

Railroad Message Hoop

As trains passed by stations placed at regular intervals along the railroad, train orders received by telegraph operators could be handed up to passing trains through the use of message hoops. To take the message, the engineer caught the wide loop of string in his hand. The Telegrapher would then place an identical message in the hoop again for the conductor who usually rode in the caboose at the end of the train.