

Not long after my uncle's arrival in London he called upon one of his old acquaintances, and one that had been a chum at college. He was an old gentleman that had passed some part of his life abroad and had brought home a great deal of French & Italian Furniture and articles of taste, and was without a very tolerable connoisseur. He was tall and rather thin; he but felt love the remains of a ^{hardy} ~~man~~ countenance & good figure. His head was bald, with some fine silvery hairs about it; his face long; with a finely arched forehead; expressive black eyes, a roman nose, and thin lips, which when not speaking were ~~usually~~ ^{habitually} tightly pressed together. My uncle found him elegantly established in a house in square. where he kept Bachelor's table in superior style.
