"America's teen-agers are suffering from an illusion . . . the idea that the world owes them everything. It is not difficult to perceive where this belief was given birth. Today the teen-ager is confronted with numerous examples of adults being rewarded for nothing. The Government pays people who are not working . . . and dishonesty in every-day transactions is condoned and rewarded. A teen-ager can hardly help but think that he deserves something also . . .

"This illusion has choked initiative and destroyed self-pride. The teen-ager is no longer driven to higher goals but merely waits for things to be handed to him. The teen-ager no longer feels embarrassment when taking something for nothing, but accepts it as the natural course of events. Although most teen-agers feel everything should be handed to them on a 'silver platter,' they soon learn that is not the case . . . "This may come as a rude shock to today's teen-agers but the world owes you nothing . . . Teen-agers owe all their efforts to the world in which they live."
