Fighting Vegetable Pests

THERE are two major classifications of insect pests—chewing and sucking. Chewing insects, such as beetles, leave telltale holes in leaves. Control by dusting or spraying plants with arsenicals (poisons with arsenate of lead as a base) or pyrethrum. These remedies are known as stomach poisons, for they must be eaten by the insects. Plants commonly attacked include cucumber, squash, other vine crops, mustard, tomato and pepper. Presence of sucking insects, such as aphids or plant lice, is indicated by a general lack of vitality in the plant. Control by dusting or spraying, directly on the insects, nicotine sulphate or pyrethrum. These insects do not eat exterior plant texture and must be killed by a contact poison. Among plants attacked are peas, pepper, cabbage and related crops.

All seedlings may well be treated early with light application of an arsenical.

Special treatment should be given two pests—cutworm and leaf beetle. The former (a chewing insect) is very fond of tender pepper, tomato and cabbage plants, and is controlled by spreading about a spoonful of "poison bran bait" near each plant. This should be done at nightfall. Leaf beetle (also a chewing insect) is found on tomato, pepper, turnips and other plants. It can be repelled by a Bordeaux mixture spray.

Remember this important "don't": Don't use arsenicals on the edible portion of vegetables within 14 days of the time they are to be used. Pyrethrum sprays, however, are equally effective and may be safely used at any time.

Dragon's Blood

Dragon's blood is the red resin obtained from several trees, including the calamus, dragon tree and an Australian eucalyptus. It is used in lacquers and varnishes and by Chinese as backing for paper.
