FRENCH SHIP CHAMPIGNY
ARRIVES FROM SCOTLAND

MEMBER OF CREW
SUFFERS SCURVY

British Bark Glenogil Will Go
To Bunker Wharf This Morning

The French four-masted bark Champigny, Capt. Guerguin, 158 days from Brake, Scotland, arrived in port yesterday and anchored off the Santa Fe Wharf. The Champigny spent Thursday night at quarantine. One of the crew had contracted scurvy and his case was investigated by the port physician, Dr. Mc Kay. The case is not serious and the man will recover after a few weeks at St. Joseph's sanitarium, which has the contract for the patients of the government marine hospital. Dr. McKay stated that the sick man must have contracted the scurvy in a mild form before he shipped on the Champigny, as the duration of the voyage was not sufficient for the development of the disease, and there was no other case on shipboard, as there would have been had this case of scurvy originated on the Champigny.

The Champigny brings a cargo of 1865 tons of cement, pig iron, fertilizer and coke consigned to the Spreckels Brothers Commercial company. She will dock at the Santa Fe wharf this morning.

Capt. Guerguin reports that he had calm weather and light winds during much of the voyage. He made the dangerous passage around Cape Horn in twelve days, encountering one heavy storm, near the Straights (sic) of Magellan. Heavy weather was experienced from
