A Visionary Engineer

By Morry Zenoff

POP SQUIRES entertained Rotarians yesterday with some breezy stories about the dam's early history. The old timer in these parts had much to do with the early development. One of his many positions was as chairman of the Tri-State group which decided what was to be given the states from the revenues the dam would earn.

This required considerable vision back in 1926, because man's wildest dreams could hardly envision the amount of power that would be sold or the amount of water that would be used.

Squires related how the very amount of water allotted for this area was strictly a guesswork deal, without benefit of engineering experts.
