. . . from baby

Would you believe? The Baltimore Orioles are being babied?

When a reporter visited the Florida training camp, he found the new head trainer busy ordering gallons of baby oil. His what-for brought the response, "to protect the pitchers against wind or raw weather."

It seems that a frequent change of undershirts (between workouts or pitching) with a new coat of baby oil on the skin underneath and on the arms keeps the players from getting chilled by the early season breezes.
