Illness Fatal To Col. Maret

Col. James Maret, nationally known as the "Boone Way Man," died Friday afternoon, February 28, 1936, at the Old Mason's home in Shelbyville, which he entered November 21, 1935.

Colonel Maret, who was 80 years old, had been in declining health for some time. He was born in Garrard county, near Paint Lick, on August 6, 1855. He was widely known in Harrodsburg and Mercer and was frequently in this city during his active years for roadwork.

Col. Maret's wife died shortly before he entered the Old Mason's home. He had been a sufferer of chronic rheumatism for several years.

He was a pioneer of good roads in Kentucky. Twenty years ago he attracted the attention of feature writers of prominent newspapers by his single-handed achievement of "battering out on his little old typewriter," as Colonel Maret put it, the highway system that was to become known as the "Boone Way," and which was to make him famous.

PISTOL FALLING FROM POCKET KILLS MAN

Elmer Ford, 25, of near Brassfield, Madison county, was killed Friday morning when his gun fell from its holster, exploding and sending a bullet through his heart.

Ford, a Madison county farmer, was fixing a tire on his car on the yard of June Duncan, a neighbor, when the fatal accident occurred. In a holster under his coat he had a pistol.

Ford was leaning over using a screw type jack to raise his car, according to Duncan, the only eye witness to the tragedy, when the pistol fell from the holster.

The falling gun, mouth of the barrel pointed into Ford's chest, went off as it hit the jack, Duncan said, and shot the bullet into the man's body. Ford cried out, staggered about 15 feet and fell to the ground.
