

Captain Engalls didn't go in steam. He had no use for steam. "To hell with the steamers," he said. "They took all the good ships off the seas and put on them steam boxes."

When he left the FALLS OF CLYDE, he didn't go anywhere else; he turned her over to Captain Smith. Engalls was by then an old man. And Smith didn't go into steam, either.

Henry Brammar made several passages in FALLS OF CLYDE as sailor in 1911, mostly between Honolulu and Gaviota. He joined her in drydock in San Francisco where she was having her bottom painted. Later, in 1916 he went out to Honolulu in her as sailor, when Capt. Smith had command, and made the voyage back as second mate, Fred Klebingat chief mate.
