

and Mrs. Rasmussen as their contractor. The builders ordered their roofing material straight from the "Tres Bien Manufacturing Company" for they realized that their roof would have to be strong and durable enough to withstand any rains, winds, or storms which might tend to destroy the interior. No sooner had they begun work than they found themselves competitors with their superiors, the Senior carpenters. However, they determined to prove to these more experienced workers that they were equally as competent as they. After engaging in archery, baseball, tennis, and hockey contests, climaxed by Junior - Senior day, they emerged the victors, thereby winning an award given by "The Builders of the Month Club." Although much of their time was consumed in these activities, they found time for another class tradition - that of entertaining the children at Riverside Mission. This experience inspired the builders as it had in previous years, and reminded them of the necessity of continuing their work conscientiously. Time passed quickly, and the group soon found themselves faced with the task of weaving a daisy chain to present at the annual Step-singing celebration, held in honor of their Senior carpenters, who were planning to move to larger construction centers. This event and the graduation of the Senior workers marked the end of another year, which had seen the carpenters well on their way to the completion of their "dream" house.

The final step was awaiting them as they returned in '54, bearing the title of authorized builders. Although the exterior appearance of the house gave the impression of being complete, the builders themselves knew that the most difficult task lay ahead of them. With the help of their leaders, Peggy Smith
