AGE DOESN'T AFFECT STATE MULE'S VALUE
Pierrette, 27-year-old mule, belonging to Mrs. Ed Duley, of the Helena community, Mason County, although nine years older than in 1927, is just as valuable now—at least bidders think. In 1927 McHugh Brothers sold Pierrette at public auction for $125. Today Pierrette went on the block again, nine years afterwards, and brought $125. Time and depression have no effect on Pierrette.—Lexington Herald.

Facts and Fancies From Frankfort

Editor Herald:

At the foot of Saint Clair Street, facing Broadway in North Frankfort, stands the stately Old Capitol, set well back on a lawn dotted with giant trees. Here, in 1827, in what was then the very heart of the town, Gideon Shryock fashioned this gem of architecture which today is as sturdy as the spirit of the pioneers who made it possible.

Passing through the great front door into the flag-stoned hall, the famous spiral stairway, so unique that the whole United States boasts only one other like it, ascends gracefully to the upper floor where, in 1829, the Legislature met for the first time in the then New Capitol. This stairway, made of stone and railed in iron is arched into a keystone for support. Tradition has it that a prisoner built this wonder and, as a reward, was given his freedom. Truth is that convict labor was employed almost solely for the construction of the building, as letters written by Shryock himself bear testimony.

The Kentucky State Historical Society has charge of this shrine and has gathered together under its roof priceless relics of Kentucky's glorious past. It is like stepping back into another day to wander leisurely thru the rooms, almost listening for the footsteps of the famous men who once passed in and out. In the circular hall upstairs which overlooks the well of the stairway, hang exquisite paintings from the brushes of Frankfort's talented artists, Robert Burns Wilson and Paul Sawyer, as well as a Duveneck and other lovely canvases. And there you may see the first drafts for the lunettes which adorn either end of the New Capitol, one depicting Daniel Boone and his companions viewing the beautiful level of Kentucky, June 7th, 1769, and the other the Treaty of Watauga between the Transylvania Company and the Indians, March 17th, 1775. These were done by the famous Gilbert White.

Passing into the old Senate Chamber, one reviews Kentucky history as he gazes at the oil paintings of all our Governors from Isaac Shelby to Edwin P. Morrow. In here is the dainty haphazard brought to Kentucky before 1830 by the father of that dashing Confederate Cavalryman, John Hunt Morgan. Here, too, is the magnificent silver service which graced the battleship Kentucky, an enormous punch bowl and a massive decorative piece begging description. In a glass case reposes the very pistol used by Aaron Burr in his duel with Alexander Hamilton, and, among other relics, a gorgeous black leather saddle, trimmed in silver, captured from a Mexican officer by Captain Fayette Dunlap, of Danville, at the Battle of Buena Vista in 1847. Another glass case holds the lining of a fur coat worn by General George Washington. There is a splendid painting of this great American hung over the Speaker's desk in the House of Representatives, and, on either side of it, are the furled battle flags of the Commonwealth. In a window stands the old scales from the State Treasurer's office, so delicately balanced that the slightest breath of wind set them to swaying. These scales were used to weigh bits of gold before our own money came into use. It is said that Spanish gold dollars were cut into eight pieces, each piece being worth 12 1/2¢, and from that quaint custom is derived the "two-bit" slang of today.

Every boy in Kentucky will want to see Daniel Boone's own hunting horn and his gun, with his initials carved in the stock. Close by, Squire Boone's fierce-looking hunting knife sends shivers up and down the spine. There are thousands of interesting relics housed here, but the ones which struck my fancy most were a child's dark blue dress, dotted with tiny white rings, worn by little Betsy Grant, niece of Daniel Boone, during the siege of Bryan's Station, and an invitation to the Grand Ball given in 1825 for General LaFayette at the old Weisiger House where, the Capitol Hotel now stands. Two silk dresses from the trousseau of the Misses Lillard, of Lawrenceburg, stand in prim dignity to depict the fashions of the period of the War between the States, and two Confederate uniforms cannot help but impress one with the thought of how slender must have been the boyish shoulders which wore them into battle for the Lost Cause.

Downstairs is a library, the value of which few Kentuckians realize. Here are hundreds of unpublished manuscripts. Here are the tax lists from the time Kentucky became a State, and the records of our soldiers and their payroll when Kentucky was still a district. These, mind you, were rescued by Mrs. Jouett Taylor Cannon as they were being baled up in the basement to be sold as waste paper. Workmen assured Mrs. Cannon that these were worthless, but woman's curiosity led her to investigate and hence these priceless records are preserved for posterity. There were 27,000 visitors registered at the Museum last year, the fewest visitors in a day being one, and the most thirteen hundred.

Bundle the whole family into the car some day and go see it for yourself. There's something to interest everybody, a complete collection of coins and stamps, beautiful Indian costumes, quaint cooking vessels, exquisite laces and embroideries, and pottery of all kinds. When you go, don't rush. Take time to saunter thru these old rooms and let the magic of Kentucky's past sink into your imagination. Picture those statesmen of another day as they thundered their convictions on controversial questions, and when you close the great door behind you and step out into the realities of 1936, you may feel as if you had rubbed shoulders with the Clays, the Shelys, the Blackburns, the Becks, and the Breckinridges, and are a truer Kentuckian for your journey into the past.

Emma May Frank.

BOY FREEZES SELF

TO RAILROAD RAIL
His tongue stuck fast to a railroad rail, Walter Davidson, 11, of Springfield, Mo., was held prisoner for a half hour Tuesday while a brother stood guard to flag approaching trains and his sister ran for aid.

The boy, old-warned not to touch frigid metal with his tongue, attempted an experiment en route to school.

Summoned by his sister, Otto Rupert, who lived a quarter-mile away, hurried to the scene with a kettle of water and released Walter.

Chandler Signs Single Primary

Kentucky Will Abide By Single Compulsory Primary As Dual Primary Goes Into Discard.

Kentucky now has a single compulsory primary election law.

This measure, one of Governor A. B. Chandler's "13-points" of legislation, was signed into law Thursday, Feb. 6, 1936, by Gov. Chandler in the State reception room in the Capitol.

Exactly one year from the day he issued the call for a special session of the General Assembly which enacted the dual-primary bill, and while waiting legislators and many State officers shivered in the heatless reception room, Governor Chandler affixed his signature to the single primary bill; thus completing the last official step in making it a law of Kentucky.
