

and Mrs. Eggleston, they set about the task of inserting windows in the house, which might let in the light of love and inspiration, and doors, which would give them access to the surrounding world. Although this undertaking was a tedious one, each builder approached her task with optimism and determination despite the weight of responsibility which she was expected to carry. However, the workers had been warned by the carpenters of past years that they would undoubtedly experience periods of depression known as "Senior Crack-up Time." One of the more serious earthquakes which threatened to shake their house from its foundation was the deadly term paper which the builders were required to write for their English constructor. They were also overwhelmed by the work they had to complete for the Senior banquet, at which they reviewed their past accomplishments and looked into a very promising future. Throughout this time, the workers were competing with another group of builders, the inferior Junior carpenters. The struggle between the two classes was a bitter one, and often the builders were tempted to strike their underclassmen with their riveting hammers. Fortunately they remembered their dignity as "Senior preps" and rushed to quieten their nerves in the calm, relaxing atmosphere of the Senior house. Here they discussed plans for the Christmas party to be given at a home for retired women builders. They also decided to return once again to Riverside Mission and give a final party for their friends there. Another important event took place during their last year in the Harpeth Hall construction company - a formal dance was given for the first time in the company's new gymnasium. As the builders occupied themselves with each of these activities,
