Many Birds Are Ventriloquists

Have Learned Trick Of Making Voices Heard From Different Parts Of Woods.

Among all the accomplishments of the feathered tribes their art of ventriloquy is most amazing. Numerous birds have learned the trick of making their voices heard from a different part of the forest than they are in.

In the South the chief ventriloquists are the rain crows. They use their powers to good purpose. Whenever any one approaches their nests they make their voices ring out. The hoarse croakings appear to be coming from the opposite direction and lead the curious one away. Thus the nest is safe-guarded.

The corncrake is another specialist at this game of leading away unwanted visitors. Should anyone come too close he causes a "crake, crake, crake" to be heard from an entirely different place. The noise rises and falls and echoes through the woods. Perhaps the ablest of all the ventriloquists amongst the birds is the mockingbird. The imitations of other birds and of many different sounds is only comparable with its ability to throw its voice. It can make its voice ring from any corner of the room that it may be in, or in the forest, it can make the trees resound with calls of birds that come from all about.

The bell-bird of South America has well-earned its name. It produces a bell-like sound that can be heard for great distances. At regular intervals the bird reproduces the clear ringing of the bell. Distant tinkles of a bell may be produced by a bird that is standing above one's head hidden by the protective branches.

It is said that none of these birds could be made to perform upon a stage. They could, especially the mockingbird, excel the best performers of the art of ventriloquy.

Suez Route Through Lakes

The route chosen for the Suez canal was largely determined by the presence of a chain of lakes. Otherwise it could have been built for a distance of 72 miles only instead of the 101.

Turtle's Flesh Now Any One's

In former times, in the Fijian Islands, the flesh of the turtle belonged to the chiefs only. Now, to the chiefs' chagrin, anybody who catches a turtle may eat it.

Ancient Arts Known to Indians

Early explorers in America told of finding Indians keeping bees in hives for the honey and the wax, and of Indians raising cochineal bugs for red dye.
