

NO EXCUSE FOR SHEEP KILLING

(Courier-Journal)
The Springfield Sun complains that the sheep-raising industry in Washington County is threatened by the ravages of marauding dogs which night after night raid flocks and savagely slay or maim lambs and mother ewes. If anyone ever has seen a flock during or after an attack by sheep-killing dogs, he will never look again with complacency upon the ownership of unlicensed dogs by rural owners who permit their charges to run at large.

Except in Garrard county, where a force of deputies has been organized and paid by the sheep owners, nothing ever has been done to remedy this disgraceful situation. The trouble never is healed until a county elects a strong man as Sheriff, one who is not afraid to offend the owners of worthless dogs which are allowed to roam where they please.

The owner of a valuable dog keeps him in a fenced yard or kennel or ties him up at night, when sheep killing goes on. Not only does the law require this, but no honest man wants his dog to become a sheep killer, which any dog is likely to do if he gets to running with a pack of killers. Nine-tenths of the roaming dogs are unlicensed. Sheriffs are authorized to take up unlicensed dogs. Licensed or not, if allowed to run at night they may be shot on sight.

Fire Chief Warns Of Cleaning Fires

Great Hazard in Home Dry Cleaning if Not Done With Care When Liquid Inflammable.

Of all the people who are burned to death in their homes—and there are hundreds of them every year—most of them are killed because someone attempts to dry clean clothing with an inflammable liquid. The liquid may be gasoline, benzene, or naphtha; all of them are used and each is very dangerous, according to Fire Chief K. B. Phillips.

Most people do not realize the real danger when they use these inflammable liquids. They understand that they must not be exposed to open flames, but are unaware that often explosions and fires result when no fire is near the pan containing the fluid. Each of the three liquids gives off an invisible vapor which is heavier than air and will flow along the floor like water. If this unseen stream reaches any flame, such as that in a heater, an explosion will result. Vapors have been known to travel twenty feet and explode.

Another danger is that of sparks that result when the garments are rubbed in the hands. The rubbing creates what is called "static" electricity, sparks from which are similar to those caused by passing a comb through the hair or stroking a cat's back. The sparks are sufficiently hot to ignite vapors being given off and cause an explosion.

Hazards of home dry cleaning have been proven by scientific experiments. Worse than that, they are verified by the number of horribly burned people every year, according to the Chief. He believes that none who fully understand the danger to which he is exposing himself and others by using gasoline, benzene, or naphtha in the home will continue the practice.

"At best," he said, "you can save only a few cents by doing your cleaning at home. Surely that's very little compared to the terrible cost in fire loss and in suffering if a fire explosion should result. The danger is always present when gasoline or other vapors are liberated. I heard of a case that was particularly horrible not long ago. A lady was using gasoline on the porch. Her husband came up from the back yard with a cigar in his mouth. Somehow that cigar ignited the fumes of the gasoline, and they both were killed. The house was blown off its foundation. I certainly hope nothing like that ever happens in our community."

"HAIN'T GOIN' TO BE NO FLOOD"

(Drew and Leon Pearson in Harper's Magazine)

On Cedar Creek in the Tennessee Valley lives Isabel Brantley.

"I was born in this house and so was my pappy before me, and here I've lived and here I'll die, even if I have to bolt the door and let the flood come—but there hain't a'going to be no flood!"

This was her greeting to the TVA appraisers, prepared to offer $1,200 for her log cabin and eroded acres.

In the end she was won over by the generosity of TVA laborers, who offered to move the house in their spare time, without cost to her, to a site below the dam. Persuaded but not softened, she declared: "You got to find me a place with a spring or a well. I don't want none of that newfangled pipe water runnin' into my house."

Such is the resistance encountered by government agents.

It is a common sight in the hill country to see a barrel standing under the eaves of a house, a plank slanting outward from the top. This device for collecting rain water saves many a trip to the spring and is a fitting part of a picture where sticks are used for plaster in piling field stone together for a chimney, where sweet fennel tea is fed to a hog that is "down at the loins," and where the women folks sit by the hearth chewing snuff, plucking seeds from raw cotton, and spitting into the fire.

While the passing of recent years have revolutionized other communities, the homes on Lost Creek and Cedar Creek and Big Barren Creek have remained the same. Even the sites of haystacks seldom vary as TVA surveyors found out when called upon to appraise the boundary as follows:

"Beginning at a white oak across the Cedar Creek road; thence a direct line to a fodderstack in the field; thence to the angle in the rail fence, and with the same to the creek; thence down the yan side of the creek to opposite where the house stood in 1853.

One farmer when shown an aerial map of his place, stood in open-mouthed wonder before its accuracy of detail. Then pointing to a dark spot in the corner, he exclaimed: "Why, if ther ain't the thicket where I shot Tom Bailey!"

Art and Propaganda
"In order for an artist really to execute a work of art, he must leave a message to deliver; but if any message is to sway people, then it is what is known as propaganda. Hence is it true, real art must be propaganda."—Edwin Shelly.

BLUEGRASS SEEDS CROP, HAY, TOBACCO, CUT BY DROUTH

Bluegrass seed harvest is in progress this week. The crop of seed in grass this week. The crop of seed in central Kentucky is the poorest in 25 to 30 years. It has been estimated that hardly 25 per cent of an average crop will be stripped in Woodford county.

The hay crop here, except lespedeza, is almost a failure.

Tobacco that has been set, pastures, lawns and gardens are suffering for rain. Corn is generally reported as doing well. A few farmers in the county had to replant whole fields of corn because of poor germination.
