Once upon a time, at the foot of the majestic Kaatskill Mountains, a quaint Dutch village flowered during the days of Peter Stuyvesant. In this very village lived a simple, good-natured fellow, Rip Van Winkle. He was a kind neighbor, a friendly gossip, a true ne'er-do-well, and an obedient henpecked husband. The great blemish in Rip's composition was an insuperable aversion to all kinds of profitable labor. If dogs possess the same characteristics, Wolf, Rip's sole domestic adherent, was of the same make-up as his master. Dame Van Winkle regarded them as companions in idleness, and both suffered under the lashing tongue of this termagant shrew. Therefore, Rip and Wolf often took to the woods to escape Dame Van Winkle's severe

In the course of one of these escapist movements, Rip journeyed to one of the highest points of the Kaatskill Mountains. As he was about to descend, he was summoned by a short, square-built old fellow with thick bushy hair and a grizzled beard. On approaching Rip, he made signs indicating his desire for assistance in carrying a stout keg which he bore on his shoulders. Rip complied with his usual alacrity, and they ascended through a small ravine into a natural amphitheatre. On entering the hollow, Rip discerned a company of odd-looking personages, similar to his companion, dressed in the style of antique Dutch or Flemish. As a result of Rip's appearance on the scene, they desisted from their game of ninepins, formed a semi-circle, and proceeded to judge Rip in a manner re-sembling that of well-conducted

Rip was received into the company of the mountaineers and learned that their leader was one Hendrick Hudson, a Dutch explorer. The little men was hospitable enough so that Rip's awe and apprehension finally subsided. As he watched them empty the contents of the keg (the same one which he so laboriously helped to transport) into large flagons, he suddenly realized he was very thirsty. To quench his parched throat, he ventured to taste the beverage, which he found had much of the flavor of excellent Hollands. Being extremely thirsty, he naturally repeated the draught. One taste provoked another and soon his natural loquaciousness overrode his anxiety. With the help of the stimulating liquid, he soon turned his adventure into one of those riotous

After many visits to the flagon, Rip's senses were finally overpowered, his eyes swam in his head, his muscles gradually relaxed, and he fell into a deep sleep. A deep sleep (?), rather a lengthy one, one of twenty years to be exact. On awakening, poor Rip was in a quandry. The previous experience with the flagon remained as a vague memory. What he could remember, he could not verify because of the changed setting. He noted that his once well-oiled fowling piece was now an antiquated firelock, his dog had disappeared, and his beard had grown a foot long. Fear of Dame Van Winkle's remonstrances caused him to hurry back to the village. As he approached, he met many people, but none whom he knew. They stared at him as though he were an oddity. As he walked down the village street, he was jeered at and taunted by a strange group of children returning from their

PHYSICAL EDUCATION

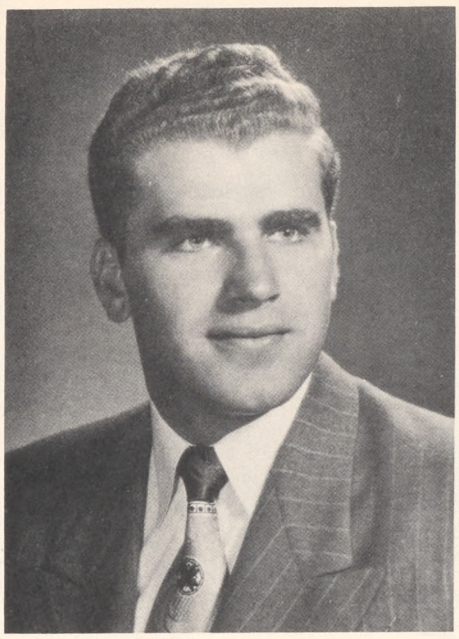

During the long period in which Rip was bathing peacefully in the arms of Morpheus, his subconscious mind was hard at work. As the effects of the fine Hollands wore off and the mountains and sky stopped whirling, Rip's dream took on definite shape and form. Education, luxury, security, happiness —all these were the focal points of the vision conjured from the inner recesses of his imaginative mind. A college degree, with all the respect due its holder, occupied the center of the stage. Futuristic conceptions of magnificent edifices, modes of transportation, and ways of life were also crystallized in his mind's eye during the long sleep. With all these advantages and achievements, Rip's subconscious assured him that he would forever be lauded and admired, even by his

Because of his aged appearance, Rip had great difficulty in establishing his identity. No one in town seemed to remember him. After much questioning by Rip and the townfolk, it was ascertained that he was Rip Van Winkle, the same person who had disappeared twenty years ago. His story was confirmed by one Peter Vanderdonk, the most ancient inhabitant of the village. According to the old sage, Hendrik Hudson revisisted the Kaatskills every twenty years. Rather than bore themselves to death by mere drinking, Hudson and his crew added variety to the festivities by playing ninepins in the hollow of the mountain. During the ensuing days of gossip, Rip told and retold the story. With every telling, the narration got longer or shorter, depending on the time available. But Rip never omitted the portion wherein he and Hendrik Hudson were engaged in ninepins, one of the best of
