets were able to handle the emergent situation they faced when attacked by nazi Germany because they had a planned economy and a complete authoritarian system of organizing their productive capacity, with the result that they were able to meet the onslaught of the enemy.

It is understandable that members of the C.C.F. group would be strongly in support of a measure of this kind because it indicates the trend toward state socialism, state national socialism, or however you describe it; this increasing trend toward domination by the state. But I am surprised when I find members of the nominal Liberal party succumbing to what has been described as the dominant dogma of our age, that chaos, confusion and crisis can be stopped only by an increasing resort to coercion and force on the part of the executive arm of government. That is the reason the members of the official opposition are opposing this particular aspect of the legislation.

In his contribution to the debate the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to incentive as an encouragement for wartime production, and implied that the incentive that was most undesirable in connection with wartime production was the incentive of profit or blood money. There are other kinds of incentives. Under the old Gladstonian school of Liberalism unlimited gain or the profit motive was the incentive. On the other hand, there is the socialist incentive or the incentive of statism, the incentive of those who subscribe to the belief that unlimited power for the state is necessary in order to build up an efficient production system to meet any possible threat. The incentive of that particular school is the incentive of unlimited power, and in the extreme where you have absolute dictatorship taking over it implies concentration camps and other types of power of that sort.

In traditional fashion the Conservatives try to find a happy medium between these two extremes, and that is the position we are taking on this matter. It would be a most unhappy and unfortunate state of affairs if we were to allow ourselves to be led, perhaps unconsciously on the part of the government, to subscribe to the dominant dogma of the age that the state must have absolute powers if we are going to prepare the country to meet a continuing emergency.

In concluding I would say that this particular viewpoint professes to have a strange faith in the capacity and ability of politicians. The captains of industry, responsible citizens of this country, are bloodthirsty men who it would seem have no interest in the welfare of the country or of our free political institutions. They cannot be trusted in a time of emergency to come to the aid of those values which underline our way of life.

On the other hand this mystical belief or faith in the ability and integrity of the politician implies that the captain of politics would be all-wise, all-benevolent, all-righteous and could be completely trusted in handling the affairs of production. That is far from the true situation as is to be found in the pages of history. The individuals we should be most suspicious of are the politicians, and that is the reason we have opposition to governments; that is the reason why we have the diffusion and division of power, to prevent a government becoming too powerful and being placed in a position where it can abuse its power.

After all the captain of politics, just as the captain of industry, is subject to all the human frailties that have dogged the footsteps of man down through the pages of history. Perhaps I can express this viewpoint best by quoting a little piece of poetry I heard some time ago which described a politician. It went something like this:

He would not kiss the babies as he went along the way,
He believed that public business should no more than others pay,
He insisted on insisting on economy in fact,
Which for any politician is a curious way to act.
He said I made a promise to the people in this town
If they voted me in office I would keep the taxes down.
So I mean to keep that promise, and he fired a dozen clerks
Saying one is all that's needed if he's honest and he works.
He refused to pose for pictures just to further spread his fame,
On every public project he refused to splash his name.
He was early at the office and on the job he stayed,
He respected all the citizens but no favourites he played.
He tried running public business in a private tradesman's way,
But the things they said about him filled his family with dismay.
He was honest, he was earnest, he was truthful and sincere,
But he was no politician so he didn't last a year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, is this doggerel pertinent to the Defence Production Act?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Dinsdale: I lost 15 minutes in the discussion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That would appear to cast some reflection on the timing. My experience has been that the officials at the table are most accurate in that respect. I may advise the hon. member that allowance was made for the interruptions on the point of order.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think it unlikely I will run over the time, though there are only 20 minutes left. I propose to speak without tedious repetition if that can be avoided, and I hope to present one or two new phases in this debate.

We are dealing with Bill No. 256—I appreciate that this has been said before—to amend the Defence Production Act. It has been said that this is a simple bill containing only two sections. The explanatory notes point out that with regard to the first section the only change is the substitution of the word "fifteen" for the word "ten". The second clause reads:

Section 41 of the said act is repealed.

