"Yes, I guess I'd better see the doctor," was answered. The deacon got up and left the house. But he didn't call on Doctor Green. His team was around the corner, and he climbed into his wagon and drove home. He had no more the rippling notes of the girl's voice and all night he dreamed of them. It was at breakfast the next morning that he again ventured to speak of her.

"Oh, here she comes, now," cried Miss Parsons. "She's bringing over the eggs. I'll tell her what you said."

the spinster giggled. Having been deprived of romance in her own life, she immediately scented the beginning of one here.

"I did enjoy your—voice," Titus found himself saying, after he had acknowledged the introduction.

The girl laughed. "You save yourself," she said, with a reproving finger raised toward him; "you say—my voice. Can you honestly say you enjoyed the song?" she asked.

Titus joined her laughter. "As you sang it—yes," he admitted. "Though I didn't think any one in the world ever sang it any more."

"Did you ever—cry over it when you were little?" she asked.
