

By Marion V. Allen
Jerry Wolf

On the construction of Hoover Dam, like any other job or business, there was a chain of command.

Directly under the executive committee was the general superintendent, Frank T. Crowe. If you wanted to go over his head you had to go to the Man Above, probably to find Him busy for in the thirties he was taking care of the needy people and the Board of Directors couldn't help you.

Under Mr. Crowe was the assistant superintendent, Woody Williams, called "the Kid" by all the old timers when Woody wasn't around. His main job was to smooth out some of the rough spots. Next to him came the walkers, Charlie Holden, Si Bous, Red Malan, Frank Fisher, Red McCabe, "Haywire" Huntington, Mel Russell, Dad Russell, Pop Baker, Floyd Huntington, C.A. Bacon, Charlie Williams and dozens more over a five year period. Each walker could have one to a dozen foremen and these foremen had as their pecking order or rating--a carpenter foreman or a con