POLLEN

Like dust, it was everywhere, a fine bright storm
billowing over barns
and feedlots, making
all the livestock shine,
the horses one color.
And for weeks it was
our weather, it's what we wore, what
my mother kept sweeping
out into the air
and what the air
kept giving back, what long after dark I'd pass through pedaling home, and home
what I always wanted to find, to have it there each morning when I woke,
shimmering
on floors, mirrors,
giving importance
to whatever was common,
whatever was ours.
