Playing By The Rules Pays Off For Seattle Goodwill's Graduate Of The Year

High school dropouts, law offenders and single mothers are not the only people who may find themselves in need of help. Seattle Goodwill Graduate of the Year, Patrice Baugh, will tell you.

Baugh did not fit into any of the categories named above. But even with a diploma from a Nashville High School, she could not find a job with potential for growth and advancement and was unable to afford further education.

Before leaving her native Nashville for Seattle in 1991, Baugh sought the help of social service agencies in learning viable job skills. "I found I did not qualify for help. I was receiving a confusing message -- 'tough luck, you played by the rules' it seemed to be saying."

Baugh did not receive that message from Seattle Goodwill, whose programs are open to anyone who needs job training or improved literacy skills. She became a Goodwill trainee and took full advantage of the vocational training courses acquiring computer knowledge and other valuable skills while she earned money by working in goodwill's plant.

Prior to completing the Goodwill program in May 1992, Baugh went to a fair where she met Paul Garcia, Seattle Times employment specialist and chairman of the newspaper's outreach committee. He was impressed with Baugh's skills and hired her as a customer service representative in the circulation department.

Since then, Baugh has shown that motivation and hard work really do pay off. She has won the Seattle Times quarterly customer service excellent award, ellence award, volunteered to do payroll for the department and to take notes at the community outreach committee meetings and recently received a promotion to classified senior clerk in the advertising department.

On December 1, at the Goodwill's 1992 Graduate of the Year ceremony (a one year lag is necessary to evaluate the graduates' progress after leaving Goodwill, employees, guests and supporters of the organization gathered to celebrate Baugh's accomplishments. KOMO television personality Steve Pool delivered the keynote speech and presented Baugh with her distinguished award.

I believe the only way to repay you all is to endeavor to become the best person I can be, and to duly serve as a model of what can happen to someone when a company, a community, and ultimately a country believes its best resources for the future are well trained people," Baugh said during her acceptance speech. "I have grown so much in the past two years and I can point to support from so many directions. Now it's up to me to be a helping hand wherever to whomever possible."

U.S. Senator Patty Murray D-Washington

Born in Seattle in 1950, Patty Murray is a lifelong citizen of Washington State, a dedicated parent and an outspoken advocate for those who face everyday challenges in America today.

Patty and her husband, Rob, whom she met while attending Washington State University, were working and raising two children when the Washington State legislature announced plans to cut funding for parent-child education programs. Murray, at that time a parent volunteer for the Shoreline Community Cooperative School, decided to fight to keep state funding for the program. Onlookers thought she would have no impact. One state legislator she lobbied told her she could not make a difference because she was just a "mom in tennis shoes." The grassroots campaign she organized triumphed, and the victory gave Murray the basis for a decade long trek to the United States Senate.

In 1988, Murray realized that in order to truly make a difference, she needed to be in Olympia as a legislator. She ran for the State Senate and unseated a two-term Republican incumbent. Before long, Murray was viewed as a formidable force, serving as the Democratic Whip in Senate from 1990 to 1992.

It was the offensive grilling of Anita Hill by the all-male Judiciary Committee during the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings that persuaded Murray to announce her candidacy for the U.S. Senate. Considered an underdog by the press and her own party, Murray worked her way to the Democratic primary victory, eventually vanquishing five-term incumbent U.S. Representative Rod Chandler in the general election, 54 to 46 percent.

Senator Murray is now gathering influence in Washington, D.C., with appointments; to the powerful Appropriations Budget; and Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committees. Although only a freshman Senator, she has already been an important voice on such issues as trade, family and medical leave, the budget, the Resolution Trust Corporation, and the President's forest economic package, which will help timber-dependent communities on the Olympic Peninsula.

Sen. Murray, her husband, Rob, and their two children, Randy and Sara, moved east when Sen. Murray won election to the U.S. Senate. They live in Arlington, Virginia.

Central Chamber of Commerce News Four Honors Given to Outstanding Youth Workers

December 19th was a cheerful day for the following four youth workers: Frankie Hendrix, Barbara Moreland, Caroline Morgan, Johnnie Fisher.

These women have a lot in common but they share a host of different problems and tasks to fill. Along with a sick husband and a full time job, Freddie Hendrix has kept all three of her stepchildren. She says it is important to keep them together; Barbara Moreland works a full time job, a part-time student at a local University, a single parent, has added into her household three children from the community gang club; Caroline Morgan is a grandmother and a mother to the church of a large youth taskforce, takes care of children from a variety of ethnically diverse backgrounds; Johnnie Fisher inherited her grandchildren through death and is very happy that she is in a position to share time with the upbringing of her four grandsons.

Central Area Chamber of Commerce was so proud to have been able to present certificates to these four lovely women and we deeply appreciate all our supporters for making this event take place. Merry Christmas.
