

All that remains of Graybow are some bricks, a well, a mill pond, and a historical marker put there in 2003 by the descendants of the Galloway family and the Brotherhood of Timber Workers. It is still called Graybow; it is inhabited and has churches.^[9]

Other abandoned towns and communities

Bon Ami

This community is now considered the outskirts of DeRidder. A street that ran to Bon Ami from DeRidder still bears the name.^[10]

Carson

Carson is located about 6.5 miles from DeRidder.^[11]

Hall

Ludington

This community is within the city limits of DeRidder and is still known to local people as Ludington.^[12]

Neame

The area known to local people and reflected on maps, situated in Vernon Parish, no longer exists. Once a thriving lumber town, the only known remnants are a mill pond about 3.5 miles north of Rosepine, Louisiana, on the east side of highway 171, and two abandoned grave sites, one surrounded by trees near the old Neame mill pond and the other on the west side of highway 171 in the middle of a field. The latter is located on property south of and adjacent to a saw mill bearing the name Neame. There are some headstones dating to the early 1900s. Most of the graves are decaying, and many have already disappeared.^[13]

See also

- Anti-union violence
- Union violence
- Murder of workers in labor disputes in the United States

References

- kilgorennewsherald (<http://www.kilgorennewsherald.com/news/2006-01-05/World/011.html>) (subscription required)
- "Bloody Bogalusa, 1919" (<http://www.internationalist.org/bloodybogalusa19191202.html>). www.internationalist.org. Retrieved 2019-06-02.