graves hastily dug in the dark earth. Fazlu's sons and nephews waited for local imam to finish another funeral to come tend to their uncle.

The bodies exhumed Monday included six members of the Bugujevi family and seven from the Duriqi family. Four of the dead were children.

Nimor Fazlu said he believes all the people were killed March 28, the same day his uncle disappeared after going to pray at the town mosque.
On that day, he said, Serbs rounded up people and took them to the Bugujevi family home, where they massacred them in the garden.

The graves will provide more evidence of the mass killings of thousands of ethnic Albanians during months of Serb terror, and war crimes tribunal investigators were present to document evidence.

NATO has struggled to prevent ethnic attacks, both by returning ethnic Albanian refugees seeking revenge against Kosovo's Serbian minority and others by Serbs targeting Albanians.

As hatred and violence persist in Kosovo, political fallout from the war is mounting in Serbia.

For nearly three weeks, protests against President Slobodan Milosevic and his government have spread over much of Serbia as the opposition tries to capitalize on public anger over the defeat by NATO and de facto loss of Kosovo. But the opposition remains fractured.

In an interview with the Montenegrin Vjesti daily published Monday, opposition leader Zoran Djindjic rejected cooperation with rival Vuk Draskovic, who has said that Milosevic's ouster should not be the main opposition goal.