What could be simpler than to increase the salary of the minister and keep the act in force after July 31 of next year? All that is required is for the house to pass this simple little bill in a few minutes and then proceed to other business. Well, there is more to it than that. A real problem has been presented in this relatively simple enactment, and that is continuing all the Defence Production Act operation except section 41. Further than that, the core of the matter is that the intention here is to make the act permanent.

As I followed the minister's argument in the early stages of the debate, he stressed the point that there was a continuing emergency, and various hon. members have dwelt upon that during the course of the debate. The meaning the Oxford dictionary gives to "emergency" is as follows: "Sudden juncture demanding immediate action". I think it is important to keep that definition in mind. We are tending to use the word "emergency" with a much wider meaning than that. There is nothing at the present time that indicates a sudden juncture demanding immediate action. As I say, the minister, in the course of his early argument, based it on what he called a continuing emergency, and he stressed the fact that a permanent department was essential in order to retain experienced employees.

There has been a measure of agreement in the house with regard to some of the matters that have been mentioned in the course of the debate. There has been general agreement that the department should be made permanent. There has been some general agreement that the world situation is uncertain. There has not been agreement that there is at the present time an emergency. The world situation has been described by the minister as being worse now than it was in 1951. We cannot recall that other ministers have indicated that in recent times. The Prime Minister, who I judge is going to participate in the debate at the appropriate moment, when speaking to the federal-provincial conference on April 26 dealt with the subject of world affairs and painted the picture as he saw it.

I shall not quote at length from his statement, but I think it is important to get his viewpoint because it has its bearing on this subject of defence production. The Prime Minister on that occasion—and I am quoting from page 6 of the Hansard of that federal-provincial conference meeting—said this:

> In 1950 we met in the shadow of the Korean crisis and the ministers most directly concerned spoke to us of the urgent tasks confronting us in the defence field. Since then the situation has changed. On the surface it seems to have changed for the better. The fighting has stopped. Fundamentally, however, the situation has not improved, but we have grown more used to it. The world remains divided and suspicious; it appears likely to be that way for many years.

He goes on further to speak about the gravity of the risk that threatens Canada should a major war break out, and he says this. I quote again from page 6:

> If a major war commences we must expect at its very beginning—that is, in the first few hours—heavy attacks on North America with large nuclear weapons. These attacks would likely take place on Canadian targets as well as on those in the United States.

That is a somewhat alarming view of world affairs, which should be presented to us here in the house if that is the situation, but I see no hint there of an emergency as defined by the Oxford dictionary. As I say, there has been some measure of agreement. What are the differences here in the House of Commons? We have been saying on this side that the powers are excessive except for an emergency, and we have said that the powers should not be permanent. It is interesting to see what has happened so far.

Attempts to reach a compromise on this matter were made during the course of the debate at the resolution stage in March. At that time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as indicated on page 1996 of Hansard, said:

> I hope that between now and then—

That is, when the bill would get second reading.

> —the government might consider whether some changes in the act itself might be made. I suggest, as one change, that instead of wiping out the expiry date altogether another expiry date might be written into the act. The department as set up originally in 1951 was to expire July 31, 1956, and perhaps the government would consider putting in an expiry date of, let us say, July 31, 1958 or 1959.

Then, as other people participated in the debate, there was agreement to that suggestion on the part of the hon. member for Peace River. Then the minister himself intervened to say, as shown on page 2001 of Hansard of March 14, 1955:

> If it were not for the human element in the department I would be quite willing to set another date and debate the matter again.

As reported on the same page, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made a suggestion in these words:

> Why would it not be possible to word the bill in such a way that the department is made permanent but these powers are made temporary, and subject to review within a certain length of time?

With that suggestion the hon. member for Peace River agreed. As reported on page 2002 the Minister of Defence Production said this:

> If the house wishes to adopt this resolution before the bill is brought in, the government will consider the request of my hon. friend.

He is referring to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

> I do not know whether or not the government will accept the hon. member's suggestion, but at least it will be given consideration.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated—

An hon. Member: No tedious repetition.

Mr. Churchill: If there is tedious repetition here, Mr. Speaker, it is because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been repeating himself.

