Dear Stuart,
Life without a memory is not a very interesting life. In other words you are what you remember.
At our age, we have built up a long history. As long as we don't forget the past, because that time determines your personality or in other words: who we are.
Short memory determines whether or not we can cope with everyday life.
It is sad to report that Vera's short memory is fading. She is in a phase of denial that there is something wrong with her memory.
This Saturday we're going by car to Pianello along Lake Como, the place Vera loves. In Menaggio we attend a memorial service of a good friend who passed away during the lockdown period in Italy. We plan to stay there two weeks and thereafter to return to Amsterdam. Weather permitting we stay a couple of days in Switzerland.

Let me bring up a piece of the past in my memory:
Here below a scribble and a report of a get together with Brian Constant and Mike Pattinson. Would I have been a wiser man if I had torn those two pieces of paper?

Love to Ursula and you from both of us, Adriaan

It is great to share for failure proof performance. Just as the discipline of practice!!

"Good managers are cautious, but not too cautious. If they show an excessive fear of mistakes, the initiative of their associates can be stifled. People get supercautious if every little slipup tends to involve their managers". I couldn't agree more
