

Frye & Company's Packing House Plant

The accompanying cut is that of the buildings and grounds of the Frye & Company's packing house plant, the largest of its kind on the Pacific Coast. This industry has grown apace with Seattle and its product covers the entire Northwest, including Alaska and Uncle Sam's Pacific Ocean insular possessions. It is practically without a rival in the Northwest, which means that it is one of Seattle's most valuable industrial concerns.

This Company, with its dependent industries, employs hundreds of men every day and their employes are able to get in 6½ days each week, including overtime, and the wages earned by the men range from $3 to $4 per day.

The managers of the concern are anxious to fill up their long list of employes with steady, reliable men, and such men would get employment year in and year out. Like most of the industrial concerns in this section no color line is drawn in employing men, which means the black man and the white man stand side by side and the one that makes good is the one that gets the permanent position.

Thousands of dollars have been recently spent by this company in not only increasing its capacity, but also in putting the plant in the most sanitary condition. Even prior to the Chicago Packinghouse clean up, the Frye-Bruhn Company had been given a government inspector at its own solicitation. Seattle may well be proud of this thriving industry within her gates.