Mr. Knowles: You fellows have been repeating what I said.

Mr. Churchill: He said:

> I hope in the consideration which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has promised to give he will consider the possibility of wording that section in the opposite way, letting it stand that the department goes on but including a provision in section 41 which would say that sections so and so of this act—and these could be the sections dealing with the wide powers—will expire on such and such a date. This action would give the officials and employees of the department a sense of permanency as far as their employment is concerned, but would also bring before parliament at an appropriate date and on a mandatory basis a review of the whole question of the powers contained in the act.

The general spirit of the house was different from what it is on this occasion. The Prime Minister, who intervened at that time in the debate, said this as reported at page 2002 of Hansard:

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has already stated that the government would give consideration to the views which have been expressed here in that regard.

That is in regard to these compromise solutions. Then as reported at page 2003 the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra summed it up. This will indicate how close we were to agreement on that occasion. He summed it up as follows:

I suggest that the matter be allowed to stand as it is at the present time, on the understanding that the resolution goes through and that the government will give serious consideration to this suggestion.

That gets us past the resolution stage, Mr. Speaker. We have reached the month of June, three months later. A change has taken place. What is the reason for that change? I do not propose to repeat some of the things that have already been quoted from the statements made in 1951 and again this year with regard to the extraordinary powers not being necessary. This morning when the hon. member for Prince Albert was speaking he drew attention to the fact that when special emergency powers were required in 1945, one year was considered to be essential; that in 1951, when the act was first brought in, five years was considered to be essential before review; and that now, in 1955, we have reached the stage of no limit. That represents a considerable change of thinking in a ten-year period.

My good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—and I am not sure that I should draw attention to him again—changed his position during the course of three months, strangely enough, as did the minister. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was criticizing my friend the hon. member for Eglinton, and incidentally, accusing him of being somewhat loquacious and long-winded—a criticism which I thought was odd coming as it did from my good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Fleming: Physician, heal thyself.

Mr. Knowles: I merely objected to his talking for so long without telling us where he stood.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Fleming: It was apparent to everybody but the hon. member.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, for whom I have the greatest respect, has told us where he stood because he has changed his position in the period from March to June. Speaking of the hon. member for Eglinton, as reported at page 4536 of Hansard he said:

He wants a time limitation in the bill.

So did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a few months ago.

He did not state how many years or what length of time. I suggest it is parliament's job not just to say we will turn these powers over and we will review them in two, three, five or ten years. No, it is parliament's job to maintain a constant scrutiny of a department of this kind.

Mr. Knowles: Do you not agree?

Mr. Churchill: I quite agree. I also agree that there should be a limitation, as I intend to point out.

The minister, having somewhat altered his position in the course of three months, I regret to say, repeated the arguments he made in March. He drew our attention to the fact that one of the reasons for the necessity of making the department permanent was in order to hold the members of his department. Then he suggested that at the time the estimates were under consideration we could review the work of his department and suggest changes. That matter has been effectively dealt with by others, so I need not dwell upon it. In reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that the powers might be limited, he quoted his legal advisers to the effect that it was rather difficult to express that suggestion in an act so it would be satisfactory. Let me point out—and I think I just have time in which to do so—that on March 10, thinking of how this act might be terminated when the time came for it, the Prime Minister as reported at page 1905 of Hansard said this:

. . . leaving it to parliament to decide if and when it will be proper to bring it to a termination.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on Wednesday, as reported at page 4542 of Hansard, the Minister of Defence Production said this:

I do not propose to be told now by any hon. member just when I will liquidate it.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, you see that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production are not in agreement. The Prime Minister suggests that parliament will decide when this act shall be terminated some time in the future, and the Minister of Defence Production says that he will not permit any hon. member to suggest—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): To tell him now.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no. That "now" crept in afterward.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have some other interesting comments to make on the attitude displayed by the Minister of Defence Production and the remarks he has made on this bill. May I now move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Churchill the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: In my absence tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, I hope the house will pass the unemployment insurance bill first; will take the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and pass at least the first item and as many more as may be possible; and then will take the estimates of the Department of Labour.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
